The law was studied by top religious experts to make sure it was in conformity with the sharia. What I have gathered from reading the clippings is that they removed some things that were perhaps more liberal, such as a woman's not needing her husband's permission to work, so that this law got past the religious officials. Even so, Sadat did not want to submit it to the congress for debate because he thought that everything would be overemotional. So he passed it by emergency decree in 1979. Anwar Sadat was killed in 1981, and in 1985, the law was challenged on the grounds that it was unconstitutional, because there had been no emergency and the president had not been entitled to use his emergency powers to pass it by decree. The court agreed and the law was overturned.

A huge debate followed, with women and men on one side saying, “This is ridiculous; women are entitled to their equal rights, to their full rights;” and using examples from the Koran, and others saying, “No, women should be seen and not heard, their place is in the home.” (It was actually very similar to debates in other countries around the world.) The beneficial part was that the issue was debated—you couldn’t avoid it—it was on television, radio, and in the press. And the UN conference in Nairobi in 1985 played a large role in getting a new law passed—I’m not sure how far the women activists would have gotten if the government hadn’t wanted to avoid looking “backward” at the conference. So within a few months a new law was drafted and after debate in the parliament it was passed in 1983.

It made minor changes to the 1979 law. For example, it reversed the provision that gave the first wife automatic grounds for divorce if the husband took a second wife; instead the judge would have to decide if the wife was harmed by the second marriage. And the onus would be on the woman really to prove whether she was being harmed or not. This would all happen in the civil courts.

I think it should be mentioned at this point that although a man may be legally entitled to take a second wife, the tradition is actually one woman/one man throughout the Arab world. Polygamy exists in only 2% to 10% of marriages, with perhaps a higher percentage in the Gulf countries, where more people can afford it.

When I started to do the research for my book, I found that a lot of the writing about women in the Arab world or (especially) women in the Muslim world starts from the premise that Islam is a conservative religion, that it’s holding women back. I found this really irritating, and many people were making that assumption, economists as well, saying you don’t find many women in the work force because Islam is a conservative religion, and so on. I did not find this a convincing argument. As I said in the introduction to my book, I did not want either to defend or attack Islam. I wanted to try and see what the actual situation was and try perhaps to put the debate in a more rational framework. If the economic situation changes, maybe people will then turn to the religion to find new arguments to defend those changes, or maybe not.

20184. Policy Research for Development Alternative: UBINIG: Asian Women's Human Rights Council; AWHRC. Press Release: International Public Hearing on Crimes Against Women Related To Population Policies. To Be Held In Cairo, Egypt. Policy Research for Development Alternative (UBINIG); Asian Women's Human Rights Council (AWHRC), September 7, 1994. [Secretariat : AWHRC (Philippines) & UBINIG (Bangladesh), AWHRC : P.O. Box 190; 1099 Manila; The Philippines Tel: 9244824; Fax: (632) 9110513/9110535; UBINIG : 5/3 Barabo Mahanpur, Ring Road, Shaymolli, Dhaka 1207, Bangladesh, Tel: 811465/816420; Fax: (880-2) 813065; E-mail: Ubinig[a]dak.gn.apc.org] We would like to announce the "International Public Hearing on Crimes Against Women Related to Population Policies" which will be held on 9/7/1994, at 10:00 am to 6:00 pm in conjunction with the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) in Cairo, Egypt. The International Public Hearing will be open to all who are interested in attending, and will involve Testimonies by women for various regions on their experiences with population programs and policies. There will be two sessions, the first on women's Experiences with Reproductive Technologies used under population Policies and Programs, and the second on the linkages Between Population Policies and Women's Rights. The Juries will also help in formulating recommendations for the future that address women's real needs. We invite you to help us publicize this International Public Hearing and to participate in the audience. We also invite you to contact us if you wish to share your own Testimony, though the number of witnesses will need to be fairly limited, due to time. We believe it is important to inject women's reality into the debates on Population and Development, as many of these discussions have been stripped of their context. The International Public Hearing is an effort to put the reality of women's lives and women's real needs at the centre of the Cairo Conferences, in a way that builds on and validates women's experiences and Knowledge. For more information, contact the Secretariat: UBINIG (Policy Research for Development Alternative); AWHRC (Asian Women's Human Rights Council) [secretariat: awhrc@iafrica.org, ubinig@dak.gn.apc.org].

SPONSORING ORGANISATIONS: Terra Feminia, Latin America; Boston Women's Health Collective/Women and Environment, USA; WIDE (Network Women in Development Europe), Europe; AWHRC (Asian Women's Human Rights Council), Philippines; UBINIG (Policy Research for Development Alternative), Bangladesh; Arab Women's Organisation, Egypt; People's Health Network, India; Women of Zagreb, Yugoslavia. [—]

20185. Pomeroy, Sarah B. Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexander to Cleopatra: Part 1: Introduction: The Status of Greek Women in Egypt. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1990. pp. xx-xix. Establishing the status of Greek women in Hellenistic Egypt is a difficult task, and comparative studies are best done vis-a-vis other classical societies: classical Greece (essentially ancient Athens) and the Roman Republic. The status of Greek women in Ptolemaic Egypt has provided a vast literature, and is conditioned by their membership in an aristocratic ruling class and of the dimished polarity between men and women in the Hellenistic world. Greek women in Ptolemaic Egypt exercised unusual power in both the domestic and public economy, and as queens managed to eliminate gender hierarchy for a brief period in Classical antiquity. [TXT]

20186. Pomeroy, Sarah B. Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexanderto Cleopatra: Part 2: Queens. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1990. pp. 3-40. In the Hellenistic period in Egypt, Macedonians were politically dominant and their queens provided the model for Greek women. Little is known of the patriarchal Macedonian social structure, but it is clear that many Macedonian wives were buried as warriors, possibly because they were 'Amazons' [sic]. In addition, the expansion of the small Macedonian tribal kingdom into a world empire created a period of extreme social change: as the army was abroad women took a fuller role in running society, and the small number of Macedonians in the vast empire maintained the new roles of Macedonian women.

The Hellenistic queens had a largely private role, and such a role is flexible and depends on individual personalities. Macedonian queens had great wealth and controlled their own resources; queens employed their resources in the same manner as kings but only on a smaller scale, such as gifts to gods and sanctuaries. While various Greek states allowed marriage between half-siblings, in order to better secure their legitimacy as Pharaohs, the Ptolemies adopted brother-sister marriage in the manner of at least some dynasties. In the second century BC, when Egypt was wracked by attacks and civil unrest, queens acquired greater political power: the populace increasingly accepted the powers of queens as legitimate. Cleopatra VII, well documented because of her interaction with many key figures in the late history of the Roman Republic, was typical of the later Hellenistic queens: conducting wars and foreign affairs independently. Both Hellenic kings and queens were deified in the Egyptian manner: while the deification of men followed the pattered drachmas. While various Greek states husband's obligations (especially clothing), and conditions for divorce (men were typically not expected to be monogamous, but such extramarital associations were expected to be casual and inexpensive). [Papyrus Elephantine 1] Marriage Contract from Elephantine, dated to 311-310 BC. In the seventh year of the reign of Alexander, son of Alexander, the fourteenth year of Ptolemy's administration as satrap in the month of Dous. Contract of marriage of Heracleides of Temnos and Demetria. Heracleides takes as his lawful wife Demetria of Cos from the father Leptines of Cos and her mother Philotis. He is free, she is free. She brings with her to the marriage clothing and ornament valued at 1000 drachmas. Heracleides shall supply to Demetri all that is suitable for a woman, which Demetria shall retain all that she has brought with her. But Heracleides shall prove whatever he charges against Demetria before three men whom they both approve. It shall not be lawful for Heracleides to bring home another woman for himself in such a way as to inflict contumely on Demetria, nor to beget children by another woman, nor to indulge in fraudulent machinations against Demetria on any pretext. If Heracleides is caught doing any of these things, and Demetria proves it before three men whom they both approve, let Heracleides return to Demetria the dowry of 1000 drachmas which she brought, and forfeit 1000 drachmas of the silver coinage of [Ptolemy bearing a portrait head of] Alexander. Demetria, and those representing Demetria, shall have the right to exact payment from Heracleides and from his property on both land and sea, as if after a legal action. This contract shall be decisive in every respect, where Heracleides may produce it against Demetria, or Demetria and those helping Demetria to exact payment may produce it against Heracleides, as though the agreement had been made in that place. Heracleides and Demetria shall each have the right to keep a copy of the contract in their own custody, and to produce it against one another. Witnesses: Cleon of Gela, Anticrates of Temnos, Lysis of Temnos, Dionysius of Temnos, Aristocamus of Cyrene, Aristocidas of Cos.

20188. Pomeroy, Sarah B. Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexander to Cleopatra: Part 4: Some Married Women in the Papyri. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1990. pp. 83-124. Marriage contracts on papyrus are the richest source of information on ideal relationships between wives and husbands of people who were not royals and were not figures in literature (few are from Alexandria). These contracts are from smaller Greek settlements, such as Ptolemais and Naucratis, and reflect a more conservative Greek milieu in Egypt, in contradistinction to Alexandria. The contracts were between men, since women could not sign a contract. The contract included: dowries, husband's obligations (especially clothing), and conditions for divorce (men were typically not expected to be monogamous, but such extramarital associations were expected to be casual and inexpensive).
dated to 92 BC (used to reused to wrap a crocodile mummy in the necropolis at Tebtunis). In the twenty-second year of the reign of Ptolemy also called Alexander, the god Philometor, the priesthood of the priest of Alexander and the other priests as listed in Alexandria, the eleventh of the month Xandicus which is the eleventh of the month Mecheir at Cercosiris in the district of Polemon in the Arsinoite Philiscus, son of Apollonius, Persian of the Epigone, acknowledges to Apollonia (also known as Cleaullitha, daughter of Heracleides, Persian, with her brother Apollonius as guardian, that he has received from her 2 talents and 4000 drachmas in copper coinage as her dowry agreed to by him. Apollonia is to remain with Philiscus, obeying him as a wife should her husband, owning their property in common. Philiscus is to provide everything necessary both clothing and whatever else is appropriate for a wedded wife, whether he is at home or away, according to the standard of their common resources. It shall not be lawful for Philiscus to bring home for himself another wife in addition to Apollonia nor to maintain a female concubine nor a little boyfrend nor to beget children by another woman while Apollonia is alive, nor to dwell in another house over which Apollonia has no rights, nor to throw her out, nor insult her or treat her badly, nor to alienate any of their common property to defraud Apollonia. If he is shown to be doing any of these things, or not to be providing her with necessities and clothing and other things as written, Philiscus is to pay the dowry of 2 talents and 4000 drachmas of copper in full to Apollonia, immediately. In the same way it shall not be lawful for Apollonia to be absent for a night or a day from the house of Philiscus without the knowledge of Philiscus, nor to have intercourse with another man nor to ruim the common household nor to dishonor Philiscus in whatever brings dishonor to a husband. And if Apollonia of her own free will wishes to separate from Philiscus, Philiscus is to return the dowry unaltered within ten days from the day the demand is made. If he does not return it, as written, he is to forfeit one and a half times the amount of the dowry to her immediately. Witnesses: Dionysius, son of Patron; Dionysius, son of Hermiascus; Theon, son of Ptolemy; Didymus, son of Ptolemy; Dionysius, son of Dionysius; Heracleus, son of Diocles (all six Macedonians of the Epigone); Guardian of the contract: Dionysius. Signed: I, Philiscus, son of Apollonius, Persian of the Epigone, acknowledge that I have the dowry of 2 talents and 4000 drachmas of copper as written above, and I have deposited the contract, which is valid, with Dionysius, Dionysius, son of Hermiascus; the aforesaid, wrote for him [Philiscus] since he is illiterate.

20189. Pomeroy, Sarah B. Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexander to Cleopatra: Part 5: Slaves and Workers. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1990. pp. 125-147. Slavery existed in all ancient Greek and Hellenistic societies: the numbers of slaves in Hellenistic Egypt remains a matter of debate (one reason for the difficulty is that there is a terminological confusion resulting from the use of the same words to designate slaves and young men or women). There is also considerable overlap in the occupations of poor freemen and freewomen and slaves. There was also considerable geographic variation in the number of slaves, and the number of slaves varied over time. The major source of slaves in early Hellenistic Egypt was conquest in Palestine and Syria: slaves were imported as war booty and their usual language was aramaic. Female slaves bore children frequently and their children were also slaves: when the father of the children was the owner of the female slave, manumission by testament was common (such manumission was the only form known in Hellenistic societies). Concubination was common among slaves, especially due to the shortage of Greek women. Reproduction of slaves was a more important source of slaves that slavery concomitant upon conquest. A small source of slaves was rescuing exposed infants: under law, such infants were presumed to be slaves (exposure was rare under the Ptolemies and became a general practice only under the Romans in Egypt). Women were often slave owners, although usually women owned female slaves. The ownership of slaves is documented in dowry documents, marriage contracts and wills.

20190. Pomeroy, Sarah B. Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexander to Cleopatra: Part 6: Women's Role in the Economy. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1990. pp. 148-173. The basis of the ancient economy was ownership of land: however, there is much uncertainty about land tenure in Ptolemaic Egypt. Gradually, land became alienable, and as early as the first century BC, a brotherless daughter inherited her father's kleros (cleruch land granted to soldiers). Women are documented as leaseholders of temple sacred lands (of 539 known leaseholders of sacred land, 48 are women). Of 664 documented owners of private land, 51 are women; the lands of women are documented to include vineyards, vegetable gradens and orchards of dates, olives and sycamores. Over time, women's ability to own land changed dramatically, with women winning more rights to own land, especially, finally, winning the right to own clerarch lands. The major means by which women became landowners was by inheritance; there is no dowry document that mentions the transfer of land to women.

In addition to agriculture, women worked in industry, were merchants, and held domestic worker jobs. Occupations known to have been held by women include food preparation, clothing manufacturing and wet-nursing. In wealthier households, such occupational nuches were pre-empted by slaves. The most common occupation of Greek women were working in wool: women of all classes worked in wool in Classical Greece.

Women played a larger role in the economy in Ptolemaic Egypt than in any other Greek society, acting as landowners, industrialists, and professionals, in addition to more lowly occupations that often competed directly with slave labor. Women owned the same kind of property held by men, but less of it. Women were active in money markets as both lenders and borrowers. While the Greek legal system required women to have the signature of a guardian (kyrios) on a contract, businesswomen could choose to operate under the Egyptian legal code which did not require a guardian. In no other Greek society would there be less economic distinction between genders as in Hellenistic Egypt.

20191. Powell, Eileen Alt. "Population Plan Approved Amid Continuous Hagglng", in Seattle Times, September 13, 1994. p. A7. The UN Population Conference approved a 20 year plan to slow population growth and to stimulate economic development. The Program of Action calls for empowerment of women as the keystone of this strategy. The non-binding platform was adopted by consensus with 20 delegations rejecting the abortion provisions [sic: consensus means unanimous and is here misused]. Libya, Iran and Yemen were among the 20 delegations noting objections to the abortion clause.

20192. Religious Interest Group of The US Network for Cairo "Press Release: Statement of Principles Regarding Population and Development. Religious Interest Group of The US Network for Cairo, August 17, 1994. You are invited to sign on to the attached statement of principles regarding population and development. This statement had been drafted by the Religious Interest Group of The US Network for Cairo in preparation for the International Conference on Population and Development to be held in Cairo, Egypt on 9/5-14/1994. This statement is also intended to be a part of a study package the Religious Interest Group is preparing for use by communities of faith in discussing the results of the Cairo gathering and the issues of population and development. This package will contain this Statement of Principles, as well as statements, pronouncements, and study guides prepared by religious communions or communities of interest. [Rev. Douglas B. Hunt, Convenor, Religious Interest Group, c/o US Network for Cairo 94; fax: 202-332-2302 tel; phone: 202-332-2200]. Religious Interest Group, US Network for Cairo 94: Statement of Principles: Economic and Social Context: As members of religious organizations, we believe that it is essential that statements of principle regarding population and sustainable development be grounded in our shared belief in a common Creator. All existence is a gift from that Creator who calls all into relationships based on world justice, equity, and respect for the integrity of all creation. Economic and social systems that rely on exploitation or exacerbate gender, race, age and class inequalities are, therefore, an affront to God. Likewise, our respect for the integrity of creation dictates that no people or species has the right to live in ways that threaten the ability of others to sustain their own lives. The world’s dominant economic system relies on ever-expanding production and consumption. This system has historically exploited the labor and resources of women and the poor, and enslaved and oppressed communities of color and indigenous people. We also see that the focus on maximizing profits by any means needed for results in imbalances between the environment and their access to and control of local resources; contributes to seemingly intractable poverty; and causes environmental degradation that threatens the diversity of life on the planet. This system also enables a minority of the earth’s people to consume a majority of the earth’s resources, threatening all of creation more immediately than any population pattern or pressure. We call upon all people of conscience to take steps to redress these situations.

Principles: Within the context of our shared religious commitments to justice, equity, peace, integrity of creation, and respect for human dignity; and recognizing the importance of the Programme of Action developed by the International Conference on Population and Development for the next generation; we have identified the following religious and ethical principles that we believe should be at the heart of concerns about population and development: Respect for human dignity calls all people and communities to acknowledge the basic human right of every child to be wanted, loved and nurtured; and to ensure that each child has the opportunity for a productive, happy and fulfilling life, and a future free from hunger and violence. Justice demands that control of one’s own sexual and reproductive life be recognized as a basic human right. Justice, equity, and respect for the integrity of creation require that health care, education, other concrete resources necessary for healthy, dignified lives, and the opportunity to secure a livelihood should be available to all people. Special attention must be given to lives and livelihoods of women, people of color, and indigenous peoples. Equity and justice require that all family partners share responsibility for family planning and that family and community life be based on full partnerships, respecting individuals’ responsibility for their own lives. Respect for human dignity compels societies to provide access to comprehensive quality health care, including information, education, and a full range of reproductive health care services. Equity and justice demand that all peoples be free to develop population and development policies and programs in accordance with their own needs and cultures, so long as these policies and programs are not coercive, respect basic human rights, and do not impinge on the rights of others. Equity and justice demand that in a world with a plurality of belief systems, no single system should be imposed on or held up as the standard or norm for all life. Equity, justice, and respect for the integrity of creation require that societies provide education and resources to empower personal and community decisions for sustainable lives. Respect for the integrity of all creation dictates that no species, including the human, has the right to propagate indefinitely or to live in ways which threaten the ability of other species or future generations of its own species to sustain their lives.

Religious Interest Group Drafting Group: Affiliation is listed for identification purposes only and does not imply endorsement. In some cases the position of a participant or the participant’s religious community may not be in agreement with this document or some portions of it.

[Douglas B. Hunt, Convenor (Network for Environmental & Economic Responsibility/United Church of Christ); Carol Benson-Holst, Ramona Brown (Ministry for Justice in Population Concerns); Kolya Braun (United Methodist Board For Global Ministries-Women’s Division); Sylvia Diss (North American Coalition on Religion & Ecology); Jane Hull Harvey (United Methodist Board for Church in Society); Karen Lombardi (Catholics for a Free Choice); Bernadine McRipley (Presbyterian Church, USA); Elmira Nazombe, Suzanne Paul (Church World Service).] [x]

Through half-closed eyes she looked at her husband. Lying on his right side, his body was intertwined with hers and his head bent over her right shoulder. As usual at such times she felt that he inhabited a world utterly different from hers, a world from which she had been excluded. Only when she became aware of the movements of his body, and of his and her access to and control of local resources; contributes to seemingly intractable poverty; and causes environmental degradation that threatens the diversity of life on the planet. This system also enables a minority of the earth’s people to consume a majority of the earth’s resources, threatening all of creation more immediately than any population pattern or pressure. We call upon all people of conscience to take steps to redress these situations.

Principles: Within the context of our shared religious commitments to justice, equity, peace, integrity of creation, and respect for human dignity; and recognizing the importance of the Programme of Action developed by the International Conference on Population and Development for the next generation; we have identified the following religious and ethical principles that we believe should be at the heart of concerns about population and development: Respect for human dignity calls all people and communities to acknowledge the basic human right of every child to be wanted, loved and nurtured; and to ensure that each child has the opportunity for a productive, happy and fulfilling life, and a future free from hunger and violence. Justice demands that control of one’s own sexual and reproductive life be recognized as a basic human right. Justice, equity, and respect for the integrity of creation require that health care, education, other concrete resources necessary for healthy, dignified lives, and the opportunity to secure a livelihood should be available to all people. Special attention must be given to lives and livelihoods of women, people of color, and indigenous peoples. Equity and justice require that all family partners share responsibility for family planning and that family and community life be based on full partnerships, respecting individuals’ responsibility for their own lives. Respect for human dignity compels societies to provide access to comprehensive quality health care, including information, education, and a full range of reproductive health care services. Equity and justice demand that all peoples be free to develop population and development policies and programs in accordance with their own needs and cultures, so long as these policies and programs are not coercive, respect basic human rights, and do not impinge on the rights of others. Equity and justice demand that in a world with a plurality of belief systems, no single system should be imposed on or held up as the standard or norm for all life. Equity, justice, and respect for the integrity of creation require that societies provide education and resources to empower personal and community decisions for sustainable lives. Respect for the integrity of all creation dictates that no species, including the human, has the right to propagate indefinitely or to live in ways which threaten the ability of other species or future generations of its own species to sustain their lives.

Religious Interest Group Drafting Group: Affiliation is listed for identification purposes only and does not imply endorsement. In some cases the position of a participant or the participant’s religious community may not be in agreement with this document or some portions of it.

[Douglas B. Hunt, Convenor (Network for Environmental & Economic Responsibility/United Church of Christ); Carol Benson-Holst, Ramona Brown (Ministry for Justice in Population Concerns); Kolya Braun (United Methodist Board For Global Ministries-Women’s Division); Sylvia Diss (North American Coalition on Religion & Ecology); Jane Hull Harvey (United Methodist Board for Church in Society); Karen Lombardi (Catholics for a Free Choice); Bernadine McRipley (Presbyterian Church, USA); Elmira Nazombe, Suzanne Paul (Church World Service).] [x]
performed, she seated herself on the edge of the prayer carpet and counted off her glorifications of the Almighty, three at a time on the joints of each finger. It was late autumn and the time for the sunset prayer would soon come and she enjoyed the thought that she would soon be praying again. Her five daily prayers were like punctuation marks that divided up and gave meaning to her life. Each prayer had for her a distinct quality, just as different foods had their own flavors. She folded up the carpet and went out onto the small balcony.

Dusting off the cane chair that stood there, she seated herself and looked down at the street from the sixth floor. She was assailed by the din of buses, the hooting of cars, the cries of street vendors and the raucous noise of competing radios from nearby flats. Clouds of smoke rose up from the outpourings of car exhausts veiling the view of the tall solitary minaret that could be seen between two towering blocks of flats. This single minaret, one of the twin minarets of the Mosque of Sultan Hasan, above it a thin slice of the Citadel, was all that was now left of the panoramic view she had once had of old Cairo, with its countless mosques and minarets against a background of the Kokkattam Hills and Mohammed Ali's Citadel.

Before marriage she had dreamed of having a house with a small garden in a quiet suburb such as Maadi or Helwan. On finding that it would be a long journey for her husband to work in the centre of the city, she had settled for this flat because of its view. But with the passing of the years, buildings had risen on all sides, gradually narrowing the view. In time this single minaret would also be obscured by some new building.

Aware of the approach of the call to sunset prayers, she left the balcony and went to the kitchen to prepare her husband's coffee. She filled the brass kanaka [coffeepot] with water and added a spoonful of coffee and a spoonful of sugar. Just as it was about to boil over she removed it from the stove and placed it on the tray with the coffee cup, for he liked to have the coffee poured out in front of him. She expected to find him sitting up in bed smoking a cigarette. The strange way his body was twisted immediately told her that something was wrong. She approached the bed and looked into the eyes that stared into space and suddenly she was aware of the odour of death in the room. She left and placed the tray with the coffee cup, for Peace. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 36, July 1991. pp. 26-27.

Almost automatically, we associate the Arab women's question" with fundamentalism. Even men talk about Islam as enemy number one for Arab women in their struggle for more individual and social self-determination. But the discrimination toward women has less to do with the economic and political relations of a patriarchal social structure.

Overwhelming economic problems are characteristic of many Arab countries. Together with the renewed hatred of the West, these conditions have given fundamentalist groups a new popularity. This tendency goes against the interests of women and has, since the beginning of the Gulf crisis, become more pronounced. These indirect consequences of the war are apparent to women in the Arab world, in particular, the tendency toward an increase in violence against women.

Over 50 billion dollars in debt before the Gulf war, Egypt had to deal with over half a million returnees from the Gulf states for the second time since 1989. Many women, who had lived in relative freedom and self-determination as the heads of the household during their husband's absence, were forced to take up traditional roles and accept control of the family by their husbands. In addition, the tourist industry suffered a 100% absence, were forced to take up traditional roles and accept control of the family by their husbands. In addition, the tourist industry suffered a 100% absorption. Worsening economic conditions meant more for Peace. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 36, July 1991. pp. 26-27.

Almost automatically, we associate the Arab women's question" with fundamentalism. Even men talk about Islam as enemy number one for Arab women in their struggle for more individual and social self-determination. But the discrimination toward women has less to do with the economic and political relations of a patriarchal social structure.

Overwhelming economic problems are characteristic of many Arab countries. Together with the renewed hatred of the West, these conditions have given fundamentalist groups a new popularity. This tendency goes against the interests of women and has, since the beginning of the Gulf crisis, become more pronounced. These indirect consequences of the war are apparent to women in the Arab world, in particular, the tendency toward an increase in violence against women.

Over 50 billion dollars in debt before the Gulf war, Egypt had to deal with over half a million returnees from the Gulf states for the second time since 1989. Many women, who had lived in relative freedom and self-determination as the heads of the household during their husband's absence, were forced to take up traditional roles and accept control of the family by their husbands. In addition, the tourist industry suffered a 100% absorption. Worsening economic conditions meant more for Peace. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 36, July 1991. pp. 26-27.

Almost automatically, we associate the Arab women's question" with fundamentalism. Even men talk about Islam as enemy number one for Arab women in their struggle for more individual and social self-determination. But the discrimination toward women has less to do with the economic and political relations of a patriarchal social structure.

Overwhelming economic problems are characteristic of many Arab countries. Together with the renewed hatred of the West, these conditions have given fundamentalist groups a new popularity. This tendency goes against the interests of women and has, since the beginning of the Gulf crisis, become more pronounced. These indirect consequences of the war are apparent to women in the Arab world, in particular, the tendency toward an increase in violence against women.

Over 50 billion dollars in debt before the Gulf war, Egypt had to deal with over half a million returnees from the Gulf states for the second time since 1989. Many women, who had lived in relative freedom and self-determination as the heads of the household during their husband's absence, were forced to take up traditional roles and accept control of the family by their husbands. In addition, the tourist industry suffered a 100% absorption. Worsening economic conditions meant more for Peace. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 36, July 1991. pp. 26-27.
associated polarization of the Arab world into forces for or against Iraq or the US, could be a set back for politically engaged women’s groups and cause serious disruptions in the work of international/Pan-Arab women’s groups such as AWSA (Arab Women’s Solidarity Association). At the international Women’s Peace conference in Geneva last 1/1990, it became obvious that differences between the Arab and the international women’s groups had been exacerbated. Demands for Iraq’s withdrawal from Kuwait, which are widely accepted by Arab women, are ignored by the Arab states, and even by the Permanent Council of Women’s Organizations. The “Women in Black,” Israeli and Palestinian women who have demonstrated weekly against the occupation of the West Bank since the beginning of the Intifada, staYed at home for the first time this 1/1991, because of the “complicated situation.” Thus women’s solidarity begins to fall apart.

In Arab countries the discussion of women’s liberation is in danger of being silenced by conservative political forces in the atmosphere of renewed nationalism and fundamentalism, cancelling gains made during the ‘80s. Just as the independent Arab women’s movement, represented by Fatima Mernissi and Nawal El-Saadawi among others, has been affected by the crisis and war in the Gulf, so have the fragile beginnings of democratization in the Arab world. When fighting-off foreign attack, in this case that of Iraq or of the USA, becomes the dominant political goal, the struggle for human rights, democracy and the debate over the position of women can easily get derailed—put on the back burner. One sign that this is happening is the recent mass arrests of countless human rights activists and journalists in Egypt. These events get scant coverage in Western media. Instead, fundamentalism is once again held up as an apparition/bogeyman, without any serious discussion.

The demonstrations of support for Saddam Hussein were met with a lack of understanding, evoking the myth of “holy war,” and firmly establishing a simple equation in Western minds: Arab equals Muslim equals fanatic. The impression is given that fundamentalism is a characteristic only of Islamic countries, in spite of the fact that there is a worldwide spread of fundamentalism.

For a long time, Arab social scientists have been resisting the concept of fundamentalism and searching for more adequate formulas: the social movements which define themselves in terms of Islam are described as “political Islam” or “Islamic movements,” for example. In this way, they attempt to account for the diversity of social programs and ideas that are propagated in the name of Islam, everything from the country of God to a social market economy.

Western feminists and some Arab feminists see Islam as the primary cause of Arab women’s oppression. A large number of Arab women activists vehemently resist ascribing so much importance to religious and cultural factors. In her book about women’s work in the Arab world, the Palestinian journalist Nadia Hijab shows that, in Jordan, for example, it is quite possible to interpret the Islamic moral creed so as to urge more women into the labor market, if the necessity arises.

Fatima Mernissi, a Moroccan sociologist and feminist researcher, notes, “At a level deeper than laws and official politics, Muslim social order conceive of woman as a powerful, aggressive individual, who can use her power to infiltrate the social order when she is not pushed into the corner. In the long run, this orientation could make women’s access to decision-making positions and power easier. One of the main obstacles for western women is that in their society women are seen as passive, subordinate beings.”

For Fatima Mernissi, current religious fundamentalism is more of a marginal problem. In her eyes, the biggest fundamentalist is “the state, because it officially discriminates against women through laws.” She holds the Arab states responsible for creating a feminine proletariat, easily manipulable on the national and international market, which can be sent back to the family hearth in emergencies on the pretext of marrying later and having smaller families. Young men have to wait for the family land to shrink further as population pressures become too intense. Overcrowding and land shortages are important factors (among such others as poverty and poor governance) in the tragic inter-ethnic conflicts in Rwanda. Overcrowding reaches terrible proportions: in the country as a whole, there are 405 people for every square kilometre -- and this rises to as many as 560 in Ruhengeri Prefecture. These are densities more usually seen in urban areas, imposed on a rural country. Crowding on the country’s limited agricultural land is already almost unthinkable high -- and before the current civil war, the population was set to double in just two decades. In 1990 there were 6.2 Rwandans for every cultivatable hectare; this will almost certainly rise to 9.1 by the end of this decade, and to 12.6 by 2010. Landholdings have fragmented. Even 10 years ago, families of up to eight children were living on plots as small as 0.13 hectares (approximately 30 by 40 metres) in Gisenyi and Cyangugu Prefectures. And these tiny plots will inevitably shrink further as population densities increase.

Land under pressure: In Rwanda -- as wherever fertilizers and the other high-technology inputs needed to increase yields are scarce -- population pressure causes more marginal land to be brought under the plough. Pastureland and forests are turned into cropland. Fallow periods are reduced, giving the soil less time to recover. All of this leads to soil erosion and, in the long run, to reduced soil fertility. Between 1970-1986, the amount of cultivated land in Rwanda increased by more than 50%, from 528,000 to 826,500 hectares. As a result, the amount of fallow land was cut almost in half and 60% of the pastureland disappeared, as it shrank from 4,980,000 to 1,990,000 hectares. This has particularly affected the minority Tutsi people, traditional pastoralists. People do modify their social behaviour under such pressures, and Rwandans have been marrying later and having smaller families. Young men have to wait longer to acquire the rugo - - the small plot of land necessary for raising a family; and when they do, they know they will have difficulty supporting the same number of children as their parents had. Knowledge and use of family planning have risen rapidly in the last decade, if from a very low base. In 1983, only 1% of people used modern methods of contraception; by 1992, this had risen to around 13%. Over the same period, the average age of marriage for women rose to 23 -- the highest in Africa -- and the

2019

Sai, Fred T.; International Planned Parenthood Federation. Press Release: Hope and a Warning of Africa. New York:International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF), August 26, 1994. At the very heart of the Arab world, the Palestinian journalist Nadia Hijab shows that, in Jordan, Landholdings have fragmented. Even 10 years ago, families of up to eight children were living on plots as small as 0.13 hectares (approximately 30 by 40 metres) in Gisenyi and Cyangugu Prefectures. And these tiny plots will inevitably shrink further as population densities increase.

Land under pressure: In Rwanda -- as wherever fertilizers and the other high-technology inputs needed to increase yields are scarce -- population pressure causes more marginal land to be brought under the plough. Pastureland and forests are turned into cropland. Fallow periods are reduced, giving the soil less time to recover. All of this leads to soil erosion and, in the long run, to reduced soil fertility. Between 1970-1986, the amount of cultivated land in Rwanda increased by more than 50%, from 528,000 to 826,500 hectares. As a result, the amount of fallow land was cut almost in half and 60% of the pastureland disappeared, as it shrank from 4,980,000 to 1,990,000 hectares. This has particularly affected the minority Tutsi people, traditional pastoralists. People do modify their social behaviour under such pressures, and Rwandans have been marrying later and having smaller families. Young men have to wait longer to acquire the rugo - - the small plot of land necessary for raising a family; and when they do, they know they will have difficulty supporting the same number of children as their parents had. Knowledge and use of family planning have risen rapidly in the last decade, if from a very low base. In 1983, only 1% of people used modern methods of contraception; by 1992, this had risen to around 13%. Over the same period, the average age of marriage for women rose to 23 -- the highest in Africa -- and the total fertility rate fell, from 8.5 to 6.2 children per woman. But the relentless increase in population continues to outpace the ability of the land to sustain its people. The evidence is all too clear: nearly half of all Rwandan children under five suffer from chronic malnutrition, stunting their growth. Despite better antenatal care and increased vaccination, the child mortality rate remains high: 150 of every 1000 children die before their fifth birthday. All beings react to overcrowding, and there is no doubt that it has reared its head, quite literally, in the form of one of the greatest tragedies of human history. It serves as a warning for the rest of the continent.

2019

A rapid rate of growth: It has often been said that land is the one thing Africa has in plenty. So, the argument goes, population growth is no problem. This is simplistic. It fails to take into account both the low natural carrying capacity of much of the continent’s land and the capriciousness of its climate. It also conveniently ignores the fact that it is the rapidity of population growth which causes so much stress and suffering. Africa’s average growth rate of 3% per year is far higher than those in most other developing regions, and much greater than those experienced in the past by the now developed world. 29 of the 36 poorest countries in the world are in Africa. Inevitably, illiteracy rates are high, infrastructure is inadequate, and health services are rudimentary -- all making it especially difficult to introduce family planning programmes. In recent decades, urbanization and the breakdown of traditional values have led to more childbearing than used to be socially acceptable. Every day, some 10000 African women resort to unsafe abortion -- evidence of their frustrated desire to control their fertility. Over half the population of most African countries is under the age of 15 providing a vast pent-up demographic momentum throughout the continent. Even if Kenya, for example, were to attain the two-child family overnight, its population would continue to grow for another two generations, eventually doubling. Encouraging signs: There are encouraging signs of the beginnings of change - - but they are only sporadic and the tempo is still slow. In recent years, most African Governments -- nudge by global advocacy efforts and their own family planning associations -- have come to accept that fewer, better spaced births produce healthier children and mothers. All but a fanatical few have dropped their earlier opposition to family planning on the grounds that it is imposed by the West, or a neo-colonialist plot designed to decimate African populations. Many have simply found themselves unable to cope with the development demands of their rapidly growing populations. The first African population policies were adopted as long ago as 1967 (in Kenya) and 1969 (in Ghana). But there was little further progress until the Kilimanjaro Plan of Action was agreed at the Second African Population Conference in Arusha in 1984 -- which was held to prepare for the last World Population Conference in Mexico City that same year. A new generation of population policies followed and many countries strengthened their family planning programmes. By the time of the Third African Population Conference in Dakar in December 1992 (part of the preparations for the International Conference on Population and Development in Cairo) African delegates were almost unanimously speaking of the importance of family planning both as a human right and a development issue. The Conference declaration included Africa’s first targets for reducing the regional growth rate to 2.5% by the year 2000 and 2% by 2010; for increasing contraceptive prevalence to “about 20%” by 2000, and 40% by 2010; and for lowering maternal mortality, through quality family planning services and a reduction in unsafe abortion by 50% by the end of the century. That was a tremendous step forward, although I still do not think African Governments are putting enough effort into their programmes on the ground. In sub-Saharan Africa as a whole, only 9% of married women are using contraceptives, as against 36% in North Africa and the Middle East, 40% in South and South-East Asia and 60% in Latin America. Only a few countries -- such as South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Kenya -- have family planning programmes successful enough to increase contraceptive use to around 50, 45, 35 and 33%, respectively.

A good example: Kenya provides the most dramatic example. Contraceptive use rose threefold in the 1980s in Kenya. Fertility fell 22% from 8.3 to 6.5 children per woman, and the average desired family fell 35% from 7.2 to 4.7 children. Traditional Kenyan values favour many children. But rapid population growth has put farmland under pressure in many areas, making big families less advantageous. Higher female literacy has helped promote new attitudes to family size. Increasingly, parents want to send their children to school, and rising school costs have made it much more expensive to educate large families. These trends have fuelled the demand for family planning. The Government is strongly committed to providing diversified and accessible family planning services -- an essential feature for the success of any population programme. Kenyan Governments have always been strong upholders of the tragedy of Rwanda. It serves as a warning for the rest of the continent.

Facing the facts: Many of them wonder how they will provide the schools, hospitals and jobs for the next generation. Many are concerned about food supplies: only a few countries, such as Zimbabwe, have carried out agricultural policies that have enabled them to become self-sufficient in food. Some are deeply worried about the growing incapacity of the environmental resource base to sustain still more people. In many regions, particularly the Sahel, population growth has already exceeded the carrying capacity of the land. Some 200 million people, out of the present African population of 550 million, receive less than 90% of the minimum of 2200 calories a day needed to maintain an active working life; another 150 million are subject to acute food deficits, and 30-50 million are actually starving. African countries face many other desperate situations which are precipitated or made worse by high birth rates. But Governments do seem to have faced up to the fact that high population growth rates are among the factors preventing them from satisfying their peoples’ development aspirations. And this offers hope that the Rwandan warning will be heard. [Dr. Fred T. Sai is President of the International Planned Parenthood Federation and a 1993 United Nations Population Award Laureate.]

20197. Salloum, Habeeb. “Umm Kalthum: Legendary Songstress of the Arabs”, in Al-Jadid, November 1995. p. 9. Umm Kalthum, called by some as kawkab al-sha’r (Star of the East), can still be heard on radios and in coffee shops throughout the Arab World, even though she died over two decades ago. She was born in Tamayeyt el-Zahayra, a tiny Egyptian village, in 1908, to a humble peasant family. As a child she sang and chanted the Quran in a voice that made her locally famous. In 1924, she moved to Cairo where she developed a devoted following for her concerts. Her songs became Pan-Arab events, with people from throughout the Arab World assembling to hear her sing. Her songs were typically celebrations of Arab history, and is widely cited for keeping Islamic heritage alive. During WWII, both Axis and Allied radio stations used her music to try to legitimize their message. She became a close friend of Abdul Gamal Nasser, and the two are often seen as the two leaders who emerged in the 1950s. In the 1950s and 1960s she became a national cultural heroine, and was nicknamed the “Ambassador of Arab Arts” as she traveled through the Arab World. During her later years, and unlike many modern Arab artists, she remained proud of her Arab-Islamic heritage. Her funeral in 2/1975 was attended by thousands. Over 300000 of her tapes are sold annually in Egypt alone. In Egypt, it is said that two things will never change: the Pyramids and the voice of Umm Kalthum. [TXT]

20198. Sameh, Catherine. “The Rebel Girl: Family Planning Without Women??”, in Against The Current, November-December 1994. p. 7. The UN Third International Conference on Population in cairo has accomplished very little: while women’s organizations were promised some role by the Clinton Administration, the US instead used the conference as a stage on which VP Al Gore could strut his cynical political agenda. The mass media coverage focused only on the conservative Vatican and the ‘liberal’ Gore-ist factions, completely excluding all other points of views and groups. The Clinton Administration’s proposed $585 million for family planning conceals a
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

‘deeply racist and musogynist’ program that holds poor women responsible for global environmental devastation. Feminist Betsy Hartmann observes that women’s fertility have become the new ‘Evil Empire’ that threatens the world. In the absence of any analysis of the distribution of wealth in a society, ‘family planning’ is merely a system for scapegoating and manipulating women. While family planning is important, the poor of the world also need adequate health care, housing, education, jobs and child care; and Third World countries need relief from the international debts. [TXT]

20199. Schlick, Yael Rachel. Travel, Education, And The Pathways Of Feminism in Post-revolutionary France. Duke University. Dissertation. 221pp. AAC 9332218. [Advisor: Schor, Naomi] My dissertation, “Travel, education, and the pathways of feminism in post-revolutionary France,” is a study of the theme of travel in the writings of nineteenth-century French authors. It highlights the historical link between travel and knowledge, and shows how the theme of travel in women’s texts is part of an emancipatory feminist discourse for greater freedom and equal education. Though I began with the intent to discuss women’s travel alone, it became apparent that travel was inextricably linked to boundaries of what was socially acceptable or desirable for women, and that those women who did not abide by limitations to the domestic sphere were perceived as transgressive. I begin to trace these themes with Jean-Jacques Rousseau’s Emile ou de l’éducation (where women are excluded both from the voyage and from education). Subsequent demands for equal education for women did not succeed in getting them out of the home; but with Stael’s Corinne ou l’Italie, travel begins to challenge domesticity and to pose more strongly the issue of women’s presence in the public space. Stael’s public woman of talent inspired future feminists and Flora Tristan in particular to argue for women’s greater freedom and increased access to travel. I conclude my study by focusing on two texts (an autobiography and a novel) in which travel and education have become one: Suzanne Voilquin’s account of her Saint-Simonian missionary work in Egypt, and George Sand’s Nanon, detailing the life history of a peasant woman highly skilled in map-reading. Other authors discussed in the dissertation include Louis-Damien Emeric, Stephanie-Felicite de Genlis, and Gustave Flaubert. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [↩]

20200. Semedo, Joan D. African American Art And Artists In The Elementary Art Curriculum. University Of Massachusetts. Dissertation. 129pp. AAC 9420688. [Advisor: Wellman, Robert] The purpose of this study was to implement and assess a curriculum on African and African-American art and artists appropriate for elementary school children in a multicultural urban setting in the northeastern part of the United States. The program involved 145 students in a curriculum that includes biographical sketches, slide presentations, studio visits to prominent artists, and hands-on activities. The students were in grades three, four and five. The students learned the three eras of African-American art: the Apprentice, the Journeyman, and the Harlem Renaissance. They also studied the art of Egypt in the time of King Tutankhamen, as well as that of Nubia. More recent African art, including the artifacts of the Dogon people and the thumb painting of the Ndebele women, exposed the children to techniques and designs they could copy. The effects of the program were qualitatively evaluated through a pre-test and post-test administered to these classes. Two sets of open-ended questions were used to assess changes in the children’s understanding. The students’ perceptions of themselves as artists and their awareness and appreciation of art in their communities were also important components of this program. The program had an impact on the children and can become a segment in the elementary art curriculum guide. At present, there is none included in the guide representing the art of Africans and African-Americans. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [↩]

20201. Sen, Gita; Grown, Caren; Development Alternatives With Women for a New Era; DAWN. Development, Crises, and Alternative Visions: Third World Women’s Persepectives: Part 6: Alternative Visions, Strategies and Methods. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1987. pp. 78-96. At its core, Feminism is a political movement that must remain responsive to the needs and issues of women worldwide. But underlying this diversity, is the conviction that gender subordination must be overcome and that women and men must be equal participants at all levels of societal life. The most fundamental approach to poverty is the complete uprooting of unequal access to resources, control over productive property and trade, and overt and covert race, class and gender differences. These broad changes will require changes in laws, civil codes, systems of property rights, control over our bodies, labor codes, systems or property rights, and social and legal institutions. Strategies to achieve these goals must be based on de-colonization, demilitarization and a reduction in arms spending, and establishing a regulatory regime to control the TNCs. Of course, this program is far from being implemented in a policy environment where, as recently was announced, the Reagan Administration will curtail aid to all African countries that lack geo-strategic value [maintaining aid, for example, to Egypt].

Organizing for this feminist program can be built on traditional women’s enclaves in societies (YWCA, All India Womens Congress, Associated Countrywomen of the World, National Council of Women’s Societies in Nigeria), on newer and more progressive institutions such as the Green Party now established in many countries, unions (such as SEWA, Working Women’s Forum in India, Makulamada in Sri Lanka, 9 to 5 in US, as well as women’s initiative in organizations such as the Malaysian Trade Union), cooperatives and project organizations (such as soup kitchens in Brazil, Colombia and Mexico, or Casa da Mulher (Sao Paolo) which encourages self-help and provides sex education, SOS Mulher (Recife) and Casa de la Mujer (Colombia) which focus on domestic violence, Flora Tristan (Lima) which provides legal aid, Gonoashastyo Kendra (Bangladesh), Womens’ Resource Center (Papua New Guinea), Muvman Liberasian Fam (Mauritius)), and research groups (Association of African Women for R&D (AAWORD (Senegal)), Asian Womens Research & Action Network (AWRAAN (Asia)), Women & Development Unit of the University of the West Indies (WAND (Caribbean)), Pacific & Asian Womens Forum (PAWF (Asia-Pacific)), ALCEA (Latin America), Institute for Womens Studies in the Arab World (Middle East); Alliance Against Sex Tourism (Southeast Asia), Greenbelt Movement (Kenya), Chipko Movement (India), Infant Formula Action Coalition (INFAC), Black & Favelas Movement (Brazil); or groups organized around issues of rape, abortion and women’s rights at work including the Mexico Coalition, CARIWA, ISIS International and the International Feminist Network Against the Trafficking of Women). While the UN Decade for the Advance of Women, which was announced under the goals of ‘Development, Equality, Peace’ has delivered little of these promises, millions of women have now realized that development must proceed from women’s perspectives.

20202. Shiva, Vandana. Press Release: Whose Choice? Whose Life? Transcending the Politics of Demographic Fundamentalism and Religious Fundamentalism. Egypt: August 30, 1994. From September 5-13th, governments of the world will meet in Cairo for a Population and Development Conference. While they will be largely discussing policies for the rapid spread to technologies to control of women’s fertility, women’s voice are already being silenced. Two delegations are already out of the home; but with Stael’s Corinne ou l’Italie, travel begins to challenge domesticity and to pose more strongly the issue of women’s presence in the public space. Stael’s public woman of talent inspired future feminists and Flora Tristan in particular to argue for women’s greater freedom and increased access to travel. I conclude my study by focusing on two texts (an autobiography and a novel) in which travel and education have become one: Suzanne Voilquin’s account of her Saint-Simonian missionary work in Egypt, and George Sand’s Nanon, detailing the life history of a peasant woman highly skilled in map-reading. Other authors discussed in the dissertation include Louis-Damien Emeric, Stephanie-Felicite de Genlis, and Gustave Flaubert. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [↩] peculiar history of reproductive politics of the US. A century ago, when the whole medical establishment wanted to take control over childbirth, it used the criminalization of abortion of enter the domain hitherto controlled by female health experts and practitioners. The first attack on abortion in America did not come from the general public or from the churches. The first anti-abortion activity came from doctors. Abortion was a central element in the efforts of physicians to control their proportions and stop the manpower-intensive wars taking place in the US. Population control is also something “like a war” as Deepa Dhanraj and Abha Bhaiya have documented in the film with the same name. It is also something like war if one goes by US foreign police and defense approach to the population issue. According to US policy, population control activities are a security issue. A summary of the Department of Defense perspective on the effects of worldwide population trends for America's ability to influence events abroad was published in 1989 in the Washington Quarterly, a journal of the Centre for Strategic & International Studies (CSIS). The report stated: “As difficult and uncertain as the task may be, policy makers and strategic planners in this country have little choice in the coming decades but to pay serious attention to population trends, their causes and their effects. Already the United States has embarked on an era of constrained resources. It thus becomes more important than ever to do those things that will provide more bang for every buck spent on national security. Policy makers must anticipate events and conditions before they occur. They must employ all the instruments of statecraft at their disposal (development assistance and populationplanning)very it as much as new weapon systems”. The Clintonadministration is focusing on the environment, population and women’s rights as driving forces for its foreign policy in a new global politics. Third World populations need to be controlled because the natural resources they use must be freed up for the growth of US corporations. As a National Security Study says: growing population will create growing domestic needs. As a result “...concessions to foreign companies are likely to be expropriated or subjected to arbitrary interaction. Whether through government action, labour conflicts, sabotag, or civil disturbance, the smooth flow of needed materials will be jeopardized...the US economy will require large and increasing amounts of minerals from abroad-especially from less developed countries, and in structural terms, from the developing states. Economic and social stability of the supplying countries. What this imperialistic view on the relationship between resources and population growth does not perceive is that population growth is triggered by appropriation of resources from the common people. Such appropriation which is necessary for diverting resources from people to corporate investment in free trade regimes also fuels social and political instability and unrest, as the Zapatista uprising in Mexico highlighted on New Year's day, 1994. Thus while the objectives of US foreign policy might be stabilisation, the consequence is actually destabilisation. At a deeper level, the urge to control the resources and populations of the Third world comes from fear. There is a fear of the hordes taking over, guided by the realisation that by the year 2010, 80% of the world's population will reside in the Third World. The CSIS report finds that because the types of conflicts likely to dominate in the years ahead are manpower-intensive regional conflicts, developing states may indeed accrue added power and influence. Paul Kennedy in “Preparing for the Twenty First Century” explains that the current demographic strategy of the North reflects the belief that “as in a Darwinian struggle, the faster growing species will encroach upon and eventually overwhelm, a population with static or declining numbers”. Demographic imperialism thus arises out of a sense of demographic marginalisation. However, by couching this policy in the language of “choice”, a North/South conflict over natural resources projected as an issue of woman's rights.

As a National Security Study which has recently been declassified states: “The US can help to minimize charges of an imperialist motivation behind its support of population activities by repeatedly asserting that such support derives from a concern with the right of the individual to determine freely and responsibly to have or not have children,appear as free choice in the marketplace of contraceptives. However, poor Third World women who are the targets of population control programmes are not “free consumers”. Coercion rather than choice characterises their situation in population control programmes, which are becoming a major component of international aid packages. Due to popular resistance to population control, governments call “family planning” and the World Bank disguises it as “Safe Motherhood”, even though the contraceptives pushed through these programmes are not very safe for women. The World Bank has emerged as a major funder of population control, during 1969-79 it only spent $278m on population programmes. In 1987, the then President promised this would rise to $500m in 1990. In 1995 it had already shot up to $1.3b Preston has now promised to make it further to an annual basis of $2.5b by 1995. Population control policies emerging from Washington D.C., both from US foreign policy and from World Bank policy, are not giving Third World women a chance to present their perspectives on issues that are so central to their lives and their health. The rallying cry of “All against the Holy See” detracts from the economic issues of structural adjustment and unfair trade, and non-sustainable resource use. It also fails to recognize that Catholic fundamentalism is not the fundamentalism most women have to deal with in the Third World.

While the Vatican might be right in calling these policies “demographic imperialism, the Church cannot be treated as the best protector of women’s interest and well-being in matters of health and population planning in the Third World, both because it is an irrelevant institution for a large majority of our people, and because it is a patriarchal institution for women who belong to the Christian religion. The most important challenge in Cairo will be to transcend the politics of Washington DC and the Holy See, and put Third World women at the centre of the "population" discourse—as subjects, determining their lives and health not as objects of state, or super state policies or as pawns in conflicts between the patriarchies of religion and the patriarchy of the super state systems and the demographic establishment. It is only in transcending patriarchal polarisations that women will be able to set an agenda for economic and social justice, environmental sustainability, and women's right to health. [2]

2003. Sipress, Alan. "Islamic Scholar Accused of Heresy Wins Court Case [charges against Nasr Hamed Abu Zeid dismissed; charged with apostasy for his linguistic research at University of Cairo into the origins of the Quran; apostacy] would void his marriage to a Muslim woman; he has received death threats", in Seattle Times, January 28, 1994. p. A8. [TXT]

2004. Smith, Morna Oruch. Desired Family Size And Desired Child Education Among Recently Married Women In Egypt (Daughters' Education). The Johns Hopkins University. Dissertation. 279pp. AAC 9327662. [Advisor: Sirageldin, Ismail] This study investigates the questions (1) do women who desire more schooling for their daughters desire less children? and (2) do women who desire more children desire less schooling for their daughters? The sample consists of recently married Egyptian women from the Egyptian Fertility Survey of 1980 to approximate the conditions of a static model at the beginning of a married couples' planning period. The sample is 1413 women within seven years of marriage. A representative subsample of 422 women contains additional economic variables. The model assumes that desired family size and desired education for daughters are endogenous and allows them to be simultaneously determined as suggested by the child quantity-quality model of the new home economics. A two-equation model is estimated using Two-Stage Least Squares. The equation for desired family size is specified as a function of desired education for daughters and a series of exogenous variables representing income and wealth, costs, efficiency effects, tastes, supply of children, and region of residence. Desired education for daughters is specified as a function of desired family size and variables representing income and wealth, costs, efficiency effects, tastes, supply of children, and region of residence. Not all variables are available for the full sample, so a series of specifications is used to estimate the model. The results show that desired education for daughters is only a significant determinant of desired family size for total Egypt in the subsample for one specification, though it has the expected negative sign in all equations. Desired education for daughters is not significant in the full sample or for urban or rural Egypt separately. Low variance in desired education for daughters due to high levels of desires in all but rural Upper Egypt may explain these results. This high level of education desired by mothers for daughters may be due to a high perceived rate of return to education. Desired family size has a consistent significant and negative effect on desired education for daughters. The relationship between desired family size and desired education for daughters may be an important factor in Egyptian fertility transition. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [2]

2006. Souley, Abdoulaye; Alouma, Gado. "Islamic Renewal in Niger: From Monolith to Plurality", in Social Compass-International Review of Sociology of Religion, June 1996. pp. 249-265. In the 1988 census, 98.7% of the people of Niger reported themselves to be Muslims, with Animists less than 1% and Christians 0.4%. While Islam has undergone some changes in Niger it is still Islam, and while Niger society has been changed by Islam it remains a distinctive society. The Islam of Niger, which includes for example more freedom for women that in Saudi Arabia, is based on a large literature written by ajamis in Hausa, Fulufude, Kurnouri and Songhai but in Arabic characters. Islamization in Peace. The ideas and tasks fundamental in many other fields such as women's groups, five newer Islamist groups have emerged: AEMUN, ARCI (Association for the Diffusion of Islamic Culture), ANASI (Niger Association for the Call To Islamic Solidarity), Al-Hourci, and Al-Adine Islam. Many of these groups have benefited from subsidies paid by Saudi Arabia, Libya, Kuwait and Iran vying for influence in Niger. For example, in 1972 Libya provided FCA77 million for Islamic education, and in 1972 established the Niger-Libyan Friendship Association. The Kuwaiti African Muslim Agency has built 15 mosques in Niger, five in Niamey alone. Despite competition among Islamist tendencies in Niger, successive waves of Islamization have created a power movement in the country; the Westernized elite is faced, for the first time, with competition for political hegemony within the state.

2007. Soviet Womens Committee. Soviet Women's Committee: Part 9: International Womens Year. Tashkent: Soviet Women's Committee, 1976. The 27th session of the UN General Assembly has proclaimed the year 1975, International Women's Year. This decision, taken on the initiative of the Women's International Democratic Federation, is of immense importance for women the world over. The UN Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women which inspired the decision to observe International Women's Year, states that "the full and complete development of a country, the welfare of the world and the cause of universal peace require the maximum participation of women as well as men in all fields. "Discrimination against women is incompatible with human dignity and with the welfare of the family and of society, prevents their participation, on equal terms with men, in the political, social, economic and cultural life of their countries and is an obstacle to the full development of the potentialities of women in the service of their countries and of humanity." The UN decision to observe International Women's Year represents an important success for the democratic women's movement throughout the world since it indicates recognition of the new role of women in modern society. The Programme for the observance of International Women's Year adopted by the United Nations sets three principal objectives before the governments and the public: to intensify activities with a view to achieving women's equality, assuring their participation in the economic, social and cultural development of their countries and enhancing their role in the development of friendly relations and cooperation between all nations and in the strengthening of world peace. Thus the following motto has been formulated: Peace: Peace and Development. The ideas and tasks fundamental to International Women's Year have attracted the attention of the world public and provided a sound basis for joint action; for example, the UN Women's Commission has been sponsored and initiated within the framework of International Women's Year by international and national women's, trade union, youth, cooperative and religious organizations, by movements for peace and national independence. The Soviet Women's Committee took part in a symposium of women from 280
Asian and African countries sponsored by the Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization and held in Alexandria (ARE) in 3/1975. Its theme, "Women and Social Development", attracted the attention of women's and other organizations in 55 countries. A delegation of the Soviet Women's Committee told the participants in the seminar held by the All-Africa Women's Organization in Mogadishu, Somalia, in April 1975, how Soviet women contribute to the country's economic development and rearing of the younger generation.

Another Soviet delegation attended the regional seminar held by women's organizations of European countries on the theme: "Economic independence of European women on the threshold of the 21st century". It took place at Brussels and was sponsored by the Belgian National Committee for the observance of International Women's Year. Another seminar was held at the UN Headquarters in early May on the initiative of the Women's International Democratic Federation and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. It was attended among others by a number of women's and other organizations from America. A Soviet representative read a paper entitled "Disarmament and its Social Aspects. Contribution of Soviet Women to a Solution of These Problems". The UN World Conference of International Women's Year held in Mexico City in June-July 1975 was a landmark of International Women's Year. It was attended by delegations from 133 countries and by representatives of national-liberation movements and almost one hundred international non-governmental organizations. Most speakers at the Conference were concerned with the social causes of inequality and discrimination to which women in many countries are still subjected; ardent appeals to secure and strengthen peace, the main condition for the realization of the objectives set, were repeatedly voiced. The Conference devoted much attention to the question of solidarity with all fighters for freedom and national independence. Resolutions pledging solidarity with the Arab people of Palestine and the patriots of Chile fighting against reaction for the re-establishment of democracy in their country were adopted as well as a resolution on rendering aid to the Vietnamese people in restoring their war-ravaged economy. The main documents adopted at the Conference-the World Action Programme and the Mexico City Declaration-emphasize the following points: The problems facing women who constitute one half of the world population are in effect problems facing society as a whole, for equitable and growing participation of women in the development of their countries serves to sharply accelerate the rates of their development and preserve peace; To ensure women's equality and their broad participation in the development of their countries, it is necessary to carry out basic socio-economic reforms and create a system which would rule out any possibility of exploitation; The strengthening of peace and security of nations, non-interference in the internal affairs of states, disarmament, liquidation of colonialism, neocolonialism, racialism and apartheid, the fostering and maintenance of new economic relations based on the principles of peace and justice are indispensable to achieving women's equality and upholding human rights. The Soviet Women's Committee is a participant in and initiator of many international events which are conducted within the framework of the Year both within the Soviet Union and abroad. For example, a Committee sponsored seminar of representatives of women's organizations of Asian countries was held in July in Alma-Ata the capital of Kazakhstan. The seminar was also attended by representatives of the Women's International Democratic Federation, the World Peace Council, the Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization, UNESCO, and the UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific. The delegates discussed the questions of women's participation in the economic development of their countries and the rearing of the younger generation. The international meeting held in Minsk, the capital of Byelorussia, the theme of which was "Women in the Struggle Against Fascism, for a Lasting and Just Peace on Earth", discussed the struggle for peace and disarmament. Second World War veterans told the delegates about Soviet women who took part in the underground movement and fought as partisans in the last war. On the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the great victory over fascism, which coincided with the time of the forum, a monument to the "Soviet Mother-patriot" was unveiled in the town of Zhodino. Its prototype is Anastasiya Kupriyanova, the honorary citizen of Zhodino who lost her five sons in the war.

A World Congress devoted to International Women's Year is due to be held in Berlin, the capital of the German Democratic Republic, at the end of 10/1975. It will be an important event. The proposal of the Women's International Democratic Federation to conduct this forum on a wide basis with the participation of not only women's organizations but also youth, working-class, religious and other organizations, and movements for peace and solidarity was supported by more than one hundred international, regional and national organizations, noted public figures and statesmen, parliamentarians and UN representatives. An International Preparatory Committee was set up, consisting of representatives of 45 international and 54 national organizations of all continents. At the consultative meetings held in Paris and Tihan (Hungary) it was agreed that the Congress would discuss problems associated with women's equality on the job, in society and in the family, and questions of ensuring peace and national independence of peoples and social progress. Thus, the theme of the Congress transcends the question of women's equality. This opens up wide opportunities for joint action by social forces of different political orientations pursuing the common aims of strengthening peace and security, halting the arms race and assuring national independence and social progress. Soviet women acclaim the holding of the Congress. They are convinced that the joint effort of the progressive forces of the world will achieve much in 1975 for the cause of women's social emancipation, the consolidation of peace and development of cooperation and friendly relations between nations. [The UN World Conference of International Women's Year was held in Mexico City from 6/19-7/2/1975. The documents adopted there denote the contribution women are making to the struggle for peace and international cooperation. Photo shows the assembly hall at the Juan de la Barrera sports complex where the Conference opened.] [=] 20209. Stork, Joe. "Political Aspects of Health", in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. pp. 4-10. Health is a fundamental part of every individual's life: the WHO definition of health as "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being, and not simply the absence of disease or infirmity", poses health as a social construct (WHO stated this as the world goal for 2000 at a conference held in Alma Ata in 1978, mainly through primary care). However, health also has a political dimension, which is defined in terms of class: that is, will health resources be used to improve nutrition, sanitation and the workplace environment, or be used to import expensive, high-tech technologies for the benefit of the elite. While the Middle East has seen dramatic improvements in health for children, its still poor child health will mean that 5 million needless child deaths can be expected from the present population. Oil money provided the basis for the import of hospital technologies (Saudi Arabia opened 80 hospitals in 1970-1985; the UAE now has 31 hospitals with a population of 1.5 million). Racial and gender differences exist in health care throughout the region (while on the West Bank among Palestinians girls are three times as likely to be malnourished than boys, Israelis discriminate systematically against Palestinians in the health care system). Health care is also rationed by wealth, as in the US: the oil states offer all their citizens health care, while in Egypt, the huge and chaotic health system provides excellent care to the rich while masses of slum dwellers have no health care. In Israel, the medical sector is complex, with Histadrut controlled Kupat Holim (receiving government subsidies) competing with lower paid doctors at the government socialized medical sector (only the opposition of Histadrut has prevented the emergence of Israeli socialized medicine.

Among the first communications of Arab Problems. Here students from different countries study Arabic duties in the Field. United States Army in World War II: Special Studies.

renaissance of the Arab East. Since 1945 it had been the headquarters of a number of writers and especially from Abdullah Nadim. With the British occupation of Egypt in 1882 the situation changed radically. Thus there was a setback to education which had got to be paid for. Nevertheless, the development of national culture could not be prevented as was shown by the activities of numerous writers and especially Mustafa Kamil. The years 1919-1930 were called Egypt's period of national renaissance. As a result of the hopes inspired by the Russian Revolution of 1917, there was a national rising against the British in 1919. It had enormous influence on the development of a national culture and on belles lettres. A group of writers, prominent among them whom was Taha Husain, expressed the strivings of progressive circles of the nationalbourgeoisie. The creator of the Egyptian novel was Mahmud Husain who was greatly influenced by Chekhov. After the Wafd government took office in 1942 new journals with progressive tendencies were brought out until they were closed down by subsequent governments with reaction tendency. In 1952 and 1956 a school of progressive writers came out in favor of realism and nationalism (narodnost') and against reactionary romanticism and individualism. The hero of novels was the builder of a new Egypt. The new tendency which spread to the theater and music received recognition in all Arab countries. Cairo became the center of a renaissance of the Arab East. Since 1945 it had been the headquarters of the Arab League. In 1953 the League set up a Higher Institute for the Study of Arab Problems. Here students from different countries study Arabic literature and history, economics, and the question of Arab unity and of the formation of an Arab nation. [From: “Part IV: Egypt: 1955-1958”, in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. p. 28.]

20211. Torjesen, Karen J. Women Were Priests: Women's Leadership in the Early Church and the Scandal of Their Subordination in the Rise of Christianity. San Francisco, Calif.: Harper San Francisco, 1993. Although most modern Christians believe that women played little or no role in the early church, there is ample evidence that women were even bishops in the early church, and that this history has been forgotten through centuries of often deliberate concealment. One major reason that this early role has been lost is that in the division between public and private space, with the the role of women restricted in Hellenistic/Greco-Roman societies to the private sphere, that the development of Christianity from a private, often persecuted faith, to a public faith resulted in the eclipse of women. Women did have some public religious role in the Hellenistic culture, as in the role of prophetesses, found among Christians from Rome to Phrygia to Tertullian's Tunisia, yet this role was an uneasy one, and against the prevailing gender roles of Hellenistic culture, could provide no general paradigm. An instance of this gender role conflict can be seen in the Gospel of Mary, found in 1945 at Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt that preserves a long forgotten tradition of the leadership role of Mary Magdalene and her gender role conflict with Peter. As Christianity entered the broader Hellenistic society, it adopted the norms of gender roles for women, if only through a process characterized by harsh rhetoric and demands that women accept their ordained subordinate role. Similarly, Rabbis argued that for women education was comparable to lechery (in the Mishnah tractae 'Sotah' (On the Suspected Adulteress), Rabbi Elezer states: "If a man gives his daughter a knowledge of the Law, it is as though he taught her lechery"), and generally Jews adopted the prevailing Hellenistic/Greco-Roman gender sociology. Unlike Jews, who could (as did the Alexandrine Jews) win special privileges as a recognized race, Christians, a hodge-podge of converts, could not win this same status, and were seen dismissively by Romans as the "Third Race"; this lack of legitimacy within the Hellenistic-Roman social order would sustain the prominent role of women in what was by necessity a group that remained outside the mainstream (ethnically, socially, politically and in gender roles). Ultimately, the assertion of a leadership role by women in religion could not be equated with fornication: John the Seer wrote to the church in Thyatira: "Yet I have this against you: you tolerate that Jezebel, the woman who claims to be a prophetess, who by her teaching lures my servants into fornication and eating food sacrificed to idols. I have given her time to repent, but she refuses to repent of her fornication..." (Rev. 2:20-23). Hence, in this new era of Christian virtues as gendered Hellenistic virtues, women's virtues were chastity, silence and obedience. The final consolidation of this submissive paradigm of women's conduct came as Christian communities acquired prestige and sought to conduct themselves in imitation of municipal councils in the same manner as did Jewish communities: with this normalization of the Christian community through normative politico-religious institutions, their institutions necessarily (as had comparable Jewish institutions) acquired legitimacy as they normalized themselves, and especially their gender roles, in the Hellenistic/Greco-Roman manner. [Oddly, although the author assumes a misogynist convergence between Jews and Christians, the status of the two communities is clearly quite different: the processes that sustained the prominence of women in the early Christians communities were absent among the Jews; similarly, the process of assimilation followed by Christians was specifically absent among Jews, as the author does note. It seems that the author draws a false analogy between Jews and Christians perhaps due to a simple lack of interest in the question of the status of women in the Jewish community.]

specialists to reach the field were the bilingual telephone operators in the first overseas unit, which reached North Africa in 1/1943. Two WAAC officers also went to the Eighth Air Force in England, even before arrival of the European theater staff director, to plan for Signal Corps Waacs in that command. A considerable percentage of the first WAAC unit to reach England consisted of telephone operators and other communications personnel, sent with the approval of the Chief Signal Officer but without Army technical training.

At about this time, the first units began to reach the Signal Corps' own installations in the US. First to arrive, in 3/1943, were units assigned to Camp Crowder, Missouri, which by the end of the WAAC totaled some 489 enrolled women and 100 officers. Another unit under Signal Corps control went to Fort Monmouth, New Jersey, in 6/1943, and still others were on requisition. However, most women in these units were not technical specialists, but clerical and overhead workers to aid in running the schools. [SigC Stf Dir file.]

From the first there was no doubt of these units' success in the assigned duties. In Allied Headquarters in North Africa, the assistant chief signal officer stated:

The manner in which they picked up the work was outstanding...Had we had enough of them, we could have used them to operate all our fixed communications installations--telephones and telegraph--throughout the rear areas. Every one...released some man for Signal Corps duty up in the combat zone.

The former chief signal officer of the AAF in North Africa added:

Don't tell me a woman can't keep a secret. Why, their own company commander doesn't even know where the board is located--we've tested the girls again and again. [The WAC in the SigC, Speech by Col Oveta Culp Hobby, SigC file, OCMH. See Ch. XX, below for North African Theater of Operations details.]

The Chief Signal Officer, Maj. Gen. Dawson Olmstead, on a visit to the area, was informed by the theater commander that approximately 1300 more Signal Corps Waacs in ten different specialties would be required if obtainable. The same good reports were received from the European theater, where, after a one-week indoctrination course, 100 WAAC telephone operators were assigned to operate multiple switchboards at five command headquarters. The officer in charge reported, "Very soon I received praise of the improved service, as the good results were noticed almost immediately." [Appendix to SigC WAC Narrative.]

Another early success was the participation of twenty-nine WAC telephone operators in the Quebec Conference in 8/1943. Rushed from train to switchboard, the women were on continuous duty for eighteen hours and doubled as secretaries and stenographers when a shortage of these occurred. After seventeen days of secret duty, each member received an individual commendation. Waacs also served successfully on the switchboards at the Cairo Conference and the Potsdam Conference. The manner in which they picked up the work was outstanding. [Ibid. (2) Speech cited n. 15. (3) Interv with Capt Jane Reeves, SigC WAC Stf Dir, 5/3/1946.]

Requests from Signal officers in the United States continued to indicate an urgent need for more Waacs, since current directives required release of their general service men. Civilian replacements were scarce, and available limited service men often were unsuitable. [Ltr, Post SigO, Ft Bliss Texas, to Chief MPB OCSigO. SigC 322 WAC 1943.]

In general such requests also indicated a desire for Signal Corps technical training for the women. In England the using agencies, desiring telelypists, had been obliged to train WAAC typists in the theater, which they protested was a task more properly assumed by the Signal Corps in the United States. Studies showed that women could, with training, fill 78 different Signal Corps jobs. Therefore, in 5/1943, Brig. Gen. Henry L. P. King's successor, Col. Duncan Hodges, put the long-delayed WIRES plan into effect. The women were to be trained first in Signal Corps duties in an inactive WAAC status, and then sent to basic training. Objectives were set at some 2000 women, the first of whom reported in late 5/1943 to a training course at the State Teachers' College at Livingston, Alabama, with eleven other schools scheduled for later opening. [Ibid. (1) Ltr, Hq AAF to AACS, 7/31/1944, and incis WD G-1 220.3 WAC (8/7/1944).

SigC WAC narrative. (3) Memo, Dir MPD ASF for Dir Pers ASF 10/26/1943. SPAP 341 WAAC (2/26/1943).]

The first request for Wacs in Cairo was received in the fall of 1943 from Maj. Gen. Ralph Royce. General Royce at this time asked only for twelve WAC secretaries "to prevent the constant and sometimes serious leaks in information." [Memo, MPD ASF for TAG, 11/10/1945, sub: WAC Pers for Gen Royce per Msg JM 1814, 10/27/1945 (CM-IN 16628). SPGAR 220.3 WAC, Dir Pers ASF, DRB AGO.]

The request was approved, and in 12/1943 ten enlisted women and two WAAC officers were flown to the area. Capt. Josephine Dyer headed the group and later served as staff director. Other requests followed: one for 240 women for theater headquarters, which was approved; one for 600 women for Tehran, which was disapproved on the grounds of nonavailability of WAC personnel; and two others, of 150 more Wacs for theater headquarters and 104 for the 19th Weather Squadron, which were disapproved by Operations Division of the War Department on the grounds that no military vacancies existed in the command. Before making these requisitions, the theater had entertained some hopes of on-the-spot enlistment of American women living in Cairo, but it was found that 49 out of 50 eligible civilian women refused to enlist, and the idea of local recruiting was abandoned as it had been in Europe. [(1) Cbl CM-IN 1072, 2/4/1944, Cbl 2442 2/3/1944. (2) Memo, Stf for Dir WAC, 1/31/1944, WDGAP 320.2 sec 8a. (3) WAC AMET Summary.]

The shipment of 240 women for the Cairo area was accordingly organized in the US in 2/1944. It reached the theater only after an exhausting four-month struggle to get shipping space, during which the unit spent a month at Fort Oglethorpe, a month in one area at Camp Shank, three weeks in another area, a week at Camp Patrick Henry, three weeks on shipboard, and ten days in Naples. The delay proved trying for the women, who were so eager to get overseas that 118 of them, 13 in the first three grades, voluntarily relinquished their ratings in order to comply with the theater's requisition for unrated personnel. The women were described as "dejected and disillusioned" during the months of waiting, but their morale rose rapidly as soon as they were in transit. [Unit Hist Cairo Det; WAC AMET Summary; and esp Unit Hist Camp Huckstep, p. 4.]

Arriving in Cairo on 6/16/1944, the women were sent to Camp Huckstep, where living conditions were pronounced by detachment officers to be "far superior to any experienced by the unit since its inception." The brick-and-wood barracks were clean, modern, and airy, and latrines were in the same building. There was plenty of hot water, and a laundry with ironing boards and washing machines. In this the women's barracks were superior to those of some of the men's units, which did not all at this time have hot water. Barracks had single-decked beds, pillows, bedding, and shelves and hangers for clothing; there was also a well-furnished dayroom with recreation equipment. On the whole, the accommodations were described as being "in striking and overwhelming contrast to the haphazard facilities encountered in the US." The only difficulty was a temporary one when, on the first morning, it was announced that Maj. Gen. Benjamin L. Giles was to review the Wacs immediately, and 240 travel-wrinkled women descended simultaneously. on ten electric irons. [Ibid. All quotations from Unit Hist Camp Huckstep.] Within a week, 126 of the women moved to Cairo for duty with Headquarters, Africa-Middle East Theater; the remaining 114 at Camp Huckstep were assigned to the Middle East Service Command. The unit in Cairo was billeted in the New Hotel, two to five women to a room. At the end of the year, after winter rains had flooded parts of the building, and after the arrival of more Wacs left it overcrowded, the Wacs moved to new quarters in a modern building with a bedroom for every three women and a complete post exchange and hairdressing shop. [Unit Hist Cairo Det, p. 3.]

As the women were interviewed and assigned to duty, a fundamental problem emerged: the theater was already at full authorized strength and not in desperate need of personnel. If Wacs replaced enlisted men, the men were idle, and if Wacs were merely added as supernumeraries, there was only part-time work for all concerned. The majority of the women were stenographers, clerks, and typists; others were messengers, bookkeepers, telephone operators, and teletypists. Many were assigned as secretaries to ranking officers, and others were placed in almost every staff section of the two headquarters, with the largest numbers in the adjutant general's office, the Signal Corps, and the Censorship Section. [Asgmts at Hq not listed 7/1944 asgmts at Camp Huckstep given in Unit Hist.]

While most women were well satisfied with the type of work assigned them, the fact that it was not full-time caused a continuing morale problem among both men and women. At Camp Huckstep, the WAC historian reported:

MORALE was affected by the exigent morale at Camp Huckstep, which was poor and contagious. The majority of the men, and consequently of the women, felt that they were not actually needed and that what they were doing was not important to the war effort. Wacs were resented by some of the men. [Unit Hist Camp Huckstep, p. 20.]

Promotions could not be given to any of the Wacs, even to a few who had replaced master sergeants, so long as the command remained overstretched. The Cairo report added:

Comfortable living quarters and opportunities for enjoyment seem to be secondary in building morale...the important factor is the feeling that they are needed and that individual assignments keep them busy. [Unit Hist Cairo Det, 8/1944 9/1944.]

During the first summer, only 56 of the 240 Wacs replaced enlisted men. Toward the end of this time, the theater appealed to the War Department for authority to return the surplus men to the US. By 10/1944, enough men had been removed from the theater so that 157 promotions were made among the Wacs, chiefly to the grades of private first class and corporal. These were followed by others at intervals. By East. (2) Incl 3 to Craighill IBT Rpt.]

The morale for the past period has improved...due partly to the fact that most of the women are now fairly busy, and also to the fact that they have a feeling of being generally accepted as a part of Headquarters. [(1) WAC AMET Summary. (2) Ltr, ME to TAG, 8/15/1944. AG 320.2, Hobby files. (3) Quotation from Unit Hist Cairo Det, p. 7.]

The theater consistently directed its efforts toward devices to maintain troop morale, and in these the Wacs were allowed to share fully. At Camp Huckstep, women were admitted to the excellent recreational facilities—a theater, a service club with cafeteria, game room, and library, and sports equipment. In Cairo, women were allowed to join a club with swimming, tennis, and golf facilities. At both stations, Wacs shared athletic programs in league baseball, volleyball, hockey, basketball, and even touch football, although such programs appealed only to the younger women. Women were also admitted to off-duty classes offered by the Armed Forces Institute in such subjects as French, Arabic, shorthand, and photography. Social activities were also encouraged, with organized parties and holiday celebrations, but the Wacs reported that such activities soon became burdensome and most women declined unit invitations. [Unit Hist Camp Huckstep, 7/1944 and 10/1944 appendices.]

Wacs likewise were given the same amount of leaves and passes as the men, and were provided with equal transportation and accommodations to visit various points of interest for sightseeing or recreation. There were frequent conducted tours of the environs of Cairo, and visits by some of the women to Bengasi, Alexandria, Cyprus, Palestine, and other areas.

Restrictions were seldom sufficient to cause complaint. Marriages were permitted, suitable married quarters were provided, and women were allowed and even encouraged to spend furloughs with husbands stationed elsewhere. Nevertheless, WAC marriages in the theater were not frequent. [WAC AMET Summary gives 16; Unit Hist Cairo Det gives 17.]

Considering the climate and the sanitary hazards of the surrounding cities, the women's health remained good. A sanitary mess was maintained, and the nature of the area caused only minor discomforts. During the winter a water shortage was suffered, and cold weather made the unheated buildings chilly, but kerosene stoves were soon obtained and men's pile jackets were issued to the women. Heavy winter rains found a small Nile coursing through the WAC area and the improved view was enjoyed by both women and men until the fence was put back up. None of these minor environmental difficulties had any appreciable effect on morale or health.

Major Craighill, who visited the area late in 12/1944, found the women's health good and illnesses "relatively less than in other units in the area." In the Cairo unit, women suffered the usual respiratory and gastrointestinal conditions, but in less degree than the men, and there had been no cases of venereal disease, pregnancy, malaria, or the hepatitis that was prevalent in the area. Emotional maladjustments had been minor, only one case requiring return to the US.

Camp Huckstep Wacs had likewise had no unusual medical conditions except an increase of appendectomies to a total of almost 10% of the group. There had been no cases of venereal disease, and only one pregnancy, which had existed before arrival in the theater. However, Camp Huckstep Wacs had experienced a number of minor maladjustment problems and two serious psychiatric cases, one of which had to be sent back to the US. These cases were not more numerous than similar cases among men and, according to Major Craighill, "were reflections of the enlisted men's attitude of frustration in an area removed from the combat zone." Improvement in this respect was noted when surplus personnel was shipped out. Gynecological conditions were minor and caused no loss of time from work or any evacuation of personnel from the area. [Passage on health, including quotations and statistics: (1) Memo Maj Margaret Craighill for The SG USA through Chief Surg USAFIME, 1/8/1945, sub: Health Conditions of Nurses and Wacs in USAFIME. SGO Hist Div 319.1 Spec Rpt--Middle East. (2) Incd 3 to Craighill IBT Rpt.]

The only policy problem noted by historians was a minor version of the Pacific and European theaters' major problem: the question of direct commissions for enlisted women who were secretaries to ranking general officers. As soon as the news of such commissions elsewhere reached the theater, General Royce was repeatedly applied to the War Department for permission to commission his secretary. The request, with others like it, was refused upon the insistence of Director Hobby, who had secured a ruling against any further such action as a result of the bad publicity accompanying earlier cases. The director suggested instead that the woman, if qualified, be selected by regular board procedure and returned to officer candidate school with promise of return to the area upon graduation. General Royce instead preferred to appoint the secretary a warrant officer, which he did. No further comment resulted except sharp newspaper criticism of the commanding general's wisdom in using public funds to make his personal plane available to the secretary and her husband for an extended honeymoon tour of the Mediterranean. [Memo, Dir WAC for CoIS USA, 4/14/1944. WDWAC 314.7. Approved by CoIS, 4/18/1944, forwarded to TAG, 4/21/1944. WDWAC 210.1.]

As the end of the war neared, restlessness increased, and both men and women were heard commenting that they wished they were in Italy, France, America, or almost any other place. Luckily the waiting period was not long, and soon after V-J Day shipment began, with the last Wacs returning home in 10/1945. Colonel Boyce, who stopped in Cairo shortly afterward on her way home from India, interviewed the chief of staff and stated that "The Wacs were highly commended for their work and they were released only when there was no longer a job to be done. [Boyce Rpt of visit to WAC Pers in Overseas Theaters, 9/21/1945-11/26/1945, Tab F: AMET. Hobby files also OCMH.]

Although recommending a two-year limit on the tour of duty, Major Craighill stated that the theater's experience with the employment of Wacs and nurses had proved that "Women service personnel are capable of adjusting satisfactorily to difficult environmental problems under proper administrative control." Other authorities concurred, with the additional comment that employment in an inactive theater would possibly always present problems of full-time employment and therefore of morale. [=

20214. United States House; House Committee on International Relations. Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Appendix: Prepared Statement by Terrence J. Brown, Deputy Asst. Administrator, Bureau for Asia and the Near East, US Agency for International Development: Egypt. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia; Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995, pp. 29-31. USAID assistance to Egypt reflects Egypt's essential role in the peace process. Since the Camp David Accords, Egypt has been a strong ally of the US, a moderating force in the Middle East, and a strong supporter of an overall settlement between Israel, its neighbors, and the PLO.

With our support, Egypt has been able to shift its effort from maintaining a 30-year state of war to addressing major development challenges, including rapid population growth, ineffective economic policies, poor infrastructure, and a sluggish economy. As a result, Egyptians now have access to dependable electricity, cleaner water, improved health care schools, more reliable telecommunications, better village infrastructure and services, new technologies for agriculture production, and better access to credit for small business development. Population growth rates have fallen, and child maternal health have improved.

America's partnership with Egypt is aimed at enhancing stability, democracy and prosperity in Egypt and the region. USAID's programs are designed to help Egypt pursue sustainable development by bringing its population growth rates to more manageable levels, accelerating the economic policy reforms necessary for job-creation in the private sector and foreign investment, strengthening civic society and democratic institutions, and addressing environmental concerns affecting nations health and economy.

The Commodity Import program, whereby Egyptian companies purchase US goods, has benefitted over 1400 American manufacturers and exporters from approximately 46 states. In addition, US firms in construction, services, services, manufacturing, and technical services are heavily involved in implementing Egypt's project assistance.

The impact of USAID's assistance to Egypt has been substantial. USAID programs are responsible for saving over 80000 Egyptian children each year through use of USAID finance oral rehydration therapy and immunizations. Infant mortality rates have declined from 97 deaths per thousand in 1998 to 61 deaths per thousand in 1992, a 37% decline. The population growth rate has declined from 2.9% to 2.1% over the past ten years. In education, more than 1 million students are enrolled in 1950 USAID-financed primary preparatory schools. These children likely would not be able attend school otherwise.

Over 23 million people benefit from improved water and wastewater systems. USAID has financed the installation and rehabilitation of over 5000 megawatts of electrical generating capacity, 40% of Egypt's total capacity. USAID support has contributed to major policy reform measures including stabilization of the foreign exchange rate, a major reduction in the budge deficit, liberalization of the economy, and a removal of agricultural controls. The latter has led to a 46% increase in the cultivated land area devoted to major crops, and has led to production increases of approximately 36% for wheat, 26% for rice, and 28% for maize over the last few years.

Despite this progress, however, much remains to be done if Egypt is to realize its potential as a stable and prosperous economy in a peaceful Middle East. Since 1991, the Egyptian Government has begun instituting the macroeconomic reforms that are necessary to stabilize and stimulate the economy after 40 years of state intervention. Subsidies and trade barriers have been reduced, the foreign exchange rate has been unified and stabilized, the budget deficit has dropped from 20% of gross domestic product to under 4%, and interest rates have been liberalized. But the pace of reforms has been disappointing, and little progress has been made on key areas such as privatization. We are concerned that the government is not meeting targets for economic policy reform negotiated with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

We are pleased, however, that the Egyptians have just agreed to the economic reform benchmarks for USAID assistance, including reducing tariff rates, reducing administrative costs to exporters, privatizing at least 15 additional public enterprises, and promoting private banks' participation in financial markets.

Finally, we expect that the new Gore-Mubarak Initiative announced last 9/1994 will bring greater focus to the US-Egyptian partnership for economic growth and development. USAID is funding a number of new activities spurred by the initiative, including providing technical assistance to improve quality standards for Egyptian exports, creating manufacturing technology centers, and addressing Cairo's air pollution problems with lead abatement measures. Sustainable economic growth in Egypt must be built upon an expanding private sector, competitive in the world marketplace. [=

20215. United States House; House Committee on International Relations. Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Statement of Mr. Terrence J. Brown, Deputy Assistant Administrator for Asia and the Near East, US Agency for International Development: Part 01. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia; Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995. pp. 5-7. Mr. BROWN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. I will submit my written remarks for the record and would like to briefly summarize some of its major points.

First of all, in the Middle East, the USAID program is clearly an essential tool to the US foreign policy. For a lasting peace to be realized, the people of the region themselves must believe their lives and that of their children will be better.

Secondly, the USAID program in the region has a clear record of success. We have improved people's lives and created hope for the future. For example, in Egypt, the same level of assistance over a number of years has successfully reduced infant mortality by 50%. 80000 children are now being saved each year as a result of the USAID child survival activities and approximately 23 million Egyptians benefit from improved water and wastewater systems.

Third, while success can be cited, critical development problems still must be addressed. We are tailoring our aid program to address these problems to build the conditions that will support peace and prosperity in the region. In no part of the region is the urgency of action more clear than in Gaza and the West Bank. I, therefore, want to focus the rest of my remarks on the West Bank-Gaza program and what we are doing to address the situation there.

In response to the signing of the Declaration of Principles on the White House lawn in 9/1993, the US mobilized the donor community to translate the dreams of peace into tangible results for the lives of Palestinians. The US pledge of $100 million a year over the next 5 years includes $75 million a year in USAID-managed funds.

The vast majority of these funds finance specific activities that build the infrastructure, institutional, and human capacity for a stable, productive West Bank and Gaza. These projects will be carried out by American private voluntary organizations, by private sector firms, and international organizations such as the UNDP.

Thus far, USAID has built or upgraded more than 1200 clinics, houses, and schools. We have funded training for more than 7000 Palestinian men and women. We have helped create more than 4000 jobs for Palestinians. In addition, a portion of our aid was contributed to a multilender fund supporting the startup costs of the Palestinian Authority.
This support has been essential to the delivery of public services in the West Bank and Gaza.

However, the complex political situation creates unique challenges for the implementation of any assistance program. Therefore, despite our commitments and those of other donors, many Palestinians complain that they have yet to see the benefits of peace.

USAID has responded to this fragile and changing situation by working with the State Department to refocus our program to maximize support for the peace process. We have just restructured our current program to emphasize job creation and the improvement of basic infrastructure. We needed a program which would be more visible and be delivered more rapidly than previously.

The USAID program will focus on Gaza where the needs are most urgent. To produce visible results quickly, we will work primarily with international and nongovernmental organizations that are already on the ground and have the capacity to mobilize people and resources quickly. These new activities include paving streets, renovating community buildings, rehabilitating housing and upgrading sewer and stormwater systems in Gaza. Upgrading the stormwater and sewage systems will have a significant environmental and health benefit for over 125,000 people by eliminating flooding and removing raw sewage from the streets of Gaza City.

When I was recently in Gaza, I visited a site with the chief engineer for the city of Gaza. As we were walking around what is a pretty abysmal situation, a number of people approached him, as they usually do, he said. For the first time, he was able to say that, yes, some relief was coming in a situation which, at the individual local residence, is truly awful.

USAID is also supporting a wide range of activities designed to generate employment through private sector development through technical assistance and marketing and production and loan guarantees for small and medium businesses. In addition to changing the focus of the program to better respond to the current situation and the needs on the ground, USAID has cut through its business as usual procedures to speed up the delivery of resources to people.

For example, it normally takes 9-12 months to design a project, and sometimes longer. In the case of Gaza, for the job creation and infrastructure activities, we have been able to compress that time to less than 4 weeks. This is an example of the sweeping reforms USAID has been making in the last 18 months.

In addition to our efforts, there is a great deal of effort at the local level and through donor coordination. The World Bank and the UN have resident representatives who are in the leadership role in a group called the Local Aid Coordinating Committee. This committee has become fundamental in helping to coordinate all donor assistance in the West Bank and Gaza.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, the Middle East is of vital interest to the US. USAID programs are helping to support our national interest by building a foundation for economic growth, for social development and stable and democratic political systems.

While many countries in the region have achieved remarkable successes in some sectors, many still face significant development challenges. The cost of failing to deal with these challenges today will be far higher tomorrow. Sustained and concerted effort today will help attain the comprehensive peace that will give all countries in the region a chance to thrive.

Thank you.

Mr. SMITH. Thank you very much, Mr. Brown.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Brown appears in the appendix.]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Condemn Practice of Female Genital Mutilation or Female Circumcision", in Congressional Record, 103rd Congress, Second Session, September 21, 1994. p. S13100.

20222. Valenzona, Rosa Linda G. "Population Control, The New Imperialism: To Argue As Population Planners Do That A Poor Woman With Many Babies Is Unhappy Is Disgenuous, and To Call Unplanned Pregnancy "Unleashed" Is Unfair", in Wall Street Journal, September 21, 1994. p. A14. On Cebu, recently many women feared to have government tetanus shots since there were rumors that the injections were really contraceptives. Many Filipina women are fearful that government health plans are family planning efforts: all too often, poor women receiving medical treatment are automatically recommended to have abortions when they are pregnant. However, "having babies is a poor woman's only inalienable right". Robbing Third World women of this right is demographic imperialism: with the rich white countries targeting individual Third World women. Reproductive choice cannot be created by government order, but only as economic development gives couples a reason to buy contraceptives with their own money. [Valenzona is a former undersecretary of Philippine Department of Social Welfare & Development.] [TXT]

20223. Van Impe, Jack. Perhaps Today (Newsletter), Jack Van Impe Ministries [Box J, Royal Oak, MI 48068], March 1992. The collapse of the Soviet Union is bringing a worldwide surge in anti-semitism worldwide, but especially in the United States and Russia. Cupied with the prophecies of the closing of General Motors' plants, unnamed rabbinc scholars forecast the end of the world on Rosh Hashanah 1999. Spain's growing military power may be used to back the Palestinians against Israel, and it may be possible that Butros Butros-Ghali is the king foretold in Daniel.

20224. Vilner, Meir. Two Years Since the June 1967 War: Part 11: Recognition of the Right of Palestinian Arab People. Pamphlet. New York: Jefferson Book Store, April 6, 1969. This is indeed a true, scientific analysis of the situation, of the official Israeli policy. We, the Communists, have always said that the policy of relying on imperialism and the policy of repudiation of the national rights of the Palestinian Arab people, and even of its very existence, are interconnected. Therefore we have always maintained that an Israeli policy according with the cause of national independence and peace must include these two elements: stopping the dependence on the imperialist powers and recognition of the just national rights of the Palestinian Arab people, and in the first place of the right of the refugees to choose between return to their homeland and receipt of compensations. It is possible to solve the Palestinian question on the basis of the right to self-determination of the peoples. Prof. Talmon writes on this subject: "In the eyes of the world, and in my eyes too, recognition of non-recognition of the Palestinian Arabs as a group entitled to self-determination is the basic question. It is the criterion which will determine if our intentions are towards respecting the rights of others, or towards ignoring them. This is the measure for ascertaining the democratic character and the moral essence of our state. Those who claim that by recognizing the rights of the Palestinian Arabs, we call in question our own right to live--in this country and to constitute a state in it, do not know what they are talking about. The truth is diametrically opposed--the recognition of the rights of others gives unshakable moral validity to our claim, and their negation deprives us of any moral right, at least in the eyes of the gentiles, who cannot be told that we have a 'kushan' (certificate of registration of immovables, according to imperial Ottoman law, still applicable in Israel - trans.) from God, blessed be He, entitling us to Jenin and Nablus."

These principles were correct and have remained correct till this day. Life has proved that negating or ignoring them has brought nothing but new wars. These principles of a patriotic Israeli policy, which are air-conditioned buses and countless security checks swarmed the Cairo "Call", in EcoNews Africa, Vol 3(19). Armed forces, guarded air-conditioned buses and countless security checks swarmed the Cairo Conference Centre. Delegates in fashionable albeit formal outfits solemnly miled the corridors of the air conditioned venue - looking set to round up the last leg of the controversial International Conference on Population and Development -ICPD. Despite the hue and cry by Muslims

20225. Vrazo, Fawn. "Close-Up: New Sterilization Tack a Savior or a Menace?", in Seattle Times, December 4, 1993. p. A3. The 'revolutionary 'quinacrine pellet' has started being used throughout the Third World to sterilize poor women. The technique involves release of a small amount of a quinine like drug that causes scarring in the fallopian tubes (95% sterilization rate): the cost is a few cents per sterilization. The Quinacrine Pellet does not have FDA approval. Already, 80000 women have been sterilized with the technique, including 30000 in Vietnam. Critics warn the health impact of the technique is unknown and that governments may force the sterilization on women who do not understand that its effect is permanent. The Center for Research on Population & Security in North Carolina has distributed the drug in Bangladesh, Costa Rica, Croatia, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Pakistan, Venezuela, Chile and Vietnam. The Association for Voluntary Surgical Contraception reports that some sterilizations in Vietnam may have been forced. [TXT]

20226. Walker, Dennis. "British Colonial Rule in Egypt: The Cultural and Political Formation of Mustafa Kamil's Independence Movement", in Hamdard Islamicus (Karachi) v. 16 (Spring 1993) 1: pp. 81-127. The "Patriotic Party" (al-Hizb al-Watanii) launched by Mustafa Kamil (d. 1908) was the main movement for the independence of Egypt during British colonial rule (1882-1922). Kamil's movement and constituency were overwhelmingly made up of acculturated, bilingualized Muslim Egyptian modern-stream students and professionals. British attempts to marginalize classical Arabic out of modern education and government ignited the resolve of the multi-lingual nationalists around Kamil to restore classical Arabic within a linguistic language-obsessed nationalism than prefigured later Egyptian pan-Arabism. The article shows how, under cultural pressure and racism from Westerners, the party of Mustafa Kamil maintained a cultural duality sometimes blending into synthesis. On one hand, they called for wholesale adoption of a constitutional parliamentary order and a laissez-faire economic regime modelled on West Europe. From adolescence, French Enlightenment concepts of the rights of Man and law offered a rallying-point against Britain and Kamil and his colleagues cited them to persuade the European states to eject Britain from Egypt. On the other hand, the Kamilists called for classical Arab works, such as Caliph 'Ali's Nahj al-Balaghah to have input into politics and demanded that "Muhammadan civilization" preserve non-Western patterns for the life of women in Egypt. [author abstract]

20227. Wambui, Mercy. "Mirror Mirror on the Wall...Taking Stock of the Cairo Call", in EcoNews Africa, Vol 3(19). Armed forces, guarded air-conditioned buses and countless security checks swarmed the Cairo Conference Centre. Delegates in fashionable albeit formal outfits solemnly miled the corridors of the air conditioned venue - looking set to round up the last leg of the controversial International Conference on Population and Development -ICPD. Despite the hue and cry by Muslims
Sexual relations especially among adolescents. Further, decisions largely the result of unfair terms of trade and neo-classical economic controversy. While the more liberal Western Nations were in agreement an emigrant has no right to be rejoined by his/her immediate family. Two, the “rights of individuals” became an issue of religious and cultural “family reunification”. It implied that a person living in another country as an emigrant from the South. The bone of contention lay in the wording of the draft text regarding contraceptive or abortion...people needed to live and eat” During the first plenary session, Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland spoke on the need to reduce northern over-consumption of resources - a fact that was reiterated by US Vice President Al Gore.

The Swiss delegate even gave a practical proposal that read... “To achieve sustained economic growth and sustainable patterns of consumption and production, economic and regulatory measures should be taken. Such measures should include fiscal incentives, environmental accounting the application of the “polluter pays” principle and environmental impact assessments.” This was acceptable to Southern delegates but when it came to push and shove, it was rejected by the north. The now watered down proposal reads: “....modify unsustainable Consumption and production patterns through economic legislatively and administrative measures as appropriate, aimed at sustaining sustainable resource use and preventing environmental degradation.” Southern countries suffering under the brunt of World Bank instigated Structural Adjustment Programmes were particularly bitter with the lip-service paid to the issues of development including Northern over-consumption that is the root causes of the survival crisis in the South. During a workshop on World Bank and NGOs at the NGO forum a participant from Egypt expressed concern that population issues were being looked at as though Africa is the one overpopulating the earth and therefore threatening the survival of the globe. “The issue here is that the debate on abortion is making it very easy for the Ills of the North towards the South go by unhiltighted.” “This Conference is looking at population in itself as a problem while the issue should be developing our economies to meet people’s needs and improve their quality of life and thus enable them to make informed decisions about their own families” said Anthony Aijok a development worker from Sudan. Annoyed by the lack of attention on development issues, African delegates wrote a letter to the ICPD secretariat highlighting issues not being dealt with. These included sustainable development, Structural Adjustment Programs and external debt. The debt burden constitutes a major constraint in government efforts to support social and economic programs. The Chair made it clear that it should be understood that these issues are being discussed within the context of development and environment. The document has nothing substantial to that supports this premise.

Family Reunification: Another issue that created an emotional tangle between the North and the South was International Migration. The North has been leveling sterner measures to control emigrants from the South. The bone of contention lay in the wording of the draft text regarding “family reunification”. It implied that a person living in another country as an emigrant has no right to be rejoined by his/her immediate family. Two broadissues were at interplay. One, emigrants from the South have increased in number due to political strife in their countries or socio-economic constraints leading them to the North in search of greener pastures. The North is aware that economic and political difficulties are largely the result of unfair terms of trade and neo-classical economic policies that continue to undermine the developing world, and should therefore not close doors to individuals and their families seeking safety and the ability to meet their own needs in the industrialised world. According to a Nigerian journalist living in the United States "Nobody wants to live and work in another country unless there are constraints - usually political or economic...they (read the North) create problems in the south and expect us to gladly accept those problems." Secondly, this being the International Year of the Family, the Youth Laureate and Panelist Bore said that the wording of the draft text denying a documented migrant the right to be rejoined by their family which is the basic core of society, contradicts the purposes glorifying the concept embodying the International Year of the Family. The conference agreed on a compromise that said that Governments of countries receiving immigrants "must recognise the vital importance of family reunification and promote its integration into the national legislation in order to ensure the protection of the unity of the families of documented migrants."

Losses and Gains for Africa: Although it is difficult to talk about losses and gains in black and white, one thing was clear, fundamental issues of priority for Africa were given lip service. Africa is facing many forms of crises largely attributed to Northern control over the South especially in the economic arena. The question of Africa's population was constantly subtly regarded as a problem without due recognition of the origin of the problem - unfair distribution of resources. Mr Ajok argued "Europe has a great population density - higher than Africa put together but nobody complains about over-population. Why? Because they are industrialised and "developed" materially." He felt that the West's concern is that they have a big problem in their hands - that Africa's growth is in the form of human resources which is bound to threaten their own diminishing growth in numbers." Many felt the whole issue of population was regarded as an African problem and the conference boiled down to controlling "this problem" by targetting women. Putting women's empowerment at the centre of the solution to the question was a very difficult task. A lot of critiques felt the document did nothing towards improving their lot. "The document reads women women everywhere but some sense of humor - he cranked up the volume of his radio to the sound of Ace of Base singing, "all that she wants is another baby..."

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

289

Transnational Corporations for the sake of making money at the expense of people's health. Additionally, they included the need to recognise that second generation side-effects of contraceptives do exist and should be taken into consideration in the research for new or existing contraceptives.

Money Money Money: The greatest challenge lies in the implementation of the Action Program. Countries committed themselves to total annual population spending of $ 3 billion for the developing world over the next century or three times the current expenditure. An important underlying question is whether the funds for population programs will be geared towards the distribution of contraceptives aimed at demographic targets (to cut down on the numbers) or there will be an emphasis on narrowing the gap in gender with regard to nutrition and education, child survival programs and providing health care to women of all ages. Will donors provide funds for improved health services without attaching conditionalities for distribution of contraceptives? There is an important role for NGOs here: to monitor future funding in population related issues. They must continue to insist on all-rounded funding that takes into consideration the quality of life; form alliances with Northern NGOs for effective lobbying against dumping of banned contraceptives in the South; access information on ongoing research in contraceptives and in line with the Conference Document, monitor the activities of Transnational Companies that are out to make money at the expense of people's health; find ways of working with Governments to avoid funding of population programs that promise people better lives when they reduce their families but do not take into consideration other factors such as overall economic structures that may inhibit attaining economic empowerment. For future conferences, it would help to have training sessions for NGOs on lobbying skills. Manuals on the issues at hand and how to lobby delegates would be useful methods to ensure active NGO participation and input. As some angry delegates from the South, incensed by the watered down compromise document that emerged from Cairo, boarded a bus to head for the hotel, the Egyptian bus driver made attempts at some sense of humor - he cranked up the volume of his radio to the sound of Ace of Base singing, "all that she wants is another baby..."

20/20 Vision - Cairo's Unfinished Business: Forwarded to the Social Summit to be held next year in Copenhagen was the 20/20 proposal. It calls for developing countries to devote at least 20 percent of their national budget to providing basic social services such as primary health care and that donors dedicate a similar proportion of aid allocations to basic social services such as primary health care. The problem is not only that of providing much needed social services but also making them accessible and welcoming to young people especially young women. "Africa is poles apart from the rest of the world," said Elisa Wells, President of Action International (ELCI) and the International Outreach Program of KENGO. It is supported by the Humanistic Institute for Cooperation with Developing Countries (HIHOS) and NGONET based in Montevideo, Uruguay. The views expressed in the features do not necessarily reflect those of EcoNews Africa or of its member organizations and donors. Reproduction of the material contained in the "features" is encouraged with acknowledgement of source. Postal Address: EcoNews Africa, P.O. Box 76406, Nairobi, Kenya. Visitors: 1st Floor, No. 27 Uchiuru Road, Off Ole Shapara Avenue, Nairobi South "C". Tel. and Fax: +254-2-604682. Email: econews(a)ukula.gn.apc.org or econews(a)elci.gn.apc.org. EconAfrica is also available on electronic conference at econews.africa(a)gn.apc.org and locally at econews.africa(a)ukula.gn.apc.org.a.n.[]=

2228. Wells, Elisa; Perkin, Gordon W. "Clinton Renews US Role in Key Population Issues". In Seattle Times, February 16, 1994, p. B7. Every minute, 180 people are added to the world population; in the next ten years 1 billion people will be added, bringing world population to 6.5 billion in 2000. By 2025, this growth rate will bring world population to 21 billion. The International Conference on Population & Development been coerced to barter their reproductive functions for a pittance to feed similarly low `income inequality' - have dramatically reduced birth rates.

289

Various pressure tactics to get them to accept or comply. Or they have same four countries - and certain other poor countries which have (and sometimes men) have been subjected to `social marketing' and which look at population trends in different countries, point out that these are often in provinces of new towns and rural areas, long accustomed to unwanted pregnancies and fetal deaths. They are more likely to accept family planning. In the current debate over population policy, what both protagonists and critics have failed to emphasise strongly enough (although both refer to it in passing) is the strong link between fertility rates and socio-economic security.

There is a wealth of evidence which demonstrates that birth rates are much more substantially and sustainably reduced by increasing social equity than by pushing family planning. Both current events and history bear this out. There is a wide range of examples that show how population growth rates decline as societies succeed in providing guarantees for meeting the basic needs of their whole populations. Socially disadvantaged parents tend to have many children as a way to provide the security that society fails to provide. For many families, both rural and urban, who live marginally by day-to-day subsistence, their children from an early age contribute to family income. Children provide a source of support and care in times of parental unemployment, sickness, and old age. In short, for a family that is desperately poor, to have many children is an economic necessity. The worse the family's socio-economic situation, the more children are needed. And where child mortality is high, a makeshift insurance plan (for those who have no other) is to have lots of children. Alternately, when societies begin to assure that the basic needs of the whole population are met, low-income families can afford to have fewer children. Hence population growth rates begin to decline. This decline is obvious when we compare the population growth rates of Northern industrialised countries to many of the poor countries in the South. Those European countries that have adequate minimum wages, universal health care, and equitable social security for all have almost zero population growth (and many would have declining populations, except for the influx of immigrants and refugees). By contrast, the United States, for all its enormous wealth, also has colossal inequities: one of every four children lives in poverty, 22 million persons daily go hungry, and nearly 40 million have no health coverage. Not surprisingly, the USA is experiencing a higher birth rate than more equitable European countries.

In the current debate over population policy, what both protagonists and critics have failed to emphasise strongly enough (although both refer to it in passing) is the strong link between fertility rates and socio-economic security. There is a wealth of evidence which demonstrates that birth rates are much more substantially and sustainably reduced by increasing social equity than by pushing family planning. Both current events and history bear this out. There is a wide range of examples that show how population growth rates decline as societies succeed in providing guarantees for meeting the basic needs of their whole populations. Socially disadvantaged parents tend to have many children as a way to provide the security that society fails to provide. For many families, both rural and urban, who live marginally by day-to-day subsistence, their children from an early age contribute to family income. Children provide a source of support and care in times of parental unemployment, sickness, and old age. In short, for a family that is desperately poor, to have many children is an economic necessity. The worse the family's socio-economic situation, the more children are needed. And where child mortality is high, a makeshift insurance plan (for those who have no other) is to have lots of children. Alternately, when societies begin to assure that the basic needs of the whole population are met, low-income families can afford to have fewer children. Hence population growth rates begin to decline. This decline is obvious when we compare the population growth rates of Northern industrialised countries to many of the poor countries in the South. Those European countries that have adequate minimum wages, universal health care, and equitable social security for all have almost zero population growth (and many would have declining populations, except for the influx of immigrants and refugees). By contrast, the United States, for all its enormous wealth, also has colossal inequities: one of every four children lives in poverty, 22 million persons daily go hungry, and nearly 40 million have no health coverage. Not surprisingly, the USA is experiencing a higher birth rate than more equitable European countries.

In the current debate over population policy, what both protagonists and critics have failed to emphasise strongly enough (although both refer to it in passing) is the strong link between fertility rates and socio-economic security. There is a wealth of evidence which demonstrates that birth rates are much more substantially and sustainably reduced by increasing social equity than by pushing family planning. Both current events and history bear this out. There is a wide range of examples that show how population growth rates decline as societies succeed in providing guarantees for meeting the basic needs of their whole populations. Socially disadvantaged parents tend to have many children as a way to provide the security that society fails to provide. For many families, both rural and urban, who live marginally by day-to-day subsistence, their children from an early age contribute to family income. Children provide a source of support and care in times of parental unemployment, sickness, and old age. In short, for a family that is desperately poor, to have many children is an economic necessity. The worse the family's socio-economic situation, the more children are needed. And where child mortality is high, a makeshift insurance plan (for those who have no other) is to have lots of children. Alternately, when societies begin to assure that the basic needs of the whole population are met, low-income families can afford to have fewer children. Hence population growth rates begin to decline. This decline is obvious when we compare the population growth rates of Northern industrialised countries to many of the poor countries in the South. Those European countries that have adequate minimum wages, universal health care, and equitable social security for all have almost zero population growth (and many would have declining populations, except for the influx of immigrants and refugees). By contrast, the United States, for all its enormous wealth, also has colossal inequities: one of every four children lives in poverty, 22 million persons daily go hungry, and nearly 40 million have no health coverage. Not surprisingly, the USA is experiencing a higher birth rate than more equitable European countries.
widespread killing of baby girls by parents who want a boy). However, Kerala, Sri Lanka, and Costa Rica all have lower fertility rates than neighbouring states, in spite of less aggressive family planning campaigns. In contrast, countries like Mexico and South Africa, with relatively high per capita incomes but great ‘income inequality’, have higher birth rates. Cuba, both historically and compared to neighbouring countrires, also validates the above observations. During the Batista dictatorship, whereas the gap between rich and poor was very wide and people had few social guarantees, Cuba had one of the highest fertility rates in Latin America. After the overthrow of Batista, the revolutionary government introduced one of the world’s most equitable systems, in terms of basic physical needs (if not always political rights). These included: housing and sanitation for all; full care for the elderly, equal rights and opportunities for women, etc. Although Cuba made a variety of contraceptive methods available, for many years it had no policy to promote family planning. Yet during the first decade of the Revolution, the birth rate plummeted dramatically - far more than in those Latin American countries with strong family planning campaigns but few social guarantees for their impoverished masses.

John Ratcliffe, a population scientist formerly with the Berkeley School of Public Health, has done some interesting macro studies of population trends, comparing fluctuations in growth rates of different countries at different times and under varying socio-economic and political systems. His studies confirm that fertility rates are determined much more by societal factors (relative equity and social guarantees) than by the presence or relative aggressiveness of family planning initiatives. Those who are genuinely concerned about population growth (as distinct from those who harp on ‘population’ to divert attention from social injustice as the root cause of our global crises) need to take the above facts very seriously. What the hard facts imply is that population growth cannot be substantially reduced through family planning programmes alone. The only way to bring about substantial and sustainable reduction of fertility rates is through far-reaching social change. Such change entails more equitable systems, with policies to guarantee that the basic needs of all persons are met. Only under conditions of social justice can most people afford - and experience substantial advantages to having - few children. Unfortunately, many of the world’s high-level planners have little commitment to a sustainable development model based on fair sharing. They are blindly committed to the dominant development model with its so-called ‘free market’ policies that place higher priority on economic growth of the few than on the well-being of the many. They are unwilling to see how the globalisation of the market economy - with its massive debt burdens, impoverishing structural adjustment policies, increasing net flow of wealth from poor persons and countries to rich, and authoritarian puppet governments armed by the global powers to keep such inequities in place - is the root cause of today’s global crises. Nor do they admit that these same injustices give rise to the apparent shortages and very real strain on resources for which they blame ‘overpopulation’. Tragically, today’s global decision makers are too attached to their disproportionate wealth and privilege to see how the avid pursuit of economic growth contributes to the rapid population growth which they fear and wish to control. It is therefore the job for those of us who are concerned about our children’s and the planet’s present well-being, to organise in struggle for a more healthy and sustainable world order. We must mobilise action from the bottom up, both locally and globally, so that all people’s basic needs and basic rights - including their reproductive rights - are met. In preparation for the forthcoming global conference in September, we must help decision makers realise that if they want to reduce population growth rate they must first look to social justice… and above all else, make sure all children get enough to eat.

Healthier people make (and demand) healthier decisions. --Third World Network Features. [About the writer: David Werner has authored numerous books on health and society, his most famous being Where There is No Doctor, which has been translated into more than 20 languages. When reproducing this feature, please credit Third World Network Features and (if applicable) the cooperating magazine or agency involved in the article, and give the byline. Please send us cuttings. Published by Third World Network 228, Macalister Road, 10400 Penang, Malaysia. Email: twn@igc.apc.org; Phone: (+604)-2293511; Fax: (+604)-364505.]

20231. Wickinger, Deborah. Experience and Expression: Life Among Bedouin Women in South Sinai. Cairo: Papers in Social Science, Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, Summer 1991. The Tarabîn Bedouin believed to originate in Arabia, live along the coast of Southeastern Sinai, and are the largest tribe among the 90000 nomadic or semi-nomadic people of the Sinai. There is little historical documentation on the Bedouin if Sinia, and even less on women, since while men had contact with travellers as guides, women were isolated in herding and household duties. The sedentarization and monetarization of Sinai Bedouin life was intensive under Israeli occupation, and Bedouin provided a labor force for Israeli economic development: the largest Israeli employer was the Ministry of Defense. While Israel has labor shortages, Egypt does not and the return of Sinai to Egyptian rule has slowed economic progress among the Bedouin, and most women remain engaged in subsistence herding activities.

While there has been tourist development in Tarabîn, it is men who provide services and goods to tourists, while women both engage in economic activity in isolation from tourists and walk along routes that are separate from areas in which tourists recreate (route separation in Tarabîn is illustrated by a map). Women rarely handle money, since in group activities are done on a barter or in-family basis, while exchange with tourists is undertaken in cash; however, the major contribution from the subsistence economy is that of women.

While Arab society emphasizes fearlessness, alertness, bravery and self-control among men, women are publicly deferential, modest and retiring. Yet the image of Arab women in traditional settings as powerless is incorrect, since women, even within the “context of hierarchical structure based on a moral code of honor segregation of men and women”, a segregation based on protecting family honor through protecting the sexuality of its women through sexual segregation, women are active in kin and friendship networks, are brokers of marriages, are political activists, holders and conveyers of vital information, and are often individuals with specific and significant power. The principle social interaction of women is with other women: this provides the basis for women being the major conduit for the flow of information in the community. Despite public modesty, among women sexual joking is common, and women earn the respect of other women by being brave, strong and self-confident, illustrated by the life-stories of Aida, a tribal woman admired for her bravery, independence, self-control and stoicism.

20232. Williams, Ian. Letter: "We Resent Your Odious Accusations", in Wall Street Journal, November 5, 1996, p. A23. [TXT] [Williams is president of the UN Correspondents Association.] Reporters at the UN have a quaint notion of freedom of the press that involves allowing unpopular and unofficial figures to state their case. I am sorry that Pedro Sanjuan does not share it in his piece (10/30/1996 editorial page, "Match Made at the UN"). Nor does he share our equally quaint journalistic attachment to truth. The UN Correspondents Association is not ‘controlled’ by anyone in the UN Secretariat, and UN officials had absolutely nothing at all to do with the invitation to Louys Farrakhan. In fact, the association has been in dispute with Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali for four years over his refusal to admit Shen Tong, the Tiananmen Square dissident, to address correspondents when we invited him. We are also vigorously contesting the UN’s refusal of accreditation to Taiwanese correspondents. In fact, we have a proud record of inviting controversial speakers in the face of official disinterest, ranging from Kurds from Turkey to Gerry Adams of Provision Sinn Fein. A member suggested the invitation to Mr. Farrakhan, and in the same spirit of press freedom our executive endorsed it. We informed the Un of our decision, but at no time did it seem to influence us either way. Despite Mr. Sanjuan’s quasi-racist assumptions about the Arabic nationality and motives of the staff at the UN’s Department of Public Information, they are sophisticated enough to realize that an endorsement by Mr.
Farrakhan is of somewhat dubious value to the secretary-general’s reappointment. Eventually, the Libyan Mission hosted the press conference because we insisted on reducing the size of the retinue Mr. Farrakhan wished to bring with him. Like my colleagues, as a correspondent, I have personally exposed cases of financial and sexual abuse at the UN, including some perpetrated by officials appointed by Boutros-Ghali. We are not controlled by anyone and deeply resent Mr. Sanjuan’s inaccuracies. [Sanjuan is president of the Institute of West-East Dynamics, and was assistant secretary of interior for international affairs and as director for political affairs in the UN Secretariat. The Institute of West-East Dynamics reportedly receives indirect funding from Israel.]

20234. Wirth, Timothy E. "Cairo Conference: US Goals at the Cairo Conference Timothy E. Wirth, Under Secretary for Global Affairs; Program of Action", in US Department of State Bulletin, September 5, 1994. The goals of the United States at the Cairo Conference are threefold. In other words, we would like to come out with a Program of Action: First is a broad, comprehensive program of action. The world is sharing in Cairo a sense of urgency about the fact that we will not be able to reach economic development, maintain political stability, or sustain ecological structures in the world without population stabilization. This is a sense of urgency felt by countries all over the world—East-West, North-South, rich-poor—and the program of action is the template that will come out of Cairo outlining what effective population stabilization programs can be. That program of action—product number one or outcome number one—of Cairo has been more than 92% agreed to. For those of you who are into UN documentation, UN documents are done by consensus. And going into the final negotiations, if areas of a document are not agreed upon, they have brackets around them. Going into the Rio Conference in 1992—the Earth Summit on Environment nearly 50% of the document was bracketed. Less than 8% of this Cairo document is bracketed. So there has been an enormous amount of work done and consensus reached on just about every issue. I will come back to the remaining issues. [=]

20235. Wirth, Timothy E. "Cairo Conference: US Goals at the Cairo Conference Timothy E. Wirth, Under Secretary for Global Affairs; Program of Action", in US Department of State Bulletin, September 5, 1994. The goals of the United States at the Cairo Conference are threefold. In other words, we would like to come out with a Program of Action: First is a broad, comprehensive program of action. The world is sharing in Cairo a sense of urgency about the fact that we will not be able to reach economic development, maintain political stability, or sustain ecological structures in the world without population stabilization. This is a sense of urgency felt by countries all over the world—East-West, North-South, rich-poor—and the program of action is the template that will come out of Cairo outlining what effective population stabilization programs can be. That program of action—product number one or outcome number one—of Cairo has been more than 92% agreed to. For those of you who are into UN documentation, UN documents are done by consensus. And going into the final negotiations, if areas of a document are not agreed upon, they have brackets around them. Going into the Rio Conference in 1992—the Earth Summit on Environment nearly 50% of the document was bracketed. Less than 8% of this Cairo document is bracketed. So there has been an enormous amount of work done and consensus reached on just about every issue. I will come back to the remaining issues. [=]
services available shortly after the turn of the century to every woman and family in the world who wants them. That will be an expensive proposition. Currently, spending is somewhere around $5-6 billion a year in the world on family planning. The cost of making sure that family planning is available to all individuals in the world who wish to have it will be in the neighborhood of $1 billion. So there must be an increase around the world. The United States has begun to work very hard on that. We have increased our own contribution to close to $600 million per year directly into family planning. The US is the largest contributor in the world. We have persuaded the Japanese to increase their contribution from $40 million a year to more than $400 million a year for population and AIDS. The Canadians, the Australians, the European Union, the British, the Nordic —have all increased their contributions. The World Bank has made population the number-one agenda for them in 1994, and it was the lead issue that Lou Preston, the President of the World Bank, spoke about at the time of the 50th anniversary of the Bretton Woods institutions. Mr. Preston will be one of the opening speakers at the Cairo Conference. We think we are making very significant progress on our second goal, which is the development of the financial resources necessary to provide family planning to everybody in the world who wants it. [=]

20237. Wirth, Timothy E. "Cairo Conference: US Goals at the Cairo Conference Timothy E. Wirth, Under Secretary for Global Affairs; Opening Remarks at a Department of State Press Briefing, Washington, DC, 8/31/1994: Part 3: Program Delivery Mechanism", in US Department of State Bulletin, September 5, 1994. The third goal is the follow-up mechanism—the delivery mechanism—for the program of action and the funding, and a very ambitious program of predominantly women-centered programs around the world, focused not only on family planning but on the full range of women's reproductive health care services. Child mortality programs, the education of children, and the role of women in economic development are all part of that follow-up mechanism which is being developed in each country. Some countries, such as Indonesia, Egypt, and Bangladesh, have very aggressive programs now. Others want to learn from the successes of countries that have done very well. So there are three goals in Cairo—the program of action, the funding, and the follow-up mechanism—and we think that we are very close to achieving very, very good results in all three. [=]

20238. Wirth, Timothy E. "Cairo Conference: US Goals at the Cairo Conference Timothy E. Wirth, Under Secretary for Global Affairs; Opening Remarks at a Department of State Press Briefing, Washington, DC, 8/31/1994: Part 4: Issues In The Program of Action", in US Department of State Bulletin, September 5, 1994. Finally, in the program of action, those items that are bracketed or still in disagreement are threefold: the issue of adolescence, the issue of women's reproductive health care services, and the issue of abortion.

Adolescence. On the issue of adolescence, I would remind all of you that by the year 2000 there will be more than 1 billion teenagers in the world—a billion teenagers—moving into their reproductive health care years. And it is because of the very rapid growth of this group of people that there is a sense of urgency. While the world's rate of population increase has in fact gone down from where it had been at a high point, it is still well above the replacement rate, and having so many people moving into the childbearing years means that there is potentially a very sharp increase in the rate of population—world population. Today, it is increasing by almost 100 million per year. That is the equivalent of a Mexico every year or a China every 10 years or, to put it in our terms, a New York City every month. The adolescence issue is very important. There has been controversy surrounding the availability of family planning information and services to adolescents. The Canadians have been working on and in the lead on language to sort through the adolescence issue. We have had very extensive discussions with Father Martin—the head of the Holy See's Delegation—and with others, and I think that the adolescence issue is well on the way toward being resolved.

Women's Reproductive Health Care Services. The second issue is the range of reproductive health care services available to women. This issue is of concern to the European Union, which is floating a draft proposal on that front which picks up on the World Health Organization recommendations related to reproductive health care services, and we believe that that is well on its way toward being resolved.

Abortion. The third issue upon which there probably will not be agreement at the Cairo Conference is how to deal with the abortion question. Out of 189 countries who participate at the United Nations, 172 allow abortion in some form. Some allow the full range of access to abortion. Others do so when the health of the mother is in danger. Others do so in the case only of rape and incest. It varies all the way across the board. It had been our proposal with Colombia in the spring of 1994 that we deal with the abortion issue as part of the reproductive health care services package and say very clearly that reproductive health care services would, of course, be made available in any country based upon the framework of law, culture, and religion existing in that country. The UN has no right or authority to impose anything on any country, and putting this in the context of the laws of each country we think is the way in which the abortion issue can be resolved to the point where we can end up with that issue also, we hope, close to agreement at the conference. There is very good progress being made on our goals, and the remaining three issues—adolescence, reproductive health care services, and abortion—we think are also on the way to being resolved, especially the issues of adolescence and reproductive healthcare services. [=]

20239. Wirth, Timothy E. "Cairo Conference: US Goals at the Cairo Conference Timothy E. Wirth, Under Secretary for Global Affairs; Opening Remarks at a Department of State Press Briefing, Washington, DC, 8/31/1994: Part 5: Security in Cairo", in US Department of State Bulletin, September 5, 1994. Finally, Mike McCurry released yesterday a statement by the United States on the issue of security in Cairo. We have been working very closely with the United Nations and with the Egyptian Government on issues of security. It is clear that the Egyptian Government has been anticipating this conference. There was a successful, very large conference of tourism people from all over the world held there last spring. There were, despite allegations of problems, no problems whatsoever. The American embassy personnel in Cairo had no problems at all for a long period of time, unlike almost any other embassy in a large city anywhere else in the world. The issues that have been illustrated on a security measure occurred south of Cairo—halfway between Cairo and Aswan—in an area that has been for 1000 years the home of a number of more radical revolutionary groups. That is where the problem occurred the day before yesterday with the unfortunate killing of the young Spanish student. We have advised all Americans not to travel through that area of Egypt. We have put out very careful advisories to people on just being careful as you would be in any large city, and the United States has no intention of changing its plans, and we don't know of other delegations who, on the basis of security, have made changes in their plans. We are monitoring the question—the issue—obviously, very closely and are in very close touch with as many of the US NGOs—citizen groups—that are going to Cairo that we know about, and have, again, as I said, worked very closely with the UN and Egyptian authorities. [=]

20240. Wirth, Timothy E. "Population and Sustainable Development: Defining an Agenda; Timothy E. Wirth, Counselor of the Department: Statement at the Third Preparatory Meeting of the UN International Conference on Population and Development, New York City, 4/3/1994: Part 1: Introduction", in US Department of State Dispatch, April 11, 1994. Mr. Chairman, Madame Secretary General, and distinguished delegates, my government is honored to be working with you as we begin the final preparatory meeting prior to the International Conference on Population and Development. We are fortunate to once again have the skilled chairmanship of Dr. Fred Sai, to have benefited from the tireless work of the Secretary General, and to be supported by the able conference secretariat. Two weeks ago, I had the privilege of visiting Cairo, where I was warmly received by President Mubarak; the Honorable Interior Minister Al-Alaf; and the Honorable Professor Maher Mahran, Minister of Population and Family Welfare and our chief host for the ICPD. I also met with the national Egyptian NGO steering committee chair, Aziza Hussein. We are greatly indebted to the Government of Egypt for the extensive preparations they are making to ensure the success of this historic conference. [=]

20241. Wirth, Timothy E. "Population and Sustainable Development: Defining an Agenda: Timothy E. Wirth, Counselor of the Department: Statement at the Third Preparatory Meeting of the UN International Conference on Population and Development, New York City, 4/5/1994: Part 2: The Foundation For a Program of Action", in US Department of State Dispatch, April 11, 1994. During the past year, the foundation has been laid for the most successful effort ever to link population and development as shared priorities and common cause for nations the world over. Almost one year ago, meeting here at the second Precom, a successful partnership was initiated—between North and South, between nations and this international institution, between governments and citizens. It is a partnership increasingly reflected in the extraordinary new common ground shared by many women, environmentalists, demographers, health professionals, and development experts alike. This partnership is also reflected in the draft Program of Action developed by the secretariat, which comprehensively defines an agenda for our future recognizing that:

(1) A humane and effective population strategy must be comprehensive and integrated with other development imperatives for education, especially for girls; increased economic opportunities for women; and the elimination of legal and social barriers to gender equality;

(2) Population growth and consumption patterns play major roles in the constellation of factors which cause environmental degradation;

(3) Development and family planning can work independently to slow population growth, but they work best when pursued together;

(4) There is widespread agreement—echoed in the 199 World Develop Report—that family planning programs should be a core element of global efforts to provide comprehensive reproductive and primary health care initiatives.

These broad themes underlie our common efforts to mobilize the world and implement the Program of Action on an international scale. Our job over the next three weeks is to sharpen the program's focus and help make it a clarion call to citizens everywhere. The United States believes that the ICPD can help launch a renewed and revitalized process of development—development that is in the long-term interests of all nations. Successfully realized, this concept of sustainable development will promote broad-based economic growth and protect the environment; it will enhance human capability and uphold democratic values; it will improve the quality of life for current generations and increase that opportunity for future generations. [=]

20242. Wirth, Timothy E. "Population and Sustainable Development: Defining an Agenda: Timothy E. Wirth, Counselor of the Department: Statement at the Third Preparatory Meeting of the UN International Conference on Population and Development, New York City, 4/5/1994: Part 3: Agenda Priorities", in US Department of State Dispatch, April 11, 1994. What might we then realistically define as a central agenda for the Cairo Conference and for sustained, priority action in the remainder of this century and on into the 21st? Let me offer a few suggestions. These priorities do not fully define our agenda for sustainable development. But if Cairo could launch action on these challenges, we could make significant progress toward stabilizing the world's population, improving the quality of life for millions of individuals, and realizing the promise of sustainable development.

First, a determined, cooperative effort must be launched to make good-quality, voluntary family planning and the full range of reproductive health services universally available early in the next century. Broadening—through research—the contraceptive methods from which individuals can choose, expanding the reproductive health services offered, and improving the distribution and the professionalism with which services are delivered will greatly enhance people's lives and augment our chances of realizing voluntary family-planning goals. Coercion must be absent from all such programs. And, as President Clinton has said to our nation, "Abortion should be safe, legal, and rare." Every effort should be made to prevent unwanted pregnancies, but—in the interest of public health and as a matter of principle—women should have access to safe abortion services and to humane services for complications due to unsafe abortions.

Simply investing in the wisdom of women is a second priority. The failure to educate females is tragic not just for human intellectual development but also because it contributes to the low status of women, infant and maternal mortality, and poverty. We must strive to close the enormous gap in educational opportunity that exists—for gender reasons alone—so that girls are able to fully realize their intellectual, economic, and political potential as well as their basic rights. As recent reports have indicated and common sense tells us, gender equity in education promises to yield enormous dividends for our population and development objectives.

Third, all countries should, over the next several years, assess the extent of the national unmet need for antenatal care, childbirth care, immunization, and the monitoring of growth and development, paying particular attention to the most vulnerable and under-served groups in the population. Further, it must be the goal of public and private child survival programs to remove all program-related barriers in the next decade to increase the ability of women and families to access these resources.

Fourth, we can reinforce health, education, and economic objectives by paying special attention to the needs of young women and men. In addition to emphasizing to adolescents the importance of interpersonal relationships and the responsibilities of sexuality, we need to have girls recognized for their full social and economic potential. We know that this strategy is not only the right thing to do for individual wellbeing and justice but that it also will help delay pregnancy and slow population momentum. We can hardly imagine the potential that would be unleashed if young women had—and believed in the possibility of—roles in addition to marriage and child-bearing.

Fifth, as women are empowered, so must we empower—some would say enlighten—men to act on their responsibilities related to fertility and sexual and reproductive health—and rights. As ever, men exercise more than their fair share of power in decision making related to family planning and reproductive choice. Men the world over need to accept and fulfill their responsibilities for promoting the rights of women, for pre- and post-natal care, for child rearing, and for prevention of sexually transmitted diseases.

Sixth, we must encourage responsible, mutually respectful sexual behavior among both men and women and teach the importance of such behavior to both boys and girls. No one has the right to be irresponsible, particularly when the lives and wellbeing of people—especially our children—are at stake.

Seventh, any discussion of responsibility must also include emphasis on the family—the basic unit of societies the world over and challenged globally as never before. Strengthening the family and intergenerational bonds and engaging citizens in their communities are ideas with greater currency today than ever before and are ideas of highest value to my government and its 260 million constituents.

Eighth, we need to take the opportunity of the Cairo Conference to discuss today's unprecedented migrations of human populations around the world. Two aspects of this problem are particularly relevant to the ICPD: the link between environmental degradation and migration and the potential effect of development programs on population movements.

Finally, together we are nurturing North-South partnerships, recognizing the mutually reinforcing roles and responsibilities of all countries for sustainable development. In the North, a commitment is necessary to help provide the financial wherewithal to realize an integrated global population strategy and to take on the difficult issues of wasteful resource consumption and the disproportionate impact the developed world has on the earth's environment. In the South, a corresponding commitment is needed to make family planning, health care, and women's empowerment among the highest national priorities. [=]
20243. Wirth, Timothy E. "Population and Sustainable Development: Defining an Agenda: Timothy E. Wirth, Counselor of the Department: Statement at the Third Preparatory Meeting of the UN International Conference on Population and Development, New York City, 4/5/1994: Part 4: Conclusion", in US Department of State Dispatch, April 11, 1994. Everywhere we must have and we must generate the political will at the highest levels of government to live up to these responsibilities. These are daunting challenges, but there are sound reasons for optimism. For all the suffering still in the world, in the last 50 years we have made more progress in alleviating human misery than in the previous two millennia. If we could do that while burdened with the political and economic costs of the Cold War and other regional conflicts, how much greater should be the goals we set for ourselves in 1994? Last fall, in his speech to the UN General Assembly, President Clinton outlined the high priority that the Clinton-Gore Administration gives to the various elements of sustainable development. Under his leadership, the United States has begun the process of shifting its priorities to reflect the changing nature of national security and long-term international cooperation. Much has been accomplished in this first year, and we look forward to working with all parties to create a vigorous agenda for Cairo and the decade ahead. Together we are working on the most important contribution which we can make to future generations—no other group in the world today has a greater opportunity to serve posterity. Let us hope that history will have reason to judge us well. [•]

Dear Friends: We have received the news that AWSA--Arab Women Solomon Association—has been banned in Egypt on 6/15/1991. Founded by Nawal El Saadawi after her release from jail nearly ten years ago--where she was detained for her writings on women--AWSA is a precious symbol of women's struggles in the Muslim world. Its dissolution is the sign of difficult times to come for women; it is a blow which hits all women's struggles in the Muslim world.

We appeal to all of you to write strong letters of protest to the Egyptian government, to demand this decision be revoked immediately, to inform the media in your country and call all democrats to protest, to send delegations to the Egyptian embassies, etc...

Since AWSA was in consultative status with the United Nations, letters of protest should also be sent to the UN and to international human rights organisations.

Do not allow AWSA to be silenced. Do not allow women from Muslim countries and communities to be silenced. Defend and demand our rights.

A Statement on the Dissolution of the Arab Women's Solidarity Association by the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights

Egyptian governmental authorities have ordered the dissolution of the Arab Women's Solidarity Association in accordance with a decision of the deputy governor of Cairo on 6/15/1991. The decision represents a new assault on freedom of association which is already severely restricted in Egypt.

The Arab Women's Solidarity Association, headed by the nationally and internationally renowned writer Dr. Nawal El Saadawi, one of the most prominent figures in the Egyptian women's movement, had succeeded, in 1985, following a two-year-long rejection, in obtaining a legal permit for its establishment from the ministry of social affairs. The permit was numbered 3282/1985.

Representatives of AWSA report that the association has, since its establishment, been exposed to numerous occasions of pressure and harassment from the ministry of social affairs on the pretext that it was engaged in activities prohibited by the law of associations.

In the above as in the recent decision to dissolve AWSA, the ministry of social affairs and other relevant authorities refused to acknowledge the existence of two distinct organizations of the same name, one an Egyptian organization registered in accordance with the law of associations, while the other is an international organization that enjoys consultative status in the UN Economic and Social Council, and works in Egypt under the approval of the Egyptian foreign ministry.

AWSA officials say that they have replied satisfactorily to all the ministry's queries in this and other respects. Nevertheless, the decision to dissolve the association was made without prior warning and without an official investigation of the association. AWSA has initiated an urgent legal appeal before the State Council Court seeking the annulment of the dissolution decision.

EOHR believes that the dissolution of AWSA is yet another serious violation of the freedom of organization and association and is deeply concerned that the Egyptian government, rather than respond to the demands of public opinion for more public liberties, and particularly for the freedom to form non-governmental organizations, and rather than respect its international commitments to maintaining basic standards of human rights and civil liberties, continues to adopt the course of increasingly tightening the constraints on basic rights and liberties in Egypt.

EOHR condemns the dissolution of AWSA, calls upon the Egyptian government to revoke the dissolution decision immediately and calls upon it to revise the legal framework regulating the establishment and operation of non-governmental organizations in the country in such a way as to guarantee respect for human rights in Egypt.

AWSA's Dissolution Update: AWSA challenges in court the decision of the Egyptian government to dissolve their association. They demand the revocation of the decision and challenge the constitutionality of Law 32 (1964) on Associations.

The trial will be heard on 10/31/1991 in Cairo. Fourteen lawyers, including one woman, volunteered to defend AWSA in court. AWSA's dissolution has created an uproar among democrats and democratic organizations in Egypt who publicly expressed their support to AWSA and wrote to the President of Egypt to demand the revocation of the decision against AWSA. They also challenge the constitutionality of Law 32 which controls and restrains their freedom of organization.

Support is starting to come from outside Egypt too, and AWSA needs massive international support before the trial. AWSA's compilation of declarations of support will be published under the title "Solidarity with Arab Women's Solidarity Association.

Nawal El Saadawi, founder of AWSA and well-known writer, is invited to the Frankfurt Book Fair and by a writer's association in Paris during 10/31/1991. She is under fierce attack by the fundamentalist press in Egypt.

20245. Zahradnik, Rich. "PLO-TV: The Medium is The Message: We Are In A Unique Situation, We Will Have Television before We Have A State", in Wired, September 1994. pp. 82, 84, 86-87. Daoud Kuttab of the Jerusalem Film Institute is a strong advocate of Palestinian television. Kuttab sees the emergence of Palestinian TV even before elections are allowed, and the possibility of Palestinian television has led to an active debate over the content and direction of programming. Israelis will continue to control the spectrum and can jam Palestinian TV at will, but that is a constraint that Palestinians struggle against in all their efforts (the peace accords grant the Palestinians one VHF television and one AM radio station frequency, but the Israelis do not honor their agreements; Khoury fears self-censorship may be necessary to prevent Israeli jamming). Palestinians are seen by Kuttab as too independent minded to accept the heavily state controlled television broadcasts that are beamed in from Israel, Jordan, and Egypt. Saman Khoury, named head of the Palestinian Broadcast Corp. sees the TV as an important pillar of the emerging Palestinian state. However, Hanan Asrawi argued, at the Palestinian Broadcasting-Promises and Challenges conference held in Jerusalem, that Palestinians should not follow the kind of strict government direction of television that is common in other Arab countries. PBC has committed itself to presenting the broadest possible range of Palestinian opinion, despite the careful path that will have to be followed between the Fatah and Hamas factions in the Palestinian polity. The European Union has granted a 2 million ECU grant to purchase television equipment, and technical assistance will be provided by France 2; UNESCO has also committed $500,000 for the station. Six Palestinians have been sent to Paris for training. Initial PBC programming will run 3.5-4 hours per day, with a half-hour news show in Arabic and three 5-minute news bulletins in Arabic, English and Hebrew. The market for the broadcasts are seen as 2 million Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and 1 million Palestinians in Israel. Kuttab hopes for street smart low-cost video productions that can make Palestine a center for ‘pan-Arab television and filmmaking’. [TXT]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iran

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

Iran

22000. -------. "Controversy Continues Over Orientalist Slated to Receive German Book Trade Association Prize", in Week in Germany, September 22, 1995, p. 6. With the Frankfurt Book Fair only weeks away, the controversy over the recipient of this year's Peace Prize of the German Book Trade Association shows no sign of abating. This prize has been awarded annually since 1950 at the close of the Frankfurt Book Fair; this year, the publishers' association is planning to bestow it upon scholar Annemarie Schimmel (73). Schimmel, the author or translator of over 70 books on Islamic religious thought and Arabic poetry, was cited by the Book Trade Association for her efforts to promote engagement rather than confrontation between the Islamic world and the West, but she drew the ire of many German writers and intellectuals earlier this spring when, during an interview, she said she could understand the sentiments behind the death sentence against Salman Rushdie for his novel The Satanic Verses (cf. TWIG 5/1995, p. 7; 5/26/1995, p. 6). So deeply wounded had Muslims been, she said, that she had "seen grown men crying."

Opposition to Schimmel found outlet earlier this month both in an open letter to President Roman Herzog, who is scheduled to speak at the prize ceremony next month, and a second protest statement issued by 150 German publishing houses. The open letter, signed by over 100 German writers, publishers, intellectuals and at least two high-ranking politicians, Heiner Geissler (CDU) and Daniel Cohn-Bendit (Greens), called on Herzog to cancel his appearance. The prize is supposed to be a recognition of courageous engagement on behalf of human rights, but Schimmel, the letter contends, has spoken out against neither the death threats against Rushdie and Bangladeshi author Taslima Nasrin nor human rights violations in the Islamic nations. Schimmel is a "welcome guest" of totalitarian regimes and appeals "adoringly and without objectivity for understanding of her special favorite, Iran," the letter said; she has demonstrated that friendship by writing for a publication of the Iranian embassy. The second letter described the award to Schimmel as "a slap in the face to all those members of the Book Trade Association who for years have defended free speech against the threat of religious terror."

Herzog and the Book Trade Association have indicated their intention to stick by Schimmel. The Association, a spokesperson told the press on 9/7/1995, had carefully considered the accusations against Schimmel, and found them unsound. Four days later, the prize selection committee likewise announced that it would not withdraw its decision.

Schimmel has her supporters as well. Udo Steinbch, director of the German Oriental Institute in Hamburg, defended her work and called the protest a "pale smear campaign." The appeal to Herzog, added writer and former German ambassador to China Erwin Wickert, was "hysterical, foolish and ill-informed." A group of Schimmel's supporters countered the open letter to Herzog with a public statement of their own on 9/12/1995. The accusations against Schimmel, the statement maintained, "abound in arbitrariness, simplifications and the deliberate citation of unrelated passages (from her works)."

Shortly after the Book Trade Association announced it would not revoke its decision, journalist-novelist Ralph Giordano made public a letter Schimmel had written this spring. In the letter, Schimmel acknowledges having said that Rushdie deserved to die and she would be willing to do the deed herself. In presenting this letter, Giordano said Schimmel's comments were flippant, but were nonetheless indicative of her unsuitability as a recipient of the Peace Prize.

Schimmel has been sparing in her responses to the furor. She described herself as "appalled and disappointed" by the letter to Herzog and insisted that she was anything but an apologist for Islamic fundamentalists. [v]

22001. -------. "Female Presence [Minister of Interior Ali Mohammed Besharat states progress and social and cultural advances of women in Iran is a 'source of great pride' for Iran]." in Granma International (Havana), November 9, 1994. p. 15. [TXT]

22002. -------. "Iran Enacts Family Size Rule [government seeks to encourage couples to limit family size to three children; government benefits for families will be provided only for the first three children; law takes effect in one year in the nation of 52 million]", in Wall Street Journal, May 17, 1993. p. A13. [TXT]

22003. -------. "Japan Crucified in UN Dock", in Peoples Korea, April 27, 1996. p. 6. [Here is a wrap-up of recent developments concerning the report on violence against women submitted by the UN special rapporteurRadhika Coomaraswamy and adopted on 4/19/1996 at the 52nd session of the UN Human Rights Commission (hereafter called the Report). Her Report was supported by government delegates and NGOs across the world in their oral statements, press conferences, and other activities during the session, making Japan look an odd man out.]

4/2/1996: The DPRK delegation in a press conference welcomed the Report, criticizing Japan's counterreport which commented that the Report was not well founded on international law and depended "too much on limited sources of information." The DPRK demanded Japan apologize for its wrongdoings done before and during WWII. The south Korean delegation said: Inaction on the part of the international community had exacerbated mass and systematic human rights violations in various parts of the world. The Republic of Korea was convinced that those who committed, directed or facilitated violations of human rights must be held accountable. It was also important to develop a mechanism for dealing with those violations of human rights which were committed by States. Franciscans International (FI) said: The Subcommission had recommended that the Commission approve appointment of a Special Rapporteur. The FI and the women from Japan for whom it spoke asked for immediate support by the whole Commission for adoption of the resolution to appoint the Special Rapporteur. There should be no further delay.

The Fact-Finding Team on the Truth About Forced Korean Laborers in Japan under the umbrella of Liberation said: After WWII, a total of 34 suspects had ben prosecuted by the allies for "forcing prostitution." A total of 115 suspects had been prosecuted for mistreating civilians. That number included suspects accused of forcibly recruiting laborers for the Hanaoka Mine in Japan. They had been convicted of crimes against humanity after standing trial in Yokohama, Japan, from 1947 to 1948. Japan had been trying to cover up related materials and documents to deny its war crimes and crimes against humanity. Japan was afraid of being punished for its war crimes; it had burned many documents during the last two weeks of 8/1945.

The Committee on Measures for Compensation to Former Korean "Comfort Women for Japanese Army" and Pacific War Victims (COMA) in the DPRK under the umbrella of International Federation of Women in Legal Careers said: Resolutions of great importance had been recommended by the Subcommission in relation to Japan. It was time for justice. Similarly, recompense was needed for Korean men who had been drafted into forced labor during the war. The compensation fund to atone for "comfort women" created by the Japanese government was not sufficient. Legal compensation was required for individual victims in accordance with international law.

The (south) Korean Council for the Women Drafted for Military Sexual Slavery by Japan under the umbrella of the World Council of Churches (WCC) said: The Commission should support appointment of a Special Rapporteur on wartime sexual slavery. Sexual slave's taken by Japanese forces during WWII were called "royal gifts" by the Emperor to his soldiers. The WCC strongly urged support of the Subcommission's resolution to appoint expert Lynda Chavez as Special Rapporteur to study the issue, as she had so far approached these problems with deep understanding, honor, and dignity. The problems must be studied on the broadest, most far-sighted scale possible, so that clarification could be achieved.

The International Movement against All Forms of Discrimination and Racism (IMADR) supported the Report which stated that Japan and its government should be held responsible for the violation of these international humanitarian law principles even though Japan was not a signatory to the particular convention.

4/9/1996: Some fifty NGOs gathered in Geneva for the session from around the world and they announced that they had formed an International Alliance Supporting Radhika Coomaraswamy’s Report on Military Sexual Slavery in War Time.

The DPRK distributed a paper as its official UN document (E/CN.4/1996/148). The DPRK criticized Japan for its attitude of evading its responsibility for the wartime crimes. Commenting that Japan should take legal and moral responsibility, the country said that the compensation should be rendered to individual victims by the State.

4/10/1996: Ms. Coomaraswamy reported on her activities and explained the outline of her Report. After that, all the audiences welcomed her report with thunderous applause.

The Chinese delegation referred to its “comfort women” issue in its own country and vowed to continue negotiations with Japan for the benefits and the honor of the victims. The Netherlands delegation said: We welcomed the resolution 1994/45 of this Commission, which proposed to create a Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women. Mrs. Radhika Coomaraswamy is doing an excellent job. Her work is of very high quality and of commendable thoroughness. The Chinese delegation said: The Report has exposed the crime of recruiting “comfort women” by the Japanese militarist government during WWII. We appreciate the Rapporteur’s constructive efforts and the results achieved.

The Chinese government has deep sympathy for the women victims who have suffered unspeakable miseries. Today, half a century after the end of the war, the Japanese government must submit itself squarely to history and reality and adopt a responsible approach to this problem for its appropriate settlement.

The Japanese delegation said: With regard to the legal aspects of the Report on missions to Japan and other countries issued by the Special Rapporteur, the government of Japan reserves its position as contained in the UN document E/CN.4/1996/137. The south Korean delegation said: The Government of the Republic of Korea is firmly of the view that if the Japanese government is really determined to “squarely face the historical facts and take them to heart as lessons of history,” as was stated by the former Chief Cabinet Secretary, the first step it should take is to publicly acknowledge its past offenses, and then to assume due responsibilities in a straightforward manner. Accordingly, the south Korean government calls upon the Japanese government to take the necessary steps in implementing the Special Rapporteur’s recommendations voluntarily and in an expeditious manner.

International Educational Development (IED) said: We are aware of current plans to provide individual compensation through a government-initiated private fund and that the government has announced an intention to distribute not less than 2 million yen per victim through that mechanism beginning as early as next month. Our organization has consistently urged direct compensation through a government-established compensation tribunal as the best way to meet Japan’s international responsibility to compensate its victims. We are not convinced that the proposed fund mechanism fully meets that obligation. IMADR expressed its full support for the recommendations made by the Special Rapporteur concerning the issue of military sexual slavery in wartime. The organization said: It is regrettable that the Japanese government refuses to acknowledge the State obligation to compensate the victims, arguing especially that an individual cannot be a subject of rights under international law. IMADR considers that the case of the so-called “comfort women” constitutes an example where the perpetrators of sexual slavery in wartime should not be allowed to avoid their legal responsibility vis-a-vis the victims.

4/11/1996:

Some NGO members from around the world staged a protest demonstration against the Japanese government, while the Japanese side refused to accept their letters of demand as was previously agreed.
the basis of Coomaraswamy's report, the 'Asian Women's Fund' will still remain, and we will continue our efforts to collect private donations to this fund." Japan's stance met with severe criticisms on the same day from the NGOs' alliance which held a demonstration in front of the Japanese Mission to the UN in Geneva. Forty delegates from 12 countries attended the protest. "The 'Asian Women's Fund' established by Japan is, in essence, an attempt to evade its state responsibility for its crimes and to offset the unprecedented crimes against humanity by a small amount of money of civilian character," the DPRK delegation said in its statement. A vote on whether to adopt the report is scheduled for later this month. Although the report has no legal force even if adopted, many NGOs working in support of the former sex slaves hope it will act as pressure on Tokyo to pay individual compensation. [ ]

22005. ------. "News Briefing by Chinese Foreign Ministry", in Beijing Review, May 8-14, 1995. p. 22. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Chen Jian announced on 4/20/1995, at one of the ministry's regular news briefings, that at the invitation of Premier Li Peng, Japanese Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama will pay an official goodwill visit to China from 5/2/1995 to 5/5/1995. He also announced that at the invitation of Premier Li Peng, the Prime Minister of the Republic of Korea Lee Hong-koo will pay an official visit to China from 5/9/1995 to 5/15/1995. Then he opened the floor for questions.

QUESTION: Some reports allege that the facilities built by China in the reefs of the Nansha Islands are not conducive to navigational safety in the South China Sea. What's your comment on this?

ANSWER: China holds indisputable sovereignty over the Nansha Islands and their nearby waters. The fishing department of the local Chinese government has built shelters for Chinese fishing vessels in the Meiji Reef in order to protect the fishermen's lives and their catches. While safeguarding its sovereignty over the Nansha Islands and its marine rights and interests, China will fulfill its duty of guaranteeing freedom of navigation for foreign ships and air routes through and over the international passage of the South China Sea according to international law. There are ulterior motives behind the spreading of the rumor that China's peaceful activities in the Nansha Islands affect navigation.

Q: Will the Chinese government permit AIDS patients or carriers of HIV to participate in the Fourth UN World Conference on Women to be held in Beijing in September?

A: According to Chinese law and regulations, foreign AIDS patients and those carrying HIV are not normally permitted to enter China. Considering that the Fourth World Conference on Women is a UN meeting, China will make inquiries about relevant international practices and extend necessary quarantine treatment to the delegates, including AIDS patients and carriers of HIV, to facilitate the widespread participation by women around the world and to assure the smooth convening of the conference. Those delegates afflicted with AIDS or carrying the virus will be permitted to enter China.

Q: What's your comment on Japanese Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama's visit to China, especially as there is no time for the Diet to review the promotion of the Treaty of Friendship and the Joint Statement, which are known to all.

A: In their recent talks Vice-Premier and Foreign Minister Qian Qichen and US Secretary of State Warren Christopher held different views on the Iranian nuclear issue. What's your comment on this?

A: China and Iran are both signatory states to the Treaty of Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. Their nuclear cooperation is fully subject to the supervision of the International Atomic Energy Agency and such cooperation is legitimate and unimpeachable. The promotion of the peaceful use of atomic energy is conducive to the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons.

Q: What effect will the recent meeting between Vice-Premier and Foreign Minister Qian Qichen and British Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd exert on the visit to China of British Secretary of State for Trade and Industry Michael Heseltine next month?

A: Maintaining cooperative relations will benefit both China and Britain and the settlement of the Hong Kong issue as well. The meeting (between Qian and Hurd) will strengthen mutual understanding and reduce friction and is conducive to Michael Heseltine's visit to China. [ ]

22006. ------. "News In Brief: Islamic Republic of Iran", in Crescent International, August 1-15, 1996, p. 2. An olympic first was the participation of Lida Fariman from Iran, an athlete in proper hijab. She competed in shooting. "We have to show the foreign media that Muslim women can participate in many areas of sporting activities, provided we abide by Islamic rules which means we have to be covered," said Ms. Fariman, age twenty-four, in an interview with Agence France Presse. She carried her country's flag as the delegation marched into the Olympic stadium during the opening ceremony. [ ]

22007. ------. "News in Brief: Islamic Republic of Iran", in Crescent International, April 16-30, 1997, p. 2. A United Nations' report presented at a United Nations' Human Rights Commission meeting in Geneva on 4/3/1997 said that the women's lot had improved under the Islamic government and that there are significant signs of further improvements in the future. [ ]

22008. ------. "Russia's Nukes: New Deal: Shusterovich's Ties to the Master of the Russian Nuclear Complex Has Given Him an Inside Track To Buy Billions in Nuclear Material", in CounterPunch, November 1, 1996. pp. 4-5. The US and Russia are locked into a struggle over 50000 tons of weapons grade nuclear material from dismantled Soviet warheads: this could allow production of 25000 low-grade nuclear weapons. The Bush Administration undertook to buy the stockpile for $12 billion, through the United States Enrichment Corp. (USEC) but now a new buyer has emerged in Russia. Minatom chief Victor Mikhailov, who tried to earn some money selling nuclear technology to Iran, was delighted with the promised 20-year deliver contract with the United States. His previous effort to sell uranium in the US, through Nucexo, failed when that firm went bankrupt, and owing Minatom $430 million.

Now a Delaware based firm, Pleiades, has announced it hopes to buy USEC: the firm is little known but has Alexander Shusterovich as president. Shusterovich has enigmatic business interests in Russia, allegedly based on pornography (Shusterovich denies, but Penthouse officers confirm that Shusterovich made an offer to buy the magazine), art speculation, a brewery and scientific publishing. However, Shusterovich has close ties to Mikhailov, who is backing Shusterovich's bid for USEC. Shusterovich has recruited some big names to Pleiades: Max Kampelman, Steven Hadley, Ron Rozenzweig (until the travel scandal an aide to Hazel O'Leary at DOE), and Wyche Fowler (US Ambassador to Saudi Arabia). Some see this growing morass as the epitome of contemporary corruption: allowing a mafia-like group to manage the flow of enough enriched uranium to make 25000 nuclear weapons, simply so that profits can be skimmed off by members of both the US and Russian governments can become rich, is the height of irresponsibility. [TXT]

2009. -------. “SIS Member Receives Honor”, in SIS News (Society for Iranian Studies), Fall 1996, p.2. Homa Sarshar was honored with the America-Israel Friendship Media Award for her past and ongoing work in journalism. The award was presented by the Bnai Zion Foundation in 8/1996 in Los Angeles. ["]

2010. -------. “Secret Clinton, Yeltsin Re-Election Pact Reported”, in Seattle Times, March 27, 1996, p. A13. President Clinton and Pres. Boris Yeltsin in a direct political exchange at the anti-terrorism summit in Egypt this month agreed to provide political assistance to each other to boost each’s chances of re-election. In the last two weeks, Yeltsin has muted Russian criticism of the expansion of NATO and expressed a greater interest in a nuclear test ban treaty, and Clinton has promised to assist Yeltsin’s re-election. Clinton stated he “wanted to make sure that everything the United States did would have a positive impact”. Clinton asked for Yeltsin to make arrangements to accelerate the import of US poultry [from major campaign contributor Arkansas-based Tyson Foods Inc.]. Yeltsin has ordered greater US-Russian cooperation against terrorism, and agreed to help the US ‘enforce a settlement’ on Bosnia.

White House Mike McCurry confirmed the accuracy of a transcript of the meeting and agreement obtained by the Washington Times. McCurry admitted that Clinton and Yeltsin had coordinated their political re-election campaigns, subordinating the foreign policies of both countries to the re-election campaigns of the two presidents. On a ‘lighter note’, the transcript, Yeltsin offered an ‘attractive instructor’ to be both Russian language instructor and prostitute to Secretary of State Warren Christopher. However, McCurry stated that the FBI would be interested in finding out how the secret document was leaked. [q.v. Dobbs, Michael, “In Bid To Support Yeltsin, IMF Lends Russia $10.2 Billion; Though Western Governments Have No Illusions About Yeltsin After the War in Chechnya and His Sporadic Record on Economic Reform, He Is Seen As Preferable to Any Of His Rivals”, in Seattle Times, March 27, 1996. p. A17, which describes the lobbying of the Clinton Administration to provide IMF financing for Yeltsin’s election promises.] [TEXT]

2011. -------. “The Relections By Region: Beirut: Hoss List Overwhelms Solh”, in Lebanon Report, September 1992. In Beirut, candidates were vying for nineteen seats, and elections took place on the basis of the muhafazah. Because of the boycott in the Christian quarters of the capital, most of the campaigning and virtually all of the voting occurred in the predominantly Muslim western part of the city. Six lists competed against each other in Beirut, but only two of them could be considered major lists: an “official” one headed by Prime Minister Rashid al-Solh, and an “opposition” one headed by former prime minister Salim al-Hoss. Two candidates close to Sunni fundamentalist circles, Mr. Adnan Traboulsi and Mr. Zuhayr Ubaydi, each on separate lists, also won seats in parliament, as did a Hizballah candidate, Mr. Muhammad Birjawi. Except for Mr. Robert Debbas and Mr. Muhyiddin Dughanj, all the candidates on Mr. Hoss’s list won seats to the new parliament. Because Mr. Hoss’s list was incomplete, however, a number of candidates on the Solh list, including Mr. Solh, as well as five Armenian representatives, were elected to parliament. The results in Beirut were as follows: the six Sunni seats in the capital were won by Mr. Salim al-Hoss (30990 votes), Mr. Zuhayr Ubaydi (12570), Mr. Muhammad Ghabban (12285), Mr. Ousama Fakhoury (12122), Mr. Adnan Traboulsi (11819), and Mr. Rashid al-Solh (11428). The two Shi’a seats were won by Mr. Muhammad Yusuf Baydoun (23559) and Mr. Muhammad Birjawi (12666). The two Greek Orthodox seats were won by Mr. Bishara Merhej (10576) and Mr. Najah Wakim (22952). The one Armenian seat was won by Mr. Hagop Jokhadarian (6051). The one minoritly seat was won by Mr. Asmar Asmar (8645). Reflecting a nation-wide trend, the turnout in Beirut was a very low 13%.

Even Prime Minister Rashid al-Solh, a stalwart supporter of elections, admitted on August 31 that “voter participation was excessively low.” After one makes provision for the number of dead people, emigres, and displaced still on electoral lists, the figure rises somewhat to about 21%. Even among the Christian boycotted elections, observers estimated that participation in Muslim areas was only some 20%. It is significant that Mr. Hoss, who won more votes than any other candidate in Beirut, was elected by no more than 9% of the officially registered electorate. Among the notable Muslim candidates who “froze their candidacy” in the electoral race was Mr. Tammam Salam, the son of former prime minister Sa’ib Salam. On August 16, the former prime minister called for the postponement of elections, noting that the government was unjustly ignoring the opposition.

This, he added, was threatening national coexistence between Christians and Muslims. In the wake of Mr. Tammam Salami’s move, a number of the Salam family’s political allies also pulled out of the race. More surprising, however, was the severe defeat of the list headed by Prime Minister Solh. Of the candidates on his complete nineeennember list, only Mr. Solh, Mr. Bishara Merhej, and the Armenian candidates who won by default, won seats at parliament. Mr. Solh won a mere 11000 votes and finished last among Sunni candidates. In forming his list, Mr. Solh had calculated that by placing all the major Armenian representatives on his list, the Armenian community would provide a significant swing vote for his list. In turn, observers noted that Mr. Hoss gambled that by not putting Armenians on his list, he would effectively neutralize Armenian participation in elections, since the Armenian community was already assured that its major candidates would pass on the Solh list. This is precisely what happened: a tiny portion of the Armenian community voted, and most candidates on the Solh list were left hanging without the Armenian vote. Mr. Hoss’s victory was also due to the very effective electoral machine which he ran. According to some estimates, the candidates on Mr. Hoss’s list did not spend more than $15000 on their campaigns, in part because they employed a large number of young volunteers. In addition, the Hoss campaign refused contributions larger than $4000. The success of the Hoss list is significant, since candidates in Lebanon are often elected depending on the liberality with which they spend their money. Mr. Hoss, however, is known as an honest man who does not render favors, a characteristic which paradoxically seemed to have played in his favor among an electorate increasingly disgusted with the corruption pervading the official class. The result thus seemed to indicate another trend common in most regions where elections took place, namely a tendency in places to reject candidates who are perceived as being too close to the government. The victory of Mr. Traboulsi and Mr. Ubaydi was significant because of their ability to use a network of charitable Islamic organizations to mobilize support for their candidacy. Unlike Hizballah, however, the Sunni fundamentalists both in Beirut and Tripoli tended to present a secular image, and did not tie their candidacies to a specific political agenda. One observer noted that the low participation in Beirut was due to the non-participation of the middle class. While there is no way yet of confirming this, it can probably be assumed that Mr. Traboulsi and Mr. Ubaydi were voted in by the poorer socio-economic classes. If this is true, then one may begin seeing in a number of predominantly Islamic areas in Lebanon, the outlines of a phenomenon found in other socioeconomically troubled Arab states: namely the ability of Islamic organizations to organize and mobilize for electoral purposes those who are suffering most from social and economic conditions in the country. While this trend might have been less evident in Lebanon had participation in elections been high, it remains a phenomenon to watch in the future. [=""]

2012. -------. “Trade; China Avoids US Punishment: Technology Sale: United States Opts Against Punishing China For Nuclear Related Exports To Pakistan”, in Olympian, May 11, 1996. p. A3. The Clinton Administrationdecided not to punish China for the sale of $70000 in magnets to Pakistan. The magnets were sold by the China Nuclear
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Energy Corp. and would be monitored by Chinese technicians to assure no application of the magnets to production of enriched uranium. Sen. Jesse Helms stated that the Clinton Administration had "finessed" the issue of sale of magnets to Pakistan, as well as questions of forced abortions and sale of technology to Iran.

20013. ------. "UN Report on Sex Slave Wins Worldwide Support", in Peoples Korea, April 20, 1996, p. 7. A large number of governments and nongovernmental organizations have supported a report by a UN expert which recommends Japan to pay compensation to the former sex slaves and punish those responsible for establishing the system. Delegates of Asian and European governments in the 52nd session of the UN Human Rights Commission, which opened 3/18/1996 in Geneva, made statements on 4/10/1996 and 4/15/1996, expressing support for UN special rapporteur Radhika Coomaraswamy's report which was submitted to the commission. Delegates from both north and south Korea welcomed the report and urged Japan to follow the Sri Lankan jurist's recommendations. The DPPR delegation highly appreciated a year-long investigation by Ms. Coomaraswamy into the issue of women who were forced into sexual slavery for Japanese soldiers before and during WWII. In a statement made on 4/15/1996, Ambassador Ri Chol, head of the country's delegation, denounced the Japanese government for rejecting therecommendations, saying, "Japan is still indexed as the criminal state, since it has not yet completely settled the issue of its crimes with all the victimized countries." If the crimes of Japan are acquired any longer, a similar crime which will violate peace and stability, human rights and fundamental freedom can be incurred," he said. South Korea's AmbassadorSun Joun Young, head of the country's delegation, said, "The first step (Japan) should take is to publicly acknowledge its past offenses, and then assume due responsibilities in a straightforward manner." He urged Japan to pay individual compensation to the victims, clearly demonstrating a shift in Seoul's stance on this issue from its 3/1993 announcement that it would not demand "any material reparations at a government level." China also expressed its strong support for the report which "has exposed the crime of recruiting 'comfort women' committed by the Japanese militarist government," and said Beijing appreciates the special rapporteur's constructive efforts and results achieved by her. The governments which backed up the UN recommendations, also included the EU, the Netherlands, Ukraine, India, Brazil, Australia, Ethiopia, Canada, Uganda, the Philippines and the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Meanwhile, some fifty NGOs, gathered in Geneva for the session from around the world, announced on 4/8/1996 that they formed an International Alliance Supporting Radhika Coomaraswamy's Report on Military Sexual Slavery in War Time, to spread support for the investigator's mandate. The international alliance requests the Commission on Human Rights to strongly support Ms. Coomaraswamy's report and follow up her work on the issue of military sexual slavery, and to encourage Tokyo to act promptly in accordance with her recommendations. Member NGOs of the alliance had increased to 70 from 30 nations as of 4/11/1996. They include the American Association of Jurists, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Movement Against All Forms of Discrimination and Racism, the Institute for Women, Law and Development and the International Fellowship of Reconciliation. [=]

20014. ------. "US Demonstrations Say: Hands Off Mexico's Rebels: New York City", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), January 23, 1994, p. 4. 1/10/1994: In New York City, 200 people demonstrated in front of the Mexican Consulate to "support the uprising in Mexico" and "stop the US-CIA intervention and protest Mexican government repression." It was initiated by the International Action Center and endorsed by many individuals and groups including: The 500 Years Coalition of NYC, Indigenous Women's Network, Federation of Iranian Refugees and Immigrants Councils, Nationalist Party of Puerto Rico, MariaJimenez (American Friends Service Committee, Houston, Texas), Haiti Proges newspaper, the Native Youth Alliance in Washington, D.C., the US Puerto Rican Solidarity Network, the National Lawyers Guild, the Patrice Lumumba Coalition, Ramsey Clark, the December 12th Coalition, Workers World Party, Rev. Lucius Walker, Jr., and the Jersey City All Peoples' Congress. Many of those who took part in the action were immigrants from Mexico and other countries in Central America and South America, as well as Dominicans, Haitians and other people from the Caribbean. There were also many political activists, members of unions, a contingent of anarchists, students and youth. The Committee to Support the Revolution in Peru had a contingent. People were angered by the repression of the rebels by the Mexican government. One Mexican woman spoke to the crowd saying, "My grandmother lived at the time of the Mexican revolution and she saw the massacres of all our people. And now the invasion is still going on. And our people are still fighting for their land and their liberty." After the action in front of the Mexican consulate people marched to the headquarters of ITT, a multinational corporation that was one of the main companies that fought to pass the NAFTA agreement. [=

20017. ------. Statement of Demands For Legal Reforms On The Occasion of International Womens Year. [Presented by a coalition of 27 Turkish women's associations] 1975. (1) Husband and wife should be entitled to represent the marital union. (2) The wife should not be obliged to adopt the husband's family name. (3) The prerogative of a husband to forbid his wife the practice of a profession or employment should be abolished. (4) Legal, educational and administrative measures to abolish the 'bride price' [basilik] should be implemented. (5) The prohibition of a religious ceremony before a civil marriage has been registered and should be enforced. (6) In order to equalize tax obligations, individual tax declarations for husband and wife should be required. (7) Women civil servants and workers should be able to take one paid year's leave of absence after childbirth. (8) Rural women should be able to benefit from social security rights. (9) The exploitation of apparently 'adopted female' children, employed in domestic service should be prevented by legal provision. [Reprinted in Abadan-Unat, "Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women", in Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 177-194. [=]

20018. ------. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: General Discussion: Afternoon Session: Part 01. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 59-62. Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Dabashi, for such a philosophical analysis of the topic of our discussion, "Theocracy, Human Rights and Women." Now we are going to open the session to the audience; if there are any questions from the floor, you can direct them either to Mr. Dabashi or any of the speakers this morning. But before I do that, let me see if any of the speakers has a comment to make about what Mr. Dabashi said. No comments? Then we open the floor for any question from the audience.

Question: I'm from Iran, and I've lived in America almost 20 years. Professor Dabashi, you gave us so much, it's impossible to digest. It was exciting to hear about all the poets that I grew up with in a very sophisticated, Perhaps political, historical, documentary type of speech and to realize the importance that you gave to the poets. I enjoyed it very much and I thank you and Professor Pirouz who organized such a conference.

But to get back to the practical aspects of women and human rights on a global level, not only in my country. As you mentioned, women constitute more than 50% of the earth's inhabitants. They do most of the work, they are nurses, and as mothers, they are the ones who have produced all the leaders, but little has been done to give them not only the recognition they deserve, but also their share in shaping the future. I don't have to tell you about the inheritance laws, which are not equal for women, lower wages for the same work, the positions of power that women do not occupy, specifically in Iran. I would like to hear some comments about that. Thank you.

Dabashi: You're absolutely right, the point of my presentation has been to try to figure out, as best as I know how, what exactly is a "woman," created as a living, breathing, historical human being, not as a totally conceptualized thing. Ferdowsi, Sa'di and many of our great poets are witnesses to what happens in terms of our collective sensibilities. So, they are certainly much more reliable than our historians. I'm sure you'd agree with me. By the way, I don't think that my references to the poetic imagination are marginal; poetry is not something tangential or luxurious in our collective culture. Let me give you a specific example; those of you who know the Shah Nameh, and I'm sure you do, recall that in the story of Siyavush we encounter an absolutely brilliant human being called Sudabeh, who is infinitely more interesting as a character than both Kaykavos, her husband, and Siyavush, her step-son, to whom she is attracted. But in Ferdowsi's narrative there are two or three occasions in which there are passing references to the effect that women are not trustworthy, or his advice that one should not marry an evil woman, and things to that effect. So there are these references to women in our pre-modern poetry, and they are stereotypes; we don't know who exactly these "women" are. If we want to figure out something more tangible, we have to begin to read very closely, between the lines.

Our present situation is not separated from the rest of the world. As a result, I am totally opposed to segregating the fate of Iranian women and treating them with criteria other than those of human rights. That is, separating them and artificially creating so-called cultural differences. I don't exactly know what these alleged cultural differences are. They seem to me to be either racist or political reasons for separating the fate of Iranian women from that of Iranian men. These current debates are not monolithic. You cannot find two feminists, for example, who agree on every point, on what it is exactly that "feminists" as such stand for. But it is imperative for the fate of Iranian women to be part and parcel of the universal struggle for their rights, and separating them, isolating them, into this presumably culturally specific pattern is not productive. Or at least if it is to be articulated into those terms, it has to be done so by Iranian women themselves, not by anybody else.

Whitley: I'd like to ask you a question myself, and I don't know whether or not to phrase it philosophically or pragmatically. Let me try. You made the judgment that the impact of the Islamic Revolution on the women's role has been the formation of autonomous, independent organizations that act as a buffer between the atomized individual and the state apparatus. You can extend that argument more or less to the Iranian case. The period of the past ten or fifteen years has witnessed an extremely volatile revolutionary situation. That is, people without much training in political participation have been mobilized to participate in a revolution. The sheer ecstasy of being able to participate in a massive political act ought to be seen against the background of a political culture that generally believed, between the 1950s and the 1970s, that any configuration of five Iranians had to have a member of the SAVAK among them. So there was a euphoric explosion after a long period of suspension of political participation. What we should be looking at in the emerging parameters of the post-revolution society, other than for individual voices, is the formation of autonomous civil organization. Civil organizations and group affiliations beyond the state, that have absolutely nothing to do with the state. These groups are beginning to emerge—that is, individuals are beginning to form professional organizations, for example, and it may be hoped that these organizations will grow, will be translated into the context of Iranian society proper. So, at a very theoretical level, the question is: Can there be a future for the creation of autonomous, secular groupings within which an atomized individual, divorced from his or her historical bonds, can have a life and be protected against the overpowering state apparatus? That in my judgment is politically more important than the formation of individual consciousness. Such consciousness inevitably finds its way into literature, poetry, painting, etc. These are things that can be permitted, and you know, as anyone who has been exposed to Iranian culture will acknowledge, that women in particular will be involved.

Let's take an example that you and I both know: Moniru Ravaripur, an Iranian novelist who is right now in the US. Just think of it: In an "Islamic" Republic, with all that such a Republic connotes, a divorced woman, somebody who simply told her husband to "go to hell", without any support at all, has been able, out of sheer conviction, to create a voice for herself, to write a major novel, which is critically acclaimed, to be compared to Gabriel Garcia Marquez, and then continue to write and participate in international conferences. She is a joy to talk to and be with, as you and I know from the past week. Now, there is no historical explanation for that. This is not a verification of the virtues of an Islamic Republic or an Islamic Revolution. This is simply a development which is a further continuation and, I hope, a verification of an inner, deeper process that you described was not much, and you reached the conclusion that the birth of the individual, of men and women as historical persons, is irreversible. I have to disagree with that judgment. However, it runs counter to popular perceptions, both within and outside Iran, about the role of the individual, in contemporary Iranian society. Contemporary images of Iran, in this country at least, are of the mass, the mass that participated in the revolution, the mass of the wave of the Basiji that took part in the Iran/Iraq war, and the masses that took part in demonstrations outside the American Embassy. The concept is there, apart from a towering historical figure, Ayatollah Khomeini, and a few other individuals. But the idea is not one of the individual, but of a group force.

My question to you is really about the problems that are created for historical development, obviously mismatched between the underlying reality of intellectual life in the country and the perceptions that Iranians act collectively and not individually. Is this discrepancy going to create some struggle between what the role of the individual ought to be in Iranian life, given that Iranians—as all this audience will know—are highly individualistic people in normal social and political interactions? Can we see some means of bringing to greater public life the role of the individual to balance that to the role of the state?

Dabashi: As for the question of mass society, which as a sociological category has been a term in circulation at least since Tocqueville's time, it was primarily a Tocquevillian insight that the rise of democracy and egalitarian tendencies poses the creation of mass societies in which the individual becomes atomized. Now, let's proceed with this insight: what Tocqueville observes in Democracy in America is that the creation of democracies and egalitarian conditions obviously goes beyond the traditional boundaries that bind individuals together and creates a massive state bureaucracy which atomizes the individual. He does not argue, however, that the salvation of democracy has been the formation of autonomous, independent organizations that act as a buffer between the atomized individual and the state apparatus.

You can extend that argument more or less to the Iranian case. The period of the past ten or fifteen years has witnessed an extremely volatile revolutionary situation. That is, people without much training in political participation have been mobilized to participate in a revolution. The sheer ecstasy of being able to participate in a massive political act ought to be seen against the background of a political culture that generally believed, between the 1950s and the 1970s, that any configuration of five Iranians had to have a member of the SAVAK among them. So there was a euphoric explosion after a long period of suspension of political participation. What we should be looking at in the emerging parameters of the post-revolution society, other than for individual voices, is the formation of autonomous civil organization. Civil organizations and group affiliations beyond the state, that have absolutely nothing to do with the state. These groups are beginning to emerge—that is, individuals are beginning to form professional organizations, for example, and it may be hoped that these organizations will grow, will be translated into the context of Iranian society proper. So, at a very theoretical level, the question is: Can there be a future for the creation of autonomous, secular groupings within which an atomized individual, divorced from his or her historical bonds, can have a life and be protected against the overpowering state apparatus? That in my judgment is politically more important than the formation of individual consciousness. Such consciousness inevitably finds its way into literature, poetry, painting, etc. These are things that can be permitted, and you know, as anyone who has been exposed to Iranian culture will acknowledge, that women in particular will be involved.

Let's take an example that you and I both know: Moniru Ravaripur, an Iranian novelist who is right now in the US. Just think of it: In an "Islamic" Republic, with all that such a Republic connotes, a divorced woman, somebody who simply told her husband to "go to hell", without any support at all, has been able, out of sheer conviction, to create a voice for herself, to write a major novel, which is critically acclaimed, to be compared to Gabriel Garcia Marquez, and then continue to write and participate in international conferences. She is a joy to talk to and be with, as you and I know from the past week. Now, there is no historical explanation for that. This is not a verification of the virtues of an Islamic Republic or an Islamic Revolution. This is simply a development which is a further continuation and, I hope, a verification of an inner, deeper movement that has been taking place. We are the heirs of at least 200 years of secular imagination in the modern history of Iran. It is of course a fact that those 200 years, when push came to shove, did not amount to very much. That is the religious sensibility was so powerful that it overwhelmed the secular imagination. Yet, institutionally difficult to establish though it might be in political terms, in terms of ideology, sensibility, literally imagination, or simply an alternative conception of being, such secular impulses continue to exist; they may come out and manifest themselves first among Iranians in Europe or the United States, or Japan, or Australia, or India, but they will have, I'm confident, a significant effect inside Iran. So briefly, formation of institutional groupings, independent of the state apparatus, the elementary formation of a civil society, and the continuation of individual voices, are emerging patterns and possibilities that will balance both the dangers of the mass society and the overpowering state apparatus.
important role in Iran too.

Dabashi: Absolutely, and as you know, now we are connected with a number of our colleagues through E-mail and are constantly in contact with one another. At this stage, it has to do more with checking manuscripts in Shiraz University or things of that nature, but the political implications of these developments are just mind-boggling. A satellite dish, I hear, is not that expensive in Tehran. And Madonna and Michael Jackson are not the only images transferred through these satellite dishes. The irrefutable dignity of an individual woman or man is what is at stake. Technology, now perhaps more than ever, has devastating implications, for or against repressive regimes.

Chair: Especially the artistic part of it.

Dabashi: Yes, that’s one example, but there are many others, including more superficial ones like T-shirts of Michael Jackson in Tehran, Madonna and what have you. These and other more substantial exchanges serve to bring Iran into that technological revolution that is occurring everywhere and as a result makes control extremely difficult, no matter how totalitarian the state may be. Madonna is a superbly subversive figure, and the domains of that subversiveness are not just sexual. They certainly include taboos of a cultural, social, and political nature. [-] 20019. ------. Thiecracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: General Discussion: Afternoon Session: Part 02. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 62-64. Question: Mr. Dabashi, you have a very interesting approach. I think you’ve made it quite clear that Iran is fast joining this global village, indicating that Iranian society is approaching that interactive age in a sense, so Iranians just like some of us here, can sit down and converse through their own media. Now, I wonder, despite the great differences between Iranian and western traditions, what do you think will be the impact of such influences on traditional Iranian culture? My impression is also that these mass media, rapid transportation and technological advancements have already undermined traditional values. Right now, we are in fact in a crisis. What do you think will be the impact on that society, with such long-standing traditions?

Dabashi: I must take exception to the premise that in the case of Iran, or any other so-called traditional society, we are dealing with an unchanging monolithic culture that has so-called “traditional values” which have never altered over the course of history and that now all of a sudden in the 1990s are being given a cultural shock by a massive and empty abstract thing called “the West.” In my opinion, culture is always in a state of flux. When you want to start in the course of Iranian history to account for the influences of our cultural development, you have to go back to the Zoroastrians, as you know. Then a military invasion occurred, and our religion was gradually changed. That was a major rupture in the going to present a special challenge to that delusion. But a new breed will be the impact of such influences on traditional Iranian culture? My impression is also that these mass media, rapid transportation and technological advancements have already undermined traditional values. Right now, we are in fact in a crisis. What do you think will be the impact on that society, with such long-standing traditions?

Dabashi: I must take exception to the premise that in the case of Iran, or any other so-called traditional society, we are dealing with an unchanging monolithic culture that has so-called “traditional values” which have never altered over the course of history and that now all of a sudden in the 1990s are being given a cultural shock by a massive and empty abstract thing called “the West.” In my opinion, culture is always in a state of flux. When you want to start in the course of Iranian history to account for the influences of our cultural development, you have to go back to the Zoroastrians, as you know. Then a military invasion occurred, and our religion was gradually changed. That was a major rupture in the going to present a special challenge to that delusion. But a new breed will be the impact of such influences on traditional Iranian culture? My impression is also that these mass media, rapid transportation and technological advancements have already undermined traditional values. Right now, we are in fact in a crisis. What do you think will be the impact on that society, with such long-standing traditions?

Dabashi: I must take exception to the premise that in the case of Iran, or any other so-called traditional society, we are dealing with an unchanging monolithic culture that has so-called “traditional values” which have never altered over the course of history and that now all of a sudden in the 1990s are being given a cultural shock by a massive and empty abstract thing called “the West.” In my opinion, culture is always in a state of flux. When you want to start in the course of Iranian history to account for the influences of our cultural development, you have to go back to the Zoroastrians, as you know. Then a military invasion occurred, and our religion was gradually changed. That was a major rupture in the going to present a special challenge to that delusion. But a new breed will be the impact of such influences on traditional Iranian culture? My impression is also that these mass media, rapid transportation and technological advancements have already undermined traditional values. Right now, we are in fact in a crisis. What do you think will be the impact on that society, with such long-standing traditions?

Dabashi: I must take exception to the premise that in the case of Iran, or any other so-called traditional society, we are dealing with an unchanging monolithic culture that has so-called “traditional values” which have never altered over the course of history and that now all of a sudden in the 1990s are being given a cultural shock by a massive and empty abstract thing called “the West.” In my opinion, culture is always in a state of flux. When you want to start in the course of Iranian history to account for the influences of our cultural development, you have to go back to the Zoroastrians, as you know. Then a military invasion occurred, and our religion was gradually changed. That was a major rupture in the going to present a special challenge to that delusion. But a new breed will be the impact of such influences on traditional Iranian culture? My impression is also that these mass media, rapid transportation and technological advancements have already undermined traditional values. Right now, we are in fact in a crisis. What do you think will be the impact on that society, with such long-standing traditions?
these stories? They have been handed down from generation to generation. What are these historians doing? Why is it that in the course of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Mottahari found the significance of these stories so appealing and began to rewrite them for revolutionary purposes? It is such anecdotes which carry weight, carry cultural significance, and as a result cultures are transformed. They begin to redefine; new elements begin to be introduced into them. It is so with all traditional languages, stories, sensibilities, and aesthetic imaginings. And by aesthetic imagination, I don't mean anything elitist; just look at the effect of the revolutionary art during the recent events in our country. Where all these images came from. We are not even talking about those artists who are hired by the Islamic Republic in order to generate and mobilize revolutionary sentiment, but by graffiti, by murals spontaneously created; these images are simply in our minds as we speak, as we remember. As a result, when I say culture, I don't have any literary or so called "Hoch Kultur" point of view but an historical amalgamation of language, custom, habits, literally and aesthetic forms of coming to terms with the absolutism of reality.

Look at Nuruz for example, how it is constantly being redefined. What is the significance of this? Or our religious sentiments; look at the image of Imam Hussein, how it is being constantly reconstructed for both revolutionary and anti-revolutionary, pious and impious purposes. These are sentiments, memories, anecdotes--Zarbul Masal, as we say in Persian--that are with in us and as such define the most enduring elements of our sensibilities. This is the constellation of senses through which we see the world; we participate in its revolutions or condemn its revolutions. As a result, as we continue to redefine what they are, they continue to define who we are. New images are constantly being formed, new myths are being created. Again read the work of Monir Ravanipur,-in fact I highly recommend Ahi-e Gharb--and see how she begins to resuscitate a panorama of folkloric traditions in the southern part of Iran that Tehran readers have a difficult time following, and always she has to footnote what she is referring to. But here you have a whole repertoire of symbolic references that are perfectly understandable and innate to the southern part of the country that she is now resuscitating for a revolutionary redefinition of what it means to be a woman. She, along with Simin Behbahani and Shahrnush Parsipur, are re-inventing what it means to be a woman, and I give you my word, what they are writing today is much more important than any institution of the Islamic Republic. arsipour'sZanan-eBedoun-eMardan, Ravanipur'sAhi-eGharb and many of the most recent lyrics of Behbahani will be the central texts of a future history of Iran to which the Islamic Revolution will constitute a long footnote.

I'm not underestimating the element of official power in any way; I know what it means when you have organized violence denying your inalienable human rights. I do not live in the Islamic Republic, but I lived under the brutally repressive regime of the Shah. Organized violence is a fact and continues to be a historical fact. Yet there are events that are happening that contribute to our continual redefinition of our culture which cannot, and must not, be ignored. Otherwise, we become subjects of these passing political powers and totally deny ourselves historical authenticity. We are all historical agents. Iranian culture is there to be redefined precisely by Iranians. This myth of a monolithic monstrous state dominating everything is absurd; it couldn't do so even if it wanted to. It represents the past; it is dehumanizing and it must simply be ignored, rendered irrelevant.

Whitley: Can we draw a distinction here between the means and form of communication, and the substance or the content? This is really following on the same discussion, in that during the revolutionary period, and I'm now addressing a subject that you are working on and are a specialist in, in the iconography of the revolution, where are the symbolic references and the ideas that were conveyed through those poster arts, which might, for example, be from deep Iranian roots? At the same time, the actual communications form, the artistic form that was used, was derived purely from revolutions elsewhere, from the Soviet Revolution, from the Chinese Revolution, from revolutionary iconography. So therefore they are borrowed media that are important but using an Iranian content.

In the same way, I'm going to ask a question which may be too theoretical at this stage. You have laid stress on the importance of language as being an essential element of continuity in traditional values and concepts of what is a people, a national culture. Is it possible, given the large size and longevity now of the Iranian Diaspora community, maybe a million and a half, two million strong, that for this community to begin communicating in languages other than Persian, and yet retain its own Iranian identity?

Dabashi: Yes, absolutely. Ervand Abrahamian's book on Khomeinism is out and in it is a chapter that deals with revolutionary posters in exactly the way you attest. Namely, there are posters that come straight out of the Russian Revolution that were very successfully adapted by Iranian graphic artists, and yet put into the context of the moment, and now we cannot culturally categorize them any more because at this period in Iranian culture there was not a centralized production of icons. Production of icons has always been at the disposal of centralized powers to generate, manipulate, and put to political use. But at this point, the moral destruction of the Pahlavi regime had rendered everything up for grabs. There were the leftists, there were the Mosaddeqians, there were all kinds of nationalists who were continuing to create and construct their political agenda. What happens is that there are certain elements that all of a sudden become so constitutional to the iconography of the revolution that the artists use them without even being aware of it.

A vivid example is the use of the red tulip in revolutionary iconography. For those of you who are students of Iranian revolutions, remember that the tulip became for Ara'f a symbol of revolutionary zeal during the constitutional revolution of 1906-11. It was the emblem of sacrifice for revolutionary purposes. Now look at the symbol of the Islamic Republic, which is also in the shape of a tulip. Here is one case which is specifically nationalist: Ara'f was a staunch nationalist secular poet who was for the constitutional revolution in specifically secular terms, wrote a secular poem in which he celebrated Mellat and Jomhur. Yet this same symbol was successfully appropriated by graphic artists for the purposes of the Islamic Revolution in 1979. My point is that no artist worthy of the name gives a hoot about the genealogy of icons. Every artist creates and paints anew. Yes, there are Russian, French, and even Chinese motifs in the iconography of the Islamic Revolution. There is nothing wrong with them when a series of posters of the clerical leaders done in an Andy Warhol sort of frame. But they are all cast in the dominant imperative of making that revolution "Islamic", and that not in a grand, a historical sort of "Islam," but Islam as it is being re-invented for very specific political purposes.

In response to your second point, you're absolutely right. In my judgment, it is perfectly possible to be an Iranian and yet to speak English. Don't we claim that Al-Ghazali and Avicenna were Iranians? And yet most of their major work is in Arabic. English now is a universal language. Very much as Arabic was in its medieval heyday. In fact, Ibn Khaldun knew the relation between power and language and observed in Al-Mughaddimah that in the East, meaning Iran, Arabic had declined because Arabs were not powerful any more. We are now beyond Kipling, imagining that the moment you speak English you are part of the British Empire. A rainbow of brilliant theorists and novelists from the Indian subcontinent, from Chatterjee and Spik to Rushdie and Nandy, have decolonized the English language for all of us. You may speak and write impeccable English without necessarily being a part of the British Empire. Here we are dealing with a transnational phenomenon. Look at India, look at the whole unbelievable body of English-speaking Indians expressing their national aspirations. Dare I mention Salman Rushdie in particular who, in effect, has contributed massively to decolonizing the English language, with which you can express the deepest anxieties of exile (which, by the way, is what Satanic Verses is essentially concerned with ) in the language of the former masters. I think it's perfectly possible for the Irish community, Italian community, Jewish community, etc., to express their sentiments in this way. Creating an identity is not something that happens in isolation but always arises in response to external factors. As a result, we are now beginning the reconstruction of the Iranian identity in English, and thus the journal Pardis rightly is in English because you are dealing with a group of young Iranians who are beginning to find out who they are, and at this particular moment of their cultural identity you cannot tell this new generation, first go and learn Persian, then you will know what your heritage is. No, it is perfectly possible to understand what it means to be an Iranian even if we decide to define it in English or, for that matter, in Chinese. This is not to suggest that the Persian language, as a cultural heritage, is not a crucial, perhaps even central, aspect of our identity. But there is more to the politics of identity than just language. The significance of Edward Said is not just in being the most eloquent spokesman for Palestinian identity and national aspirations. His writings constitute, that is to say define, the forms, and construct the symbolics, of that national identity. And most of Said’s writings are in English, the language of urban intellectuals throughout the world, from China to India, from Scandinavia to Australia. That it is English which is now the hegemonic, culturbuilding language is an entirely historical phenomenon. Arabic and Latin used to perform that function for a long time. Persian, in fact, was the hegemonic language of culture building for much of the Eastern world from Asia Minor to India. The British were adamant in substituting English for Persian as the administrative and cultural language of India. Language is power. From Ibn Khaldun to Foucault, we have ample arguments to that effect. [a]

Chair: Thank you very much Mr. Dabashi, Janet Bauer, Andrew Whitley, Elis Sanasarian and Mohsen Milani. I know we all benefitted from what you had to say. I deeply appreciate your participation in our conference, and I hope that you found it worthwhile. We look forward to seeing you next year. [b]

Dabashi: We should of course always be afraid of such hegemonic powers, but these days it is extremely difficult for any state to achieve such domination. I realize there is a plague among us Iranians concerning conspiratorial theories, simply a plague, a disease. So that anything that happens, the Americans did it, or the British did it. They come up with insane theories for such assumptions. But we have to assume historical responsibility for what we have done. Among those historical responsibilities is that we have a say in the future of our culture, history, politics, who we are and what we stand for. People are petrified by “agents” of the government or of a foreign power. This is simply dehumanizing. Like many of you, I used to live in a police state. It is a frightfully dehumanizing experience. I refuse ever again to live under such a system in which I would be afraid to speak out for fear of persecution. Yes, I share your concern at hegemonic powers gaining control over our home culture. But I refuse to make that fear the condition of my entrapment in a theocratic totalitarianism.

Chair: Thank you very much Mr. Dabashi, Janet Bauer, Andrew Whitley, Elis Sanasarian and Mohsen Milani. I know we all benefitted from what you had to say. I deeply appreciate your participation in our conference, and I hope that you found it worthwhile. We look forward to seeing you next year. [b]

22022. ------. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: General Discussion: Morning Session: Part 01. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 35-38. Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Whitley, for your thoughtful presentation on such a sensitive issue. We are now going to open our session for dialogue between the audience and the speakers, but before I do that, I would like to see if any of the speakers has comments about the other presentations. No comments? Well then, let us open the session to any questions the audience may have.

Question: I want to thank Dr. Pirouz and his staff for providing us these past four years with such exceptionally stimulating sessions. I must say this is a unique opportunity and a great chance for dialogue.

I have two comments with regard to the presentation by Mr. Milan. One really has to do with the issue he raised: that is, the relationship between policy and the state and religion. It seems to me if we now look back over the western experience in terms of how it has dealt with religion, particularly with the experience in the US that we know well, the conclusion is that it was not only a matter of disassociating politics from religion, but rather it seems to me that the founding fathers here were quite wise to protect religion from the state; they came up with the separation of religion and state. In your closing remarks, you asked us what we think of the relationship, or what you refer to as the lack of conspiracy, between Hojatol-eslam Rafsanjani reflecting the new Republic and Ayatollah Khamenei. But I want you to tell us in terms of your own perspective, do you really see differences between these two? At this point, and if you do, what are the social and socio-economic bases of the differences between these two who represent separate constituencies?

Chair: I will take one more question from the audience so we can move faster. Yes, please.

Question: I'd like to know if other people agree, or disagree, with my observation, but in my opinion it was a very interesting panel representing a balanced perspective. I want to know what that balance is about. My sense from hearing the speakers was that the Iranians on the panel, Moshen Milani and Eliz Sanasarian, chose to emphasize, even with their critique within the critique of what is taking place in Iran, the fact that there are voices of debate, sent and so on, that are pushing the notion, as Professor Milani put it, of Islamic law towards a new philosophical direction. And I understood that also to be part of what Dr. Sanasarian was saying in terms of women's intervention in the Islamic sphere; they are not merely passive victims of a system that tries to keep them out but do have a say in how things develop and so on.

My sense of Mr. Bauer and Professor Whitley was that what came across from their observations was something viewed very much from a Western perspective, of rights, individual freedom, etc., and that there really isn't a way within the current definition of Islam, of the Islamic government of Iran, that would allow for the kinds of improvements that you would like to see universally extended to women and others. I was very much struck by that difference in your presentations. I want to know if that is the correct perception or not. And I'd be interested in hearing more about what Professor Milani said on this new direction of Islamic philosophy.

Milani: Let me start with Mr. Whitley's presentation and the few comments he made about the lack of a neutral body in Iran to make judgment about the conflict between the theocratic and the republican aspects of the new order. So far as I know, there is no such a neutral body in England, nor is there one in this country. The members of the US Supreme Court are selected by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In England, as you know better than I do, the Parliament is supreme and sovereign, and represents the wishes of the masses and the majority party. The Parliament establishes the law and it becomes the law in England. In Iran, there is the Council for Determination of the Interest of the Islamic Republic whose members have the ultimate say in settling the major disputes among different organs of command in the Islamic Republic. The judiciary is also independent of the executive and legislative branches, at least theoretically.

In terms of the presidential elections, I agree with you. There were about 1000 candidates who wanted to become Iran's president in 1992. That should tell you something about job opportunities in Iran! Of the 1000, so far as I know (and I was in Iran when that happened), four candidates were given the okay by the Council of Guardians to campaign for the presidency. I must confess that I found the level of the debate between those four candidates quite engaging. Finally, how do we enlarge the so-called freedoms that the elites enjoy in Iran? I think, number one, that we must not apply our Eurocentric criteria when we evaluate Iran. We must be more accurate and careful about what we say, too. I was, at one time, an opponent of the Shah's regime. I remember very vividly that Amnesty International used to declare that there were over 100000 political prisoners in Iran. I was one of those who would go around and spread that nonsense. After the Shah's overthrow, we learned that 100000 was a highly exaggerated number.

Now, we are doing the same thing again. We keep complaining about this or that, that Iran is insensitive to this minority, or insensitive to that minority, and that it is violating the basic human rights. While I agree with many of these valid criticisms, it is important that we look at the bigger picture, too. If we observe any positive trends or actions, no matter how small, we should not disregard them. Instead, we should build on them. In that bigger picture, we can see that a new breed of Iranians has come to power, and political participation has been expanded to the lower classes. Dr. Sanasarian talked about the new constituency of women. The fact that there are elections is a positive development and we should encourage that. The fact that they are controlled is negative; we should try to make them freer.

And finally, the last point someone raised was about the development of a new Islamic jurisprudence. I think the only hope we have, at least the only hope I've had, is for a sort of Shi'i renaissance, an Islamic renaissance, to be orchestrated by those people who have the authority to render judgment about Islam and Shi'ism. If I am not mistaken, the process of reformation in Europe began by someone who was a cleric himself. In Iran, I think there are individuals who are moving in that direction and are trying to make Islamic laws compatible with the modern world. The greatest challenge facing the Islamic Republic is this: Can it make Islamic law compatible with the needs of the modern world? If it succeeds in this imperative, it will survive. If it fails, it will not survive.

Chair: Mr. Whitley, would you like to make any comments?

Whitley: Yes, I think both by addressing Dr. Milani and also Dr. Sanasarian, we are continuing the same debate. She'd asked us whether rights and individual freedoms can be accommodated within an Islamic political system. I believe they can. I think that it's not incompatible. I think, as Dr. Milani has said, there are certainly well-meaning, intelligent people in Iran who believe that it is possible to preserve the broader ideological framework and the preeminence of Islam as a guiding philosophical political system, and at the same time provide a degree of protection for individual rights. I think there are some problem areas that we could discuss, in particular concerning religious minorities. Nonetheless, I am hopeful, and I don't wish to appear as negative as perhaps Dr. Milani thought that I was being, intaking a particular occidental point of view.

I sometimes wish I didn't have a British accent and therefore can be held accountable for the British political system. Believe me, I don't approach this subject as one who feels he has to justify all the practices in England. I would simply make one small side note, which is that when he says there is no neutral body in England, there is. There is the judiciary which is an independent body. The judiciary remains one that can ultimately provide a judgment in Britain. In Britain unlike the US, there are no elected judges. I think your point about the Expediency Council in Iran is well taken. At the same time, it is a body which is acting to adjudicate disputes and interpretations within a political framework—one that was set by Ayatollah Khomeini in the first instance, a certain interpretation of political Islam if you like—of an Islamic polity is what I mean to say—which a single individual brilliant as he was with certain flaws maybe, had chosen for the nation.

There has been very little opportunity to challenge the basic premises of it. Those who have attempted to do so have found themselves marginalized. You find that Ayatollah Montazeri, prominent religious authority that he is, is no longer able to speak publicly, to act as an individual. You find that Abdul Karim Soroush, an Islamic reformer within the society, is having his voice silenced today. Although for a while he could open up and speak, he's now been silenced again. This is not just a mark of intolerance from a human rights point of view; it's stupidity from my point of view, as far as the regime is concerned, because they're restricting the scope of debate, rather than opening it up.

It is perfectly true that you can have this huge electoral base in which individuals can vote for the President. But at the same time, the control that is exercised means that your choices are going to be more limited, to the poverty of the nation ultimately, and that's a theoretical argument rather than a practical argument. I agree with you that political participation is much broader and deeper now than it had been under the monarchial system. There is no doubt about that. It is one that extends the debate more broadly. So I think we're arguing about tactics as much as goals.

I agree with you that the issue of how to make Islamic law compatible with the needs of the modern world is a central one and a very difficult problem for the regime. [\ldots]

22023.

Chair: Yes, please.

Whitley: I've been observing these issues for many years, and I'd like to try to change the direction of this argument and get to some of the more fundamental issues. One aspect which I think is at the core of much of the problem, which I heard mentioned only once, is that of gender and sexuality. We haven't talked about the concept of sexuality. It seems to me that you don't see this so much any more, but in the 1970's before the revolution, if you went to Islamic organizations and campuses, you heard over and over about this image of the female as the temptress, the male as the weak victim, etc. Much of this arises, if you go to a Fagheh or go to the basis of many of these restrictions, from this issue of the sexuality of women. What I want to ask Mr. Sanasarian is: In these debates has anybody, any of the women activists, begun seriously to address this issue? This seems to me, in my personal view, the core of the issue, and this is where the debate and the discussion should be.

Chair: Yes, please.

Question: I have a few comments I'd like to make. I think we don't have serious quarrels with Islam. It is our religion. It is the dominant factor. Rather, it is the so-called Islamic Republic that has betrayed religion as a vital and effective force. Many of those who practice the religion as supporters of the regime are terrorists. Also, they have admitted to using religion as a political tool for their revolutionary goals.

Mr. Milani asked why there is such media hype about what goes on in Iran, particularly with respect to Hezbollah and Hamas. When Hezbollah was formed in 1982, Ayatollah Khomeini sent about 2000 revolutionary guards to Lebanon. Since then both factions have been financially supported by the Islamic Republic in Iran to the extent of $30 million annually, or a total of around $300 million. There are documents. Politically it is a corrupt regime. Socially and economically it is bankrupt, and I think that's what it comes to. I am not trying to say that the previous regime was ideal and everything was great, but when we are dealing with issues like these I think we have to be more to the point. Thank you.

Chair: Dr. Sanasarian, would you like to first address the issue of sexuality of women?

Sanasarian: Yes, that was a good question, and a very important one. I think what you were referring to was the argument that has been made especially in scholarly literature coming out of the Islamic world. A lot has been written on the way in which female sexuality is viewed, merely as a hindrance to men's relationship with God. In fact, the first book about this was written under a pseudonym, and then it was translated into French and eventually English. Woman in the Muslim Unconscious is the first work that we ever knew that addressed female sexuality. Of course, this perspective is within orthodox Islam, rather than the more spiritual Islam, more common among Sufis, which doesn't see women so much as a hindrance but as forming a direct link with the Creator. In the case of Iran, we haven't seen this discussion. Definitely, women who have been active in the government have not been able to address this issue in this fashion. I think partially because they are politicians they focus on more immediate issues, and concentrate on legislative changes. What they have done is try to address the issue of sexuality in the context of what goes on in the real society. For example, on the issue of prostitution, their language is very different from the language of the men. Instead of condemning it or saying it's immoral they often raise the question of why a female becomes a prostitute and what is wrong with a government and with a society that makes a woman earn her living through prostitution. This has been the general trend in discussing womens issues.

Chair: The other question was, I think, contrary to what has been discussed here, the assertion that the system is socially, politically, and economically corrupt and also the fact that $30 million was mentioned as being given to Hezbollah and at some point this rose to several hundred million dollars. Let me ask Mr. Whitley if his organization actually has any figures about the support for the Hezbollah or other terrorist organizations by the Iranian government.

Whitley: That's really not an issue that we deal with. I'm not concerned with the sponsorship of foreign political organizations. It's not one that we would consider to be within our mandate at all.

Chair: Okay, then I should ask Mr. Milani to comment, because I think the consensus here is that the system is not corrupt and that if making progress on all fronts.

Milani: No, I'm not here to say there is corruption or there is no corruption in Iran. This is not my topic. My topic was to talk about the two different sides, or the two different forces, that operate in the Islamic Republic--the push for Islam and the push for popular sovereignty--and that's all I have talked about and that's all I will defend. Now, as far as the Hezbollah and the Iranian operation, I would like to see the documents that show Iran is contributing some $200 or $300 million. Thank you.

Chair: Yes, please.

Question: I have a brief question for Mr. Whitley. Does your organization have any information on habeas corpus, and how's that being treated in Iran?

Chair: Can we take one more question before we go to panel?

Question: My question to Mr. Milani concerns cooperation between the Fagheh and the President. The way I see it is that each of them can function only if the other is not opposed. The ultimate power is the essence of what the Valayat-e Fagheh seeks, and I don't observe any cooperation between the two. I'm just wondering, how do you see that cooperation develop, as it is against the nature of both?

Whitley: Just briefly, habeas corpus is not an established legal concept in Iran. In fact, to the contrary, and Ayatollah Yazdi in his Friday prayers address a couple of weeks ago made a remarkable observation on the fact when he said that charging somebody with a crime was in effect an acknowledgement of his guilt. So, therefore, by this statement he defended the system whereby individuals can be arbitrarily held, and they're often held for lengthy periods, supposedly undergoing questioning. It is difficult to gain access to them or for lawyers to determine their guilt or innocence. Thus, one does not have the check on the arbitrary power of a variety of arresting bodies in the country who can then hold people in detention.

Chair: Mr Milani, would you like to discuss the conflict between Fagheh and the President?

Milani: As long as Ayatollah Khomeini was alive, as you will recall, that conflict didn't exist because: (a) Ayatollah Khomeini was the dominant force, and (b) the President was the symbolic head of state and had no power to formulate policy. Now, under the revised constitution, I think there is a balance. In actuality, at least during the past four years, there has been a remarkable cooperation between Rafsanjani and Khamenei. This cooperation has been based on the recognition by both men that if they do not cooperate, the system will collapse. Therefore, they have been on the same side, at least on important issues. Yes, there have been some minor differences. But on major issues they have supported each other. I can give you a number of concrete examples, the most important of which was the cooperation between the two during the Persian Gulf crisis, during the Kuwait crisis. Ayatollah Khamenei supported President Rafsanjani, although he rhetorically attacked the US.

Sanasarian: May I say something?

Chair: Yes, please.

Question: I've been observing these issues for many years, and I'd like to see making progress on all fronts. Politically it is a corrupt regime. Socially and economically it is bankrupt, or innocence. Thus, one does not have the check on the arbitrary power of a variety of arresting bodies in the country who can then hold people in detention.

Chair: Mr Milani, would you like to discuss the conflict between Fagheh and the President?

Milani: As long as Ayatollah Khomeini was alive, as you will recall, that conflict didn't exist because: (a) Ayatollah Khomeini was the dominant force, and (b) the President was the symbolic head of state and had no power to formulate policy. Now, under the revised constitution, I think there is a balance. In actuality, at least during the past four years, there has been a remarkable cooperation between Rafsanjani and Khamenei. This cooperation has been based on the recognition by both men that if they do not cooperate, the system will collapse. Therefore, they have been on the same side, at least on important issues. Yes, there have been some minor differences. But on major issues they have supported each other. I can give you a number of concrete examples, the most important of which was the cooperation between the two during the Persian Gulf crisis, during the Kuwait crisis. Ayatollah Khamenei supported President Rafsanjani, although he rhetorically attacked the US.

Sanasarian: May I say something?

Chair: Yes, please.

Sanasarian: On the issue of theocracry in Iran, I think one thing that Dr. Milani is not mentioning, and a very important one, is the relationship and the conflict between the Maraji' taglid and the Velayat-i Fagheh. Where one begins and the other one ends, and vice versa. This issue was raised again after the death of Grand Ayatollah Khoi. Both are being defined by the state. Regarding Mr. Milani's comments, I really don't think that the two of us see things exactly the same way. I believe I'm much more open to the discontent that I have seen and heard Iranians express, and this discontent is coming not only from women who've had a Western education, it's coming from Islamic women as well, traditional women, and indeed all sectors of Iranian society. It is true, and I think you were correct in your comment, that the issue of corruption is a major issue now in Iran. Sometimes the government tries to address this but people are cynical. They have great difficulty simply earning a living. Many people hold two or three jobs and then another job on weekends. Your point was well taken.

Whitley: I just want to follow, briefly, really to endorse Dr. Sanasarian’s marks about the centrality of this issue, between an innovative political concept such as Velayat-e Fagheh and the long-standing religious societal traditions behind the concept of Marja-ye Taghli. I thought it’s interesting that we have had such a change coming about and so different, and that it has been driven by the new generation coming about that hasn’t the whole culture is bad and everybody in it is bad?” They were arguing about groups of women. During these 14 years there have been many changes. How can we criticize male dominance in the society without implying that dominance, but we don’t want to be critical of Iranian culture and some rather than a question. Feminists were saying to Iranian women: “You have to be the ones to ask Mr. Rafsanjani the answer is obvious. This is just a comment Betty Mahmoody’s book, “Not Without My Daughter”, many German promised a sort of third channel of TV, which people have been expecting make the distinction between the government and the people, and what change things but haven’t succeeded. Just to give you four examples: 1) calculated toward getting a certain image or response in the audience. Women within the Majlis as a whole? You mentioned several because they are different physically. And then women can come back office and their relationship to other groups, and what are the dynamics of women who were very outspoken and more vocal in terms of women’s and argue, but we’ve been doing that kind of work for centuries. That’s the Majlis that you mentioned. What types of women are qualified to run for different ways and exemplified or implemented in different ways. You see behind Islamic thinking, in general—I mean, the Islamicist perspective or philosophical perspective, which that the central premise of the basic issues there is a merger taking place which is interesting to watch. On some other issues there are differences, which is a healthy trend.

Question: I have a question addressed to Janet. You characterized, as I gathered from your talk, the perspective of the regime on women as separate but equal, and we need to talk more about what you mean by that or what you mean by characterizing the regime as emphasizing the concept of separate but equal.

Bauer: I’d like to respond to that question and I have two comments about previous questions that were asked; particularly the question about the use of language and the observation that Andrew and I both focused more on this term “rights” than the other speakers. As for separate but equal policy, I see in a lot of Islamic writings a tendency to emphasize that women are naturally different from men and a tendency to assert that although they are equal, that equality can only be achieved, because of men’s and women’s very different natures, by creating different roles for each. Maybe not a very good example, but one I’m going to use, is the language used by philosophers when they talk about a public policy and make the distinction between treatment as equals and equal treatment. And the distinction they are usually trying to make is that the best policy in treatment as equals is creating a situation where people can experience equality.

Now that can mean different things, however you define it. But an example is when we construct public buildings now in the US, we are supposed to provide an access ramp for people who have to use wheelchairs or mobilized vehicles of some kind because they are not able to enter easily on their two legs. This is different treatment for people who are in wheelchairs, but it is designed to allow them to achieve equality like everybody else; not the same, but to be equal with others. And I see behind Islamic thinking, in general—I mean, the Islamicist writers like Maboodi from Pakistan—an acceptance of the idea that Islam suggests that men and women are different, they are naturally different, and therefore their roles in life have to be different in order to create a better society, in order to be fair to both of them. And that can be achieved in different ways and exemplified or implemented in different ways. You might say, well, women are not capable of doing heavy agricultural work because they are different physically. And then women can come back and argue, but we’ve been doing that kind of work for centuries. That’s what I mean by separate—but equal or a difference perspective.

I would also like to make two other comments—one on the difficulty of making criticism and related to that, the issue of the language that we use. Some of the shades of difference that I see in the comments by the speakers and by people in the audience seem to me to be calculated toward getting a certain image or response in the audience. When we say things we are not always sure how people are going to interpret them, and in this society it is very difficult to be critical without being negative. Westerners are not like Iranians who are very careful to make the distinction between the government and the people, and what the government does and what people do in a particular culture and so, for example, in Germany a couple of years ago after the publication of Betty Mahmoody’s book, “Not Without My Daughter”, many German feminists were saying to Iranian women: “You have to be the ones to speak out on this issue. We want to criticize patriarchy, or male dominance, but we don’t want to be critical of Iranian culture and some aspects of the book are ethnocentric and are critical of the culture. And how can we criticize male dominance in the society without implying that the whole culture is bad and everybody in it is bad?” They were arguing that Iranian women, as representatives of their culture, were in the best position to make critical statements. It is very difficult sometimes to
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iran
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

make observations without being perceived as taking one side or the other.

On the issue of rights and the language that we have used to discuss our particular topic today, Andrew mentioned that his topic was human rights and he was interested in supporting them. My use of language [the language of Rights] comes from probably three factors: one is I was raised in a liberal Western tradition so it is very difficult for me to exclude, maybe exclude altogether and very difficult for me to envision a world where people don't have some rights to decide for themselves how their life is going to be and what choices they are going to have. Secondly, I take the language also from the women whom I interviewed, both those in Iran before the revolution (some of whom had very little education) and refugee women and their relatives who come from Iran, who do talk about the rights of women to do certain things. And also I see that, at least as voiced by Eliz Sanasarian when she talks about women in the Islamic Republic, the regime is taking steps to change laws so that women can do certain things. And third, I really was trying to suggest that in all societies there is a tension between individuals doing certain things and controlling their decisions, and the social good—the good of the community, the good of the family. We really should not think that western society represents complete individualism and other societies represent complete communitarianism where the welfare of the society or the culture is held above everything else. I see that feminists are also beginning to debate this issue by saying that an individual's ability to control decisions—individual rights, if you will—has to be created within the context of communities, of social organization and of families. I was trying to get at that debate as well. I think Iranian acceptance of women's rights actually characterizes that very well. Women want the ability to decide certain things, and yet they have always been responsible to their families and to their communities and have tried to make choices with those social responsibilities in mind.

Chair: Thank you. Mr. Milani, would you like to make any comments?

Milani: I read somewhere that back in 1947, when the UN came with the plan to partition Palestine, somebody asked David Ben Gurion, who later became Prime Minister of Israel: How do you think the Jews should react and how do you think the Arabs will react? Ben Gurion said, well, I know my Arab friends and I know my own countrymen. We Jews will accept what is given to us now and we will think about the rest later on. Whereas our Arab friends will reject the plan outright because they want the whole thing and they want it now. There are those who would like to see democracy established in Iran quickly and now. If I say I see some encouraging developments, my point is let's build on those encouraging developments. It is in that spirit that I have talked about some positive developments in Iran. Of course, there are certainly many many things I do not like about the situation there.

Now, going back to the last question. Specifically, as far as I know, the concept of Marja'eya'at was eliminated. I have the original book Ayatollah Khomeini published when he was in Najaf. Therefore, it was not doctorated. If you study it there Ayatollah Khomeini makes it very explicit that the Fagheh does not have to be a Marja. He argued that the Fagheh must be an expert on Islamic jurisprudence and must possess all necessary political and economic skills to manage the government. As far as the three or four cases you talked about, the Iranian position on PLO-Israeli accord, Iran and the US, etc., I think you must keep in mind that Ayatollah Khamenei and Mr. Rafsanjani represent two different constituencies. The job of Ayatollah Khamenei is to keep the core support of the Islamic Republic happy, and therefore he has to be more radical than Mr. Rafsanjani, whose task it is to run the country. [=]

22025. --------. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: General Discussion: Morning Session: Part 04. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 46-48. Question: I have a question for Ms. Bauer. It's a twofold question—it has to do with the veil or hejab. As an anthropologist, have you done any research on the hejab with respect to the distinct Persian culture or present culture of Iran and given that there are no laws pertaining to hejab within Islam either in the Qur'an or Hadith, why are non-conformists in Iran being punished so harshly by the regime?

Bauer: I think it goes back partly to Ayatollah Nouri's comment, mentioned in my talk. Yes, there are variations in the way the Qur'anic verses about being modest and covering oneself are interpreted across Islamic cultures and within them by different groups, but in Nouri's interpretation, to maintain social order in Iran we have to continue what has been a social tradition. So he was admitting that the hejab wasn't necessarily attributed directly to Islam but to interpretations that have developed over many centuries. The studies of the origins of the veil are many, and it's been attributed to customs that developed among the women relatives of the prophet Muhammad or to traditional Hindu society. There are many explanations for where this kind of full cloth covering originated. It seems to have been a practice associated with the status of elite families, whether you believe it was the religious elite of Muhammad's family or whether you believe it was the economic elite landowners and government officials at some point in time. The best explanation of how it developed is cultural and social. Why people are punished in Iran for not wearing hejab has to do with the particular understanding and interpretation of Islamic texts and the traditional [in the sense of historical] interpretations of these texts. People have decided that to be a good Muslim, a woman must conform to these dress codes. I see it as a reflection of the power certain people in groups have to make that decision, not necessarily as deriving from Islam itself, I mean from the texts and the spirit of Islam. Eliz Sanasarian mentioned differences in Sufi practice and even before the revolution, but I'm sure it's also more true now. People would say to me, "Why do you go to Sufi religious services and interview Sufi women? They aren't real Muslims." and "Don't listen to what they say about Islam because they are not really Islamic, and they don't really know what they are talking about," so other interpretations are discredited.

Chair: Thank you very much.

Question: On the veil I've read that some research finds that women are not particularly opposed, but rather like it. Have you found the same thing?

Bauer: There has been a great deal of research, but I think if you look at it closely, those women who provide positive explanations for wearing the veil talk about the convenience, not having to decide what you're going to wear everyday. I mean I think I was in Iran, for most of the time in Tehran but in other places as well I actually wore the veil to be accepted more readily. Eventually, I discovered that women didn't care whether I wore it or not. They said that in America you don't do that. Many others said we'd really not be doing it ourselves anyway, so why do it if you don't have to? The freedom of not thinking about what you wear, not being exposed to the matalak from men on the street when you are walking around, relaxes you of a certain kind of burden. Many of these women who wear the veil, for example in Egypt, are working class, middle class, religious women. They are slightly more educated, usually slightly more urban than maybe some other women in society, and as one woman told me in Iran: "We take our religion seriously and we are scientific about it." Maybe the women were studying the texts and trying to adjust their behavior to what they saw and what they were told were the correct interpretations. There is a segment of women who believe that to be good Muslims they have to wear it, and they can offer you many other kinds of rationalizations—it will avert stares, it's convenient in terms of deciding what to wear. I don't think that those reasons are given by all women who are wearing the hejab because not all of them do it for the same reasons, not all of them do it from choice. Muslim women in Mindanao (the Southern Philippines) for example, wear a sort of hat, like Catholic women in Europe and America wore scarves in churches. They don't wear a full cloth covering.

Chair: Thank you. Yes, please.

Question: I would like to comment that the veil is not just Islamic. The Hindu religion prescribes veils. In India we have seen with scarves. Christians also have covered heads. And Jewish women have veils or scarves. So it is not just Islamic; all religions use them.

Chair: Thank you. Does anyone else have any comments to make? Yes, please.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iran
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Whitley: Before this conference ends, I just wanted to have the opportunity to bring the debate back to issue that's been a subtext in much of our discussion on balances between individual and collective rights. I wanted first, though, to make a professional disclaimer. On the one hand I have been invited here as a representative of an organization which is concerned with upholding human rights, and so therefore you should expect at I would speak on behalf of that institutional mandate. We have a point of view to uphold, whether or not you agree with it. At the same time I have my own individual point of view which I am free to express under some limitations in a public forum such as this. I would like to say though, as a disclaimer, that neither I personally nor my organization, holds any particular prescription for the appropriate or the right balance between individual and collective rights. Being British, being European I would prefer to say, I am extremely conscious of the differences in the interpretations or the emphasis in the United States and Europe as to where that balance ought to lie. As an individual, I would veer more towards the collective rights than the extreme emphasis, as I see it in the United States, on individual rights and the individual freedom of choice. So, therefore, from an ethno-cultural perspective, I believe that I am sensitive to some of the considerations that Dr. Milani mentioned. I don't wish to be prescriptive to the Islamic Republic about where that balance ought to lie. At the same time, beyond the fundamentals of physical integrity, which I believe transcend any cultural considerations, I think we can address the issue without talking specifically about rights, with all the cultural baggage that comes with that term in the US. We can talk about it more, at least for some aspects of it, in terms of liberties; and we can talk about individual liberty, or liberty to be able to act as a free citizen in a society. These are philosophical questions we're getting into now, as to what the limits of a citizen's role should be in society and in participation in public life. These are difficult issues for the Islamic Republic to grapple with. They are issues that deal with the issue of rights. But there is a debate about it, even though at the moment it's a debate which is confined to the elite.

Chair: Thank you very much. We have to brake our discussion for now as we are running out of time. We can have more discussion in our afternoon session. [=]

22026. ------. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Official Welcome: Gregory Waters, Deputy Provost. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. p. vi. Good morning. One of the distinct pleasures of my job is to serve as the official welcomer for conferences at Montclair State. This conference is of particular interest to me because I have observed the richness of the programs that have been put together in the past four years. Montclair State is a growing and complex institution. We have almost 14000 students, over 250 majors, minors and concentrations. We recognize that the state of New Jersey as well as the state of the world is changing very, very rapidly, and consequently we have embarked on a program to enrich all of our international programs and to infuse a concept of global education across the curriculum. This program is a hallmark and has become a tradition now and we are very proud of its strength. I am particularly pleased with the distinguished panel that has been put together and again I welcome them to our campus.

I wish to apologize for the weather, however; our campus is particularly striking at this time of year and I know some of you had a chance to walk around before the sessions. I don't know if we're going to have much of a chance to walk around after the conference, but I know that there will be a good deal of rich discussion going on within the walls of this room so that we don't have to worry about shuffling you outside. This is a conference that is striking because it's on a topic that I believe experts and people from the inside need to reflect upon. I believe it is all too easy for folks like me with backgrounds like mine to have opinions on subjects like this. They are unformed on the traditions of the country. I think that we all are here to learn a great deal and I wish you all well. Thank you for coming. [=] 22027. ------. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Opening Remarks. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. p. vi. On behalf of the Office of the Global Education Center and the Department of Economics & Finance at Montclair State University, I would like to welcome you to our one-day conference on "Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: the Iranian Experience." This is the fourth conference in the past four years, in a series dealing with issues related to Iran and the Middle East, sponsored by the Department of Economics & Finance at Montclair State.

At the outset I would like to thank some of the individuals and institutions that have made this conference possible. First and foremost, I want to express my deep appreciation to Dr. Irvin Reid, the President of Montclair State University, who has always been very supportive of interdisciplinary programs with an international content such as the one we are holding today. Thanks are also due to the Office of the Global Education Center within the Office of the President for a grant which has financed this project. I would also like to thank Dr. Albert Rossetti Dean of the School of Business Administration, and Dr. Phillip LeBel, Chairman of the Department of Economics & Finance, both of whom have been very supportive of this program and a source of encouragement. I would like to thank Tom Cassilly of the Department of Political Science, who having served in the Foreign Service in Iran for two years, had a special interest in this project and has given a generous amount of his time to help me with its implementation.

I would like to thank John O'Brien of the Media Center, and Gary Rideout, Director of the Office of Publications of Montclair State University. I also want to express my appreciation to my wife Homa Pirouz for her art work. In addition, I am grateful to all members of the Department of Economics & Finance for their support and encouragement.

Last, but not the least, I thank Arunava Chakraborty, George Melkonian and other student members of the Economics Society. Thanks are also due to Lakisha Roberts and Beth Wymbus, student aides to the Department of Economics & Finance, and in particular Mrs. Ida Fazio, the secretarial assistant to the Department, without whose help and careful attention this program would have been impossible.

I will now ask Dr. Gregory Waters, Deputy Provost at Montclair State University, to formally open our session by giving the official welcome. [=]
Speeches, as well as general discussion between the audience and speakers, were taped and later transcribed. The transcribed version of presentations as well as general discussion between audience and the speakers were edited by each speaker, by myself, and by my colleague Tom Cassilly of the Department of Political Science at Montclair State, who as a Foreign Service officer served in Iran for two years in the late 1950s. I am extremely indebted to Professor Cassilly who gave a generous amount of his time to help me with the editing, and without whose dedication and cooperation this project would have not been possible.

All the speeches were informal and not in the form of scholarly papers. The participants are all internationally recognized scholars and, in the case of Andrew Whitley, an experienced human rights observer. I thank all of the speakers who, despite their busy schedules, accepted my invitation to take part in this conference, and to the audience whose support and contribution has been very vital for the success of these conferences. Kamrouz Pirouz; Conference Coordinator, Upper Montclair, NJ 10/1994. [=]

22029. Afshar, Soraya; Azuri, Farah [editor]; Iranian Womens Solidarity Group; IWSG. Women of Iran. The Conflict With Fundamentalist Islam: Part 3: The Economic Base for the Revival of Islam in Iran. [Iranian Womens Solidarity Group (IWSG), London] London: Ithaca Press, 1983. pp. 72-89. The question of economic development in Iran and its implication for women's rights has been ignored the Iranian left. However, at the same time that the Islamic political movement is historically based in mercantile capitalism, it is industrialization that has created the socio-political milieu that has supported movements for women's rights. In Iran, as in many Muslim countries, the economic isolation and domination of women by men has been strongest in the centers of the mercantile capitalist economy: in the towns and cities. The value of women's labor was too high in the rural and tribal areas for the artificial and enforced isolation of women in cities to be possible.

The White Revolution of the Shah began the transition to industrial capitalism in Iran. In 1962-1964, 39% of the capital in the economy was involved in trade (the bazaaris), in 1967-1976, the contribution of the trade sector in Iran grew 360%; while the dominate role in the economy was held by the state-owned oil sector, its impact on the socio-economic formation of Iranian society was limited by the fact that it employed only 0.6% of the labor force. In 1977, while Iran had 2.5 million industrial workers, 72% of the industrial work force was employed in enterprises employing ten or less people. Of these small workshops, some 430000 were located in villages and were directly controlled by the socially- and ideological-cohesive trade sector. Significantly, in the immediate post-Revolution economy, the share of foreign trade held by the bazaaris increased (even though overall trade declined), rising from 7.5% in 1977-1978 to 10.5% in 1980-1981. This economic strength, and the continuing central role of the bazaaris in the Iranian economy, creates stronger downward pressure on wages of women: this structural problem is one of the central issues limiting and eroding women's rights. [TXT]

22030. Afshar, Soraya; Azuri, Farah [editor]; Iranian Womens Solidarity Group; IWSG. Women of Iran. The Conflict With Fundamentalist Islam: Part 5: The Attitude of the Iranian Left to the Women's Question. [Iranian Womens Solidarity Group (IWSG), London] London: Ithaca Press, 1983. pp. 157-169. Only the Tudeh Party predates 1970: so much of the political left in Iran has a very limited institutional history (the author dismisses Tudeh noting it lost its "credibility" in 1953 and today is insignificant). Between 1970-1979, the two major new left organizations, the Mujahideen-e Khalq and the Organization of Peoples Fedayeen, ignored the woman question (using formulas such as: "Let's solve the problem of democracy and then we will get to women's issues."). Even now, most leftists believe that the woman question will be solved simply by the transition from capitalism to socialism. It was only after a protest march of 200000 women in Tehran denouncing the mandatory veiling regulation that the left addressed the question of women's rights: even then, for example in articles by Organization of Peoples Fedayeen, the problem of women's rights was noted without any suggestion of how the problem might be addressed. While the Socialist Workers Party (Hezb-e Kargaran-e Socialist (HKS)) called for abortion rights, the Tudeh controlled Womens Democratic Organization of Iran praised women for "the sacrifice by Iranian women [in] not giving priority to their own rights... women have shown to the world that they hold the rights of a nation higher and more important that their own." However, despite discussion of women's rights in principle, no leftist organization in Iran has a program of action for women's rights or has offered a definition of 'equal rights'. This unsympathetic attitude of the left has been especially disappointing since the majority of political active women in Iran were leftists. [TXT]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

Women: 32.
Housewives: 11.
Total: 240.

Islamic ideology regards women with a mixture of fear and paternalism, seeing them both as the source of evil and as the most vulnerable member of the household in need of constant surveillance and protection. This is reflected in the laws and policies of Muslim states, which often equate women with children and the insane.

During the 80 years preceding the Islamic revolution, Iranian women fought for and gained access to education (1910), the abolition of the veil (1936), the vote (1962), a curb on the unequivocal male right of divorce and the right to contest for the custody of children (1973), free abortion on demand (1974), and a ban on polygamy and right to maintenance after divorce (1976). Although equal opportunities were still a long way away, the women's movement had great expectations of success in the 1970s.

There were, however, divisions amongst women. Middle class and educated women were demanding and gaining access to the public sphere and seeking control over their own sexuality and the freedom to express it. Devout and less wealthy women equated sexual freedom with immorality, imperialism, and corruption, and found the pecuniary rewards for their menial jobs insufficient; this in turn made access to paid work more of a loss than a gain for many women, who felt that they had lost the honour and dignity bestowed on them by their religion without gaining any material benefits in return. As a result the advocates of domesticity for women found a large support base among the poor and working classes, both male and female. Khomeini, on his return in 1979, exploited this support and embarked on an intensive campaign to drive women back to the sphere of domesticity. Within months of his return women had been redefined as "unequal" and "impetuous" and biologically and naturally "inferior." Their mere presence in public was "salacious," and they were forced to don the Islamic hejab, covering them from head to toe, and to return to the home fires. Their hard-won rights--to education, the vote, abortion--were seriously eroded or completely revoked.

A series on The Ethics of Marriage written by Hojatolah Abasqoly Akhtari, a well-known cleric, makes clear the extent to which control over a woman's body is exclusively given over to her husband. Marriage exists for the purpose of satisfying male sexual urges. The "comfort" of marriage is that of the husband; its "solace" is also his. Wives are there to quench the "ever blazing fire of lust" and placate the "obsession" with "sexual urges" which renders men "desperate," overriding all dignity and judgment. Ardour is the preserve of men; a woman is required merely to "give herself unquestioningly to her husband" and to obey his every command.

But there is a major problem for "obedient" women in the contradictions of an ideology that prescribes total innocence, chastity, and modesty for young girls, yet expects these puritanical creatures to turn into lusty lovers as soon as the brief marriage prayer has been pronounced. Women are supposed instantaneously to abandon modesty ("their greatest asset") and "when alone with their husband take off all their garments and exhibit all their beauty." They are required to be "generous with giving themselves to him and to satisfy his every desire"; in fact they are told not only "to seek and satisfy his desire, but also to augment his lust," to "seek out his secret fantasies and by enacting them gain hold of his heart."

The young girl is told that "the worst wives are those who, when alone with their husband, refuse his advances and deny his pleasure and do not submit to his will." At the same time, these desirable sex objects are expected to revert to their previous modesty as soon as the man is satisfied. "When the man leaves, then the wife should put on her garments of modesty and cover herself from the eyes of the strangers." It is not clear how young girls can go through these repeated metamorphoses at such short intervals.

"Arab Culture and Writing Women's Bodies," by Leila Ahmen, in Feminist Issues, vol 9, no. 1, Spring 1989. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O.
The Sandinistas still need to say this. Stalin did. It is best to claim the goals of Marxism in opposition to the united front against those who want to break the revolution. And both confine socialism to one country and try to run it bureaucratically, as we will grant you your democratic rights if the Sandinistas had been on the revolutionary side on the other side of the barricades. It is best of years of being oppressed as a nation; we will be better than Somoza; extend democracy all the way, rather than face those people who should you all the way, we recognize that you have had hundreds and hundreds determine the destiny of the revolution. It is better for revolutionaries to agree with your demand, we recognize you as a nation, we support to the church and to the economic structure. And the correct answers will though the majority of MISURASATA are not on the contra side—to join revolution and any vanguard party must answer. They concern the Indios who should be natural allies of the revolution to join the other side. Why should they replace capitalism with socialism? Why? Why, if they right to autonomy is a counterrevolutionary demand! This is an anti-equality and nationhood under a Marxist government, why the hell should people who belong on the revolutionary side. This is what is currently revolutionary struggle. As a Marxist I expected more than the Sandinistas need to change their policy towards the Indian Nations of Nicaragua immediately. Not to grant the demand of autonomy, land and resources to the Indios will result in cultural genocide. This is how serious this issue is. Without land the Indios do not have a basis for their culture—they will cease to exist. Ask any Indian. Most Native Americans in this country I am sure would agree. That is why historically Indians have fought like hell for their land, even if it meant they were the last ones left to fight. The Sandinistas have been in power for almost five years, but they have made only very little concessions, concessions on words; concessions on terms, yes, but when it comes right down to it they are still making the same mistakes that have cost lives. For example, in 1981, MISURASATA was asked to come back to the Sandinistas with a study of land ownership and a map of Indian lands, and, in the meantime, the Sandinistas agreed to stop further Indian land seizures. Matters looked hopeful. But the Sandinistas broke their agreement. They opened Sumo land to logging, they started to relocate the Indians by force, and, one week before the Indian land study was to be presented to the Nicaraguan government, the Sandinistas arrested all Indian leaders and declared them "separatists," outlawed MISURASATA, and killed four Indians in a church. Thus began the Indian-Sandinista War in Nicaragua. As a result some dissident youth joined the contras in Honduras. And MISURASATA picked up arms in self-defense and started to fight back. How do we help resolve this conflict? What do we say to our Indian brothers and sisters? And what do we say to our Sandinista compaeras and companeros? We say to our Indian brothers and sisters, we unconditionally support your democratic right to autonomy and your demand to control your own lives, your own territory and your own resources. And we support you in putting pressure on the Sandinista government to change their Indian policy. And we are with you in support of the revolution. We say to our Sandinista companeros, for the sake of the revolution, for all our sakes, grant the Indios their democratic rights. After all, isn’t a Marxist revolution above all a democratic revolution? If the Spanish independence movement against imperialism, the Sandinistas’ reason for the right to self-determination is that they are only an “ethnic group.” But, efforts to portray the Indians as an “ethnic group” cannot change the truth. The Indians are a nation; they have the right to separate if they so choose. Lenin was very clear on the obligations of socialists towards oppressed nations: “Socialist parties which did not show...that they would liberate the enslaved nations and build up relations with them on the basis of a free unity—and a free union is a false phrase without the right to secede—would be betraying socialism.” Lenin practiced what he preached. Virtually the last political struggle of his life was conducted against Stalin’s Sandinista-style “integration” of the Georgian Republic into the Federation of Soviet Socialist Republics. Marxists who hodge on the right of sovereignty are issuing an invitation to anti-Marxism among people who belong on the revolutionary side. This is what is currently happening in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas are saying in essence that the right to autonomy is a counterrevolutionary demand! This is an anti-socialist and anti-Marxist position, and one that is bound to drive some Indians who should be natural allies of the revolution to join the other side. The Sandinistas, by not granting Indian nations their right to autonomy—to control their land and resources—are driving some of the Indians to pick up arms against the Sandinistas in self-defense, or—even though the majority of MISURASATA are not on the contra side—to join the counterrevolutionaries. If the Sandinistas had reached out and said “We agree with your demand, we recognize you as a nation, we support you all the way, we recognize that you have had hundreds and hundreds of years of being oppressed as a nation; we will be better than Somozas; we will grant you your democratic rights”—if the Sandinistas had done this from the beginning—the Indios would have joined with them in a united front against those who want to break the revolution. And both sides need this kind of unity. The Sandinistas still need to say this. They need to change their policy towards the Indian Nations of Nicaragua immediately. Not to grant the demand of autonomy, land and resources to the Indios will result in cultural genocide. This is how serious this issue is. Without land the Indios do not have a basis for their culture—they will cease to exist. Ask any Indian. Most Native Americans in this country I am sure would agree. That is why historically Indians have fought like hell for their land, even if it meant they were the last ones left to fight. The Sandinistas have been in power for almost five years, but they have made only very little concessions, concessions on words; concessions on terms, yes, but when it comes right down to it they are still making the same mistakes that have cost lives. For example, in 1981, MISURASATA was asked to come back to the Sandinistas with a study of land ownership and a map of Indian lands, and, in the meantime, the Sandinistas agreed to stop further Indian land seizures. Matters looked hopeful. But the Sandinistas broke their agreement. They opened Sumo land to logging, they started to relocate the Indians by force, and, one week before the Indian land study was to be presented to the Nicaraguan government, the Sandinistas arrested all Indian leaders and declared them "separatists," outlawed MISURASATA, and killed four Indians in a church. Thus began the Indian-Sandinista War in Nicaragua. As a result some dissident youth joined the contras in Honduras. And MISURASATA picked up arms in self-defense and started to fight back. How do we help resolve this conflict? What do we say to our Indian brothers and sisters? And what do we say to our Sandinista compaeras and companeros? We say to our Indian brothers and sisters, we unconditionally support your democratic right to autonomy and your demand to control your own lives, your own territory and your own resources. And we support you in putting pressure on the Sandinista government to change their Indian policy. And we are with you in support of the revolution. We say to our Sandinista companeros, for the sake of the revolution, for all our sakes, grant the Indios their democratic rights. After all, isn’t a Marxist revolution above all a democratic revolution? If the Spanish independence movement against imperialism, the Sandinistas’ reason for the right to self-determination is that they are only an “ethnic group.” But, efforts to portray the Indians as an “ethnic group” cannot change the truth. The Indians are a nation; they have the right to separate if they so choose. Lenin was very clear on the obligations of socialists towards oppressed nations: “Socialist parties which did not show...that they would liberate the enslaved nations and build up relations with them on the basis of a free unity—and a free union is a false phrase without the right to secede—would be betraying socialism.” Lenin practiced what he preached. Virtually the last political struggle of his life was conducted against Stalin’s Sandinista-style “integration” of the Georgian Republic into the Federation of Soviet Socialist Republics. Marxists who hodge on the right of sovereignty are issuing an invitation to anti-Marxism among people who belong on the revolutionary side. This is what is currently happening in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas are saying in essence that the right to autonomy is a counterrevolutionary demand! This is an anti-socialist and anti-Marxist position, and one that is bound to drive some Indians who should be natural allies of the revolution to join the other side. The Sandinistas, by not granting Indian nations their right to autonomy—to control their land and resources—are driving some of the Indians to pick up arms against the Sandinistas in self-defense, or—even though the majority of MISURASATA are not on the contra side—to join the counterrevolutionaries. If the Sandinistas had reached out and said “We agree with your demand, we recognize you as a nation, we support you all the way, we recognize that you have had hundreds and hundreds of years of being oppressed as a nation; we will be better than Somozas; we will grant you your democratic rights”—if the Sandinistas had done this from the beginning—the Indios would have joined with them in a united front against those who want to break the revolution. And both sides need this kind of unity. The Sandinistas still need to say this. They

The effect of the Constitution was to strengthen enormously Jewish self-respect, and at the same time to enhance the status of the Jews in the eyes of the Muslims. The field covered by the schools was limited and the educational task enormous. But illiteracy among the Jews has gradually decreased to about 75%, even though Jewish secondary education could be much improved. Today, there are some 22 Alliance schools in Persia, with approximately 8000 pupils. The Anglo-Jewish Association has also contributed towards education in the Persian Jewish community.

In addition, the last few decades have seen the establishment of other Jewish schools, numbering about 30. The total number of pupils attending these latter schools, however, is less than that of the Alliance schools. Their syllabus is in accordance with the requirements of the Persian Ministry of Education.

Although the mother tongue of Persian Jews of all classes is Persian, the influence of the Alliance schools and the more international atmosphere of the capital have contributed greatly towards the dissemination of European languages, especially French and English.

In view of the limited capacity of the Alliance classes and the growing demand for education, many Jewish parents send their children to Government schools, which are open to Jewish as well as Muslim children.

A few 22 Alliance schools in Persia. Although today there are no obstacles to higher education for women, the fact that this has only been so for a comparatively short time explains why Jewish girls have so far attended courses only in nursing. It should be remembered that only 15 years ago no Persian woman, Muslim or Jewish, could go out without the Chador, a long draped garment concealing by its shapelessness any suggestion of seductive curves, plus a black veil.

Late as Western habits and ideas spread among Persian Jews, they have none the less done something to vitalize their hitherto hemmed in lives. Young people, in particular, have been quick to adopt the standards of the West, with their doctrines of emancipation and their comparative absence of restrictions.

All the more bitterly have they resented the many disabilities under which the Jewish community has had to exist for so long; for the deeply rooted prejudice of the Muslim towards the Jew, and his traditional contempt for the non-believer, could not be abolished merely by the introduction of a new law.

Eventoday, for instance, a Jew cannot be elected Member of Parliament in the ordinary way, and only one Jew is allowed to represent the Jewish minority. A new Bill, still under discussion, at the time of writing, providing for the election of an Upper House or Senate, entitles Jews to vote for Muslims, but does not allow them to stand as candidates themselves. By virtue of a recent resolution of the Council of Ministers, no Jew can become a judge. Many other restrictions make it almost impossible for a Jew to enter the civil service. The National Bank of Persia to this day refuses to employ Jews.

Apart from these official and legal disqualifications, there is a good deal of social discrimination, of which the Jews are deeply and increasingly conscious.

Under these conditions it is only natural that Zionism has made considerable headway all over the country, and particularly among the youth in Teheran. Nothing can better arouse the self-respect and confidence of the still humiliated Persian Jew than the idea of Israel, an independent Jewish nation. The Jewish Agency is extremely active through its branch in Teheran. Modern Hebrew has been introduced into the syllabus of the Jewish schools, with the consequence that a growing number of people have acquired some knowledge of it.

For a time the Zionist Organization published a weekly called Ha-Gelilah ("Redemption"). When this was discontinued, another magazine called Israel, edited by Dr. R. Cohen (Persian delegate at the 22nd Zionist Congress), appeared. The revolutionary fervor of this paper, however, oscillated between Zionism and extreme Leftism. It was forced to cease publication when the Arab States invaded Israel. The mixture of extreme Left wing politics and Zionism in this periodical is symptomatic of the alternative solutions to current problems which present themselves to the Jewish youth of Persia. [="
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iran

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

22036. Azuri, Farah; Azuri, Farah [editor]; Iranian Womens Solidarity Group; IWSG. Women of Iran. The Conflict With Fundamentalist Islam: Part 1: Islam's Appeal to Women in Iran: Illusion and Reality. [Iranian Womens Solidarity Group (IWSG), London] London: Ithaca Press, 1983. pp. 1-71. Despite the "massive participation" of women in the revolution that led to the fall of the Shah, the government that came to power was dominated by Muslim clergy and which tried to undo the few advances won by Iranian won in the few previous decades. This massive participation by women in the revolutionary movement was unprecedented in the Muslim world, and if for many young women the revolution had a revolutionary-Islamic content, they were greatly disappointed by the regimes persistent attempts to limit the job and educational opportunities of women. The attempt to restrict the rights of women must be seen in the context of a general attack on human rights by the regime, including the denial of self-determination to the Kurds (which led to a regional war), the persecution of religious minorities, censorship of the media, and attacks on free trade union activities.

The origins of the treatment of women in Islam is the product of the patriarchal nature of Islamic religious thought, as well as the persistence of certain traditional, pre-Islamic modes of treatment of and conduct by women (e.g., the persistence of tribalism). Significantly, many elements in early Islam, especially those in the conduct of the life of the early Muslim community by Prophet Muhammad, that emphasized the autonomy of women in a social milieu in which tribalism was disintegrating, have been overwhelmed by the new social dispensation after the 'Disaster of Uhud', in which many early Muslim males were slain and Muslim society had to be restructured: at that time the patriarchal character of Arabic tribal society was reinforced in the new Islamic polity. Iranian civil laws were instituted in 1928 with the establishment of a modern judiciary, but Islamic Law was the basis of 'civil' law, especially that dealing with relations between men and women. In the White Revolution, the Shah granted women the right to vote, and granted other concessions that were likely to increase the participation by women in the workforce; this led in 1967 to the Family Protection Act (1967) which made divorce a (largely) civil process. The act also brought improvements in polygamy and custody of children.

One of the main proponents of the post-revolutionary Islamic ideology of women has been Ayatollah Motahari; he has published several books on women in Islam, including a book on the veil and another on women's status. Motahari defends the traditional role of women in islamic society, with a few exceptions. His argument is based on the idea that the difference in "nature" between men and women calls for different rights and duties in both the family and society. Motahari also dismisses women's liberation in the West as largely an illusion that has led to the industrial exploitation of women by capitalism. Radical Shiite social philosopher Ali Shariati also was dismissive of women's liberation in the West, seeing the real struggle of Shiites to be against "world imperialism, international Zionism, colonialism, exploitation, oppression, class inequality, cartels, multinational corporations, racism, cultural imperialism, and the blind worship of the West." Indeed, Shariati saw women as defenders of the traditional Islamic order against the West, yet he also observed of genuine women leaders, like Angela Davis: "on the contrary, she has advanced so far as to represent a people's ideal, a source of liberation and pride for a race." Yet Shariati's argument that the movement towards greater women's rights under the Shah haddegraded women: "A woman is not a thought-inspiring being any more, a receiver on sincere emotions, a beloved of great loves, a mother, a companion, a source of inspiration, a truthful mirror reflecting the man's rightful self, she is just a commercial good that is bought and sold depending on the level of her sexual attraction." This 'moral crusade' against such movement away from the Islamic ideal of women would pass into the hands of the clergy. In the 1975-1977 recession, which followed the social and population displacement of the oil boom, provided the opportunity for mobilization of the pervasive national discontent by the network of mosques and mullahs against the Shah: women even resumed wearing the veil as protest against the political order instituted by the Shah. The popular participation of women in the revolution resulted in the imposition of a more traditional order than had emerged before the revolution, and this dismaying result was unforeseen by the secular and leftists critics of Ayatollah Khomeini and clergy.

1957:
Rural: 1.2%.
Urban: 22.4%.
Total: 8%.

1972:
Rural: 8.5%.
Urban: 38.3%.
Total: 26.3%.

Figure 22037. Percentage Literacy Rate Among Iranian Women 1977 (estimated).

1977 (estimated):
Rural: 17.4%.
Urban: 56%.
Total: 36%. [=]
women were especially militant in the step requiring the veil. Very quickly, pro-Islamic women's organizations have seen a brief florescence confront the national imposition of the "traditional Muslim restrictions of women with a vigor reminiscent of the Qajar dynasty". The limited rights granted to women after the Revolution, including the right to vote, improvements in marriage and divorce law, and improved job opportunities, did not reflect any commitment to women's rights, but rather an attempt to improve the efficiency of the capitalist economy of Iran. These changes are not the product of a genuine commitment to women's rights in Iran. The repression, including the control of all channels of public expression, has silenced the women's movement.

The repression, including the control of all channels of public expression, has silenced the women's movement.

The energy of the feminist groups that organized the International Women's Day march is captured in the report, 'Women's Re-Awakening' (Nos. 3-4), issued by the organizing coalition that planned the march: "Their suspicion and hostility was further invoked when they heard that the occasion was organized by women themselves and for women. What shame and audacity that women want to celebrate their own day! An International Day! What hurtful words and goals! Who has given them the right? The permission? and so on... The words 'woman' and 'international' resurrect nightmares of blasphemy in their tiny brains and they naturally conclude that 'this is an international conspiracy by corrupt and promiscuous women'. But such thoughts are far from our conscious and freedom-loving women. Our militant and suffering women have born [sic] the weight of such slanders and bullying from their homes to their farms, factories, offices and schools. Today, when the greatest source of bullying and dictactorship in the past fifty years of the rest of our country has been overthrown by the determined and brave struggle of these women and their menfolk, they will not tolerate any more exploitation and coercion. Consciousness and freedom cannot be limited and temporary. They are like drops of rain that will find their way through narrow streams, into rivers and onto the seas. How mean are the efforts of those who want to dry up the seas only to find little ponds in their own backyards." The march started with 15000 women rallying at Tehran University, and swelled during the march to 30000; some 3000 women marched in Shiraz; both marches followed by one day a speech by Ayatollah Khomeini that denounced International Women's Day as a product of a genuine commitment to women's rights in Iran. The Women's economic activities were restricted to the household. The most prominent woman dissident of the period was Ghoroatolein (1815-1851) who converted to Bahaism and demanded the emancipation of women. She also embraced socialist ideas. Women first participated in political affairs by joining in the national boycott of tobacco in 1891-1892 in protest of the granting of a tobacco monopoly to the British owned Regie. Women played an even more aggressive and public role in the Constitutional Revolution (1906-1911): during fighting in Tabriz women even carried guns in the defense of barricades.

The period of 1931-1951 saw the emergence of more Iranian women's organizations: the first women's newspaper was established in 1910; the establishment of women's schools in the 1910s in Tehran (in Fars in 1921, in Isfahan in 1926) created a cadre of women activities who founded women's publications and writing articles on women; this period saw Parvin Etesami (1907-1941) emerge as a nationally prominent feminist poet; in 1936 the Shah abolished the veil; in the 1930s the modernization policies of the Shah drew women into the workforce in a more significant manner.

In the late 1940s, the largest women's organization in Iran was the Women's Organization of the Tudeh Party, later renamed the Democratic Organization of Women; the group mainly recruited middle class women and was subordinated to the men of the Party's central committee. The Shah's White Revolution beginning in 1963 led to a greater role for women in the workforce, and it gave more formal rights to women. In the Qajar period (1827-1925) Iranian society had a rigid traditional implementation of these norms through various Islamic institutions. The importance of virginity and chastity in Islamic management of women's sexuality, the role of women in family alliances, and the socio-economic significance of prostitution is discussed. The article concludes with an outline of the implication for women's sexuality of the Revolution and provides a Reichian analysis of sexuality in Iran, Shiite societies and Islamic societies.

22039. Azari, Farah; Azari, Farah [editor]: Iranian Women's Solidarity Group; IWSG. Women of Iran. The Conflict With Fundamentalist Islam: Part 4: Sexuality and Women's Oppression in Iran. [Iranian Women's Solidarity Group (IWSG), London] London: Ithaca Press, 1983. pp. 90-156. A comprehensive review of the question of sexuality in Iran begins with the traditional Islamic definition of women's virtue in having appropriate prescribing and social and controlled sexuality. The article provides a summary of the theoretical basis for the inexorable growth of women's group activism in the context of traditional implementation of these norms through various Islamic institutions. The importance of virginity and chastity in Islamic management of women's sexuality, the role of women in family alliances, and the socio-economic significance of prostitution is discussed. The article concludes with an outline of the implication for women's sexuality of the Revolution and provides a Reichian analysis of sexuality in Iran, Shiite societies and Islamic societies.

22040. Bahar, Sima; Azari, Farah [editor]: Iranian Women's Solidarity Group; IWSG. Women of Iran. The Conflict With Fundamentalist Islam: Part 8: A Historical Background to the Women's Movement in Iran. [Iranian Women's Solidarity Group (IWSG), London] London: Ithaca Press, 1983. pp. 170-189. Until the Islamic Revolution of 1979, all women's dissident organizations had been associated with the main ideology of the groups of which they were a part; such women's groups were not based on feminism. The February Revolution of 1979 stimulated demands among organized women to meet the specific needs of women. In the Qajar period (1827-1925) Iranian society had a rigid social and political system and women's activities were very restricted. Women's economic activities were restricted to the household. The most prominent woman dissident of the period was Ghoroatolein (1815-1851) who converted to Bahaism and demanded the emancipation of women. In the Constitutional Revolution (1906-1911): during fighting in Tabriz women even carried guns in the defense of barricades.

Despite political pressure by the Islamic Republican Party and its allies (including the Muslim Women's Organization (Nehzet-e Zanan-e Mosa' man), and local groups like Muslim Nurses, Muslim Teachers that are auxiliaries to larger male-dominated groups) on women's groups, the Feminists continued to grow through the period of the beginning of the Iran-Iraq War. When the government ordered mandatory veiling in 6/1981, one supporter of the policy was the Tudeh Party, which made fierce attacks on women who protested the mandatory veiling. The attacks on women were part of a general political and police offensive against the left, which ultimately would sweep up much of the membership of Tudeh, and which led to frequent executions and an official figure of 10000 political prisoners. Cyrichly, perhaps despairingly, some Iranian feminists see the reverses for women in Iran as energizing the future struggle for women's rights in Iran. [TEXT] organizations were established, including the Muslim Women's Movement (Nehzet-e Zanat-e Mosalman).

22041. Bauer, Janet. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Fundamental Dilemmas? Modernity, Islam and Women's Rights: Part 01. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference, Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993, pp. 13-17. Thank you very much. When I first started working on this presentation about women's rights and Islam a fundamental dilemma for me was how to maintain an anthropological appreciation of cultural relativism--that is, respect for different ways of doing things--and at the same time develop what some might call a feminist view, that women should have the basic right to be treated as equals and have equal opportunity.

So I want to approach this question: Can or should there be fundamental rights for women across cultures? And I use the Iranian case to discuss that question. Some women's groups and the UN committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women are committed to the adoption of a universal set of criteria. Critics, on the other hand, maintain that universal human rights can only become a reality if they are consistent with particular cultural traditions, and they argue that women's rights, or ideal women's rights, are based on western traditions of individual rights, something which they say is unfamiliar to the more social communitarian bases of non-western culture. One problem, I believe, for both those who try to develop or define universal rights and those who reject this notion is a view of culture as monolithic. That is an assumption that everyone within any particular culture adheres to the same values and beliefs. This position fails to give attention to the views not only of cultural minorities but also of women and other dissenting members of the majority culture or religion. And it too easily leads to another presumption that in Islamic societies, communal loyalty or consensus about standards for women's behavior has to take precedence over the individual's right to choose.

Fatma Mernissi, the Moroccan sociologist writing about Islamic societies, has claimed, "Modernity means the emergence of women as citizens and this emergence suddenly transforms the nature of the state." In other words, whether voiced through religious nationalism, socialism or secular humanism, the issue of women's rights is a challenge and a source of debate in modern societies. A look at Iran reveals how concern with women's rights has become a focal point for all sides and what great diversity of positions exists on women's rights. Women's positions and behaviors were used as symbols of modernity and progress and for the construction of the good society in both Pahlavi and Khomeini Iran, and I argue they are focal points in the reconstruction of the Iranian community.

Najmabadi and some other Iranian writers who generally support individual or women's rights have drawn one basic distinction or a basic line between those people who criticize the Islamic Republic for limiting women's rights and those who support the regime, claiming that their standards and codes actually represent liberation for women. This characterization oversimplifies the complexity of the various Iranian positions. Even the Islamic Republic admits it faces dilemmas in redefining and asserting its vision of appropriate behavior for women. In 1992 Dr. Habibi admitted the government was having problems getting people to comply with certain dress codes. On the other hand, feminists face dilemmas in contemplating the possible benefits of recent struggles by women within the regime to change laws affecting women's rights, as they did this summer at the Iranian women's studies conference in Vienna. Could reform measures sponsored by Islamicist women really contribute to improvement in women's situations?

So being an anthropologist I would now like to proceed with the broad range of ordinary women's opinions and voices on the issues of women's rights using material from my research with rural, working class, and middle class (some religious) urban women at the time of the Revolution and later with refugee women, some non-refugee visitors and relatives, and students in Germany and Canada. And some of the opinions and ideas voiced by these women may challenge our ideas or stereotypes of traditional Iranian views on the rights of women.

Perceptions of women's rights before the Revolution, both by Islamicists and non-Islamicists, have not been fully investigated, and many people assume that working class and rural women, before and after 1979, simply supported the Islamic definition of appropriate behavior for women. Leftist women asylum seekers who worked among poor women in south Tehran after the Revolution told me that they were surprised to find out that their stereotypes of these women were not true, that they were not as religious or conservative as they had thought. Of course before the Revolution the Pahlavis had made changing women's position a hallmark or a banner of development--unveiling, education for women, the right to divorce. The actual situation for ordinary women may not have changed substantially to provide greater opportunities for them, but the interviews that I conducted with poor urban and rural women suggest that on the whole they supported the rights of women to education, to choose spouses, to work, or to go unveiled. On the whole they found women to be intelligent and as capable as men but with fewer opportunities. In the migrant, working class areas of Tehran, for example, among the women I interviewed about 54% said they wore the veil for social reasons. Whereas about 24% said they wore it for religious reasons. On the other hand, among the more middle class and some lower middle class religious women who had more education, who live in one neighborhood, about 5% of the women said they wore the veil for religious reasons and 20% for social reasons. [So almost the reverse.] These are the women who attended religious services regularly (routzesh or Qur'an classes) and they basically subscribed to the position that we now identify with the Islamic Republic. That is, women's activities and roles must be separate from men's; they should concentrate on their duties as housewives and mothers. They shouldn't speak to unrelated men, but they also insisted that women were equal to men and that the Islamic code of behavior actually liberated women and allowed them to become equal or to enjoy equal opportunity.

The impact of the Revolution on the debate on women's rights is obviously enormous. Refugee women have described to me how revolutionary events had a dramatic impact on the thinking of ordinary people (like their mothers and their fathers), with respect to equal rights for men and women. It was not just their revolutionary experiences, but also women's lack of opportunities under the Pahlavis, their experiences in the Revolution (perhaps in leftist organizations or in prison) and living in the Islamic Republic that helped to stimulate their interest in women's rights.

Today when their relatives come to visit them abroad, these relatives express frustrations at women's lack of opportunity or the inconveniences of cumbersome clothing in Iran. Women in Iran are not unaware. Talking about picture brides in Europe, one woman explained to me that refugee men who bring brides from Iran don't really realize how much women's thinking, ordinary women's thinking, has changed with the times, with more information, education and aspirations. And they often find that their brides are not as conservative or as reticent as they had hoped. On the other hand, it has become very difficult for me to assess how women in Iran now feel about women's rights and I think there needs to be further research to address that issue in more detail.

Among Iranian refugees, especially political exiles, there is lively debate over women's rights. For many refugee women in Germany and Canada, studying the situation of women has become an avocation. But it is a mistake to think their interest in women's rights began in exile. Women in what I would call nationalist feminist groups in Germany generally describe themselves as supportive of women's rights and equality. They differ from some of the other Iranian women and other women's groups in Germany, by taking a women centered approach in their activities. Some of them also argue that feminist is a western tradition of individual rights, something which they say is religious reasons and 20% for social reasons. [So almost the reverse.] Women's Rights: Part 01. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads women's occupations which is a result of gender segregation policies. [Women are needed to work in certain occupations because men are not allowed to have contact with women.]

Meehan, who is one of the women who participated in this group’s activities, presents public talks on changes in women’s status in Iran. Unlike some of the other members in this group, she had been a member of a women’s branch of a leftist organization in Iran before the Revolution. In Iran, she said, even those men, such as leftists, who professed to hold different ideas about women’s roles, found some way to control the household and get women to do most of the work. And she tells many stories of how her interest in political work conflicted with her husband’s. [He was unwilling to share the housework and child care responsibilities, while he expected her to provide those services when he had political meetings.] A supporter of women’s rights and equality for women, she has not been able to implement her goals in her own life, either in Iran or as an exile in Europe. Her education was interrupted by the Revolution and by marriage, and even in exile she finds that her cultural socialization prohibits her from taking advantage of certain opportunities like going out on dates or going to bars.

For women in what I’ll call the more leftist women’s organizations in Germany, class (along with democracy and sexuality or sexual issues) is still the central concern. They argue that the effects of class are just as important as gender in understanding women’s position and achieving women’s rights. These individuals are generally receptive to the idea of cross-cultural feminism and to the potential for working class and rural women to make contributions to it. For them, democracy is a prerequisite for equality and some of them see fundamentalist Islamic politics as a real threat to Iranian women of all classes, and they criticize vigorously what they see as the suppression of women’s rights in the Islamic Republic which outweighs any advantages that might be gained from some of its other policies.

One of these women, Farzaneh, said that it was important to understand the framework under which people were operating and how they thought. She said change for women cannot ultimately come from within Islam. She’s certain about that, but she is not certain about what kind of feminism or what other kind of approach might work. She believes, for example, that women must work with men because although men are generally not supportive of women’s rights, they also have their own battles with patriarchal socialization. In other words, it’s a shared battle between men and women to achieve equality for women. In retrospect, she feels she experienced inequality in her political organization in Iran, but it wasn’t important at the time. She is very active in various committees to improve human rights and prison conditions in Iran, and she believes that she has benefited from her association with German feminists, but they have also benefited from their association with her.[6]

22042. Bauer, Janet. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Fundamental Dilemmas? Modernity, Islam and Women’s Rights: Part 02. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference, Montclair State University, Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 17-21. In Canada, women's organizations are just beginning to really break away from immigrant and refugee organizations to establish their own independent organizations. One of these immigrant societies that I interviewed in 1992 was a married student I had interviewed in Tehran years before. She had been religious before the Revolution and she was veiled. Now she tells me that she is able to study and pursue her profession in college orally because she has a good Muslim husband who shares the housework and child-rearing with her. She believes that women's liberation can only come through observing Islamic principles correctly, as her husband does. She's convinced, of course, that the government has brought enormous improvement in women's status and provided them with more opportunities for education, for child care and so forth. On the other hand, she's lived and studied abroad for ten years, although she does plan to return to Iran.

Whenever I have interviewed Mojahedin women, of the one so-called opposition socialist group, who publicly claim to abide by Islamic traditions, I have, interestingly enough, been required to contact them through male relatives. Nevertheless Mehr and others empathically recount their organization’s commitment to women's rights—the right to choose, to male/female equality, and to democracy. The Islamic Republic’s Islam, she believes, is just not the right Islam. In her own case she is frustrated in her life because her husband does not share the housework and child care with her so that she can pursue her education.

There are of course a lot of other women, refugee women, whom I have interviewed, some of them wives of political asylum seekers, who generally support women’s equality, democracy and choice but are not members of organizations, are not active in publicly debating women’s rights. They tend also to accept the universal definition of feminism and the idea of women’s equality, but they’re very critical of women’s groups, leftist groups, and other organizations for the way they are trying to achieve this goal. For example, Mahnaz feels that other Iranian women don’t understand working class women, like her own mother, who she said “may not have an education, or know about women’s rights, but they are not satisfied and they really know oppression at the hands of men.” Monir, another who participated in the refugee society in Canada and is herself an immigrant, claims men take advantage of women everywhere in whatever kind of society, industrial, agricultural, urban, rural. “Women must support each other and need a women’s group. Not that men and women shouldn’t work together, but do you really think feminism is necessary?” she asked.

Well, I think it’s important for the Iranian Revolution to control and define women’s behavior simply to the predictable outcome of Islamic or Islamic views on women’s rights, diverts attention from these very diverse ideas or opinions about women’s rights, both within and outside of the Islamic Republic, and also diverts attention away from the role of political power in achieving certain kinds of legislation concerning women in Iran. It also assumes that emphasizing individual rights is the only way to achieve equality at a time when many western feminists are in fact beginning to question this perspective. So I’m suggesting that just to say the situation of women in Iran, the legislation that’s being created that affects women, just to see that as the predictable outcome of Islamic moral codes is drawing attention away from the fact that there is diversity of opinion and that political power is very important in creating the situation that we are experiencing in Iran now: it's not just purely Islamic views on women and men. How should the rights of women or others be defined or supported in the modern world and what type of political system or society is necessary for achieving justice for women? Some western observers of religious nationalism and democratic secularization, like Juergensmeyer in The New Cold War, have pointed out that the constitution of the Islamic Republic does provide for the rights of minorities and women. He goes on to say that political religion, that is religion that is used in the service of politics today, is fueled by democratic impulse, providing outlets for some sectors of society who have few other options for controlling their lives and their status. Indeed, in sources like Islam, the Misunderstood Religion, Islamicists explain at length their commitment to democracy, justice, and rights. And since pluralism does seem to be a condition of modern nation states, rights for minorities (however defined) are clearly an issue, particularly in Iran. The country is having problems not only with women's general compliance with the dress code as described by Habibi, but with Islamic women within the regime who are disputing some of the laws, claiming current legislation is unfair to women.

Juergensmeyer, however, goes on to describe, and to accept, a basic incompatibility between Islam and western secular notions of rights. He says "Religious nationalists will always be more reluctant than secular nationalists to extend rights to individuals because the notion of individualism goes counter to the logic of religious nationalism: that a nation should reflect the collective values of the moral community that constitutes it." While this collectivism in non-western societies has been overestimated in my opinion, there is of course enormous attention being paid to a set of restrictive behaviors imposed upon women by the Iranian state, which insists that men's and women's natures are different or distinct. This is what western feminists called the difference paradigm. Women's natures and needs are different and they must be assigned different roles in society in order to produce a better, more ordered and more moral society. Western feminists have generally challenged the separate-but-equal policies that this perspective creates, pointing out that they have not been shown to provide women with really equal access to resource control, opportunities, or choice. However, western feminists are also beginning to re-examine the use of individualism and equality (as sameness) as the bases for establishing women's rights. Increasingly, they are turning to some conception of individual rights within the context of social responsibility or community. Some call it relational individualism. They argue that western individualism has been exaggerated that people have always been some what dependent upon social relationships in communities, and that rights must be more grounded in the community. On the other hand, they recognize that women's rights have not been protected within traditional communities of family and state.

Some feminists recommend what they call a justice approach based on treatment of women as equals within a pluralistic, democratic society, which assures that women have the power to control their own choices. These suggestions are supported by the experience of Iranian women for whom the state, social networks and family control, even in exile, have limited individual opportunities and choices, but where these women, the exiled feminists, show concern and responsibility toward this community. [They take social responsibility for their communities at the same time.]

I would like us to entertain these questions for a moment. Is it possible to guarantee women's individual rights within an Islamic society, or any religious patriarchal community, in some other way, some other perspective than the difference perspective? In other words, can something other than the separate-but-equal approach be created within the Islamic framework, and what are the possibilities for expecting tolerance for competing moral codes or interpretations on women's issues? Juergensmeyer suggests that there is no absolute reason why Islamic or religious regimes in general must be intolerant on moral issues, because there is room for tolerance on those issues in Islamic regimes. Across Islamic cultures, of course, there is a great deal of diversity in perspectives on women's rights (from the Islamic animists in the Philippines to people who try to follow very closely some kind of textual interpretation in the Middle East). In fact, Ayatollah Nouri told me in an interview in 1978 that these kinds of variations were necessary to sustain the social order of existing cultures. In some other sources, like Human Rights and Conflicts of Cultures, the authors, relying on the ambiguity of Islamic texts and interpretations, have concluded that the flexibility of the Islamic framework allows for an insistence on compliance with one specific moral code, but they also wanted to point out that neither Christianity nor Islam has supported the kind of religious liberty advocated by contemporary human rights organizations. There is also ample evidence that with in the Islamic Republic, policies and ideas about gender roles have changed to reflect social and economic realities. That suggests that there might be some room for different interpretations of Islamic mores but also draws attention to the importance of political power instilling any particular reforms. For many religious Muslims, the actual erosion of women's opportunities in the Islamic Republic is explained by the failure of the government to be faithful to the right Islamic interpretations.

Some Pakistani feminists are using the Qur'an to argue for restoration of many of their rights, but it's not clear how successful they will ultimately be because in Pakistan, as in Iran, contemporary Islamicists have grounded women's rights in separate-but-equal policies, which leaves patriarchy essentially untouched and accepts differentiation in the roles of men and women as a natural phenomenon. There are various Muslim, Christian and Jewish women who are trying to provide women-centered analyses of religious texts, and one example is Memissi's The Veil and the Male Elite, in which she challenges the presentation and verification of Hadith. But as one of my feminist friends says "Interesting book, it's too bad that she wrote it because no one will take it seriously" Those fundamentalist women seeking status through Islam, who have important roles in public organizations in the Islamic Republic, often find some kind of empowerment, but at the same time they realize that they lead the very lives that they do not prescribe for other women. That is, they suggest one way of living for a majority of women in the community, but as leaders and as public persons they lead quite different lives for themselves. In their own lives, for example, they do not focus on the housewife/mother role. This has been observed also for conservative Christian women activists in the US, like Phyllis Schlafly, for example.

Regardless of what society they live in or their backgrounds, Iranian women share common social and familial constraints by which men generally enjoy disproportionate power to set standards, even to decide which religious prescriptions are authoritative. Men or the male elites (in Bruce Lawrence's Defenders of Defenders) make the rules in Islamic society and provide the interpretations. They are able to use religious and cultural traditions to maintain hegemony over women. In my research I asked women not only about their beliefs in women's rights, but also about their relationships with men and their communities. In Germany and Canada, women are accused by men in their communities of losing themselves; women from leftist organizations find that men have defined their issues, women's issues, as less important and also expect certain kinds of behavior from them. In Iran, Islamicist women have had to fight against the implementation of religious laws that they find unfair to women. In exile or at home, women have found that their brothers have advantage that they don't have. The real challenge for women is to create, negotiate and assert their rights in a society (East or West) where men, in particular those with political power, have a vested interest in preserving their privileges and defining women's rights in inequitable social arrangements. Women's own comments in the interviews with me suggest that they generally reject the offers of greater respect or status from Islam or from their culture in favor of as much real choice and control in their lives as they can have and as soon as possible.

If I were to add a concluding statement to my presentation, if I were forced to give you a summary in one or two sentences and answer the question of whether universal human rights for women are a possibility or in fact should be pursued, I would say that these common Ten Siberian cranes fly through Iran each year; while conservationists pay taxes on past contributions to the Institute, which was officially a friend in Iran; Bird Lover Fllows Rare Flock Threatened by Hunting; No precedent allowing the agency to act against a public-interest legal under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code as a tax-exempt

Shahriyar of Turkic works, very different from his earlier Persian works: recommendation of a regional office to revoke the Institute's classification

Azeri grammar; and the diffusion of popular Azeri verse forms. One PREPARING TO MOVE AGAINST INSTITUTE In a related the long run effects of this literary period included: a wider familiarity with organization. The average Federal sanctions order is $4000. If the

The socialist realist imagery). After the reintegration of the region into Iran, largest financial penalty imposed to date on a public- interest law were followed by the denouncement of the formation of the Tudeh Party. the Institute's attempt to appeal the original sanctions order was also socialist realist imagery). After the reintegration of the region into Iran, largest financial penalty imposed to date on a public- interest law poetry described supra. In much of the social realistic works of this Administration. But now the Institute faces additional penalties. In military events related to Soviet Russia. As younger poets of the Poets & classification. The Institute has already paid a $1.2-million punitive be published under Soviet guidance. Soviet writers Samad Vurghun, Suleyman Rustam, M. Rahim, Jalal Khandan, Ghulam Muhammadi and others published on the independence of Azerbaijan and its historical ties with Soviet Azerbaijan. Literary criticism, usually as articals in periodicals or in the form of introductions to monographs, also guided local poets and writers on content and form. The development of Azerbaijan letters (in Arabic script) in Iran was guided by the Soviet-Iranian Society for Cultural Relations: its accomplishments included publishing eleven Azerbaijan letters of decades that had remained unpublished in Iran and the literary journal Shaqaf. The goal of this movement was to 'purify and revitalize' the Azeri language, which in practice meant making it identical to the Baku dialect of Azeri, with its heavy inclusion of Russian language elements (this included replacing French forms of certain European loanwords with Russian forms). The filtering of publications by the editorialship of Soviet men of letters in Tabriz was more hostile to Persian elements in Azeri than to Arabic elements. The poetry produced in this period combined traditional themes with elements of Soviet socialism; gradually Persian elements, so common to the older generation of writers, receded. The major themes in poetry became: (1) 'love of the homeland,' 'the mother tongue', and 'the historical and cultural past of Azerbaijan'; (2) 'Democracy and the the local Democratic Party' and poems to commemorate local events, Soviet holidays and politico-military events related to Soviet Russia. As younger poets of the Poets & Writers Association became more important, older Persian themes faded: some had genuine talent, such as Mohammed Birya, Azaroghil and Ali Tudeh. In the same period, there was a large volume of novels, short stories and press sketches, similar in content and development to poetrydescribed supra. In much of the social realistic works of this period, the historical theme of the condemnation of the previous regime, was followed by the denouncement of the formation of the Tudeh Party. The socialist realist content of the works was consistently reinforced by strict criticism (an example cited calls for presentation of a stronger, more autonomous image for the main woman character, in keeping with socialist realist imagery). After the reintegration of the region into Iran, the long run effects of this literary period included: a wider familiarity with and interest in Azeri history and language; the republication of Azeri classics; the organization of Azeri folk materials; considerable work in Azeri grammar; and the diffusion of popular Azeri verse forms. One measure of the lasting value of this achievement was the works by Shahriyar of Turkic works, very different from his earlier Persian works: this work was published abroad in both Turkey and the USSR. [TXT]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

320
classified as a tax-exempt organization in 1980. Donations to the Institute will continue to be tax-deductible until the IRS takes formal action—not expected until June at the earliest. The Bush Administration began to investigate the Institute last year after a postcard campaign organized by the ‘Arigan’ defendants demanded that the IRS move against the private-interest law center. A group of conservative members of Congress, led by California Republican Bob Dornan, accusing the Institute of “legal terrorism,” also pressured the IRS to strip the organization’s tax-exempt classification. The ‘Arigan’ defendants may attempt to move against the Christic Institute’s bank accounts and office buildings within the next few weeks. “If the Institute is unable to pay the additional $400000 fine, US Marshals will then proceed to seize the Institute’s payroll, office buildings, and computers,” said Sara Nelson, the Institute’s executive director. “If we survive the sanctions, the IRS may attempt to cripple the Institute financially.” “It would be no exaggeration to say that this could be the first time since the anti-communist hysteria of the 1950s that the Government is preparing to use its judicial power to seize the assets and property of a tax-exempt organization founded to defend civil liberties.” warned Ellie Smeal, former president of the National Organization for Women. “The Institute’s record in civil- rights law is beyond reproach, but its exposure of national security crimes went far beyond the Iran-contra scandal and became a threat to the Reagan and Bush Administrations. The government is now putting public-interest law firms everywhere on notice that they face massive penalties if they seek justice for clients abused by government or corporate power.” Officials of other non-profit groups fear the political misuse of judicial sanctions will block future lawsuits against job discrimination, environmental hazards and other threats to the public interest. “The outrageous nature of the sanctions order in this case threatens every public-interest group that seeks to use the judicial system to correct injustice,” Alan Morrison, director of the Public Citizen Litigation Group, wrote in a brief defending the ‘Arigan’ plaintiffs. [–] 22046. Coalition for Democracy in Iran. Iranian Women: Self Immolation As The Only Way Left To Protest. Brochure. Seattle, Wash.: Coalition for Democracy in Iran [c/o PO Box 3935, Seattle, WA 98124-3953]. N.D. [1995?] An Iranian academic woman burned herself to death in Tehran on Monday February 21st. Psychiatrist Homa Darabi, 51, set herself on fire in a northern public center of Tehran, before hundreds of people, passing by, in protest against “the appalling situation of Iranian women”. Dr. Hima Darabi was born in Tehran in 1940. After completion of high school she attended medical school of Tehran University in 1959. She married her colleague Dr. Keyhani in 1963, with whom she came to the US for her continuation studies. She became a pediatric specialist in psychology and went back to Iran in 1978 to serve as a professor of psychology at Tehran University. In 1990 she was dismissed against dress codes and the authorities misconduct and abuses. During her political life she worked with Iran Nation Party, a group of the Iran National Front. Thousands of people turned out to mourn her on Friday the 25th of February at a ceremony at Djawad Mosque in Tehran, despite danger of being persecuted by the authorities. The ongoing human rights violations by the Islamic Republic of Iran which finally put this woman in a situation to resort to self-immolation as her only choice to protest must be stopped. International human rights organizations have constantly condemned these violations. But unfortunately in reality nothing has been done for the people of Iran in general and Iranian women particularly under pressure of religious extremists.

I was born a girl; [The poem ‘I was born a girl’ by Mahvash Qadiri, a woman poet living in Iran, reflects the adolescent resentment that women feel at the discrimination and constraints they endure these days in the Islamic Republic of Iran.]

I was born a girl
so that I’d be given a doll and broom
To sew the hew of men’s shirts with gold lace
And to sweep the dust from the home.
My brother is playing in the street.
He takes off with his bicycle,

And I remain in the corner of the house.
I was born a girl, In the chapter of questions and search
My questions are left unanswered and My search is futile.
My brother, in the winding streets,
By playing with the dirt and pebbles, is experiencing life.
My experience does not pass beyond these walls.
I do not know the streets.
I was born a girl,
So that in the dawn of puberty
(My frightful eyes,
Like the eyes of a restless deer,
Would give away my secret,
My brother didn’t come home tonight,
He is considered a man now.
I was born a girl
So that I’d be the loser in the aftermath of each war
When they make peace,
I’d be the sacrifice.
In war,
The Mongol soldiers and Timur’s attendants
Will make my painful cries echo against the blue dome of the sky
An in peace time
The Amir and his servants will.
After each war
My sisters put on the ugly dress of the prostitutes
And in the tranquility of each peace
They circle around the wine at the lustful feasts of their masters. [–]

22047. Cowell, Alan. “Vatican Rejects Compromise on Abortion at UN Meeting”, in New York Times, September 7, 1994, pp. A1, A6. Cairo, 9/6/1994: An American female representative of the Vatican blocked an abortion plan put forth by Pakistan. The decision was booed by other members of the conference. Even though Al Gore had tried to assure the Vatican that legalized abortion and teenage sexuality would not be considered as human rights in the conference program, the Vatican issued a statement saying that they would not support any type of population control that condoned abortion or gave teenagers sexual rights without parental consent. The Vatican also claimed that Gore had misrepresented the conference’s intentions.

Gore, who heads the American delegation, met with the Archbishop Renato R. Martino to discuss their misunderstandings, but Gore reported later that the Vatican and US would continue to disagree over the issue of abortion at the population conference. The US delegation promoted abortion when it was safe, legal and rare.

The abortion compromise stated that abortion should not be used as family planning, that each nation should be given its own power to legalize it, and that where abortion is legal, it should be safe. The US opposition was put forth by Pakistan. The decision was booed by other members of the conference. Even though Al Gore had tried to assure the Vatican that legalized abortion and teenage sexuality would not be considered as human rights in the conference program, the Vatican issued a statement saying that they would not support any type of population control that condoned abortion or gave teenagers sexual rights without parental consent. The Vatican also claimed that Gore had misrepresented the conference’s intentions.

Gore, who heads the American delegation, met with the Archbishop Renato R. Martino to discuss their misunderstandings, but Gore reported later that the Vatican and US would continue to disagree over the issue of abortion at the population conference. The US delegation promoted abortion when it was safe, legal and rare.

The abortion compromise stated that abortion should not be used as family planning, that each nation should be given its own power to legalize it, and that where abortion is legal, it should be safe. The document is part of a 20-year plan to control population, encourage economic development, and promote women’s rights. The UN and World Bank estimates that the 5.7 billion world population will soon exponentially rise into unmanageable numbers.

Islamic delegates also oppose the conference’s abortion compromise. An Islamic paper, Al Shaab, called the abortion outline amoral by promoting sexual promiscuity. Pakistan Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto earlier called the policy on abortion as unacceptable, but later approved, along with Iran, the language in the compromise. The Vatican hopes other delegations from Latin American countries will also oppose the compromise and call for a new compromise to be drawn-up. The Vatican considers the next topic of discussion, reproductive health, to just be a cover for abortion rights. The Vatican has been able to persuade the conference to accept a compromise concerning teenage sexuality, saying that confidential sex counseling for adolescents should be first approved by parents, and that parental rights come before the rights of teenagers.

Gore reported on 9/7/1994 that there should be no illusion about the Vatican changing its stance on abortion and signing the compromise document. [TXT]

22048. DS. "Europe and Canada: Turkmenistan: Introduction", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Turkmenistan, a one-party state dominated by the President and his closest advisors, made little progress in 1994 in moving from a Soviet-era authoritarian style of government to a democratic system. A national referendum held on 1/15 extended until 2002 the term of office of Saparmurad Niyazov, head of the Communist Party from 1986 to its dissolution and President since 10/1990 when the post was created. The Democratic Party of Turkmenistan, the old Communist Party under a new name, retained its monopoly on power, the Government registered no opposition parties in 1994 and by its actions continued to inhibit opposition political activities. Only government-approved candidates were permitted to contest the 12/11 parliamentary elections, in which all 50 candidates ran unopposed. Emphasizing stability over reform, the President's nationbuilding efforts continued to focus on renewing Turkmen nationalism, a feature of which has been a personality cult around the President. The Committee on National Security (KNB) has the responsibilities formerly held by the Soviet Committee for State Security (KGB), with membership and operations essentially unchanged. The Ministry of Internal Affairs directs the criminal police which works closely with the KNB on matters of national security. These agencies have been responsible for human rights abuses in enforcing the Government's policy of repressing political opposition. Turkmenistan remained a centrally planned economy, although the Government continued to take small steps to reduce state intervention, e.g., by phasing out the state order system. Turkmenistan is the world's fourth largest producer of natural gas and is heavily dependent on revenue from natural gas exports. Payment problems by its major customers in the former Soviet Union have led it to consider construction of new gas pipelines toorthunderneighboring Iran. Agriculture, particularly cotton cultivation, accounts for nearly half of total employment. Turkmen authorities continued severely to restrict political and civil liberties and maintain tight controls over opposition political organizations. They completely controlled the media, censoring all newspapers and rarely permitting criticism of government policy or officials. All trade unions are government controlled. The Government generally gave favored treatment to ethnic Turkmen over minorities and to men over women. [=]

22049. DS. "Iran: Introduction", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. [The United States does not have an embassy in Iran. Accordingly, it draws heavily on non-US Government sources.] The Islamic Republic of Iran was established in 1979 after a Populist revolution toppled the monarchy. The Government is dominated by Shi'a Muslim clergymen and their lay allies. Ayatollah Ali Khamenei is the Leader of the Islamic Revolution and functions as the Chief of State. He is also the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, first elected in a popular vote in 1989, was reelected in 1993. The Constitution, approved in 1980 by popular referendum and revised in 1989, provides for a 270-seat unicameral Islamic Consultative Assembly, or Majles. The Government seeks to ensure that public policy is consistent with its view of political and socioreligious values, but serious factual differences exist within the leadership. The Government reinforces its power by arrests, summary trials and executions, and various forms of intimidation. Several government agencies are responsible for internal security, including the Ministry of Intelligence and Security, the Ministry of Interior, and the Revolutionary Guards, a military force established after the revolution which is coequal with the regular military. These organizations regularly commit such abuses as arbitrary arrests and torture. Iran has a mixed economy. The Government owns the petroleum and utilities industries and the banks. Oil exports are the primary source of foreign exchange. The economy is still recovering from the disruptions of the 1979 revolution and the destruction from the Iran-Iraq war. Iran remains isolated from international financial markets. Economic performance is adversely affected by corruption and government mismanagement. Unemployment in 1994 was estimated at 30%, and the annual rate of inflation was about 60%. The Government continued to be a major abuser of human rights. There was no evidence of improvement in 1994. In March, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (UNHCR) concluded that the Government's continuing abuse of human rights justifies international scrutiny. The United Nations extended for another year the mandate of Reynaldo Galindo Pohl, its Special Representative on Human Rights in Iran. Systematic abuses include arbitrary arrests and detentions, widespread use of torture, lack of fair trials, summary executions, and repression of the freedoms of speech, press, and association. A prominent social critic and historian, Ali Akbar Sadiq-Sirjani, died in detention in November, 10 months after his arrest on improbably criminal charges. The Government claims Sadiq-Sirjani died of a heart attack but did not permit an independent autopsy. The Government failed to provide adequate protection for three Evangelical Christian leakers who were murdered in 1994. Women face legal and social discrimination, important worker rights are restricted, and the Government continues to persecute the adherents of the Bahai faith. There is a lively and open debate on political issues but the ruling clerics effectively control the electoral process, thereby denying the people the right to change their government. The Government conceals its abuses and obstructs the activities of human rights monitors. [=]

22050. DS. "Iran: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution states that 'reputation, life, property (and) dwelling(s)' are protected from trespass except as 'provided by law'. However, security forces enter homes and offices, monitor telephone conversations, and operate email without court authorization. The wife of a dissident reported that, after her husband's arrest in March the Anti-Vice Department of the Revolutionary Prosecutor's office raided her home seized her husband's papers, and sealed the library (see Section 1.a.). Paramilitary volunteer forces known as the Basiji and other security forces monitor the social activities of citizens. Such organizations may harass or arrest women whose clothing does not cover the hair and all of the body except hands and face or those who wear makeup. Enforcement of such standards of public morality varies with the political climate and the jurisdiction. [=]

22051. DS. "Iran: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Iran is ruled by a group of religious leaders and their lay associates who share a belief in the legitimacy of a theocratic state based on Ayatollah Khomeini's interpretation of Shi'a Islam. There is no separation of state and religion. The clerics dominate all branches of government completely. The Government represses any movement seeking to... separate state and religion, or to alter the State's existing theocratic foundation. The selection of candidates is effectively controlled by the ruling clerics, consequently depriving citizens of the right to change their government. Regularly scheduled elections are held for the President, members of Parliament (the Majles), and members of the Assembly of Experts, a body responsible for selecting the successor to the Leader of the Revolution. The Majles exercises a considerable amount of influence over executive branch decision. Debates and laws are reviewed by the Council of Guardians (see below). Vigorous parliamentary debates take place on various issues, and in some cases the Majles has defeated laws proposed by the executive branch. Most deputies are associated with powerful political and religious omisals, but often vote independently and shift from one faction to another. The Constitution provides for a Council of Guardians composed of six Islamic clergymen, and six lay members who review all laws for consistency with Islamic law and the Constitution. The Council also screens political candidates for ideological and religious suitability. It accepts only candidates who support a theocratic state but clerics who disagree with government policies have also been disqualified. Women are under represented in government. They hold 9 out of 270 Majles seats, and there are no female Cabinet members. [=] 22052. DS. "Iran: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There is no known pattern of child abuse. [=] 22053. DS. "Iran: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Discrimination against women has increased since the revolution. On January 31, Mina Kalout was reportedly stoned to death in Evin Prison. Kalout, a married woman, was accused of committing adultery with her cousin, Abdul-Hossein, who was executed for the offense. On 2/22/1994, Homa Darabi, a pedestrian, reportedly immolated herself to protest the Government's discriminatory policies. Prior to her death, Darabi had been dismissed from an academic position for failing to adhere strictly to the Islamic dress code. On March 2, Tahereh Ghane'a a married woman with children, was reportedly stoned to death in Qom for alleged adultery. On May 6, a female student of medicine and women's activist at Beheshti University was found strangled to death. Her arm had been broken, as well. Although the Government claimed the student had committed suicide, 1000 female students staged a sit-in on May 9 to protest what they believed to be her murder. Although domestic violence is known to occur, little is known about its extent. Abuse in the family is considered a private matter and seldom discussed publicly. There are no official statistics on the subject. In general, women suffer discrimination in the legal code particularly in family and property matters. It is difficult for many women, particularly those residing outside large cities, to obtain any legal redress. Although women may be educated and employed in the professions, social constraints tend to inhibit their educational and economic opportunities. Illiteracy and the lack of university degrees also affect their standing. The enforcement of conservative Islamic dress codes has varied considerably since the death of Ayatollah Khomeini in 1989. Nonetheless, such dress codes persist and are arbitrarily enforced. Under legislation passed in 1983, women have the right to divorce, and regulations promulgated in 1984 substantially broadened the grounds on which a woman may seek a divorce. However, a husband is not required to cite a reason for divorcing his wife. In 1986 the Majles passed a 12-article law on marriage and divorce that limited the privileges accorded to men by custom and traditional interpretations of Islamic law. The 1986 law also recognized divorced women's rights to share of the property couples acquire during their marriage and increased alimony Government's views on women's rights were exemplified in 1994 by an open letter to the UN Special Representative from the President's Special Advisor on Women's Affairs, Shailia Habibi. In the letter, Habibi explained that legal restrictions on a woman's freedom to travel—a woman needs permission from a close male relative to obtain a passport are "consensual" because such restrictions 'are designed to preserve the unity and sanctity of the family.' She also accused 'Western emancipation of causing 'corruption, prostitution, Lesbianism, and widespread venereal disease'. [ ] is staged publicly, it is generally because the prisoner has already been forced to confess to a crime. Persons tried by the revolutionary courts (including in drug trafficking cases) enjoy virtually no procedural or substantive safeguards. The accused are often indicted under broad and all-encompassing charges such as immoral corruption, anti-revolutionary behavior," and "siding with global arrogance." Trials lasting 5 minutes and less are common. The right to a defense counsel is theoretically provided for in Iranian law and in the Constitution, but in the revolutionary courts defendants are not known to have access to a lawyer; moreover, they are not able to call witnesses on their behalf or to appeal. Courts have failed to investigate allegations by defendants that they were subjected to torture during pretrial detention. Some persons have been imprisoned beyond the limit of their sentence and even executed after the formal expiration of their prison term. There was again no evidence in 1993 of any judicial reform that would bring Iranian courts into compliance with international standards. The Special Representative noted in his 1/1993 report that a new law on legal representation—which provides that any Muslim is eligible to represent the accused in court does not in fact provide for qualified legal counsel. The judicial system is further weakened by the fact that revolutionary courts may consider cases formally under the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal courts. Assignment of cases to regular rather than revolutionary courts is haphazard and apparently occurs mainly when arrests are made by regular police. Revolutionary courts may also overturn the decisions of the civilian courts. The review authority of the Supreme Court is limited. For common criminal offenses, many elements of the prerevolutionary judicial system survive, and the accused often have the right to a public trial with benefit of lawyers of their own choosing. Even this judiciary is not fully independent, however. Many of the former judges were retired after the revolution, and new judges were selected. One criterion for new judges is grounding in Islamic law; political acceptability is a requirement for any government position. According to the New York based Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, the 1982 Law on Judicial Personnel, which exempts agriculture, domestic service, family businesses, and, to some extent, other small businesses, forbids employment of children under 18. In the education sector, the law effectively bars pupils under 15 from attending school, although there is no official statistics on the subject. In the past, there have been credible reports of the torture and execution of women detainees. Under legislation passed in 1983, women have the right to divorce their husbands, and regulations promulgated in 1984 substantially broadened the number of grounds for which a woman may seek divorce.

A husband may obtain a divorce without stating a reason or going to court. In 12/1992 the Council for the Discernment of Expediency reversed itself and ratified a bill already passed by the Parliament which added somewhat to a divorced woman's right to financial support from her ex-husband. It is not clear yet whether this adjustment has had any impact in practice. [–]

22059. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Iran: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Iranian law includes provisions that prohibit the use of child labor in industry. No information was available on the enforcement of these statutes. [–]

22060. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Iran: Part 21: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. In common with many countries, Iranian labor law, which exempts agriculture, domestic service, family businesses, and, to some extent, other small businesses, forbids the employment of children under 15 years of age (compulsory education extends through (June 11) and places special restrictions on the employment of minors under 18. In addition, women and minors may not be used for hard labor or, in general, for night work. Information on the extent to which these regulations are enforced by the Labor Inspection Department of the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs and the local authorities is not available. [–] independent following a referendum on October 27, 1991. During its first year of independence it became a member of the United Nations and a participating state in the CSCE. Turkmenistan's stated commitment to CSCE principles, laudably reiterated in President Saparmurad Niyazov's public statements during the 1992 Helsinki Summit, was not consistently reflected in its actions. Turkmenistan's record during its initial year in CSCE has been mixed, and in the human dimension, poor. On security matters, for example, Turkmenistan's reports to CSCE missions on its obligations, initiated peaceful relationships with neighboring states, and avoided participation in regional conflicts. In the economic sphere, its transition from a command economy to a free market system moved slowly, but by the end of the reporting period the pace quickened. On the human dimension front, however, no progress was made in the development of democratic processes based on respect for human rights. There is no free press, opposition viewpoints and parties are not tolerated, and elections are one-party affairs. Government in Turkmenistan is not accountable to the people it purports to serve.

Security: Turkmenistan has not yet developed its own independent military structure; its armed forces remain under the command of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) military establishment, with a largely Russian officer corps. Possibly for this reason, Turkmenistan did not provide VD-92 data for 1992. The Government of Turkmenistan signed an agreement with the Russian Federation in 1992 which called for joint control of CIS forces within the territory of Turkmenistan. The agreement also laid the groundwork for the gradual withdrawal of most Russian troops and the conversion of the remainder into a new national army of Turkmenistan. In addition to its cooperation with Russia, Turkmenistan entered into friendship and cooperation agreements with other neighboring states, including fellow CIS members and Iran. Through its membership in the North Atlantic Cooperation Council, it developed contacts with North Atlantic Treaty Organization members, sent military officers to Turkey for training, and had discussions about possible training and other cooperative activities with several NATO countries, including the United States. As a successor state to the USSR, Turkmenistan inherited responsibilities under multilateral security agreements, including the Treaty on Intermediate Nuclear Forces. Generally, it developed responsible security policies and demonstrated adherence to its international and bilateral commitments. Turkmenistan has not used or threatened to use its military forces in any hostile manner, and it has not interfered in the internal affairs of its neighbors. The Government of Turkmenistan offered humanitarian assistance to war-torn Tajikistan, but declined to participate in a peacekeeping force to be drawn from the armed services of other neighboring states.

Economics: The Government of Turkmenistan announced its intention to undertake a ten-year transition period from a command economy to a free market system. Movement toward privatization and the transformation of the legal framework to encourage the development of private business, private land ownership, and foreign investment were slow. The government maintains control of virtually the entire economy, and continues to subsidize some essential goods to cushion the consumer from inflation. Old-style bureaucratic requirements hindered the development of private enterprises, and a slow-to-reform banking system discouraged many potential investors. Nevertheless, progress on the economic front was achieved, and the quickened pace of reform during the latter portion of the reporting period suggests greater commitment to change. New laws concerning economic activity, foreign investment, and banking were passed in 1992. The government also introduced a program of free economic zones to attract foreign investors through tax and other incentives. In 1993, the government announced an agricultural land privatization program which will open up small plots of land to private farmers and make larger plots available for rental and eventual ownership by joint-venture investors. A new presidential decree of January 1993 promises financial credits for aspiring local entrepreneurs and increased government support for the development of private business. Turkmenistan countered its lack of economic and business expertise by seeking advice and assistance from the IMF, the World Bank, and regional development banks as well as the European Community, foreign governments, and international private businesses. While movement overall was slow, the Government of Turkmenistan seems determined to meet its CSCE economic obligations. Turkmenistan has a serious problem of environmental degradation. The life expectancy of its people is among the lowest in the former Soviet Union, and its infant and mother mortality rates are the highest. The government acknowledged the existence of environmental problems, but was slow to develop concrete policies to deal with them. Turkmenistan participates in some international fora on ecological issues (such as the Aral Sea environmental disaster area). These issues are becoming more important in its relations with its neighbors, other countries, and international organizations.

Human Dimension: Turkmenistan made no progress in its transition from a Soviet-era authoritarian style government toward a democratic system during the reporting period. The ruling Democratic Party (the former Communist Party) has a monopoly on power under the leadership of President Saparmurad Niyazov, around whom a cult of personality appears to be developing. The government used laws on the registration of political parties to control the opposition and thwarted attempts by opposition elements to organize. Opposition members were placed under house arrest to prevent them from meeting with visitors to Ashgabat and were prevented from travelling to other CIS countries. The constitution prohibits the formation of political parties based on religion or ethnicity. The 1992 constitution declares Turkmenistan to be a secular democracy in the form of a presidential republic. In practice, however, it remains a one-party state dominated by the president and his closest advisers within the Cabinet of Ministers. Citizens have no real ability to change the government peacefully and have little influence on government policy or decision making. Elections remain, by and large, one-candidate affairs. In the 1992 presidential election, the sole candidate was President Niyazov, who, according to official results, received 99.5% of the vote. The refusal to allow more than one candidate. Freedom of speech is severely restricted in Turkmenistan, and there is no freedom of the press. Radio and television are completely government controlled, and the government censors all newspapers. The views of opposition political elements are not allowed to appear in the local media, and criticism of government policy is permitted only in those areas where the government has already decided to implement reform. Opposition publications have been declared illegal and copies of them confiscated. Turkmenistan largely avoided abuses against the integrity of persons during the reporting period, but did place travel restrictions on political critics. The government failed to issue passports to some persons wishing to participate in international human rights conferences, and has threatened others. The court system has not been reformed from Soviet days, and adherence to due process rights is not uniform, particularly in the lower courts in rural areas. The government gives preference in job advancement and opportunities for international training to males and ethnic Turkmen over females and minority members. [=] mechanism for admitting a refugee when the applicant is among those persons of particular interest to the United States. With respect to persons applying overseas for admission to the United States as refugees, an initial review is performed to evaluate cases based on US national interests, the refugees' situation in temporary asylum, the conditions from which they have fled, and other humanitarian considerations. Applicants who meet the criteria specified above and who fall within the priorities established for the relevant nationality or region, are presented to the INS for determination of eligibility for admission under Section 101(a)(42) of the INA.

(2) The Worldwide Priorities System: The worldwide priorities system sets guidelines for the orderly management of refugee admissions into the United States within the established annual regional ceilings. The issue of whether a person is a refugee under US law, and the priority to which a refugee should be assigned for resettlement are separate and distinct. Assignment to a particular priority does not make that individual either more or less a refugee although it may reflect an assessment of the urgency of the need for resettlement. Indeed, refugees could well be qualified for the resettlement program of another country. Just as qualifying for refugee status does not confer a right to resettlement in the United States, assignment to a particular priority does not entitle a person to acceptance into the United States refugee program. The US refugee priorities system sets guidelines for the orderly management of refugee admissions into the United States within the established annual regional ceilings and is subject to change during the fiscal year.

Refugee Processing Priorities-FY 1993:
Priority One. Compelling concern/interest: exceptional cases of (a) refugees who are in immediate danger of loss of life and for whom there appears to be no alternative to resettlement in the United States, or (b) refugees of compelling concern to the United States such as former or present political prisoners and dissidents.
Priority Two. Former US Government (USG.) employees: refugees employed by the USG. for at least one year prior to the claim for refugee status. This category also includes persons who were not official USG. employees, but who for at least one year were so integrated into USG. offices as to have been in effective and appearance USG. employees.
Priority Three. Family reunification: refugees who are spouses, unmarried sons, unmarried daughters, or parents of persons in the United States. (The status of the anchor relative in the United States must be one of the following: US citizen, lawful permanent resident alien, refugee, asylee or member of certain groups of public interest paroleses).
Priority Four. Other ties to United States: (a) Refugees employed by US foundations, US voluntary agencies or US business firms for at least one year prior to the claim for refugee status; (b) Refugees trained or educated in the United States or abroad under USG. auspices;
Priority Four (Iran and Cuba). In addition to (a) and (b) above: (c) Refugees who have served in positions of leadership or played a conspicuous role within a religious denomination whose members are subjected to discrimination, including the clergy, prominent laymen, those who have served in denominational assemblies, governing bodies or councils; (d) Refugees who because of their minority religious affiliations have been deprived of employment, have been driven from their homes, have had their business confiscated or looted, have been denied educational opportunities available to others similarly situated in the same area, or have been denied pensions that would otherwise be available; and (e) Refugees who have become targets of persecution because of a perceived identification with the United States or the other nations of the West (including Israel).
Priority Four (East Asia). In addition to (a) and (b) above: (f) Persons previously in the civil service or armed forces of the former governments of Indochina who were associated with USG. policies or US-supported programs; (g) Persons who played a meaningful role in the social, economic, political, religious, intellectual, or artistic life of the former societies of Indochina, including such persons as professors, philosophers, monks, or other transmitters of the cultural traditions of these societies.
Priority Five. Additional family reunification: refugees who are: (a) married sons or married daughters of persons in the United States; (b) unmarried siblings of persons in the United States; (c) married siblings of persons in the United States; (d) grandparents of persons in the United States; (e) grandchildren of persons in the United States; or (f) more distantly related individuals who are part of the family group and dependent on the family for support. (The status of the anchor relative in the United States must be one of the following: US citizen, lawful permanent resident alien, refugee, asylee or member of certain groups of public interest paroleses).

Priority Six. Otherwise of special humanitarian concern: other refugees whose admission is in the national interest.

(3) INS Refugee Processing Authority for refugee processing is provided in Section 207 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). The Attorney General has delegated this authority to the Immigration and Naturalization Service to admit any refugee who is not firmly resettled in a third country, who is determined to be of special humanitarian concern, and who is admissible as an immigrant. In both overseas refugee processing and domestic asylum proceedings, INS has the statutory role of decision maker, determining who meets the requirements for refugee status.

INS Overseas Operations: The Immigration and Naturalization Service's overseas offices have a variety of responsibilities administered by three District Offices located in Bangkok, Mexico City, and Rome. The INS overseas office corps currently consists of 21 officers in the Bangkok District, including suboflicies in Manila, Singapore, Seoul, and Hong Kong; ten officers in the Mexico City District, including suboflicies in Monterrey, Guadalajara, Ciudad Juarez, and Tijuana; and 50 officers in the Rome District, including suboflicies in Frankfurt, Vienna, Athens, Moscow, London, Nairobi, and New Delhi. One of the most important responsibilities of INS' overseas program is refugee processing. The percentage of time each office devotes to this activity depends on the refugee workload, as well as the staffing pattern and priorities within the office. The permanent staff are augmented by temporary duty personnel from stateside offices, as needed. Circuit rides to processing posts are arranged by the office having geographic jurisdiction over the post.

Presentation to INS: In general, a refugee applicant proceeds through the following steps before his interview with an INS officer: an applicant is determined to be in need of protection and resettlement by the INS. The USG. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR); he or she is referred to a voluntary agency (VOLAG) or Joint Voluntary Agency (JVA) for pre-screening; if the applicant is of a nationality of special humanitarian concern and within a processing priority eligible for US consideration, the VOLAG or JVA prepares the case for submission to INS by assisting the applicant in filling out a request for refugee status, a biographic information sheet and other documents. Processing priorities are administrative guidelines designed to order the refugee admissions process within the established ceilings. Priorities do not address the quality of an individual's claim to refugee status, but rather are an assessment of the relative degree of US interest in resettling an applicant, made by ranking an applicant's ties to the United States based on factors such as relatives in the United States and prior employment by the US Government or private US firms. Nationalities of special humanitarian concern to the United States are determined annually by the President in consultation with Congress.

The Eligibility Determination: Eligibility for refugee status is determined on an individual, case-by-case basis. A personal interview of the applicant is held by an INS officer. The interview is non-adversarial and is designed to elicit information about the applicant's claim for refugee status. Questions are asked about the reasons for the applicant's departure from his country, his political or religious beliefs/activities, problems he may have had or fears having to do with the authorities in his home country. A determination of well-founded fear of persecution requires judging both objective and subjective elements of an applicant's claim. Conditions in the country of origin are taken into consideration and the applicant's credibility is assessed. Persecution is the most difficult element of the refugee definition to analyze and apply. There is no internationally accepted definition of the term "persecution," but it includes a threat to life or freedom. Discrimination in the treatment of various groups is not, per se, persecution but at times an accumulation of discriminatory measures may involve such significant denials of opportunities to participate in society that it constitutes a threat to freedom. Economic hardship is not itself a basis for eligibility for refugees status but persecution may take the form of economic reprisals, such as denial of the opportunity to work.

Post-Interview Processing: After interview, applicants found eligible for refugee status must have a medical examination and sponsorship assurance. A refugee admission number, subtracted from the annual ceiling, is allocated. Transportation arrangements are made through the International Organization for Migration (IOM) and the refugee signs a travel loan, promising repayment of the cost of airfare. At the US Port of Entry, INS admits a refugee to the United States and authorizes employment. After one year, a refugee is eligible for adjustment of status to lawful permanent resident. Five years after admission, a refugee is eligible for naturalization.

Asylum Issues: Last year, INS implemented new asylum regulations published in FY 1990, which established not only a specialized corps of asylum officers, but an entirely new organizational structure for processing asylum applications. Regional asylum offices were opened at seven sites with a newly-hired corps of 82 Asylum Officers who inherited a backlog of 114000 applications for asylum. During FY 1991, approximately 60000 new applications were submitted; receipts are expected to be even higher in FY 1992. An additional workload burden was imposed by the December 1990 settlement in the case of American Baptist Churches v. Thornburgh. Under the terms of the settlement, INS will provide asylum interviews to 45000 Guatemalans and up to 200000 Salvadorans over the next several years. During much of FY 1992, trained Asylum Officers were detailed to Guantánamo Bay to pre-screen Haitian migrants, leaving some asylum offices with fewer than half of normal staffing levels. Some 68 new Asylum Officers were hired and underwent a four-week training course in March. A total of 150 adjudicating officers and 24 supervisors are now onboard, ready to face the challenges ahead. INS has regional asylum offices in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Newark, Arlington, Miami and Houston, and the asylum program is administered from these seven locations, under the direction of INS Headquarters. The Resource Information Center exists within the Asylum Branch to provide asylum adjudicators with easily accessible information on the human rights situations in refugee producing countries of origin. The Center produces country profile reports as well as periodic "Alerts" on new or evolving situations of direct interest and impact on the work of the Asylum Officers. The Center is located with the main Asylum Office headquartered in Washington, DC, and is linked to it and to each of the seven Asylum Office sites. Section 209 (b) of the INA permits the adjustment of status of persons previously granted asylum in the United States who have been in the United States as refugees for at least one year and who continue to qualify as refugees. The INS intends to adjust to the status to permanent resident alien 10000 persons during FY 1993. [=]

22063. DS. Report To The Congress On Proposed Refugee Admissions For FY 1993 Submitted With The World Refugee Report On Behalf Of The President Of The United States To The Committees On The Judiciary, United States Senate And United States House Of Representatives, In Fulfillment Of The Requirements Of Section 207 (E) (1) - (7) Of The Immigration And Nationality Act: Part 12: Resettlement Needs in FY 1993. Private Sector Initiative. District of Columbia: Department of State, June 30, 1992. The PSI is a joint private and public venture in which the basic costs of admitting and resettling refugees are paid for by the private sector. The program was first approved in June 1988 with a project for the admission of Cuban refugees from third countries proposed by the Cuban American National Foundation. The Cuban program, now administered by the Foundation’s independent office for immigration, the Cuban Exodus Relief Fund (CERF), was renewed for FY 1989, 1990, 1991 and 1992. About 730 privately funded refugees were admitted in 1988, 1500 in 1989, and 3000 in 1990. For FY 1991 and 1992, the Fund proposed that some of the PSI admissions to be admitted receive Federal assistance for part of the cost of their health care. Plans call for the foundation to resettle 1000 privately funded refugees, plus an additional 1000 refugees who would have normally been publicly funded, in return for federal coverage of part of their health care cost. HHS recently approved this proposal. Cuban refugees in third countries admitted through the Private Sector Initiative Program may be processed if they fled Cuba on or before 1/1/1992. Since the program began, three other smaller privately funded sponsorship projects have been approved: one administered by the Catholic Relief Services of North America, for Vietnamese refugees from the Vietnamese Resettlement Association, and for Ethiopian refugees from the Ethiopian Community Development Council. Additional proposals for admitting refugees from the Near East and other regions are under consideration.

[=] 22064. Dabashi, Hamid. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: The Shattering of the Wor(l)d: Part 02. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993. pp. 53-56. The pre-modern history of worlds categorically designated as "Islamic," is the history of a relentless struggle between the theocentric forces of the sacred imagination, sustained by a Biblical (i.e., Qur’anic) metaphysics, and the anthropocentric forces of the poetic imagination, generated by a cosmopolitan multiculturalism that embraces effectively all the cultures of the region, from Arabic and Persian to Indian and Turkish, eastern Mediterranean and northern African. To be sure, subservient forces in the poetic have invariably offered their services to the forces of the sacred to further its claim and authority over "Man." While in the Biblical tradition, Aquinas, al-Ghazali, and Maimonides are the supreme examples of onto-theological logocentrism at the service of he sacred, Dante and Rumi are the prime examples of the poetic at the service of the sacred. The hegemonic power of the sacred was thus fortified by both its appropriated anthropocentrism of "Reason" (‘aqd) and the poetic power of "Imagination" (khayal). That subservience notwithstanding, the anthropocentric imagination in the poetic did manage to claim limited territories for the domain of "Man" as an autonomous entity, however dialogically created in response to the sacred imagination of "God." From Aristotle to Avicenna, a hesitant logocentrism carved a space for the anthropocentric possibility of a vision of reality independent of the sacred. From Aeschylus to Sophocles, Homer, Ferdowsi, Nezami, Abu Nuwas, Khayyam, Abu al-'Ala al-Ma'arri, Sadi and Hafez, the poetic postulated a mode of being (through that moment which Heidegger in Unterwegs zur Sprache called "the shattering of the word") which is anthropocentric in the core of its self-imagination. In the Islamic tradition proper, while Sana'i, Attar, Rumi and Jami subserviently put their poetic imagination at the service of the sacred, Ferdowsi, Nezami, Khayyam, Sadi and Hafez managed with nothing more than a lip service to the sacred, and shattered the word for a poetic possibility of being autonomous and independent of the sacred. This poetic imagination is the key anti-metaphysical-counter-intelligibility to the Biblical transcendentalism in which—whether monotheocentric in "Islamic Law" (Shari'ah ) or logocentricized in Islamic Philosophy (Falsafah) or theo-eroticized in Islamic Mysticism (Tasawwuf)—"Man" is de-historicized and essentialized.

Despite the alternative anthropocentric spaces that the anti-logocentric poetic created for a non-sacred possibility of being, the "Man" thus conceived was as abstract and essentialized as "God" of the theocentric imagination. This abstract essentialized, de-historicized "Man" could only be conceived as the dialogical counter-intelligibility of a "God" who was, as a matter of doctrinal and creedal conviction, supremely abstract, essentialized, pre- and supra-historical. If we follow the Heideggerian lead, more recently re-articulated by Vattimo, in considering language as the inaugurating event for all subsequent questioning/answering of being, then the apposition between the theocentric language of the sacred and the anthropocentric language of the poetic assumes fictional historical significance. Equally significant is Vattimo’s adaptation of Rorty’s call for a sort of cultural anthropology into which collapses the Heideggerian hermeneutics. The first step towards that anthropological hermeneutics, which is also the first step away from the Biblical "Man" and towards "the historical person," is the full, operative recognition of the historical thrown-ness of the Heideggerian Dasein.

"(Wo)man" as a historical person could not have been born until much later in history. In European history, the Reformation, the Renaissance, and ultimately the French Revolution were birth channels of "(Wo)man," as a historical person. In The Order of Things, Foucault carefully traced the historical formation of "man" as an epistemic category through the so-called "human sciences." Not long after the French Revolution of 1789, a group of five Iranian students travelled across Europe and went to England early in the 19th century. They were sent by Abbas Mirza, a reformed-minded Qajar prince, to learn the technological achievements of Europeans so that they could help the Qajars remedy their miserable defeat at the hands of the superior Russian army. While four of these five students learned what they could about the new military marvels at the heart of the colonial power, one of them, Mirza Saleh Shirazi, kept a long, sustained, and insightful diary in which he recorded his observations while in Europe. The travelogue of Mirza Saleh Shirazi must be considered a turning point in the course of Iranian political culture. In a simplified Persian prose, Mirza Saleh reported of the French Revolution, of the rule of law in England, of parliamentary democracy, of universal suffrage, of mandatory elementary education, and of much more. When here turned to Iran, he brought with him the first printing press, and with it published the first newspaper in Iran. Mirza Saleh Shirazi's Safarnameh must thus be considered a turning point in the historical reconfiguration of the Iranian political culture, a turning point through which was delivered the first sign of "(wo)man" as a historical person.

The movement that thus started ultimately concluded with the gradual formation of a potent political ideology that by the early twentieth century led to the Constitutional Revolution in Iran. The ultimate result of the Constitutional Revolution in the Iranian political culture was the birth of Iran as a "nation." The conception of a "nation-state" rested on the political necessity of "The People" (mellat, mardom, etc.) as the most potent political rhetoric of the period. It is in the bosom of "Iran" as a "nation-state" that "The People" as a necessary political community comes to life. Both in the ideological and the institutional rhetorics of the Constitutional Revolution, which expanded from the eighteenth to the twentieth century, "Iran" was born as a "nation-state," and with it the idea of "The People" as the first historical categorization of a political community. This individuation of "Iran" as apolitical category was the result of a number of factors that one may categorize in the two internal and external machinations that Vattimo, following Rorty, postulates for cultural anthropology. That is to say, the construction of a cultural "Other" (which was "The West" in the case of Iran, as indeed in the case of much of the so-called "East") and the individuation of essentialized and de-historicized categories (which again in the case of Iran and much of the so-called "Middle East" were such categories as Ummah, Muslims, or even more specifically Ajams or the Shi'ites). Neither "man" nor "woman" can be either the essentialized, metaphysical counterpart of "God," nor the metaphysical object of the "human sciences." As historical persons ("person," as in Latin persona and Etruscan phersu, both meaning "mask;" or alternatively as in the Arabic shakhs, from Shakhasa, "He rose, or became raised, or was distinguished, or individuated").

"Man" was born in and through the poetry of Forough Farrokhzad. Thus in the relentlessly anthropocentric imagination of the poetic, and from Nima the father and Forough the mother, the historical and existential Iranian "man" and "woman" were born very recently in our shared memory. [~]

22065. Dabashi, Hamid. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: The Shattering of the Wor(l)d: Part 03. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993, pp. 56-58. It is only by virtue of these successive generations of events that today we can talk about a potential juxtaposition of Islamic theocracy, human rights and women in Iran, or any other post-Islamic society.

That process inevitably continues. The very recent birth of "broad and white" as a historical person, barely begun in Iran, is a further existentialization of "the individual." We have just begun to face the powerful formation of the idea that not all individuals are men, that women constitute a distinct, historically denied and suppressed, constellation of sensibilities, aspirations, hopes, fears, and anxieties.

Thus permanently under (re)construction as historical persons, neither "man" nor "woman" can be either the essentialized, metaphysical counterpart of "God," nor the metaphysical object of the "human sciences." As historical persons ("person," as in Latin persona and Etruscan phersu, both meaning "mask;" or alternatively as in the Arabic shakhs, from Shakhasa, "He rose, or became raised, or was distinguished, or individuated"). The individuation of "man" and "woman" thus, ipso facto, yields to material forces that continue to shape and form them, (re)define and (re)inform them. As we have gathered here today, asking the question of "Theocracy, Human Rights and Women," we are these "man" and "woman" in this very specific sense.

If we follow this history, this genealogy of our question, we already find ourselves in the middle of our answer. What has been the impact of the "Islamic Revolution" on this long historical process? Not much. These are historical gains; they were not easily occupied or easily lost. Reza Shah or Muhammad Reza Shah did not give them to Iranians so that Khomeini or his successors can take them back. The birth of "the people," "the individual," the historical "man" and the historical "woman" are all irreversible. Historical "men" and "women" massively participated in the revolution on all sides, Islamic and other.
But in the meantime the world outside Iran is changing. If we are to believe Heidegger, the song of Being has just begun. If we are to believe Foucault, "man" is already, or about to be, dead. The post-modern imagination has already suspended and superseded the primacy of reason and progress. The deconstructionist imagination has laid bare the mere linguisticity of all--sacred, rational, or poetic--acts of signification. The historical unfolding of existential being seems to have moved beyond "The People," beyond "the individual"--beyond this insult to the Turk's long quest to find "woman" and reached deep into the abyss of what Derrida and Spivak consider a bottomless pit, the pitch darkness of an absence of any act of signification, where nothing signifies, nothing means, nothing matters, nothing is. Can the Iranian experience be separated and isolated from these vanguard events in the world of ideas? I seriously doubt it.

In the mean time life goes on. In Iran there has been a theocratic revolution. The state apparatus rests on an ideology that rules with the sacred certitude of having the same Abstract, Essentialized and pre- and post-historical "God" on its side. We lack any autonomous secular institution that can protect the rights of the individual--man or woman--vis-a-vis a massive state bureaucracy. All the potential alternatives to the Islamic Republic, whether monarchical, nationalistic, Marxist, or equally religious, oppose the government on its own terms, without the slightest inking as to their programs for the formation of a civil society, democratic institutions, secular and independent of the state apparatus.

But the next revolution, ladies and gentlemen, as the last one, will not be fought in the streets. The cultural revolutions always precede the political ones. Political revolutions always linger, by a measure of decades and centuries, behind the cultural transmutations that take much longer to incubate until they crack their shell. In historical scales, the poetry of Simin Behbahani and the fictions of Shahrnoush Parsipour and Moniru Ravanipour are infinitely more important for the self-re-configuration of "woman" in contemporary Iran than the entire state apparatus of the Islamic Republic. The next battle, as the last, will be fought on the pages of books, screens of personal computers, flickering images of cinema and television. What precisely the configuration and the out come of that battle will no one knows. But this much is clear: If Madonna and Michael Jackson tapes are readily available in Tehran, and I am told they are, then much more than that is equally available. The world has irreversibly shrunk to a village. What happens in the bigger tents reverberates throughout the smaller ones. The future of Iran is not separable from the future of the world of ideas that surround us all: ideas that proclaimed the death of God, and that now proclaim the death of man; ideas that anchor all acts of understanding to all acts of being; ideas that completed by a bed, but in the Orient divans are used instead of beds.

One might have imagined oneself in the room of any Parisian Lady if the furniture had been separable from the future of the world of ideas that surround us all; ideas marble mantelpiece with a pillared clock upon it. One might have imagined oneself in the room of any Parisian Lady if the furniture had been separable from the future of the world of ideas? I seriously doubt it. Nothing is. Can the Iranian experience be separated and isolated from coarsest insults only end in the triumph of one or the other in the opinion of the bystanders. But, as the Pasha looked on with astonishment, my companions, who had, at first, done nothing but laugh at the man's mistake, explained that I was a Frank. I only mention this scene to show the fanaticism which still exists among the lower classes which, though it has considerably calmed down so far as Europeans are concerned, is always strong between the different seers. Moreover, it is very much the same with the Christians: a Roman Catholic would rather have a Turk than a Greek. The Pasha was highly amused, and began to chat with the painter. We re-embarked after these refreshments, at the same time as himself, and as our boats had to pass before the Sultan's summer palace, which is on the Asiatic side, he gave us leave to visit it.

This summer seraglio, which should not be confused with the other, on the European side, is the most delightful residence in the world. Great gardens, laid out in terraces, reach right to the top of the mountain, from which Scutari can be clearly seen on the right, and, in the far distance, the bluish silhouette of the Bithynian Olympus. The palace is built in the eighteenth-century style. Before we went in, we had to change our boots for slippers which we were lent then we were taken to see the apartments of the Sultanas, then, of course, unoccupied. The lower rooms are built upon piles, most of which are of precious woods. We were even told of aloes wood piles, which are better able to resist the decay which the seawater produces. When we had visited the huge rooms on the ground-floor which nobody lives in, we were taken to the apartments. In the middle was a great hall, out of which opened twenty or so smaller rooms with separate doors, like those in the galleries of a bath-house. We were allowed to go into all the rooms, each of which was furnished with a divan, a few chairs, a mahogany chest of drawers, and a marble mantelpiece with a pillar ed clock upon it. One might have imagined oneself in the room of any Parisian Lady if the furniture had been completed by a bed, but in the Orient divans are used instead of beds. Each of these rooms was that of a cadine. I was struck by their symmetry and perfect uniformity; and was told that the most absolute equality reigns among the Sultan's ladies. The painter gave me the following example: Then His Highness orders boxes of sweets, usually from a French confectioner at Peræ, they have to be made up of sweets exactly alike. One comfit too many, one sugar-plum of a peculiar shape; too many pastilles or too few lozenges, and there would be serious complications in the relations between these beautiful creatures. Like all other Musulmans, whoever they may be, they are believers in strict equality. In the principal room a musical clock was made to play for us. It played several airs from the Italian operas. Mechanical birds, singing nightingales, peacocks spreading their tails, added to the attraction on this little masterpiece. On the second floor were the quarters of the odaleur, who are divided into singing and serving women. Higher still were the rooms of the slaves. In the harem there is the sam order as in a well-kept boarding-house. The oldest established of the cadines has authority over to others, but she is always subject to the Sultana-Mother whom, from time to time, she must go and consult at the old seraglio in Stamboul. So much I learned of the interior-arrangements of the seraglio.

In the meantime life goes on. In Iran there has been a theocratic revolution. The state apparatus rests on an ideology that rules with the sacred certitude of having the same Abstract, Essentialized and pre- and post-historical "God" on its side. We lack any autonomous secular institution that can protect the rights of the individual--man or woman--vis-a-vis a massive state bureaucracy. All the potential alternatives to the Islamic Republic, whether monarchical, nationalistic, Marxist, or equally religious, oppose the government on its own terms, without the slightest inking as to their programs for the formation of a civil society, democratic institutions, secular and independent of the state apparatus. But the next revolution, ladies and gentlemen, as the last one, will not be fought in the streets. The cultural revolutions always precede the political ones. Political revolutions always linger, by a measure of decades and centuries, behind the cultural transmutations that take much longer to incubate until they crack their shell. In historical scales, the poetry of Simin Behbahani and the fictions of Shahrnoush Parsipour and Moniru Ravanipour are infinitely more important for the self-re-configuration of "woman" in contemporary Iran than the entire state apparatus of the Islamic Republic. The next battle, as the last, will be fought on the pages of books, screens of personal computers, flickering images of cinema and television. What precisely the configuration and the out come of that battle will no one knows. But this much is clear: If Madonna and Michael Jackson tapes are readily available in Tehran, and I am told they are, then much more than that is equally available. The world has irreversibly shrunk to a village. What happens in the bigger tents reverberates throughout the smaller ones. The future of Iran is not separable from the future of the world of ideas that surround us all; ideas that proclaimed the death of God, and that now proclaim the death of man; ideas that anchor all acts of understanding to all acts of being; ideas that suspect reason and progress with the same intensity that deconstruct the naive assumption that what one says is what one means, or that one means what one intends, or that one intends what one imagines. In the equality reigns among the Sultan's ladies. The painter gave me the following example: Then His Highness orders boxes of sweets, usually from a French confectioner at Peræ, they have to be made up of sweets exactly alike. One comfit too many, one sugar-plum of a peculiar shape; too many pastilles or too few lozenges, and there would be serious complications in the relations between these beautiful creatures. Like all other Musulmans, whoever they may be, they are believers in strict equality. In the principal room a musical clock was made to play for us. It played several airs from the Italian operas. Mechanical birds, singing nightingales, peacocks spreading their tails, added to the attraction on this little masterpiece. On the second floor were the quarters of the odaleur, who are divided into singing and serving women. Higher still were the rooms of the slaves. In the harem there is the sam order as in a well-kept boarding-house. The oldest established of the cadines has authority over to others, but she is always subject to the Sultana-Mother whom, from time to time, she must go and consult at the old seraglio in Stamboul. So much I learned of the interior-arrangements of the seraglio.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

329
was the case with the Franks in the Middle Ages.

It would seem that the Sultan, for his part, is ready to help forward the repopulation of the Turkish Empire, judging by the number of births of princes and princesses which are made known to the city by the booming of cannon and the illuminations of Stamboul. We were shown the cellars, kitchens, reception rooms and concert hall. Everywhere things are arranged so that the women can take part, without being seen, in all the amusements designed for those who are invited by the Sultan. There are raised boxes everywhere which, like tribunes, look out upon the rooms, so that the ladies of the harem can, in spirit, associate themselves with matters of politics or with pleasure.

We admired the bath-room, which was made of marble, and the private mosque of the palace. When we were taken out through a peristyle which leads to the gardens. It is adorned by columns, and closed in by a conservatory with arbutus-trees, and plants and flowers from India. So Constantinople, which is cold, because of its mountainous position and the frequent storms which come from the Black Sea, has its hothouses for tropical plants, just as we do in our more northern lands. We went round the gardens again, and were taken into a pavilion, where we were served with fruit from the garden, and conserves. The Pasha invited us to this feast, but himself ate nothing, for the moon of Ramadan had not yet risen. We were quite overwhelmed by his politeness, and somewhat embarrassed, because we had no way of showing our gratitude except in words. "You will be able to say," he said, in reply to our thanks, "that you have eaten a meal with the Sultan. Without making too much of the honour of so kind a reception, one may at least see in it much goodness of heart, and that absence of religious prejudice which is now almost complete in Turkey. [4]

22067. Deo, Veena. "Review Essays: Celebrating the Emergence of Iranian Women Writers From Behind The Veil: Farzaneh Milani", in Journal of Critical Studies of Iran & the Middle East, Fall 1993. pp. 88-93. Milani's "Veils and Words" (1992) provides an important overview of the emergence of women writers in Iran. Milani draws upon Western feminist literary criticism in the examination of the relationship between movements to unveil women and the efforts of women to become published writers. The veil has historically been used mainly to regulate attitudes and relations between men and women in societies; the veil solidifies separate world for men and women within society, imposing silence between men and women in both textuality and sexuality.

22068. Engram, Sara. "The Vatican's Campaign Against Population Control", in Seattle Times, September 2, 1994. p. B7. In mid-1993 world population was 5.5 billion and growing by 90 million per year. As the world's nations prepare to meet at the UN Population Conference (UN International Conference on Population & Development) and draft a commitment to slow population growth, mainly by increasing the power of women to determine their family size, the Vatican remains rejectionist. The Vatican continues to oppose abortion and contraception. The Vatican's alliance with Islamic groups (including Iran) has been widely criticized. The Vatican has a minority opinion and it should be denounced by the world community.

22069. Eritreans for Liberation in North America. "Eritrea: The Revolution Surges Forward -The Current Situation", in Eritrea Liberation (Eritreans For Liberation in North America), March-April 1976. Since 2/1975 tremendeous changes and progress have been made in the Eritrean struggle against Ethiopian colonialism. US imperialism and Israeli Zionism. In the following few pages we can only attempt to give a glimpse of what is done and what is being done at this present time. The present ongoing battles show that a new chapter has been opened in the Eritrean struggle. A qualitative change has taken place. The balance of forces between the occupation army and the Eritrean revolutionary army has basically and decisively changed in favor of the revolutionary army. The enemy is receiving humiliating defeat every day. The revolutionary army has changed its tactics from that of a guerilla warfare into that of predominantly mobile. Mass mobilization is leading towards complete participation of all Eritrean patriotic forces in the struggle. The liberation army has liberated practically the entire countryside and some fairly large towns. We find, at this time, entire provinces completely liberated. Now the Ethiopian troops are concentrated inside fortified camps in large towns. But these fortifications have not prevented the liberation forces from constantly attacking, constantly harassing, and terrorizing and demoralizing the enemy troops. The fascist occupation army is finding it increasingly impossible to get out of its forts and the towns, and when they do, it is driven back to its forts. The Ethiopian navy is also rendered incapable of doing anything. The naval base is in disarray. The only way the Ethiopian occupation force is able to function is through its planes. Ethiopian planes have made their target anything that has life and that moves. They are brutally bombing villages and napalm all crops. But the Eritrean fighters and people have vowed to silence these planes and add them to the number of planes already downed. Though the criminal activities of the fascist forces weigh very heavily on the Eritrean people, the people, undaunted and disregarding all the horrors of war, are working hand and glove with the fighters, and despite the enemy and show their defiance by continuing their productive activity. For all practical purposes the Ethiopian fascist junta has lost the war. The might of the Eritrean people is coming out victorious every day. But a colonizer or an oppressor never realizes its defeat and never gives up until physically thrown out or completely demolished.

Instead, it persists in committing senseless crimes and continuing its aggression and war of genocide. So does Ethiopia. Even though Ethiopian colonialism continues to suffer heavy human and material losses, has lost the entire countryside and, with its troops unwilling to fight any more, cannot defend even its fortified camps, it still goes on begging its imperialist and Zionist masters for more military aid. These masters, the enemies of all justice and progress loving peoples of the world, and who never learn from experience, deliver more destructive weapons either directly or indirectly through their puppets the Shah and his like. But isn't this a too familiar picture? Haven't we witnessed the same in Vietnam and Cambodia? National unity is one of the main factors for the success of the Eritrean revolution. This is well understood by all patriotic Eritreans. Thus national unity is demanded by the Eritrean masses; democratic forces within the ELF want it and the EPLF has always taken a principled and correct stand on it. Moves towards the unity of the two fronts—the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Forces (EPLF) and the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF), are one of the most important items in the Eritrean struggle today. Since the civil war between ELF-revolutionary council and EPLF stopped at the end of 1974, many important steps have been taken towards genuine unity, though other steps have also been taken to frustrate this unity. While the forces of progress are pushing for a principled unity, the forces of reaction are pushing for a sham unity; a unity, which in the long run will result in disorder and in consequences far more worse. At this time revolutionary and brave fighters from both fronts are daily meeting to discuss various issues. By drawing a common program, they are fighting against the Ethiopian fascist junta and reaping joint victories, thus laying the ground for further cooperation and creating favorable conditions for principled unity of the fighters and the people. In addition, two committees whose members are elected by the fighters of both fronts have begun working together, moving around to meet with fighters of both fronts and the people to discuss unity and the correct steps to be taken for a principled unity. Great successes are being recorded by these two committees. While these are among the positive developments of the revolution, there has also been a negative aspect obstructing the moves toward genuine unity. Under the guise of uniting the Eritrean masses, the rightist elements have attempted to consolidate their unity first—a unity of reactionarions and opportunists. These parasites by exploiting the genuine sentiment of the people for unity, are trying to mislead and trap the people into an exploitative and oppressive system.

But these elements are being isolated while progressive and democratic forces are clearly winning dominance. The vanguard of the Eritrean revolution, the EPLF, in its special declaration of 1/1976, makes it clear that one of its highest priorities is unity and firmly states that a unity that is not based on the politicization and full participation of the Eritrean people and fighters is no unity. "Whatever is tried, whatever is done, principled unity of the people or fighters will reach its correct conclusion through the ideological and practical struggles undertaken by the people and fighters according to concrete situations. No reactionary force can stop this historic course. All attempts taken to frustrate the will of the (Eritrean) people and fighters by the oppressor classes and opportunist groups will fail. The EPLF declares that “the success of the Eritrean revolution and the guarantee for its continuation is the participation of conscious masses; hence to raise the consciousness of the masses and to organize them is one of the things that we tirelessly work.” The result is, in a very short time, the EPLF have been able to organize thousands and thousands of people, and help them raise their consciousness and realize their role in the revolution. Now, we find different classes and sections of Eritrean society - workers, peasants, students, women, etc. organized in a democratic way. Women participation in the fronts has tremendously increased. The number of women fighters has hit the thousand mark. Women are involved in all aspects of the revolution in the Press and Information section, medical section, in the front lines fighting etc. Extensive road building is being undertaken by the EPLF. In the last six months, hundreds of miles of roads have been built. The engineering section of the EPLF is busy building new roads and maintaining old ones. Transportation of goods and people by camel alone is increasingly becoming a thing of the past. Big trucks and Land Rovers—captured from the enemy—are in wide use now. In the past when the fronts were on the defensive, they had to destroy all the strategic bridges and important roads. Now that the liberation army is on the offensive, it is building new roads while controlling the ones that the enemy might attempt to use. At the same time a good use is made of the abandoned old roads built by the Italians. All of these roads are being effectively maintained by the EPLF engineering section. At present, a good number of medical doctors, "bare foot" doctors and nurses are found in the rank of the fighters. This has enabled thousands of peasants to get medical attention - an attention they never got before under the colonial regimes. Various surgeries are now performed in the field. Two big hospitals with 300 beds each, six smaller ones and several clinics have been set up in the liberated and semi-liberated areas. It is very seldom that sick or wounded EPLF fighters are now sent outside of Eritrea for medical treatment. It is to be remembered that all the hospitals in the towns under the control of the occupation army has been turned into military hospitals and serve only the wounded and dying Ethiopian troops. Thus, even the people in the areas under the control of the Ethiopian occupation troops depend on the liberation army for medical treatment. Though such is the case, with the number of diseases prevalent in Eritrea, there is always chronic shortages of medicine, and lack of sufficient medical equipment has hindered the doctors from exploiting their skill to the utmost. The EPLF, the vanguard, has created a new section—Trade and Retail Section—which is in charge of coordinating mainly the supplies and markets in the liberated areas. The liberation army has declared a total economic embargo against the towns under the control of the occupation army. The peasants have stopped going to these towns to sell their products. To meet the demands of the peasants, markets are created in the liberated and semi-liberated areas, thus bringing exploitation through trade to a good end. The EPLF provides peasants with their basic needs and buys all their products when necessary. A recent visitor to one of the EPLF markets recounts thus: “The EPLF has introduced in its markets the ratio card. This avoids peasants with more money buying more than others. The family’s size determines the quantity to be supplied. The exchange is simple barter in most cases. . . . If a peasant needs something but cannot pay for it EPLF helps him by other means, but not through the market. The peasants are well organized, they know the market rules and respect them. . . . ‘our (an EPLF fighter speaks) markets have started very recently; they are a new stage in our revolution. . . . by means of these markets, we control the prices and avoid the inflation that is found in the cities under the Ethiopian control.’” The Eritrean struggle is now surging forward towards final victory. The contradiction between the Eritrean people on the one hand, and the Ethiopian fascist junta, its supporters of many colors, and its masters, US imperialism and Israeli Zionism on the other, is ever sharper. At this stage, it is important for all progressive and democratic forces to closely follow and give active support for the Eritrean revolution. [↩]

22070. Evans, Kathy. "Women's Rights To Fore in Iran Poll", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, May 25, 1997, p. 5. The status and rights of women have emerged as a major issue in Iran on the eve of national elections. Last week, without explanation, the Council of Guardians rejected nine female candidates for public office. Since the Iranian revolution 18 years ago, women have been working behind the scenes to gain a greater role in governance. In recent months, women have become deputy minister, a district mayor in Tehran and a senior diplomat overseas. Now Iranian feminists are determined to gain a greater role in politics: the conservative candidate Nateq Nouri has clearly lost the woman vote.

22071. Fallahi, Mitra. Foundations Of Education In Iran And Education After The Cultural Revolution Of 1980. Marquette University. Dissertation, 218pp. AAC 9325676. [Advisor: Dupuis, Adrian; Marlaire, Courtney] The government of Iran changed from a monarchy to an Islamic republic after the Revolution of 1979. In the spring of 1980, the regime closed the universities for a Cultural Revolution. The goal of the Cultural Revolution was to redefine and redesign the educational system, which was a duplication of western education, and adapt it to the culture and politics of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Upon the closure of the universities, Ayatollah Khomeini assigned a Council to review the educational system and propose a new program adaptable to the philosophy, culture, and religious foundations of Iran. This study reviewed the role of educational institutions in the uprising and the victory of revolution in 1979 and the reasons why the universities were closed during the Cultural Revolution. This research also reviews the proposal submitted by the Council for the Cultural Revolution. Historical methodology has been utilized for this study. A variety of literature including books, journals, government documents, and dissertations were reviewed. Some literature has been translated from Farsi by the researcher. Also, the researcher's background, as having been educated and an educator in Iran, has added an ethnographic dimension to the study. The findings of the study suggest that the regime of the Islamic Republic has been, successful in certain areas such as: (1) promotion of seminars, conferences, and symposiums, (2) promotion of extracurricular activities, and (3) expansion of universities, majors, or programs within the universities. However, the weaknesses of the educational system are in areas like: (1) the education of ethnic minorities, (2) the role of women in education; (3) teacher education programs, (4) dropout rate/literacy, (5) shortage of human power, (6) credentialism, and (7) expansion of schools and school facilities. The regime has not been able to overcome these shortages mainly due to the weak economy which is a result of eight years the war with Iraq. Among the suggestions for improvement of the educational system are: (1) to allow the private sector to get involved and invest in education, and (2) to use the media to promote education and to make the people aware of the benefits of education. A brief outline of the research will give you a better understanding of the subjects discussed. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [↩] mainstays of their political campaign. [pp. 118-120]

Ferraro's campaign staff included (at the advise of consultants Maxine Isaacs and Anne Wexler), former Carter aide Pat Bario, Charles Atkins from the Platform Committee as deputy campaign manager; Steve Engelberg handled domestic policy; Madeleine Albright handled foreign policy (professor at the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University and a National Security Council staffer during the Carter Administration); [pp. 17-119] (when both were House Majority Whip Tom Foley and Patrick Muyihaen of the Senate Intelligence Committee attend, just as Mondale was briefed by James Schlesinger, former CIA director, and Amb. Max Kampelman, later to become Reagan's chief arms control negotiator [pp. 138-139]); Samuel (Sandy) Berger, former speech writer for Cyrus Vance, beacomm speechwriter; Addie Guttag became fundraiser; and Kate Schaeffer became trip director. [p. 155]

Ferraro became the vice presidential choice largely because of her opposition to Palestinian human rights (which she notes correctly is the mainstream of the Democratic Party); by contrast, Jesse Jackson's support. [p.64] Ferraro's strong support for Zionism placed her in a critical role in discrediting Arab-Americans and Jesse Jackson for their support of Palestinian human rights. One crisis came as Jackson sought to have the head of the American-Arab Anti-Defamation Committee testify on his views before the platform committee. The Jewish community, especially in New York, was furious that the platform committee would allow Arab-Americans to have input into the political process. The confrontation was defused when Jackson advisor Dr. Ronald Walters, at Howard University, scheduled the Jews and Arab-Americans in separate rooms at the same time, since the Jews refused to testify in the presence of Arabs. In Los Angeles, Ferraro would defuse Hispanic anger at legislation that would target them as possible illegal aliens: she met with them and managed to erase their concerns from serious discussion as part of the platform development process, dismissing the concerns of Hispanic Democrats such as Sal Alvarez as irrelevant (since his pleas for protection of Hispanic civil rights 'had driven me crazy'). [pp. 83-84] Ferraro notes that Jesse Jackson's advocacy of Palestinian rights was frankly anti-semitic; when Reagan criticized the Democrats as being anti-semitic during a speech at a Long Island synagogue, the lack of specific platform plank denouncing anti-semitism became a major political liability, especially since Jesse Jackson had not been expelled from the party. Jewish leaders were demanding that the Mondale campaign guarantee that Palestinian rights would never be part of the policies of a Mondale Administration. Ferraro speaking at Temple Kehilath Jeshurun in New York on 10/29/1984, denounced Reagan for stating the Democrats were 'soft on anti-Semitism' and stated that in fact Reagan was soft on anti-semitism; she denounced Reagan for citing the Holocaust as a justification for sending the Marines to Lebanon, and instead insisted that the Democrats were the true exponents of the lessons of the Holocaust. [p. 284] Ferraro notes that a massacre did occur at Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps (expressing her surprise at discovering that refugees can be poor, in an aside, 'which held in Doctor Siddiqui's memory, the first in London last November and the second in Tehran in August. It is clear that his absence is greatly felt.' [pp. 125-128] Ferraro notes that on a speech on 11/2/1984, she spoke on 'the tragedy in Ethiopia'. [p. 292] [TXT] 22074. Friedl, Erika; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Part 11: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Dynamics of Women's Sphere of Action in Rural Iran. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 195-214. Shifts in gender roles in Iran in recent decades has been complex, contradictory, and included even relatively isolated rural areas. The common good could be enforced only from a position of overlapping making any "gender role norm" almost meaningless. Such contradictions allow one to either describe women as "downdropped beings without much of a face or a voice" or "powerful personages to be reckoned with in the domestic and political sphere". Rural women have much freedom, but it rests on the fragile basis of circumstantial, largely economic, necessity, and takes place within a milieu of a traditional "patriarchal feature set", which allows for limited "women's identity formation". Little of the recent shift in gender policy in Iran should be attributable to the Islamic Republic: two decades of 'modernization' had prepared the basis for the marginalization of women. Economic development has largely empowered men, just as sedentarization of nomadic groups has more constrained the mobility of women that of men. Modernization of housing (e.g., with private baths) has reduced traditional extra-kinship gatherings of women (at bath-houses). As single-family homes replace larger family homes, the range of normal kinship interaction is reduced. In recent years women have lost access to sources of power that they were once assured of: this is a product of socioeconomic modernization that erased contingent freedoms for women that were "not embedded in a gender-equalitarian ideology." 22075. Gani, Saadia; Kalla, Sumayya; Shakoor, Fatima A. World Conference Pays Glowing Tribute to the Late Doctor Kalim Siddiqui, in Crescent International, April 16-30, 1997. pp. 1 and 11. Glowing tributes were paid to the late Doctor Kalim Siddiqui at the international memorial conference held in Pretoria, South Africa from 3/28-30/1997. Among the conference participants were colleagues and friends from around the world, as well as thousands of admirers of the late Islamic scholar and activist. Coinciding with the first anniversary of his death, the conference was marked by an air of nostalgia about the life and work of Doctor Siddiqui. However, there also prevailed a strong sense of optimism about the future of the Ummah despite the immense suffering of Muslims at the hands of the west and its puppet regimes in the Muslim world. It was fitting that the conference should take place in Pretoria because it was here that Doctor Siddiqui passed away shortly after attending a similar conference last year, organized by the "Crescent International. He had visited South Africa on numerous occasions in the past two decades, his first visit dating back to 1975. He was very fond of South Africa and often referred to it as his "second home." Two previous conferences have been held in Doctor Siddiqui's memory, the first in London last November and the second in Tehran in August. It is clear that his absence is greatly felt worldwide. The recent conference theme, "The Muslim World: Towards a New Destiny," was based on one of Doctor Siddiqui's earliest books, published soon after attending the International Muslim Youth Conference in Tripoli, Libya in 1973. It was there that he met a number of young Muslim activists from South Africa, among them Ismail Kalla, with whom he struck a lifelong friendship in the service of the Global Islamic Movement. As has now become customary, this year's conference also included a massacre did occur at Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps (expressing her surprise at discovering that refugees can be poor, in an aside, 'which held in Doctor Siddiqui's memory, the first in London last November and the second in Tehran in August. It is clear that his absence is greatly felt.’ [pp. 125-128] Ferraro notes that on a speech on 11/2/1984, she spoke on 'the tragedy in Ethiopia’. [p. 292] [TXT] 22074. Friedl, Erika; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Setting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 11: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Dynamics of Women's Sphere of Action in Rural Iran. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 195-214. Shifts in gender roles in Iran in recent decades has been complex, contradictory, and included even relatively isolated rural areas. The common good could be enforced only from a position of overlapping making any "gender role norm" almost meaningless. Such contradictions allow one to either describe women as "downdropped beings without much of a face or a voice" or "powerful personages to be reckoned with in the domestic and political sphere". Rural women have much freedom, but it rests on the fragile basis of circumstantial, largely economic, necessity, and takes place within a milieu of a traditional "patriarchal feature set", which allows for limited "women's identity formation". Little of the recent shift in gender policy in Iran should be attributable to the Islamic Republic: two decades of 'modernization' had prepared the basis for the marginalization of women. Economic development has largely empowered men, just as sedentarization of nomadic groups has more constrained the mobility of women that of men. Modernization of housing (e.g., with private baths) has reduced traditional extra-kinship gatherings of women (at bath-houses). As single-family homes replace larger family homes, the range of normal kinship interaction is reduced. In recent years women have lost access to sources of power that they were once assured of: this is a product of socioeconomic modernization that erased contingent freedoms for women that were "not embedded in a gender-equalitarian ideology." 22075. Gani, Saadia; Kalla, Sumayya; Shakoor, Fatima A. World Conference Pays Glowing Tribute to the Late Doctor Kalim Siddiqui, in Crescent International, April 16-30, 1997. pp. 1 and 11. Glowing tributes were paid to the late Doctor Kalim Siddiqui at the international memorial conference held in Pretoria, South Africa from 3/28-30/1997. Among the conference participants were colleagues and friends from around the world, as well as thousands of admirers of the late Islamic scholar and activist. Coinciding with the first anniversary of his death, the conference was marked by an air of nostalgia about the life and work of Doctor Siddiqui. However, there also prevailed a strong sense of optimism about the future of the Ummah despite the immense suffering of Muslims at the hands of the west and its puppet regimes in the Muslim world. It was fitting that the conference should take place in Pretoria because it was here that Doctor Siddiqui passed away shortly after attending a similar conference last year, organized by the "Crescent International. He had visited South Africa on numerous occasions in the past two decades, his first visit dating back to 1975. He was very fond of South Africa and often referred to it as his "second home.” Two previous conferences have been held in Doctor Siddiqui's memory, the first in London last November and the second in Tehran in August. It is clear that his absence is greatly felt worldwide. The recent conference theme, "The Muslim World: Towards a New Destiny," was based on one of Doctor Siddiqui's earliest books, published soon after attending the International Muslim Youth Conference in Tripoli, Libya in 1973. It was there that he met a number of young Muslim activists from South Africa, among them Ismail Kalla, with whom he struck a lifelong friendship in the service of the Global Islamic Movement. As has now become customary, this year's conference also included a massacre did occur at Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps (expressing her surprise at discovering that refugees can be poor, in an aside, 'which held in Doctor Siddiqui's memory, the first in London last November and the second in Tehran in August. It is clear that his absence is greatly felt.’ [pp. 125-128] Ferraro notes that on a speech on 11/2/1984, she spoke on 'the tragedy in Ethiopia’.
message who had repeatedly stressed that "Islam is incomplete without the Islamic State," which represents as the authority bestowed by Allah upon His faithful servants. The participants were formally welcomed by Ismail Kalla, the conference chairman, who paid tribute to Doctor Kalim Siddiqui and his intellectual contribution and dynamism. Throughout the day, other speakers—Doctor Ghayasuddin Siddiqui, leader of the Muslim Parliament of Great Britain, and Zafar Bangash, editor of the "Crescent International,"—highlighted numerous aspects of his active and fruitful life. Zafar Bangash narrated the circumstances in which Doctor Siddiqui grew up and the events that led to the realization that Muslim regimes were incapable of defending Muslims or Islam. He concluded that Muslims needed an intellectual revolution before change could be affected in Muslim societies. This led in 1973 to the establishment of the Muslims Institute for Research and Planning in London which has acted as the intellectual engine for Muslim Political Thought over the last twenty-five years. The first day's final session was captivated by Imam al-Asi's tremendous exposition of the political thought of Doctor Siddiqui.

The result was an overall impression of the late scholar/political activist as a giant figure in the history of the Global Islamic Movement whose intellectual energy forged a vision that will guide the Ummah in the realization of its new destiny, insha’Allah. Doctor Siddiqui was a leading exponent of the idea of the Global Islamic Movement. His last book, "Stages of Islamic Revolution," was published just before his death. He himself called it his final will and testament. In it, he outlined the processes through which change can be brought about in Muslim societies. A compilation of his works, "In Pursuit of the Power of Islam," was also published last year, edited by Zafar Bangash.

The second day of the conference was dedicated to women's issues. This in itself was a paradigm shift from previous conferences, where at most, a workshop was devoted to such discussion. A number of qualified and motivated sisters addressed the conference and left a very strong impression on the participants with their clear and incisive analyses. A wide range of issues were discussed, providing a platform for the political and social upliftment of Muslim women. Sister Merve Safa Kavakci, head of international relations and Women's Affairs of the Reffah Party, outlined the activist position of Muslim women in Turkey. She shared many innovative strategies for mobilizing women in the Islamic Movement. Another theme strongly conveyed by Sister Waheeda Kassim, "Crescent International's" representative in South Africa, Shaikh Saadullah Khan of the Islamic College of South Africa and Lubna Siddiqui and Faiza Siddiqui, both of the Muslim Women's Institute in London, was the inherent sense of respect and dignity conferred on Muslim women by Islam fourteen hundred years ago. It was pointed out that nowhere in the Qur'an is it categorically stated that men are superior to women. The parity between men and women, Islam ensures was contrasted with the unnatural attempts by western women in their frantic resolve to attain absolute similarity with men. This has led to all kinds of skewed relationships and problems. A living example of the strength and endurance of Muslim women in the Islamic Movement was encapsulated by Zafar Bangash. He rendered a moving account of the heavy contribution of Sister Seyyeda Asiya Andabi of the Dukhtar-e-Millat in Kashmir. She has spearheaded the movement rendering yeoman service to the widows and orphans in Kashmir. The sister's organization has also resolved to resist the indignity inflicted by Indian soldiers and the process of Indianization of Muslim culture in the State.

A unique contribution to the conference was the heart-rendering account of Professor Mohamed Shishani, head of the International Congress of Chechens. His testimony on the struggle for the supremacy of Islam in Chechnya (Ichkeria) was an inspiring revelation of the sacrifices of the Chechen muslims. Not only were they committed and united under the banner of Islam but also unshaken in their confidence that Allah subhanahu wata'ala will crown their efforts and sacrifices with victory. The mercy of Allah manifested itself with the healing balm of victory on 8/31/1996 when the Russians were forced to sign a peace treaty agreeing to pull all their troops out of Ichkeria. The Chechens are a remarkable story of human perseverance and jihad. With a total population of barely one million, four hundred thousand of whom became refugees, they fought the two million-strong Russian army. While the Russians were massively armed, the Chechens had only light weapons. What they lacked in weapons, however, they more than made for with the strength of iman. After a two hundred-year-long struggle, they won a great victory but found that their entire country had been virtually destroyed. The infrastructure would cost an estimated $150 billion to rebuild. The "Crescent International" immediately launched a Chechen Relief Fund to help with medicines and rehabilitation in Ichkeria. Other speakers included Mohamed Sabu, PAS member of parliament from Malaysia, Doctor Perwez Shafi from the "Crescent International" office in Pakistan, Iqbal Siddiqui, research fellow at the Muslim Institute London, Doctor Feizal Kalla of Lenasia, Doctor Anwar Hoosen of the Islamic Medical Association and Sister Ayesha Khan of Johannesburg. To once again revive the memory of Doctor Kalim Siddiqui, Ayatullah Amid Zanjani, head of a research institute in Tehran and member of the Majlis in Iran, made a surprise visit on the last day of the conference. Ayatullah Zanjani, a long-time friend of Doctor Siddiqui, paid rich tribute to the late Islamic scholar.

This was appropriately followed by the revolutionary stance of Imam al-Asi in his critical evaluation of the Hajj, Haramain and Al-Quds in the crucible of history. He meticulously exposed the corruption of the House of Saud and highlighted the Qur'anic commandments of the true meaning of Hajj. He urged the assembled participants to work for the liberation of the Haramain. He expressed the view that visa restrictions imposed by the Saudi regime not only subverted the Hajj experience but also the essential role of the Global Islamic Movement. The closing address by Zafar Bangash constituted a brilliant follow-up to Imam al-Asi by confirming the fallacy of the world's self-declared supremacy. He gave a factual outline of the moral and social decline which contains the seeds of the world's eventual self-destruction. The myth of its invincibility was effectively demolished by the end of his address, leaving the Muslim Ummah with a sense of reassurance as it set out to face the challenges ahead. In a touching moment, Doctor Kalim's son, Iqbal, read the statement of his mother, Suraiya Siddiqui. She thanked the conference participants for remembering and honoring her late husband. She also emphasized the importance of continuing his work. The Conference Declaration presented by Sister Waheeda Kassim then achieved a sudden sense of urgency as it posited the reassertion of Islam as the dominant force for the establishment of social justice in the world. This will be achieved by transforming the present crop of nation-States into Islamic States through the process of the Islamic Revolution. The Muslims of South Africa also expressed their commitment to promote the work and vision of Doctor Kalim Siddiqui. The conference similarly drew inspiration from the living example of the Chechen's struggle. It concluded with calling upon the South African Muslim community to define and address its problems living in a minority situation in the transforming social and political climate of South Africa. Ismail Kalla, the conference chairman, delivered the final word of thanks before it concluded with a moving dua by Imam al-Asi. [-]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

(1) Decides to consolidate the role of the Committee on Information as its main subsidiary body mandated to make recommendations relating to the work of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat;

(2) Calls upon the Secretary-General, in respect of United Nations public information policies and activities, to implement the following recommendations in accordance with relevant United Nations resolutions and in the light of General Assembly decision 47/469 of 5/6/1993 and General Assembly resolution 47/199 of 12/22/1992:

(a) Continues to disseminate information about the activities of the United Nations in coordination with the information services of other relevant agencies in accordance with the United Nations medium-term plan, the programme budget and their relevant revisions, pertaining, inter alia, to: (i) International peace and security; (ii) Disarmament; (iii) Peace-keeping operations and peacemaking; (iv) Decolonization and the situation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the International Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism; (v) The promotion and protection of human rights and in that context the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993; (vi) The elimination of all forms of racial discrimination; (vii) The advancement of the status of women and their role in society; (viii) The promotion of the Convention on the Rights of the Child; (ix) Problems of economic and social development, as well as international economic cooperation aimed at resolving external debt problems; (x) The least developed countries; (xi) The environment and development; (xii) The elimination of foreign occupation; (xiii) The campaign against terrorism in all its forms in accordance with General Assembly resolution 40/61 of 12/3/1985; (xiv) International efforts against drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking; (xv) Crime prevention and criminal justice; (xvi) Support for the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s and for the tremendous efforts of the African countries aimed at recovery and development, as well as the positive response by the international community to alleviate the serious economic situation prevailing in Africa; (xvii) International efforts towards the total eradication of apartheid and support for the establishment of a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa and, where necessary, the role of the United Nations in this context; (xviii) United Nations activities pertaining to the situation in the Middle East and the question of Palestine in particular, also including current developments in that region and the ongoing peace process; (b) Provides the necessary level of information support for the activities of the United Nations in situations requiring immediate and special response; (c) Continues its efforts at promoting an informed understanding of the work and purposes of the United Nations system among the peoples of the world and at strengthening the positive image of the system as a whole; (d) Continues its briefings, assistance and orientation programmes for broadcasters, journalists and other media professionals from developing countries focused on United Nations-related issues; (e) Provides, on the basis of its activities, information to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization about new forms of cooperation, at the regional and subregional levels, for the training of media professionals and for the improvement of the information and communication infrastructures of developing countries; (f) Continues its policies of cooperation with all agencies of the United Nations system, in particular with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; (g) Continues its policies of cooperation with the news agencies in and of the developing countries, in particular the News Agencies Pool of Non-Aligned Countries.

(3) Welcomes the decision by the Department of Public Information to establish a task force to look into the allocation of office space to the media at United Nations Headquarters;

(4) Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General regarding the continuous and major publications of the Department of Public Information and urges all efforts to ensure timely production and dissemination of its major publications, in particular the UN Chronicle, the Yearbook of the United Nations and Africa Recovery, maintaining consistent editorial independence and accuracy, taking necessary measures to ensure that its output contains adequate, objective and equitable information about issues before the Organization, reflecting divergent opinions wherever they occur;

(5) Expresses regret at the circumstances leading to the discontinuation of Development Forum, and encourages the Secretary-General to suggest ways and means to revive this publication, which has continued to receive a mandate of the General Assembly, and to report thereon to the Committee on Information;

(6) Requests the management of the Department of Public Information to review the Department’s publications and proposals for publications to ensure that all publications fulfill an identifiable need, that they do not duplicate other publications inside or outside the United Nations system, and that they are produced in a cost-effective manner, and to report to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth substantive session;

(7) Reaffirms the importance attached by Member States to the role of United Nations information centres in effectively and comprehensively disseminating information about United Nations activities and the optimization of the resources allocated to the Department of Public Information;

(8) Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth session for the purpose of evaluating the need for any subsequent integration, the results of the current trial of integrating eighteen United Nations information centres with field offices of the United Nations Development Programme, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General, as well as the views of the host countries, bearing in mind the concerns of Member States that the integration of the United Nations information centres with the United Nations offices could adversely affect their functions in the developing countries;

(9) Reaffirms the role of the General Assembly in relation to the opening of new United Nations information centres and invites the Secretary-General, as well, to make such recommendations as he may judge necessary regarding the establishment and location of these centres;

(10) Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that his proposals relating to the structure, functions and activities of the seven United Nations interim offices in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Ukraine and Uzbekistan fully comply with the mandates of the relevant General Assembly resolutions pertaining to operational activities and dissemination of information, taking into account the observations and recommendations in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, General Assembly decision 47/469 of 5/6/1993 and relevant General Assembly resolutions, especially resolution 47/199 of 12/22/1992;

(11) Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General regarding the allocation of resources to the United Nations information centres in 1992 and would appreciate information on the status of the relevant General Assembly resolutions as well as a detailed breakdown of resource deployment between centres and, while welcoming the action by some Governments with regard to the financial and material support for United Nations information centres in their respective capitals, calls upon the Secretary-General to study ways and means to rationalize and effect equitable disbursement of available resources to all United Nations information centres and to report thereon to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth substantive session;

(12) Notes the substantial contribution by the Government of Poland and requests the Secretary-General to continue to consult with the Polish authorities, with a view to finalizing arrangements for a United Nations information component at Warsaw;

(13) Also takes note of the report of the Secretary-General regarding the enhancing, reactivation and establishment of United Nations information centres and again calls upon the Secretary-General to implement fully and expeditiously the recommendation contained in paragraph 10 of its resolution 47/73 B of 12/14/1992 regarding the establishment of an information centre at Sana’a; the reactivation of the information centre at Tehran; the enhancement of the information centres at Bujumbura; Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania; and Dhaka; and to submit the implementation report to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth substantive session;

(14) Calls upon the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the aforementioned recommendation to the sixteenth session of the Committee on Information;

(15) Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General and encourages continued enhanced cooperation between the Department of Public Information and the University for Peace in Costa Rica as a focal point for promoting United Nations activities and disseminating United Nations information materials;

(16) Takes note of the requests by Bulgaria, Gabon, Haiti and Slovakia for information components;

(17) Expresses full support to the wide and prompt coverage of United Nations activities through a continuation of United Nations press releases;

(18) Calls upon the Secretary-General to enhance the efficiency of regional radio units in the Department of Public Information;

(19) Also calls upon the Secretary-General to make every effort to create conditions more conducive to achieving parity in the press coverage of meetings in English and French by appropriate utilization of existing equipment;

(20) Takes note of the recommendations and observations by Member States contained in the report of the Secretary-General and invites Member States that wish to do so to submit their observations and suggestions to the Secretary-General by 1/1/1994, on ways and means of furthering the development of communication infrastructures and capabilities in developing countries, with a view to consolidating recent experience in the field of international cooperation aimed at enabling them to develop their own information and communication capacities freely and independently, and requests the Secretary-General to report thereon to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth session;

(21) Recommends, in order to facilitate continued contact between the Department of Public Information and the Committee on Information between sessions, that the Bureau of the Committee on Information, together with representatives of each regional group, the Group of Seventy-seven and China, in close contact with representatives of the Department, should meet, as required, and consult at periodic intervals with representatives of the Department;

(22) Supports decision 5 of the Preparatory Committee for the World Summit for Social Development, requesting the Secretary-General to develop and launch, on a priority basis, in cooperation with relevant specialized agencies, funds and programmes, a specific programme of public information on the core issues of the Summit as well as on its objectives;

(23) Also supports the decision of the Preparatory Committee for the International Conference on Population and Development, to be held at Cairo in 1994, requesting the Secretary-General, in cooperation with competent United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, to develop and launch, on a priority basis, a coordinated public information programme;

(24) Takes note of the request by Belarus and Ukraine to consider the development and implementation of a system-wide programme for the tenth anniversary in 1996 of the Chernobyl disaster;

(25) Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Committee on Information at its sixteenth session in 1994 and to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session in 1994, on the activities of the Department of Public Information and on the implementation of the recommendations contained in the present resolution;

(26) Decides that the next session of the Committee on Information should last twelve working days and invites the Bureau of the Committee to explore ways and means of making optimum use of the Committee's time;

(27) Requests the Committee on Information to report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session;

(28) Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-ninth session the item entitled Questions relating to information. [-]

In 9/1982, the Islamic Parliament sanctioned The Bill of Retribution as Iran's new criminal law. The bill, which includes a series of bloody punishments, was another surprising shock to Iranians. The law is based on patriarchal relationships which date back to pre-Islamic tribal Arabia, 14 centuries ago. In the case of murder, the bill permits retaliation against a murderer by the murdered person's guardian, traditionally a man.

Article 33 of the bill denies a woman's ability to serve as a witness in the case of premeditated murder. Willful murder "...is proved only on the basis of two righteous men's testimony." This means that if an intentional murder occurs in the presence of hundreds or thousands of women, but no men, it cannot be proven. In the case of non-willful or unintentional murder, two women may testify as one voice only if accompanied by one man's testimony.

The bill also includes provisions for blood-money—money paid to the murdered person's guardian for the loss of that person's life. Blood-money translates into the economic value of someone's life in terms of her/his social and economic position in society. It is the price paid for murdering another human being. Behind the bill is the reasoning that only men have an economic role in society and are the only source of a family's income; women are considered consumers. In the end, a male killer ends up with a higher status than a female victim.

If a man murders a woman, her guardian has the choice of carrying out the retaliation, or demanding the woman's blood-money from the murderer and letting him go free. But, if the guardian of the murdered woman forgives the killer, he can receive the woman's blood-money. If the guardian retaliates and the killer is killed, the guardian has to pay the killer's family one half of his blood-money. Not surprisingly, if a woman kills a man, she is executed.

To legalise the Bill of Retribution in Iran, the regime has converted Iranian courts into Islamic tribunals, and mullahs [members of the clergy] are appointed to rule the courts. In cases where non-mullahs are judges, they are supposed to have Islamic knowledge and education to the level of a Mojtahed [religious leader].

How these courts determine the amount of blood-money has not been mentioned in the bill or any other official document. What is certain is that the law is being forcefully executed in the courts and blood-money is taken and given. This means that women living in Iran in the 20th century have been sentenced to the legal status they held in the Middle Ages.

...surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [-]

22077. Gol-Mohammadi, Fereshteh; Peoples Translation Service

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

335

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

[trans.], "Women Inside and Out: Blood Money: Iran", in Connexions, An International Women's Quarterly, n. 14, Fall 1984, p. 9. [This article was written for Connexions by Fereshteh Gol-Mohammadi, 8/1984.]
case is referred to the Shah. If the Shah approves of the view of the Legislative Assembly he will endorse the subject. But if he does not, the case will have to be kept in abeyance for a period of six months before it can be taken up again. Any of the Articles of the Constitution or the Supplement thereto, which defies the above procedure shall be considered as revoked.

A third amendment to the the Constitution was made in 1957 by the Joint Congress of the two Houses of Parliament, extending the term of the Majlis from two years to four years. The number of deputies was also altered:

"The total number of deputies for Tehran and the provinces shall be 200. After ten years, in case of an increase in the population, as shown by official census figures, there shall be one additional deputy for each Constituency to represent 100000 individuals. The Constituencies shall be determined by a separate law."

"The term of the Majlis is four complete years and this applies to the 19th Majlis as well. Before the expiry of its term, new elections shall be held in accordance with the provisions of the Law."

The Constitution was amended a fourth time on 9/9/1967 designating the Shahbanu, mother of the Crown Prince, as the Regent if upon the transfer of the Throne the Crown Prince should not have reached twenty years of age. Please see Articles 38, 41 and 42 of the Supplement to the Constitution. [=]

Article 36 (as amended 12/12/1925): The Constitutional Monarchy of Iran is vested by the people through the Constituent Assembly in the person of His Imperial Majesty Reza Shah Pahlavi and his male descendants in succession.

Article 37 (as amended 12/12/1925): The (right of) succession to the Throne shall rest with the eldest son of the Monarch, whose mother must be of Iranian origin. If the Monarch has no male child, the nomination of the Crown Prince shall be made at the suggestion of the Monarch and with the approval of the National Consultative Assembly, on condition that this Crown Prince shall not be a member of the Qajar family; but at any time, if a son is born to the Monarch, he shall be Crown Prince by right.

Article 38 (as amended 9/9/1967): In the event of the transfer of the Throne, the Crown Prince shall personally perform the functions of Monarch when he has reached 20 years of age (to be calculated on the basis of the solar year). If he has not reached that age, the Shahbanu, mother of the Crown Prince, shall assume the Regency, unless another person shall have been designated by the Monarch for that office. The Regent shall form a Council composed of the Prime Minister, the Heads of both Houses of Parliament, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and four other sagacious, reputable personalities of the country to be selected by the Regent, and (the Regent) shall, in accordance with the Constitution, assume the duties of Monarch in consultation with the Council until (such time as) the Crown Prince reaches the age of 20. In the event of the demise or resignation of the Regent, the Council shall temporarily carry out the duties of the Regency until another Regent—not a member of the Qajar family—is appointed by the Houses of Parliament. Remarriage by the Shahbanu Regent shall constitute resignation (from Regency.)

Article 39: No Monarch may ascend the Throne unless, prior to his coronation, he appears before the National Consultative Assembly, and in the presence of the members of the Assembly, the Senate and the Cabinet, he shall have taken the following oath:

"I call upon God Almighty as witness, and I swear upon the Glorious Word of God (the Qur-an) and upon all that is ascribed to God to exert all my efforts to preserve the independence of Iran, to protect the frontiers of the country and the rights of the nation to be the guardian of the Constitutional Law of Iran and to reign accordingly and in conformity with established laws, and to endeavor to promote the Ja'fari doctrine of the (Shi'ah) sect of Twelve Imams, and in all my deeds and actions, I shall remember God, Most Glorious, as being present and watchful, and shall have no aim but the happiness and greatness of the State and the Nation of Iran. And I seek the aid of God, whose help is begged (by all) to serve the progress of Iran with success, and I seek the help the Holy Spirits of the Great Saints of Islam."

Article 40: Likewise, no one chosen as Regent may assume his functions until he has taken the above oath.

Article 41 (as amended 9/9/1967): In the event of the demise of the Monarch, the provisions of Article 38 shall be complied with. In such an event and also in the event of the transfer of the Throne, if a Regent shall not have been designated in the manner prescribed in the said Article, the Houses of Parliament, in special joint session, shall appoint a Regent who shall not be a member of the Qajar family. Until a Regent is appointed, a committee composed of the Prime Minister, the Heads of the two Houses of Parliament the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and three former Prime Ministers or former Heads of Parliament (to be selected by the Council of Ministers) shall temporarily perform the functions of Regency.

The Regent, who in accordance with this Article or Article 38 takes over the functions of the Regency, shall also have to take the oath as prescribed in Article 39.

Whosoever assumes the office of Regent shall be forbidden to ascend to the Throne.

Article 42 (as amended 9/9/1967): Whenever appointment of a Regent by the Houses of Parliament is required, a Joint session of Parliament shall convene within 10 days (after such an appointment becomes necessary)

In the event that the term of one or both Houses shall have expired or new members shall not have been elected, the joint session of Parliament shall convene with the presence of the former members.

In the event of the dissolution of one or both Houses of Parliament the functions of the Regency shall be performed by the Committee as prescribed in Article 41.

The Monarch may, when travelling abroad, appoint a Regency Council or a Regent who, in consultation with the Council, shall temporarily perform the duties of the Monarch during his absence.

Article 43: The King cannot take charge of another country without the consent and approval of the National Consultative Assembly and the Senate.

Article 44: The Monarch is free of responsibility. The Ministers of State are responsible for all matters to both Chambers.

Article 45: All decrees and rescripts of the Monarch relating to the affairs of the country shall be put into effect only when they have been signed by the Minister who is responsible for the correctness of the contents of the decree and rescript.

Article 46: The Ministers are appointed and dismissed by the decree of the Monarch.

Article 47: It is the prerogative of the Monarch to confer military ranks, decorations and other honorary awards in conformity with the law.

Article 48: The nomination of the heads of Government departments, for home or foreign service is the Monarch's right with the approval of the responsible Minister, except where the law provides otherwise. However, the nomination of other officials is not a concern of the Monarch, except as expressly provided for by the law.

Article 49 (as amended on 5/16/1957): It is one of the rights of the Monarch to issue decrees and give orders for the enforcement of laws, without ever having the power to delay or postpone their enforcement. If His Imperial Majesty the Shah finds a revision necessary in the laws relating to the financial affairs of the country which is the prerogative of the National Consultative Assembly, he may send such laws back to the Assembly for re-examination. In case the National Consultative Assembly confirms its previous view by a majority vote of three-fourths of the members present in the Capital. His Imperial Majesty shall sign the law.

Article 50: The Commander-in-Chief of all the land and sea forces is the Monarch in person.

Article 51: The declaration of war and the conclusion of peace are functions of the Monarch.

Article 52: Treaties the secrecy of which is essential as provided by Article 24 of the Constitutional Law of 12/30/1906, must, as soon as the reasons which necessitated such secrecy cease to exist, and interests and security of the country allow, be brought by the Monarch to the notice of the National Consultative Assembly and the Senate with all necessary explanations.

Article 53: The secret clauses of a treaty may not nullify those made public.

Article 54: The Monarch may order an extraordinary meeting of the National Consultative Assembly and the Senate.

Article 55: Money shall be coined in the name of the Monarch, in conformity with the law.

Article 56: The costs and expenses of the Royal Court shall be determined by law.

Article 57: The prerogatives and powers of the Monarch are only those expressly mentioned in this Constitutional Law. [=]

22080. Gururdke, Rasit. “An Islamic Revolution Unlikely In Azerbaijan: Fundamentalists Reopen Mosques, Start Up Schools,” in Seattle Times, February 6, 1994, p. A15. An Islamic revolution in Azerbaijan seems unlikely, despite the efforts of Iranian and Turkish fundamentalists there. Iran is actively promoting Shiasm, spending $50-100 million in religious newspapers, associations, charities and scholarships; Iran has funded the Islamic Party of Azerbaijan; and is financing a planned religious TV station. While Turkey is secular, the Turks activists in Azerbaijan tend to be Sunni fundamentalists. While Islamic fundamentalists have emerged for as a powerful faction in Tajikistan (even if not in power), in Azerbaijan, fundamentalism has made few inroads. Haji Salman, deputy of the Caucasian Muslims Administration stated that after 70 years of atheism reviving Islam would be difficult. There are now 500 mosques in Azerbaijan, but segregation of men and women at prayer is not practiced (as in Iran). One heritage of Soviet rule is that women reject Iranian style roles. [TXT]

22081. Halle, Fanina. Women in the Soviet East: Part 15: The Dawn of a New Era: October and the Question of Nationalities. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1938. Lenin's designation of Tsarist Russia, with its countless oppressed nationalities, as "the great prison of the peoples" was not inapt. Tsarist policy towards the conquered colonial peoples, or those who had been incorporated in the empire without actual conquest, the "alien races," was a policy of exploiting such natural riches as were most easy of access, a policy of the most wide-scale robbery of the land and the soil, of the most ruthless "clearing of the country of the native savages," in short, a policy of annihilation. In order to be able to colonize the land with reliable Russian elements, the Tsarist Government expropriated over a hundred million acres of the best land of the Kirghiz Kazakhs alone and drove them into the deserts of what is now Central Kazakhstan. These, and similar governmental methods, were repeated against the Cherkesses, Bashkirs, Uariat Mongols, Kalmucks, and other peoples. Practically nothing was done to develop the annexed territories economically and culturally. The cotton of Turkistan was all manufactured in the mills of Central Russia; the hunting tribes of Northern Asia, who supplied the whole Russian fur trade, still used bows and arrows, and in many districts people still used the most ancient and primitive agricultural implements. Little wonder, then, that a Russian writer, Pissemksiy, who had the opportunity in 1885 to become well acquainted with the lives of the Kalmucks on the Caspian Steppes, observes in his diary that, compared with a Kalmuck, the Russian peasant lived like a prince. The same might have been said without hesitation of the other colonial peoples of the Russian Empire. As regards the cultural policy of the Tsarist Empire, it was confined to this inhuman exclusion of the alien peoples from anything like culture and education, a mockery of all historical progress. There was not a single university among them, no secondary schools in their native language, no national cultural institutes, but all the more illiterates (in many districts as many as 100%), sombre superstition, horrifying lack of hygiene, serious illnesses and pestilences. The hatred between the several nationalities was systematically fomented. Thus the instructions to the President of the Orenburg Commission contains the following brazen command: “If the Bashkirs or Kirghiz show an inclination to rebel, they are to be played off against one another, and the Russian army spared.” In consequence of this Tsarist colonial policy, many peoples were destroyed and many were in process of dying out when the Revolution broke out. With the fall of Tsarism in 2/1917, a new chapter begins in the history of Russia’s national minorities. The economic, political, social and cultural rule of the alien peoples, the “step-children and wards of the Great Russian State,” were roused by the spreading vibrations of the great earthquake that had overturned the Tsar’s throne. But Kerenski’s February Revolution failed to make use of their new mood. The protagonists of the middle-class, democratic revolution had no programme for the alien nationalities, no key to this most burning problem of the tottering empire, in which only about 52% of the population was GREAT RUSSIAN, and so belonged to the dominating race. It is true that they were the heirs of Tsarism, but in spite of empty phrases about self-determination and cultural autonomy they were not disinclined to continue the policy of their predecessors with, perhaps, less despotic methods. But meanwhile the days of the middle-class revolution were numbered, even in Central Russia. Within a few months the discontent of the war-weak masses, clamouring for a radical revolution, grew under Bolshevism to an irresistible force, and found natural allies in the intellectual leaders of the oppressed nationalities, from whom the February Revolution withheld the longed-for liberation, and had, moreover, no guarantee of a better future to offer. And so the non-Russian peoples underwent a constant process of radicalization in the months from February to October. “The most retrograde of the retrograde were forced to seek allies in the revolutionary class,” writes a historian of the new Russia. “And so the left wing elements in their youthful intelligentsia paved the way to Bolshevism for the Voltaiks, Chuvashes, and Syryenians and the peoples of Dagesthan and Turkey.” Unlike the February Revolutionaries, the Bolsheviks whom the rising revolutionary wave in October bore aloft and made the arbiters of Russia’s destiny, had a ready-made plan for the solution of the nationality problem.

Like all the principles which guided the proceedings of the Party before and after its accession to power, the validity of this formula is associated with Lenin’s name. In his book, Who are the People’s Friends? Lenin had traced the essential lines as early as 1894 along which the solution of the minority problem in the territories of the former Tsarist Empire was later to be achieved. Conscious of the importance of the problem, the October Revolution lost no time in realizing its leader’s programme, for only by its solution could the goodwill and aid of the non-Russian peoples be assured to the country that had gone red overnight. It was a programme calculated to throw everything into the shade that had hitherto been achieved in this matter, by its boldness and its consistency. For Lenin is ruthlessly radical in his nationality programme, as in everything else. Avoiding all half-measures from the first, he proclaims the necessity of self-determination, political and economic, of all peoples, including the right to secede and form independent states; mere cultural equality he opposes. His prime object is the interest of the Soviet power to secure the solidarity and help of the masses formerly scorned as “alien” in its struggle to assert itself. “In order to overcome the suspicion of the working masses in the oppressed countries against the proletariat of the country that formerly oppressed them,” says Lenin, “it is essential to abolish all privileges of all national groups, to make the nations absolutely equal in rights, and to recognize the right of the colonies, as nations enjoying equal rights, to form separate states.” It is hard to see how it would have been possible to go further, without directly encouraging the alien races “to separate from Russia. Needless to say, that was not the aim of the victorious party. And so we can understand how it is that Western Europe refused to see anything but a Bolshevist “war stratagem” in the whole Communist programme for the nationalities. Be that as it may, it is a fact that the right to political independence was quite clearly formulated. The Declaration of the Russian Workers’ and Peasants’ Government signed by Lenin and Stalin, and issued on 11/1917, two days after the victory of the October Revolution, includes, besides the recognition of the equal rights of all the
The prime necessity is to allow the non-Russian peoples in the Union to catch up; now we have Bolshevism, but that will not pass over. Ssanan conditions of production and standard of life. And, as regards national midst of his speech he suddenly turned to one of the members of the number of peoples in Central Asia, the Caucasus, and Northern Asia, An anecdote illustrates this point. At the first Conference of socialist revolution, although it is in some measure European and there was a dim urge towards freedom in the Eastern masses, but the Socialist theorists have always declared Russia to be unripe for the age-long servitude hardly took any notice of the programme. It is true that warfare into these countries? Even now it appears strange to European cultural standard in the areas inhabited by national minorities, had indeed, oppressors and oppressed, but neither middle class nor oppressed peoples at once for the new rulers. But that could only have question had not even reached the Russian stage of capitalist culture and speech. It might have been expected that so radical a fulfil the promise in practice. For, especially in the East, the countries in and it will be seen that they particularly stress the fostering of native easy, therefore, to concede on paper "separate state organization on the schools, both general and technical or professional, in the native tongue." and of the Tsarist nationality policy, was the backwardness of the seventy education, the theatre, and club organization, as well as other cultural and of the Kirghiz area and Kazakhstan, whilst the Transcaucasian Union was divided into three independent member states (Georgia, Armenia and Azerbaijan). Within the separate member states there were further constituted fifteen autonomous republics and nineteen autonomous regions which, like the member states, were founded on the principle of national self-determination. Within this federal structure the nationality programme of Lenin and the Communist party was incorporated in the constitution of the Soviet Union and, in a general way, realized in practice. Even the principle of free union was retained, of which Lenin had written that "without the right of separation it was an empty phrase."

Thus the Soviet Union is a union of nationalities; its supreme legislative organ, the Central Executive Committee (Vtisk), consists of a COUNCIL OF THE UNION and a COUNCIL OF NATIONALITIES. The latter consists of representatives of the eleven member states, the autonomous Republics, and the autonomous Regions. It is of particular interest in connection with our subject that the ten representatives of each member state, as well as the five representatives of each autonomous Republic, must include women. The autonomous Regions only send two representatives each to the Council of Nationalities. Here too, then, the fact that the political structure of the Union is built upon a federal and national basis finds expression. The difficulties confronting such a development were many and various, and the unhappy experiences of the nationalities, who remembered their former Russian oppressors and, as I have said, continued to foster suspicion, were only one of the most important. What seemed an insuperable difficulty, a heritage of history and of the Tsarist nationality policy, was the backwardness of the seventy million non-Russians living in the territory of the present Union. It was easy, therefore, to concede on paper "separate state organization on the basis of national culture," as officially formulated, but all the harder to fulfil the promise in practice. For, especially in the East, the countries in question had not even reached the Russian stage of capitalist development; gentile organization frequently prevailed, and there were, indeed, oppressors and oppressed, but neither middle class nor proletariat. How was it possible to introduce the "proletarian class warfare" into these countries? Even now it appears strange to European readers when, let us say, a Tungus newspaper uses the well-known expression "capitalist exploitation," whereas many Western European Socialist theorists have always declared Russia to be unripe for the socialist revolution, although it is in some measure European and capitalist. And what had to be done, at least in theory, was to raise a number of peoples in Central Asia, the Caucasus, and Northern Asia, who had not even reached the capitalist stage, to the "higher socialist conditions of production and standard of life." And, as regards national culture, which, according to the programme, was to serve as a basis and guide for each separate state organization, it existed at best for a minute section of educated men, whilst the mass of the "alien races" lived their lives in the profoundest ignorance. The protagonists of the new development in Soviet Russia have never been blind to the fact that the prime necessity is to allow the non-Russian peoples in the Union to catch up Russia proper in economic and political progress. Everything that has been done since the October Revolution, and is still being done, belongs to this transitional programme, the accomplishment of which is to create the prerequisite conditions for the real nationality programme. The right of self-determination of the peoples of the Soviet East finds unambiguous expression in the political structure of the Soviet Union, but it has been left to further progress to fill in the outlines, which progress, however, is actively encouraged by the whole Soviet policy. And so we may not always ask whether Socialism will not disappear, but whether the economic and cultural progress of the backward peoples, to which every effort is directed, will not produce results other than those expected at present: whether, when once these peoples have reached a certain stage of economic and cultural progress, they will not try to make use of their chartered right of self-determination in an unwelcome manner. It does not appear that these anxieties are felt in the Soviet Union itself. Only occasional doubts are expressed. Thus the Buriat Mongols addressed the following question to Stalin, which we should rather expect from the lips of a professor of philosophy than from the representatives of a plain and straightforward nomad people: "Since it is the admitted aim of Communist policy to create a uniform human civilization, how must we picture the transition of national civilization, as evolved in the several national republics in the Union, to this general human civilization, and how will the particular characteristics of the various national civilizations be approximated to it?" For the rest, people in the Soviet state today see in the manner of solving this cultural problem a striking example of historical dialectic, since by strengthening the national character of the peoples and fostering their hitherto neglected culture, they are meant to be brought nearer to one another, and actually are so brought, not divided. Be that as it may, the encouragement of cultural, and of course no less economic, progress is the alpha and omega of the Bolshevik programme, or rather, of the transitional programme, of the present Government in all the non-Russian territories of the Union, and first and foremost in the Soviet East. Two aspects of the constructive programme of the Soviet Government-economic and cultural-emerge unambiguously in the principles of the dominant party, formulated in 1922. According to these it is the task of the party's nationality policy to "help the working masses of the non-Russian peoples to catch up the more advanced Central Russia." This was to be achieved on the one hand "by the systematic establishment of industries in the frontier districts, especially by the fostering of the economic and social development of the backward national areas," but, on the other hand, "by consolidating the native systems of justice, administration, industrial management, and government under persons with a knowledge of native conditions and of the psychology of the inhabitants; further by encouraging the Press, education, the theatre, and club organization, as well as other cultural institutions; and finally by creating a widespread network of courses and schools, both general and technical or professional, in the native tongue." These, briefly stated, are the guiding principles of the nationalities policy; and it will be seen that they particularly stress the fostering of native culture and speech. It might have been expected that so radical a programme, which combined all tactical advantages, would have won the oppressed peoples at once for the new rulers. But that could only have been if the most important point in the programme itself, the raising of the cultural standard in the areas inhabited by national minorities, had already been realized. The reverse, however, was the case. At first the peoples to whom the Bolsheviks promised and brought liberation from age-long servitude hardly took any notice of the programme. It is true that there was a dim urge towards freedom in the Eastern masses, but the call from the West sounded too strange and uncustomed to them.

An anecdote illustrates this point. At the first Conference of Eastern Peoples Lenin read a report lasting for several hours. In the midst of his speech he suddenly turned to one of the members of the Conference, the representative of the Kalmucks: "What do the Kalmucks say about Bolshevism?" The man addressed, the author Amur Ssanan, whom I have already mentioned several times, leapt to his feet and was ready with a prompt answer: "The Kalmucks says: We have had the plague, and that passed over; we have had the cholera, and that passed over; now we have Bolshevism, but that will not pass over." Ssanan writes that the answer called forth general mirth. As regards the few intellectuals among the minorities, some of them had not taken the social revolution so very seriously, some were allied by ties of blood and class interest with the feudal possessing classes and the native clergy, and, finally, they did not evince any very great readiness to miss the historic opportunity of real political independence; for in each country there were feeble rudiments of a national mass movement to which the advocates of a final secession from revolutionary Russia could attach themselves. Taking all this into account, the effects of the October Revolution in the countries of color, and gays fought back successfully, and even the "alien races" did not work out as had been expected. Everywhere arose an armed barrier to the forward march of Bolshevism. In October itself there arose a strange and short-lived political structure known as the "South-Eastern Union of the Cossack Armies of the Mountaineers of the Caucasus and the Free Peoples of the Steppes." Everywhere a motley jumble of national governments assumed power and established independent democratic states under middle-class leadership, intended partly as the realization of long-standing national aspirations, partly as a check to the Red menace.

Most of these governments survived longer than they would otherwise have done because the Russian counter-revolution and foreign intervention came to their aid. Thus the "Democratic Republic of Daghestan" was occupied by the Turks in 1919 after some months of rule by the White Guards; then it was under British control for two months, and finally served as a basis of Denikin's operations, who fought with Kornilov and General Alexeyev's army of volunteers against the Russians and extended his authority for a time throughout the whole of southern Russia. Transcaucasia, too, separated from Russia and was the scene of a bloody struggle between the three newly established independent republics of Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan. In the proletarian city of Baku, where a Soviet Government was set up soon after the October Revolution, the civil war, in which English troops sometimes took part, lasted two whole years, until the "Mussavet" Government was overthrown and Bolshevikism triumphed. Armenia wassovietized in 1920 Georgia not till a year later. During all these years, rivers of blood were shed in Transcaucasia. By way of example, I will only cite the little mountain territory of Karabagh, now an autonomous part of the Republic of Azerbaijan. Of its 212 villages, fifty-nine were razed to the round, and a quarter of the population lost their lives in the struggle carried on by the democratic Governments of Armenia and Azerbaijan for the tiny territory. No less bloody was the struggle in Central Asia. The revolutionary fever spread most rapidly to Bukhara the centre of Islam in Turkistan and the capital of the Emir, who still ruled with oriental despotism. In 1920 the Emirate was overthrown, but a further four years passed before Uzbekistan joined the Soviet Union as a Soviet Republic and a member state. In the same year Turkistan adhered to the Union. But meanwhile the fiercest struggles raged in Central Asia, led by the basmaches, successors of the nomad robbers formerly well-known in those parts, and supported by the beys, the large landowners, and the Mohammedan clergy. Kishiksks destroyed, settlements burnt and laid waste, and only now slowly reviving, still mark the trail of the basmaches. They were fanatical Mohammedans, and assumed the title "Hoats of the Faith"; they violated women and murdered them, tore their tongues out, and turned the fruitful valleys of Fergana into cemeteries, and fields that had born golden harvests into sandy deserts. For years afterwards the fields were populated by wild beasts and boars instead of the horses, cattle, and camels of the dekhkans, the peasants of Central Asia.

From Persia, too, the basmaches received aid and support, and it was not till 1922 that the victorious advance of the Red troops succeeded in subduing them. But it was only in 1925 that the Soviet regime began to consolidate itself and spread in Central Asia, only with the realization of the land reform, of which I shall have more to say, since it is connected with the law of marriage. [=]

22082. Hatch, Marcel. "Tories Slam the Door on Neediest Immigrants," in Freedom Socialist (Seattle), July-September 1993, p. 8. Last year, while Prime Minister Brian Mulroney was peddling the "free trade" pact between Canada, Mexico, and the US, he was simultaneously restricting the free entrance of immigrants and refugees into Canada. The message of his harsh new legislation, known as Bill C-86, could provide the copy for a wanted poster from a corporate head-hunting agency: "$250000 or rare skills in the nuclear, computer, or aerospace industries guarantees Canadian citizenship. Third World workers and political refugees need not apply." But the crackdown on immigration is producing angry counter- organizing, as in the case of a young Iranian woman served with deportation papers in 11/1992. A coalition led by immigrant women of color, and gays fought back successfully, and even gained ground: It established a first by forcing the government to grant a woman refugee status because of sexist persecution in her country of origin.

Welcome Mat for the Well-off: Historically, Canada has used immigration to meet the needs of a hungry market for low-paid labor. Bill C-86, passed by parliament in autumn 1992, marks a shift to feeding an economy now desperate for capital and technological expertise. The bill stipulates that the majority of arrivals be highly skilled workers in high-tech fields of "Investor" or "Business" entrants with a minimum of $250000 ready cash. It drastically cuts back on immigration geared to reunite extended families. Like most of its provisions, this primarily penalizes immigrants of color. Political refugees get short shrift. Bill C-86 forbids entry to those who were tagged as dissidents in their native country. Also, new sanctuary-seekers can't work until their claims are settled, forcing them onto welfare. As well as causing poverty and privation, this gives ammunition to right-wingers who scapegoat refugees for the country's increasing economic woes.

Sexism Creates Refugees: Five thousand refugees were deported last year. The story of why twenty-year-old Vancouver resident Caroline Teghizadeh was not one of them provides a model for how to challenge xenophobic legislation. In Iran, Teghizadeh had been imprisoned and tortured for not wearing the veil properly. After fleeing to Canada, she was denied political refugee status. When all her regular legal appeals went nowhere, she went public and became a leader in the Caroline Teghizadeh Defense Committee (CTDC). While fighting for her own life, Teghizadeh connected all the issues facing immigrants. She demanded a declaration of amnesty for all refugees from repressive countries and the extension of the definition of refugee to include those discriminated against because of their sex or sexual orientation. CTDC included the Coalition United to Fight Oppression, International Federation of Iranian Refugee Councils, Freedom Socialist Party, and Radical Women. It educated about conditions for women in Islamic countries and organized a broad outcry from unions, feminists, lesbian and gay groups, and ethnic and immigrant associations against Teghizadeh's expulsion. Just days before police were to apprehend her, the Tories backed down and waived the deportation order.

Takes All of Us to Win: In contrast to Teghizadeh's precedent-setting experience, a 2/1993 hunger strike by 10 other Iranian refugees achieved only meaningless government promises that their appeals would be considered on a case-by-case basis. The leaders of the hunger-strike campaign opportunistically relied on media melodrama and closed-door negotiations with immigration bureaucrats, rather than on all-inclusive grassroots coalition-building. And they refused to criticize the Canadian government for its culpability in the fate of the refugees once sent back to Iran. The fight for immigrant rights unites the issues of class, race, sex, and sexuality inseparably, and Teghizadeh's case points the way to victory. An open-door united front that is feminist, internationalist, and critical of capitalist injustice in every form can turn the anti-immigrant tide.[=]
While women did tend to remain in or near the home, the home was also the center of much business and political activity. Women were known as astute managers and entrepreneurs, and some had trade businesses that reached out to the periodic camps of the Qashqai nomads who pass through the area. Regional development has changed the context in which women’s political activity takes place: Land Reform (1962) fragmented the extended networks of women and reduced their political power; the Islamic Revolution gave women an acceptable political voice (by many men as religious in content and hence appropriate); and the post-revolutionary period, which appears to have centralized many decisions that, perviously local, would have been more accessible to women. The public-private myth obscures women’s actual role in politics in Aliabad: “it becomes clear that domestic is political, that private is public, that all activities performed in the domestic, private realm are significant for the public and political realm”.

22084. Helms, Cynthia. An Ambassador’s Wife in Iran. New York: Dodd mead & Co., 1981. The author’s husband, Richard (Dick) Helms, retired as director of the CIA on 11/20/1972 and was offered the ambassadorship to Iran by Pres. Richard Nixon. Dick had long been a friend of the Shah; after a brief introduction for Cynthia in Oriental Art by Dr. Esin At’l at the Smithsonian Institution, they were on their way. En route, the Helms’ were told that Black September might be planning to kill them: but no attack was ever made. Cynthia at once busied herself with redecorating and selecting new plants. During shopping trips in the cities she became aware of the prominence of the bazaaris, who continued to have a significant role in the economy and whose wealth allowed them to provide modern educations for their children; among the merchants, she was comfortable only with the Jews. However, her travels in Tehran would be more restricted after the assassination of Lt. Col. Lewis Lee Hawkins of the American Military Assistance Group by terrorists. But poor Cynthia soon came to understand that she would never understand the Iranians, “even if I could clear my mind of Western thought and logic... the Iranians do not think the way we do...”

Her duties included entertaining: she had a private bet with her husband that most US dignitaries and experts visiting Iran would not know that Iran was not an Arab country, and few did know; one US Senator thought that King Hussein of Jordan was the Shah of Iran. She sometimes met humble local people, like the members of the International Iranian Bridge Team (“Iranians are fierce card players”). Cynthia also explored rural areas and visited several tribal groups, sometimes traveling with an Israeli anthropologist.

Cynthia does note that SAVAK, the secret police exists, but only to note that if the personable Shah was better known, that his potential popularity would preclude SAVAK from casting such a shadow over Iran (seemingly considering the secret police to be a mere public relations problem), but she dismisses the unpleasant question of torture by observing: “These is no doubt that SAVAK is tough, but Iran has a brutal heritage. The penitents whipping themselves with chains on the religious commemorations of Ashura is public witness to this.” (pp. 93-94) “We listened to the intermittent rhythmic clanking of the chains all evening, and eventually we walked to the gate and stood in the shadows to watch. The flagellants work themselves into a fervid hypnotic state and appear to feel no pain.” (p. 137) The Shah’s modernization against such an environment found three major opposition groups: religious leaders, students and the bazaaris. Yet political discourse was stifled because, Cynthia notes, people were too afraid of SAVAK to speak openly. At the same time, the Shah tried to cultivate more understanding for Iran through subsidies to US university Persian studies departments through the Pahlavi Foundation. In 1975, the Helms’ participated in the visit of the Shah to the United States: the graceful events at the Carter White House were rather marred by anti-Shah protests. This was followed by a state visit of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who confined “his admiration for the Shah’s understanding of world problems”. [sic] (p. 192) At the end of the visit, Helms stated his intention to resign as ambassador, and at the end of 1976 the Helms’ returned to the United States. Later, visiting the exiled Shah hospitalized in New York, the Shah constantly wondered why the West had betrayed him and allowed his government to fall.
reducing women’s options is the tendency of divorce courts to grant custody to the fathers. There is a strong contradiction between the government’s emphasis on improved access to education by women, and the limits it imposes on women’s participation in the workforce: such contradictions are openly debated in Iran by a ‘pragmatic feminism in Muslim costume’. The necessity of moderating population growth has made the regime accommodating to women’s demands in Iran, with many conservative religious leaders adopting some interpretations of women, even if high unemployment in Iran will slow women’s entry into the workforce. Nevertheless, the improvement of women in Iran is the product of a pragmatic Iranian understanding of their social and political realities. [TXT] 22086. Howell, David L. “Ethnicity and Culture in Contemporary Japan”, in Journal of Contemporary History, pp. 171-190. Japanese homogeneity has been dynamic, masking a greater ethnic diversity than generally recognized. The process of redefining Ainu culture as the ‘essence of Japaneseness’ illustrates this process. Traditionally, Japanese identity was based in a cultural identity that was opposed to the barbarian periphery. So, in the early twentieth-century, there was a serious effort to redefine Korean history in terms of its ‘forgotten’ roots in Japanese culture. Minorities in Japan today are divided into three groups: (1) Ainu (perhaps 30000 in Hokkaido; now recognized as indigenous people), Ryukyu-Okinawans, and Burakumin (outcasts emerging in Tokugawa, now organized through the Burakumin Liberation League); (2) Koreans brought to Japan from the Empire as laborers and their descendants (700000 at present, and gradually becoming unlinked from Korea); and (3) recent immigrants from Asia (Iranians at 40000 in 5/1992 being the largest and most conspicuous illegal worker population; Filipinas have been recruited in large numbers as wives for farmers) and Latin America seeking work. Violence against the minorities is rare, but psychological pressure is intense. Conflict is moderated by having state minority relations moderated by minority organizations having official recognition: this allows for the institutionalization of ethnic relations and largely supercedes individual action. This institutionalization does moderate conflict within a hostile social milieu, but tends to perpetuate the persistence of such minority groups as exogenous to mainstream society.

22087. Humayuni, Sadeq; Chelkowski, Peter J. [editor]. "An Analysis of Taziyeh of Qasem", in Taziyeh: Ritual and Drama in Iran. [Based on the Proceedings of the International Symposium at the Shiraz Festival of Arts, August 1976.] New York: New York University, 1979. pp. 12-23. The Taziyeh of Qasem is the story of Qasem son of Umam Hussan, who desires to fight, but is young. Qasem struggles to be allowed to fight, and his mother comforts him: she prepares Zainab, sister of Imam Hussein, to whom he is betrothed for their marriage. After his marriage, before the marriage is consummated, he promises to meet her at judgment day, and leaves for the battlefield. After a courageous struggle, he is killed. Throughout this drama, Hussein remains the center of the action. Throughout this drama, ancient and enduring Persian traditions are used: this ties the events of the drama closely to the lives of the audience. Central themes include the heism and self-sacrifice of women.

22088. Iranian Women Students Federation (USA); Iranian Student Association (USA). Press Release: February 1979 Uprising By Kurdish Forces Against the Islamic Republic. Chicago., Ill.: Iranian Women Students Federation (USA), Iranian Student Association (USA), February 1984. In 9/1979, less than seven months after the February uprising, the Islamic Republic’s regime waged a major military attack against Kurdish towns. The fighting that had been going on since the declaration of de facto autonomy by Kurdish nationalist and leftist forces in 3/1979, had reached new dimensions. The indiscriminate bombing of towns, coupled with the advance of tanks on Kurdish cities in 9/1979, was the first of steps in a continuing war. The many attempts by the government to ‘wipe out Kurdish resistance’. Far from bringing about the quick victory sought by the regime, it proved to be a major victory for the Kurdish people. It proved to the world that, contrary to the claims of the Islamic regime, it was not small ‘groups of bands’ that had taken over Kurdish cities. It proved that the Kurdish nation, men and women, young and old, were united and determined to fight for the right to self-determination.

In the first year of the civil war, in many Kurdish cities, women took up guard duty. In the city of Morivan, women shared guard duty in most of the posts set up around the city. In later battles for the control of the cities, most eyewitness reports mention especially the role of and the courage of women: nurses who stayed in the hospitals throughout the fighting, while hospitals were shelled by army tanks and planes; women who, with little military training, went to the trenches built throughout the city. Soon after the first war, most of the guerrillas were forced to leave the cities in order to stop further destruction of life and property. The women who stayed behind took over the political organizations. Their immediate task concentrated on collecting financial and material support for the pishmargehs (Kurdish guerrillas) in the mountains. Their role in maintaining the link between the guerrillas in the liberated areas and the Kurdish people in the towns and villages under government control has been a crucial factor in keeping the revolution alive. Women regularly cross the government road blocks, defeating the economic sanctions imposed on the liberated areas. They supply the guerrillas with everything from food and medicine to books and gunpowder. Women have been instrumental in maintaining the level of political activity in Kurdish towns, in both the publication and distribution of revolutionary newspapers, leaflets and pamphlets. In the Kurdish countryside, the remnants of feudal and tribal customs still govern day to day life. In many villages the custom of ‘Zen be Zan’ (exchange of women) prevails. A family will allow the marriage of their daughter only if they can gain a woman from the groom’s family (i.e., if their son can marry a daughter from the groom’s family, usually a sister). This tradition shows clearly most peasant families’ dependence on the chores taken up by women. Housework itself is a difficult task in the harsh weather conditions of this mountainous region; women have to carry water from distant fountains, break wood for heating and cooking, and wash dishes and clothes in freezing water. But in addition to their housework, Kurdish peasant women have to work in the fields, look after the cattle or weave carpets day and night. In many areas, polygamy is common. Because of the patriarchal family relations, men often beat up their wives and daughters.

During the last four years, the living conditions of Kurdish peasants have deteriorated considerably. It is the women who bear the burden of the difficult conditions as they have to feed the family despite the severe food shortages caused by the government sanctions and the destruction of agriculture. In recent years many peasants have become homeless (forced to flee their homes after the capture of their village by economic sanctions on the liberated areas, executed thousands of revolutionaries, massacred hundreds of Kurdish peasants and bombarded civilian areas. During this period Kurdish men and women have shown exceptional courage and determination to stop a far better equipped and stronger army. In this underdeveloped region of Iran, women suffer countless forms of exploitation and deprivation, yet they have played a unique role in defending the Kurdish revolution. In paying tribute to the present article, we will try to describe some of the aspects of their lives and their struggles.

In Kurdistan, like all other areas of Iran, the division between the town and countryside is very wide. In the urban areas women participate in social production. Sections of petit bourgeois women are employed in service industries or by the bureaucracy, while the poorer women find work in small manufacturing firms. Inevitably the participation of women in politics started in the cities. Kurdish women who had participated in the demonstrations prior to the overthrow of the Shah, took an active role in opposition to the Islamic Republican regime when it refused to grant autonomy to Kurdistan. In the first major attack against the city of Sanandaj (southern capital of the Kurdish region), as the army advanced on the main road to town, Kurdish women and children lay down on it, physically blocking the entrance to the city. The retreat of the Iranian army tanks, in the face of such a resolute resistance, was a major victory for the Kurdish people. It proved to the world that, contrary to the claims of the Islamic regime, it was not small ‘groups of bands’ that had taken over Kurdish cities. It proved that the Kurdish nation, men and women, young and old, were united and determined to fight for the right to self-determination.
the army and the revolutionary guards). Most villages in the liberated areas face new problems because of overpopulation. For the refugees it is difficult to adapt to their new conditions, they are left landless and penniless in a region of Iran where basic food prices are enormous. But the sense of solidarity is very high; most families in the village share their meagre food rations with the refugees and the guerrillas who are staying in or passing from the village. There can be no doubt about the solid support expressed by Kurdish men and women for the nationalist cause. In the fierce battles of 1983, waged to recapture villages, Kurdish peasants fought alongside the guerrillas. In many villages, middle-aged Kurdish women stayed on during the fighting, helping the guerrillas by bringing ammunition, looking after the injured, preparing and distributing food amongst the fighters. Since the February uprising and the initial formation of the liberated areas, many women have joined the ranks of the guerrillas. Most of the women guerrillas work in areas traditionally associated with women: welfare (both in the field hospitals, the village clinics, etc.) or in the publication of revolutionary newspapers in the liberated areas. All women pishmargehs take part in military training but only a small number participate in military operations.

The success of women pishmargehs has been in raising the consciousness of peasants, especially peasant women. Initially their arrival in the liberated areas caused an uproar amongst the peasants. Many villagers did not respect women guerrillas, nor did they take them seriously. Peasant women were even more hostile as they found the idea of women in men's clothes, armed with rifles' distasteful and alien to their culture and traditions. Yet, after the initial difficulties, with patience and perseverance, the women guerrillas proved in practice their seriousness in revolutionary struggle. Today they play a very important role in the social welfare of villages in the liberated areas, working as teachers, nurses and political activists, as well as taking up guard duty in defence of the village. Because of strict Islamic traditions, Kurdish women, especially in the countryside, rarely speak to male strangers. But women guerrillas usually find a receptive audience amongst the peasants and the youths in the villages they visit for political propaganda, thus transforming the general support for the nationalist cause into active participation of peasant women in the people's war against the Islamic Republic's regime. On the military front, the government, despite using heavy artillery and tens of thousands of soldiers and pasdars, has been unable to recapture a considerable section of the liberated areas, especially away from the main roads. But even in the areas where the regime has gained control, the special relations between the guerrillas and the peasants stemming from the experience of the last four years, have insured the continuation of the support of the population for the guerrillas. The Iranian army and the Pasdaran are treated as an occupying army, and the government is, indeed, a very long way from wiping out Kurdish resistance. [5]

22089. LCOME. "Kurdish Unionist Executed By Iranian Government", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Summer 1990. KURDISH LABOR organizer Jamal Cheragh-Veisy was one of at least 17 people executed by the government of Iran in Kurdistan province on April 21, according to a report by the Los Angeles-based Iranian American Labor Solidarity Committee. Cheragh-Veysi, who worked at the Department of Water Supply in Sanandaj had been the main speaker at a May 1st rally in Sanandaj last year where he spoke of demands raised by the workers on that occasion. These included recognition of workers organizations, such as sovets, syndicates, unions and arbitration committees, equal rights for women and men in all fields, prohibition of child labor below age 18, pay rises linked to inflation, a 40-hour working week with two days off, prohibition of contract and piece work, unemployment benefits for all men and women ready to work and suitable housing and health services. The resolution also expressed solidarity with all workers throughout the irrespective of nationality, race, religion or sex and asked that May 1st be declared a national holiday. (For further information, contact the Iranian-American Labor Solidarity Committee, POB 25472, Los Angeles CA 90025, 618-342-1351) [5]

22090. Larin, Veniamin; Burambayev, Gaziz. Kazakhstan Soviet Republic of the Soviet Union: Part 04: Pages of History. Moscow, 1980. Many centuries ago the territory of Kazakhstan was roamed by many nomadic tribes known to students of ancient history as the Saki. They were pointed felt hats, while their breeches and wide tunics, caught at the waist with a wide belt, were of leather. Their footware, too, was of soft leather. The Saki roamed the steppes with their cattle from one grazing ground to another. The men were on horseback and the women and children travelled in covered wagons. The territory of present-day Kazakhstan was the scene of many bitter battles over the centuries. The armies of many a conqueror swept across the wide plains between the Caspian Sea and the Ural Mountains. Early in the Middle Ages a number of large farming settlements appeared in the oases. Their population settled down and began to grow grain, vegetables, fruit and melons. Several feudal towns grew up and traded with such neighboring lands as China, Iran and the states of Central Asia. In the early 13th century the hordes of Genghis Khan invaded Kazakhstan. They left a trail of fire, destroying in their path everything people had created over the centuries. Most of the towns were pillaged and burnt. The harsh Tatar-Mongol yoke continued for 250 years. But even when it ended, Kazakhstan remained extremely backward both economically and politically. It was a land torn by feudal strife. At the beginning of the 18th century conquerors again came from the Dzungar khanate that had emerged on the territory of Mongolia in the 17th century. The land of the Kazaks, which was just beginning to find its feet after the Tatar-Mongol invasion, was once again plundered and burnt. Torched as it was by feudal strife and war, it faced the threat of total enslavement by the Dzungar khans, by China and the Central Asian khanates of Khiva, Kokand and Bukhara, behind which stood the British and Turkish colonialists.

It was then that the Kazaks turned to their neighbour, Russia. The Kazaks had always traded with Russia, obtaining from it the industrial goods they needed. Moreover, Kazaks had on many occasions sought refuge from foreign invaders on Russian soil, where they found both sympathy and help. Union with Russia brought to an end the primitive subsistence economy and the clan structure of society. It helped to abolish both economic and political isolation. The discovery of rich deposits of copper and lead ores in Central and Eastern Kazakhstan led to the emergence of a mining and manufacturing industry. By the end of the 19th century something like 10000 workers were already employed in the industry. The once nomadic people now had a working class of their own. Kazaks worked together with revolutionary minded Russian workers at factories, oil fields, gold mines and on the railways. Together with them they took part in the strikes and other industrial actions that led up to the first Russian Revolution of 1905-1907. The tsarist government looked upon the distant Kazakh lands as a convenient place to which it could exile its political opponents. These latter mingled with the local population and thus was largely responsible for the spread of revolutionary ideas to the Kazakh steppelands. Kazakhstan's union with Russia drew the Kazakh people into the Russian revolutionary movement that subsequently led to the Great October Socialist Revolution. [5]

22091. Larin, Veniamin; Burambayev, Gaziz. Kazakhstan Soviet Republic of the Soviet Union: Part 13: Spiritual Revival. Moscow, 1980. At the beginning of this century officials of the tsarist Ministry of Education estimated that it would take at least 4600 years before illiteracy could be wiped out in Central Asia and Kazakhstan. This figure was given in an article in the magazine "Education News" in 1914. On what basis were these estimates made? Chiefly on the allocations for education made by the tsarist government. These were miserly. In 1910-1912, for example, only 22 lopkops per person were allocated in Kazakhstan. But it not only took a few decades after the October 1917 Revolution to wipe out the backwardness and illiteracy that were the dire heritage of the past.

For many centuries the Kazaks had no written language. It was the poet Abai Kunanbayev (1845-1904) who laid the foundations of the Kazakh literature and literary language. He was greatly influenced by progressive Russian literature and by the Russian intellectuals of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. It was with their help that the first books and newspapers in the Kazakh language were published at that time. Following the establishment of Soviet government in Kazakhstan work continued on perfecting the Kazakh literary language with the help of Moscow and Leningrad linguists. Many textbooks were written, as well as other aids, in the Kazakh language. For the task facing the republic was a formidable one—practically the entire population had to be taught to read and write, since before the revolution those who could do so were few and far between.

The spiritual revival of the Kazakh people began in the twenties with the opening of schools where tuition was in the Kazakh language. The separation of the church from the state, the elimination of illiteracy on a wide scale, and the first steps in training scientists and teachers from among the local population, the opening of college preparatory courses for working people—all this was part and parcel of the cultural revolution which was an integral part of Lenin's plan for building socialism.

Today the people of Kazakhstan are just as accustomed to the wonders of the modern world as are the people of Western Europe. Even the oldest men, those who started their lives as nomads and stared open-mouthed at the first locomotive they saw, today read newspapers in their own language, listen to the radio, watch TV, travel by train and plane and drive their own cars. As for their sons, they are launched into space from their own land, they smelt steel, probe the secrets of the atom, lecture in universities, write books, compose operas, produce films and design new machines... They also look after the health of the people. At the beginning of this century there was no such thing as medical aid for the Kazakhs—witch doctors were the only people they could turn to. Today there are more than 42000 doctors in the republic and about 150000 junior medical staff. There are five medical colleges and dozens of scientific research institutes with a staff of over 3000. Yet before the October 1917 Revolution there were none at all. Few children had the chance of attending school in Kazakhstan before the revolution. Today there are more than 10000 general schools to cater for nearly 3.5 million children. A transition is now being made to a secondary education for all. One cooperative farm in Semirechaye—the "22nd CPSU Congress" farm—spends more money on education each year than was spent by the tsarist government for the whole of Kazakhstan. The farm pays maintenance grants to its members studying in colleges, specialised secondary schools and vocational schools. It also finances the building of a secondary school for 900 pupils in the village. Today 654 people out of every 1000 engaged in the Kazakhstan economy have either a higher or secondary (complete or incomplete) education. The changes described by Morban Yesembayeva, secondary school teacher in Kzyl-Saya, are typical of the republic as a whole. "I have been teaching the children in my native village of Kzy-Saya for a long time," she said. "First we had a seven-year school, then tuition was extended for another year, and today our school provides a complete secondary education. There was a time when children from neighboring villages were brought in on horseback, if the weather permitted. If there was a snowstorm or it was very cold they did not attend school at all. The premises were small and classes had to be held in three shift. Later dormitories were built for children coming from other villages. Now a big modern building has gone up side by side with the old single-storey one. Various subjects are taught in specialised study rooms. We have been able to open a number of workshops that are of great help in giving our pupils vocational guidance."

Twenty-five years ago, when illiteracy had already been wiped out, the teacher was still the only person in the village with a higher education. Today there are 17 specialists with a college education and another thirty with a specialised secondary education, while many others are taking correspondence courses at colleges or specialised secondary schools. The first elementary school in the village was opened 50 years ago. It was a great event and people from neighboring villages came to watch the children at their studies. Last year the thousandth pupil to complete the ten-year course of education left the school. Its former pupils are now working in various parts of the republic. Hundreds of people from this small village, which lies far from the main highways and once did not have a single person who could read or write, have now received a college education. Fifteen former pupils have returned to the school to teach. Many other graduates have become scientists, teachers and journalists. Kazakhstan has 52 higher educational establishments with a student body of 220000, and there is another quarter of a million students attending specialised secondary schools. Kazakhstan alone now has three-and-a-half times as many specialists with a higher education as all tsarist Russia had.

The leading higher educational establishment in the republic is the Kazakh State University named after Kirov. When it was founded in Alma-Ata 45 years ago, it had two departments: physics and mathematics (combined) and biology. 54 students were enrolled, 2 of whom had received a higher education. Today the university has a student body of 12000. The students are taught by seven Members and Corresponding Members of the Kazakh Academy of Sciences, 40 doctors of science and professors and 250 candidates of science and assistant professors. A new university building is now going up at the foot of the snow-capped Alatau Mountains. The buildings of the arts and biology departments have already been completed, along with the tall administration block, the assembly hall for 2000, sports facilities and the refectory. Kazakhstas has its own Academy of Sciences and is the site of the Eastern Department of the USSR Academy of Agriculture. Among the staff of its research institutes are more than 600 people with doctor's degrees. The founder and first President of the Kazakh Academy of Sciences was Kanysh Satpayev. He was not only an outstanding geologist and an able organiser of scientific research, but he also played an important part in the establishment of the Kazakh Soviet Socialist Republic. The range of Satpayev's studies increased every year. First he sought copper in Djezkazgan, then he worked in Central Kazakhstan and, finally, his prospecting embraced the entire republic. Satpayev and his colleagues were convinced that copper was not their republic's only mineral wealth. Thanks to their efforts, Kazakhstan became the USSR's supplier of many other non-ferrous metals. In prewar years Kanysh Satpayev was bus, starting up the production of pig-iron and steel in the republic: After the war he concentrated on analyzing the results of geological engineering prospecting expeditions in the Mangyshtal Peninsula. At the same time he worked on maps showing probable ore deposits in his republic. These proved of great help to field geologists pinpointing deposits. For this work a group of scientists led by Kanysh Satpayev were awarded a Lenin prize.

Today Kazakh scientists are working on some 500 problems of applied science. Over the past five years they have introduced into production twice as many projects as during the previous five-year period, and the economic effect of their innovations has tripled. The work of the Institute of Hydrogeology and Hydrophysics, for instance, is of great practical significance. In regions that used to be regarded as lacking fresh water its scientists have discovered as many as 70 ground water basins extending over more than two million square kilometres. They contain as much water as 25 Seas of Azov, enough to irrigate five million hectares of pasture and to supply water for many towns, settlements and industrial enterprises. Good work is done by the Institute of High Energy Physics, the second of its kind in the USSR.

A major event in the cultural life of the republic was the Fifth Conference of Afro-Asian Writers held in the capital, Alma-Ata, in 1973. It was attended by writers and public figures from 70 countries. Some of the participants in the conference said later they had expected to see a land of wild nomads. What they had in fact seen and the Kazakh people's achievements in the economic and cultural fields impressed them immensely. The great Russian proletarian writer Maxim Gorky once remarked: "There are two forces that are most instrumental in shaping the culture of man: the arts and science. Both are combined in books... It is therefore quite correct to measure the cultural standards of a nation by the number of books and newspapers it publishes."

Kazakhstan today has eight publishing houses issuing more than 2000 titles a year in a total of 25 million copies. The books are put out in the Kazakh Russian, Uigur, German and Korean languages. The Kazakhs can now read in their own language the works of Lenin, Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels Pushkin, Leo Tolstoy, Maxim Gorky, Dickens, Honoré de Balzac, Victor Hugo, Ernest Hemingway, and many other authors. More than 400 newspapers are published daily and about 30 magazines with a total circulation of over five million copies. The central newspapers published in Moscow are relayed by wire and printed in Alma-Ata. Right after the revolution Lenin paid a great deal of attention to the opening of more libraries, regarding them as an important indicator of cultural standards. He dreamed of the day when Russia would have 50,000 libraries and reading rooms. Today Kazakhstan alone has over 12,000 libraries. The Republican Library alone has three and a half million books on its shelves. Its new premises have 14 reading rooms, which together can seat more than 1,300 people. The book repositories are linked with the reading rooms by pneumatic dispatch and conveyor belts. An Automatically signalled readers when their orders for books are ready. A special office can order books from any library in the USSR, as well as from abroad. The cultural revolution that took place in the early years of Soviet government was instrumental in the establishment of a Kazakh national theatre (the first company was formed in 1925). It also offered great scope for the growth of professional music. The fine arts were developed, especially drawing, painting and sculpture, which until then had been unknown. People of other nationalities of the Soviet Union with centuries-old traditions in these arts helped to teach the Kazakhs.

How about the cultural life of the republic today? A few words about its musical life. No figures, just a conversation we had with composer Gaziza Zhubanova. She recalled receiving a letter one day from the German Democratic Republic. The return address surprised her.
She could not imagine who living at 8 August Bebel Strasse, Berlin could have heard of her. When she opened the letter she found it was from Professor Karl Fritz Bernhardt, a name familiar to a great many women composers, for he had devoted many of his studies to them as.

As the first professional composer in Kazakhstan, Gaziza Zhubanova had aroused his interest. Soon a lively correspondence began between the German professor and the Kazakh composer. Professor Bernhardt was particularly interested in the composer’s latest work, her score for the ballet “The Legend of the White Bird”, one of the first Kazakh national ballets. Gaziza met the professor in Moscow later and he told her about his work. His file contains the names of 3,600 women composers, most of them in the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic. The professor returned home with the score of Zhubanova’s symphonic poem “Aksak-Kulan,” which he intended offering to one of the symphony orchestras in the GDR.

Something like ten years ago, at a congress of music critics in Hamburg, Professor Bernhardt had argued that women were quite capable of becoming composers. The example of Gaziza certainly provides an excellent illustration of his point. Gaziza had chosen music as her career when she was still a child. Her abilities were manifested at an early age.
While still at school she wrote the music for a number of songs. On leaving school she travelled to Moscow to study at the Conservatoire first as a student and then doing postgraduate work. She wrote choral, instrumental and chamber pieces but her talent was best revealed in the field of symphonic music. Telling us about her plans, Gaziza said that she was completing an opera about Kurmangazy, the outstanding Kazakh folk musician of the 19th century. All who know Zhubanova are full of admiration for the way she combines her work as a composer with her responsibilities as rector of the Alma-Ata conservatoire and her public activities as Deputy to the City Soviet (council) and secretary of the Union of Kazakh Composers. She is also the mother of four children.

When anybody asks her how she manages, Gaziza replies: “Well, that is what life consists of. it all adds up to happiness…” For centuries women in Kazakhstan had no rights at all. They were confined to the home and their life was governed by feudal laws and customs. Today, women make up 47% of the labor force in Kazakhstan, including scientists, engineers, writers, actresses and musicians.

Kazakhstan is proud of its talented women who have brought fame to the republic. The singer Kulyash Bayseltova became widely known as “the Kazakh nightingale” and at the age of 24 was made a People’s Artist of the USSR. Equally familiar to music lovers throughout the country are the voices of Bibigul Tulegenova, Rosa Baglanova, Rosa Djamanova and the young Rosa Rymbayeva. The flourishing of the amateur arts in the Soviet period is a clear sign of the higher cultural standards of the people. More than one million people are involved in the work of people’s theatres (opera, ballet and drama), folk-instrument and symphony orchestras and in choirs and variety groups, and participate in the various contests and art festivals. Kazakh workers in the arts and culture often go on foreign tours. In 1975, for instance, they took part in the Soviet art festival in France. Kazakh actors have performed in Britain, Malaysia, Singapore, India, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Denmark, Czechoslovakia and Iran. In the last five or six years they have toured a total of more than 40 countries in Europe, America, Asia and Africa. Three folk Kazakh groups—“Saltanat” from Karkaralinsky district in Karaganda region, “Ulutau” from Dzhezkazgan, and “Alatau” from Djambl—have also successfully performed abroad. [—]

22092. Lederith, Edith M. “Women Invisible Victims of World Conflict; Amnesty International: Cities Killing, Rape, Torture”, in Seattle Times, International Womens Day that names women as the major victims of wars in which they “have taken no part”. The report asserts that women are treated worse than men in every country. Women are reported to make up 80% of the world refugee population, and that all governments approve of rape or torture of women, especially women refugees. The report accused the Zapatistas of mass rape of women in Chiapas, and cited torture of women in Mexico, Indonesia, El Salvador, Burma, China, Iran and Uzbekistan. Oddly, ignoring Israel, the only country in the world where torture is legal, and a country where rape is a routine interrogation technique used on women and boys, and cited hundreds of women being killed in fighting in Mali and Somalia.

22093. Mahomed, Farida. “Life Style: Experiences of Muslimahs at the 8. (Sister Farida Mahomed is a lecturer in Arabic and Islamic Studies at the University of South Africa in Pretoria. This is an abridged version of her report that she prepared after returning from the Hairou conference).
The fourth international women’s conference was preceded by the non-governmental organization (NGO) women’s conference in Hauirou. This beautiful town is some fifty-five kilometers from Beijing. Since all the hotels and boarding houses were occupied by the thousands of delegates attending the conference, many were obliged to stay in Beijing and commute daily. The lush green willows and exquisitely landscaped gardens welcomed women from all over the world. The South Africans enjoyed special attention in some workshops and plenary sessions.
Women from other countries were curious to know about our human rights and equality situation. South Africa, it seems, lags behind many other countries. My first day at the conference was a euphoric affair.
When we did not understand the language but we still related to each other. We hugged and shook hands in solidarity. We received a twohundred page schedule of activities for the ten day conference. There were some three hundred and fifteen papers/seminars a day. This was indeed an intellectual bonanza and a challenge to all participants to select the workshops of their interests. Themes included economy, governance and politics, human/legal rights, peace and human security, education, health, environment, spirituality and religion, science and technology, media, art and culture, race and ethnicity, and youth. In a very emotional workshop on Bosnia, women signed a message to the United Nations demanding an end to the war and the degradation of women. A male participant who listened and watched, said with deep emotion: “It has just occurred to me, if women ran the world, there would be no wars.” In this workshop, the genocidal war against the Muslims in Bosnia was shown on video, narrated through poetry and through the personal experiences of women.

It is, however, encouraging to note that some Muslim women have risen above the violent repudiation of contemporary traditional patriarchal forces within the Muslim society and have emerged as progressive Muslim women who believe that solidarity is the way to consolidate their power. Rights without power often become ineffective and insignificant.
My own workshop on ‘Muslim women in the struggle for human rights and equality in South Africa’ generated considerable interest and lively discussion. Every day, I attended the NGO Muslim Women’s caucus.
This forum was mobilized because the Muslim women realized the need to network, discuss and analyze the platform of action contained in the United Nations’ Document. The Muslim caucus strongly criticized the major errors in the United Nations’ Draft. In particular, its lack of Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

recognition of the relevance and importance of the moral and spiritual values that actually guide human judgement and action in all social contexts, came in for strong criticism. Muslim women from the Gulf States, South Africa, Iran, Kuwait, the United States, United Kingdom, Sudan, Tunisia, Palestine, etc., unanimously urged all participants to take a unified stand against objectionable parts of the United Nations’ draft declaration which is incompatible with Islamic principles and traditions. Muslim women were highly motivated to defend their God-given right concerning equality as enshrined in the noble Qur’an. I made a special effort to meet with university women and NGOs who were involved with reviewing educational programs and materials to eliminate stereotypical images of women. I emphasized that women have played an important role in history and continue to play a crucial role in social life and family well-being. I also contacted women who encouraged the participation of women’s groups in the preparation of teaching material to avoid the introduction of discriminatory messages against women. I was actively involved in a demonstration on ‘femicide’: the killing of the woman especially because she is a woman. The African women NGOs warned that unless States take a much stronger stand on ‘femicide’, more and more women will die as a result of the physical abuse in their homes. States must realize that such violence is intolerable and that patriarchal societies provide no protection to women.

Some workshops generated a severe undercurrent concerning issues of Muslim women and abuse in Muslim countries. Lively and sometimes heated debates focused on the issue of Hijab. At times, western women marginalized some Muslim women in hijab. I realized this on the third day of the conference when my sisters from the Arab countries reported that one western woman walked up to them and said, ‘O you stupid girls, you here again.’ Upon hearing this, I decided to go into the next day’s workshop in hijab. To my great shock, I was marginalized and ignored, experiencing a sense of exclusion. The chairperson ignored my hand when I raised it to make a point. I wanted to deconstruct the stereotyped thinking by European women concerning religious matters. They think that a Muslim woman in hijab is not capable of thinking! Muslim women need to mobilize and present their point of view where world issues are concerned. The atrocities committed in Bosnia against the Muslims, mass rapes and genocide present further challenges for sisters and brothers to become more dynamic and vocal at international conferences against violence and abuse. Muslim women also empathized with the victims of atrocities in Iraq and Palestine. They were vocal at the Beijing conference challenging the United Nations’ document concerning issues affecting their lives, especially inheritance, moral laws and structural adjustment programs. The South African women from NISAA, Jubeida Dangor and Julekha Adam presented a workshop on the Prevention of violence against women. Their workshop was well-attended and their experiences augmented lively discussion. Their strategies and prevention techniques concerning the abuse of women were shared by other women working in the same field. Among the many Muslim women from South Africa, Suraiya was actively covering the media for South African television and news programs. Mrs. Koebra Najjar was very active in attending all the workshops concerning Islam. [–]

22095. Millard, Betty. Women on Guard: How The Women of the World Fight For Peace: Part 10: In Iran At Four. New York: New Century Publisher, February 1952. IN IRAN, CROWDS OF unemployed beg and hunt for their food in garbage cans. Thousands of children from the age of four work in the carpet factories. They crouch before their machines, 14 hours a day, breathing wool dust, spitting blood; 99% of them suffer from TB, ulcers or smallpox, and die before they reach the age of 10. “Often,” said the Iranian delegate, her voice full of bitterness, they lie down and die right there in the workshop, and the other doomed children look on and know that their turn will come soon, too.” This is the way the beautiful Persian rugs are made that we all admire so much. But the Iranian women, in spite of jailing and torture, were fighting the rule of the British oil company which was the chief factor in the impoverishment of their country. And since then, as we know, the struggle has grown irresistibly. Huge numbers of women have come out in the streets to demonstrate for the nationalization of oil. On International Women’s Day 15000 women assembled before the headquarters of the Iranian Peace Committee in Teheran, and paraded through the streets carrying the Peace Dove and posters with the slogans: “Bread, not guns!”; “Return Iranian oil to the people!”; “We will not allow our country to become a base of aggression”; “Down with the war in Korea!” The women have collected hundreds of thousands of signatures demanding a meeting of the Big Five. [–]

22097. Miskin, Al. “Mediations: The Prophet Made Me Do It”, in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. p. 39. Iranian population, now at 50 million, is growing at 2.5 million per year. Ali Khameini has stated that while large families may have once been needed to spread Islam, now such large families are not needed. He stated that he would not endorse or criticize large families, but that Islam is no reason for having large families. [TXT]

22098. Mohammed, Jahangir. “Role of Kufr Forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina”, in Ceres Intl International, September 16-30, 1996. p. 7. [Jahangir Mohammed, deputy Leader of the Muslim Parliament of Britain, recently visited Sarajevo.] While in Bosnia last month, I had the opportunity to witness, first hand, the role of the west and their forces. My first thought as we drove through the devastation of Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and the number of IFOR and UN agencies was to recall the colonial policies of the British in India. After sending Indian soldiers to destroy a village and rape its inhabitants, the British would go in to provide medical help and repair the damage. The natives would thus get the impression that the British are decent and civilized people. This is precisely the role the west is playing in Bosnia today. It facilitated the Serb/Croat-perpetrated genocide while preventing the Bosnian Muslims from acquiring arms or self-defense forces in Bosnia which was already destroyed. A building with glass in the windows is a rare sight. Windows everywhere have been temporarily subjected to a humiliating passport scrutiny. The look on the face of the soldier flicking through our passports was one of disgust and hostility. We experienced this from western forces, and the Serbs and Croats throughout our journey. After this checkpoint we went through another before being allowed to board the flight. This time our passports disappeared for 40 minutes. Our official told us they had gone to the UN generals for recording our details. They had their headquarters there and videotaped everyone and everything that went in or out of Sarajevo.

Our Bosnian brother said in Arabic: “You see how we are treated; we are hostages in our own country. We have to get their permission to enter our land.” I asked him why Sarajevo airport was not operational despite being ready for months. He replied, “Why open it when the UN can make money from us. We have to pay the UNHCR for these flights. One day, insha’Allah, we will have our own airport and airlines and our Muslim guests will not be subjected to such humiliation.” He said this with great determination. We witnessed such determination and high morale among all the Muslims we met in Bosnia. Upon arrival at Sarajevo we were greeted by a delegation of senior Muftis and officials. They embraced us with great affection and warmth, making the IFOR the first Bahai Spiritual Council, the Spiritual Board of Counsel was recognized the Bahais as a separate community and punished the prominent Shiite merchants; they had hoped a general massacre of the local population is told that the west is doing work out of goodness and concern for humanity. International agencies also spread un-Islamic western culture. In Bosnia, western soldiers roam the streets drinking alcohol and searching for Bosnian women to fulfill their sexual desires. Poverty has forced many women into prostitution. No doubt AIDS will now spread rapidly in Bosnia. Also visible in Bosnia is the dumping of cheap cigarettes on the local market. Alcohol has now reached epidemic proportions with almost every male and female smoking. Then of course there is Coca-Cola and Pepsi. Warehouses and factories throughout the country are being stocked up. Surely these huge quantities cannot be just for use by the forces. Christian missionaries are also busy at work. Bosnian government officials told us how orphans are being looked after by missionaries and how educational exchange visits between young Bosnian Muslims and Christian families are being arranged. It seems that the real war in Bosnia has only just begun. Resentment toward the "occupying forces" is growing among the Muslim population. Graffiti bearing the phrases “IFOR=DOGS” and “IFOR=DOGS+PIGS” is beginning to appear on walls. =) was destroyed, and the House of Worship was converted into a Soviet art gallery. The Ashkhabad Bahai community was an important place of refuge for the Bahais, and was a key staging area for Bahais escaping the persecutions of Khurasan. The Ashkhabad community was also the first community which tried to implement a Bahai community along the lines prescribed by Bahai writings. However, the Ashkhabad model was a dead end, and the Bahais have remained a diaspora community until recently, when a few larger Bahai communities, scattered around the world, have emerged, almost a century later.

22100. Naghshevareh Theatrical Group; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Womens Words: A New Birth: Iran: A Play by the Naghshevareh Theatrical Group", in Connexions. An International Women's Quarterly, Number 13, July 1, 1984. pp. 23-25. [The following play was collectively written by the Naghshevareh Theatrical Group, an Iranian theatre company currently residing in the US. It was performed in Farsi for the first time at the Julia Morgan Theatre in 9/1983 in Berkeley, California. It was translated and adapted for Connexions by the authors.]

The Naghshevareh Theatrical Group was formed in 4/1983 by a group of Iranian citizens concerned with social issues. Out of this concern, and at the impetus of the women in the group, the following play, Tavvalody Gar [A New Birth], was written. Essentially avant-garde in style, the play examines the traditional chauvinistic view of women from two different angles: that of a sheik and that of a bride's father. Especially important is the concept of possession, be it a wife, house, or the camels of a sheik. In keeping with the play's message, the group has titled it after a poem by the contemporary Iranian poetess, Forough Farrokhzad. Forough, who died in 1966, has been long admired for her accurate portrayals of the life and aspirations of the Iranian women.

The stage is abstractly decorated with black and white background canvasses. The only props are three chairs: two set together at center stage right, and one set to the rear of center stage. The female performers wear black and white leotards with their faces painted white so that they are essentially indistinguishable from each other. Their social identities and the time periods in which they are set are revealed through their words alone. By contrast, the male performers are costumed according to the role they portray.

As the scene opens, the stage is dark. At the sound of a gong, a single spotlight appears at the far right, front of the stage illuminating a woman standing, facing the audience. She is the Narrator. Act I Scene I: Narrator: Often, perhaps always, they treat women in ways that they wouldn't want women to treat them. They buy a woman like they buy a carpet. They put her down with all their might. In the end, she, like the carpet, is sold to another. Caliphs sold women. Islam buried them under a veil, and today, they imprison them in the house, in the kitchen. (Sound of the gong. Another spotlight appears at stage left illuminating a woman who slowly, and with great fatigue, moves mechanically across the stage as if sweeping the floor. She exits at the other side) There are scars in life that slowly eat up one's soul in solitude. These scars can be expressed. (Sound of the gong. Light off. Scene II: Three spotlights illuminate the stage: a woman stands lighted at stage right; a man in sheik's garb is seated at center rear; and two more men, dressed in modern attire, are seated at stage left. As the performers in each position speak, the others remain frozen. This is to give the impression that each position is a separate world unto itself; even while a relationship is maintained between them through their words. The pair of men are the fathers of a bride and groom soon to be married. The woman is a bride. The third man is a sheik of old. Groom's Father: Anyway sir, I'm asking you to allow your daughter to marry my son. We were young once and we know how hard it is to be without a wife.

Sheik: (apparently to an unseen servant) I demand that you bring me a woman.

Bride's Father: Praise Allah, it would be a good deed to give my daughter's hand to your son.

Daughter: (protesting) I don't even know him!

Bride's Father: No matter that she doesn't know him; it's none of her business anyway. We are older and have much more experience in these things.

Sheik: (commanding) Bring her with whatever it takes. With the sound of a flute, with jewels, with a trap...or with a rope. Bring me a woman who...

Bride's Father: (humbly yet enticingly like a bazaar merchant) Praise Allah that she is a clever girl!

Daughter: Am I something to be sold?!

Sheik: And of course housework, you have nothing to worry about. Sheik: She should be light and fast as a deer.

Daughter: I am not an animal!

Bride's Father: What are your son's prospects?

Groom's Father: (proudly) He has a very good job, a house, a car, and a lot more.

Sheik: (arrogantly) Tell them that the Sheik has 50 acres of land, 200 camels, 22 wives, 41 tons of...

Daughter: (crying out NO!...) Groom's Father: It is time for him to start his own family; he must find a wife who...

Bride's Father...Gives warmth to a man's house.

Sheik:...Brings happiness to the harem.

Groom's Father...Will be a good mother to her children.

Sheik:...And brings up brave men like me.

Bride's Father: Anyway sir, there is a saying, as you know, that a good, obedient, and faithful woman can make a beggar a king. After all, a wife's duties are...

Sheik:...To take orders, to obey...

Bride's Father:...And to be loyal and pure, quiet and demure.

Sheik:...When needed she will keep silent, and when necessary, she will be entertaining...

Bride's Father:...To be comforting to her family.

Sheik:...So that I can relax and enjoy her company.

Daughter: (desperately) I am a human being!

Groom's Father: Anyway, humans--I mean men need help at difficult times in their lives. Of course, there were other girls that we were considering...

Sheik (dreamily) Beautiful eyes, tall, thin waisted, white or black.

Groom's Father:...But your daughter is educated, and even on an intellectual level she might be of some service to him.

Sheik: (still imagining) A wise woman, to become my first lady of the harem.

Bride's Father: As for the dowry, what can I say? A Koran, a rose...and of course 100000 Toomans.

Sheik: I will give 100000 Dinars! Now go but beware, if you come back empty handed, I will have you beheaded! (gong sounds; lights go out.)

Act II, Scene I: In this scene, three new women appear still dressed in black and white leotards, and indistinguishable from each other in outward appearance. They are, however, different from one another insofar as they represent different levels of feminist consciousness. These differences are made clear in their interactions with the Sheik's servant who has come to find him a woman.

As the scene opens, three spotlights illuminate the stage in the same positions as before. In the spot where the Sheik was, the Sweeper and the Daughter stand immobile, facing the audience as if witnesses to the proceedings. In the spot where the two fathers were, the heretofore invisible servant of the Sheik is seated. He appears to be playing a flute. If in the spot where the Daughter was, another woman now stands half facing the audience, half facing the Servant. The gong sounds.

1st Woman: Hello brother.

Servant: (lowering his invisible flute) Hello sister.

1st Woman: How well you play the flute, and such jewels you have! Where do you come from?

Servant: (come from the Sheik's palace to find him a woman)

1st Woman: (naively) Who is the Sheik? What kind of man is he? What does he do? And who are you?

Servant: (proudly) The Sheik is a brave man and a great ruler. I am his servant, and all these jewels are his.
1st Woman: (becoming interested) What did you say the Sheik sent you for?
Servant: A woman that he can make first lady of his harem.

1st Woman: (eagerly) Would the Sheik feed this woman? Would he give her jewels and silk? If he would... Servant: (contemptuously) Listen, woman, this time the Sheik is not looking for a hungry woman or an idiot. He wants a wise woman. (she drops her head) He ties women like you with a rope, and if they do not obey him, he throws them in a lion's cage, or imprisons them in the kitchen where they cannot see the sunlight for years.

With each of these images, the woman shrinks back in horror toward the rear of the stage where the Sweeper and the Daughter stand. She moves in cadence with his words, freezing when he pauses, and moving again when he speaks. When she has taken her place with the two others, the Servant goes on dreamily to himself.

Servant: Ah, those were such good times, those days when I could hunt and trap whoever I pleased. I would play my flute, and the women would come to watch. Then I would trap them and tie them... (the narrator suddenly reappears in a spotlight at the extreme right, front of the stage.)

Narrator: Didn't they scream?
Servant: I had a whip.

Narrator: (matter of factly) You were cruel, too.

The gong sounds and all the lights go off simultaneously. Within moments the spotlights come back on. A different woman has taken the place left by the First Woman, but otherwise, the stage is as it was before with the Servant seated, miming playing the flute, and the three woman standing at the rear. The Narrator has disappeared.

2nd Woman: (suspiciously) What are you doing here?
Servant: (innocently, lowering his flute) I am playing my flute.

2nd Woman: Who are you playing for?
Servant: For myself. I feel depressed.

2nd Woman: (softening) Are you a stranger here?
Servant: Yes, I am.

2nd Woman: What brought you here?
Servant: I am looking for someone.

2nd Woman: Who?
Servant: (vaguely) A woman.

2nd Woman: Has she left you?
Servant: No.

2nd Woman: What's her name?
Servant: I don't know.

Then how will you recognize her?

Servant: She is wise.

2nd Woman: She is wise? How did you fall in love with her?
Servant: I am not in love with her. The Sheik wants her.

2nd Woman: (suddenly understanding who he is; she is frightened but aggressive) Sheik! No. YOU are the one who kidnaps women for the Sheik! YOU kidnapped my sisters! Get away from me! (with each exclamation she retreats, pointing accusingly at him, until she reaches the other three women at the rear of the stage. She takes her place next to them. Now a third woman enters from stage left and steps into the spotlight vacated by the 2nd Woman)

3rd Woman: (addressing both the servant and the audience in a slightly confrontational tone) Hello man.

Servant: (cautiously) Hello, my sister.

3rd Woman: (abruptly) Is it your greed that's brought you here?
Servant: (agreeably) No, I am not greedy.

3rd Woman: (pressing her accusation) I've heard that you've come to steal again.

Servant: This time I don't intend to steal; rather I have come to find a wise woman. The Sheik has sent me.

3rd Woman: Why did the Sheik send you?
Servant: Because I am his servant. He trusts me. I've gotten all his women for him.

3rd Woman: And just how did you get them?
Servant: (matter of factly) I got each one with a different trick and a different story.
Bride's Father: Gives warmth to a man's house...Groom's Father: Will be a good mother to her children...Bride's Father: Who is loyal and pure, quiet and...

Groom's Father:...Comforting to her family. Of course, there were other girls we were considering...(gong sounds, lights go out replaced by the spotlight on the narrator)

Narrator:...There are scars in life that slowly eat up one's soul in solitude. These scars can be expressed.

22101. Naim, Mouna. "Mullahs Tighten The Screws on Rafaqanji; As Iran Sinks Into Deeper Economic Crisis, There Is Mounting Evidence of Repression In The Face of Growing Protest," in Manchester Guardian Weekly, March 27, 1994, p. 14. Iran has seen growing, violent unrest as the economy has continued to deteriorate. In 2/1994, there was an assassination attempt against Rafaqanji. In Zahedan, Sistan-Baluchistan, demonstrators clashed with police, and bombs exploded at the city council and a mosque: the bombings were blamed on a militant Sunni faction. On 3/10/1994, there was an attack on the Syrian embassy by a deranged man; this follows attacks on Western embassies in 1/1994. Ali Khamanei has transferred some of his powers to Interior Minister Ali Mohammed Beshari, who has become the commander in chief of the 50000 man paramilitary police for three years: this move is seen strengthening the repressive powers of the state. At the same time, career officer Gen. Mortez Rezaei has been made commander of the Revolutionary Guards. The liberalization of the economy started four years ago, with falling oil revenues, has plunged Iran into desperate economic straits. The government is apparently planned to respond to the crisis by repression. Rafaqanji has become increasingly isolated, with his brother Mohammed Hashemi being replaced as director general of the Iranian radio and television by hardliner Ali Larijani; the new culture minister Mostafa Mir-Salim is also close of Khamanei. The general Iranian response to its present crisis has been to intensify ideological indoctrination. One woman, former Tehran University prof. Homa Drabi, set fire to herself to protest the plight of women in this ideological climate. All this ideological ferment has increased the separation between the national government and the people, without solving economic problems, which include a foreign debt of $20-30 billion. Opposition movements continue to support the US embargo, which they see hastening the collapse of Iran. [TXT]

22102. Najmabadi, Afsaneh. "Zanha-yi milleti: Women or Wives of the State" in Revolutionary Studies, Winter/Spring, 1994. pp. 51-71. This article critically examines the role of women in the Iranian Constitutional Revolution, discussing in particular the contested concept of the term 'zan' (woman and wife) and the ambiguity surrounding the defining of a new womanhood.

22103. Nakanishi, Hisae. Creating The 'Ideal' Woman And Reconstructing 'Islamic' Women: Ideology, Power, And Women's Consciousness In Post-revolutionary Iran. University Of California, Los Angeles. Dissertation. 272pp. AAC 9425774. [Advisor: Keddie, Nikki] This study examines the interactions of discourses between the post-revolutionary government of Iran and Muslim women on woman's rights and roles. It focuses on how Muslim women have reinterpreted passages from the Qur'an and other Shi'i texts. Their interpretation of women's images and rights demonstrates how it is possible to defend women's rights within the framework of Islam: women can reverse the regime's stereotypical images and denials of rights for women. The analysis of the bi-weekly newspaper Payem-e Hajer (Hajer's Message), published by the Women's Society of the Islamic Revolution of Iran (WSIRI), is the focus of this study. The WSIRI's "middle of the road" approach--oriented toward neither Western feminist nor a rigid interpretation of the Qur'an--provides women with an indigenous base to push for reform, while avoiding the label "Westoxicated" (plagued by Western culture). The WSIRI's Islamic reformism is of great importance in shaping the improvement of women's rights in future Iran. Oral accounts of Muslim women show that they have flexibly internalized the meaning of the hejab (Islamic veil and dress) for their personal, psychological, and political use, while accommodating their own interpretations of "Islam." Thus, both the hejab and the Qur'anic passages are used by Muslim women as political tools. The recent development of the reform-oriented posture of the government reflects a tension between how to maintain its legitimacy of power and how to negotiate with the increasing demand of women activists. The tension will continue to grow between what "Islamic" shape the Islamic Republic should and can take, and the "Islamic" society women seek to realize. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.][=]

22104. Nawab, Syed Amir. Two Asian Revolutions: Two New Democracies: A Sociological Appraisal. Origins of Basic Democracies: Pakistan's Political Innovation. Karachi: Free Lance Bureau, November 1960. p. 98-100. Pakistan in its life of 12 years had a semblance of a democratic tradition, as it had come into being on the basis of the 1935 Act, in which 13.5% of the electorate had taken part, under the Parliamentary system. In doing away with the edifice which had identified it as a democratic nation formally recognizing the right of the individual, the country apparently ran the risk of being saddled with a national Fascist or Totalitarian Regime. In the absence of an alternative political principle worthy of replacing the socio-political principles of the older system, guaranteeing political rights, a political vacuum was apparent. Therefore misgivings and skepticism of new declarations was a natural process of thought in the intelligentsia and the educated circles of our society. Though this denoted democratic consciousness in a small section of the upper and middle class, with a misplaced concern for the parliamentary type, it was by no means a concern for the essence of democracy or for the rights of the poor common man, whose spontaneous reaction was quite different.

The promulgation of the order bringing into being another type of a democratic set-up within one year, by the Revolutionary Regime, dispelled doubts and forebodings to a large extent, yet much has to be said and done in this respect.

New ideas are, however, slow to find groundings, as in the first place habitual process of thought (and action) takes time to change from one thought-current, which has become a fixed idea, to another; and secondly, no two individuals have the same standard of judgement, and it follows that interpretations vary.

It goes to the credit of the makers of Pakistan's October Revolution that they could adopt such an innovatory idea, based on realism and shape it so as to suit local conditions. ["It is a lesson of history that important and fundamental changes in the ways of thought, ushering in an era of new standards of socio-economic measurements, have generally been brought about by a group of individuals belonging to that section of society which is the most conscious of its environments and by reason of its intellectual ability and enlightenment is able to think and look ahead. In our country too we have such well meaning individuals, fairly educated, cultured and discerning...."] From "Pakistan and Communism," published as "A Report from Pakistan," by S. A. Nawab in Radical Humanist, Vol. XVI, No. 35 of 8/31/1952. The concept of Basic Democracy - democracy at the roots, or a radical interpretation of democracy in a manner that in application its essence and spirit is not contaminated by traditional formalism attached to it - is an innovation in socio-political thought here. For the common men and women this political concept in this shape - in this country - has its political, social and economic aspect; and its sociological genesis is of interest and concern to the of Islamists and the thinkers in our society and elsewhere, as it is pitted against older theories of State, from the medieval monarchic to the modern totalistic. That is, an all powerful, highly centralized State versus the idea of a State with defused powers, which derives its strength from the conscious participation and therefore the support of the individual member who exercises effective power within his immediate limited circle and at the same time his or her socio-political ideas can find manifestations in the higher tier of the state.

Appraised from this aspect, the concept of Basic Democracy offers a positive alternative to other Asian countries - so impressed by the "centralized" system of the Totalitarian State, as the only alternative to the Parliamentary type of Democracy. To the intellectuals and political thinkers in Asian countries, this contribution of the concept of Basic Democracy is its greatest achievement, as it has halted the one-way traffic towards the totalitarian concept of state. [After my first article, "Democracy in Pakistan - A Critical Appreciation," was published in "Times of Karachi" dated 12/12/1959, Mr. Jaipuraksh Narain, leader of the Swatantra Party of India, speaking later at a reception in Hotel Metropole, Karachi, highly appreciated Pakistan's Basic Democracy. As an "aid d'memoir" he was given a copy of the paper containing this published article.] Later, in 1960, it was reported in the local press that Iran, too, had declared to adopt the system of Basic Democracy of Pakistan.)

22106. Noah, Timothy. "New Single Issue Pressure Groups Sprout Up On The Right To Support the Republican Agenda", in Wall Street Journal, May 31, 1995. p. A18. The Fair Government Foundation sounds like Common Cause or Public Citizen, but in fact it is their direct opponent; it was established with a $70000 contribution by the National Republican Senatorial Committee. Increasingly, pro-Democratic organizations are finding themselves confronting pro-Republican groups. Conservatives have long been frustrated by the march of pro-Democratic single-issue lobbies, and have now started to respond by creating their own grassroots organizations. The Frontiers of Freedom was formed to confront pro-Democratic-environmental groups; the Center for Effective Compassion (headed by Arianna Huffington) faces the Childrens Defense Fund; the Independent Womens Forum (headed by Barbara Ledeen, wife of Iran-Contra/CIA figure Michael Ledeen) fights affirmative action.

22107. Pahlavi, Mohammed-Reza, Shah; Government of Iran. "Part 2: Speech From The Throne (10/6/1967)", in The Revolution: New Dimensions. The Revolution Of The Shah and the People. London: Transient Press, October 1967. "By The Grace of God, We open the answers to the requirements of our own society, as well as, I think, of any other society no matter what its regime. Our revolution, which is based on social justice, on the one hand requires that economic democracy - agrarian, urban, and industrial - should complement political democracy - be based on these cooperatives: i.e., cooperatives for production, cooperatives for distribution and cooperatives for consumption without middlemen who do not perform any positive work."

On the other, the same revolution requires that the welfare of every Iranian should be ensured from the day he is born to the day he dies through various kinds of insurance such as against disease, accidents, retirement, old age and others. This is an objective for which careful efforts will be made. The second principle of the Iranian revolution is the nationalization of some twenty million hectares of forest and pasture lands which are part of the national wealth, and in the creation of which no human being has played a part. Up till the Sixth of Bahman Senatorial Committee. Increasingly, pro-Democratic organizations are finding themselves confronting pro-Republican groups. Conservatives have long been frustrated by the march of pro-Democratic single-issue lobbies, and have now started to respond by creating their own grassroots organizations. The Frontiers of Freedom was formed to confront pro-Democratic-environmental groups; the Center for Effective Compassion (headed by Arianna Huffington) faces the Childrens Defense Fund; the Independent Womens Forum (headed by Barbara Ledeen, wife of Iran-Contra/CIA figure Michael Ledeen) fights affirmative action.

22107. Pahlavi, Mohammed-Reza, Shah; Government of Iran. "Part 2: Speech From The Throne (10/6/1967)", in The Revolution: New Dimensions. The Revolution Of The Shah and the People. London: Transient Press, October 1967. "By The Grace of God, We open the answers to the requirements of our own society, as well as, I think, of any other society no matter what its regime. Our revolution, which is based on social justice, on the one hand requires that economic democracy - agrarian, urban, and industrial - should complement political democracy - be based on these cooperatives: i.e., cooperatives for production, cooperatives for distribution and cooperatives for consumption without middlemen who do not perform any positive work."

On the other, the same revolution requires that the welfare of every Iranian should be ensured from the day he is born to the day he dies through various kinds of insurance such as against disease, accidents, retirement, old age and others. This is an objective for which careful efforts will be made. The second principle of the Iranian revolution is the nationalization of some twenty million hectares of forest and pasture lands which are part of the national wealth, and in the creation of which no human being has played a part. Up till the Sixth of Bahman Senatorial Committee. Increasingly, pro-Democratic organizations are finding themselves confronting pro-Republican groups. Conservatives have long been frustrated by the march of pro-Democratic single-issue lobbies, and have now started to respond by creating their own grassroots organizations. The Frontiers of Freedom was formed to confront pro-Democratic-environmental groups; the Center for Effective Compassion (headed by Arianna Huffington) faces the Childrens Defense Fund; the Independent Womens Forum (headed by Barbara Ledeen, wife of Iran-Contra/CIA figure Michael Ledeen) fights affirmative action.
The effects of these efforts will be visible within a very few years. Obviously, if it is found necessary, shares of other industries will be sold in the same manner as those which are now put up for sale. The fourth and definitely the most important point of the revolution was profit-sharing by workers in the factories where they worked. This revolutionary measure not only gave a better income to the labourer for his toil but at the same time it gave to him the human dignity and personality which was his birthright because he felt that he was no longer being exploited. He felt that he was a shareholder in the factory where he worked. For the correct enforcement, and to make sure that the Iranian labourer gets his 20% share of profits, legislation will be brought in as and when necessary. The fifth point in the Revolution of the Shah and the People was amendment of the Electoral Law, to abolish discriminations which altogether favoured the influential class and which prevented entry of other people into the Parliament. Perhaps one of the most important results of this programme was the freeing of Iranian women from many unfair restrictions and granting of rights to them equal with men. We all know that until the amendment of the Electoral Law, the Iranian woman was treated in the same manner as the mentally unbalanced or financially insolvent and was deprived of her right to vote or contest an election. This meant that nearly half the Iranian population had no say in its own affairs. Our revolution gave millions of Iranian women their human and natural rights: so much so that even in this gathering there are a number of women sent in by the nation to sit beside their brothers and discharge their national duties. At this point it is not out of place to recall one of the most important laws passed by the outgoing House. That is the Family Protection Law which, I hope, will play an effective role in stabilising the family and provide our society with needed security. Perhaps it is not necessary to say much about the Literacy, Health and Development Corpsmen who bear the proud name of the Soldiers of the Revolution, because these soldiers have truly won respect for Iran in foreign countries. The Soldiers of the Revolution represent the highest ideals of civilisation and progress: learning, health and creativity. They take these to the farthest corners of the country and it is only just that the Iranian nation should be proud of its selfless, sincere and responsible sons. Perhaps it will be sufficient to cite these figures to show the output of work by these young men. At present nearly half a million children or adults are going to more than 7000 rural schools run by the Literacy Corpsmen. So far nearly 40000 Literary Corpsmen have served in the countryside. It should, however, not be forgotten that the efforts of these young men are only part of a much wider campaign going on in Iran for the eradication of illiteracy. It will, therefore, not be out of place to mention that at present 2.5 million students are attending more than 15000 primary schools, 600000 students are attending 17000 secondary schools and about 400000 students are going through university education. The number of technical and vocational schools, which did not exist a few years ago, now exceeds one hundred which provide education to more than 17000 young men and women. We are firmly determined that in our country, where more than 80% of the people were illiterate until recently, we shall eradicate illiteracy completely in a few years. Not confining ourselves to this country alone but on the contrary, we have derived inspiration from nations in removing the scourge of illiteracy from human society. The first step was holding a Literacy Congress in Tehran in 1344. Our efforts and the results obtained from the work of the Literacy Corps led to the recognition of Iran by UNESCO as a pioneer and model country in the drive against illiteracy. You are aware that we have decided to make financial contributions from our own budget to UNESCO. In order to ensure faster progress in the eradication of illiteracy, it is necessary that, like male Iranians serving in the Literacy, Health and Development Corps, a number of educated women should be required by law to teach illiterates or help in the improvement of health facilities in the cities and towns where they live. Studies have been launched to determine the best way. The services of the Health and Development Corpsmen are laudable in their own fields both in view of the heavy responsibilities that were entrusted to them and the manner in which they discharged them. Let it be sufficient to say that at present 500 medical groups forming the Health Corps are working in more than 13000 villages for more than six million people. Similarly 2500 Development Corpsmen are working in some 10000 villages. The ninth principle of our revolution was the establishment of the Houses of Justice and Arbitration Councils. These courts transformed the complicated, and often cumbersome and unnecessary, legal procedures by solving ordinary disputes simply. This eased pressure on the Ministry of Justice as well as saving considerable time and expense for the litigants. They gave the villagers an opportunity to spend their money in more productive fields. At present nearly 1000 Houses of Justice are operating in the countryside while fifty Arbitration Councils have been established in the cities. These institutions have jurisdiction over about 1.5 million villagers and about the same number of city dwellers. All the achievements dealt with here briefly show the consequences of the revolution over the last five years. What is important at this stage is to say that to fulfil the revolution we should maintain the spirit which has been the main moving force behind the changes, and work for increasing it. It is for this reason that we have decided to add three other points to our nine-point reform programme so that the changes in Iranian society can move faster and in many directions. One of these three points is the nationalization of water because our physical and atmospheric conditions do not allow us to waste even one drop of water. We must make sure that modern science and techniques assess our surface and underground water resources, both underground and surface. Then with maximum economy we should determine the priorities for the uses of water on the basis of returns for domestic, urban, agricultural and industrial consumption. However, because we have little water in our country, we must use it in the first place on land which is the most productive, so that agricultural centres can be created across the country. Obviously, we shall participate with interest in activities now underway all over the world for the desalination of water and take maximum advantage of any new developments in this field. The second point which must be added to our revolution is the launching of a nationwide programme of reconstruction to provide a better life for Iranian families. These programmes should be launched in both the villages and cities and should be compatible with Iranian social conditions, aiming at the utilisation of our vast natural resources and manpower, for which I hold a high opinion. To achieve this objective our entire resources, intellectual and material, should be brought to bear with the same spirit of change, which is necessary for the accomplishment of such a programme. No complaint should be left unused. The third point relates to an administrative and educational revolution which will meet the requirements of present day society. The meaning of this reform is that any person employed in administration and working in government agencies whether in high or low position, should discharge his duties with complete honesty, sincerity

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iran
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
and responsibility. The spirit of time wastage, paper work and bureaucracy should be eliminated. Every worker should know that in the first place it is his duty to attend to callers who approach him with work and help solve their difficulties quickly, through correct interpretation of law and without personal bias. It is these people who pay the worker’s salary through their taxes. Our offices should be cleansed of the spirit of time killing and indecision. On the other hand, unreasonable and illogical centralisation in which the capital should be the main hub of administration in the provinces and districts should be given an opportunity to show their talent and enterprise in their work. It may even be desirable that service in the capital and other big towns may be made inter-dependent with service in the villages. Similarly, basic and profound reforms are needed in the educational plan of the country. Iranian youth should be given the opportunity to show their talent which should be used in the sphere to which it is best suited. Jobs should be given to people according to their specialisation and experience. It is for this reason that the government has been ordered to launch wide-ranging studies as to the changes required in the educational system in view of the increasing need for trained personnel and top-flight managers. The main aim of the reeducation reform is that the sense of self-reliance and personality of our youth should be developed so that they can shoulder national responsibilities later. In fact, our society should change itself constantly to keep pace with new development and other developed societies, and to walk ahead of them, if possible. In foreign policy we continue on our well-defined path: we follow a national independence policy based on international cooperation and understanding, protection of our own national rights and respect to those of others. We firmly believe that this international understanding and cooperation is a vital prerequisite for all societies, anywhere in the world and with any kind of government. In this field we not only believe in co-existence but also peaceful cooperation between nations of different regimes. The success achieved by us in many spheres of national rights speaks well that we are on the right and wise path. From the point of view of international relations, we continue to abide by the principles and regulations of the UN Charter, and although recently signs of weakness have been visible in the world body, we firmly believe that it is still the best body to solve international disputes. We hope the day will come when the world organisation is able to make decisions and enforce them. As one of the founder members of the United Nations, we reiterate our allegiance to it and sincerely back it.

It is for this reason that we believe that any country recognised by the UN should have the right to exist and no other country should threaten its destruction. We support non-proliferation of atomic arms, declaration of atom-free zones and complete and general disarmament through controlled supervision. But at the same time, while guaranteed disarmament is not a reality we have no option but to strengthen our defences to safeguard our territorial integrity despite all the friends in pacts of which we are members. Unfortunately, recently events occurred in the Middle East which have hurt our feelings based on Muslim brotherhood. Naturally our sympathies were immediately aroused. We announced immediately and repeat today that occupation of any country’s territory by another country is unacceptable. This truth should be understood clearly: the days of speaking through force and military adventurare are over for ever. Quick military victories should have no intoxicating or blinding effects. We hope that this House of Parliament, which will consider the Fourth Development Plan and witness the 2500th Anniversary of Iranian Monarchy, will have as much success in its work as the previous one. We hope that the Fourth Plan will prepare the ground on which the Fifth and later plans can be drafted, and within the course of one generation we may catch up with other developed societies, and to walk ahead of them in foreign policy we continue on our well-defined path: the new development and other developed societies, and to walk ahead of them if possible. In the field of international relations, we continue to abide by the principles and regulations of the UN Charter, and although recently signs of weakness have been visible in the world body, we firmly believe that it is still the best body to solve international disputes. We hope the day will come when the world organisation is able to make decisions and enforce them. As one of the founder members of the United Nations, we reiterate our allegiance to it and sincerely back it.

It is for this reason that we believe that any country recognised by the UN should have the right to exist and no other country should threaten its destruction. We support non-proliferation of atomic arms, declaration of atom-free zones and complete and general disarmament through controlled supervision. But at the same time, while guaranteed disarmament is not a reality we have no option but to strengthen our defences to safeguard our territorial integrity despite all the friends in pacts of which we are members. Unfortunately, recently events occurred in the Middle East which have hurt our feelings based on Muslim brotherhood. Naturally our sympathies were immediately aroused. We announced immediately and repeat today that occupation of any country’s territory by another country is unacceptable. This truth should be understood clearly: the days of speaking through force and military adventurare are over for ever. Quick military victories should have no intoxicating or blinding effects. We hope that this House of Parliament, which will consider the Fourth Development Plan and witness the 2500th Anniversary of Iranian Monarchy, will have as much success in its work as the previous one. We hope that the Fourth Plan will prepare the ground on which the Fifth and later plans can be drafted, and within the course of one generation we may catch up with other advanced countries of the world. The government will undoubtedly discharge its duties for the achievement of this goal and I am confident that Parliament will also endeavour to do its duty fully aware of the responsibility that rests on its shoulders. At the same time, however, we firmly believe that it is the Iranian nation which will work with greater will, faith and confidence in the promotion of the movement which has shown its effects within a few short years in the political, social, economic, intellectual and material fields. We are glad to say that during the last three years the annual economic growth of our country has averaged over 11% while the cost of living has been almost stationary. However, it must be understood that this was quite exceptional. We will try to maintain this rate in the future so that an average rate of 9% per annum should be maintained in economic growth. We must pay special attention to agriculture because by doing so we will be performing two jobs. First, we shall be able to improve Iranian food in the sense that every Iranian will have more and better to eat as compared to the past or present. Secondly, we will be fulfilling our duty to humanity and other people who face food shortages. Let us not forget that by the end of this century the world will have passed through a most serious food situation unless nations from the start cooperate, so that remedies may be found before it is too late. The special attention that we are giving to agriculture and the plans which we have for development require that the Ministry of Agriculture should be broken into a number of other ministries. I would like to take this opportunity to recall one basic measure that was taken recently to ensure continuity in the regime by the Constituent Assembly. We pray to God Almighty to keep this ancient nation under his constant mercy and provide us with all opportunities to maintain through hard work on the basis of the revolution the high ideals of Islam. I wish you all success in the grave responsibilities that you should as representatives of the nation.

First and foremost as an Iranian, then as one devoted to the principles of democracy and freedom, and finally as the lawful heir to the Iranian throne, I come forward, in these critical times, to join voices with my fellow countrymen to speak as one, to strive side by side and to save our country from the brink of destruction.

In these bitter days of separation from my homeland, not even for a fleeting moment, have my thoughts drifted from you and our country.

Above the day to day political gamesmanship and maneuverings, I have been continuously studying ways and means of taking advantage of conditions and trends conducive to the liberation of the Iranian people.

Ever since I assumed my lawful responsibilities, my efforts have been directed, on the one hand, toward bringing the voice of the oppressed people of Iran to the attention of the world, thereby exposing the cruelties inflicted upon them, and on the other hand, toward creating situations which would assist us in the struggle to liberate our country.

It has been necessary to carry out all efforts with caution and sagacity. With your participation and without any foreign intervention, we shall direct ourselves toward a path leading to independence, national sovereignty and the good of our countrymen. On this path I have, like all those who strive for right and righteousness, shunned all fears and hesitation.

I have separated myself from my kith and kin, dedicating all my being to the service of Iran and its people. Although young in years, destiny has thrown me into the path of events from which I have gained a great deal of experience.

My sole desire is to see the sacred land of Iran once again; not for reasons of pomp and glory, but rather, in the hope of breaking the shackles of tyranny so that we may all achieve freedom together--free from fear, free from want and joblessness, and free from violations of religion, thought, life and property. Like thousands of Iranians who are sacrificing their lives for their country, I too am prepared to tread the same path. There is nothing holding me back from such a sacrifice. Together with you, we shall eradicate cruelty and oppression. We shall destroy the oppressors and vindicate the oppressed. I do not advocate vengeance, rather I support the establishment of law and justice.

I believe this to be my destiny, and I have no doubt that in the end, light shall conquer darkness. Our ancestral land has witnessed and shall direct ourselves toward a path leading to independence, national sovereignty and the good of our countrymen. On this path I have, like all those who strive for right and righteousness, shunned all fears and hesitation.

I have separated myself from my kith and kin, dedicating all my being to the service of Iran and its people. Although young in years, destiny has thrown me into the path of events from which I have gained a great deal of experience.

My sole desire is to see the sacred land of Iran once again; not for reasons of pomp and glory, but rather, in the hope of breaking the shackles of tyranny so that we may all achieve freedom together--free from fear, free from want and joblessness, and free from violations of religion, thought, life and property. Like thousands of Iranians who are sacrificing their lives for their country, I too am prepared to tread the same path. There is nothing holding me back from such a sacrifice. Together with you, we shall eradicate cruelty and oppression. We shall destroy the oppressors and vindicate the oppressed. I do not advocate vengeance, rather I support the establishment of law and justice.

I believe this to be my destiny, and I have no doubt that in the end, light shall conquer darkness. Our ancestral land has witnessed and survived many such vicissitudes in the past.
Let us not stray. A glance at the events of nearly 80 years ago which triggered the Constitutional Revolution, will prove this point.

With the dawn of the industrial economy in Europe, the relationships between countries underwent a drastic change. Industrial development became the main instrument of power in the world. Through industrial expansion, European countries gained access to the non-industrialized world. Analogous with this change, the closed economy of the latter took a new form. The era of colonialism had begun. Asia, Africa and Latin America became exporters of cheap raw materials and importers of expensively manufactured goods from Europe and, later, North America. Political trends became dependent upon a system of production and distribution of commodities. The industrial powers divided the world into spheres of influence.

In the meantime, by virtue of its geographical location, Iran became subjected to the political influences of two strong powers from the north and the south. [Russia and Great Britain.] The influence of these two powers, together with that of their Iranian puppets, kept the country in a state of chaos and backwardness. At the same time, their rivalries and efforts to gain the upper hand in Iran, opened the eyes of the people to certain realities. The idea of the Constitutional Revolution, springing as it did from the midst of these rivalries, and supported by the efforts and endeavors of the progressive elements in Iran, was designed to save the country from such foreign influence.

The nation suffered poverty and illiteracy under the yoke of despotism from which it knew no respite. Intellectuals, politicians, the clergy and those merchants who had visited foreign lands and were aware of the economic and social changes in the West began to orientate and guide public opinion covertly and otherwise. Despotism and despots resisted. The nation revolted. The political and religious institutions--those two main pillars of Iran's social structure--each became divided. Freedom-loving clergymen sided with the liberal politicians. Reactionaries rushed to the aid of the despots. But liberty was victorious and autocracy was supplanted by a constitutional monarchy.

The aims and objectives of the Constitution were:
— to change the administrative and social order,
— to entrust the destiny of the people to their legally elected representatives, — to create a strong central Army, Police and Gendarmerie Corps in place of a scattered and ill-equipped force, — to codify civil and penal law,
— to organize the department of justice, and to replace the contradictory verdicts of so-called religious leaders by a just implementation of the law,
— to establish legal security,
— to secure participation for women in national affairs,
— to establish and expand modern educational facilities, in order to develop and give conformity to elementary and secondary schools, universities and technical and vocational institutions; a program similar to that which had been initiated by Amir Kabir [Nasser-ed-Din Shah's Chancellor, 1848 A.D.] and which was thwarted by strong opposition from reactionary clergymen,
— to increase the number of Iranian students sent to the developed countries for higher education—something previous progressive monarchs had initiated and that led to an awareness which gave life to the idea of constitutional monarchy.

Thus the aims of the Constitutional Revolution of Iran and the results obtained therefrom, allowed the nation to fall in line with the march of world civilization. [=] more day-to-day experiences. And basically everybody was concerned with their own life and interests.

I enrolled in school, hoping I would meet people. At the beginning, I felt very invisible, as I had at my primary school. I stood on the outside looking in; I could watch other people interacting, but they couldn’t see me. After a few months of taking classes, there was some interaction with some of them, but not really any kind of friendship. It always amazed me how people said “hello,” called me by name, but never ever were further than that. I still wonder why they bothered learning names. I only ask for someone’s name if there is further interest in interacting, and that is the way it was back home. I finally realized that saying “hello,” calling you by your name, and even stopping to ask “how are you?” are just routine—-they even do it in the supermarket.

After a period of resistance, anger and depression, I started to see how I could fit into this new kind of friendship. Soon I realized I could talk about my feelings much more freely than I used to, and if at any moment I did not feel like doing something, even though I had made a prior arrangement to do it, I could say “no.” Certainly, saying no was much easier. I could be more and more of who I am.

I had a lot of time to myself and started viewing myself in a very different light. I could express my feelings and became less trapped in my head. Therefore I could talk about my very deep feelings without any fear of judgment. I remember back home when we were hurt we never really talked about it. It was a matter of withdrawing for a few days, followed by the intervention (meddling) of other friends, who would finally bring the two parties back together.

After moving to Northern California, I entered a world where I could be more and more myself. I came out as a lesbian and therefore started to spend time with lesbians. It was very exciting. I never felt so comfortable and joyful being with women who are like me, who no longer have to accept me, but we share a world, view. So close to my own identity. There were many times while speaking to my lesbian friends that I felt so close, I found myself forgetting that I was speaking a language different from my own.

What I am most enjoying is again a sense of freedom of expression and sharing very deep feelings that I cannot share with my Iranian friends. I can easily say no, and if I am hurt, I can easily acknowledge it. As for my Iranian friends, I still have a strong bond, a lifelong connection, although I can’t talk about my feelings, and especially not my hurt feelings, very easily or directly. Every time we start talking about it, the focus shifts from “I feel hurt and angry” to “You are this or that or basically you are the cause of my misery.” A great part of it is that in my culture, individuals essentially don’t hold themselves responsible for much of anything. As individuals, they barely accept any responsibility for their actions or feelings. I would like to make a few references to this: Unlike here, where everyone feels responsible for their misery or happiness in life, in Iran, most people blame the circumstances, such as the order of the cosmos, for their shortcomings in life. Approximately 20000000 people participated in the revolution, but at this point, a large majority of Iranians believe the revolution was made by the US or UK, or by a collaboration between those two powers. There could be some truth to this, but not being responsible certainly fits other parts of our culture. A very simple example is that instead of saying “I cut my hand,” we usually say “the knife cut my hand.” At any rate, when it comes to friendship, no one focuses on herself or himself, her or his needs and responsibilities, and that makes it hard to talk about such things. So now I understand why friends withdraw when they are hurt.

Despite this, there are still other valuable aspects of my relationships with my Iranian friends that I haven’t yet discussed, and those are sharing and giving. Being generous and willing to give and share is part of being able to extend yourself for another person; there is mutual joy in sharing. And in giving, whether of material or non-material goods. If I invite a friend out or buy her something, it is not expected that she pay me back right away, or if we go out, there is almost a fight between those who want to pay. And of course if I pay today, it is because I like to pay. Also, when I am in a relationship that feels timeless, and there is a strong sense of trust, it is almost like a “karmic rule” that you receive what you give out. Life is a give-and-take, and so is friendship:

what you give out you will receive someday, somehow, whether it is the same or not.

Being at the place I am now and looking back at my different friends and relationships, I can’t say which one I like better; I enjoy every one of them in a different way. There are, of course, positive and negative points in both cultures. In sum, what I like with my Iranian friends is the eternal sense of trust and giving, and what I like with my American friends is sharing the same feelings, being free to say “no,” and feeling free to express my resentment without fear. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][—]

Iranian women are the primary losers of Khomeini’s regime, although there are no winners in a country where human rights are suppressed and peace has long been gone. Khomeini’s policy against women stems from a reactionary view that promotes the idea that women’s primary tasks are housekeeping and pleasing men.

To establish this society based on strictly delineated male and female roles, and where women are completely dependent on men, requires limiting women’s independence in every way. Obviously, education is viewed as a potentially dangerous activity.

In fact, Khomeini’s policy targets a century of struggle by Iranian women for literacy and better education. At the turn of the century, women’s education became a focal point for women as well as the state which saw it as a way to “modernize” Iran. Women’s efforts and the official policies together gradually expanded women’s educational opportunities. Education for girls became compulsory, and girls’ primary schools sprang up all over the country and developed into high schools, colleges and universities. Initially, boys’ and girls’ education was completely separate, but mixed schools began to appear on the primary level about 20 years ago. Even so, there were very few, if any, mixed high schools but college level classes were mixed. Nonetheless, illiteracy remained high, especially among rural women for whom it had decreased from 99% in 1956 to 91% in 1971.

However, the product of a century of effort did result in professional women gaining access to academic, technical, administrative, management, and business jobs. Today the situation has been reversed by the Mullas (Shi’a priests). Their policy has sharply reduced the number of girls attending schools and prevents those who do from pursuing higher education.

The following report from Iran Liberation, 1/4/1985, is an account of the Mullas’ policy on girls’ education in Iran.

The views and decisions of the Iranian Education Ministry have been described to reporters by a senior official of the Ministry His comments reflect the regime’s attitude towards girls’ education.

The Undersecretary for Research and Planning, Hadad Aadel, speaking about a new plan which seeks to educate girls in housekeeping, said: “On the whole, the administrative, educational and labour regulations in the Islamic Republic have not yet been adjusted in accordance with the nature of women. Our colleagues in the technical and vocational training department have decided to create a new course in housekeeping for high school girls, so that their life and energy is not spent on courses which are of no use to them.”

The truth is that this regime, step by step, has implemented its plan to completely bar women from economic, social and cultural activities According to the regime’s programmes, only a limited number of women are allowed to study and specialise so that they can meet women’s medical and educational needs, the latter of which will gradually diminish in time.

In a revealing story, the official newspaper Ettela’at reports: “Two years ago, the Education Ministry issued a circular totally banning mixed classes at all levels. In addition, all classes were required to have at least ten pupils. But in many villages the number of pupils was less than ten and so the classes were closed. Girl students in a village in Takestan said: ‘The education authorities of Takestan refused to send a teacher to our village because they said there are too few of us. But in fact there were twenty girls in the first grade of high school and eleven girls in the second grade. So they have denied us education.’

The next step was to undertake an extensive propaganda campaign in schools. Agents of the regime working as ‘Education Affairs Instructors’ extensively encouraged girls to marry. They stressed the futility of girls receiving education. In many girls’ high schools, mathematics courses were closed on the pretext that there was a shortage of teachers and facilities. Girls are told, ‘Find a husband and lead a normal life!’

The so-called ‘Headquarters of the Cultural Revolution’ has issued a circular which deprives women from studying many university subjects. Women are barred from enrolling in courses in agriculture, farming and gardening, oil refining, gas and chemical industries, mining, construction, iron and steel production and chemical engineering.

Girls also came to face serious restrictions in studying other subjects. The percentage of seats open to female applicants is 25% in pharmacy, 20% in genetics, and a mere 5% in dentistry. Female graduates can go on with their studies and specialise in only a few select courses [and must occupy the back seats of the class while the men sit up front].

Today, out of about 1.8 million primary school girls, less than a third enter high school. About 1.3 million have no choice but to give up schooling in order to find employment in workshops and factories, or to work without reward in the home. In the academic year 1980-81, only 38,000 girls managed to enter high school. All indications are that this number is still falling.

Further Readings: Women of Iran: The Conflict with Fundamentalist Islam, edited by Farah Azarit, Ithaca, Press, London, 1983. Connexions, see articles on Iran in issues on Militarism (n. 11), Prostitution (n. 12) and Women’s Movements (n. 19). Contact: Iranian Women’s Independent Group, P.O. Box 9829, Berkeley, CA 94709. Slide show on Iranian women available for San Francisco Bay Area viewing. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712, Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

Men have authority over women because God has made the one superior to the other, and because they [men] spend their wealth to maintain them [to support women]. Good women are obedient, they guard their unseemly parts because God has guarded them. As for those from whom you fear rebellion or disobedience, admonish them and send them to beds apart and BEAT them. Then if they obey you take no further action against them. God is high supreme. —Sureh Nisa-34

These are the words of God as depicted by his prophet Mohammed, justifying violence against women by men. But not all women. Only the rebellious or the disobedient ones. How are these women treated in present-day Iran? Violence has many dimensions and it appears in many different forms, circumstances, and places. But let us look at the violence that has existed in public places. Whether during the Shah’s regime or Khomeini’s, the harassment has always been there (but in different forms). It was never easy for women to go out in public and not get abused—either verbally or physically.

Walking in the streets and shopping was always a hassle. Any man who would walk by us, if he could get close, would commit some kind of physical abuse, or if he was not close he would be verbally abusive, or even both. So as women, we learn to look and act fast. We were constantly watching and zigzagging across the street.

During the Shah’s era, there was no official dress code for women. The behavior of the harassing thugs was not morally or socially accepted. They could get in trouble if an officer was around. Although the government could prevent the harassment perpetrated by men against women, they didn’t care enough to impose laws against it. On one level, the actions of these thugs were subject to punishment; on the other level, they were not taken seriously enough be stopped completely. The abusive behavior was an avenue for the men to let out their frustration.

After the Shah was overthrown, women hoped that they would have real protection and voice in the government. Instead, their situation worsened. The harassment continued, but now it was sanctioned by those in power. Official Islamic policy enacted a dress code for women. Those who didn’t abide by the code were subject to severe punishment. The dress code is called Hijab-e-islami. Hijab means any partition that separates two things. In the Koran it has the sense of a curtain or a veil. In Iran, it has a more specific meaning, covering. A woman is supposed to cover herself from head to foot. She is only allowed to show her face and her hands. The shape of the garment sworn over the clothes must be loose so as not to show any curve of the body. The color should be dark or dull. An ideal Moslem woman wears a black chador—a fabric that loosely drapes from head to toe. She also wears flat shoes. High heels are forbidden because they make noise that supposedly excites men. Makeup is also forbidden because it supposedly excites men. In fact, the discreet woman hides all but her eyes beneath her chador.

A clergyman described this incident on T.V.: ‘A man was passed by a beautiful woman on the street. The woman was fully covered, except for her face, which was too beautiful to be ignored. The man, of course, desired her, so out of frustration he went home and beat up his wife. The moral conclusion of the story is that if the beautiful woman’s face had been uncovered, nothing would have happened, and everyone would be happy.

In order to prevent any “disobedient” woman from appearing in public, there are four revolutionary guardsmen and women (male-identified women) marching the streets all day and night. They will arrest any woman who is not behaving according to Islamic law or to the guardsman’s personal law:

There is no predictable punishment for women. Once a woman is arrested she could be subjected to 80 lashes, imprisonment, verbal abuse, or she could go free, depending on her behavior. If the arrested woman lowers herself and plays it humble, she might be free, but to argue or even resist arrest is very costly.

The revolutionary guards are not the only people who could execute punishment. Every good Moslem has a duty to warn, or attempt to arrest women who he or she thinks are wrongdoers.

Four years ago, I was in Iran, and I went to the Caspian Sea with two other women to take care of some family business. One day we decided to go for a walk in a place where we used to do a lot of hiking. As we were walking, a man approached us and asked us what we were doing there and who we were. Since we had dressed according to the official code, we told him he had no right to disturb us, especially since he was not a guard. He told us that in the Islamic republic, every man is a guard and it was his Islamic duty to prevent us from going walking. We got into a long and disturbing argument. Meanwhile, other men approached, in order to support him. Finally, he told us that he did not trust our “brain,” and went to call the guards. In frustration and anger, we went back, fearing we might be stopped and taken away at any time.

We were at the Caspian Sea for four days and we were stopped and questioned three times. The last time, we were heading back to Tehran. As we were getting gas along the way, four guards stopped us and took us back to our place to question us, as well as other people with whom we were staying. They cross-examined us and after two hours, because we played it really humble, they let us go.

In every crisis, in order to distract people, the government focuses on women, and the harassment escalates. The media starts attacking the improper wearing of hijab, the streets, and the school. Workplaces become dungeons. A few months ago, during one of these attacks on women, the administrators asked the girls’ schools to watch their students. A girl aged 16 who had been given warnings a few times for her “bad” behavior was expelled from school. According to her mother, after The shoddy state of the film industry in Iran. to drive there every day. The Revolutionary Guards guarding the economic poverty usually leads to cultural poverty. This is reflected in cinema. Pars Theatre was located exactly opposite a Mosque. We used Iranian cinema was. There are a lot of poor people in Iran, and I think that power struggle that went on between the Mosque and the theatre and society would change. It did not take long for my dreams to be shattered. I appear in films or theatre)?

Q: How did you become a Mam Nou Ul Chehreh (forbidden to Britain. I was not allowed to see my son for 12 years—not until I arrived in Once I had a Kurdish-style scarf instead of the government-designated convenience did not work; I got a divorce, and lost custody of my three-had any make-up on. They would threaten to execute me in the house. My mother supported me by telling him that I wanted to attend my brother's piano classes. I went to rehearsals for a short while, until one day my father turned up at the rehearsal. He was furious. He took me home and would not let me out of the house until my sister convinced him that I should learn English. I pretended I was going for English lessons while I was really attending rehearsals. This is how I managed to appear in my first TV play.

After this my father agreed to my appearing in other plays as long as he could turn up at the first rehearsal to put me in the care of the directors or producers. This made me think that if I married an actor my Forces on my back. They would enter my dressing room without guaranteeing that I would never again give interviews. It was like signing a severe depression, she committed suicide.

But women are resisting the oppression, and the suppression by the state. Women utilize any avenue they can to express themselves. In their day-to-day lives, they resist hijab-e-islami. There are more women writers now than during the Shah's era. One of them was arrested and imprisoned for her book, The Women without Men. Women are appearing in public places more and more, and they talk against the government, despite the extremely dangerous situation. They have not given up. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

Farzaneh Taidi is an actress. She was smuggled out of Iran a few months ago, and now lives in exile in London. What she has gone through in Iran under the Shah and then under the Khomeini regime typifies the life of many Iranian women. The interview was conducted by Rana Bahar, who has chosen to live in London rather than under the Khomeini regime.

Q: You must have faced many problems before you became a wellknown actress; could you tell us how you coped?

A: I was committed to becoming a professional actress, and to fighting against all difficulties. I have now been an actress for over 18 years. My first and most important obstacle was my father. He was against my becoming an actress because—the majority of Iranians—he considered acting an unsuitable profession for women. Women in Iran are expected to get married as soon as they leave school; by the age of seventeen they have had their first if not their second child. Women are not expected to work outside the home.

Q: How did you manage to overcome this fate?

A: I had to think of ways to free myself of my father's hold on me. I was lucky to have the support of my sister and certain friends of the family. Coming from the upper middle classes also helped me to be in the right place at the right time. This accounted for my first TV appearance. A friend who knew people in the Office of Dramatic Arts in Teheran told me that they were looking for someone to play the role of a European woman. My blonde hair and Nordic features made me ideal for the role. When my father came home, this friend mentioned that this play was being rehearsed and asked if it was all right for me to attend the rehearsal. My father agreed, and the next day I went to audition and got the job. The problem was then how to trick my father into letting me out of the house. My mother supported me by telling him that I wanted to attend my brother's piano classes. I went to rehearsals for a short while, until one day my father turned up at the rehearsal. He was furious. He took me home and would not let me out of the house until my sister convinced him that I should learn English. I pretended I was going for English lessons while I was really attending rehearsals. This is how I managed to appear in my first TV play.

Q: But we know that those who produce films are upper-class, highly educated men. Why have they not been able to create an alternative world view for the Iranian culture?

A: If you are asking me why Iranian cinema has been so sexist and commercial, I would argue that it is related to the structure of our poverty-stricken society. The fact is that the majority of Iranian women and men are illiterate and poor. This means that they are not making intellectual demands upon the intelligentsia who do not bother to produce any meaningful, realistic, or responsible art forms. Those who have a lot of money own the film industry and make their own films. These people are the most reactionary people in Iran in terms of cultural values and standards. Men who want money and fame meet young, lower-middle class women, and promise to make them movie stars. They introduce these women to commercial directors, who first spend a few days and nights with them in bed. Then they introduce them to drugs and ask them to act in their pornographic films. Many such women, betrayed and abused emotionally, physically, and sexually, commit suicide.

Q: Have directors and producers treated you similarly?

A: I never appeared in commercial films because they had no place for serious female roles. But even alternative and so-called progressive filmmakers were very patriarchal in their attitude to women. There are no positive and active roles for women other than those of prostitute and mother/housewife. I appeared in 10 films between 1973 and 1978, I played serious female roles in nine out of 10, yet my roles in all of these films were minimal. The leading character was always a man. Iranian history has produced several strong and distinguished women, such as Parvin Etesaami, a poet and philosopher, and Gorat ul Aine, a women's rights campaigner of the 18th and 19th centuries. But filmmakers in Iran never consider making a film about either of these two women.

Q: Couldn't you try to write your own script and direct your own films, so that you could portray women in a different manner?

A: When I turned 30, and had just begun to feel confident and experienced enough to do such things, the Islamic Revolution took over. And that compounded the obstacles I faced. My first troubles with the Islamic Republic began in 1979, only seven months after Khomeini's takeover. In 2/1979, a journalist from the German magazine STERN asked me to comment on the impact of the Islamic Revolution on women. I said that I was very concerned about the future of women under the Khomeini regime. I explained how some 50 years ago, because women were not supposed to be seen in public, male drag artists played women's roles in the theatre and cinema. I was concerned that those days might return. I said that the revolution was a disaster for progressive women. Immediately after it was published, my statement was picked up by the Islamic Revolutionary Courts. Since then I have become the subject of unprecedented mental and psychological torture.

At the time I was working with my husband, Behrooz Behnezad, in Pars Theatre in Teheran. I was about to go on the stage when the phone rang and I was summoned to the Courts immediately. They interrogated me for three days, at the end of which they forced me to sign papers guaranteeing that I would never again give interviews. It was like signing away my own personal freedom.

From the moment of my arrest until the day I left Iran five months ago, I have had the Revolutionary Guards and the Committee's Armed Forces on my back. They would enter my dressing room without knocking. Their impression of actresses is that they are sexually available. They would pull out handkerchiefs to make sure we did not have any make-up on. They would threaten to execute me in the revolutionary manner if I refused to observe Islamic uniform on the stage. Once I had a Kurdish-style scarf instead of the government-designated black, grey, or navy blue. Armed guards immediately appeared backstage and stopped the show.

Q: How did you become a Mam Nou Ul Chehreh (forbidden to appear in films or theatre)?

A: It was a long process, which I saw as an integral part of the power struggle that went on between the Mosque and the theatre and cinema. Pars Theatre was located exactly opposite a Mosque. We used to drive there every day. The Revolutionary Guards guarding the Mosque and the Mullahs running it were not happy to see hundreds of our fans rushing towards our car every day. Pars Theatre had 850 seats and gave three shows a day, which were always sold out. On Fridays we had an extra show at 3 p.m. for those who attended Friday prayers at the Mosque; that show, too, was always sold out. People would travel from as far away as Mashhad (over 1000 miles) to see our plays. Theatre at that time was a very powerful means of communication, while the Mosque had only just begun to be a power base. The Mullahs did not like our growing popularity. They started to compete with us, offering talks by Islamic leaders together with free three-course lunches. Eventually they demanded that Pars Theatre remove displayed pictures of women actresses. Some months later they demanded that women's names not be mentioned in any form of advertising, not even in the box-office area. They knew that our life-line was our audience, and they were trying different ways of attracting them away from us. Fortunately, none of their attempts worked—we were always fully booked. That's when they started threatening us with death. Then and there I gave up acting.

356

Q: Did they ever approach you with suggestions of cooperation with the Islamic system?
A: Yes, on numerous occasions we were approached by the Ministry of Information and Guidance with scripts for films. My part in one film was so ridiculous and so obviously propagandist that I was disgusted. According to the script, I was to play a village wife with several children. I am standing on the roof of my house; my few-months-old baby is there too. I become furious with anger for some reason. In blind anger I pick up the baby and throw it down from the roof. Before the baby touches the ground, I am to realise what I have done and scream, "Allah Ul Akbar" (God is great) and "Ya Khomeini," and two magical hands are to appear from nowhere and hold the baby, save it just before it touches the ground.

I refused to act in such a film. The film was to be directed by younger Mullahs or their relatives, with money provided by the government. I wrote back saying I would not be party to the spread of naivete and ignorance among village women. That was the ultimate disobedience. I was forbidden to appear in any films or plays.

Q: The Islamic Republic is repressive and offensive to Iranian women. Why don't they revolt against the state?
A: The major barrier is that the majority of women, about 70%, are illiterate. This is because parents do not believe in educating their daughters; women are supposed to be wives and mothers only. Another barrier is the isolation women in the cities face. They have no experience of organizing together to fight for their rights. Forming a liberation movement is a historical process that does not happen overnight. In the Western societies of today, women have the benefit of historical experiences such as the fight for the right to vote, to own property. But we don't have such experiences, or knowledge of them is denied to us by the dictatorial governments we have been living under since the early 18th century.

Q: Is there anything women in the West could do to support Iranian women?
A: The feminists in the West should raise their own awareness of how their imperialist governments contribute to the repression of women in Iran. What is happening in Iran today is the result of concerted Western support for the Islamic government. Do Western feminists know that their state machinery was involved in bringing Khomeini to power? They should fight against their own governments' involvement in Iran. Only when Western support is withdrawn, only then, Iranian women will find some breathing space to think of organizing themselves and fighting for their own liberation.

Contact: Women Living Under Muslim Laws, International Solidarity Network, 34980 Combaillaux (Montpellier) France. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] discussion groups on Iranian history, migration and biculturality and workshops on American customs should be organized to help Iranians deal more effectively with the integration of the two cultures. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] =*

The Iranian revolution of 1979 remains a turning point in the recent history of the entire Middle East. This epochal event unleashed a whirlwind of historical forces that has swept across the region and has had serious repercussions throughout the world. From Algeria to Egypt to Saudi Arabia and on to Kuwait, Islamic ideology is challenging autocratic and corrupt secular governments. While high officials in these countries point their fingers to foreign interference notably from Iran as the cause of their troubles, the main reason for the success and spread of Islamic ideology in the region is economic inequality, lack of political freedom, and corrupt governments. The imitation of Western type democracies in the Islamic countries of the region in the 20th century has not provided a viable vehicle for growth in the economic sphere, nor has it provided a sound political mechanism in which masses can participate in the decision-making process. Islamic ideology is more indigenous to the culture of these countries, and it preaches an economically egalitarian system and politically one in which people can have a voice. For some countries like Egypt the Islamist groups hardly have to look to Iran for inspiration or ideas. The origins and activities of, for example, the Muslim Brotherhood date back to decades before 1979.

Presently Iran is the only country in modern times to have instituted a theocratic regime, with a cleric as the head of state and a Fagheh (highest religious authority) with supreme political power. With all its shortcomings, Iran's post-revolutionary government is a curious kind of Persian-style democracy. The country's 270-seat Majlis (or parliament) is a lively and important forum for debate. However, the Majlis' decisions are subject to long reviews and approval by the Council of Guardians, a watchdog group of six clerics and six laymen with veto power. Moreover, it is the Council of Guardians that must approve the legitimacy of all candidates for elections. Therefore, its political system is a controlled and distinctive kind of democracy. To address this issue one of our panelists today will examine the evolution of Iran's theocratic regime since its inception in 1979.

When dealing with the issue of the role of women one has to understand the culture of the region. One cannot consider this problem in a Western frame of mind. The culture of Middle Eastern countries is basically male-dominated, probably no one has expressed this feeling better than Iran's late and legendary woman poet Forough Farkhizad when she says:

"Come here, o self-centered male creature, come open the door of the cage. / I am that bird, that bird who for a long time / has had thoughts in her head of flying... / Come open the door so that / I might spread my wings.../ toward the bright sky of poetry./ If you allow me flight/ I will become a flower/ in the rose garden of poetry..."

To get a flavor of this male-dominated mentality it is worth mentioning that just this month the Iranian Majlis defeated a proposal by women members to create a committee on women's issues. One opponent of the bill, Deputy Abbas Abbasi who is a cleric, maintained, "Women must accept that men rule over them, and the world, too, should know that man is dominant." Abbasi then further argued that, "If a women's committee is to be set up, we should also form a men's committee. If this motion is carried, we will be hearing murmurs tomorrow about a minister for women's affairs."

In the Western frame of mind, the veil or hejab, is a sign of repression. But for true Islamists, the veil is a sign of modesty and purity. It is a rejection of the allegedly Western idea of woman as a commercial and sexual object. Paradoxically, under the clerical regime Iranian women are gaining some form of political power. In the last elections to the Majlis in 6/1992, 9 of the 270 deputies elected were women. This is more than the number of females in the US Senate. Under current clerical rule women seem to have gained a greater sense of participation and identity than under the previous regime when all norms were Western and irrelevant to native traditions. "Zan-e Ruz, a women's magazine, which before the revolution devoted its format to Western fashions, housekeeping, and child care, has been drastically transformed into a journal of social and cultural debate surrounding the issues of women and their place in today's Iran. By wearing the veil, the badge of modesty and purity, women are able to move around freely and are beginning to compel the state to back up its claims to the equality of men and women in Islam."

Two of our speakers - one a westerner and the other an Iranian (but not a Muslim) will examine, from their own perspectives, the sensitive and vital issue of women in Iran today.

Any revolutionary movement promises a utopia in which human values are going to be respected and freedom of expression protected. Iran was no exception. Recently, Iran and a few other countries have adopted a defensive attitude on what they maintain are uniquely western criteria used to judge violations of human rights. One reason for this stand is that by western standards Iran's record is not a good one.

In post-revolutionary Iran, despite all the claims of the Islamic regime to a just and free society, the limits of discourse have been strictly defined. There are no independent newspapers. Books and films are issued a permit only after passing a process of close religious and political scrutiny. Magazines are generally precluded from covering political matters and every issue of a publication must first be submitted to the Ministry of Culture and Islamic Guidance. Artists and intellectuals run the risk of censorship or banning. In the case of books and films such banning can be financially ruinous to the creator.

Radio and television, the two important mass media, are under direct control of the government. For a country in which at least 50% of the population is illiterate, this provides an effective means of control.

Freedom to organize political parties with views not aligned with the prevailing ideology is strictly prohibited. For '91 Amnesty International documented 775 executions, of which at least 60 were the result of convictions on political charges; and for 1992, there were 330 executions, of which at least 140 had been formally charged with political offenses.

To examine this controversial issue one of our speakers who, at Middle East Watch, a human rights organization, has been closely monitoring Iran's record, is going to present us with his observations.

The Department of Economics & Finance is proud to sponsor this conference which will examine such vital issues. Personally, and on behalf of Montclair State, I would like to thank each of the speakers for accepting my invitation to take part in this session. We are honored to have them with us today and hope they will benefit from this discourse as much as we do. [Kamrouz Pirouz: Chair and Conference Coordinator]

Iranian women have never been passive in their pursuit of freedom. From the tobacco strikes at the turn of the century to the student movements and mass uprisings in the 1960s and '70s, Iranian women have been active in social and political protest. However, they have not formed independent women's organizations, although they have demonstrated on several occasions for women's rights. After Khomeini came to power, women constructed several groups, but these were subsets of liberal, leftist and other groups in which the "women's issue" was always the last to be considered.

In the nineteenth century, two patriarchal orders confronted each other. One was the secular patriarchy presenting a new but contradictory policy towards women, and the other, a clerical patriarchy committed to upholding the Islamic law. The history of women's oppression and women's struggle in Iran is embedded in the modernisation movement.
on the one hand, and the power of Islam on the other. The modernisation movement in Iran first began in the early 19th century when students and merchants, travelling in Europe, were impressed by the achievements of the European Industrial Revolution. During the second half of the 19th century, modernisation took on a more direct form of exploitation. Iran was a buffer zone between the empires of Tsarist Russia and Britain, both of which forced their own banks upon Iran, thus imposing a direct form of exploitation. In 1890, a British company obtained the monopoly over production, sale and export of Iranian tobacco. This concession produced a massive wave of popular discontent as Iranian merchants and workers were ruined. The clergy, who were opposed to all foreign influence, joined the opposition and called for the boycott of tobacco use. Strikes and street demonstrations made the anti-concession campaign highly successful. In a mass movement like this, women could take part in demonstrations, and they did, despite apparent general religious sanctions against women smoking.

The anti-concession uprising was the first modern struggle of the Iranian masses and the lessons of that campaign led to the Constitutional Revolution of 1906. The Constitutional Revolution was the result of the combined efforts of opposing forces—the liberal intellectuals and merchants who desired a fair chance against foreign capital and the religious leaders who desired the return of religious power and tradition, as well as the closure of western-style schools that educated girls. The girls' schools, originally established by French and American missionaries, were opened in 1875 to Muslim girls. A small number of young middle class women learned about French women's involvement in the Paris Commune, British women's fight for the vote and Russian women's struggle against the Tsar. These stories were repeated from woman to woman, in family circles, in mosques and even in public baths. Many graduates of these schools themselves established girls' schools despite opposition from the Islamic clergy.

During the Constitutional Movement of the 1900s, women, still wearing the chador (which means tent, the outward sign of women's inferiority), were jailed by the Shah for their activities. Thus, many women during this period developed as speakers, orators and leaders. The girls' schools, originally established by French and American missionaries, were opened in 1875 to Muslim girls. A small number of young middle class women learned about French women's involvement in the Paris Commune, British women's fight for the vote and Russian women's struggle against the Tsar. These stories were repeated from woman to woman, in family circles, in mosques and even in public baths. Many graduates of these schools themselves established girls' schools despite opposition from the Islamic clergy.

In Isfahan, in southern Iran, Seddighe Dowlatabadi set up the Sazeman (which means tent, the outward sign of women's inferiority), which was an essential condition in Islamic marriage. They began their struggle for equality. Because of their sanctioning of Russian imperial intentions, the Tudeh Party lost much of its support.

In 1936, Reza Shah outlawed the veil and women were forced to parade in the main streets unveiled. At the same time, however, the leaders of women's groups called Payke Saadat who were fighting against the veil were jailed by the Shah for their activities. Thus, many considered that the Shah's law was not written with the intent of giving women greater freedom.

The Tudeh Party was formed in 1941 by a group of 53 intellectuals who were under Russian protection and encouragement. This party was a new marriage between popular front tactics and committed to a Stalinist strategy. The women members, some of whom had been involved in earlier women's organisations formed the Tudeh Party's women's wing. But the fight for women's rights did not go further than adopting slogans for equality. Because of their sanctioning of Russian imperial intentions, the Tudeh Party lost much of its support.

In 1952 mass demonstrations and strikes led to the rise of the National Front government headed by Dr. Mossadegh. The nationalization of Iran's oil and various social reforms were priorities of the new government.

However, two years later the Mossadegh government was overthrown in a CIA-engineered coup. In exchange for "saving" Iran from nationalism, the US demanded half of Iran's oil from the newly installed government of Reza Shah, the son of the former leader. With the return of the Pahlavi dynasty and with the help of the US, harsh political restrictions were imposed and the notorious Iranian secret police force, the SAVAK, was created.

Despite vast US aid to the Shah, the regime tottered towards a deep economic crisis by the early '60s. The demand for radical reforms was growing. By 1962, there were mass student demonstrations and university occupations. Hundreds of men and women were injured and some were killed when Tehran University was stormed by troops. In 6/1963, after two to three days of street fighting in Tehran, the Shah ordered that his government immediately launch a programme of reform, known as the White Revolution of the Shah and the People.

The twelve initiatives of the White Revolution were land reform, nationalisation of forests and pastures, the public sale of state owned factories to finance the land reform, profit sharing for workers in industry, votes for women, the formation of a literacy campaign, of a health corps for the rural areas, a reconstruction and development corps, rural courts of justice, nationalisation of waterways, national reconstruction and an administrative revolution for the education service.

As a result of land reform and industrialisation, the need for female child labor on land increased. In the rural areas women and children constituted the majority of the seasonal work force, for which they were paid only half as much as male laborers. The carpet and cloth weaving industries are also concentrated in rural areas and the majority of workers are women and girls, ten to twenty-year-old girls. According to government statistics, female employment in towns was running at around 11% in the mid-1970s, with the majority of women in the service sectors.

In the mid-1970s, although much was made of "liberating" women from the veil, and of granting women the right to vote, they were still inferior beings under the reformed version of Islamic law. Young women of the modernised middle class, however began to fight the traditional way of life within the family. They fought for divorce and refused dowry (which is an essential condition in Islamic marriage). They began temporary or permanent relationships with men, including sexual relationships outside marriage. The family considered this not only an unforgivable disgrace, but also an act of prostitution. The modernised middle class bought virginity with their money. Sewing up the woman's hymen became a profitable business for Iranian doctors.

Many women during this period realised that as long as poverty and repression exist in Iran, women would continue to be regarded as inferior beings. They played an important role in the fight against the system. Out of an estimated 45000 to 100000 political prisoners under the Shah, the official statistics estimated that 4000 were women. While torture was a common fate for all political prisoners in the Shah's jails, the women were subjected to particularly cruel and degrading forms of torture, including rape and other sexual abuses. Despite these severe conditions many women during this period developed as speakers, orators and leaders. The girls' schools, originally established by French and American missionaries, were opened in 1875 to Muslim girls. A small number of young middle class women learned about French women's involvement in the Paris Commune, British women's fight for the vote and Russian women's struggle against the Tsar. These stories were repeated from woman to woman, in family circles, in mosques and even in public baths. Many graduates of these schools themselves established girls' schools despite opposition from the Islamic clergy.

In the northern region of Iran many people were in some way involved with the anti-Tsarist struggle in Russia. As a result, nationalists and merchants led a movement in 1915, calling themselves the Jongalis (the forestmen). The government statistics, female employment in towns was running at guerrilla fighters and some even fought their way to the political leadership of some organisations. The majority of the women political prisoners were members and sympathizers of the guerrilla organisations.

The Revolution: In 9/1978, following an oil workers' strike, a wave of blue and white collar workers' strikes shut down the oil refineries, the oil fields and the petrochemical complex in the south, the banks, the copper mines and many large industries. The workers demanded political rights as well as economic concessions. A rapid succession of strikes organised by strike committees (which by now were functioning in all factories, plants, all other work places, schools and universities) crippled almost all the bazaars, universities, railways, newspapers, customs and port facilities, airlines, radio and T.V. stations, paper and tobacco plants, textile mills and other large factories.

Violent demonstrations broke out in all cities and even large numbers of peasants from neighboring villages joined the urban rallies. Millions of women participated in demonstrations every day without wearing a veil. They were given scarves by the march organizers, who pleaded with them to wear them as a sign of unity for the overthrow of the Shah. A woman activist showed me a whole wardrobe full of scarves which she collected every day at the demonstrations.

What was important for all these women, veiled or unveiled, workers, peasants or from the middle class, was the fact that they all felt that this was the time to fight not only against the Shah's repression but against all the repression they face as women imposed on them for so long by their fathers, brothers, husbands and even by male comrades. They were women who spent all day everyday fighting. For many women, to wear the scarf or not seemed irrelevant at that point in time.

In early 2/1979, after 18 months of violent clashes, demonstrations, sit-ins and strikes, the Shah was forced to leave the country and one of the regime's best-known opposition leaders, Ayatollah Ruholiah Khomeini returned to Iran after his long exile in France. On 2/26/1979, Khomeini's regime began reestablishing Islamic patriarchy.

Khomeini's attack on women began with a decree on 2/26/1979, that suspended the Family Protection Act—the Shah's minimal reform of women's rights. Khomeini returned the exclusive right of divorce to men, and permitted them to take four permanent and an unlimited number of temporary wives (sighe) without the first wife's permission. A few days later on 3/3/1979, another decree forbade women judges to work with men, according to Islam, women are not fit to judge. On 3/6/1979, the Ministry of Defence barred women from military service (which some women had used as an opportunity to get military training). And finally, on 3/7/1979, Khomeini proclaimed that women, while not prohibited from taking jobs, must wear the Islamic veil (hejab, the head scarf).

The following day, 3/8/1979, hundreds of thousands of women who had been preparing to celebrate International Women's Day after so many years of repression, understood that they had to turn the day into a day of action against the regime. Mass meetings were organised in girls' schools, colleges and at Tehran University against Khomeini's Islamic laws. The demonstrators marched in the streets of Tehran to the Ministry of Justice and the Prime Minister's office and shouted the slogans: "In the dawn of freedom, our freedom has been taken away." "Down with dictatorship." "We gave our lives for freedom, and we will fight again."

The Hezbollahis (members of the Party of God), the Islamic thugs, attacked the demonstrators with stones, shouting: "Our belief is not your belief, get lost;" "Either you put scarves on your heads or we will hit you on the head." "Either hejab or tisab [acid]." These slogans were and are the essence of Islamic ideology towards women.

This was the first mass demonstration of women since the revolution where women marched without the veil against Khomeini and not the Shah. For a whole week there were further protest meetings and demonstrations against Khomeini's anti-woman legislation. Meanwhile the regime instituted further attacks on women's rights such as prohibiting women's participation in sports with the argument that the atmosphere of sports events was dirty and implementing restrictions on women's education which in many cases excluded girls and women from schools altogether.

On 7/12/1979, for the first time, three prostitutes were executed. This followed Khomeini's speech in which he said, "If you flog four prostitutes, prostitution will end." Later in the year, Chalie Shahrre Noe, the Tehran prostitution quarter, was officially closed down by the Bureau for Fighting Corruption. In 1980, it was turned into a center for Islamic temporary marriage-Islamic prostitution (sighe).

Today, Iranian feminists in exile are organizing independent women's groups all over Europe and in most of the US. They write articles, translate books, and try to keep in contact with women living in Iran in order to build an Iranian feminist movement. The image of the thousands of Iranian women marching and shouting in the streets on 3/8/1979 under Khomeini's regime has not been forgotten.

22117. Prose, Francine. "Gender Defender: Want to Challenge Your State's Abortion Laws? Call Janet Benshoof, the Tireless Pro-Choice Litigator and Activist", in Harpers Bazaar, March 1, 1993, pp. 146, 148. Janet Benshoof, 45, founder of the nonprofit Center for Reproductive Law & Policy, has a long history in public-interest and reproductive law. Benshoof graduated from Harvard Law School and began working at Brooklyn Legal Services, fighting landlord-tenant cases. She was recruited by the ACLU Reproductive Freedom Project, and during her 15 years there, she expanded the budget from $70000 to $2 million, and increased the staff from 2 to 12. In 1990, she was arrested in Guam for soliciting abortion; she had read the address of a Honolulu Planned Parenthood office within a press conference, which put Governor Joseph Ada and Guam in the media spotlight (Ada signed the antiabortion law in March 1990).

In June 1992, Benshoof left the ACLU Project and started her own, the Center for Reproductive Law & Policy. Since then, Benshoof's organization has upheld and is arguing womens reproductive rights in various cases: Challenging Guam's appeal to reinstate its ban on abortion (Ada v. Guam Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists), in which Guam's appeal was turned down; an upcoming case concerning Utah's restrictions on abortion and challenge of Roe v. Wade (the Center placed an ad in the New York Times, stating that Utah would shoot a woman who got an abortion); an international case, where Iranian women are seeking asylum in the US for helping a woman in Iran get an abortion, which is a capital crime there; and, the fighting to pass a Freedom of Choice Act before the US Supreme Court.

The Center, which is the only one of its kind, fighting solely for women's reproductive rights, is concerned with abortion laws, state restriction laws on clinics, sex education for minors, rights of pregnant women involved with drugs, fertilized embryo status, vitro-fertilization, and anything that affects women and reproduction and women's bodies. Benshoof states that men are not legally required to give blood to children, and pregnancy should be viewed the same; women's bodies, not just men's, should be Constitutionally protected.

Benshoof says that the Center is vastly underfunded, and that the spotted owl issue receives more money than women's reproductive rights. With a budget of $2.5 million now, and a staff of 21 (other important Center lawyers include: Kathryn Kolbert, Simon Heller and Lynn Paltrow), Benshoof says that $10 million would make them effective. The Center has received support from the MacArthur Foundation, which gave her the "genius grant" in 1992, and from the art district: Warren Buffett, Jessica Lange, Barbara Musbacher, Felicity Gund. Besides more funding, Benshoof says they also need a stronger
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

22118. Quaataert, Donald; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 09: Modern Turkey and Iran: Ottoman Women, Households and Textile Manufacturing, 1800-1914. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 161-176. Little is known about Ottoman households in the nineteenth century, but it is clear that households were major production of even manufactured goods, such as textiles. While in the period there was a decline in textile production, the fall off of production by male guilds may conceal the growth of informal textile production by the household sector and the growth of a female-staffed modern industrial textile industry.

In the nineteenth-century silk industry of Bursa, silk production included a complex sexual division of labor. In 1812, silk production was 150000 pounds, but production plummeted in the 1830s as guild production fell. The new industrial silk sector relied on women workers, and rose from 10% of production in 1850 to 98% (of reeling) in 1860, when raw silk output reached 1.5 million pounds. Excepting factory supervisors, the Bursa silk industry workforce was entirely female. The major problem for the industry was recruited female workers (in the 1860s, the Pope (in Rome) issued a decree allowing Armenian girls to work in the mills) The overwhelming role of women in these factories was largely a product of the traditional labor shortage in the Ottoman Empire; also, the variable and parttime nature of the work was seen as inadequate for men but appropriate to women (“that corresponded well with Ottoman society’s view of female labor as supplemental”). Between 1820-1870, some 160000 Ottoman women FTE were freed from manual cotton spinning at home by the growth of industrial production: continuing home spinning was typically a mark of the poverty of the household (yet the almost universal presence of hand looms in the homes allowed women temporarily unemployed to shift back to handmadecloth production). The nineteenth-century growth in silk reeling, lacemaking, and carpetmaking, was fueled by European demand and sustained by very low wages paid to women workers. However, whether engaged in house-centered textile production, or working in the new industrial sector, women’s economic contribution to the Ottoman household and to the emerging Ottoman industrial sector was crucial, even as the reallocation of female labor between these two sectors highlights the pragmatic flexibility of the Ottoman gender division of labor.

22119. Sanasarian, Eliz. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Politicizing Gender: Reflections on Fourteen years of Theocracy. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics, Business Administration, October 30, 1993, pp. 23-25. Thank you for inviting me. Much of the discussion here revolves around the state (including government organs, official representatives, leaders, and policies) and a community of women (not individual women) who have actively participated in organizing groups, running for public office, or have directly raised women’s issues with the state. To “politicize” means: “To bring a political character or flavor to; to make political...” Under the Pahlavi regime gender issues were politicized nationally on only two occasions: (1) the unveling law of 1935/36, and (2) the 1963 legislation which gave women the right to vote and to be elected to public office (one among a series of reforms known as the White Revolution). Both aroused opposition from the clerical groups and temporarily highlighted women’s issues. Yet there never was a rigorous public debate on gender in the Pahlavi era. The rigid-brutal authoritarianism of Reza Shah and the controlling-coopting style of Muhammad Reza Shah’s rule prevented a debate. This hindering of debate was not only on women’s issues but on other issues of public policy in Iran. National media rarely addressed serious and complex problems, and when they did, the problem was dismissed as an isolated incident caused by provincialism and religious backwardness.

After the 1979 Revolution the most restrictive measures against women were launched during the first three years. They included abrogating the meager family laws with a clear disadvantage to women, forced Hejab, the criminal code known as Qesas, and restrictions on women’s choices of work. These restrictions got worse as, for example, female students’ choices of fields of studies in higher education were severely curtailed. Briefly, all legal and social changes were reversed except one, women’s suffrage.

Yet the message was loud and clear: women’s political and social participation is accepted in Islam and Iran. This avenue set in motion a process that was difficult to stop or to reverse. Women’s activism began to acquire a life of its own as it got entangled with the male elite. Sometimes it went along with them and other times it went against them. Also, different female voices were heard on a variety of issues.

Politicization of gender has come from different quarters: (1) the regressive policies and legislation of the regime, (2) the prominence and close attention given to women, sexuality, and gender differences through mass media and clerical pulpits, (3) obvious contradictions between what was preached and actually done. For example, women served in a non combat military capacity and learned how to use arms yet they were told that the fields of agriculture and geology were not suited to their nature. (4) government failure to live up to its promises of protecting mothers, widows, and poor women... This despite the fact that motherhood was officially endorsed and legislatively encouraged. Here, women not only experienced deficient services by government organs, they also saw a conflict among them over the interpretation of gender-related issues. For example, the government organ responsible for implementing legislation on divorce, the Special Civil Courts, was severely criticized in the mid-1980s by a myriad of women’s groups. The criticism circled around the inefficiency and male bias of the courts and issues such as expediting a man’s request for divorce with no regard to the welfare of the wife and granting custody of children to the husband regardless of his character. However, years before this controversy, the women’s press had identified some of the reasons for high divorce rates in Iran: moral corruption and drug addiction of men, age difference between the spouses, the meddling of relatives, polygamy, and male machismo. In fact, in 1986, a round table of professional women and one female deputy discussed the issue and prepared a list of suggestions including having female legal and family counselors and setting up new family courts. (5) The male elite continuously addressed gender issues in political, religious, and social settings. This prompted the reversing of some issues and contradiction in concept and meaning of what was being said. For example, despite favoring polygamy, President Rafsanjani in a 1989 speech declared that having more than one wife is not to the advantage of a man.

Ayatollah Khamenei, when he was President, made the following speech at the inauguration of the first international congress on women and the Islamic revolution which was held in Tehran in 2/1988: “Islam urges women to strive and reach perfection which has no limits, nor does it stop at any point and therefore has granted them the right to serve society as a scholar, inventor, philosopher, teacher, physician, or even an active politician.” Increasingly, women outside and inside the Islamic Assembly became the spokespersons for the female constituency. This constituency is generally non Westernized, religious, comes from a traditional (rather than modern) family structure, and is socially conservative.

During the first, second, and third Majlis only four deputies (out of some 270) were female. During the fourth Majlis beginning in 1992, nine deputies are female. If one looks at the male/female ratio, it does look dim. Yet, the larger picture shows slow but incremental improvement. Legislative allowing more conditions under which a woman can get a divorce has been expanded. Limits placed on the fields of study by university students have been reduced. Today, for example, women can major in the field of agriculture, a reversal which was prompted by an avalanche of women’s protests well exemplified in a comment by Azam Talegani: “Two-thirds of the women in this country live in the rural areas; they perform much of the agricultural labor yet women cannot study the field of agriculture?” Already the female deputies of the one-year-old fourth Majlis have... targeted two issues: demand to set up a special commission to address women's issues and grievances, and to reverse the legislation preventing females from travelling abroad for higher education unless they are accompanied by their husbands. The first was voted down recently in Majlis, while the second is being worked out in special committee as of this date.

The conceptual and theoretical aspects of these changes in individual Islamic women community activists and the Islamic state have been discussed in much more detail in my article in the Journal of Developing Societies. Suffice it here to say that politicizing women's issues has prompted a demand by women to be included in state development. I would like to end by reading a quote from my article: "Every time they compared Muslim women to Western women and argued that women have been oppressed in the West but not in Islam, they raised awareness. Every time they reasserted female equality and praised women's abilities, they raised expectations. Every time they admitted that oppression of women is ongoing in Iranian society, they raised demands. Every time they met with women's groups, they gave them recognition. The state officials unwittingly entangled themselves in gender discourse." Thank you. [x]

22120. Schauf, C. Hart. The Lower Mekong: Challenge to Cooperation in Southeast Asia: Part 43: The Mekong River Scheme-The Awakening of a Giant: Organizing For Action: Good Will International. Princeton, N.J.: Van Nostrand Co Inc., 1963. The report of the Wheeler Mission engendered two reactions. On the one hand there was jubilation at the confirmation of earlier assessments, and applause for the establishment of a clear, itemized program of work. But on the other hand there was apprehension at the extent of the effort recommended, and the estimated cost of $9.2 million. This uneasiness was somewhat countered, of course, by the announcement that France was placing funds at the disposal of the Committee, which as noted had been made at its First Session. At the Second Session of the Mekong Committee the representative of the UN Technical Assistance Board reported an allocation of $200000 by its Executive Chairman from the TAB contingency fund. Further world-wide response was gratifying. At the annual session of ECAFE in 3/1958, New Zealand's Prime Minister offered $100000 and the United States $2 million to the program. Within a year the Committee's resources exceeded $ million. By the beginning of 1961 they reached approximately the Wheeler Mission target of $9.2 million; and by the end of 1961 they neared $1 million-then to launch virtually all the data collection program as suggested by the Wheeler Mission and to advance beyond data collection to the commencement of planning of ten multiple-purpose component projects, three of them on the mainstream, and to begin actual construction of navigation aids in some reaches of the river. The total resources contributed or pledged to the Mekong Scheme in approximate U. S. dollar equivalent by the Spring of 1963 came to some $37 million. In addition, the Ford Foundation has provided a number of travel grants; and the Pan-Pacific South East Asia Women's Association has offered to participate in social studies. It will have been noted that the figures are given in "US dollar equivalent." When cooperation in the Mekong Scheme is in cash, expenditure is in some cases authorized globally, and in others limited to a particular country. Many contributions are not in cash but in kind. Thus despite handicaps of currency restrictions and adverse trade balances, an effective channel of cooperation in the Mekong Scheme can usually be worked out with any country, agency or organization which desires to participate. The full list of participants by the Spring of 1963, in addition to the four riparian states themselves (Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and the Republic of Vietnam), were Australia, Canada, India, Japan, New Zealand, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, and the United States through the Colombo Plan; the Republic of China, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iran, Israel, Italy, the Netherlands, and the Philippines; the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE), Bureau of Technical Assistance Operations (BTAO), Technical Assistance Board (TAB), and Special Fund; International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), International Labor Organization (ILO), Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), World Health Organization (WHO), World Meteorological Organization (WMO), and International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA); the Ford Foundation, the Asia Foundation, the Pan-Pacific South East Asia Women's Association, Resources for the Future, and a number of private companies. Each item of cooperation, large or small, it is clear, must be carefully fitted into the overall plan of the Mekong Scheme; this emerging master plan is described in the next chapter. [x]

22121. Schatzman, Dennis. "Race War Is Bot Coming. It Is Already Here", in New York Amsterdam News, November 16, 1996. pp. 11, 44. [Schatzman is a former district court judge in Pittsburgh and is now a journalism professor at CSU-Fullerton.] Carl Rowan's prediction of race war in the United States is not correct because it is already here. Black Americans are under intense attack by intense but carefully concealed attacks. Former Pres. George Bush and retired Col. Oliver North used the Contras and CIA to pour crack cocaine into inner-city neighborhoods to finance their war in Nicaragua. California's pete Wilson has been unapologetic in his efforts to "create a race war" by eliminating Affirmative Action (Wilson fired his Black staffer Paulette Matthews for treason when she balked at his plan to end Affirmative Action). ADL leaders like Clifford Savaran in Cleveland and Abraham Foxman in New York, who denounced anyone they disagreed with as "anti-semites". CNBC "propagandists" Geraldo Rivera and Charles Grodin attack on O.J. Simpson and the Blacks who support his acquittal. A similar role is played by the big three newspapers: the New York Times, Washington Post and Los Angeles Times. Everywhere in America, the "militia...foot soldiers" who murder Black men in the streets are the cops: "like soldiers, they have a license to kill while defending the honor of the nation." [TXT]

22122. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 94: The State of the Israeli Economy: Part 1 of 2. Israel, January 20, 1992. In spite of the uncertainty over whether Israel is going to obtain American guarantees, their first expected yearly installment, to the tune of $2 billion, has already been included in the 1992 government budget. This fact prompted the best economic correspondents of the Hebrew press to reflect at some length about the real state of Israeli economy. On this occasion, the same correspondents were also comparing the current economic realities with the reports which the Israeli Treasury had been submitting to the Americans. This report will confine itself to a summary of how things in this respect are and how are they presented, without probing into the deeper causes of the current Israeli economic decline: at least beyond the obvious point that the long-standing policy of recent Israeli governments (not just Shamir's!) to use maximal financial resources for the sake of the former USSR.

But let us begin with the facts. On 1/1/1992, Gideon Eshet published two articles in the Yediot Ahronot Financial Supplement. The first, summarizing the economic data for 1991 on the basis of the preliminary report of the Israeli Bureau of Statistics, bears the title: "For the first time in the last decade, the [Israeli] GNP per capita decreased by 1% in 1991". True, "the [aggregate] GNP grew by 5.2%" in that year: the decrease in GNP per capita having being due to the population growth, largely accounted for by the immigration of Jews from the territories of the former USSR.

Eshet's detailed analysis of the Israeli GNP figures contains much useful information. Much of the GNP increase can be accounted for by a 33% growth in apartment housing construction. By comparison, industrial production increased only by 6%, while agricultural production decreased by 14%. As is well known, new immigrants, by and large willing to accept no matter how menial jobs in the towns, absolutely refuse to work in agriculture. At the same time, beginning with the summer of 1990, the Israeli government radically restricted the issuance of work-in-Israel permits for the Palestinians from the Territories. Many thus denied their right to work had been employed in agriculture. Economic considerations, however, pale in Israel in importance when confronted with racist and "security" considerations. There is no reason to suppose that this order of priorities may be reversed, especially as long as American money continues to flow. Hence it can be expected that as long as the US lavishes on Israel free money (whether in form of "aid" or of guarantees to the Israeli government) it will stick to its racist policies regardless of their economic consequences.

Eshet’s second subject is the analysis of the patterns of Israeli consumption in 1991. It seems that the largest increase occurred in the sector of "security imports", which grew by more than a third as compared to 1990. I have already discussed this matter and its implications in my report 89. What remains to be added here, is only that an expenditure of such magnitude, even if fully paid for by the American taxpayer, is bound to have an adverse effect on Israeli economy. Helicopters, for example, have to be operated by handsomely paid crews which otherwise could perhaps be more usefully employed in production for export. Moreover, storage and maintenance of helicopters also drain resources without commensurable returns. According to Eshet, however, consumption also increased, even if only to the extent of 8%, in the sector of private luxuries, like the cars, expensive TV sets, videos etc. As was noted by other commentators, for example by Lily Galili ("What are the new immigrants eating?", Haaretz, January 9), the aggregate consumption of food remained in 1991 stationary, which means that consumption of food per capita decreased. Galili, who reports that the pertinent data "astonished the senior officials at the Treasury", argues that "since the new immigrants and other poor Israelis must eat something, we must presume that they eat little: probably mainly waste vegetables and other dirt@cheap produce obtainable in the markets, which are not even covered by any statistics". Indeed, her conclusion is well corroborated by the press stories about new immigrants and other poor Israelis looking for discarded food in garbage cans, or about their children who come to school without a single slice of bread in their bags. Such stories no longer count in Israel as news. Indeed, the gap between the poor and the middle class and rich can be assumed to grow steadily, 1991 being the year of a further and quite dramatic polarization.

In regard to the future, the two crucial economic indicators are the investments and the balance of payments. Eshet reports that although in 1991 investment increased by about 40%, following an increase of only 17% in 1990 and near zero investment growth in 1985-89, the bulk of this increase occurred in the sector of apartment housing construction. Hardy any other construction was in 1991 in progress, which means that no new industrial projects are planned for 1992. A large part of that construction, variably estimated as between 25-40%, took place in the Territories. In regard to the balance of payments, the total trade deficit rose by $2.5 billion, or 50%, in a single year, to reach the sum of $7.5 billion, thus equalising what Israel expects to obtain from the US in aid during two and half years. As Eshet notes, this deficit was caused "by the decrease of exports by 2% and the increase of imports by more than 10%". He finds it strange that this deficit was amassed in spite of some favorable world trade circumstances, such as "the drastic fall in oil prices which in 1991 saved the Israeli economy as much as $0.5 billion". Eshet also provides data on wages and income distribution. These data are quite illustrative of the trends the Israeli economy is now undergoing. Thus the real wages of Israeli employees "declined in 1991 by 1.2%, while within the last three years the decline amounted to 5%". The decline of real wages needs to be contrasted with the growth of productivity which in 1991 increased by 1.7% and in three last years by about 7%. Together, the decrease of wages and the increase of productivity have contributed to the changes in proportion of wages and of capital to the [Israeli] GNP: the former decreasing and the latter increasing. "The proportion of the capital to the [Israeli] GNP increased by 16% in 1991, after increasing by 11% in 1990".

In his second article "The failure in figures", Eshet tries to interpret his data. "By any accepted standard of assessing it, 1991 ended up badly [for Israel]. If economic data are to be taken as an indication of the government policy’s success, then the data of the Israeli Bureau of Statistics (in particular the decrease of the GNP per capita by about 1%) point to a devastating failure". After pointing out that the Israeli budget for 1992 does not seem to provide any remedies, Eshet proceeds to discussing the steady growth of unemployment. According to official data, unemployment in December 1991 already exceeded 10%, but its real extent is probably higher, because a lot of Israelis from the three most affected categories (the demobilized soldiers, the new immigrants and the Israeli Arabs) no longer bother to apply to the official Employment Offices.

Features of the recession documented by Eshet find their confirmation in writings of other commentators. Thus, Tzvi Zerakhyah and Judy Meit ("The percentage of unemployed is highest [in Israel] since 1966", Haaretz, January 14) rely on the data published by the Bank of Israel and the Ministry of Labor and Welfare to show the 30% increase of unemployment in 1991 alone. If the trend continues throughout 1992, the authors forecast that the number of officially unemployed "will by the end of that year reach more than 250000", as compared to "104000 at the year’s beginning". Those figures, however, "do not include a great majority of new immigrants. According to the official data, no more than 50,000 new immigrants have joined the national labor force. But the unemployment figures don’t include 35000 new immigrants who in 12/1991 passed their first year in Israel and thereby ceased to be entitled to a relief from the absorption basket [i.e. the subsidies for their living expenses, apartment rentals, etc.]. Those 35000 should by now begin to work, but judging from the press reports, only few of them actually did. Nor do the unemployment figures include those new immigrants who attend the fully government-subsidized vocational retraining courses. No wonder under such conditions immigration to Israel has since several months dropped sharply. (This fact seemed to escape both the US media and the official Israeli estimates published in the US). The arrivals of new immigrants in 1/1992 are reported to be in the vicinity of 5000, and since the monthly figure is steadily declining, the official Israeli forecast of a quarter of a million as due to arrive in 1992 is clearly delusory. The bulk of the brand-new arrivals originate from the Muslim Asian republics of the former USSR, such as Uzbekistan.

Even more elucidating is the authors’ breakdown of the unemployed by profession. The two professional categories in which the unemployment is the highest, turn out to be the academics (including engineers)and the skilled industrial workers. By contrast, in sectors requiring mostly unskilled work, such as agriculture or construction, the unemployment is relatively mild. As noted above, Israel is still forced to rely on Arabs from the Territories for work in these two sectors; whereas in "sensitive areas" in which the Palestinians are denied employment, Israel relies on other foreign workers still imported from countries as remote as Poland or Thailand. The concentration of unemployment in skilled occupations makes nonsense of rosy anticipations which various "Israeli sympathizers" frequently publish in the US press. In such anticipations, Israeli, provided it receives the American guarantees, can with the help of trained academicians and engineers from the ranks of new immigrants easily turn into another model of successful economic development: another Singapore or Taiwan. The opposite is true. Regardless of the settlements and of the Israeli policies in the Territories, further doses of free American money can in no way cure Israeli economic ills. They can only aggravate them.

Extrapolations of the present trends beyond 1992 yield an even grimmer picture. In the conclusion of this report I will yet state my personal opinion that there is no point in making such extrapolations. Still, I am reporting one such extrapolation to prove that if the Israeli policy does not change, it can only lead to economic disasters. The extrapolation in question is based on a document commissioned by the Israeli government from Ya’akov Lifshitz, a former Director General of the Israeli Treasury. The document is due to be submitted to the Americans in order to persuade them to grant the guarantees. "The economists forecast unemployment at 480000 in 1996 if Israel does not get guarantees from the US", Hadashot, January 17), and as such, it is meant to replace another official document to be described below. The most revealing part of Lifshitz’ document deals with the status of the Israeli debt, disclosing facts which the Israeli censorship had banned from publication even during the annual budget debates in the Knesset. According to Lifshitz, “Under the rubric ‘other loans’, the Israeli budget for 1992 includes loans to the sum of 8 billion Shekel, equivalent to $3.5 billion, due to be received from abroad on the basis of guarantees for the $2 billion expected from the US”. Lifshitz informs that in addition to the $2 billion “already included in the Israeli budget [for 1992] on revenues’ side, another $3 billion are included as well. No one else has information. But it claims “that without getting the $10 billion American guarantees in the next five years, as looked forward to, Israel will not be able to obtain the needed $20 billion from any other source... since in the financial world no one will want to loan any money to Israel after the US refuses to grant the guarantees”. I am omitting Lifshitz’s rosy anticipations of the upswing of the Israeli economy once the guarantees are granted and the loans dependent on them received. I am doing this because economic (and other) information which Israel feeds the Americans with can be safely assumed to be fabricated. Except that the Americans usually want to be cheated and accept Israeli fabrications knowingly. The contents of Lifshitz’s document stand in glaring contradiction with another Israeli official documentary presentation of the state of the Israeli economy which was submitted to the Americans a short while earlier (Nehama Du’efek and Gideon Eshet, “How deceptions are being sold to the Americans”, Yediot Ahronot Financial Supplement, January 10). The latter document, drafted by the Treasury itself, was conceived to ad supplement of sorts to the first Israeli request for guarantees submitted 4 months earlier, “which had consisted of no more than a dozen pages” and which had lacked any real information. But, as the authors report, “even this new and already thick document, is no more than a strenuous exercise in self-beautification. Israel presents itself there as embarking on an exemplary economic policy, certain to succeed, more than anybody else ever has”. Israeli production and exports are promised “to boom instantly”, allowing Israel to repay the guaranteed loans with ease. Noting that “the chapters of the document contain both the analyses of [Israeli] economic past and the predictions of future miracles”, the authors wisely prefer to confine themselves to discussing the former, and thus show the document’s crude mendacity.

Let me cite a few of their findings. For example, the Americans are assured in that document that a new government-owned company “Yozma” (“Initiative”) was founded “to encourage investment in an almost of 26,000 new businesses in modern projects in the private sector”. The authors acutely comment that the document “forgot” to mention “that ‘Yozma’ was then for many months [to be exact since 4/1990] still in the process of formation” not yet completed due to a factional dispute within the Likud over the choice of its directors. The Americans are also assured by the document that “the [Israeli] government had already decided to slash state subsidies for water and public transportation. Yet for some unknown reason, the document conceals that the Knesset reversed the government’s decision regarding the subsidies for water and that the minister of Transportation publicly announced that the decision regarding the subsidies for public transportation would not be carried out”. It can only be added that both decisions were fully approved by Shamir, although it can be hardly be doubted that at least the former was never meant to be carried out, its real aim having been to deceive the Americans. While opining that “the Americans love nothing as much as privatization” of government-owned enterprises, the authors quote from the discussed document a number of Israeli promises of the privatization of all and sundry government-owned companies. They further say that “promises of this kind have already been made for several years”, and express their utter disbelief that they may be ever carried out. Indeed, there are good political reasons for paying no credence to such promises. For example, no less than 25% (!) of the Likud Council membership is now comprised of members of directorates of government-owned companies or of close relatives of theirs, while among Labor party stalwarts the corresponding percentage is smaller but still quite significant. Under present circumstances, with Israeli policies unchanging, I cannot figure out who the prospective buyers of the Israeli government-owned businesses might be. There is no point in listing other examples of Israeli official deceptions which the two authors provide. But their conclusion by all means deserves to be quoted. “Our message to the Americans is true-to-type Israeli: ‘Give us money and have confidence in us! Everything will be OK. And besides, why should you worry? What do $10 billion really matter between friends?’ As long as the Americans so desire, they will anyway keep swallowing all [Israeli] deceptions”.

However, in all fairness it must be pointed out that the Israeli ministry of Finance deceives not only the Americans, but other Israeli ministries as well. Far from it. Furthermore, the minister of Trade and Industry, Moshe Nissim (who, like the minister of Finance Moda’i, is a member of Likud) during an interview with Nehama Du’efek (“I was a year of freeze and of missed opportunities”, Yediot Ahronot Financial Supplement, January 14) said that “the figures supplied by the [Israeli] Treasury are not true. They are all lies and deceits”. Nissim said it in response to the Treasury’s announcement, addressed both to the Americans and to the Israeli citizens, that in 1992 it allotted more money for creating jobs than in 1991. In rebuttal, the minister of Trade and Industry said “that allotment for creating the jobs was in this budget not by a single penny higher than in the previous one. I showed how the presented figures were lies and at the government meeting I voted against the budget in protest. But everyone knows how the [Israeli] government makes its decisions”. Although Nissim is right about Moda’i (and perhaps also vice versa), this is no proof that the former is any better economist than the latter. Nissim’s currently avowed aim is that Israel should emulate the example of “Mexico and Chile”. When questioned by the interviewer why don’t we see here, then, a long line of the same investors who now invest in Mexico and Chile?” he answered “because we don’t know how to sell ourselves”. His proposals, apart from his Mexico-and-Chile idea, don’t anticipate any other change, whether political or economic. Like Moda’i, he is on record as prioritizing the progress in settlement formation over anything else, including the US guarantees. He only hopes that “through good and quiet work in the Congress”, Israel can get both.[=] 22123. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 94: The State of the Israeli Economy: Part 2 of 2. Israel, January 20, 1992. Nissim said it during the same week during which the Hebrew press was filled with headlines like “Children come to school hungry” (Yediot, January 13), “Money urgently needed for 8 roads in the densely populated central area of Israel has under settlers’ pressure been reallocated for 3 new roads in the Territories” (Yediot, January 9), or with a number of news items about the growing number of “Russian Jewish women working as prostitutes” (e.g. Kol Ha’ir, January 10, which reports that their prevalent motive is to feed their children). Although I could quote such headlines from other papers as well, I chose them mostly from Yediot which has circulation higher than all other papers combined. I could therefore presume that the Likud ministers and their underlings at least scan it.

In addition to that, around January 7 the entire Hebrew press reported that the number of Israeli breadwinners officially defined as “being below the poverty line” increased in 1991 by over 100,000, to reach the magnitude of 538000 within the nation-wide population (including East Jerusalem) estimated on January 1, 1991 as amounting to 4.8 million. The number of Israelis in the 20-54 age cohort was on the same date 2.024 million. Even if to discount the relatively high percentage of non-working Israeli women, and even though the nationwide population in 1991 increased, it would not be far of the mark to anticipate any other change, whether political or economic. Like Moda’i, he is on record as prioritizing the progress in settlement formation over anything else, including the US guarantees. He only hopes that “through good and quiet work in the Congress”, Israel can get both.[=] the sake of Greater Land of Israel, the settlers and the religious parties whose constituency amounts to less than 20% of the Israeli electorate? True, in the short-range, certainly in 1992, the incitement of Shamir and Sharon not only against "the Arabs", but also against Labor and Left-to-Labor parties, which have already been exorcized by Likud as "Arab lovers", will probably yield an electoral victory in elections which are now scheduled for 6/1992. A prediction of that effect was made by David observed that during a meeting of Likud's Center held barely few days before, Shamir and Sharon heaped all the abuse they could against the Labor party as a whole, after the latter not only carefully refrained from attacking Likud, but also supported Shamir's conduct at the Madrid Conference and during its aftermath. On that basis Padatzur concluded, righly in my opinion, that Shamir "emulated the hysterics" of Begin in 1981 electoral campaign, when "Labor was accused of treason, of not caring about security of Israeli citizens, of harming national interest and breaking national unity. Through such appalling incitement, Begin succeeded in shifting the focus of the electoral debate with Labor from the deeep economic crisis to political and security issues". Essentially the same tactics was used by Shamir in the 1984 electoral campaign. Padatzur predicts that by "diverting attention of voters from the present government's economic failures... Likud will focus in the coming electoral campaign on what it considers the top national priority for the present and future generations, namely on 'guarding the Land of Israel'...
Hundreds of thousands of [Israeli] unemployed, of homeless, of materially deprived and of those in need of more extensive welfare services, for the most part don't understand not only what they read, but also what they see and hear. They are doomed to be deeply affected by the scare propaganda". I concur with Padatzur's prediction regarding the next elections. But how long can such tactics work? I cannot envisage it as working for years.

Another explanation of Shamir's policies, as offered by some commentators, is in terms of Israeli intention to scare the Americans.
Two above quoted official Israeli documents addressed to US authorities do contain the threat that failure to grant the guarantees on the part of the US can only lead to Israel's economic and the military collapse. As Nehama Du'ek and Gideon Eshet put it, "in trying to scare the Americans of their wits, and thus make them believe that there exists no alternative to their guarantees, the official Israeli request exhibits a range of horror scenarios. Foremost among them is the answer to the hypothetical question: what will be the economic consequences of our receiving the guarantees for only the half of what we request, i.e. for $5 billion?" In that event, the document anticipates a drastic decrease of personal revenue levels, with the consequence of "mass emigration of young Israelis of army service age" and the resultant decrease of Israel's military power.
The document does not say where could those young Israelis emigrate to.
It only promises the US that granting the guarantees in the amount requested is going to entail an economic miracle owing to which the young Israelis will stay at home and serve happily in the army for ever after.

As I indicated above, the documents produced by Israeli Treasury need to be viewed with suspicion. The horror scenarios are certainly a clumsy concoction. After all, the generous terms of a settlement offered Israel via Baker by the Saudis and their allies in 4/1991, which were rejected by Shamir out of hand, would in all probability have sufficed to solve Israel's gravest economic problems for some years to come. But questions remain. One of them is whether after the collapse of the USSR the US will keep supinely accepting everything Israeli says. The second question is whether Shamir wants Israel to depend on the US good will.
My own best guess is that Shamir's policies do not depend on such uncertainties. When the US economy is itself in bad shape, even the power of the Jewish lobby in the Congress may not help for long.

In making this guess, I rely to a certain extent on what I have heard from my private informants, but, much more crucially, I take into all due consideration the warnings of an imminent Israeli aggression against Syria or a raid against Iran or both. I described those warnings in a series of my reports, most recent having been nos. 89 and 90. To a considerable extent, such predictions rest on the analogy with the situation Israel found itself in before and after the 1967 War. As mentioned by Tzvi Zerakhyha and Judy Melz "the percentage of unemployed is [now in Israel] highest since 1966". Indeed, from the beginning of 1966 till June 1967 Israel was in deep recession. Many observers, myself included, believe that Israel then planned a war, also in order to stem that recession. As it was planned, the war was intended against Syria, possibly also against Jordan, but Egypt, which at that time was heavily engaged in a guerilla campaign by Israel, was not in the planners' consideration. (A fine rendition of these events in the excellent book by Andrew and Leslie Cockburn "Dangerous Liaison", frees me from necessity to retell the story here.) What is of concern to me here, is that the economic effects of that war proved to be most fortunate for Israel, until the next war, that of October 1973, reversed the economic situation again. The years 1967-1973 marked an economic prosperity unsurpassed in Israel's history. The prosperity was not due to US financial aid, whose size was until October 1973 minuscule and flow sporadic. Nor was it due to Israeli exploitation of the Territories, which certainly existed, but still without yielding sizable economic benefits.
Its main factor was private investment which right after the victory in the Six Day War reached an unprecedented scale, at once extricating Israel from its recession. This flow of investment continued uninterrupted for 6 years.
In a part, in my estimate a minor one, it was Jewish investment activated by chauvinist frenzy gripping many Jews after the victory. But in its major part it was motivated by nothing else but profit considerations. And the profit seekers of that time were not disappointed. If the minister of Trade and Industry, Moshe Nissim, wants Israel to emulate "Mexico and Chile" as investment-attracting countries, he probably has in mind the investors of the same type as those in the aftermath of 1967. And when Nissim says that "the same investors who now invest in Mexico and Chile", shrink from investing in Israel "because we don't know how to sell ourselves", he may well think about "selling Israel" in the classic Israeli manner, that is by a military victory. As noted in my reports 75 and 77, the Israeli generals share this viewpoint. I personally think that an Israeli victory in a war of aggression is far from assured, and that the world economy of 1992 is very different from that of 1967. But I also think that the present Israeli power elite, both political and military, handicapped by its own racist myths, low intelligence and its inadequate knowledge of the outside world, is quite incapable of taking such factors into consideration. But it is by far not the only power elite like showing signs of an increasing deterioration of their intellectual faculties.

In my opinion Likud in general and Shamir in particular, although well aware of Israeli economic problems, do not even attempt to solve them because they hope to solve them by means of a victorious war.
They expect such a war to entrench the Israeli rule over the Greater Israel (perhaps within expanded borders), to establish an Israeli hegemony over the entire Middle East, and thus to solve Israel's economic problems. There are some who refuse to even consider this prospect as too ghastly to be plausible. But if so, they should offer an alternative explanation of Israel's present policies, consistently pursued for quite some time already. An explanation in terms of Shamir's foolishness won't do. After a series of successes prior to his becoming a prime minister, Shamir has already been lording over Israel for a longer time than anybody except Ben-Gurion. He clearly intends to  stay in power, and to ensure that Likud stays in power after his retirement. In any event, economic data presented in this report warrant utterly grim predictions of Israel's economic future, even if the US guarantees are granted. This is why the question stands: apart from a victorious war, what else can offer hopes for an economic improvement? [–]

22124. Shahak, Israel. The Election of Netanyahu the Leader of Likud and Its Significance: Part 1 of 2. Shahak Report 119. Israel, March 30, 1993. Israeli politics is now said to be in the process of its Americanization, as shown by the increasing role of a party leader.
In Likud, and earlier in its predecessor Herut party, the tradition of leader-worship has always been firmly ensonced. The tradition dates from the days of the movement's founding father, Ze'vev Jabotinsky, and it flourished under Begin to become tarnished under Shamir. This why the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as the next leader of Likud, who by virtue this election automatically becomes the head of the Right Wing opposition against Rabin's government, is bound to have deep political significance. The circumstances of his electoral victory only add to its significance. The Hebrew press realized it immediately. It refrained from writing much about Netanyahu until after his victory, presumably in order not to let him use press criticism to his electoral advantage, which would have been easy when the bulk of Likud party membership perceived the press in a similar way. But right after the victory, the press began and this was announced, the press began to make amends for its earlier reticence by publishing a lot of stuff about Netanyahu, most of it quite derogatory. The Labor leaders, Rabin among them, have grasped the importance of Netanyahu's election as well. Rabin responded at once by leaking to the press his intention of designating general Ehud Barak, the current Chief of Staff, as his successor and - to smooth his path - as his likely imminent appointee as the Defense minister. Right now, Barak happens to be nearing the end of his two year term as a Chief of Staff, and the press has kept itself busy discussing his personality and career. The bulk of this report will be devoted to an analysis of Netanyahu's victory, but I will conclude it by briefly discussing Barak's present standing and his political chances in the future.

Under Begin's leadership Likud comport itself with all due respect for formalities. In Shamir's years [1983-93], however, it fell into unprecedented disarray. As the press has rightly pointed out, Likud now has neither a valid convention, nor valid statutes, nor any revenues. To make things even messier, its major leadership figures are constantly at each other throats, especially after Shamir's retirement in 6/1992. The last time Likud's convention met was in 1986. It did admit some (mostly moribund) small parties to its ranks, and it did elect the party Center which functions as the decision-making body in between the elections. But it annulled the old party statutes without bothering to start drafting anything in their place. According to the old statutes a convention was to meet every four years. But it hasn't met since 1986. Even the Center meets infrequently. The crucial decision to hold primaries, which in Likud are total novelty, was adopted at informal meetings of Likud's major leaders.

In Likud the party's ongoing affairs were always conducted primarily by "the leader". Until the latest elections to the Knesset, Shamir acted in that capacity. Under Begin the leader's decisions were unchallengable. Anyone who dared challenge them had to leave the party at once, as happened to Ezer Weizman, now elected by the Labor-led Knesset majority as the next President of Israel. Under the much less charismatic Shamir, his decisions were sometimes challenged, in which case things had to be subsequently patched up by informal agreements between the party's recognized "secondary leaders", concretely by Arens, Levy and Sharon. After Likud's electoral defeat, followed by the resignation of Shamir and Arens and by the political eclipse of Sharon, Netanyahu became virtually leaderless, and thereby lacking an inner cohesion. But what Likud has in abundance, properly, the fact that Netanyahu won despite a widely-publicized scandal, can be considered proven, But Netanyahu didn't have a jot of evidence incriminating "the gangsters". Curiously, he told the story on TV first, and submitted a complaint to the police the only the next day. Naturally, most observers assumed that if the police fail to find evidence supporting Netanyahu's accusations, he will be discredited. Also, one has to understand that a high proportion of Likud's members are part-religious (the so-called "traditionalists") or full-scale religious. Such members could have been expected to refuse to vote for an adulterer as their leader and a prospective Israeli Prime Minister. It was also expected that at least some Israeli rabbis, ever quick to denounce the Laborites and "Meretz" leaders for much lesser transgressions, would find words of severe condemnation for the grievous sin of Netanyahu. After all, the same rabbis and the same public quite recently hounded Shulamit Aloni for the mere eating of non-kosher food. In Orthodox Judaism adultery is regarded as one of three most heinous sins, much graver than eating non-kosher food. But none of these expectations materialized. No rabbi said anything about Netanyahu's sex life. But Netanyahu's electoral campaign was too well-managed to make too many Likud members unduly concerned about this matter. The now retiring chief commander of the Israeli police, Superintendent Terner, is now blamed by the Police minister for conniving with Netanyahu by deliberately stall the investigation. Supposedly the two struck a deal: Netanyahu is said to have promised to return Terner's favor by advancing his political career. (Terner denies everything, but without sounding very convincing.) But regardless of whether the police has or hasn't investigated the affair properly, the fact that Netanyahu won despite a widely-publicized scandal, and against the expectations of practically all analysts, has a political significance of its own.

Before analyzing the reasons for his victory, it would be useful to provide information on Netanyahu's biography. Its best accounts so far have been by Orna Kadosh (Maariv, March 28) and Binah Barzel (Yedioth Ahronot, March 26). Netanyahu was born in Jerusalem, 46 years ago, to a wealthy family of extreme right wingers. His father, professor Ben-Zion Netanyahu, an editor and historian by profession, was on close terms and thereby lacking an inner cohesion. But what Likud has in abundance, properly, the fact that Netanyahu won despite a widely-publicized scandal, and against the expectations of practically all analysts, has a political significance of its own.

Before analyzing the reasons for his victory, it would be useful to provide information on Netanyahu's biography. Its best accounts so far have been by Orna Kadosh (Maariv, March 28) and Binah Barzel (Yedioth Ahronot, March 26). Netanyahu was born in Jerusalem, 46 years ago, to a wealthy family of extreme right wingers. His father, professor Ben-Zion Netanyahu, an editor and historian by profession, was on close terms and thereby lacking an inner cohesion. But what Likud has in abundance, properly, the fact that Netanyahu won despite a widely-publicized scandal, and against the expectations of practically all analysts, has a political significance of its own.
As she points out, “these 13 years constitute a black hole” in his biography. Little is known about what he did during much of that time since his family has adamantly refused to disclose anything about it. It is rumored that he might have then worked in some Israeli secret ventures whose very existence on US soil has always been staunchly denied by Israel. Yet Bibi, as he became known from his childhood on, did leave the US to report for military service in Israel. Following in the footsteps of his brother, he was observed in the most prestigious of the Israeli “elite units”, the “General Staff Patrol”. Subsequently, however, Yoni chose to make a professional career in this unit, advancing to the rank of a major, whereas Bibi left Israel for the US upon the termination of his service. The whole thing constituted a breach of the army’s rules which do not allow two brothers to serve in the same “elite unit”. But the fact that such a breach occurred only testifies to the strength of the Netanyahu family’s “connections”.

Yoni Netanyahu was killed in 1976 in the Entebbe Raid, enabling Israeli propaganda especially in the English speaking countries, to make him into a hero of heroes. (In Israel this effort was a failure, and he is now rather forgotten.) Kadosh writes: “On 7/4/1976, the youngest brother Ido phoned Netanyahu in the US notifying him [of Yoni’s death]. As a result, the whole family returned to Israel at once. Yoni was turned into a myth. Bibi and Ido didn’t spare any effort in producing this myth. Already during the [religiously prescribed] seven days [of mourning] they began to review Yoni’s private letters for publication. In the end they decided that the best way to perpetuate his memory would be to establish an institute for helping combat international terrorism to be named after him”. The institute was officially opened by Begin in 1979, but the whole idea had been energetically pushed forward by Peres, who during the Entebbe Raid in 7/1976 was Defense minister. Kadosh comments that “for all his efforts in mythologizing the memory of his brother, Netanyahu was not above using this occasion for generating publicity around himself. Major political figures would sponsor the formation of the institute. Golda Meir, Shimon Peres and Menahem Begin and [the then] Secretary General of Histadrut, Yeruham Meshel, made all their international contacts available for the purpose. In this way he began corresponding and actually meeting in person a lot of VIPs with international renown. Since then he became well-connected. In no time, American TV studios opened for him. Taking advantage of Israel’s influence in the US, he used this opportunity to preach to the Americans that they were much too ‘soft’ toward the Arabs”.

Those endeavors reached their culmination at the First International Symposium Against Terror, held in Jerusalem in the fall of 1979. Netanyahu was the symposium’s star. The modern media, however, get easily tired of the stars. According to Kadosh, “soon after the Symposium the Netanyahu family was forgotten”. Bibi had to leave the institute and take a job as a sales manager in the furniture company “Rim”. He performed this job quite successfully. Aggressive advertising he designed induced the customers to “invest” in new furniture at a time anything ever spent on political undertakings in Israel.

He performed this job quite successfully. Aggressive advertising he designed induced the customers to “invest” in new furniture at a time anything ever spent on political undertakings in Israel. “Rim”. He performed this job quite successfully. Aggressive advertising he designed induced the customers to “invest” in new furniture at a time anything ever spent on political undertakings in Israel.

...
Netanyahu's wealthy diaspora friends, they not only assured his victory in the campaign, but, even before that, adapted that campaign to the tastes of not only the Likud members but also an entire segment of the Israeli Jewish society. What I have in mind, is what is referred to as "Israel No. 2", within which Likud is indeed the core party, and the main recipient of votes. During the campaign, a considerable number of Yeshiva students joined Likud in order to vote for Netanyahu. They were undeterred in the least by his acknowledged adultery, nor by this literal interpretation of their rabbis, nor even by those rabbis' threats of punishment in hell for so doing. Those interdictions and threats, incidentally, had little to do with Netanyahu's moral qualities or his secularity. They were made on the ground of a more general principle forbidding a Haredi [ultra-pious] Jew to join a secular party which lets non-Jews be its members. The social gulf separating the two segments of the Israeli Jewish society was particularly pronounced during Netanyahu's campaign. The same things which exhilarated "Israel No. 2" would repel and disgust the secular and modernizing "Israel No. 1" to the utmost. This factor might well helped Netanyahu defeat the other contestants in the race for Likud leadership so decisively.

22125. Shahak, Israel. The Election of Netanyahu the Leader of Likud and Its Significance: Part 2 of 2. Shahak Report 119. Israel, March 30, 1993. Among other differences, the mettison gulf between the two segments of Israeli Jewish society implies very different uses of the term "peace". The difference is not in political behavior, since Labor hawks can well compete with and even outdo Netanyahu. Rather, the difference lies in deeply ingrained manner-of-speech habits. "Israel No. 1" feels compelled to reassure itself and the world about "its deep and unwavering desire for peace", especially at the time of major Israeli atrocities (invariably perpetrated "for the sake of peace") or preparations for a war. Of course it is sheer hypocrisy, but it nevertheless implies a notion of desirability of peace with the Arabs, on Israeli terms for sure, in some more or less remote future. It is indicative that when "Israel No. 1" spokesmen, the Laborites included, talk about the ethereal peace with the Arabs, they like to compare it to peace Israel has with friendly non-Jewish states like Denmark or Holland, or with peace between the Scandinavian states. The attitude of "Israel No. 2" is poles apart. Since all the Gentiles, including even Reagan or Bush can be assumed to be potential or actual anti-Semites, Israel can have no real peace with anyone, not just with the Arabs. In that worldview, the Holocaust is not attributed to the German Nazis, but to Gentiles who happened to be German. Accordingly, in that imagery Hitler is conceived of as no different from, say, the Roman emperors Vespasian and Titus who in 70 AD destroyed the Temple (leaving the Jews throughout Roman Empire free of persecutions), or from other enemies of the Jews, whether mythical like the Pharaoh, or real ones. This is why the above quoted statement by Netanyahu's that Arafat was worse than Hitler could be accepted by many as a foregone conclusion. When one departs from such assumptions, it is perfectly logical to claim that the only Israeli "answer to Palestinian terror" could be to use ever more force, in fact more terror.

This point was well grasped by Doron Rosenblum (Haaretz, March 5) who collected a lot of Netanyahu's enthusiastically received statements on such topics. They show, incidentally, that in campaigning against David Levy he took full advantage of the latter's reputation as somebody associated with the "peace process" by the very virtue of serving as Foreign minister in Shamir's government. Following the recommendations of his PR advisers, and adapting himself to the tastes of the public he was addressing, he chose to speak for the most part in the form of short and simplistic sloganeering, without bothering about its inner contradictions which "Israel No. 1" would have detected and resented. Here is a sample of his statements: "Who can guarantee to us that a peace we would sign will work?" "Major wars usually break up between states which were at peace". "Peace is just a slip of paper". "We can give the Arabs peace for peace". "Peace with Syria, perhaps - but the return of the Golan, never". "The choice we have is between a war with the Golan in our hands or without". "We can influence the [US] Administration in our favor". "The answer to terror is that every Jew should carry a revolver". Replying to a heckler objecting that many Jews are too poor to buy themselves a revolver, he reached what can only be described as high point of absurdity: "The state should distribute revolvers to the people". This statement, although berated by the press (which the Likud supporters tend to consider "hostile to the nation"), was received enthusiastically by his audience.

The mentioned gulf separating the two halves of Israeli Jewish society is by no means insurmountable, with the distinction between Ashkenazi and "Oriental" Jews. It is true that for reasons which can not be discussed here, large numbers of "Oriental" Jews tend to congregate in "Israel no. 2", But so do plenty of Ashkenazim, while not a few "Oriental" Jews stand firmly in "Israel no. 1". Professor Ya'akov Shavit (Hadashot, March 26) traced the roots of Netanyahu's speech style to the Revisionist movement of the late 1930s. Shavit recounts how, after Jabotinsky founded his "New Zionist Organization, he went on a tour of Jewish communities in small towns of Poland. Emulating the style of the Polish 'generals regime', he promised to Jews all kinds of things impossible to achieve, provided they would support him". For example, he assured them that "Jewish pressure will force Britain" to soon establish the Jewish state in Palestine and Jordan, not bothering about his simultaneous description of Britain as hardly less antisemitic than Nazi Germany. Using such speechmaking style, he quickly persuaded 700000 Polish Jews, (i.e. about 20% of the Jewish population of Poland), most of them religious, to sign a declaration supporting his demands, while knowing, as Shavit points it out, that his action "could not but be devoid of any political significance". Other Jewish leaders of the time compared Jabotinsky's demeanor to a that of a movie star, and this comparison could be applied to Netanyahu as well. But at the same time, Shavit points out that "Netanyahu couldn't care less about Jabotinsky's ideology" which, even if meant to be followed by his party members alone, has always had some importance. "He reduces Likud to a party whose only aim is to exploit the public's mood". If he means that Likud under Netanyahu's leadership is likely to lack any worldview apart from some banalities, Shavit may be quite right.

Throughout his campaign, Netanyahu laid heavy stress upon his own personality. In particular at the late stages of his campaign, when he frequently appeared in medium size towns and poor neighborhoods in large cities, inhabited by Jews of "Oriental" extraction who might have been assumed to be potential supporters of Levy, he entertained his audiences with stories about his soldierly qualities of more than 20 years past, including his training in the "General Staff Patrol" and his success in overcoming the hardships of such training. Such prattle would not have any political significance. Other Jewish leaders of the time compared Netzahinazi and Orientals alike: namely the army service. It had a side advantage of conveying an image of a warrior valiant enough to make his adulteries forgivable. Notions of this sort are cross-cultural and accepted by many as a foregone conclusion. When one departs from such assumptions, it is perfectly logical to claim that the only Israeli "answer to Palestinian terror" could be to use ever more force, in fact more terror.

An analysis of electoral returns shows that Netanyahu won handsomely in big cities, especially in disproportionally religious Jerusalem, and rather convincingly in the medium-sized ones. In Bnei Brak, a medium-sized city with a considerable Haredi majority, Netanyahu received no less than 90% of votes. The Moroccan-born Levy had to content himself with some votes of North African (primarily Moroccan) Jews concentrated in medium-size towns, but above all else in the poorest towns located far away from big cities which Netanyahu avoided during his campaign. It seems that other "Oriental" communities were far from willing to vote for Levy. The weakest contender, Katzav, who is of Iranian extraction, apparently attracted only the vote of other Iranian-descendants. Therefore Benny Begin doesn't seem to have been influenced by communitarian affiliations.

As I already indicated in report 99, written on 4/14/1992, dealing with Levy's aborted departure from Likud after a quarrel with Shamir, the constituency of Levy's faithfulness is much too small to serve as his power base letting him play an independent role in national politics. Insofar as the results of Likud primaries can be extrapolated, they would indicate that his Knesset strength wouldn't exceed 3-4 seats. Netanyahu's victory has finally convinced all Israeli political observers that there is no such thing as united "Oriental" vote. All that exists, is the votes of separate "Oriental" communities. But even this vote is not something to be taken for granted, as its extent may vary widely depending on extraneous factors. Long sections of the mass media are now sounding the warning that all-Israeli ideas will defeat an appeal to communalist separateness. In any event, Levy's defeat is so great that it forecloses for him an option of leaving Likud and forming an independent party, at least for a foreseeable future.

On election day Netanyahu's superior financial resources turned out to decisive. Uzi Benziman (Haaretz, March 26) describes the enormous fleet of minibuses and other vehicles which Netanyahu hired in order to bring his voters to the polling stations. He also describes crowds of Netanyahu's hired henchmen drowning every outcry of Levy's supporters in "an organized loud chorus of 'Bibi, Bibi, king of Israel' outlasting all the others". Voting formulas were 3 page long, containing over 100 entries to fill. The majority of the Likud's members would find it difficult to fill them, but the candidates were equipped with computerized forms given to their prospective voters. One of the tasks of Netanyahu's hired hands was to push his forms into the hands of the voters, while often "buying" for few Shekels a form of rival candidate in a voter's possession. While calling the manner in which some Netanyahu voters were brought to the polling stations, "herd-like", Benzimor deplots the fact that Netanyahu's rival candidates failed to demand "other voting conditions under which democracy in Likud could have been seen to a better advantage".

The smashing victory of Netanyahu leaves open many question about Labor's response to it and his conduct as Likud's chief. Let me raise two pertinent questions. The first concerns the contrast between Likud's virtual bankruptcy and Netanyahu's riches. In Likud's central building in Tel Aviv, now taken over by Netanyahu, the elevators are in disrepair and the telephones, in any case outmoded, are time after time disconnected as a result of non-payment of bills. Is Netanyahu going to pour his riches into Likud's chest? Under Israeli law the State Comptroller inspects the financial affairs of the parties but not those of the factions within the parties: accordingly, the question cannot be easily answered. The second question concerns the danger posed to Likud by the Tzomet party and its leader Rafael Eitan, who not only once was a Chief of Staff but also had had a much longer and more impressive army career than Netanyahu before reaching the C-o-S rank. Although Tzomet has only 8 Knesset seats compared to Likud's 32, it is rising in the polls much more rapidly than Likud. In addition to that, Eitan is certainly capable of coming out with slogans no less simplistic than Netanyahu's. A translation of Netanyahu's vague campaign promises into a coherent program is another problem. As the head of the largest party in opposition he will now be surely pressed to come out with some program. This point was raised Yosef [Tommy] Lapid, one of the rare press commentators of distinctions who supports Likud. Writing in Maariv (March 26), Lapid didn't shy of opining that Netanyahu's "style of leadership reminds me of Mussolini's style in Rome when he emulated Caesar and at the same time Bonaparte". Lapid does express his general agreement with Netanyahu's slogans, but with the qualification that he "will refrain from asking questions about those slogans which can in no way be realized". But he does ask some specific questions, for example: "What concrete plans for the future do you have as Likud's leader? Are we permitted to know what do you propose? If we are, why can't I find a single feasible idea in all your speeches, declarations and ads?" After more such questions, Lapid continues: "Don't keep telling us that you want 'peace for peace'. This is at best a delusion and at worst a nonsense bad enough to insult the intelligence of at least some of your listeners. You must know it yourself and you also know that we know it. Spare us the shame, then. You can say: 'I renounce peace. I will never sign any agreement with the Arabs. I want 'peace for peace'. This is at best a delusion and at worst a nonsense qualities into action".

Other recently retired generals are also said to communicate to Rosen that "Barak loves to speak but hates to hear other generals speak. He makes speeches at the General Staff meetings long enough to exhaust his listeners and antagonize them. He always implies that his listeners are incapable of understanding what he means". More such stuff can be quoted, but I will omit it. Clearly, Barak is now nearing the end of his two year term as the Chief of Staff without basking in public popularity. For Rabin’s scheme this is the main obstacle. Both Rosen and Levitzky discuss this factor, but due to military censorship, both cannot say much apart from vacuous generalities, e.g. that “Barak’s way of coping with the Intifada doesn’t presently add to his popularity”. They both say that “Barak is doing very good work in the army, but its nature cannot be reported”. In my own view, although Rabin has always been his popularity, his power remains absolute because the ministers fear that if they oppose him the government will collapse. The same fear may well influence the Labor Party to approve Barak’s ascendency. However, whether posting Barak against Netanyahu can contain the latter is another question which only the future can resolve. It can be said that, if the Israeli army keeps blundering as gravely as to date, parachuting Barak to Labor leadership will be of little avail. But if the Israeli army still under his command gains something perceived by Israeli public as tangible enough, whether against the Palestinians or against any other enemy, Barak will have his chance to defeat Netanyahu and Eitan. In either case, the victory of Netanyahu and the possible ascendency of Barak will mark the further shift of Israeli politics to the right. [—]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Iran

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

370

Women's rights and economic independence is often restricted in practice. Women's lack of education and access to income often contributes to their vulnerability and exploitation. In developing countries on all continents, the US Agency for International Development (USAID) has programs to increase women's access to education, health care and income. A number of USAID activities include legal rights education, along with other basic services targeted to women. The terrible custom of female genital mutilation is widespread in many countries in Africa and also occurs in Yemen and Oman, as our human rights reports note. Female genital mutilation is estimated to affect over 70 million women worldwide. This ritual, when practiced in its most extreme form, can lead to hemorrhage, shock, infection, inability to consummate marriage, urinary tract infection, pelvic inflammatory disease, infertility, psychological trauma, increased maternal mortality, and death. The United States views female genital mutilation as both harmful to women’s health and as a violation of their right to physical freedom.
We cannot allow women to be the exception to the fundamental principle of human rights universality. The US affirms the principle of cultural diversity, but does not believe cultural tolerance should be used to justify abuses of human rights. We believe we should help to promote local women's groups' efforts to improve the status of women, and we should continue to make clear to governments that we are concerned about systematic gender violence and gross discrimination. Governments that promote or turn a blind eye to gender-based violence are denying basic human rights. The Clinton Administration regards promoting the cause of women's rights as a key element of our overall human rights policy. Addressing abuses against women is a complex and difficult task, and we are committed to moving forward in the following specific areas:

(1) By supporting ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, we will demonstrate how seriously we take our international legal obligations to protect the rights of women. This treaty requires states parties to it to condemn and to work to eliminate discrimination against women. Among other measures, states must embody the principle of equality of men and women in their constitutions and laws; adopt laws and other measures—including sanctions if necessary—prohibiting all discrimination against women; and take measures to eliminate discrimination against women by any person, organization, or enterprise. States must also act to ensure the full development and advancement of women in the political, social, economic, and cultural fields.

(2) As we press for implementation of the recommendations of the World Conference on Human Rights, we will focus particular attention on the agenda for women's rights. We were pleased that the conference's Final Declaration endorsed positions taken by the US Human Rights Action Plan. The Vienna Declaration calls for the integration of the human rights of women into the mainstream of United Nations system-wide activity and stresses the importance of working toward the elimination of violence against women, sexual harassment, exploitation, and trafficking in women; gender biases in the administration of justice; and harmful traditional practices. The declaration also calls for universal ratification of CEDAW by the year 2000, reaffirms the right of women to accessible and adequate health care and the widest range of family planning services, and urges governments to facilitate the access of women to decision-making positions and activities. Another important provision that calls for support, by the UN Human Rights Commission, of a Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women. Finally, the declaration urges that the human rights of women play an important role in the deliberations of the 1995 World Conference on Women.

(3) The World Conference on Human Rights also called for the establishment of a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. The United States strongly and actively supports this proposal and believes that the creation of this position will enhance the integration of women's issues throughout the UN's human rights machinery. We will also consider introducing resolutions in the United Nations General Assembly, the Commission on the Status of Women, and the Human Rights Commission to address issues raised in this subcommittee's hearings on women's human rights.

(4) As the War Crimes Tribunal moves forward with prosecuting crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia, the United States will press for the assembly of evidence to prosecute systematic rape as a war crime and a tool of ethnic cleansing. We are pleased that the US candidate for 1 of the 11 judgeships on the tribunal. Judge Gabrielle Kirk McDonald, was elected to the tribunal and received more votes than any other candidate.

(5) The elimination of abuses and discrimination against women will be an important factor in our overall consideration of the human rights records of countries interested in receiving US aid and trade benefits. Our efforts to promote democracy, which include the administration of justice and broad citizen participation in social and political life, will be a major vehicle for advancing women's rights in new and emerging democracies around the world.

(6) As I noted above, an integral part of our human rights reports is examining the ways in which women are subject to gender-specific discrimination and abuse. In addition, our Embassies abroad report on women's human rights throughout the year on the status of women in host countries. This year's annual reports emphasize the abuses targeted at women should be included throughout the report in the appropriate section. For example, rape by government of women's rights would be covered in the section on torture, restriction of voting rights would be covered in the section on the right to choose one's government, and so forth. There is also a separate paragraph in the instructions cable specifically requiring that our Embassies and Consulates report on trafficking in women.

(7) I am aware of proposals by both the House of Representatives and the Senate to create a full-time position within the Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs to address women's issues. I note that an employee within the bureau has always included women's rights in her portfolio. Whatever the outcome of the Senate and House proposals, I can assure you that I plan to assign someone to work on these issues fulltime. Promoting the equality of women is an essential component of this Administration's human rights and democracy policy. As Secretary Christopher said when he addressed the World Conference on Human Rights: "Violence and discrimination against women don't just victimize individuals; they hold back whole societies by confining the human potential of half the population. Guaranteeing human rights is a moral imperative with respect to both women and men. It is also an investment in making whole nations stronger, fairer, and better. We look forward to working with the Congress toward the realization of this common goal".
smells revolution," said one student visiting the Pathfinder booth for the first time. Many who bought Pathfinder books in previous years have come back looking for new titles. One doctor from a village near the town of Uroimeh in the northwest (Azerbaijan) came back this year and bought Che Guevara: Economics and Politics in the Transition to Socialism by Carlos Tablada. A group of young men who bought To Speak the Truth - Why Washington's 'Cold War' Against Cuba Doesn't End by Fidel Castro and Che Guevara last year, came back to buy several more books on the Cuban revolution. There is an increased interest in Pathfinder titles on national self-determination, particularly among young people who are Kurdish. The best-selling titles so far are New International no. 10, containing the article, "Imperialism's march toward fascism and war," and Evelyn Reed's Problems of Women's Liberation. "Pathfinder is offering 200 titles of books and altogether 2000 copies for sale, mainly on politics which are the writings of great philosophers, politicians and world leaders such as Carl Marx, Fidel Castro, Lenin, Nelson Mandela, Malcolm X, etc..." pointed out the Tehran Times in an article about the book publisher's participation in the fair. [8]

22128. Steining, Judi. "Young Israel On The Move: Students Join The Fight For Freedom For Israel's MIAs", in Jewish Press (New York), June 14, 1996. p. 79. American Jewish students are transfixed by the plight of Zvi Feldman, Yehuda Katz, Zachary Baumel, Rachamim Alsheich, Yossi Fink and Ron Arad. Now, hundreds of American schools have been visited by the American Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers (ACMIS). For example, Ron Arad was captured after parachuting from his fighter bomber after a peacetime airraid on a Lebanese village on 10/16/1986. Reportedly some of the MIAs are held in either Iran or Syria. ACMIS is sponsored by the National Council of Young Israel and the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers based in Jerusalem.

ACMIS' 'programming' operations are in place in the metropolitan area schools including: Beth Jacob-Beth Miriam School, Frisch School, Hebrew Academy of Nassau County, Hillel Yeshiva, Shal & Miriam Tawil High School, Magen David Yeshiva, Manhattan Day School, Marsha Stern Tamudic-Yeshiva University High School For Boys, North Shore Hebrew High School, Rambam Mesivtim Samuel Wang Yeshiva University High School For Girls, Rabbi Joseph H. Lockstein Upper School of Ramaz, Westchester Day School, Yeshiva of Central Queens, Yeshiva of Flatbush Elementary, Joel Braverman High School, Yeshiva Steela K. Abraham High School For Girls (HALB), and Yeshiva Mizrachi L'Banim. The Bnei Akiva of North America has been established as a national organization to establish Israel MIA programs throughout American schools nationwide. [TEXT]

22129. UN. Preparatory Committee for the 1995 Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, Part 1: Agenda. (Third session). September 1994. Chairman's suggested draft agenda of the 1995 Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (1) Opening of the Conference by the Chairman of the fourth session of the Preparatory Committee (2) Election of the President of the Conference (3) Statement by the President of the Conference (4) Statement by the Secretary-General of the United Nations (5) Submission of the Final Report of the Preparatory Committee (6) Adoption of the Rules of Procedure (7) Election of Chairman and Vice-Chairmen of the Main Committees, the Drafting Committee and the Credentials Committee (8) Election of Vice-Presidents (9) Credentials of representatives to the Conference (a) Appointment of the Credentials Committee (b) Report of the Credentials Committee (10) Confirmation of the nomination of the Secretary-General (11) Adoption of the Agenda (12) Programme of work (13) Adoption of arrangements for meeting the costs of the Conference (14) General debate

(15) Review of the operation of the Treaty as provided for in its Article VIII, Paragraph 3: A. Implementation of the provisions of the Treaty relating to non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, disarmament and international peace and security: (1) Articles I and II and preambular paragraphs 1-3 (2) Article VI and preambular paragraphs 1-13 (3) Article VII with specific reference to the main issues in A and B. B. Security assurances: (1) Resolution 255 (1968) of the United Nations Security Council (2) The CTBT, Effective international arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon States against the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. C. Implementation of the provisions of the Treaty relating to non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, safeguards and nuclear-weapon-free zones: (1) Article III and preambular paragraphs 4 and 5, especially in their relationship to Article IV and preambular paragraphs 6 and 7 (2) Articles I and II and preambular paragraph 1-3 in their relationship to Articles III and IV (3) Article VII D. Implementation of the provisions of the Treaty relating to peaceful applications of nuclear energy: (1) Articles III (3) and IV, preambular paragraphs 6 and 7, especially in their relationship to Article III (1), (2), (4) and preambular paragraphs 4 and 5 as well as to Articles I and II (2) Article V E. Other provisions of the Treaty (16) Role of the Treaty in the promotion of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and of nuclear disarmament in strengthening international peace and security and measures aimed at promoting wider acceptance of the Treaty (17) Decision on the extension of the Treaty as provided for in Article X, paragraph 2 (18) Reports of the Main Committees (19) Other questions (20) Preparation and adoption of Final Document(s). [X] session of the Committee was scheduled to start half an hour later than usual. It took up item 1.1 on "Rules of procedure" beginning with a progress report by the Chairman of the informal working group on the rules of procedures, Ambassador S.A. Adekanye of Nigeria. The last part of the afternoon session dealt with item 1.3, the agenda for the 1995 NPT Conference. The Chairman of the third PrepCom, Ambassador Ayewah of Nigeria, presented his draft agenda. The first 13 points are of formal nature. The rest of the agenda items (abbreviated):

(14) general debate
(15) review of the NPT
(16) role of the NPT in the promotion of non-proliferation and disarmament
(17) decision on the extension
(18) reports of the Main Committee
(19) other questions
(20) preparation and adoption of Final Document(s)

The discussion of the individual points proceeded well, but then started a struggle about the order of the topics. Iran suggested to decide on the extension of the Treaty as the last point and after adopting the Final Document. Ambassador Hoffman of Germany questioned how this could possibly be done. He argued that review and extension are dealt with parallel and that no artificial order should be introduced. He said that if order would be of no importance one could as well treat item 17 before item 15, i.e. decide on the extension of the treaty before it is reviewed. This appeared to many observers to be meant as a joke. But next the Russian delegation took up the German contribution as a suggestion to which it agreed and added that this would be the only way acceptable to them. The Chairman then proposed a compromise order which begins with 18 and 19, 17 will be treated before 20. The Russians didn't agree questioning whether there would be anything to do at all at the Conference if there is no decision on the extension. At that point the US delegation joined the Russians in endorsing the German proposal, while preferring no reordering of the items as drafted by the chairman. During a lengthy debate Mexico, Indonesia, and Syria backed the proposal made by the Chairman, while Italy joined in with Germany, too. Eventually agreement was reached on a compromise according to which the sequence of items will remain as in the Chairman's draft but without numbers given on the left so as to indicate that the order is without prejudice to the chronological sequence of agenda items which will later be adopted by the NPT Conference itself. [ ]

22131. UN. Preparatory Committee for the 1995 Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, Part 3: NGO Activities. (Third session). September 1994. The major event of NGOs during the week was a two hours briefing held this afternoon. Speakers of 30 NGOs presented their short statements. It was organized by the Special NGO Committee for Disarmament at Geneva. It is mentioned in italics letters on the official timetable of the PrepCom which started this afternoon later than usual to give delegations the opportunity to attend. More than 50 people of NGOs were present and more than 20 representatives of delegations. A reader with one-page-statement of the NGOs will be distributed to the delegations. Most speakers endorsed an extension for limited periods (rolling extension). The Main argument is that with indefinite extension NNWS would be deprived of their possibilities to put pressure on the NWS to disarm. In the following, the complete list of speakers is given. A rather personal selection of points that were made is noted here. (1) George Bunn, Lawyers Alliance for World Security (LAWS) (2) Alyn Ware, Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy (3) Roland Timerbaev, Monterey Institute for International Studies (4) Sheila Oakes, National Peace Council (5) William Epstein, NGO Committee on Disarmament, New York (6) Helge Hagelund, No to Greenpeace International: Additional thought to the broadly discussed steps towards nuclear disarmament is a new energy deal addressing the question of civil nuclear energy in the future. Long term planning and financing required therefore he regards long term safeguards necessary to get public acceptance. (14) Michel Monod, War Resisters International: The time is over where a state can measure its own power by the number of warheads. All steps considered are partial. Necessary now: Nuclear Weapons Convention. (15) James Leonard, Washington Council on Non-Proliferation: Not reasonable to expect the 5 NWS to come up with a common timetable, but to expect that they provide their ideas how to reach a joint action. Extended indefinitely best way. Limited extension weakens the treaty; current process of disarmament which nobody would have imagined some years ago to go so fast might come to a halt. (16) Jacqueline Cabasso, Western States Legal Foundation: Nuclear testing is continued by proxy-testing now called Scientific Based Stockpile Stewardship. Its officially declared purpose it to ensure the technical competence of weapons research, enhance the ability of research teams to design new nuclear weapons in the future. In the view of the Western States Legal Foundation inspectors and guards would suffice for stockpiles stewardship. (17) Bill Pace, World Federalist Movement: He quotes Albert Einstein saying that it would be a murderous contradiction to believe that countries can at the same time prevent and prepare for war. (18) Solange Fernex, Julie McKay, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom: Endorses no indefinite extension because it would be arbitrary and set a self-serving standard for NWS to define and evaluate progress in nuclear disarmament. (19) Romesh Chandra, World Peace Council: World public opinion against the indefinite extension of the NPT as being a discriminatory treaty because it gives a monopoly to NWS. They still stockpile nuclear weapons and continue unashamedly the vertical proliferation. He demands to put an end to nuclear weapons. He believes that can be done now. (20) Kate Morgan, Campaign Against Militarism: Racisms in the world is perpetuated by the double standards of the NPT as an instrument of western foreign policy in the age of the cold world to control a nd threat those countries which are not allowed to possess nuclear weapons. Attention is always focused on weapons programs in the third World and the real power to destroy the whole world in the arsenals of the NWS is overlooked. Any extension of the NPT would legalize the NWS to threaten the rest of the world and it would be destabilizing the world by cementing the discrimination between the two sorts of countries. (21) Janet Bloomfield, Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament: NPT extension should be conditional on the start of negotiations to a treaty to ban all nuclear weapons in the world completely.

(22) Joseph Cirincione, Campaign for the Non-Proliferation Treaty: Mentions several steps, including negotiation on a global verified cutoff of fissile material which all are possible by 4/1995. The NPT is more than a leverage; it is in itself important. It deserves to be extended, maybe even indefinitely. This has to be seen in April 1995. (23) Jim Walsh, Defense and Arms Control Studies Program, MIT: (24) Dorrie Weiss, Economists Allied for Arms Reduction: Must not risk a period without a Treaty and must not legitimize the Status Quo of NWSs. The NWS should pledge not to make qualitative improvements in weapons This can be done without verification and cannot be included in the CTBT. (25) Pasahat Syet, FRIENDS - Foundation for Research on National Development and Security: Though it has been said that Pakistan had achieved the ability to produce a nuclear weapon its NP policy implies neither have made a bomb nor the intention to do so. He said Pakistan would sign the NPT, if India does the same. (26) Remi Permentier, INESAP - International Network of Engineers and Scientists Against Proliferation: He mentions doubts about the nuclear energy regarding areas such as security, safety, economy, environment, waste, and development. As a consequence, an
In this regard, we should not forget that the destructive power of the herein is based on analyses of primary data collected in Iran in tandem with extension of this treaty seems to be a contradiction in itself. Regrettably, the primary case—post-revolutionary Iran—are compared with relevant proliferation as well as promoting (nuclear) disarmament. Indefinite. This is a comparative study in which qualitative and quantitative data for at the core of the long-term project of both avoiding horizontal and vertical view state legitimation, development strategy and revolutionary effects. The attempt to narrow the debate to the question of limited or indefinite evaluate the fruitfulness of this model. In this study, health policy as controller of nuclear energy and technology. populist development strategy or an economic growth approach to useful; and finally, as the main agent of the NPT, strategies. Building on James Malloy's argument that post-revolutionary proliferation policy should strive for unambiguous credibility, for proliferation resistance of nuclear energy programmes, or a convincing transferability to other states. Such a policy should aim at (a) recognizing civil-military ambivalence, (b) avoiding the maintaining of scientific-technological prerequisities for all kind of weapon programmes and (c) reducing discrimination. It should be realized that one important bottle-neck is the production, use and trade of weapon-grade materials (i.e., highly enriched uranium, plutonium in all isotopic compositions, and tritium).

Unilateral commitments and multilateral agreements should lead to an end of all production and use of weapon-grade material in significant amounts (comprehensive cut-off having a real effect); to an end of the use and further development of specific sensitive nuclear technologies, such as reprocessing or laser isotope separation or inertial confinement fusion; to the internationalisation of all existing stockpiles of weapon-grade nuclear materials and to its elimination; to full-scope safeguards of all nuclear facilities in all states. Furthermore, a comprehensive test-ban should strive for reducing obvious loopholes presented by some technologies which allow circumvention; this should go hand in hand with the ending of all nuclear weapon related research and development. Further deep cuts in nuclear arsenals of all nuclear weapon states are imperative within a binding framework of a nuclear disarmament time-table towards zero. All these measures mean moving beyond the NPT. Unambiguous and credible steps towards a nuclear-weapon-free world are much more important than only discussing specific procedures for NPT extension alone or enforcing indefinite extension. Negotiations should be started aiming at a Nuclear Weapons Convention being undiscriminatory, and which may replace the NPT one day. This convention should govern the transition of the existing non-proliferation regime to a nuclear-weapon-free regime in pending negotiations of a Nuclear Weapons Convention. The lack in civil-military ambivalence, (b) avoiding the maintaining of scientific-technological prerequisities for all kind of weapon programmes and (c) reducing discrimination. It should be realized that one important bottle-neck is the production, use and trade of weapon-grade materials (i.e., highly enriched uranium, plutonium in all isotopic compositions, and tritium).

These problematic aspects have to be included into the debate on development, I introduce an alternative model, which incorporates the policy of an ideological strategy, informed by notions of individual and social transformation. The Iranian post-revolutionary state is examined to evaluate the fruitfulness of this model. In this study, health policy formation and implementation in Iran serve as a window through which to view state legitimation, development strategy and revolutionary effects. This is a comparative study in which qualitative and quantitative data for the primary case—a revolutionary Iran—are compared with relevant data for selected semiperipheral national-states. The research presented herein is based on analyses of primary data collected in Iran in tandem with secondary data from Iranian and international sources. The revolutionary Iranian state's development strategy and its implications for health policy changes are examined on the basis of qualitative data. To get at the further question of what consequences these policy changes have effected, pre- and post-revolutionary health status outcomes, primarily as reflected in changes in infant and child mortality rates, are compared. Finally, the question of whether these outcomes can be attributed to international forces rather than revolutionary policies is addressed by contrasting health outcomes in Iran with outcomes in other semiperipheral nations. The conclusions drawn are threefold. First, qualitative analyses of health policy in Iran since the revolution indicate that an ideological strategy predominates, though political and economic considerations continue to play a secondary role. Second, taken as a whole, these data indicate that the revolution had a positive and significant effect on health policy and outcomes in Iran. And, third, though both types of data indicate significant changes, the qualitative data provide somewhat more compelling evidence for a revolutionary effect than do the quantitative data. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [5]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iran

22135. Valinejad, Afshin. "10000 Watch as 'Tehran Vampire' Killer is Flogged, Hanged", in Arizona Republic, August 14, 1997, p. A21. The taxi driver Ali Reza Khoastryan Kordiyeh, who became known as the 'Tehran Vampire' for his campaign of stalking, kidnapping, raping, stabbing and arson, who terrorize the city for three months, was flogged by the relatives of his victims and then hanged. His victims included nine women. Unusually, the time of the punishment was publicized to reassure people that the crime wave was done.

22136. Valinejad, Afshin. "Iran President Says Choices For Cabinet Fit Times Ahead", in Seattle Times, August 19, 1997, p. A7. President Mohammad Khatemi has appealed to parliament to accept his choises for the 22-seat cabinet. A televised debate on the selections has begun in Iran. The nomination process is seen as an early test of Khatemi's support in the Parliament after his upset, landslide victory in recent elections. One nominee has drawn particular criticism: Atollah Mohajerani, named to head the Ministry of Culture & Islamic Guidance, who has suggested direct talks with the US in the past. The culture ministry controls the media, film and music industry in Iran. Abdullah Nouri, nominee to head the Ministry of Interior, is also controversial, since he is seen as a moderate who might ease some social restrictions. Newspapers state he will name one woman, US-educated Massoumeh Ebtekar as VP. [TXT]

22137. Wakin, Daniel J. "Champion of the Secular Vows To Defy Fundamentalists, Publish Rushdie Novel", in Arizona Daily Star, January 16, 1994, p. A17. [TXT] Leftist writer Aziz Nesrin in Turkey has vowed to publish the works of Rushdie in Turkey. He has been dogged by attacks against him since the announcement. He is the author of about 100 books and a newspaper column. His literary earnings fund a home for needy whatever their religion, or their faith, or their gender, are convinced that this belief is shared by others), most people around the world, around so lightly, and obviously means different things to different people. Let me say that I believe, (and it's not just a matter of personal credo, I think this belief is shared by others), most people around the world, whatever their religion, or their faith, or their gender, are convinced that there are certain fundamental human rights and that these fundamental human rights will affect any individual in society.

22138. Waldman, Peter. "Divorce Iranian Style: In Court, Islamic Law Honors The Husband; The Wife Has Few Rights The Mullahs Will Concede; Battering Is No Grounds", in Wall Street Journal, November 8, 1994, p. A1, A14. The current court system in Iran is dominated by reactionary clerics who came into office with the triumph of Ayatollah Khomeini.Before such judges, domestic violence is no reason for women to seek a divorce: 'women have paid the price' for this reaction. Men may divorce women at will, but women can obtain divorce's only with the consent of their husbands. Family law expert and former member of the Council of Guardians Hoosein Mehrpour in Iran argue the major problem in Iranian courts is not their Islamic character, but rather that the draconian environment is very 'un-Islamic' in its drastic and radical siding with men in courts against the claims of the wives. So, the claims of women for custody of their children are rarely accepted by courts, even when the ex-husbands are degenerates or drug-addicts. In addition, a further pressure for young wives who seek divorces often are rejected by their own families, who are sometimes pleased to have one less mouth to feed.

22139. Whiley, Andrew. Theocracy, Human Rights and Women: The Iranian Experience: Iran's Mixed Human Rights Record: Part 01. Proceedings of a One-Day Conference. Montclair State University: Department of Economics & Finance, School of Business Administration, October 30, 1993, pp. 27-31. Thank you Dr. Pirouz for that introduction and I would also, like the previous speakers, like to thank Montclair State for holding this event. In particular, I would like to commend Dr. Pirouz for his balanced choice of panelists. It certainly makes my life a lot easier being the fourth speaker today after allowing three such well-rounded speakers; they have made my life easier in I don't have to deal with the issue of women's rights, or at least, will defer those questions to people who are more expert than I am. Although, that I would correct him on one tiny point, which is that when said we will now turn to the issue of human rights, that's not the case; we've been dealing with human rights throughout this morning's session. And my task today, as I try to define it, is to theorize a little bit about the differences in approaches towards human rights in the West and in Iran, try to explain some of the considerations which affect the Islamic Republic's approach towards human rights matters and avoid being too judgmental. Inevitably, since you have a human rights activist speaking to you, you will expect me to draw some usions or at least make some statements about the nature of the beast that 'we are examining.

Unfortunately, there is a tactical and peripheral problem since the quality of evidence available to us in sifting and weighing the situation is extremely poor. As an organization, we have been able to visit Iran twice in the last 18 months, which is better than other human rights organizations have done. Amnesty has yet to be given permission to go there and most other NGOs, as well as the UN Special Rapporteur on Iran, have been barred from the country. In the case of the Special Rapporteur, he has not enable to go there for the last two years. So, we lack the data that we would like to have in order to draw balanced conclusions.

At the same time, the government, as we all know, is extremely defensive on this subject and attempts to address the issues from the point of view of a cultural and Islamic defense, rather than necessarily to argue the facts. So, when organizations such as ours attempt to question the government, or to ask for information, it's rare that we get any feedback from them.

I think before I get in to my formal remarks because I'm addressing a specialist audience concerned with a particular region, it's worth just diverting your attention for a few minutes to say what it is we are speaking about with respect to human right a phrase that is tossed being the fourth speaker today after allowing three such well-rounded speakers; they have made my life easier in I don't have to deal with the issue of women's rights, or at least, will defer those questions to people who are more expert than I am. Although, that I would correct him on one tiny point, which is that when said we will now turn to the issue of human rights, that's not the case; we've been dealing with human rights throughout this morning's session. And my task today, as I try to define it, is to theorize a little bit about the differences in approaches towards human rights in the West and in Iran, try to explain some of the considerations which affect the Islamic Republic's approach towards human rights matters and avoid being too judgmental. Inevitably, since you have a human rights activist speaking to you, you will expect me to draw some usions or at least make some statements about the nature of the beast that 'we are examining.

Unfortunately, there is a tactical and peripheral problem since the quality of evidence available to us in sifting and weighing the situation is extremely poor. As an organization, we have been able to visit Iran twice in the last 18 months, which is better than other human rights organizations have done. Amnesty has yet to be given permission to go there and most other NGOs, as well as the UN Special Rapporteur on Iran, have been barred from the country. In the case of the Special Rapporteur, he has not enable to go there for the last two years. So, we lack the data that we would like to have in order to draw balanced conclusions.

At the same time, the government, as we all know, is extremely defensive on this subject and attempts to address the issues from the point of view of a cultural and Islamic defense, rather than necessarily to argue the facts. So, when organizations such as ours attempt to question the government, or to ask for information, it's rare that we get any feedback from them.

I think before I get in to my formal remarks because I'm addressing a specialist audience concerned with a particular region, it's worth just diverting your attention for a few minutes to say what it is we are speaking about with respect to human right a phrase that is tossed
In the last couple of months, three additional cases coming to trial after a long time; German courts will also be coming to trial after a short time; those involved in the assassination of Opposition leaders in the KDPI, the Kurdish Democratic Party of Iran, Mr. Sadegh Sharifkhandi and three others in 9/1992. The importance of this case is that the German Federal prosecutor has publicly stated that the prosecution has evidence linking those involved in this plot to the Iranian government. And the Iranian who is in jail at the moment facing trial is said to have been sent by the Iranian authorities. The importance here is that, despite a considerable amount of anecdototal evidence, and considerable suspicion on the part of many people, the Iranian government to this day continues to deny that it has had any direct role in the assassinations of opponents of the regime, some of them peaceful opponents, which have taken place periodically over the last fourteen years. If this case indeed leads to a judgment that the Iranian authorities were directly involved, it will be a first, with far-reaching implications. The significance of this case for Tehran was indicated by the fact that the intelligence minister, Mr. Fallahian, visited Germany fairly soon afterwards, and this subject was believed to be one of those under discussion at the time. There are other cases which in the next couple of months will also be coming to trial after a long time; those involved in the interrogations of Kazem Rajavi in Geneva and Shahpur Bakhtiar in Paris. By coincidence, those three cases coming together could blow a devastating hole in the Iranian government's arguments that it has not been involved with these assassinations. I must say that based on the evidence that my organization has gathered so far, it does appear that there has been an authorized pattern of targeted assassinations abroad against Iranian opponents, attacking the very central premises of the right to life.

My third example is perhaps, on the surface, a smaller one, but it's one which I believe indicates the lack of tolerance of the Islamic authorities to criticism, even of the mildest form. Their sensitivities, I believe, indicate the insecurity of the regime, its extreme defensiveness and its inability to cope with critics who pose no harm other than satirizing the regime itself. Earlier this month, Ayatollah Yazdi, the head of the judiciary, took it upon himself in a Friday prayers address, an occasion that is usually reserved for important announcements of government policy to speak about the case of a cartoonist Manuchehr Karimzadeh who had been originally sentenced by a Revolutionary Court. Despite the provisions that he should have been tried openly, he was tried in a closed court. He was originally given a one-year jail sentence, and now he's been given a 10-year sentence. The fact that a cartoonist should have suffered in this particular way simply by having, or deemed to have, insulted the Islamic authorities, and in particular, the late Ayatollah Khomeini—the sacrosanct memory of the late Imato mind suggests an extraordinary sensibility on the part of the authorities, in particular to the sensibilities of the Hezbollah revolutionary element of society, suggesting that people were making fun of them too openly.

So, in these three examples, then, we have looked first at issues of discrimination in employment, the controls over individuals' appearances and actions which we've heard about in the case of women's rights in the streets. Women's rights has become a political football in Tehran, in the push and pull of society between those favoring a more pragmatic approach and those favoring an approach that emphasizes what are to be considered to be revolutionary values more consistent with the line adopted by the late Imam. Secondly then, we addressed the issue of the right to life, which also as a subsection involves the role of ethnic and religious groups in Iran today. What is the role in Iran of the minorities? The country is often spoken of as if it were a monolith; clearly, as this audience well knows, it is not. It is a multi-ethnic, multi-linguistic, multi-confessional society. [=]

(2) Fight against illiteracy among women.
(3) Mobilization and organization of women.
(4) Fight against prostitution and moral decadence.
(5) Fight against the exploitation of women and young girls in factories; establishment of specific work hours, more jobs, paid weekends and holidays, and equal wages for women and men.
(6) Prohibition of child labor.
(7) Two-months paid sick leave for pregnant women.
(8) Free child care for working class mothers.
(9) Free kindergarten for the children of working class women.
(10) The establishment of training workshops for the poor young girls.
(11) The establishment of centers and libraries for women.
(12) The establishment of a journal for women.

[Reprinted from Bidary-e Ma (Our Awakening), 1944.]

22142. World Confederation of Iranian Students (National Union); Mujahideen-i Khalq. In Defense of People's Struggle in Iran: The Last Defense of Ali Mihandoost: Part 4: Mihandoost's Last Defense: Sociological Concept. Pamphlet. Frankfurt, West Germany: World Confederation of Iranian Students (National Union), June 1974. At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century, struggle for independence in the poor and exploited countries started. Their objectives, of course, was to break the chains of colonialization and exploitation in their countries. As these struggles grew, the enemies of the masses had no choice but to gradually retreat. Among many countries, even the small African nations achieved their independence. There are however some questions which remain unanswered. Do these countries achieve their economic as well as political independence? Even though colonization appears to be gone; is exploitation also gone? Are the masses of the third world rules of their own destinies? At the beginning of the 20th century, the answers to above questions might have appeared to be difficult. Today however the answers are very clear. Imperialist countries with the United States as their leader had to find new means of exploitation, because the masses have become more aware and resisted domination by foreign countries. Imperialists realized that direct colonization is no longer a workable solution because they feared that their open and outright presence can cause resentment among the masses and can lead to a general uprising. In other words, imperialists, initially under the name of development of the third world countries have come to exploit and colonize them and any direct intervention in their affairs could have resulted in unmasking their ugly face. Colonialization, therefore, has become old and no longer serves their purpose.

Their appearance had to be changed, and the dependent and obedient regime could very well accommodate them with this change of appearance. Internal security could also be maintained with providing help and direction for local armies. Is not exploitation the objective of imperialism? Then economic dependence provided them another means to achieve the same objective. This time again because of growing awareness of the masses and their new revolutionary strategies, especially in China, Viet Nam and Cuba, the imperialists should realize that their days are numbered and they will be soon destroyed. One should not expect, however, that those, who live like parasites and exploit poor and defenseless people simply abandon their lust and desire for wealth.

Imperialists, therefore, desperately try to device new means which could destroy revolutionary movement and appear to erase the existing contradictions in the exploited countries. In some countries, many programs which are reformist by nature, have been put into effect and apparently have temporarily delayed insurrection of the masses. The objectives of these so-called revolutionary programs are not to solve the real and fundamental contradictions, but to change the appearance of an ugly and dying face of colonial power. White revolution, in Iran, has the same character. These programs cannot and will not be able to solve the fundamental contradictions in our society. On the contrary, these contradictions become more acute as the class differentiation increases. In the past, the peasants were exploited by the land owners. Today, the foreign and local capitalists exploit the farm laborers. Our sociological structure does not change and unemployment increases daily. Peasants, in search of bread, constantly move to cities and end up living in slums of Tehran. This emigration of peasants from the rural areas to the cities, in fact, symbolizes the conditions of our peasants. On the other hand, farm laborers are also exploited by such a project called Farm and Industry. Under this project, they have to hand out their meager earnings to those who exploit them. Iran's regime claims that the chain of land ownership has been broken and the peasants own their land. The truth, however, is that without money, water and tools, they have to go back to the same capitalists and pawn their land. After the so-called White Revolution, contradictions among the class have, indeed, intensified and exploitation has increased. Our country has become more economically dependent to imperialists and this regime, being their puppet, protects their interests. Is it possible for capitalism to grow in our country without dependence on foreign interest? The answer is negative.

The capitalists in our country are totally dependent on foreign capital and the regime has increased and have no self dependence. Industrialization in this country cannot take place independently and domination of foreign capital is evident in all aspects of our industry. Assembly type of industries form a major part of our industries and they are designed in such a way that makes foreign and local capitalists richer and richer. Is it really an honor to assemble engines and parts that are manufactured by British Hillman Co. and sell them for many times over the production cost to our consuming society as cars made in Iran? Is it not true that these tactics intensify exploitation of our labor force and bring stronger pressure upon the consuming public! Even these types of growth are not designed to raise the standard of living in our country, but, for instance, try hopelessly to solve the problem of unemployment. In addition to other internal problems of the dependent countries, the imperialists want, with propaganda campaign and talking of social progress and industrial growth, to reduce the contradictions between the exploited masses and themselves. At the same time, the imperialists employ cheap labor available in the third world countries and take advantage of the tariff exemption without reducing the prices of their manufactured products. They are, therefore, able to make extremely high profits which they partly share with the local capitalists. This is the way our industries are controlled and this is why it is not possible to achieve a real industrial growth in ours and other dependent countries. For instance, to keep these countries economically dependent, the imperialists know that the local regime constantly needs weapons for preventing any local insurrections. Even though the need for weapons are characteristic of these puppet regimes, they are not manufactured in their own country.

This causes the military budget in the third world countries to increase continuously. In our country the military budget has rapidly increased. In 1351 (1972), 42% of the total budget for our country was spent on military hardware which corresponds to 23% increase in recent years. The people of Iran pay for such a wasteful expenditure with their sweat and blood. It is a shame, while millions of people are hungry and are forced to travel hundreds of miles for a piece of bread or their children are sent to graze like animals; we have Phantom jets fly over their heads and missiles which are worth millions of toomans shine in hand, the people's thoughts and beliefs are limited and, on the other hand, many times that these weapons have been used by their imperialists and will be more and more dependent on them and will be much easier to manipulate our minds and push us toward our animalistic instincts. In the industrial field, about which unlimited propaganda is made, I want to discuss the administrative and educational revolutions of this regime. When the objective of a government is not to solve fundamental contradictions, it will not be able to solve any other problems of a society. In other words, this government is crippled and cannot, by its nature, solve any kind of contradiction. Administrative revolution is a good example of this disability. When all the high administrative posts are filled in by persons who are lacs for corruption, then no meaningful changes will be allowed to take place in this administrative mess. In such a situation, what then can one expect from the people who are in the lower administrative posts?

This contradiction will not and cannot be solved as long as this corrupt and rotten regime is in power. On another front, the regime claims that the objective of educational revolution is to have better education for everyone and increase the number of universities, elementary and high schools. The problem, however is that better education and more educational facilities will also increase social awareness among young people and how can the regime, then, prevent the growth of the revolution? The regime therefore makes education available to only those who can afford it and not to those poor and deprived masses. As a matter of fact, this is the real objective of this regime's educational revolution. Otherwise, the result of higher education for young people is to become revolutionaries and stand in trials like this one. Just look around you, all of us here have bachelor or master degrees. The regime realizes this fact and because of this, it has made a definite effort to make education available to people of the upper class. This is why, on the one hand, tuitions are continuously raised and the number of private colleges with very high tuition are rapidly increased. On the other hand, a number of public schools and universities have reduced and the quality of education has been lowered. Experienced high school teachers and professors are attracted to private institutions because of higher salaries (four to seven thousand tooman initial salary in a private school compared to one thousand in public schools.)

This of course has an adverse effect on the quality of education in the public institutions. In addition, armed guards are continuously kept in the universities. It is also clear that educational revolution is designed to initiate blindly the American culture and make the younger generation of this country more receptive to bourgeois values and culture. Foreigners influence and rule us in every facet of our lives. The consumer economy is the best example of western influence on our culture. Consumption of luxury and unnecessary items in the whole country are growing very rapidly and this is exactly the objective of the imperialists. On the one hand, the people's thoughts and beliefs are limited and, on the other hand, the people are psychologically pushed to buy luxury and unnecessary items. For the purchase of these items, people of course, have to get loans and become dependent on banks and loaning institutions. Yes, indeed, we are pushed towards such a rotten objective. In other words, the objective of the imperialists is to make us consumers of their products; for which we will have to pay very dearly. In this way, people will be more and more dependent on them and will be much easier to make the people accept their culture. The newspapers, movies, radio and television programs are geared for realization of this goal. They want us to lose our national characters and ignore our correct standards of decency. They want to brain wash us so that they will be able to manipulate our minds and push us toward our animalistic instincts. In Iran, they try to manipulate the minds of our youth and intellectuals so that they accept the western values and in the process lose their identity and character. False and unlimited propaganda are an inseparable part of this system and certainly without this propaganda the regime cannot survive. Our press, even in the domain of western ideology and limited colonialization, do not have any freedom of expression. Freedom of ideas and their expression are a basic part of human rights; and reflected in the United Nations Charter, are ignored in this country. The opposing views are simply suppressed by force and imprisonment. The killing and torture of revolutionaries have continuously increased simply because they stand for the rights of the masses and their better living conditions. Every day more revolutionaries are imprisoned. The torture methods have become more scientific. In trials which are more ceremonial than anything else, the revolutionaries are condemned to death or long term prison sentences. The regime does all these because it is afraid of opposition and the opposition's views. Yes, this is the way the regime deals with revolutionaries because its very life trembles with their existence. In a society which military and police rule; in a society where judicial and legislative branches of the government are only puppets, there is no other way to struggle but with arms and force. Our masses have experienced all the non-violent ways of struggles but when your voice for equality, justice and freedom is suppressed by guns and machine guns, the only way out is the armed struggle. Coup d'etat of 28th of Mordad [This coup d'état was engineered by the CIA which overthrew the Popular Democratic government of Dr. Mossadegh in 8/1953.] and the massacre of the 15th of Khordad [On 6/5/1963 following a 3-year period Or severe economic crises, the people in a spontaneous movement rose in anger to demand their democratic rights. The regime retaliated, murdering more than 6000 people. This event marked a turning point in our movement and revolutionary struggles became the main trend.] have shown us clearly that we have to rise up and undertake an armed struggle. The form of struggle in Iran like other exploited countries in the world has changed from non-violent to an armed struggle. At the beginning of this decade 1350-1360 (1971-1981) is the start of this period of struggle for the Iranian masses. We have taken up arms to show the path of armed struggle against this regime.

Mr. Prosecutor, between you who represent the regime and us, only bullets can rule and I do not want any part of you. Right now, if I had a submachine gun I would have killed you. Here, of course, I am talking in general terms and I mean all of those who cooperate with this regime and you are only one of them. We have started our struggle with the knowledge of revolutionary death. We are not afraid of death and when our death is for the masses, we will welcome it.
Iraq

24000. ------. “22000 Iraqi Children Die Because of UN Sanctions [surplus deaths in first two months of 1994 reported by Iraqi Ministry of Public Health due to lack of medicines and starvation; 140000 people per month are treated for malnutrition]”, in Granma International (Havana), April 13, 1994. p. 15. [TXT]

24005. ------. "A Trade Union Worker Deported and His Wife Compelled to Divorce", in Iraqi Review-Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab, April 13, 1960. p. 22. [TXT]

24006. ------. "Chicago Protesters Prepare to Defy US War of Sanctions", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), February 25, 1996. p. 10. [TXT]

24007. ------. "Countries Where Depo-Provera Is Marketed", in Multinational Monitor, February/March 1985. p. 10. [TXT]
Events of the Week: Baghdad Masses in Other Funerals

In the afternoon of 7/7/1959 the masses of Baghdad marched in the funeral of yet another victim of reaction; this time the martyr, Nassif. Nassif is a student and member of the Popular Resistance Forces from Tikrit. This is the third victim from Tikrit since the conspiring elements were released. The crime took place on the eve of 7/7/1959 when some hooligans attacked the headquarters of the Democratic Youth Federation. Earlier, the members of the local DUF were warned that the building would be burnt if the members did not close down their headquarters.

The body was borne by the angered citizens to the Headquarters of the General Students' Union in Baghdad from which the funeral procession started.

Behind the coffin was the emblem of the Iraqi General Students' Union and banners on which were written: "The Third Victim: The Student Nassif Latif" and "Every day we have a Martyr...While the criminals are free." People from Baghdad and Tikrit marched in their organizations: Student Unions of of various Colleges and Secondary Schools, the League for the Defense of Women's Rights, Trade Unions and other organizations in addition to thousands of ordinary people. Throughout their march, to the Ministry of Defense and back, the masses raised their voices in unity demanding punishment of the criminals, the carrying out of the death sentences passed by the People's Court, purging the State and military organs and consolidating the democratic line of our Republic by strengthening the National United Front.

24008. Events of the Week: Preparations for Youth Festival

The Iraqi youth, who are looking forward to meeting their friends from all over the world at the 7th International Festival of Youth and Students, due to be held in Vienna at the end of 7/1959, started preparing several months ago. A General Committee, including such organizations as the Iraqi Democratic Youth Federation, the General Union of Students, General Federation of Trade Unions, General Union of Peasants' Associations and the Women's League, was formed in order to organize these preparations. Sport, music and folk-dancing groups of the various nationalities of the Iraqi Republic are now busily training for the Festival. Thanks to the 7/14/1958 Revolution, the Iraqi youth delegation can now participate with complete freedom in this festival of peace and friendship.

24009. Preparations for Youth Festival

An Iraqi youth delegation can now participate with complete freedom in this festival of peace and friendship.

24010. Fundraising: Looking for Cash Cows: Here and in the Gulf

You have probably seen the commercials on TV or the full-page ads in newspapers boldly proclaiming: "Support President Bush and the brave men and women of Operation Desert Shield working to free Kuwait." The ads have appeared in most major American newspapers and on all the national TV networks. It has been a costly advertising campaign. The group sponsoring this media blitz, the Coalition for America at Risk (CAR), describes itself as "an ad hoc organization which supports a strong response to Saddam Hussein's aggression in the Persian Gulf." It claims to have raised nearly $1 million dollars to continue its mission, and to have received 2600 calls a day on its two toll-free numbers from people who want to receive its Emergency Action Kits. CAR operates out of the offices of Keene Shirley Associates, a lobbying and public relations firm in Alexandria, Virginia. What the people don't know take the group at face value and respond to its advertising is that its moving force, one William Kennedy, is a bankrupt precious metals dealer and failed magazine publisher who also happens to be on the payroll of the exiled Kuwaiti government. In fact, according to the Wall Street Journal, he is a registered agent of the Kuwaiti government.

The co-chairmen of the committee are all longtime associates of Kennedy involved in his various past failed enterprises. They are: Scott Stanley, Jr., former managing editor of American Opinion magazine, a John Birch Society publication, who went on to edit Conservative Digest when it was purchased from mailing list whiz Richard Viguerie by Kennedy; Sam H. Zakhem, the US ambassador to Bahrain from 1986-1989; and Lewis Tambs, the US ambassador to Costa Rica and Colombia during the Reagan administration. The stated purpose of the group, according to Zakhem, the most prominent spokesman, is to generate "grass roots support for President Bush. With this new ad campaign, we are expecting thousands more Americans to join our Coalition. Only by showing a broad consensus for our present policy in the Gulf, can we thwart the isolationist sentiment of a few individuals who have captured the media's attentions, and liberate both Americans held hostage and Kuwait." Zakhem is obviously referring to the growing movement among the so-called paleo-conservatives—old-line, traditional America firsters who oppose interventionism—best characterized by columnist Pat Buchanan's high-profile statements against the war. Vice President Dan Quayle refers to the anti-war movement as the Buchanan-McCarthy axis, since both the conservative columnist and the liberal former Sen. Eugene McCarthy find themselves on the same side of this issue. All three of these co-chairmen worked with Kennedy by serving as speakers at his so-called Monetary War Colleges. These were sponsored by Kennedy's Western Monetary Consultants (WMC), his bankrupt precious metals investment firm. At these events, high-rollers were invited to attend "seminars" on geopolitical strategy, given by a host of conservative luminaries and past and present lower-ranking Reagan administration officials, supposedly to help sophisticated investors make wise financial decisions. Circulating among the guests, however, were high pressure salesmen getting down to the real business at hand, the sale of silver through WMC. Conservative Digest (CD) and WMC were inextricably linked. Potential attendees for the "war colleges" were solicited from the subscriber list, and the seminars were heavily promoted in the pages of CD. WMC filed for bankruptcy in 1988, at which time Kennedy was pouring $20000 a month into the operating deficit of the magazine. According to a lawsuit filed against CD, Kennedy and other officials of the company by Richard and Vaudois Douglas of Sacramento (investors who were left high and dry after WMC's bankruptcy), Kennedy, his employees, relatives, friends and attorneys.

Also, Conservative Digest, Inc. was used as a front for Kennedy's Western Monetary enterprises, as 'journalists' for Conservative Digest served as 'boiler room' sales people." The Douglass lost $158000 dollars to Kennedy. CAR is yet another moribund conservative organization revitalized by Kennedy. It had been founded in 1985 to drum up public support for the Nicaraguan contra's, but ceased to operate in the wake of the Iran-contra scandal. Kennedy had many ties to conservatives close to then President Reagan, and some sources have indicated that Zakhem's appointment as ambassador to Bahrain was due at least in part to his association with Kennedy.

And this is where the Middle East connection began. As WMC was struggling to keep afloat in 1988, Kennedy traveled to Bahrain in March of 1988 and met with Zakhem, who proceeded to introduce him to wealthy individuals in that country who might be interested in investing in WMC, sponsoring war colleges or even in buying CD. Is CAR just an effort by Kennedy and associates to ingratiate themselves with the cash-rich Iraqis?
cow Kuwaitis? The ads he has placed certainly cite no pressing American interests at stake in the region, but rely heavily on emotional appeals that seem geared more to arousing Kuwaitis, rather than American, indignation. "To remove Saddam Hussein from Kuwait, the Desert Shield needs a sword," reads one headline. The copy reads: "The Kuwaiti morgues are filled with the bodies of murdered Kuwaitis in heaps, as at Auschwitz. Countless Kuwaiti women have been raped and brutalized by grinning Iraqi troops in uniform. Saddam Hussein has friends right here in America that want to help him bring America to her knees. This is not merely a 'crisis in the Gulf' but a HOLOCAUST. Why, then, are we not hearing the whole truth? Why are so many dancing around the issue?" Kennedy refuses to reveal the sources of his funding. He told the Wall Street Journal, "You don't tell the enemy what your resources are." "What the CAR ads don't say is that Kennedy is a registered Kuwaiti agent trying to profit by managing Kuwaiti flight capital," says the Wall Street Journal. [=]

24011. --------- "Government Building Bombed in Baghdad, Killing One Man", in Seattle Times, October 19, 1994, p. A16. A bomb exploded at a mosque at the Ministry of Religious Affairs, killing one man and seriously wounding five people (including three women). There was no claim of responsibility, by the Iraqi police blamed 'agents hired by the enemies of Iraq, which could be a reference to Kurdish or Shiite rebels. The last such attack was a car bombing of the state-run Al-Joumhuriya newspaper offices: there have been a string of bombings over the last two years. Separately, the military forces Iran cross the Iraqi border at Ashraf to attack the main base of the Mujahideen-i-Khalq. [TXT]

24012. --------- "Gulf War Syndrome Research Boosted", in Science News, October 15, 1994, p. 252. Some $8.4 million has been allocated in defense appropriations for Gulf War Syndrome research ($5 million), and for the 'antibacterial treatment method' of Edward Hyman at Touro Infirmary in New Orleans. The legislation would also require the VA to examine the health impact on spouses and children, which has not been done to date. In 7/1994, the VA allocated $1.5 million to study possible health effects of environmental contaminants during the war. [TXT]

24013. --------- "Gulf War Syndrome Research Boosted", in Science News, October 15, 1994, p. 252. Some $8.4 million has been allocated in defense appropriations for Gulf War Syndrome research ($5 million), and for the 'antibacterial treatment method' of Edward Hyman at Touro Infirmary in New Orleans. The legislation would also require the VA to examine the health impact on spouses and children, which has not been done to date. In 7/1994, the VA allocated $1.5 million to study possible health effects of environmental contaminants during the war. [TXT]

24014. --------- "Gulf War Syndrome: The Cold Cover-Up: Tampering with Medical Records", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 1, 1996, pp. 9, 14. As the RW reported last year (number 820, 8/27/1995), the military has tried to destroy or alter soldiers' medical records as part of the GWS coverup. A Marine Corps order dated 8/1991 indicates that tampering with health records was a matter of policy. Several sources have suggested that the documentation of exposure to smoke within the geographical boundaries of Kuwait should be placed in members' health records," the order said. "Placing such information could wrongly imply possible health problems in the future, while all the information to date suggests no health hazard exists. Unless there are current health complaints, there is no reason to make health record entries." The Army Times (4/25/1994), which covers news of the US armed forces, reported accusations by Navy personnel that the Navy removed files from the medical records of afflicted sailors in 11/1991. The sailors say these records prove they were exposed to biological or chemical agents in the Gulf. Navy Reserve captain Julia Dyckman, a 27-year veteran of the military, was a supervisor in a 500-bed field hospital in Saudi Arabia during the war. She believes that she was exposed to chemical or biological warfare agents. The 46-year-old nurse has tried unsuccessfully to get her own records from the Navy so she can get treatment for over a half dozen disabling medical conditions. She says the problem is not just with her records. "We kept statistical records and data that we sent to the Navy Research Center in San Diego, but they said they never received them. We sent medical encounter sheets to the 10000 we saw over the period we were in Saudi Arabia, and they claim it never arrived. Convenient, isn't it?" Dyckman said that the field hospital treated many people, but none for chemical illnesses. "If somebody came in with like what I had - open sores, which I think was from a blister agent - we were told that there were no chemicals, so we didn't treat them for that." Dyckman was told that the blisters and open sores were from "desert sand." After the war, Dyckman served on a committee to interview soldiers returning from the Gulf. "When I started interviewing people, they were complaining of the same illnesses that were plaguing me, so I started documenting the complaints. When I started reporting, the Navy got even with me and took my pay away and stuff. I got a lot of harassment." [=]

24015. --------- "Iraq Claims Sanctions Killed 400000 [one-third of dead were under five, Health Ministry reports; in addition 42000 under five are malnourished, 2 million had illness related to malnourishment]", in Arizona Daily Star, January 9, 1994, p. A17. [TXT]

24016. --------- "Iraqi Trade Unions Federation Founding Congress: Congress Ended Its Sessions on the 11th Instant", in Iraqi Review-Weekly English Supplement to ithdad Al-Shaab, July 23, 1959, p. 12. The number of unions represented in the Congress was 51, which is the total number of trade unions existing in Iraq embracing 275000 members. These unions were represented by 258 delegates, among them five women. In addition there were 64 observers, representing all Executive Bureaus of the Federation. After reading and discussing the political and economic reports and other affairs of the Federation, the Congress took a number of resolutions, among which were:

1. A resolution to join the National United Front.
2. A resolution about joining the World Federation of Trade Unions. The resolution explained the honorable rule played by the WFTU in defending the cause of the colonial and suppressed peoples, its support to the World Peace Movement, its fine stand on the questions of Arab Liberation and its great efforts to unite the struggle of the toilers of the world.
3. A resolution about People’s China: The resolution expressed condemnation of the stand of the reactionary states in the UN, and of the occupation of the Chinese seat by Chiang Chai-shek. The resolution demanded the restoration, to the Chinese people and their popular government, of their lawful place in the UN.

A resolution about strikes: "Our assessment of the political situation leads us to consider negotiations between the workers (through their unions) and the owners of factories, as the best means of settling disputes without compromising the basic demands of the workers." The resolution requested the owners to respond to the spirit of the revolution and dispense the workers of the need to resort to strikes.

5. A condemnation of the arrest of Iraqi workers in the UAR. The congress asked the Foreign Ministry to take the measures necessary for their release. The Congress also sent greetings to the Leader Abdul Karim Qassim on the occasion of the First Anniversary of the great 7/14/1958 Revolution and greetings to the Cuban workers struggling for the consolidation of the independence of their country. The congress sent an appeal to the conference of Foreign Ministers in Geneva to concentrate their effort for the peaceful solution of international problems. The Congress expressed appreciation of the honest economic aid offered to us without strings by the countries of the friendly Socialist Camp. Finally the Congress condemned the criminal attack on the Lawyer of the Federation, Said al-Khafaji and demanded the punishment of those responsible for the killing of our martyrs. [=]

24017. --------- "Is Japan's Responsibility of War Over? (11): Chapter 4: 4-2. Who Will Try Them? - The Issue of Establishing Tribal, Part 1", in The People’s Korea, June 5, 1993, p. 5. (Continued from the previous issue) Many suggestions have been put forth in regard to establishing an international criminal tribunal to make it possible to try war crimes and crimes against humanity on the basis of international community [Kuhn, “International Criminal Jurisdiction,” American Journal of International Law Vol. 41, 1947, and Vespasian V. Pella, “Towards an International Criminal Court,” American Journal of International Law Vol. 44, 1950.]. The UN General Assembly on 12/9/48, adopted a resolution stating that “in the course of development of the international judicial organ for the trial of certain crimes under international law,” and therefore “inviting the International Law Commission to study the desirability of establishing such a judicial organ, in particular as a Criminal Chamber of the International Court of Justice” [See the Report of the sixth Committee of the General Assembly prepared by the Rapporteur Mr. J. Spiriopoulos in UN Doc. A/760, 12/5/48.]. However, attempts to establish the international criminal court have not been fruitful. [–]

24018. -------. “Is Japan’s Responsibility of War Over? (11): Chapter 4: 4-2. Who Will Try Them? - The Issue of Establishing Tribunal, Part 2”, in The People’s Korea, June 5, 1993. p. 5. Despite the absence of such a court with general jurisdiction, there is still a possibility to establish a court with limited jurisdiction. Mr. Van Boven, the special rapporteur for the Commission on Human Rights has already submitted a report arguing that “the establishment of courts of human rights, or criminal courts, regionally or internationally, could help in the process of making those responsible for gross violations of human rights accountable for their acts, as could legislation authorizing universal jurisdiction over such violations” [UN Doc. E/C.4/Sub.2/1992/6, 7/25/92, P. 24.]. Even though he did not mention such specific subjects as the jurisdiction, composition of the judicial body, procedure, and enforcement of the decision, we can imagine several kinds of tribunals. It is unimaginable for the United Nations to succeed in setting up an international tribunal with which all nations concerned are forced to comply. Japan is also not likely to succumb to the tribunal, because there has not existed any similar international tribunal since the Nuremberg Tribunal and IMTFE. On the other hand, it is highly suggestive to see the example of the United Compensation Commission (UNCC), even though it had not criminal jurisdiction, which was founded under the supervision of UN for the purpose of compensation to victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental rights resulting from the unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq [The UNCC was established pursuant to paragraph 18 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) in order to administer funds to pay compensation for the victims in Kuwait. The claim was mainly allowed to be submitted on the governmental basis, but compensation was aimed to be calculated on the individual basis. (See UN Doc. S/RES/682/1991, S/AC.26/1991/1, S/AC.26/1991/3, S/AC.26/1991/17/Rev.1 and S/RES/687/1991)]. With the agreement of Japan, the problem will be settled easily. (cont. [–]

24020. -------. “Is Japan’s Responsibility of War Over? (11): Chapter 4: 4-2. Who Will Try Them? - The Issue of Establishing Tribunal, Part 4”, in The People’s Korea, June 5, 1993. p. 5. Furthermore, the principle of universal jurisdiction which grants a state the right to punish a crime regardless of the place of the crime or the nationality of the criminal, has undergone considerable development [This principle of universal jurisdiction was also applied to the Ichmann case. The defense council denied the jurisdiction of Israel over Ichmann, criticizing the law 5710 on the ground that it was contradictory to international law because it allows for the trial of acts which were perpetrated even before the creation of Israel, outside of its present borders and the victims of which were persons who were not citizens of Israel. However, Israel court dismisses the opinion saying that the right of Israel to punish the genocide of the Jews proceeds directly from the universal nature of this crime and since an international tribunal does not exist for the moment, international law invests the legislative and judicial organs of each state with the power to punish them. (Pep Dapatdos, The Eichmann Trial, Stevens & Sons, London, 1964, p. 42, p. 44.) Universal principle as established by the municipal law of several states for certain crimes has recently been recognized for a whole category of war crimes [Ibid, p. 45]. It has also been introduced into international treaty law by the Conventions of Geneva of 8/12/49, which impose on the authors of the crimes. After World War II, the field of application of universal jurisdiction was further enlarged to include crimes against humanity and the great majority of scholars on legal theory agreed to submit crimes against humanity in general to universal jurisdiction [Ibid, p. 46]. The court established under the principle has been explained that “these courts, although national in form, are essentially international in character by reason of the functions they perform. They are in fact, called upon to impose punishment for international offenses on behalf not only of their own states but also of all other states, on behalf of the international community as a whole. They thus act as judicial organs of the international legal order, which is institutionally deficient” [UN Doc. E/C.4/906, p. 116. It has similar logical background which is shared in Eichmann case]. Therefore, there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of Korea over the war crimes or crimes against humanity committed by the Japanese army. [–]

24021. -------. “Is Japan’s Responsibility of War Over? (11): Chapter 4: 4-3. How Can the Criminals Be Brought to Court? - The Problems of Deportation and Extradition: (1) Inevitability of Extradition of War Criminals and Criminals against Humanity”, in The People’s Korea, June 5, 1993. p. 5. If the Japanese government has concerns about prosecuting the war criminals and criminals against humanity within its territory and under its jurisdiction, the procedure for punishment is simple. What other countries can do is only to cooperate with the Japanese government in the trial, including investigation and obtaining witnesses. However, judging from the attitude and mentality exhibited by Japanese government, it is unimaginable that it will consider the issue of prosecution sincerely. The next possibility is that the Japanese war criminals appear voluntarily in front of the authorities. In the past, there was the striking scene where a few conscientious war criminals appeared before the public and confessed the crimes they committed during World War II or during the occupation of Korea [Mr. Yoshida Seiji was a former chief of Yamaguchi district responsible for draft and hunting for “comfort women” and forced laborers to come to Korea to give witness on 1/16/92. He confessed shockingly that he himself had hunted no less than 1000 Korean women to send to the military camp as “comfort women.” He had already published his Confessions titled “My Confessions on War Crimes” in 1983 and was determined to act as witness wherever he was wanted. (The Han-Kuk libo, 1/17/92)]. When we are reminded of the fact that they can be punished through the criminal procedure, it is unimaginable for the criminals to cast voluntarily their destiny on the altar of foreign judiciary. The last remaining way of bringing the war criminals to the country concerned is to extradite them by Japan or other countries in which Japanese war criminals retain their nationality or residence. Without efficient means of obtaining the criminals, any discussion about punishment will become useless and futile. Fortunately, the principle of extradition of those who committed war crimes and crimes against humanity has been established as an international customary law. Extradition and deportation constitute a legal process by which a country removes individuals involuntarily. Extradition means to request a country to surrender an individual whom the requesting state wants to prosecute. A formal mutual extradition treaty is needed to extradite. On the other hand, deportation is a unilateral measure by which a country expels an alien. Almost all of war crimes cases have been regarded as deportation, because war criminals removed without mutual extradition treaty between the countries concerned [Gregory J. Getschman, “The Uncertain Role of Innocence in United States Efforts to Deport Nazi War Criminals,” Cornell International Law Journal Vol. 21, 1988, p. 289]. [=]

24023. ------. “Mideast Destabilization Seen From Breakup of Iraq Embargo, Part 2”, in The Spotlight, February 21, 1994, pp. 18-19. Kuwaitis feel the whole affair was mishandled and overly costly both in terms of money and social upheaval and are demanding an accounting. Add to this the faux pas by the Kuwaiti government in jailing a British citizen of Kuwaiti extraction, Suleiman al-Adasani, who was said to have been involved in the anti-Iraqi resistance, only to be picked up off the street when Operation Desert Storm returned the Sabahs to power and -- allegedly -- tortured. The Kuwaiti government charges al-Adasani with producing and distributing pornographic films featuring members of the royal family. The films are said to depict known members of the ruling house engaged in both heterosexual and homosexual orgies. Whether the charge is true or not, the local populace tends to believe the stories about the orgies and feels their rulers have offended Allah. Now Kuwait faces an angry populace and an equally angry international community. Only gobs of cash can keep things under control. And if oil prices drop, there goes the ball game. The situation is much the same -- if less violent on the surface -- in Saudi Arabia, where the royal family considers all assets of the country to be their personal property. For years the ruling family has been taking cash out of the country and investing it -- or spending it. But the result is that the Saudis need the cash flow from oil profits to keep the country going. Add to this the unrest among the foreign workers, who owe no allegiance to the royal house, and you have a government that’s ready to topple. Perhaps with this in mind, Saudi Arabia’s King Fahd ibn Abdul Aziz, in late December 1993 (12/93), inaugurated the kingdom’s first Majlis-e-Shura (consultative council). The council has 60 members appointed by the king from the general public not belonging to the ruling al-Saud family. They took their oaths of office on 12/28/93. Prominent Moslems welcomed “this historic step”.

384 Women in the Middle East and North Africa Iraq www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
King Fahd said: "Saudi Arabia was founded on the principle of consultation and is determined to continue along the Islamic path." It should be noted that the kingdom has no general elections. And, it is no secret that the banks -- bulging with oil money -- are smacking their lips in anticipation of the downfall of any or all of the governments of the oil-producing states. That will give the banks the chance to freeze the funds of the ousted rulers and keep them forever. [–]

24024. ------. "New US War Threats Against Iraq", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), October 16, 1994. p. 2. As we go to press - 10/8/94, the Pentagon has announced large movements of troops, combat planes and warships to threaten the country of Iraq. The US imperialists already have warships and thousands of troops permanently stationed within striking distance of the Gulf oil fields. Now more warships carrying jets and cruise missiles. 4000 US Army troops and two anti-missile batteries are being rushed to the Persian Gulf. Floating warehouses full of tanks and other invasion weapons are moving from the Indian Ocean into the Gulf itself. The decision for even more troop deployment is waiting for the heads of the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Perry and Gen. Shalikashvili, to return from US-occupied Haiti. US threats in the Persian Gulf have nothing to do with preventing aggression. The US troops are ship movements are new acts of aggression by US imperialism in a region it considers strategically vital. With these war threats, the US ruling class shows again that it demands the right to control other countries throughout the world, especially in the oil-rich Persian Gulf. In 1991 the US government did not hesitate to kill more than a hundred thousand Iraqi people to enforce this domination. The excuse for this new round of US threats is full of hypocrisy: The US government accuses the Iraqi military of massing troops in a threatening way near Kuwait's northern border. However, it is the US (not Iraq) that has just invaded and occupied a neighboring country, Haiti! The US militarily threatens and isolates other countries constantly. In just the last few months the US has bullied North Korea, Cuba, Haiti, and now Iraq again. Iraq's people are suffering terribly from an embargo imposed on them by the US and the United Nations - an embargo energetically reinforced by Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Iraq has been prevented from selling oil internationally, and from buying many necessary goods on the world market - including machinery and supplies to restore sanitation, electricity, bridges, highways and other key structures destroyed by the US military almost four years ago during the 1990 Gulf war. Many reports document the suffering caused by this embargo, including heightened death rates among Iraqi children. In recent weeks, Iraq was forced to even further cut the food rations of the people. The US government and military have no right to bully other countries. It has no right to dictate and dominate in the Persian Gulf. US hands off Iraq! US troops out of the Persian Gulf! [–]

24027. ------. "Save the Life of Faraj Allah Al-Hilu", in Iraqi Review-Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab, July 23, 1959. p. 11. More than three weeks have passed since Faraj Allah Al-Hilu, the leading Lebanese patriot was arrested in Damascus, by Nasser's gestapo; ever since his arrest he had been subjected to the most horrible torture in the Maze Prison. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From there he has been transferred to an unknown place. From then on it is known. These telegrams and petitions came from all kinds of honest people: men and women, young and old, peasants, workers, professionals, students, etc,... belonging to various organizations, classes, sects and beliefs. Messages of protest from 20000 Lebanese have been sent; there was a telegram from 61 children in Lebanon, friends of the hero's daughters, requesting the return of Faraj to his country and home. Another letter of protest came from the Arab Students in Prague; also one from the Peasants; Associations in Mosul.

A letter from Syria to the Lebanese "Nida," paper, said that the Syrian people, who have known Faraj as a great fighter against French imperialism and for Lebanese and Syrian independence, demand, an immediate end to the torture of Faraj, his release and publication of the truth about his fate. The letter ended with the following words: "Our People raise their voices, together with all the freedom loving peoples of the world to demand the release of Faraj Allah al-Hilu."

World progressive public opinion strongly denounced the kidnapping of Faraj; among the petitions and messages of protest coming from various parts of the world, there were letters from the Communist Parties of Italy, Morocco and Tunis; these demanded the authorities in Cairo and Damascus to save Faraj's life.

The Lebanese National Congress also demanded the UAR authorities in the name of freedom of thought and human rights to clarify the mystery that seems to surround the destiny of Faraj.

The latest development in the "Save Faraj" campaign is the Lebanese Government decision to send an official delegation to Damascus in order to investigate the matter. Prime Minister Rashid Karami, stated that the government is deeply concerned about the safe return of this great patriot to his homeland. [–]

24028. ------. "Setting the Record Straight", in Multinational Monitor, February/March 1985. p. 13. In many countries, government officials and doctors rely almost exclusively on pharmaceutical companies or their representatives to provide information on drug's efficacy. In Upjohn's cover memo, reference is made to Stephen Minkin, former nutrition director with the United Nations in Baghdad, who has written several articles exposing problems with Depo-Provera and deficiencies in safety testing of the drug. Note our rebuttal to Upjohn's "Key Response Statements." [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. 1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.]

24029. ------. "Setting the Record Straight: Cover Memo", in Multinational Monitor, February/March 1985. p. 13. 5/25/83 TO: Group and Division Vice Presidents, Subsidiary and Branch General Managers, Medical Directors, Regional Marketing Managers, Health Regulatory Affairs Managers, MSL Managers, and Worldwide Public Relations Agencies

Subject: Depo Provera
Dear Colleagues, Attached are important new materials to assist you in responding to negative publicity about Depo-Provera. As you know, false and inaccurate stories about Depo-Provera have been repeated in the media until they are accepted as truth. While there is no completely effective method to stop such reports, we believe one of the best ways to counter false and adverse publicity is to quickly and factually respond to all major negative news stories that appear in your country. To assist you I have attached: A completely revised Depo-Provera Information Kit, intended to replace your present kit which contains outdated materials; A form letter to media editors responding to attacks against Depo-Provera which can be translated and adapted to specific charges by using: Key response statements rebutting specific, but common charges leveled at Depo-Provera, which can be inserted into the form letter above: A review of Depo-Provera response procedures. Depo-Provera Information Kit. This new kit reflects the shift in focus of the major issues surrounding Depo-Provera following the recent US and U.K. hearings regarding its registration for long-term contraceptive use. Both hearings centered on scientific evidence rather than on unsubstantiated allegations by activists such as Stephen Minkin. We regard this as a positive development: consumerist attacks often forced us into a defensive stance; the scientific focus allows us to use a wide range of supportive materials. This new Information Kit reflects this shift: the Minkin material has been removed and a number of recent third party scientific reports and endorsements have been added. Since issuing the original D-P Information Kit, we have also sent out a number of supplemental materials. I suggest you review these materials, keeping only the most up-to-date items having specific relevance to local Depo-Provera issues in your country. Form Response Letter: A number of our subsidiaries have asked for a basic form letter to use to responding to negative stories. This sample letter, prepared by B. K. Berger, can be translated and adapted to a variety of situations by incorporating selected key response statements discussed below. Key Response Statements: These 12 statements provide replies to some of the most frequent charges against Depo-Provera. They can be inserted into the Form Response Letter as necessary. Review of Response Procedures: To assist you in responding quickly to media attacks on Depo-Provera, I have attached a step-by-step guide. These procedures merely formalize what is established practice with our subsidiaries affected by negative Depo-Provera publicity. In the coming months, we can expect increased media activity as the results from the US and U.K. hearings are announced. We will keep you informed as events progress, and will supply supportive materials whenever possible. Please contact us if you have any questions. Sincerely, Leigh M. Bailey, Public Relations Associate, International Human Health LMB/ems Attachments cc: JAllen, RAssenzo, MGBeck, BKBerger, PCCarra, ELClark, GWDuncan, JGoossens, RBHeaps, JHTheywood, KKnort, OAKreuzer, CTMan, TMansager, WACO'Connell, TGSchlaik, PCSchwallie, ESShepherd, JCSucki, WESykes, SSVescovi, DWDitcher. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. [1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted with permission.] [==]

24030. -------. "Setting the Record Straight: Form Letter for Response”, in Multinational Monitor, February/March 1985, p. 14. Dear Editor: On (date) you published/aired a story entitled, (title). This story concerned our product, Depo-Provera; unfortunately, it contained a number of false and inaccurate statements and I want to correct these inaccuracies for you and your readers/viewers. I think you will agree that health care products are of vital concern to consumers. We believe that the accurate reporting to consumers of information about health care products is just as important. First, Depo-Provera is an injectable product containing the drug medroxyprogesterone acetate. The product is injected intramuscularly and its contraceptive effect comes from suppression of pituitary hormones that cause release of a mature egg. The drug is also approved for use in many countries for treatment of endometrial, breast and kidney cancer. Now, include ideas from key paragraphs to respond to specific inaccuracies. This may be one or several paragraphs in length. Finally, worldwide experience with Depo-Provera shows that it is a highly effective contraceptive option for women, and it is probably the safest hormonal contraceptive available. We believe that those who know the information about the drug do a serious disservice not only to reputed worldwide scientists and doctors who support Depo-Provera, but also to patients themselves. Again, I hope that you will share this information with your readers/viewers. I’ve also attached a copy of the “Information Kit on Depo-Provera,” which contains additional evidence about the drug. Please feel free to contact me if you wish to discuss further this product. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. [1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.] [==] no significant differences were observed in comparison with IUD or oral contraceptive users. 10. Depo-Provera is "used" on women without their knowledge or consent . . . : The Upjohn Company has always supported the concept of fully informed and free choice of contraceptive methods in all countries. Adequate patient information is a necessary part of any contraceptive or family planning program, and Upjohn has through the years provided a number of written and visual materials for this purpose. Also, in 1983, Upjohn prepared a comprehensive 17-page patient booklet that fully informs potential users of all known side effects and contraindications. Finally, millions of women-years' experience with Depo-Provera prove that it is not a dangerous contraceptive given to unsuspecting women. 11. Upjohn makes large sales and profits from Depo-Provera and will make even more when the drug is approved in the US and the U.K. . . .: This is simply not true. Sales of Depo-Provera for contraception account for less than 1% of total corporate sales in any given year. Further, US approval is not going to open up numerous new markets since the drug is already approved in more than 80 countries. Finally, the patent on Depo-Provera in the US expires in 1986. Thus, the company will not obtain substantial commercial value from approval in the US before the patent expires. 12. Then why is Upjohn pursuing registration?: We have continued to support Depo-Provera for long-term contraceptive use on principle because we believe it is a safe and efficacious product. We feel that it supplies an important need worldwide and, in particular, to the 2 million women who presently rely on Depo-Provera. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. 1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.] [x]

24032. --------. "Setting the Record Straight: Rebuttals to Key Response Statements", in Multinational Monitor, February/March 1985. p. 14-15. 1. and 4. In many countries, drug "registration" simply involves registering the drug with customs. Even "approval" by a foreign health minister is often based only on information supplied by the drug company itself. The Swedish government, recognizing Depo-Provera's dangers unless it is administered with close monitoring, prohibits its international development agency from promoting the drug abroad. 2. The FDA Board of Inquiry recommended in 10/84 that approval of contraceptive use of Depo-Provera continue to be denied. In 1978 the FDA itself gave four reasons for its denial of approval: three of them were scientific, and a fourth was that no significant patient population needing the drug had been demonstrated. 3. The FDA Board of Inquiry found that there is no proof that Depo-Provera does not cause cancer. Cancer did result in required tests of the drug conducted on beagle dogs and monkeys; Depo-Provera was only the contraceptive that caused cancer in both of these animal tests. 4. There have been no studies conducted of the drug's children through puberty, when reproductive abnormalities would most likely become evident. One study of infants exposed to Depo-Provera through breast milk showed that Depo-exposed infants were more vulnerable to common infections than other children. A number of studies showing no difference in Depo-exposed and other children were reviewed by the FDA Board of Inquiry and found to be inadequate. 6. The FDA Board of Inquiry criticized the scientific studies of Depo-Provera as being "haphazard" and "uncoordinated." 7. Judith Weisz, chair of the FDA Board of Inquiry, has said of the OB-GYN advisory committee's recommendation of approval of Depo-Provera, "Theirs was a free-wheeling discussion, not serious analysis. It's a shame that it wasn't, since they now get cited as the authorities." One of the advisory committee's own members commented that the more you know about physiology, the less you want to take this drug. 8. As the FDA Board of Inquiry stated, "The lack of adequate long-term follow-up of subjects cannot be obscured or overcome by pooling of data from women who have used the drug for different periods of time and presenting these data in forms of 'women years' or months of use. . . . While it takes nine months to produce a baby, nine women, each one contributing one month, cannot produce a baby." 9. This is an especially important area where there hasn't been adequate study with long-term follow-up. 10. It's been a major concern of women's groups and experts like the Medical Committee in England that the targeted population for this drug, often uneducated or underprivileged women, have the least ability to give informed consent. Griff Ross, the member of the FDA Board of Inquiry recommended to the panel by Upjohn, recommended that the drug be approved for use in the US by drug abusers and the mentally retarded, two of the very groups unlikely to be able to give such consent. One of the major criticisms in the 1978 FDA audit of the Grady study in Atlanta was that many of the women seemed to be aware of the drug's experimental status. 11. and 12. Governments around the world are concerned when a drug is not approved for use in its country of origin. Even though Depo-Provera is currently registered or approved in 80 countries, those decisions are not irreversible. Continued FDA denial of approval will fuel opposition to the drug, and undermine Upjohn's reputation around the world. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. 1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.] [x]

24033. --------. "Soviet Exhibition Opens in Baghdad", in Iraqi Review-Western English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab, April 30, 1960. pp. 5-6. Sunday, 4/10/1960, was impatiently awaited by thousands of men and women. Young and old poured into the street (the widest in Baghdad) where the Soviet Industrial Exhibition was to be opened at 5:00 p.m. Hours ahead at the scheduled opening massive groups were gathering along the street, at first standing orderly on the pavements, but soon getting too much for the space and gradually, yet still orderly, spilling into the whole street. The cars bringing the guests to the opening of the exhibitions had to force their way through the human ocean!

The thousands of peace-loving men and women that filled the streetand the surrounding area, were in fact themselves the host of Baghdad's great guest, Comrade Mikoyan. Echoing through Baghdad West was the enthusiastically repeated slogan of "Mikoyan Welcome! Iraqi People Greet You." For hours on end the people voiced their feelings towards the Soviet Union, friend of the peoples, and their warm support for Iraq-Soviet Friendship.

At five o'clock sharp, Comrade Anastas Mikoyan, the First Deputy of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, opened the exhibition by delivering a speech to the invited guests of more than 2000. Mikoyan's speech was many times interrupted by warm applause from thousands of pairs of hands and greatly touched the hearts of the audience.

The mention that by the end of the Seven Year Plan all workers and employees would enjoy the six or seven hours work day, was met with loud applause. More so was the cause with the mention of Mikoyan that there is not a single political prisoner in the Soviet Union.

The peaceful intentions of the Soviet Union and the prospects of development of communist construction in the USSR, besides its sincere will to strengthen and consolidate friendship and cooperation with peoples the world over, including the Iraqi people - all this was received with prolonged and stormy applause.

On inviting the guests to see the exhibition, the Premier Abdul Karim Qassim spoke, stressing Soviet-Iraqi friendship. In parts of the Premier's speech, he quoted from the speech of Mikoyan his mention that the Soviet Union was proud of their being able to expel the invaders. Premier Qassim admired the courage of the Soviet people and added that the Iraqi people have likewise destroyed the imperialist base into which their country had ben, and particularly they destroyed British imperialism in Iraq.

Throughout the speeches, which lasted for some hour and a half, the masses outside the exhibition kept raising slogans of Soviet Iraqi friendship and of the friendly nature of the Soviet Union.

This was among the masses in the street. High up above were the two flags of the Iraqi Republic and of the USSR. As if taking their cue from the enthusiastic crowds below, they were proudly waving in harmony with the feelings of peace and friendship voiced by the two leaders, Premier Qassim and Comrade Mikoyan, and by the many thousands of guests and bystanders alike.

The exhibition entrance was lit by a huge sign bearing the slogan: "The Peaceful Economic Program of the Soviet Union Opens from 1959-1965 for the Further Development of Soviet Foreign Trade."

A statue of the founder of the world's first workers and peasants state Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, welcomes you as enter the exhibition of Soviet products...a showroom of 1000 square meters, with many pavilions showing examples of the successes scored in the Soviet Union in all spheres of life.

Full-scale model of the three sputniks, exhibition. When the tour of the exhibition began, all machines started to work, a sign of greeting to the guests.

Premier Qassim showed interest in a large Saloon car, and even mounted a "heli-copter" amidst the cameras of pressmen and T.V. to mark this happy and friendly occasion.

In the agricultural section, the Premier enquired about the Soviet seeds and their suitability for Iraqi soil. Comrade Mikoyan's reply was: "Try them, they might be useful.

In the "Atom for Peace" section, there was a cannon, of which the manager of the section said: "This cannon is not for killing, it is for curing people.

The Automatic "hands" raised laughter and admiration amongst the guests, for their skill in handling materials.

Comrade Mikoyan then invited Premier Qassim to attend a concert and variety show held in the large hall established on the exhibition grounds. Baghdad considers this exhibition a manifestation of the friendship. Long live Iraqi Soviet Friendship! May it flourish still more!

[=]

24034. ------. "Special Report: Muslim Women Show the Way Forward at World Conference", in Crescent International, April 16-30, 1997. p. 6. Among the many highlights at the "Crescent International conference in Pretoria, held in memory of Doctor Kalim Siddiqi, was a full day dedicated to Muslim women. It was an instant success. The most frequently heard comment was that this is something they were looking for all along. At hand were a number of sisters who had long experience in motivating and mobilizing sisters for the Global Islamic Movement. Overseas guests included Sister Merve Safa Kavakci, head of international relations and women's affairs for the Refah Party in Turkey, Sister Suraiya Siddiqui, widow of the late Doctor Kalim Siddiqui, their daughter Lubna, and Sister Faiza Siddiqi—the last two members of the executive committee of the Muslim women's Institute in London. There was no shortage of local talent either. The Women's Day idea had come from Sisters Waheeda Kassim and Fajriya Fakier, "Crescent International's" representatives in South Africa. They had the support of such other women activists as Sister Ayesha Khan, Sister Rabia Kaila, among others. Once the sisters had been motivated to take up the challenge, then there was no stopping them. Throughout the day, the sisters held their sessions and workshops. The excitement was electrifying. As what usually happens on such occasions, they wanted to move quickly to achieve something tangible right away. It was clear that they had missed a lot of time in the past; they did not want to waste any more time. The issues they wanted to discuss were not about cooking or sewing, important as these are (an army marches on its stomach, goes an old saying!). Their concerns were much more profound: the mobilization of Muslim women for the Global Islamic Movement, addressing the drug menace, providing the proper environment for their children to grow up in, and refuting the challenges of western feminists who insistently pronounce that Muslim women are oppressed because they wear the hijab. Had western feminists been there, they would have found more than a match in these sisters. A number of sisters addressed the issue of why Islam held such attraction for middleclass, otherwise worldly successful western women. What was lacking in their lives to attract them to Islam after they had achieved almost everything that the Muslim Women's Day will be included in the forthcoming issues of the "Crescent International," insha'Allah. [=]

24035. ------. "Study Concerning Right to Restitution, Compensation and Rehabilitation for Victims of Gross Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (18): Final Report Submitted by Mr. Theo van Boven, Special Rapporteur: V. Compensation to Victims of Gross Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Resulting from the Unlawful Invasion and Occupation of Kuwait by Iraq", in Peoples Korea, September 3, 1994. p. 8. 93. In resolution 687 (1991) adopted by the Security Council on 4/3/91 the Council reaffirmed that Iraq "...is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait" (paragraph 16). In this connection the Council decided to create a fund to pay claims that fall within paragraph 16 quoted above and to establish a Commission that will administer the fund. It should be noted that the Council's wording in paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991) by and large restated paragraph 8 of the Council resolution 674 (1990), which reminded Iraq that "...under international law, it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq." 94. For the purpose of the present study three issues will be discussed: (a) the legal basis for Iraq's duty to pay compensation; (b) loss, damage or injury suffered in connection with gross violations of human rights; (c) Governments and individuals as subjects submitting claims. [See also Larisa Gabriell, "Victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms arising from the illegal invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq," Report of the Maastricht Seminar, pp. 29-39; Frank C. Newman, Redress for Gulf War Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Resulting from the Unlawful Invasion and Occupation of Kuwait by Iraq, in Peoples Korea, September 3, 1994. p. 8. 93. In resolution 687 (1991) adopted by the Security Council on 4/3/91 the Council reaffirmed that Iraq "...is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait" (paragraph 16). In this connection the Council decided to create a fund to pay claims that fall within paragraph 16 quoted above and to establish a Commission that will administer the fund. It should be noted that the Council's wording in paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991) by and large restated paragraph 8 of the Council resolution 674 (1990), which reminded Iraq that "...under international law, it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq." 94. For the purpose of the present study three issues will be discussed: (a) the legal basis for Iraq's duty to pay compensation; (b) loss, damage or injury suffered in connection with gross violations of human rights; (c) Governments and individuals as subjects submitting claims. [See also Larisa Gabriell, "Victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms arising from the illegal invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq," Report of the Maastricht Seminar, pp. 29-39; Frank C. Newman, Redress for Gulf War Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Resulting from the Unlawful Invasion and Occupation of Kuwait by Iraq, in Peoples Korea, September 3, 1994. p. 8. 93. In resolution 687 (1991) adopted by the Security Council on 4/3/91 the Council reaffirmed that Iraq "...is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait" (paragraph 16). In this connection the Council decided to create a fund to pay claims that fall within paragraph 16 quoted above and to establish a Commission that will administer the fund. It should be noted that the Council's wording in paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991) by and large restated paragraph 8 of the Council resolution 674 (1990), which reminded Iraq that "...under international law, it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq." 94. For the purpose of the present study three issues will be discussed: (a) the legal basis for Iraq's duty to pay compensation; (b) loss, damage or injury suffered in connection with gross violations of human rights; (c) Governments and individuals as subjects submitting claims. [See also Larisa Gabriell, "Victims of gross violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms arising from the illegal invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq," Report of the Maastricht Seminar, pp. 29-39; Frank C. Newman, Redress for Gulf War Violations of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Resulting from the Unlawful Invasion and Occupation of Kuwait by Iraq, in Peoples Korea, September 3, 1994. p. 8. 93.
to answer the call of their people and leader to defend the cause of the people, for the sake of all these we beseech you to order the release of these dutiful patriots and let justice be done to them in order to enable them to return to their mothers. [–]

24041. ------. "US Embargo Kills Half Million Iraqi Children: Big Increases in Disease and Hunger", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 17, 1995, p. 8. The study appeared in The Lancet, the journal of the British Medical Association. It was co-authored by Mary Smith Fawzi, a researcher at the Harvard University School of Public Health, and Sarah Zaidi, science director of the Center for Social and Economic Rights. The study was based on a survey conducted in 8/1995 of 2120 children under 10 years old in 25 neighborhoods in Baghdad, the capital of Iraq. The survey found that: - Mortality rates for children in Iraq is now five times greater than before the Gulf War. - Iraq's water and sanitation systems were devastated by the bombing during the Gulf War. As a result, deaths related to diarrheal diseases have tripled compared to before the war. - 28% of children were stunted in growth because of food shortages and bad health conditions, compared to 12% in 1991. - The percentage of children affected by "wasting" - emaciation requiring urgent medical attention - rose from 3% in 1991 to 12% in 1995. Malnutrition is widespread, and the rate of underweight children now compares with those of the poorest Third World countries like Mali or Ghana. The Lancet article says: "These findings illustrate a strong association between economic sanctions and increase in child mortality and malnutrition rates." The article in Lancet is an isolated study. A series of studies by various organizations - from the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) to the Harvard Medical School of Public Health - have documented the catastrophic effects of the US bombings and the economic embargo on the 20 million people of Iraq. A 9/1995 study by UNIFEC reported: "The situation in the health sector regarding children and women has remained critical over the past five years... According to [Iraq's] Ministry of Health (MOH) statistics, the number of mortality cases among children under five has been on the rise over the past five years. MOH figures indicated that the monthly average of mortality cases among children of the same age group due to acute respiratory infections, water-borne diseases and malnutrition stood at 4409 for 1994 against 742 cases in 1990..."

24039. ------. "US Embargo Kills Half Million Iraqi Children", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 17, 1995, p. 8. For five years, the US and its big-power allies have carried out an economic embargo against Iraq, preventing that country from selling its main export - oil - and importing vital necessities like food and medicine. What has been the human cost of these sanctions? A study just published in a leading British medical journal reports that as many as 576000 Iraqi children may have died since the end of the 1990-1991 Gulf War because of the economic sanctions. The US accuses the Iraqi government of continuing to produce "weapons of mass destruction," and uses this accusation as justification for the embargo. But it is the US which has used economic sanctions as a "weapon of mass destruction" against Iraq. [–]

24040. ------. "US Embargo Kills Half Million Iraqi Children: Behind the Sanctions: US Imperialist Interests", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 17, 1995, p. 8. The massive US-led bombings and the land invasion of Iraq during the Gulf War left more than 100000 Iraqi people dead. But the US policymakers were not satisfied with the military defeat of the Saddam Hussein regime. For the US rulers, keeping a dominant position in the Persian Gulf and the Middle East overall is crucial to their status as the top imperialist superpower. The US itself gets a relatively small percentage of its oil from the Gulf, but the area is a lifeline for Europe and Japan. Saddam Hussein has remained in power despite the devastation of the Gulf War, and the US imperialists are afraid he has become a symbol of the limitations of their global power. So they want to force Saddam Hussein himself out and replace him with a new set of rulers that the US can more easily control. The US has used the economic embargo - backed by military threats - to try to achieve this result. The anti-Iraq sanctions are being carried out under the banner of the UN, but they are basically enforced by the US and British military. Some of the other powers - like France and Russia - have pushed for easing the sanctions, hoping to strike profitable capitalist deals with the Iraqi regime. But the US has vetoed any suggestions to lower the embargo wall that has been built up around Iraq. Madeleine Albright, the US ambassador to the UN, bluntly declared last year, "We recognize this area [the Persian Gulf] as vital to US national interests, and we will behave with others multilaterally when we can and unilaterally when we must." This is the cold-blooded imperialist logic behind the sanctions against Iraq and the deaths of half a million Iraqi children. [–] sections of the people in Iraq. But the situation is getting desperate for the great majority of Iraqi people. Eric Rouleau, a former French diplomat, wrote in Foreign Affairs (1-2/1995): "The slow asphyxiation of the economy since the Persian Gulf War has brought about the collapse of the dinar and a cumulative inflation rate estimated at 5000% over four years. Salaries, meanwhile, have remained virtually frozen. An entire month’s salary of a middle-level governmental employee, for example, is needed to buy a kilo of bread for a pair of shoes for a pair of children. This makes the middle of Baghdad survive. Since the beginning of the Gulf crisis, children have been selling petty things at traffic lights, but today many more have turned to beggary.... Child labor is also visible in the streets where small children are seen selling a variety of items, even drinking water. This situation is unlikely to witness immediate improvement even if the economic and trade sanctions are lifted or eased. [–]

24043. ———. "US Embargo Kills Half Million Iraqi Children: Cutting Off Food", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 17, 1995. p. 8. Iraq, which has the world’s second largest oil reserves after Saudi Arabia, is a country oppressed by imperialism. But before the Gulf War, the revenues from the sale of oil was the basis for a general living standard and levels of literacy, health, and nutrition that were far higher than other Third World countries. The massive air bombings during the Gulf War destroyed a lot of Iraq’s infrastructure, such as factories, water and sanitation plants, electric lines, roads and bridges, and so forth. And the sanctions have cut off the foreign sale of Iraqi oil, eliminating what used to be Iraq’s main source of income. The sanctions have also prevented Iraq from purchasing essential goods - such as machinery and parts to repair conference of non-governmental organizations held in Baghdad in 1992, the import of necessary food and medicine is still supposedly allowed under the sanctions, the ban of the sale of oil means that Iraq has no way to pay for such key imports. The study “Hidden Casualties II, the Environmental, Health and Political Consequences of the Persian Gulf War” (copublished by Arms Control Research Center and North Atlantic Environmental, Health and Political Consequences of the Persian Gulf War) reported in 1993: “Before the war, Iraq imported 70% of its food. Even though food is exempt from the UN sanctions, delivery is slow and restrictions on Iraq’s cash supplies have helped to prevent bulk buying. UNICEF reports that food prices had increased 20 to 40 times over pre-Gulf War prices by 1/1992. Dr. Eric Hoskins, a Canadian physician, who has been monitoring the effects of the Gulf crisis on Iraqi women and children, reports that from 8/1990 to 4/1993 food price index had increased 50 times and that most prices increased by an additional 50% or more during the first three months of 1993 alone. Government food rations contain 1500 calories, not the 2700 calories daily adult recommendation.”

"As a result, malnutrition has been and continues to be a major problem in Iraq. According to Dr. Hoskins, pregnant women are subject to anemia because their diets are deficient in iron and folic acid, leading to abnormal rates of miscarriages, premature labors, and low birth weights of newborn infants.... Adding to these problems is a continuing lack of infant formula, with protein and micronutrient deficiency the cause of growth retardation, anemia, goiter, rickets and other illnesses related to the health of infants. Malnutrition, touching all groups of the society, has especially affected children one to three years of age. Government attempts to supplement food supplies ran into trouble when the 1992-1993 cereal harvest fell far short of expectations. Damaged crops were a result of the lack of pesticides and spare parts for irrigation pumps and other agricultural machinery, another consequence of UN sanctions.” The Iraqi government provides a subsidized “food basket” of five basic items to all the people. But this food ration covers only about 40% of minimum nutrition requirements. And the price of food items not rationed by the government is sky high due to inflation, putting it out of touch of the vast majority. According to UNICEF, the shortage of food is putting at risk some 3.5 million people in Iraq, including 1.58 million children under the age of 5. The International Committee for the Red Cross estimated that 220000 children were underweight due to the lack of food, and an additional 300000 were malnourished. Even more critical is the health of children below the age of one. There is evidence that many children will be born mentally handicapped. The US News & World Report wrote in 10/1994: “A UN survey in a poor section of Baghdad found nearly 1 in 10 infants suffering clinical marasmus; the Saddam Central Teaching Hospital for Children sees nearly 100 cases a month of children suffering marasmus and kwashiorkor - Third World nutritional diseases in a country that recently aspired to join the oil rich.” In 10/1994, an article in the New York Times revealed the sickening contrast between the hunger facing the Iraqi people with the situation in Kuwait - the reactionary oil kingdom that the US claimed to be protecting through the Gulf War: “To the north, in Saddam Hussein’s Iraq, food rations have been cut in half and there are lines for bread and cooking oil. Inflation is rendering the Iraqi dinar worthless, and many on fixed incomes have trouble buying enough food for their families. Food has become a daily concern. But Kuwait, whose oil wealth and small population give it one of the highest per capita incomes in the world, has no such worries. Obesity has been steadily on the rise since the end of the Persian Gulf war, and Health Ministry officials say that at least half of the population is overweight.” [–]

24044. ———. "US Embargo Kills Half Million Iraqi Children: Direct Impact on Health", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 17, 1995. p. 8-9. Aside from increase of malnutrition, the economic embargo has a direct effect on the health of the Iraqi people and the medical care they receive. Iraq used to import $400 million each year in drugs and medical supplies - now it gets only one-tenth of that. There are serious shortages of medicines, vaccines, syringes, anesthetics, surgical materials, laboratory and diagnostic equipment. The UN has put anesthetics on the "red list," because of the supposed "military value" of its nitrate content. Newborn babies in intensive care must share incubators, and hypodermic needles are being used over and over again. During a 1991 survey in a poor section of Baghdad found nearly 1 in 10 infants suffering marasmus, all of which could be prevented. The surgeon needs special tools to do his work sterile. The result is wound infection, gangrene, osteomyelitis, sepsis, all of which could be prevented. The surgeon needs special tools for operations. The simple things were missing: sterile disposable scalpels. Because of this, the doctors were forced to use them as often as possible and only throw them away when they did not cut anymore. There was no gauze, bandages, surgical yarn, and even now the available amount is not according to the standard Iraq was accustomed to before the embargo. Normally operations are done under total anesthesia. How can you do it if the drugs are not available, the narcotic gas is missing. This is why the reason why many patients including children had limbs amputated without anesthetic as well as painful wound dressing without painkillers. Because of the breakdown of the sanitation system due to the damage from the Gulf War and the continuing sanctions, there has been a huge increase in diseases caused by contaminated water. "Hidden Casualties II" reported that in 1/1993 the northern Kurdish city of Sulaymaniyyah saw a 500% increase in the number of typhoid cases from the previous year. And there have been serious outbreaks of other illnesses, including: malaria, cholera, gastroenteritis, intestinal parasites, diarrhea and dehydration, infection hepatitis and respiratory tract infections. [–]

24045. ———. "US Sends More Troops to the Gulf", in Socialist Worker
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
The anti-China campaign, which most bourgeois forces in the US have joined, is being waged because they can't forgive the workers and peasants of China for seizing their country for themselves in the 1949 revolution. In doing so they removed close to one quarter of the world's population from the dictates of capital. Today the Chinese government is taking on a greater political, economic, and military role in Asia and the Pacific, out of the control of Washington, London, Tokyo, and other imperialist powers. And, for all their investment, the imperialists are finding they can't reimpose capitalism in China just by opening a stock market in Shanghai. Fighters for women's rights from around the world will be looking for each other at this conference, trying to find ways forward. Neither Hillary Clinton and Madeleine Albright, leading the official US delegation, nor the right-wing forces campaigning against the conference speak for the vast majority of women. Our future will be forged in uncompromising fights for women's equality, and is intertwined with the worldwide struggle for socialism. [↩]

24049.  ....... "Youth Movement in Iraq", in Iraqi Review-Weekly English Supplement to Itilhad Al-Shaab, June 11, 1959. pp. 7-8. (6/11/1959 is the opening of the First Congress of Iraqi Youth. Our Correspondent visited the headquarters of the Iraqi Democratic Youth Federation (IDYF), on the Karkh bank of Baghdad and in an interview with Mr. N. A. Rasaq, Secretary General of the IDYF, collected the information, on which this article is based.)

The youth, on whose shoulders rest the pillars of the new society, were very much oppressed in old Iraq that is the pre-7/14/1958 Iraq. They did not have the right to legal organizations of their own.

The Youth organization, under the same it holds now, IDYF, was first formed in 8/1951. Being illegal it was unable to bring in all the youth it would have done in normal life. Yet the obstacles placed in its way, did not limit the scope of its work. Branches outside Baghdad were active and its organ “The Youth,” distributed illegally some 7000 copies all over the country. The federation spared no efforts to defend the gains of the republic and its social interests and fought with great courage and resolution for the defense of freedom and the independence of the country against the imperialist forces.

The youth, organized in this federation, were conscious of their responsibility towards the progress of their society and the freedom of their people. They realized that their destiny was part and parcel of that of their fellow citizens. To improve their own conditions, they were confronted with the task of improving that of the people in general. Thus they came face to face with the imperialist domination of our economy and social affairs. Imperialism and the imperialist lackeys running the country’s affairs had to be exposed as being the direct enemy of our people and youth alike. This fact explains the whole character and history of the youth movement in Iraq. It explains likewise why it was attacked by the successive governments of the old regime.

The Iraqi youth struggled alongside the people, and their patriotism during national uprisings is particularly remembered. During the uprisings of 11/1952, the youth were in the forefront of the demonstrations, and many of them were the first victims of the fascist rule of the government. During the Tri-partite aggression on Egypt, Iraqi youth played a similarly active part in the campaign of solidarity with the Egyptian people.

Through the anti-imperialist struggle was the dominant feature of the IDYF then, it did not limit its activities to this end only. The difficulties it continued to face, reaching a climax with the signing of the Baghdad Pact, failed to isolate the Iraqi youth from the youth of the rest of the world. The youth participated in all the youth festivals held successively in Berlin, Bucharest, Warsaw and Moscow. Iraq youth are now getting ready for the forthcoming festival in Vienna. The youth delegations to these festivals were organized by the IDYF, thus contributing to the strengthening of the relations between students, workers, artists and other sections of the youth of Iraq with their colleagues in the various parts of the world.

Mass international youth congresses and conferences were similarly attended by the IDYF. The Council of the World Federation of Democratic Youth (WFDY) held in Berlin in 1951, the Third International Youth Congress in 1953 and the Peasant Youth Congress in 1954, were all but examples of the international contribution of the IDYF.

At home, one great achievement was the participation of the IDYF in the Higher Committee of the National United Front. This was a direct recognition of the role the youth federation was playing in general. On Nuri as-Sa'id's comeback to office, in 1954, all democratic measures forced on the previous government by the struggle of the people, were revoked and similarly all democratic organizations, first and foremost the IDYF, were crushed.

The activities of the federation decreased to a minimum till freedom dawned on Iraq, on 7/14/1958. The IDYF was reformed and reorganized on a totally new basis. Its aims changed according to the demands of the new era. The support of the people's movement for democracy and the defense of our independent Republic, are the chief aims of the IDYF now. All other activities originate from these two aims.

The IDYF now includes a number of organizations as well as individuals. Its membership grew by leaps and bounds since the very first day of the Republic.

What is the IDYF today? It is a social organization embracing youth of all walks of life, irrespective of political affiliations, race, religion or nationality. It is a non-party mass organization. Social activities, including cultural, artistic and sports, are the main type of activities.

The Preparatory Committee was legalized by the end of 3/1959. An ever increasing number of youth registered as members in the IDYF. In fact in the short period of four months, the figure reached 100000. The target of the federation is a quarter of a million members during the coming year. In fulfillment of its responsibility towards the republic, the federation spared no efforts to defend the gains of the republic and its democratic system, the youth nobly carried out their duties and many of them actively guarded the country, as members of the People's Resistance Forces.

During the Shawaf conspiracy (planned not by one aggressive force but by ruling circles in UAR, Britain and the US) the youth entered the battle for freedom on the side of the people. By the joint efforts of the honest army men and the people including the massive number of youth, it was impossible to smash the putsch.

The federation called on its members also to help in the nationwide campaign for combating illiteracy. Many schools were opened in the villages and rural areas and are run by the youth. Since the IDYF counts as members all the main companies of music theater and arts in general, it urged these members to take an active part in the people's preparations on the various national occasions. Army day on 1/6/1959, 6 months of the Revolution on 1/14/1959, Woman's Day on 3/8/1959, the Peace Festival on 4/16/1959 and May Day. The Musicians' Society and Modern Theater Company are the most active in this field. The IDYF since 7/14/1958 has participated in an even greater number of international meetings than before, the most important being the Ninth Congress of the Dimitrov Youth in Bulgaria, held in 11/1958, the Afro-Asian Youth Conference, end of 11/1958, the meetings of the Executive Committee of the WFDY meeting in Colombo and recently the Congress of The Free German Youth (FDY) of the German Democratic Republic.

The Federation's attention is now being directed mainly (apart from the congress of course) to the coming Youth Festival in Vienna. The delegation of the IDYF will be around 600 young men and women. There will be members representing all the arts, culture and sports of the Iraqi people: The Modern Theater Company, the Music Society, the Folk Song groups, literary and scientific personalities besides the various sport clubs and unions. The branches of the IDYF all over the country are now competing in the different fields to be represented, and the best of each will be the luckiest of all! Other organizations were given a chance to send their representatives to the Festival. The students' Union was given a greater share than others. The Trade Unions, the League for the Defense of Women's Rights, the General Union of Peasants' Societies and others are represented on the Preparatory Committee of the Youth Festival, formed by the IDY.

Yet all this is but a start. Four months are short in the history of an organization. The first Congress of Iraqi Youth, to be held on 6/11/1959 (today), will mark the opening of a new era for the IDY and open fresh fields for its activities, so that the youth, the hope of the future, will live a happier and better life in a world of peace and progress. [=]

(2) Sectarian segregation: The Iranian authorities have enforced and exploited the segregation of the POW's according to their denominations and religions. Thus Sunni, Shiites and Christians were segregated from one another. Then the Iranian authorities recruited religious scholars from every sect to try converting the religious beliefs of the POW's to their own creed. Their aim was to lecture every POW in accordance with his beliefs. As far as Christian POW's were concerned, they were subjected to intolerable pressures to convert them to Moslem Shiites and they were forced to perform the rituals of the Islamic religion.

(3) Daily coercive means: The measures pursued by the Iranian authorities include the coercion of POW's to attend prolonged religious sermons filled with hatred and odio expressions against Iraq and its leadership. The POW's are forced to carry pictures of Khomeini and to shout hostile slogans against the political system of Iraq. They are forced to engage in collective prayers. This kind of measure aims at making the POW's accustomed to this kind of behaviour. Through repetition, this may lead to habitation and a state of being inured or the psychological condition of being rendered insensible to reaction to it. Once this takes root, one does not feel guilty as a result of association with hostile slogans or with carrying Khomeini's picture or with other acts of such a kind.

(4) Concealment of prisoners: The Iranian authorities have concealed a great number of Iraqi POW's from the International Red Cross. This measure leads to increasing pressure of worry on the POW's due to the lack of news and correspondence of their families. Moreover, in these circumstances, the fears of POW's for their unknown fate will be mounting, until they have the feeling that they are on the verge of death at any moment. They find themselves forced to obey their Iranian captors in order to escape death and as a means to get to know their families' news.

(5) Camp transfers: The Iranian authorities resort to this kind of measure by transferring POW's collectively or individually from one place to another continually. This in itself leaves POW's in a constant state of fear as they are deprived of the chance to adapt themselves to their environment or to make close friends with their fellow POW's. This usually leads to the weakening of POW's psychological resistance. As a result, their Iranian captors achieve their end when POW's turn to accept anything in return for some kind of stability. Subsequently, POW's are turned to become docile and more receptive to ideological concepts, at least as a presence in order to be left alone.

(6) Individual isolation: The Iranian authorities disperse Iraqi POW's in such a way as to facilitate the treatment of the prisoner in accordance with the authorities' ends. They isolate officers from soldiers and try to break up any collective unity by dispersing friends and colleagues. They implement as well individual isolation measures against the individuals who enjoy a good standing among POW's or against those who oppose the Iranian practices and designs. This procedure aims at erecting barriers against the psychological unity of the POW's which may arise through gathering in one place. It serves as a punishment against opponents in order to stop others from following suit.

(7) Infiltrating agents among POW's: This is done through agents from the Dawa Party who try to find out the political views and loyalties of the POW's. These agents are selected from various areas in Iraq. They should eventually be able to provide thorough reports on POW's affiliations and loyalties. The reports are dealt with by the POW Administration, and in the light of their contents, POW's are selected for various measures of torture or murder.

(8) The intimidation of airmen: Due to the effective role of air power in the war, the Iranian authorities have resorted to threatening and intimidating them by warning them that they will be tried as war criminals when the war comes to an end. This makes POW's extremely worried about their future fate. It could lead to the same consequences as have been mentioned previously.

(9) Visits to the war zone: The Iranian authorities take some of the officer POW's to the areas that were bombarded by Iraqi forces, such as Abadan, Dezful, Andimishk and alMuhammara (Khorramshahr) in order to make POW's feel guilty and sympathetic with Iran about it. Their captors think that Iraqi POW's will pass to their fellows the picture of the damage they have been led to see by their captors.

(10) Food poisoning: Poisonous substances and laxatives are administered to the POW's food. These cause pernicious pains among the whole group of prisoners, and the Iranian authorities then deliberately allow excrement to foul the body in order to humiliate the POW's and weaken them psychologically prior to the stage when they have to obey what is imposed on them for safety.

(11) Sex abuse: The Iranian Administration of POW's encourage their agents and collaborators to commit indecent acts against prisoners who do not cooperate with them, especially the young. This offensive activity weakens the moral deterrent of the prisoner and makes him more readily manipulable in the hands of the enemy and the enemy's agents.

(12) Night raids: This is another measure pursued by the Iranian authorities. The POW's guards shout vociferously at various intervals in the night in order to call POW's for assembly. Individual and collective tortures are carried out including the murder of ZO POW's and inflicting injuries on 70 others, not for any reason apart from the fact that these POW's expressed their dissatisfaction with the offensive treatment they received at the hands of Iranian guards. Other groups of POW's were made to witness similar executions in Karaj, Mashad, Semnan, Brandik, Tazileh, Tawandah, and Anzali. The aim of using this means of threat and torture was to shake violently the emotional balance and sensitivity of the POW's by bringing them to deduce that a horrible fate will befall them if they still try not to respond to the Iranian orders and directions.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
example, and the POW's are exposed to many other kinds of humiliating and injurious acts. [=]

Plaintiff filed a complaint alleging a conspiracy to enslave and oppress certain segments of our society. Plaintiff contends she is a cyborg, and that she received most of the information which forms the basis for her complaint through ‘Proteus’, which I read to be some silent, telepathic form of communication.

Presently before the court is an Order to Show Cause why the Court should not enjoin the trial in the World Trade Center bombing case. Plaintiff alleges that President Clinton ordered the bombing of the World Trade Center in order to justify war with Iraq. In support of her application, plaintiff describes certain ‘proteus’ communications she has had with other individuals. Plaintiff contends that the United States invaded Panama and arrested General Noriega because Noriega objected to United States soldiers raiding Indian tribes in Central America for child sex slaves to torture in American cocaine-filled thrill-killing rackets. Plaintiff contends she wrote to Noriega asking him to join in her lawsuit but that United States soldiers holding Noriega beat him when he asked for his mail.

Plaintiff asserts that in 1988 Rajiv Gandhi spoke to her through ‘Proteus’ and informed her that he was being held prisoner and sexually abused by a man whom he had caught stealing from the funds generated by the Bhopal disaster settlement. According to plaintiff, Yasser Arafat tried to confirm Gandhi’s tale of abuse on behalf of the plaintiff, to no avail.

Plaintiff additionally contends that the Gulf War was undertaken so that America could restock its sexual slavery camps, which had been depleted. According to the plaintiff, 40,000 Iraqi soldiers captured by the United States and selected for their physical attractiveness had been brought to this country, ‘beaten, forced to run gauntlets, and homosexually gang-raped by American soldiers’. Plaintiff claims to have confronted former Secretary of Defense Cheney with evidence of this allegation. Cheney, through ‘proteus’, purportedly told the plaintiff, “Well, we were so sick and tired of killing Black girls. We just had to put some variety back into our death-hunting industry. And they (Persians) are incredibly beautiful. The beauty of the face heightens the pleasure of the kill. I know of no higher pleasure than the gang-rape of exceedingly beautiful people”.

Additionally, plaintiff alleges that the Soviet government, the Nazi ‘Bund’, the Bank of Commerce & Credit International (BCCI), and IBM are also involved in the conspiracy. Representatives of both IBM and BCCI made an appearance and successfully moved to have the claims against them dismissed.

The Clerk of the Court is directed to dismiss the complaint as to all defendants. The Clerk is directed to refund to plaintiff her filing fee. Plaintiff’s motion to Order to Show Cause to enjoin the World Trade Center bombing trial is denied.

It is so ordered. [=]

FY 1994 estimate: $100 million.
FY 1995 request: $100 million.

Purpose: UNICEF encourages and assists the long-term humanitarian development and welfare of children in developing countries. UNICEF does so through education and information programs which make governments, communities, and private groups aware of the plight of children and the possibilities for improving their situation. UNICEF also provides goods and services to help meet basic needs in maternal and child health, sanitation, clean water, nutrition, primary education and social services in support of self-help efforts. UNICEF provides incentives, both technical and financial, to start important programs, but the Governments or NGOs implement them. UNICEF also provides emergency assistance in the event of disasters.

Background: The United Nations General Assembly created UNICEF in 1946 to aid impoverished children left in the wake of World War II. Initially an emergency aid program, UNICEF, by 1953, had evolved into a long-term, voluntary development fund aimed at improving conditions for the poorest children of the developing world. UNICEF currently cooperates in programs in 130 countries. In its work, UNICEF cooperates closely with governments, private groups and local communities in developing nations, as well as with UN and aid donors to protect children and enable them to develop their full mental and physical potential. Individual governments establish their priorities as a result of studies of major needs, and UNICEF assists in implementing mutually agreed-upon programs. In 1993 UNICEF will inaugurate new country programs in eight Central Europe and New Independent States (NIS) of the former Soviet Union. UNICEF’s assistance is allocated on a sliding scale according to such factors as the number of children, the wealth of the country, and, especially, the infant and child mortality rate. Allocations are scaled so that the larger countries do not monopolize most of the assistance and so that the per-child allocation among countries of similar size favors the poorest countries which receive approximately five and a half times as much per child as do the middle-income developing countries. UNICEF has a small emergency unit that continues to play a key role in many international relief efforts. Because it is careful to maintain an apolitical approach to its work, UNICEF frequently finds acceptance in countries seriously destabilized by civil strife and in 1992 provided emergency assistance in 56 countries.

In 1989, UNICEF coordinated Phase I of “Operation Lifeline Sudan,” the UN’s emergency relief effort in the Sudan. In 1990, UNICEF was called upon to assist the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe in assessing the needs of their children and in 1992 this request was echoed by the New Independent States of the former Soviet Union. UNICEF was also among the first of UN agencies to assist victims of the Gulf conflict, by providing emergency and basic health services for women and children. Such assistance served to meet the urgent needs of vulnerable populations in Iraq and Kuwait at a time when bilateral aid was not possible. UNICEF has assumed primary responsibility for assistance projects in the particularly vulnerable Kurdish area of northern Iraq. Likewise, UNICEF is working to alleviate conflict-induced conditions in the Horn of Africa and in the former Yugoslavia. It is now working in close coordination with the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs on humanitarian assistance in new emergencies. UNICEF reports expenditures of over $167 million on emergency efforts during 1992 -- a 50% increase over emergency expenditures in 1991 and more than 340% over those in 1990. This figure represents 22% of total 1992 expenditures -- a level unprecedented since UNICEF’s founding in 1946 as the “UN Children’s Emergency Fund.” Four staff members lost their lives in emergency situations in 1992. UNICEF inspired and provided the secretariat for the 9/1990 World Summit for Children which was attended by 71 heads of state. The Declaration issued at the Summit endorsed a mutually agreed-upon program. There is a close and continuous dialogue between the United States and UNICEF on technical matters of assistance priorities and programs. There is a close and continuous dialogue between the United States and UNICEF on technical matters of assistance priorities and programs.

In 1990, UNICEF was called upon to assist the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe in assessing the needs of their children and in 1992 this request was echoed by the New Independent States of the former Soviet Union. UNICEF was also among the first of UN agencies to assist victims of the Gulf conflict, by providing emergency and basic health services for women and children. Such assistance served to meet the urgent needs of vulnerable populations in Iraq and Kuwait at a time when bilateral aid was not possible. UNICEF has assumed primary responsibility for assistance projects in the particularly vulnerable Kurdish area of northern Iraq. Likewise, UNICEF is working to alleviate conflict-induced conditions in the Horn of Africa and in the former Yugoslavia. It is now working in close coordination with the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs on humanitarian assistance in new emergencies. UNICEF reports expenditures of over $167 million on emergency efforts during 1992 -- a 50% increase over emergency expenditures in 1991 and more than 340% over those in 1990. This figure represents 22% of total 1992 expenditures -- a level unprecedented since UNICEF’s founding in 1946 as the “UN Children’s Emergency Fund.” Four staff members lost their lives in emergency situations in 1992. UNICEF inspired and provided the secretariat for the 9/1990 World Summit for Children which was attended by 71 heads of state. The Declaration issued at the Summit endorsed a Plan of Action to guide national efforts to address children’s needs. The United States submitted its own National Plan of Action in 1/1993. UNICEF is working to sustain the momentum generated by the Summit throughout the coming decade and to meet the midterm goals by 1995.

In fulfillment of the Plan of Action, UNICEF is supporting developing countries in the preparation and implementation of national programs of action in pursuit of Summit goals. UNICEF cosponsored or helped plan seven regional conferences on summit follow-up issues in 1992-93. UNICEF also reports regularly to the Secretary General on Summit follow-up activities and in 1993, began publishing an annual publication -- the Progress of Nations -- to report on progress achieved each year, based on a set of core indicators. US Interests: UNICEF’s approaches have generally been consistent with US humanitarian development assistance priorities and programs. There is a close and continuous dialogue between the United States and UNICEF on technical matters of common interest and strong cooperation in field activities. All UNICEF programs are directly related to the welfare of children and mothers. Some programs -- such as clean water and sanitation -- also benefit other members of the community. Programs are designed to involve local communities as much as possible and to use equipment and

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
work of UNICEF which complements our own bilateral assistance controlled by the government; thus giving the government more control in being of the neediest, most vulnerable population groups. A contribution of strengthen government control. The first was mandatory registration of incidence of low birth weight (2.5 kilograms or less) to less than 10%. between Sunni schools of law, in general, and Shi'i schools of law in moderate malnutrition among under-5 children by half; (d) Universal Reduction of maternal mortality rate by half; (c) Reduction of severe and reinterpret them in order to create the necessary changes in family law.
these goals are: (a) Reduction of infant and under-5 child mortality rates formed of Muslim scholars to draft the reform, a committee instructed to reform family law followed certain steps to insure the success of the 2000 of goals delineated in the World Summit Plan of Action. Among reform and to minimize adverse criticism to it. It created a committee instructed to follow the basic precepts present in all traditional legal books and to accomplish because of public resistance to change and fear of manipulation of the traditional laws as interpreted by the early scholars. The problems were compounded by tradition and custom which imposed pledged $100 million, or approximately 28% of the $361 million in total amount. Muslim
The United States has always been a strong supporter of UNICEF and is supported UNICEF generously through private donations over the years. population then he could perhaps arrange to send them food across the border. Actions by Kuwait to increase the strangehold on the wretched population are difficult to reconcile with the expressed sentiment. [M. Al-Chalabi, petroleum consultant] =
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
materials which can be locally obtained and maintained.
Such projects are frequently linked to resources from other bilateral and multilateral aid agencies, e.g., the UN Capital Development Fund and the bilateral US Agency for International Development (USAID) program, including child survival activities. UNICEF emergency assistance efforts are also coordinated with those of other agencies and governments, under the leadership of the Undersecretary General for Humanitarian Affairs (DHA). UNICEF, traditionally is given the formal responsibility in major emergencies for essential medical supplies, child needs and water/sanitation work. The United States has urged continued collaboration between UNICEF and the World Health Organization (WHO) in several areas of mutual interest, including: the development of the Children’s Vaccine Initiative and the promotion of breast-feeding and nutrition. In addition, during the 1992 governing body meetings of WHO, UNDP and UNICEF, the United States sponsored resolutions requesting increased interagency collaboration, particularly at the field level, in the fight against AIDS. At the urging of the United States and other donors, UNICEF is increasing the attention it gives to assure that the programs it supports can be maintained and sustained by local resources over the longer term. UNICEF has also reviewed its external relations activities and, with the encouragement of its membership, is taking steps to assure these activities (which include advocacy, fund-raising, information and education) are more effectively integrated into its operations, and achieve their intended objectives without diverting resources from those operations. A 1993 State Department informal survey of UNICEF programs due for renewal or approval in 44 countries reflected an increased focus on monitoring and evaluation at the field level. External evaluations of UNICEF programs include a recent United Kingdom review of the “Bamako Initiative” and an overall evaluation by a multi-donor group presented in 1993. Official US support for UNICEF conforms with the humanitarian ideals of the American people, who have supported UNICEF generously through private donations over the years. US participation enables the United States to serve humanitarian aims in some nations where direct bilateral assistance is not politically feasible or desirable. The position of UNICEF Executive Director (currently James P. Grant) has always been held by a US citizen. Other Donors: The United States has always been a strong supporter of UNICEF and is one of its largest contributors. For calendar year 1993, the United States pledged $100 million, or approximately 28% of the $361 million in total governmental contributions to UNICEF’s general resources budget. Other major contributions included: $44.2 million from Sweden, $35.0 million from Norway, $25.9 million from Japan, $25.5 million from Italy, $25.4 million from Denmark, and $20.1 million from the Netherlands.
FY 1995 Program: According to UNICEF publications, approximately 35000 child deaths occur each day from ordinary malnutrition and disease. A total of 150 million children live with ill health and poor growth. A total of 100 million 6 to 11-year-olds are not in school. As the acknowledged leader in the field of child survival and development, UNICEF has made major contributions to reducing infant and child mortality rates in developing nations. Perhaps best-known are UNICEF’s emphases on childhood immunization and oral rehydration therapy (ORT). Through its Universal Child Immunization program, UNICEF helped countries achieve the seemingly impossible goal of 80% coverage (by WHO and UNICEF estimates) in 12/1990. (Funds came from many sources but UNICEF provided the impetus). UNICEF hopes this success will be replicated and improved by attainment by the year 2000 of goals delineated in the World Summit Plan of Action. Among these goals are: (a) Reduction of infant and under-5 child mortality rates by one-third (or to 70 per 1000 live births -- whichever is less); (b) Reduction of maternal mortality rate by half; (c) Reduction of severe and moderate malnutrition among under-5 children by half; (d) Universal access to basic education and completion of primary education by at least 80% of primary school-age children; and (e) A reduction in the incidence of low birth weight (2.5 kilograms or less) to less than 10% in five countries. UNICEF’s programs have a widespread, positive impact on the well-being of the neediest, most vulnerable population groups. A contribution of $100 million will reinforce the continued US support for the development work of UNICEF which complements our own bilateral assistance efforts through USAID’s Child Survival Fund and other bilateral programs. The contribution will also demonstrate US commitment to the pursuit of the World Summit goals in developing countries and in newly independent countries that are in a critical transitional stage. Furthermore, it will demonstrate our interest in improving the overall UN emergency relief response to which UNICEF has become a key contributor. [=] 24053. Adler, T. “Illness of Gulf War Vets Stump Experts”, in Science News, May 7, 1994. p. 294. After failures of physicians to characterize the cluster of symptoms known as Gulf War Syndrome, the NIH has established a 12-man panel to develop a working definition of the disease. A preliminary report finds leishmaniasis (a parasite), pesticides, fine sands and petroleum fumes as causes, while ruling out exposure to depleted uranium in US radiological weapons or vaccines as causes. The syndrome appears to be transmissible to wives of affected veterans and their children. 24054. Al-Chalabi, M. Letter: “Iraq’s Starvation Will Not Bring Peace or Democracy ?”, in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 24, 1994, p. 2. The letter from the ambassador of Kuwait (letter, 7/17/1994) sadly echoes three years of political rhetoric. I will take up one issue as an example: the $1.6 billion worth of oil that Iraq is supposed to be able to sell. What the Iraqi people actually get is not $1.6 billion but only about half of that, or just over $40 per head. The oil is sold by UN officials, not marketing specialists. If and when this oil is sold, the Iraqi people still cannot access the funds. They need to submit a request to the UN escrow account making a case for why and how much of the $40 should be released and which the UN may or may not consider to be valid. It is all very well to demand maintaining sanctions when the dying children are not one’s own. If his excellency was so concerned about the Iraqi population then he could perhaps arrange to send them food across the border. Actions by Kuwait to increase the strangehold on the wretched population are difficult to reconcile with the expressed sentiment. [M. Al-Chalabi, petroleum consultant] =
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

In recent years, women are coming to expect a greater degree of equality in the relationship with their husband. Yet the normal expectations of Iraqi women about marriage, and the traditional manner in which most partners are selected, strongly argue against companionship and friendship being the major part of a marriage. Many women noted how difficult it was to engage their husband's in conversation on other than matters of household or the children: husbands are viewed as outsiders and women normally have stronger ties to their brothers than to their husbands. Iraqi women rarely engage in the normal leisure activities of women in the West: reading and painting [sic?]; women are mainly occupied with housework, which is largely performed by women in Iraq. While all manner of household appliances are widespread in the affluent Iraqi society (so widespread that it is hard to determine whether a family is middle class just by its possessions, since such appliances are also common in the working class), domestic servants are very rare now. While economic development has pushed many women into the workplace, many women feel that fulltime housewives have higher status than women who work outside the home. Women do not perceive independence to be an option since it ends any likelihood of future marriage. Few women thought Western style "women's liberation" was genuine liberation since it entailed, they argued, little more than sexual freedom for which there are very high trade-offs; some noted that even the activities of the General Federation of Iraqi Women were sometimes seen as rather bold. "In Iraq, women's oppression within the family is fairly universal", and neither widespread access to education or a strong presence in the workplace has made any difference in this "universal oppression".

24057. Al-Radi, Selma. "Iraqi Sanctions: A Postwar Crime: Punishing the People; The Embargo Will Be Lifted When Business Wants It Lifted", in Nation, March 27, 1995, p. 405. Life is becoming increasingly intolerable in Iraq, after four years of embargo. The struggle for food is everywhere. Baghdad is gradually running down, with air pollution intensified as petroleum product additives are banned. The systematic explosion of Iraqi chemical weapons, many just outside Iraq, have also created an ominous pollution problem throughout Iraq. The levels of air pollution have damaged agricultural production, possibly causing the disastrous harvest of 1994 (dates down 50%, citrus down 33%). No new cars, parts or equipment have entered the country in four years. General poor health and malnutrition is widespread. While medical care has declined in Iraq, many Yemenic states come to Baghdad for medical care (which was among the best in the Middle East) bringing their own medical supplies with them for their treatment. Prices have exploded, education is seen as a luxury as children are forced to work: If the embargo is not stopped soon, the next generation of Iraqis will be illiterate, ignorant, amoral and fanatically anti-Western, replacing a society that is secular, educated and largely pro-Western. While Iraqis have little history of emigration, now 2 million of the population of 18 million have fled. "Perhaps when the embargo is finally lifted, the Iraqi people can bring the countries of the Security Council before some tribunal for taking away their livelihood, their health, their education and their physical safety. In short, for violating their human rights."

24058. Amnesty International. Press Release: Kuwait: Wave Of Abuses In Wake Of War. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [June 1991?] In April, Amnesty International publicly appealed to the Emir of Kuwait to end the wave of arbitrary arrests, torture and killings in the country since the withdrawal of Iraqi forces. The appeal followed a two-week Amnesty International fact-finding visit to Kuwait. The team reported that scores of victims had been killed and hundreds more had been arbitrarily arrested since February 26. Many had been brutally tortured by Kuwaiti armed forces and members of "resistance" groups since February 26. Most of the victims were Palestinians, among them Jordanian passport holders. They also included Iraqi and Sudanese nationals and members of the "Bidun" community (stateless persons in Kuwait, denied basic civil and political rights). Victims have been shot in public or tortured and killed in secret. Hundreds were taken from their homes or arrested at checkpoints, many to be tortured in police stations, schools and other

the rural areas of the country. The second gave the judge more control over matters dealing with family law. Both decrees served to weaken tribal control over women and to decentralize tribal power. The dissertation discusses the history of reform to family law in Iraq, the role and objectives of the Iraqi government in the drafting of reform, presents the traditional family laws as well as the new amendments. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [\textcopyright ]

24056. Al-Khayyat, Sana. Honor and Shame: Women in Modern Iraq. London: Saqi Books, 1990. This study of Iraqi women is written by and Iraqi women who has training as a sociologist, allowing both insider and outsider perspectives to be taken; the study is based on in-depth interviews with Iraq women (interviewing Muslim Arabs, Muslim Kurds and Muslim Turkomans, and Christian Arabs; while the attitudes and lives of all the Muslims were very similar, the Christians were much more conservative). (By contrast, she notes the observation of a well-educated Iraqi man who states: "Why are you wasting time with those stupid women? What can they tell you?... If you insist on adopting this method, select a few educated men and interview them; they would tell you all you need to know about women"). Iraq is a patriarchal society reinforced by Bedouin tribal values that became normative during the four centuries of Ottoman rule up to WWI; the society uses both bedouin social values and Islamic ideology to control women. In Iraq today education is compulsory for both sexes at the primary level (11-12 years), and in urban areas most girls go on to secondary education and many to universities. Many traditionally male areas such as engineering are open to women. Most jobs are open to women from bus and truck drivers to doctors, university professors and executive positions in Ministries; such opportunities broadened during the labor shortages of the Iran-Iraq War; there are few women in top decision-making positions however. The compulsory national literacy program includes fines for any adult that does not learn to read.

The conduct of women in Iraqi society is governed by the concept Arab concept of honor, and of shame; the sexual conduct of a woman can bring shame on all her kin (because her male kin have responsibility for her conduct); immorality can bring shame on kin as well. Gossip may bring shame on a woman wrongfully, so many women suffer from guilt without necessarily having committed any shameful act. The predominantly agarian nature of Iraqi society, where the inability of girls to work in the fields as well as boys, has "fuel[ed] the historical hatred of women"; while girls are seen as weak, boys are seen as strong (a common rebuke for a boy is "do not act like a girl"). The birth of daughter is traditionally seen as an inadequacy, and the burden of preserving the honor of the girl (and her virginity) is an additional burden. For some of the women, their childhood was scarred by domestic violence, their father's beat their mothers; this was usually associated with alcoholism by the women, which added the sense that the behavior was un-Islamic (and thus reinforcing rather that subverting Islamic norms). The more general education of Iraqi women has not dramatically changed the manner in which they raise their children.

Marriage is almost universal in Iraq; people want children and grandchildren. Marriage is seen as the joining of two families rather than of two people: traditional marriages are arranged and the couple meets on the wedding day. Modern marriages in which both partners select the other are becoming more common. In Iraqi society it is very common for cousins to marry, with favored cousins being father's brothers children. Love is still seen by many Iraqis as an impediment to happy marriage: until the 1940s, if a man was known to love a woman this would preclude an arranged marriage. Many women do not believe marriages for love can be successful; modern affairs by victims had been killed and hundreds more had been arbitrarily arrested since February 26. Many had been brutally tortured by Kuwaiti armed forces and members of "resistance" groups since February 26. Most of the victims were Palestinians, among them Jordanian passport holders. They also included Iraqi and Sudanese nationals and members of the "Bidun" community (stateless persons in Kuwait, denied basic civil and political rights). Victims have been shot in public or tortured and killed in secret. Hundreds were taken from their homes or arrested at checkpoints, many to be tortured in police stations, schools and other Victims were still being killed and tortured during Amnesty International’s visit from March 28 to April 9. The team also updated information in Amnesty International’s 1990 report on violations by Iraqi forces in Kuwait. Amnesty International was able to confirm that its report had given an accurate overall picture of the range and intensity of the violations inflicted on the population during the occupation, although it could not confirm the precise number of killings by Iraqi forces during the occupation. However, on the highly publicized issue in the December report of the baby deaths, Amnesty International’s team was shown alleged mass graves but found no reliable evidence that Iraqi forces had caused their deaths. In response to Amnesty International’s appeal, the Kuwaiti government admitted on April 19, that human rights violations had been committed immediately after the withdrawal of Iraqi forces but insisted that such abuses are no longer taking place. [=]

396

24059. Amnesty International. Press Release: Kuwait: Wave Of Abuses In Wake Of War. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [June 1991?] In April, Amnesty International publicly appealed to the Emir of Kuwait to end the wave of arbitrary arrests, torture and killings in the country since the withdrawal of Iraqi forces. The appeal followed a two-week Amnesty International fact-finding visit to Kuwait. The team reported that scores of victims had been killed and hundreds more had been arbitrarily arrested since February 26. Many had been brutally tortured by Kuwaiti armed forces and members of “resistance” groups since February 26. Most of the victims were Palestinians, among them Jordanian passport holders. They also included Iraqi and Sudanese nationals and members of the “Bidun” community (stateless persons in Kuwait, denied basic civil and political rights). Victims have been shot in public or tortured and killed in secret. Hundreds were taken from their homes or arrested at checkpoints, many to be tortured in police stations, schools and other makeshift detention centers. Savage beatings with sticks, hose pipes and rifle butts and whippings with electric cables were the most common methods. Amnesty International’s team also catalogued more than a dozen forms of torture, including electric shocks, burning with cigarettes, candles and acid, cutting with knives, biting, threats of execution and of sexual assault. Teams of torturers reportedly worked in relays, maintaining the torture for hours. Daily torture of captives appeared to have been common. Most of the abuses immediately after the Iraqi withdrawal were said to have been carried out by “resistance” squads, but armed forces personnel were increasingly cited in later cases. Victims were still being killed and tortured during Amnesty International’s visit from March 28 to April 9. The team also updated information in Amnesty International’s 1990 report on violations by Iraqi forces in Kuwait. Amnesty International was able to confirm that its report had given an accurate overall picture of the range and intensity of the violations inflicted on the population during the occupation, although it could not confirm the precise number of killings by Iraqi forces during the occupation. However, on the highly publicized issue in the December report of the baby deaths, Amnesty International’s team was shown alleged mass graves but found no reliable evidence that Iraqi forces had caused their deaths. In response to Amnesty International’s appeal, the Kuwaiti government admitted on April 19, that human rights violations had been committed immediately after the withdrawal of Iraqi forces but insisted that such abuses are no longer taking place. [=]

24060. Amnesty International. Press Release: Kuwait: Widespread Abuse Follows Invasion. London: Amnesty International, December 1990. Since the 8/2/1990 invasion of Kuwait, Iraqi forces have tortured and killed hundreds of victims, arrested thousands and left more than 300 babies to die after looting incubators from at least three of Kuwait city’s main hospitals. The abuses perpetrated by Iraqi forces are detailed in an Amnesty international report on human rights violations in Kuwait, published December. The human rights that Amnesty International seeks to protect are the same in times of peace and war. It takes no position on the conflict in the gulf, but is concerned about human rights violations inflicted on civilians. While the organization mandated in international law to protect victims of armed conflict and prisoners of war is the International Committee of the Red Cross, Amnesty International remains concerned that captives of the armed conflict may be at risk from human rights abuses such as torture and execution. It will monitor any allegations that prisoners of war are being subjected to human rights violations. Most of the abuses outlined in the 82-page Amnesty International report occurred in the first three months after the invasion. The severity of the early suppression appears to have crushed much of the opposition. Amnesty International interviewed several medical personnel who worked in the hospitals where the babies died. All had seen the dead bodies and one doctor had even helped to bury 72 of them in a cemetery near a hospital. In some hospitals, unofficial records were kept of the number of people who had been killed, including the babies. Amnesty International's report contained numerous testimonies from former detainees, who said they were held incommunicado without charge or trial and tortured throughout their detention. Thirty eight percent of the interviewed juvenile offenders reported suffering from mental illness or brain damage. Curtis Harris himself was one of nine children brought up in extreme poverty. No evidence was presented at either the trial or the sentencing hearing regarding his background or the fact that he had an IQ of only 77.

Later psychiatric evaluations found evidence of brain damage resulting from severe head injuries he had sustained from beatings during childhood. Amnesty International found it particularly disturbing that Curtis Harris and other offenders should face execution when the law under which they were sentenced to death has been radically changed. Texas has had a new capital sentencing statute since 9/1991 which allows the jury to consider any mitigating factor in deciding whether to impose life imprisonment or the death sentence. However, this new law does not apply retroactively to offenders who were convicted before this date. There were many mitigating factors in Curtis Harris' case which the jury had no opportunity to consider under the old law and this alone should have been grounds for commuting the death sentence. Although Texas has the most juvenile offenders under sentence of death (at least 12 as of 4/1993), it is not alone. 24 other US states allow the execution of offenders under 18 at the time of their crime. Frederick Lashley, a black teenage offender convicted of murdering his foster mother when he was aged 17, is due to be executed in Missouri on 28 July. If it goes ahead this would be the first such execution in the state for over 60 years. Amnesty International has called on the Clinton Administration to stop the state killing of juvenile offenders. It has urged the United States Government to withdraw its reservation to Article 3 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, one of a series of international treaties and standards which bar the execution of people under 18 at the time of the crime. These standards were developed in recognition of the fact that the death penalty, which denies any possibility of rehabilitation or reform, is wholly inappropriate in the case of young offenders. [=]
Thank you for the invitation. I am delighted to be here. I will come right to the point. Building a vibrant and productive partnership between the United States and the United Nations is one of the critical tasks of our time. And I can tell you after some months as Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations that—if you like roller coasters—it is also one of the most exhilarating tasks of our time. It is also a task in which the UNA/USA has long played a dynamic leadership role. For that and for all our good work, I salute you. I suspect many of you saw the cover story in the Sunday Times magazine this past week featuring a battered blue helmet and a discussion of the trials and tribulations of UN peacekeeping. That article—and the facts on which it is based—underlined again the importance of the US/UN relationship. It reminded us that the UN remains dependent upon the will and the resources of national governments, which in turn depend on collaboration through the UN to do things none of them can do alone. It told the story of an able and distinguished Secretary-General doing a hard, and, at times, thankless job. And it should compel us to respond to the advent of a new and promising historical age, not by settling for what seems possible today, but by setting our sights on what may be possible tomorrow. Let me start with two pragmatic policy propositions: First, the United States should maintain a robust military and diplomatic capacity to act unilaterally. This is necessary because the world remains dangerous, and because we want to influence events in directions that reflect our interests and values. Second, we need workable alternatives for those occasions when unilateral action is unnecessary, insufficient, or impossible. That is why we are preserving vigorous alliances with our fellow democracies and long-time friends, and why we must put fresh energy into our commitment to the United Nations. These basic propositions frame our approach in what pundits persist in calling the "post-Cold War era." I note from your program that the UNA has a more useful label: "the global era." The distinction is by no means semantic, for as the President recently pointed out, post-Cold War tells us "where we have been, not where we are going." The Cold War prism also tells us little about the underlying forces of history which helped end the old era and are plainly shaping the new. These are indeed global forces. Only if we build policies and institutions that take them into account can we expect to succeed. What are some of these forces?

Economic interdependence is one. Labor, capital, production, and markets have all been globalized. The information revolution—faxes, VCRs, satellites, CNN—have made people around the globe more aware, more demanding, and more able to act independent of governing structures. Not only are money and ideas overrunning political borders, so too are refugees, immigrants, pollution, narcotics, armaments, and disease. As a result, terms like national interest and national security are losing clarity. And national governments are less able, on their own, to satisfy popular expectations.

At the same time, more and more non-state actors are moving onto the world stage. These include multinational corporations, environmental and human rights organizations, criminal cartels, ethnic minorities, and individuals of broad public influence. These and other forces are the essence of the post-Cold War world, and they are changing the international order beyond anything the statesmen and statecraft of the old state system ever contemplated. Long-stable institutions have been profoundly altered; some—including the United Nations—are acquiring new relevance; others—like NATO—are being redefined; still others are fading from view. It would not surprise us, then, that Americans' own vision of global affairs is in flux. Clearly, economic and social problems—legacies, in part, of Cold War costs—occupy our attention here at home. A recent Los Angeles Times poll concluded from this that the general public: "... is inclined toward a new but unique kind of isolationism.... They want a foreign policy that serves the domestic agenda of the United States, and they would treat each global issue according to its impact on that agenda." According to the pollster, the top foreign policy priorities of the American people are to stop drug trafficking, strengthen our economy, halt the flow of illegal aliens, and protect the global environment. To me, these priorities are not isolationist at all. On the contrary, they contain the seeds from which a... new and revitalized consensus about our role in the world may grow. People are seeing that global forces do have a real impact on their lives and believe, not unreasonably, that a central purpose of a successful foreign policy should optimize these impacts. The Clinton Administration's focus on global economic growth is part of an emerging domestic/foreign policy synthesis. By enlisting the circle of market democracies and reducing barriers to trade, we create good jobs at home and more opportunities for people in developing countries to improve their lives. NAFTA, APEC, and GATT don't exactly roll off the tongue—and not everyone agrees about them, to be sure—but they reflect precisely the kind of domestically grounded multilateral initiatives that will serve our citizens well in a global era. Against this background of a transformed and transforming world, we need to ask ourselves anew: What should we expect from the United Nations and other international institutions? Where do they fit in? What can we do to limber them up? How can we develop robust options for collective action and burden-sharing, when those alternatives appear to offer the best solution? Clearly, the potential for international organizations to play an influential role on the world stage is greater today than in previous decades. If we are to fulfill that potential, we must forge international arrangements that complement, not compete with, the efforts of national governments. This is not a zero sum situation in which existing authority is simply reapportioned among national and international actors. All must make the strongest contributions they can. For purposes of tonight's discussion, I will divide the Clinton Administration's strategy for developing the kind of multilateral institutions we need into three general components. First, we are taking a new and more constructive approach to reforming UN institutions. As our superb Permanent Representative to the UN, Ambassador Madeleine Albright, has pointed out: "... the bills of the [United Nations] are not paid by governments; they are paid by hard-working, tax-paying citizens—the largest portion by citizens of the United States". Those citizens have a right to know that their dollars are being used wisely, efficiently, and for purposes they understand and support. We who are responsible for the UN cannot afford the luxury of bureaucratic bloat. There are too many important jobs to perform and, in key areas such as peacekeeping and emergency relief, far too few resources. We must now do what governments, businesses, universities, hospitals, and other institutions are being asked to do: improve services while controlling costs. In the recent past, the United States has pursued UN reform through micromanagement and interference in its innermost workings. The result was little reform and even less accountability. The current Administration has charted a different approach. Instead of trying to micromanage in quest of micro-gratifications, we are trying to shift the focus to good governance—to setting broad objectives, to holding UN managers responsible, and to evaluating results. The global era is also a competitive era. As a contender for scarce public resources, the UN can neither be insulated from that competition, nor should it fear it. The UN brings to the table enormous assets of global legitimacy, a record of past accomplishments, and a system of shared financing that multiplies each dollar contributed several times over. Unfortunately, as former Ambassador Donald McHenry has said: "The whole UN civil service got hijacked by the Cold War and decolonization. Everybody, us included, started insisting on certain jobs within the UN and using them for defeated politicians.... Once you took on such an individual, you had to take on three other people who could actually do the job." The United States is now trying to set an example by embarking on a higher road. We're working to identify outstanding individuals not only from our own country, but from around the world, to recommend for high-level UN posts. We're advocating a personnel system in which UN employees are hired, fired, and promoted according to merit, rather than political pull. And we're pressing for reforms that will give agencies and programs a real chance to perform, with the understanding that we will back fully those that achieve results, and do our best to pull the plug entirely on those that do not. The second element in our strategy at the UN is to take full advantage of the opportunity to break free from the east-west, north-south divisions that have traditionally hindered the institution's work. Here, with a massive assist from history, we are making dramatic progress. For example, this past fall, the General Assembly voted to establish a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. This is something Americans have been pushing for, with greater or lesser degrees of energy, since the days of Eleanor Roosevelt. It is a true landmark in the life of the UN. It could not have been achieved during the Cold War, but this year, every former Soviet Republic supported it, and regimes that abuse human rights were reduced to delaying tactics and weakening amendments that failed. The High Commissioner is no home to unique human rights problems, but he or she can become a highly visible and influential champion for a cause that embodies both UN principles and our core values. Arms control is another arena in which the Cold War chilled cooperation. But this past fall, at the General Assembly, Russia opposed the US on only one of 3 arms control and security-related resolutions. The UN endorsed a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, a ban on the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons, and a moratorium on the export of antipersonnel land mines. Meanwhile, the IAEA, with support from all major powers, is playing a key role combating nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iraq. These actions, too, accord with the fundamental purpose of the UN as a peace-preserving institution, and with the interests of our own citizens in a more stable world. There is also a new attitude at the UN on what has historically been the most contentious of issues—the Middle East. September's Israeli-PLO Declaration of Principles breached deep and bitter divisions. For the first time, an Israeli was elected to a position at the General Assembly. Anti-Israeli rhetoric was toned down and action on some particularly divisive resolutions was deferred. Most importantly, the peace process was endorsed by a nearly unanimous vote, and there was broad support for economic and social projects in Gaza and the West Bank. Let me cite briefly some other areas where US leadership and a changed UN hold the promise of benefits for us and for others:

We are determined to make the War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia a meaningful instrument for establishing the truth about the atrocious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the Balkans.

We are welcoming and participating in the UN's entry into the business of democracy-building and election monitoring in places as diverse as El Salvador, Cambodia, South Africa, and Mozambique.

We are working to follow up on the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio by making the concept of sustainable development a reality in people's lives, in our own country and overseas.

We have embarked on a joint effort with Japan to improve the coordination of the UN's response to complex emergencies.

And the President himself has called attention to the heroic efforts of UNICEF and WHO to save children's lives. By using low-tech, low-cost, high-impact techniques, these agencies have raised immunization rates in cities like Lagos, Calcutta, and Mexico City above those even in the United States. As a result, more than 3 million children who would otherwise die each year are now getting a chance at life. This is doubly important because we know that birth rates decline when mothers are confident that the children they do bear will survive. The key fact here is that without a general spirit of cooperation—to which the US is contributing—these initiatives and experiments at the UN would not be possible; and without experimentation, forward movement would not be possible. Today, the habit of cooperation has led the UN to the threshold of a new age of discovery. Like the European monarchs of 500 years ago, those of us responsible for international organizations are sending vessels to sea in search of the unknown. Like them, we can expect some of those vessels to turn back, some to sink, and some to find new worlds wholly beyond our prediction. The important thing is not that there are setbacks, but that we continue to sail outward toward the horizon, rather than allow our resources to rust inexorably and uselessly in port. The third element in our UN strategy is international peace-keeping. Why? Because if we do not wish to assume responsibility for containing overseas conflicts ourselves, we must look to the UN and regional organizations to do so, or accept a future ruled not by the law of nations, but by no law at all. Territorial disputes, armed ethnic conflicts, civil wars, and the total collapse of governmental authority in some states are now among the principal threats to international peace. Although many of these conflicts do not now impinge directly on our security, the cumulative effects of continuing conflict include economic dislocation, humanitarian disaster, terrorism, regional political instability, and the rise of leaders and societies that do not share our values. We are working with Congress to forge a strong bipartisan consensus on our approach to international peacekeeping. Such a consensus must be guided by realism about what the UN can and cannot be expected to do, especially in the short term. It must be durable and disciplined enough to withstand the vicissitudes of this morning’s headlines and tonight’s network news. And fourth, under no circumstances will American servicemen or -women be sent into combat in the absence of competent command and control, nor will the ultimate command authority of the President over US armed forces ever be compromised. A consensus on peace-keeping must also draw the right lessons from past successes and disappointments. The difficulties of peace operations in Somalia, Bosnia, and Haiti demonstrate that traditional approaches are not adequate where government or civil society have broken down or where one or more of the parties is not prepared to end the conflict. Major operations must be planned not only with “best-case,” but with “bad-case” and “worst-case” scenarios in mind. A clear understanding must exist not only of how an operation might begin, but also of how it can be brought to a conclusion within a reasonable period of time and at an acceptable cost.

Finally, the complexity of modern peace-keeping missions underlines the importance of being very clear about what the mission is and how the mission is to be accomplished. Certainly, the experience in Somalia underlines the importance of defining a mission clearly and of understanding the limits of what outsiders can do in the absence of an internal commitment to peace. At the same time, we should not forget that because of American and UN efforts, hundreds of thousands of Somali children are alive, crops are being planted, and prospects for political reconciliation are real. No one can guarantee what Somalia will look like a year or two from now. But it would be patronizing to assume that Somali leaders have not learned from past tragedies, or that chaos will inevitably ensue as the international presence is drawn down. Nor should we find it troubling that the fate of Somalia will be shaped primarily by Somali hands. UN peace-keeping is not the only tool, but it remains a vital one, for responding to threats to international peace and security. Certainly, such threats will continue to arise. The world will continue to look to America for leadership. It will continue to be in our interest to provide that leadership, but we cannot and should not bear the full burden alone. We, and all those who share our stake in a relatively peaceful and stable world, will benefit if the UN becomes more capable of preventing, containing, and ending international conflict. Although it is true that the UN has moved to center stage of world affairs in recent years, the reviews to date are mixed and the prospects are unclear. The UN’s commitment to genuine reform remains suspect.

Because of financial shortfalls occasioned, in part, by the United States, the UN’s logo seems sometimes less the dove of peace than the tin cup. The durability of major power cooperation at the UN cannot be taken for granted. There are inevitable limits on what an organization dependent for its mandate on the full diversity of world opinion is going to be able to do. But we would fail in our responsibility if we were to take too narrow and pricked a view of the opportunities that are now at hand. We Americans, living in an open democracy and a global economy, have a deep interest in a world where acceptable “rules of the game” are observed. For decades, we argued the merits of free markets, free elections, the nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and human rights. During the depth of the Cold War, these issues were raised even when hopes for immediate progress were not realistic.

Today, as the global era dawns, we have the chance to see real movement toward higher standards of international behavior, not overnight, but over time. International organizations, and especially the UN, can be central to this effort. A couple of weeks ago, the Secretary-General met in Japan with the family of Atsuhito Nakata, a young UN volunteer who was shot to death in Cambodia last April. There was no bitterness. On the contrary, the young man’s mother spoke of her son’s kindness, his concern for the UN. The father, who has quit his job to help raise his orphaned son, said that it is his dream that the UN volunteer himself, told the Secretary-General that “although my son’s flesh has vanished, his spirit of service has survived.” Thanks in no small measure to you—the UNA/USA—this same spirit of service is alive and well in America. It is no accident that 71% of Americans said in a recent poll that the US should cooperate fully with the United Nations. Because of your efforts, most Americans understand that the UN family is characterized less by the renowned slothful bureaucrat than by the health technician whose vaccines are saving small children; the election monitor aiding the cause of freedom; the convoy driver struggling to help the innocent survive; and the peacekeepers like Atsuhito Nakata and our own servicemen and -women who have given so many victims a chance for what President Clinton has called “the quiet miracle of a normal life.” Forty-eight years ago, another President, Harry Truman, pledged to the first General Assembly that America would: “... support the United Nation with all the resources we possess ... not as a temporary expedient, but a permanent partnership.” After decades of ups and downs, this partnership between the US and the UN continues to contribute mightily to a global system more acceptable than anything either we or it could achieve alone. The financial cost is relatively small. The entire UN system, including peace-keeping, gets 0.7% of the $285 billion the US spends annually on international security. That translates into a price per capita for us, for everything from blue helmets for peacekeepers to polio vaccines for babies, of less than $7 a year—or the price of a ticket to see “The Pelican Brief.” Those who expect the UN to solve all the world’s problems are unrealistic; those who suggest it has ever had such broad pretensions are wrong. The UN was created by men and women who had just survived the second of two devastating world wars. These were not naive people. They understood, perhaps better than we, the frailties of humankind, and the yawning gap between how we would like the world to be and how it is; between promised benefit and reality. But they also understood the perils of missed opportunities and failed responsibility.

During Senate debate on the UN Charter, Senator Arthur Vandenberg replied to those who thought the goals of the Charter unrealistic by saying that: You may tell me that I have but to scan the present world with realistic eyes in order to see these fine phrases . . . reduced to a contemporary shambles.... I reply that the nearer right you come to the eye of the storm, the greater is the need for the lesser qualities that had made it necessary. Today, under the leadership of President Clinton, America is exploring the possibilities and perils of a new world. We are developing a new framework of policy and power that will protect our territory, defend our citizens, safeguard our interests, promote our values, and project our influence. In that effort, we will embrace opportunities for multilateral collaboration without forfeiting the prerogatives of leadership. We will strive to make international institutions serve the times, rather than spend our time serving institutions. In so doing, we will seek to build a world driven not by events we deplore, but by hopes we cherish; a world not without conflict, but in which conflict is effectively contained; a world not without repression, but in which the sway of freedom is enlarged. That is our mandate as we enter this new global era. And that is the future that—with your continued help—we can bequeath with pride to our children and to theirs. [↩]

24068. Bracey, Derek; Williams, Maurice. “In Brief: Hussein Remains President”, in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), November 6, 1995, p. 2. Saddam Hussein remained head of state of Iraq after a referendum on his presidency in mid-10/1995. The overwhelming “yes” vote for Hussein reported by the government is widely seen as a reflection of Iraqis’ anger at UN-imposed sanctions on their country. "We have 11,000 children dying of malnutrition here every year. Nothing can justify this genocide," a pharmacist told the New York Times. At least 15,000 Iraqis were killed during the US-led slaughter in 1990-91. [ ]

24069. Brittain, Victoria. "Iraqi Children Suffer Drugs Shortages", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 24, 1994, p. 4. The health of children in Iraq continues to deteriorate as supplies of drugs continue to decline. Kwashiorrhkhor, rickets and malnutrition are common now; leukaemia is increasing rapidly; and cancer among children is soaring. Hospitals have no antiseptics, incubators, anesthetics, needles, antibiotics and drugs of all kinds, reports Medical Aid for Iraq. Medical aid is supposed to be exempt from the UN embargo but in practice enforcement of the embargo has closed off out-country supplies of drugs and medical supplies. Five of six hospitals in Baghdad have shortages of drugs to treat children for diabetes, asthma and epileptics. Children with cancer are receiving half doses of drugs. Sick children are often treated with tea.

24070. Brooks, Geraldine. "Albright's Role As Tough Face On Foreign Policy May Be Ticket To Become Next Secretary of State", in Wall Street Journal, October 12, 1994, p. A12. Madelaine Albright relishes her role as US enforcer in the UN, telling the Iraqi ambassador that the US was staging rocket attacks on Baghdad in response to the Iraqi role in an attempted assassination of George Bush [the US now admits that the charge was false] and in new threats of massive attacks if Iraqis cross the Kuwaiti border. She has been a consistent advocate of force in Rwanda, Somalia, Iraq and North Korea. Her harsh brand of foreign policy has made her the favored candidate for replacing Warren Christopher as Secretary of State. She also provides fierce sound-bites and has become one of the main spokesmen for the Clinton Administration, often making two-three TV appearances a day during crises. She also claims to be a feminist. She married newspaper heir Joe Albright, obtained a PhD in Russian Studies and became a professor at Georgetown University; she was in the NSC and worked with Edmund Muskie. [Albright is also closely associated with Zionist lobbying organizations, including the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, an AIPAC affiliate.]

24071. Brooks, Geraldine. "Albright's Role As Tough Face On Foreign Policy May Be Ticket To Become Next Secretary of State", in Wall Street Journal, October 12, 1994, p. A12. Madelaine Albright relishes her role as US enforcer in the UN, telling the Iraqi ambassador that the US was staging rocket attacks on Baghdad in response to the Iraqi role in an attempted assassination of George Bush [the US now admits that the charge was false] and in new threats of massive attacks if Iraqis cross the Kuwaiti border. She has been a consistent advocate of force in Rwanda, Somalia, Iraq and North Korea. Her harsh brand of foreign policy has made her the favored candidate for replacing Warren Christopher as Secretary of State. She also provides fierce sound-bites and has become one of the main spokesmen for the Clinton Administration, often making two-three TV appearances a day during crises. She also claims to be a feminist. She married newspaper heir Joe Albright, obtained a PhD in Russian Studies and became a professor at Georgetown University; she was in the NSC and worked with Edmund Muskie. [Albright is also closely associated with Zionist lobbying organizations, including the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, an AIPAC affiliate.]

24072. Carnegie, M.D. "Between East and West; There Is a Growing Feeling In Ankara That Turkey's Inflexible Pro-Western Stance Harms The Nation's Pocketbook As Much As Its Pride", in American Spectator, May 1996, pp. 36-43. Turkey has a modern sector that overlays the brutal poverty of growing numbers of drug addicted homeless children. Turkey now has 60 million people and the seventeenth largest economy in the world, but with an inflation rate above 100% per year. Turks are becoming more impoverished by the minute. Yet trade is booming: for example, while official two-way trade with Moldova is $1 million per year, unofficial estimates are $56 million. As much as two thirds of the entire economy is underground and missed in the GNP. The triumph of the Refah (Welfare) Party in national, Istanbul and Ankara elections is an example of the paradox that lies at the heart of modern Turkey. The upset stunned everyone who accepted Turkey's pro-Western, secular orientation as a given. The rise of Refah is a direct challenge to Turkey's relationship with the West. In one campaign speech, Necmettin Erbakan called for an end to 'interest, imitation, IMF slavery, Western slavery'. However, Refah has been unable to implement its agenda due to the uneasy coalition of the Ciller's True Path Party and Mesut's Motherland Party. However, Ciller's rule, predicted on being progressive because she was a woman and because she espoused privatization, failed. In particular, privatization was a complete failure. However, even as Ciller's economic policies have eroded the assets of the Turkish middle class, she built vast foreign holdings, reportedly including strip malls in New England, a mansion in Oregon, and farmland in the Midwest. The obvious corruption of the secular leaders led to the rise of the Refah, whose reputation is one of exceptional honesty. In Istanbul and Ankara, Refah has cut the municipal work forces by thousands while improving services. In Istanbul, even opponents of Refah admit that at least the garbage is collected, and the ban on burning coal has reduced the city's notorious air pollution. Refah has used computers in coordinating its electoral strategies, and has effectively mobilized women as local leaders and party spokeswomen (Refah Womens Commission).

At the same time, the business class is concluding that Turkey's excessively pro-Western stand has been a disaster; the embargo on Iraq has cost Turkey and estimated $25 billion. Turkish leaders have contempt for the policies of the Clinton Administration, although they dare not use their names fearing retaliation by the US, for example: (1) about US policy in general: "Warren Christopher is a perfect fool and everyone knows it. He commands no respect amongst his peers", (2) about US Russian policy: "Strobe Talbott is in the Moscow orbit. His world view is so focused upon them that I don't understand how you Americans could support him, or the administration he works for"; (3) about Syria: "It is really a very simple matter of diplomacy. You claim to be opposed to terrorism, yet there is Clinton pleading with Damascus. You claim to be our friends, yet you don't come speak to us. At some point, we get the idea that we are not your important allies. And then we think, maybe we shouldn't be".

Yet Turkey will probably never be acceptable as a member of Europe, since "Europeans have a difficult time seeing a Muslim nation as their equal", and the recent killing of one Jewish businessman by an 'Islamic Jihad group' makes Turkey unfit to join the 'civilized' world.

24073. Cary-Webb, Aimee. "Arts And Culture: Arab Impressions", in BBC, Jerusalem Times, November 17, 1995, p. 13. Janet Venn-Brown is a lovely woman with white hair and clear eye. She sees everything with an artist's eye, she devours light and texture, her ambrosia. Venn-Brown began her career as an artist in her native Australia where she moved from abstract and took a day to paint landscapes, as she had in New England, a mansion in Oregon, and farmland in the Midwest. The New England, a mansion in Oregon, and farmland in the Midwest. The New England, a mansion in Oregon, and farmland in the Midwest. The
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

she wants to sell as much of her work as possible. She wants Arabs to buy it as a reminder of their heritage. A heritage that is slipping away. She said, "I don't believe in making political statements, it must be more subtle than that. I only want Arabs, Palestinians in particular, to appreciate their heritage." Venn-Brown does not set herself up as the chronicler of the Arab world, but says that her paintings will some day be precious reminders of what was. Her work is an important document of disappearing architecture and landscapes, some already gone. She said of Jerusalem, "Architecturally, Jerusalem is the most beautiful city, and I am enjoying every moment in this marvelous, beautiful city." Before she left she said, "I don't mean to preach, but a heritage is being lost in the present. We know the past, but the present is disappearing, it must be preserved." [–]

24074. Casals, Rodolfo. “Baghdad Ready to Begin a New Chapter in US-Iraq Relations; No Response From Washington On Request For Talks; Iraq Not Too Optimistic About New Administration; Delegation of Iraqi Legislators Visits Cuba To Show Solidarity and Condemn the Tightening of the US Blockade”, in Granma International (Havana), February 14, 1993, p. 14. Iraqi officials do not believe that the election of Pres. Clinton will result in any change of policy. Abdel el-Hadithy, chairman of Iraqi National Assembly's Petroleum & Energy Commission noted. Hadithy led a delegation of Iraqi legislators to Cuba. Iraqi officials expressed their appreciation of the Cuban support at the UN for the end of the embargo against Iraq. Hadithy noted: 'We have invited the new administration to negotiate an agreement that will do no diminish Iraqi sovereignty and will put an end to intervention in its domestic affairs'. Hadithy noted recent US cruise missile attacks, including those on the Rashid Hotel, were foreign correspondents stay in Iraq, had eroded the coalition against Iraq. He noted that the massive and indiscriminate destruction of Iraq by the Bush Administration had merely left the US with resistance to reconstruction in Iraq, rather than any impetus towards peace. Hadithy stated that Iraq will never agree to the terms of the UN Sanction Committee (created in 8/1990 in Security Council Resolution 661 and opposed only by Cuba and Yemen). Hadithy observed: 'When we were on the brink of reaching an agreement that would have been satisfactory to the Iraqi people, pressures exerted on the commission by the United States and other Western powers thwarted its approval. This demonstrates that our differences are not with the UN but with those countries which exert pressure on the organization and manipulate its resolutions'. He noted that the no-fly zones were created for Shiites and Kurds in order to de facto partition the country. Hadithy reported that the embargo had plunged Iraq into a terrible time of privation. People have been able to survive only due to a national system of ration distribution. However, public health conditions continue to deteriorate, with the most serious health problems among infants and children. Diseases long since banished from Iraq are reappearing, including cholera and malnutrition.

The delegation also included Jaber al-Rawi, member of the National Assembly's Foreign Relations Commission, and Mohamed Ezzat, head of the Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Relations's Latin America Department. [TXT]

24075. Chomsy, Noam. “Chapter 13: The Burdens of Responsibility”, in Letters from Lexington: Reflections on Propaganda [letters to Lies of Our Times (LOOT)]. Monroe, Maine: Common Courage Press, 1993. pp. 93-100. [B/12/1991] Truth is what is said by those with power, while facts may be insignificant, especially if they contradict Truth; example: the US government is attempting to curb arms sales to the Middle East at the same time it is working to increase arms sales to the Middle East; example: from a New York times article by Patrick Tyler: Though Mr. Bush has made it plain that he will not tolerate needless suffering among Iraq's women and children, widespread disease and malnutrition have been documented in the country, but have not been addressed' (Truth is the US is trying to decrease suffering in Iraq, the fact is its policies are causing the suffering (a 5/1991 Harvard study predicted 170000 child deaths by the end of 1991)). The Bush Administration has never supported the democratic opposition in Iraq, hoping instead that another officer will overthrow Hussein so that stability will be maintained. The treatment of the Kurds in the region reflects their role as a pawn in the strategic game.

24076. Chomsy, Noam. Enter a World That Is Truly Surreal. President Clinton's Sudden Use of International Violence. Special Broadway: Open Magazine Pamphlet Series. Westfield, Mass.: Open Media, 1993. At the end of the 1982 Israeli/American attack on Lebanon, Pres. Bush stated that what was at stake was the New World Order. This war was the product of the Saddam Hussein having 'committed the first crime that mattered, disobeying orders'. On 6/26/1993, Clinton attacked Baghdad with 23 cruise missiles: 7 missiles hit residential areas, and one killed Layla al-Nora Boustany, a well known Arab artist: Defense Secretary Les Aspin noted that such civilian deaths were acceptable since the missiles do not put US pilots at risk, Clinton and Congressional supporters including Barney Frank and Joseph Moakley applauded the attack as an appropriate response to terrorism. The attack was made in response to positive proof that Iraq had tried to assassinate George Bush in Kuwait; later it was quietly admitted that there was no proof at all. While Amb. Madeleine Albright, the New York Times and the Washington Post agreed that this attack met the definition of Article 51 of the UN charter that allowed for attacks in self-defense, they justification was absurd even if the charges of Iraqi involvement in the assassination attempt were true, which they were not. The Boston Globe and Christian Science Monitor even noted that the attack was actually proof of US respect for international law. However, by any normal standard of international law the attack on Baghdad was criminal act that should be punished. The attack did raise Clinton's standing in the polls; as TV correspondent Charles Glass noted, Clinton has long used violent acts to bolster his political standing: Layla al-Attar in 1993, and mentally retarded Black man Rickey Ray Rector, whose execution in 1992 boosted Clinton's presidential bid. Clinton's advisors have gauged the deep disillusionment of the US electorate and decided that since addressing the genuine sources of their alienation is not a priority (since such moves would offend key constituencies: 'it does not matter much if public education and health deteriorate, the useless population rots in slums and prisons and the basis for a livable society erodes for the public at large'), that the principle purpose of state power is to divert and frighten potential domestic opposition. Cold War propaganda about imminent threats to America served this purpose for a while. Now, the political advantages of good photo-ops dictate which interventions will be made: Somalia is selected after the peak of the famine because no meaningful resistance is possible, while Bosnia is ignored since there might be real fighting. So US troops can use massive force in Bosnia where there is no real opposition, but rules of engagement in Bosnia are carefully drawn so as to not bother the Serbs as they exterminate the Muslims. 'Terrible atrocities' in haiti are simply irrelevant. The principle new enemy is 'Islamic fundamentalism', which is seen replacing the Soviet Menace as a tool with which to manipulate the American people. Oddly, the Saudi Arabia is the most extreme Islamic fundamentalist state, and the US ally Gulbuddin Hekmayt in Afghanistan (who received $3.5 billion in US aid), are the most extreme Islamic fundamentalists in the world. Accordingly, the open goal of the US-backed 1982 invasion of Lebanon was to destroy the PLO, which is the most progressive voice of Arab secularism; predictably, the most far reaching impact of that invasion was the emergence of the fundamentalist Hezbollah. Israel even supported fundamentalist Hamas in the Occupied Territories in its struggle against the PLO, dropping support only when Hamas emerged as a threat to Israeli security. As is normal in the American press, the discussion of the attack on Baghdad (in New York Times, Washington Post, and by William Safire) sees in the US attack 'an act of war' by Iraq, when in fact the US attack was unprovoked; Safire also argues that the US would have had a basis for attacking Cuba if it were proved that Cuba assassinated Kennedy, when in fact the Kennedy Administration repeatedly tried to assassinate Castro. Similarly, Thomas Friedman of the New York Times would argue that the US raid on Libya under Reagan, an assassination attempt in which Qaddafi's baby daughter was killed, was good precedent for attacks on Iraq; Friedman simply ignores that the US justification for the attack (an alleged Libyan role in obliterating of a discotheque in Berlin) was simply a lie. Such corruption of the intellectual community is of course necessary if the unprecedented series of assassinations of foreign leaders by the US in this century is to be ignored by the press.

US policy is to use the Kurds of northern Iraq to weaken the Baghdad government, and often publicizes the brutality of the Iraqi government against the Kurds, but has included Kurds of Iraq in the illegal embargo against Iraq as a whole and provides only a fraction of the aid needed to assist the Kurds who have become impoverished in their new role of a buffer zone against Baghdad. This is one instance of the US use of economic warfare worldwide (which has included Cuba, Nicaragua and Vietnam): as in Iraq, it leaves the central government intact while savaging the population (in Iraq, killing 46,000 children in 1-8-1991). Clinton's 'first triumphant display of his manhood and character' was the random butchering of unarmed civilians in Baghdad. Clinton operates in a political climate in which international law is a fraud and there is an 'intellectual culture that recognizes few limits in its services to power'.

'The New World Order is 'new' only in that it adapts traditional policies of domination and exploitation to somewhat changed contingencies; it is much admired by the West because it is recognized to be nothing more than yet another device 'to enslave the countries and people of the world'...’ [TXT]

24077. Churchill, Ward; Means, Russell. "Circumcized Nazis: Israeli Aggression in the Middle East", in Rebel, February 27, 1984. The special relationship between the US and Israel has created a myth that Israel has some 'unique moral character' and a 'purity' of military force. So the US government and its media market Israeli war as 'peace', Israeli terrorism as 'justice', and the mass dispossession and forced relocation of the Palestinian people as 'a just settlement of the Middle East crisis'. Zionist leadership has long been interested in vast expansion beyond the territory of Palestine now held as Israel: open proclamations of the goal to annex southern Lebanon, parts of Syria, Gaza and all of Jordan have been frequent. David Ben-Gurion has stated: 'The acceptance of partition does not commit us to renounce Transjordan...We shall accept a state with fixed boundaries toady, but the boundaries of Zionist aspirations are the concern of the Jewish people and no external factor can limit them'. In 1948, Menachem Begin proclaimed: 'The partition of the Homeland is illegal. It will never be recognized. The signature of institutions or individuals of the partition agreement is invalid. It will not bind the Jewish people. Eretz Israel [the land of Israel] will be restored to the people of Israel. All of it. And forever.' In 5/1948, Ben0Gurion noted: ‘...we should prepare to go over to the offensive with the aim of smashing Lebanon, Transjordan and Syria...The weak point of the Arab coalition is Lebanon [for] the Muslim regime is artificial and easy to undermine. A Christian state should be established, with its southern border along the Litani River. We will make an alliance with it.' This systematic policy of military expansion has led Israel to reject peace will all Arab states around it: Israel has territorial ambitions against each of them. Israelis continue to believe that they are fighting a genocidal holy war, with a Gush Emunim rabbi stating: ‘...It is a mitzvah [religious duty] to destroy Amalek [non-Jews], including women and children’. As Rafael Eitan, Chief of Staff of the IDF stated: 'What must be destroyed--we will destroy. Whoever must be imprisoned--we will imprison'. Mainstream Rabbi menachem Barash observes: ‘There is no place in this land of the People of Israel and other nations alongside it. The practical meaning of [this commandment to] possess the land is the expulsion of the people who live in it...[ours] is a holy war, commanded in the Bible...You shall destroy them, you shall enter into no covenant with them, you shall not pity them, you shall not intermarry with them...’

This call for genocidal warfare against non-Jews is stated clearly by Yedida Segal, in the Israeli Journal Nekuda: 'Those among us who call for a humanistic attitude towards our neighbors are reading the Halacha [religious law] selectively and avoiding the specific commandments...in a divinely commanded war [milhemet mitzvah] one must destroy, kill and eliminate men, women and children...The ethical principles do not change...there is no place for 'humanistic' considerations:' This unity of clergy, military and political leadership has sustained an intense race hatred for the Palestinians: as David Ben-Gurion (in his Independence War Diary) notes: 'The question is only time and place. Blowing up a house is not enough. What is necessary is cruel and strong reactions. We need precision in time, place and casualties...[We must] strike mercilessly, women and children included. Otherwise the reaction is insufficient. At the place of action, there is no need to distinguish between guilty and innocent.' So, the 1967 war was an aggressive war fought by Israel to break out of the possibility of a peace agreement with Egypt. Sadat had offered Israel peace and secure borders in return for an end to Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon and for human rights guarantees for Palestinians: this offer, first made in 1971, was rejected by Israel. Similarly, the PLO offer in 1975-1976 of recognition of Israel in return for Israeli recognition of Palestinians was rejected by Israel. By 1979, even Iraq and Libya made clear their willingness to make peace with Israel: but Israel rejected their peace initiatives. The refusal of Israel to accept peace talks is a product merely of Israeli desires for territorial expansion.

The systematic nature of Zionist terrorism has also been long ignored. The Irgun in the 1930s conducted a systematic campaign of bombing Arab marketplaces, and in 1938 killed 52 Palestinians in 'retaliation' for the arrest of one Jew. While supporters of Israel term the Deir Yassin massacre an aberration, in Israel the massacre was celebrated, with a mass celebration at the site of the mass graves one year later by happy Israelis. Israelis staged the first airliner hijacking in 1954 (to gain hostages to exchange for Israeli POWs), and staged the 1967 attack on the USS Liberty. Similarly, the Israelis directed the massacre of 200 Muslim hostages on 12/6/1975 in Lebanon by the Phalange; assisted with Israeli bulldozers the razing of the Muslim Karantina slum in 1975; and directed the massacre at the Tel al-Zaatar Refugee Camp in 1975. Israeli long secretly equipped and financed the Phalange forces of Bashir Gemayel and George Haddad: only Israeli military aid enabled this fascist group to emerge as a power in Lebanon. So, the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon was a transparent attempt to impose an Israeli-controlled puppet government on Lebanon. The character of the invasion was made clear when the US vetoed a UN ceasefire resolution for Lebanon on the grounds that the resolution was 'a transparent effort to preserve the PLO as a viable political force' just as Israeli forces were trying to exterminate Palestinian resistance.

Such allusions to Nazi Germany are not a rhetorical device, but are rather a precise nature of the Israeli regime. Nazism and Zionism are mirror images: each embracing military expansion of the master race, expanding by extermination of indigenous peoples. Zionists refer to non-Jews as 'dogs' exactly as Rosenberg termed non-Aryans 'swine'; and the director general of the Israel Broadcasting Authority openly notes the 'genetic racial inferiority' of South African Blacks. The Zionist argument that the Holocaust gives them special rights is belied by the establishment of Israel. However, it is reasonable to expect that the US will continue to support Zionist genocide against Palestinians in the same manner that the US practiced genocide against the indigenous peoples of North America (some call the American Indians the 'Palestinians of America'). Nevertheless, 'the Nazis—whether they be Jewish, German or American—have had their day, their time, Today, one way or another, that time is running out.' [Ward Churchill is a Creek-Indian artist who teaches at the University of Colorado (Boulder); Russell Means is an Oglala Lakota (Sioux) and a leader of the American Indian movement. He is also a contributing editor of The Rebel.]

Dear Ambassador:

The fourth anniversary of the unleashing of 110,000 aerial sorties which assailed Iraq with 88,000 tons of explosives by US aircraft alone, and the first Security Council review of sanctions during 1995 will occur in the next week. The combined effect of the military assault of the sanctions constitutes the deadliest and cruellest violation of human rights in the name of the United Nations since its creation. It is a crime against humanity.

UNICEF estimated in 12/1994 that 500,000 children under five years of age have died in Iraq since sanctions were imposed by the Security Council in 8/1990. It warned that an additional 1.5 million children "could die if sanctions continue." An article from New York Newsday for 12/18/1994, reports the story. Several million children bear permanent personal injuries as a result of the sanctions. The elderly, chronically ill and emergency medical cases have suffered higher increases in death rates and the general population feels the impact of sanctions physically and psychologically every day, all day.

Conditions in Iraq are worsening with consequent increases in death and permanent injury rates. The British Red Cross last month described conditions in Iraq as horrific and rapidly deteriorating, adding, "We cannot be silent in the face of such a tragedy."

A German study group has graphically demonstrated the staggering increases in deaths in Iraq. Using only selected major causes of death, they report the average death rates between 1989 and 1994 of children under five increased over 6.5 times, and death rates for persons over five years of age increased over 3.5 times.

Water and sanitation conditions in Iraq were described by a UNICEF report Children, War and Sanctions, in 4/1993 as being in a "crisis condition." By late 1994 Kalinda Seneviratne of the University of Technology in Sidney, Australia reported: "UNICEF spent some US$70 million last year in assisting Iraq to overcome the effects of the embargo on its child population. According to UNICEF's resident representative in Baghdad, Thomas Ekvall, one of the problems which is never heard about from either the media or the government, is the situation with drinking water."

I'm just back from Basrah (southern Iraq) where health authorities have taken 400 water samples for analysis and they have found 90% of it to be contaminated, Ekvall says. "This situation could have catastrophic effect on the well-being of the population."

Ekvall says that though there was some damage caused to the water system by US bombing, the major problem now is with spare parts and special chemicals needed to operate the plants, which are very sophisticated ones imported and installed in the 1970s and 1980s. UNICEF has been importing spare parts and chemicals for these plants, but Ekvall admits that the UN embargo causes problems because every import has to be approved by the UN sanctions committee."

Secretary General Boutros Ghali has called sanctions a "blunt instrument" stating, "They raise the ethical question of whether suffering inflicted on vulnerable groups in the target country is a legitimate means of exerting pressure on political leaders whose behavior is unlikely to be affected by the plight of their subjects."

The Secretary General is too diplomatic. Sanctions which kill infants, children, the elderly and the chronically ill are a crime against humanity. They are weapons for the destruction of the masses. Those at the UN who sponsor, condone, or perpetuate such sanctions are guilty of complicity.

The Security Council must end the sanctions against Iraq immediately.

Sincerely, Ramsey Clark.

Women of the International Forum of Arab Women for Peace in Tunisia was an occasion for feminists in the Maghreb (Arab North Africa), and others as well, to find themselves, to search for an identity beyond the one represented by the banner of Saddam Hussein.

When a group of journalists from the Maghreb convened in Tunisia last 9/1990 to discuss the state of the Arab women's press, what came out of the meeting was apparent: from Morocco to Mauritania, to Algeria, Tunisia, and over all of the Maghreb, the end of the 1980s coincided with the closing of many experiments in "women's journalism" born in the 1970s: magazines, journals, black and white "zines," written in Arabic only or bilingual (in Francophone North Africa), which spanned the full range of Arab feminism to represent all points of view.

"What a waste," commented Dorra Bouzid, former director of the Tunisian magazine Faiza, listing those magazines now extinct: Faiza, perhaps the pioneer among Arab and Maghreb women's magazines, closed early in the 1970s; then Nissa, a monthly from the Tunisian feminist collective, Tahar Haddad, was suspended in 1985; then the Moroccan Kalima, March 8 (magazine in Arabic from the Democratic Women's Movement) and Nissa El Maghrib (bilingual monthly from the Democratic Women's Association) were both suspended between 1988 and 1989.

"What a waste," repeated Dorra, lightly unfolding the pages of the final issue of Faiza. Thousands of copies previously had passed through all the important Arab and Afro-Arab cities. As she points out the hottest issues covered in the magazine (virginity, relations between the sexes, marriage, love, friendship, prostitution), I can identify in the yellowed photographs time different from the feminist world that currently surrounds me. We are presently in Tunisia, in the hall of the Congressional Palace where the International Forum of Arab Women for Peace, organized by the Tunisian Women's Union and the Collective of organizations in the Arab Women's Union is unfolding with the theme "Peace with Dignity."

The conference is being held during the Gulf War: 2/17-18/1991. Inside the Congressional Palace, along the walls of the auditorium, the work of the Women's Forum is unfurled, little doves made of blue paper fluttering among manifestos, children's drawings of peace and video images of Iraq that cause murmurs and discussion: bodies mangled by the force of the bombing, mutilated children, the weeping and swearing of women.

In the room Arab feminists have assembled in Tunisia for the first time, women from official positions and independent feminists, young and old, mothers, children, in chador, in stiletto heels and nicely made-up, Algerians, Tunisians, Libanese, Iraqis, Yemenis, Egyptians, while the Mauritanians are recognizable by light and colorful veils and the Palestinians by their national scarves about the neck. I observe the continuous movement typical of any convention, searching for the common denominator in the mosaic of differences. In weaving together these "calling cards" I form a first image: "lay" feminism in the Maghreb (articulated in groups, small circles and individually, equally distributed along all political fronts), Two names: Fatima Alau, president of the Maghreb Development Forum and Meziha Nefoud, president of the Tunisian Women's Union (40000 members); Egyptian, Iraqi or Palestinian feminism which is both part of and articulated through the politics of their respective states, "authenticist" feminism that, especially in the Maghreb, expressed a need for a cultural identity and finds; "at the end of the tunnel, the breeze of Islam as it was in the beginning." War and peace, neutrality or intervention cut across the differences. Among the blue doves of peace and images of death, also the consensus and dissent that accompany the speeches from the floor are part of the complex mosaic; who is it that applauds, who instead mutters with that thready sound usually reserved for births, marriages and funerals. The speeches occur with a concise rhythm ("we are for life," shouts the representative..." of the Women of the Earth Association, a Maghreb collective living in France; “In the name of Lebanese women, enough destruction of the Arab world. We have seen too many ruins,” says the representative of Lebanese women, in turn, while the Algerians toss out names of the Arab Nation, “the only one that matters.” A showcase of humor and emotion, the Forum swings like a pendulum, sometimes all too eager, then permitting space and visibility. “This war has united us,” explains Samaja, 54, a law and an independent feminist, “but it makes me more aware of the conditions for speaking subject to old prejudices and the eternal inferiority complex of the Arab world. So, women’s attentions are sidetracked defending cultural identity, enclosed in the North/South opposition, participating in the popular emotion of the Arab nation and leaving in the background what is relevant to feminine identity and liberation. When the war ends, we will have to account for all of this.” Tamara Accroui, speaking of liberty and solidarity from the Iraqi women’s podium, received an ovation from the congress. Liberty, magic word. But what is liberty, I ask shortly afterwards, under an Iraqi dictator? Tamara said shortly, “Saddam Hussein is our president. Already in 1977, Iraqi women had achieved salaries comparable to those of men. Today, 38% of the working population is made up of women in every sector, guaranteed by legislation.”

“Take a look at the emirates,” concurs Delonda Jaziri from Tunis, “those absolute monarchies that the West considers champions of good faith and even good government. I assure you that within the Arab world they are medieval; there the daily life of women is like a blindfold covering their eyes: one long dark night.”

Delonda is 35, a teacher and has three children. While she accompanies me past the stands set up by women at the Forum, her voice is frantic and tired at the same time. She speaks of national liberation, citing Garibaldi and our war of independence, developing parallels with astonishing knowledge. “After all,” she says, “the emancipation of women is tied to social accomplishment. The Tunisian woman in her 50s is more liberated than one in her 20s because she has breathed the enthusiasm of the end of colonialism and the birth of a new society. The young’ are without a point of reference, overwhelmed by the present, closed to the traditions that give a sense of certainty in membership. In the large. Tunisian cities, many young people are turning to the chador and raising it up as a banner of progress in the streets and at work. This gives them a sense of the future because it answers their need for an identity.”

Delonda is a cyclone of references, but I linger over the key word, progress. What is progress for Arab women, in the Arab world? Wasisila Tampali is an Algerian lawyer. Her speech to the Forum called for unity among women in order to express the real power of women, “But,” she told me shortly afterwards, “the heart of our problem is contained in the word ‘modernization’, which should not be confused with economic development. Arab society does not identify modernity with technological development. Added to this is Islam, to which few in the West assign democratic values because the West has made the ideal of social justice its own property since the French Revolution; another thing is authenticism. It finds roots in the rejection of irritating technology and it nurtures the same social anxieties that provoked the failure of so many modernization policies in the Arab states since the colonial period. While authenticism is not a return to the old obscurantism, it is a modern phenomenon within Islam. Women live within it and they go beyond it, as happens with every historical conflict. But we have a chain on our feet in comparison with those in the West: you fought within an idea of legality that has the foundation of your state ethics for almost 200 years, we are setting out still deprived of all of that. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30] [c]

24080. DS. "Iran: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Credible reports indicate that security forces continue to torture detainees and prisoners. Common methods include suspension for long periods in cable or bars, cigarettes, and more severe torture. The Special Rapporteur noted that he had witnessed guards torture children in the presence of their parents. In September the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) issued a report on unresolved humanitarian issues from the Iran-Iraq war. The ICRC noted that the Government violated the Third Geneva Convention by failing to identify combatants killed in action and exchange information on those killed or missing. According to the report, the fate of almost 19000 Iraqi prisoners of war (POWs) in Iran "remained unknown." The report criticized the government for obstructing ICRC efforts to register and repatriate POWs. [1]
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Iraq is a party. The UN General Assembly likewise condemned what it termed mutilations in a December resolution. Certain prisons are notorious for routinemistreatment of prisoners. Al-Rashidiya Prison, on the Tigris River north of Taji reportedly contains torture chambers in its basement. The Al-Shamma’iya Prison, located in east Baghdad, holds the mentally ill and is reportedly the site of both torture and disappearances. The Al-Rawaniyah Prison, located near Baghdad and reportedly the site of torture and arbitrary killings, including mass execution by firing squad. This prison was the principal detention center for persons arrested following the civil uprisings of 1991. Many people taken into custody in connection with the uprisings have not been seen since. Middle East Watch estimated in 1994 that the Al-Rawaniyah Prison holds between 6000-10 000 detainees. The Special Rapporteur, Middle East Watch, and Al cited the Al-Rawaniyah Prison and the Abu Ghraib Prison, located in Baghdad, as principal sites where torture and disappearances continue to occur. According to opposition reports, in late 1994 authorities at the Abu Ghraib Prison amputated the hands of persons convicted of theft. The security forces allegedly raped captured civilians during the Anfal Campaign and the occupation of Kuwait and the Gulf War. The Special Rapporteur noted in his February report that he had interviewed numerous women who continue to suffer severe depression after they were raped in official custody. The Government has never acknowledged or taken any action to investigate reports of rape by its officials. Kurdistan authorities in northern Iraq also employed torture. Al reported in 1994 that these authorities and Kurdish opposition groups used torture on political opponents and criminal suspects in 1993. [6]

24083. DS. “Iraq: Respect for Human Rights; Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial”, In Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5208(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There are two parallel judicial systems: the regular courts, which try common criminal offenses; and special security courts, which try cases involving national security. However, the security courts try many criminal cases. The President may override any court decision. There are no checks on his power. The Special Rapporteur noted in his February report that the executive interferes regularly in all aspects of normal judicial competence in matters ranging from property and commercial law, to family law and criminal law.” The procedural rules applicable in the regular courts theoretically provide many basic protections. However, the regime often assigns to the security courts cases which, on their merits, would appear to fall under the jurisdiction of the regular courts. Trials in the regular courts are public, and defendants are entitled to counsel government expense in the case of indigents. Defense lawyers have the right to review the charges and evidence brought against their clients. There is no jury system, panels of three judges try cases. Defendants have the right to appeal to the Court of Appeal and then to the Court of Cassation, the highest Court. The Special Rapporteur reported that the regular courts often assign penalties that are “disproportionate” to the offense (see Section 1.c.). Decree 13 of 1992 imposes the death penalty for automobile theft. In 1994 the Government announced the death penalty would be invoked for automobile smuggling, various categories of theft, and solicitation for the purposes of prostitution. As of late 1994, the penalty for possession of stolen goods was life in prison. Similarly, the Government shields certain groups from prosecution for alleged crimes. A 1992 decree grants immunity from prosecution to members of the Ba’ath Party and the security forces who may cause death while in the pursuit of army deserters. A 1990 decree grants immunity to men who kill their mothers, daughters and other female family members who have committed “immoral deeds”. There are no Shari’a, or Islamic law, courts as such. Regular courts are empowered to administer Islamic law in cases involving personal status, such as divorce and inheritance. In 1994 the regime introduced Shari’a punishments for some lapses of criminal offenses and for military desertion (see Section I.b.). Special security courts have jurisdiction in all cases involving espionage and treason, peaceful political dissent, smuggling, currency exchange violations, and drug trafficking. According to the Special Rapporteur military officers or civil servants with no legal training head these tribunals which hear cases in secret. Authorities often refuse to allow defendants in incommunicado detention and do not permit them to have contact with their lawyers. The courts admit confessions extracted by torture which often serve as the basis for conviction. Although defendants may appeal their sentences to Saddam Hussein, many cases appear to end in summary execution shortly after trial. Because the Government rarely acknowledges arrests or imprisonments, it is difficult to estimate the number of political prisoners. Many of the tens of thousands of persons who have disappeared or been killed in recent years were originally held as political prisoners. [6]
Security forces reportedly detained 15 youths and transported them from the area. Simultaneously, the military caused destruction and arrested inhabitants in Al-Haaahiya, Al-Wasidiya, and Al-Malha. In September opposition sources reported that military forces used incendiary bombs and launched an armored attack against the area of Al-Seigel in the Amarah marshes. The army later set fire to the entire area. In 1994 military operations caused an unconfirmed number of civilian casualties in the region. More than 1000 refugees from the marshes fled to Iran where they joined between 50000-60000 who had fled in previous years. In January the European Parliament (EP) passed a resolution characterizinthe marsh Arabs as a persecuted minority whose very survival is threatened by the Iraqi Government. The EP resolution described the Government’s treatment of the Marsh inhabitants as "genocide." According to Middle East Watch and US. Government researchers, government files captured by Kurdish rebels in 1991 contain a military plan for the destruction of the marshes and the people living there. The plan appears to have been approved at the highest levels of the Government. It is being implemented by Minister of Defense Ali Hassan Al-Majid, the military leader who supervised the Anfal Campaign.

The Special Rapporteur continues to note the similarity between the Government's "genocide-type operations" against the Kurds and its operations in southern Iraq. He stated in his February report that the extent of violations against the marsh inhabitants places the survival of this indigenous population in jeopardy. In August the Special Rapporteur dispatched two of his assistants to the Iran-Iraq border to interview refugees fleeing the marshes. He reported in October that the refugees are generally in poor physical and psychological condition, having suffered severe deprivation of food and medicine. He reiterated his concern over the survival of the marsh inhabitants "as a community." Regarding the Kurds, the Special Rapporteur reported in February that he also holds the Government responsible for "serious breaches" of the 1925 Geneva Protocol on the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare. He observed that these breaches may demonstrate the Government liable under the 1948 Genocide Convention. According to the Special Rapporteur, the activities of the Government during the Anfal Campaign left virtually no Iraqi Kurd untouched. He concluded that "serious violations of human rights committed against the civilian population of Iraq both in times of peace and war involve crimes against humanity committed under and pursuant to the commands of Saddam Hussein and Ali Hassan Al-Majid." The Special Rapporteur reported that he continued to receive accounts of mass graves in southern Iraq. Observers believe these graves contain the remains of persons killed following the civil uprising of March 1991. As the Government does not permit international visitors into these areas, forensic experts have not yet investigated the grave sites. However, forensic experts continued to developinformationobtained from mass grave sites in northern Iraq. These graves contain the remains of hundreds of persons presumed killed in the Anfal Campaign. According to opposition sources, a new mass grave, containing up to 250 bodies, was found in April near the Al-Sharqat district of Mosul. Sources said that the graves were discovered when heavy rains washed away the covering soil. Based on forensic evidence and government documents seized by the Kurds in 1991, Middle East Watch and Physicians for Human Rights estimate that between 70000-100000 Kurds were killed, and up to 4000 villages destroyed, during the Anfal Campaign. The evidence suggests that government efforts to eliminate Kurdish communities were widespread, systematically planned, and ruthlessly implemented.

The most flagrant example of current discrimination against the Kurds is the Government's ongoing internal embargo on the north, which includes necessities such as food, medicine, and other humanitarian supplies. Since 8/1993, the embargo also has included massive electric power cut-offs in specific areas cause the spoilage of medicines, breakdowns in local water-purification systems and the loss of certain hospital services. A disaster was averted only by the prompt action of the United Nations and donor governments, who imported and installed temporary generators to alleviate the crisis. Additional electricity cut-offs were imposed in 8/1994. The embargo of the north has impacted not only Kurds but various other minorities such as Turcomans, who also live in the area. Operation Provide Comfort—the joint US., British, French, and Turkish command—continued in 1994 to inhibit government aerial attacks in the northern "no fly zone." However, the military forces continued intermittent, sometimes heavy shelling of northern villages by long-range artillery. On October 26, opposition media reported that shelling of villages in the Shawan region had resulted in several civilian casualties in that same region. The military maneuver continued throughout 1994. Two persons were killed in an execution-style shooting (see Section 1 a.). Several other international workers involved in the relief effort, including six United Nations guards, were injured in bombing and shooting attacks in March and April. On March 27, Iraqi security forces permitted a crowd in Mosul to attack and damage a UN helicopter attempting to airdrop wounded guards to safety. Two Swedish journalists were injured in Aqrah on March 14 when a bomb exploded under their automobile.

Some terrorist incidents pointed to government involvement, but there was insufficient information to determine the responsibility for other attack. Innocent civilians were the victims of fighting between the guerrilla forces of the two main Kurdish political parties—the Kurdish Democratic Party (KDP) and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK). Heavy fighting between the two parties broke out in May, in August, and again in December, producing several hundred civilian casualties. In 1994 civilians near the Turkish border were caught in raids by Turkish military forces on suspected hideouts of the extremist Kurdistan Workers’ Party (PKK). On August 8, Turkish planes bombed a camp near Zakho containing 10000 Kurdish refugees from Turkey. Although the refugees suffered no casualties, 10 Iraqi guards were reported killed and 7 wounded. The Turkish Government claimed that PKK terrorists were hiding in the camps. On August 23, Turkish planes attacking a PKK camp in Zele bombed the nearby village of Bidewan village, wounding 7 Iraqi Kurdish civilians. On September 8 Turkish planes again bombed the large concentration of Turkish refugees near Zakho. No injuries were reported, but several tents were destroyed. Kurdish villages along the Iranian border were subjected to shelling by the Iranian military, as well as sporadic Iranian military incursions into Iraqi territory. Opposition media reported that Iranian artillery shelled civilian areas in As Sujeymaniyah province the night of April 17-18. Iranian forces were also reportedly involved in fighting between the two main Iraqi Kurdish parties in August and December. The Iranian military conducted attacks on Iranian opposition camps based in Iraq. On November 6, it launched a SCUD missile attack on a Mojahedin E-Khalq base located some 30 miles north of Baghdad. On November 9, Iranian jets bombed an Iranian Kurdish Democratic Party base in the town of Koi-Sarauq in northern Iraq. Land mines in northern Iraq continued to kill or maim civilians. Many of the mines were laid during the Iraq-Iraq War, but the army has failed to clear them. The mines appear to have been haphazardly planted in civilian areas. The Special Rapporteur as repeatedly reminded the Government of its obligations under the Land Mines Protocol, to which Iraq is a party, to protect civilians from the effects of mines. Based on interviews with victims and eyewitnesses, the US Government has concluded that the Iraqi regime engaged in war crimes—willful killing, torture, rape pillage, hostage-taking, unlawful deportation, and related acts—directly related to the Gulf War. The US. Government urged the UN Security Council to create an international commission to study evidence of a broader range of war crimes, a well as crimes against humanity and possible genocide. At the end of 1994, Middle East Watch was preparing a charge of genocide that it hopes governments will bring against the Government of Iraq before the International court of Justice in the Hague. Middle East Watch reported that its case was based on a thorough review of evidence obtained from mass graves, government documents, and interviews with eyewitnesses. [=] International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government controls movement within the country of citizens and foreigners. Persons who enter sensitive border areas and numerous designated security zones are subject to arrest (see Section I.d.). Police checkpoints are common on major roads and highways. The Government requires citizens who obtain expensive exit visas for foreign travel. Citizens may not make more than two trips abroad annually. The Government reportedly prohibits some citizens from all international travel. Before traveling abroad, citizens are required to post collateral with the Government which is refundable only upon their return to Iraq. There are restrictions on the amount of currency that may be taken out of the country. Women are not permitted to travel outside Iraq alone; male relatives must escort them. The Government continued to pursue its discriminatory retributive policies, including demolition of villages and forced relocations of Kurds, Turcomans, and other minorities. Middle East Watch reported that the Government was continuing to force Kurdish residents of Mosul to move to Kurdish controlled areas in the north. However, the Government directed most of its resettlement efforts in 1994 at residents of the southern marshes. According to the Special Rapporteur, security forces relocate marsh inhabitants obtained during the course of military operations to the main southern cities. They were later transferred to detention centers and prisons in central Iraq, primarily in Baghdad. Opposition sources reported in September that the Government had relocated more than 300 families from the marshes to a detention area in Diwaniya province. The authorities reportedly returned other families who had taken refuge in Baghdad to the province of Amara. Large numbers of Shi’a refugees from southern Iraq fled to Iran, particularly after the escalation in military activity in March. It was difficult to estimate the number of persons displaced by these operations, due to the lack of international monitors in the area. However, in late 1994 the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimated that more than 10000 refugees from the marshes were in camps in Iran. Amal Appeal, a charitable organization operating several of the camps, placed the number at more than 35000. US. Government analysts estimated in September that more than 200000 of the 250000 former inhabitants of the marshes had been driven from the area since 1991 (see also Section 1.a.).

In 1994, the Special Rapporteur noted that the Government in 1993 had expelled several Faili, or Shi’a, Kurdish families. Faili Kurds, who have traditionally lived in the mountainous region bordering Iran, were the victims of mass deportations in the 1970'8 and 1980'. The Special Rapporteur reported that in recent years the Government may have expelled a total of more than 1 million persons suspected of being “Persian sympathizers.” According to the Special Rapporteur, about 500000 of these displaced persons are believed to live in Iran. According to the UNHCR, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees remained abroad—mainly in Iran, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Syria, Turkey, Pakistan, and Jordan. Apart from those suspected of sympathizing with Iran, most fled after the Government’s suppression of the civil uprising of 1991: others are Kurds who fled the Anfal Campaign of 1988. The UNHCR assists many refugees, notably in Kuwait, Syria, and Turkey. Of the 1.5 million refugees who fled following the 1991 uprising, the great majority, particularly Kurds, have repatriated themselves to northern Iraq in areas where the allies have prohibited overflights by Iraqi aircraft. Several hundred thousand Kurds remain unsettled in northern Iraq because political circumstances do not permit them to return to their former homes in Government-controlled territory. Moreover northern Iraq is host to about 10000 recently arrived Turkish Kurds who have fled civil strife in southeastern Turkey (see the report on Turkey), in response to the Turkish government’s counterinsurgency campaign against the PKK. The UNHCR is treating these displaced persons as refugees unless they reach an official determination on their status. In late 1994, the UNHCR relocated the Turkish Kurd to protect them from periodic raids by Turkish military aircraft (see Section dents abroad who refuse to return are required to reimburse any expenses paid by the Government. Each student wishing to travel abroad must provide a guarantor. The guarantor and the student's parents may be liable if the student fails to return. Foreign spouses of citizens who have resided in Iraq for 5 years are required to apply for nationality. The requirement is 1 year of residence for the spouses of Iraqi citizens employed in government offices. Many foreigners thus have been obliged to accept citizenship and are subject to official travel restrictions. The penalties for noncompliance include 1088 of job, a substantial financial penalty, and repayment for any governmental educational expenses. The Government prevents many citizens who also hold citizenship in another country—especially the children of Iraqi fathers and foreign-born mothers from visiting the country of their other nationality. [=]

24085. DS. “Iraq: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. No information is available on whether the Government has enacted specific legislation to promote the welfare of children. However, the Special Rapporteur and several human rights groups have collected a substantial body of evidence pointing to the Government's continuing disregard for the rights and welfare of children. The Government failure to comply with relevant UN Security Council resolutions has led to a continuation of economic sanctions. As a result, general economic and health conditions throughout Iraq have deteriorated dramatically. Children have been particularly susceptible to the decline in the standard of living, increases in child mortality and disease rates have been reported. The Special Rapporteur has observed that, under these circumstances, the Government has special obligations to ensure that the most vulnerable groups in the population have adequate food and health care. The Special Rapporteur stated in his February report that Iraq's refusal to implement UN. Security Council Resolutions 706 and 712, which would permit a one-time sale of oil in order to finance the import of humanitarian goods, has had an adverse effect on vulnerable populations including children. In October the Special Rapporteur reported that “the obvious imbalance between military expenditure and resources allocated to the fields of health care and education clearly illustrates the priorities of the Government.” The Special Rapporteur has repeatedly observed that the ongoing bombardment of civilian settlement in the southern marshes has resulted in the deaths of many innocent persons, including women, children, and the elderly. [=]

24086. DS. “Iraq: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government claims that it is committed to equality for women, who make up about 20% of the work force. It has enacted laws to protect women from exploitation in the workplace and from sexual harassment: to permit women to join the regular army, Popular Army, and police forces, to require education for female children; and to equalize women's rights in divorce law ownership, taxation surcharge, and election to the National Assembly. It is difficult to determine to what extent these protections are afforded in practice. Reports indicate, however that the application of these laws has declined as Iraq’s political and economic crisis persists. Familial violence against women, such as wife beating and rape is known to occur, but little is known about its extent. Such abuse is customarily addressed within the tightly knit family structure. There is no public discussion of the subject and the Government issues no statistics. Spousal violence constitutes grounds for divorce and criminal charges, but suits brought on these charges are believed to be rare. The Special Rapporteur has commented on the high incidence of rape committed by the armed forces and security services (see Section 1.b.). He noted that an unusually high percentage of the northern population is female, due to the disappearances of tens of thousands of Kurdish men in the Anfal Campaign. The Special Rapporteur has reported that the widows, daughters, and mothers of Anfal victims are typically dependent on their relatives because they may not inherit the property or assets of their missing family members. Other report suggests that economic destitution has forced many women into prostitution. Evidence concerning the Anfal Campaign of 1988 indicates that the Government killed many women and children, including infants, by firing squads and in chemical attacks. [*]

24087. DS. "Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The judicial system is composed of the regular courts, which try criminal and civil cases, the State Security Court, which tries cases of a security nature, and the Court of Cassation, which is the highest level of judicial appeal. During periods of martial law, the Amir may authorize military courts to try civilian defendants. There have been no martial-law trials since 1991. Sunni and Shi'a Muslims have recourse to courts of their respective denominations for family-law cases. The Constitution states that judges shall not be subject to any authority. Nonetheless, the Ministry of Justice controls the judiciary's administrative and financial matters. The Amir appoints all judges on recommendations from the Minister of Justice. Judges who are citizens have lifetime appointments but the Government also employs many non-citizens as judges. They work under 1-year, renewable contracts, which undermine their independence. The Ministry of Justice may remove judges for cause but rarely does so. Foreign residents involved in commercial disputes with citizens frequently complain that courts show a pro-Kuwaiti bias. Defendants have the right to confront their accusers and to have a lawyer of their choosing. Defendants and prosecutors may appeal verdicts of the State Security Court to the Court of Cassation, but the appellate court may only determine whether the law was properly applied with respect to the sentence, it does not rule on guilt or innocence. In criminal cases not involving state security, appeal is to the High Court of Appeal, which may rule on all aspects of the lower courts decision. In the secular courts there are no groups, including women, who are barred from testifying or whose testimony is given lesser weight. The Islamic courts, which have jurisdiction over all aspects of family law, follow Islamic law, which states that the testimony of one man equals that of two women. Most trials are public, as was the 1994 trial of 14 persons accused in the foiled assassination plot against former President Bush. In June the State Security Court convicted 13 defendants and acquitted 1. It sentenced six defendants to death and seven to prison terms ranging from 6 months to 12 years. Like other trials, this one did not meet internationally accepted standards regarding an independent judiciary and the evidence required for proving abuse. There are no reported political prisoners, but the Government continues to hold persons accused of collaboration with Iraq during the occupation. By law such collaboration is a felony. Most of the people convicted in martial-law courts (including a majority of collaborators) did not receive a fair trial. [*]

24088. DS. "Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (b) Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The judicial system is composed of the regular courts, which try criminal and civil cases, the State Security Court, which tries cases of a security nature, and the Court of Cassation, which is the highest level of judicial appeal. During periods of martial law, the Amir may authorize military courts to try civilian defendants. There have been no martial-law trials since 1991. Sunni and Shi’a Muslims have recourse to courts of their respective denominations for family-law cases. The Constitution states that judges shall not be subject to any authority. Nonetheless, the Ministry of Justice controls the judiciary's administrative and financial matters. The Amir appoints all judges on recommendations from the Minister of Justice. Judges who are citizens have lifetime appointments but the Government also employs many non-citizens as judges. They work under 1-year, renewable contracts, which undermine their independence. The Ministry of Justice may remove judges for cause but rarely does so. Foreign residents involved in commercial disputes with citizens frequently complain that courts show a pro-Kuwaiti bias. Defendants have the right to confront their accusers and to have a lawyer of their choosing. Defendants and prosecutors may appeal verdicts of the State Security Court to the Court of Cassation, but the appellate court may only determine whether the law was properly applied with respect to the sentence, it does not rule on guilt or innocence. In criminal cases not involving state security, appeal is to the High Court of Appeal, which may rule on all aspects of the lower courts decision. In the secular courts there are no groups, including women, who are barred from testifying or whose testimony is given lesser weight. The Islamic courts, which have jurisdiction over all aspects of family law, follow Islamic law, which states that the testimony of one man equals that of two women. Most trials are public, as was the 1994 trial of 14 persons accused in the foiled assassination plot against former President Bush. In June the State Security Court convicted 13 defendants and acquitted 1. It sentenced six defendants to death and seven to prison terms ranging from 6 months to 12 years. Like other trials, this one did not meet internationally accepted standards regarding an independent judiciary and the evidence required for proving abuse. There are no reported political prisoners, but the Government continues to hold persons accused of collaboration with Iraq during the occupation. By law such collaboration is a felony. Most of the people convicted in martial-law courts (including a majority of collaborators) did not receive a fair trial. [*]
at international conferences abroad. Citizens are free to emigrate and to return. A serious problem exists in the case of the bidoon, who are stateless persons usually of Iraqi or Iranian descent, who resided in Kuwait prior to the Iraqi invasion. The Government argues that many of the bidoon (the term means "without") are actually the citizens of other countries, who claim they are stateless in order to remain in Kuwait, become citizens, and enjoy the generous government benefits provided to citizens. However, the Government has insisted that the number of bidoon resident in Kuwait was reduced by more than 50% in the postwar period, from about 220,000 in 1990 to about 117,000 in 1994. Others immigrated to Kuwait during the oil boom years. At the end of 1994, there were about 117,000 stateless people in Kuwait, down from the prewar level of about 220,000. The Government does not wish to see the return of the bidoon who departed Kuwait during the Gulf war. It frequently delays or denies issuing them entry visas. This policy imposes serious hardships and family separations. In 1994 the Government continued its postwar policy of reducing the number of Iraqis, bidoon, Palestinians, and other foreign residents. However, the Government permits the ICRC to verify if the deportees object to returning to their country of origin. The Government holds those deportees who have objections at the main deportation center. In 1993 the Government discontinued its postwar practice of arresting and deporting Gazan Palestinians for violating residency laws. The Government issued 1-year renewable residency permits to 5000 of the 8000 Gazans remaining in Kuwait, but did not seek to deport those without residency permits. Nonetheless, the Government and social pressure prodded many Gazans to depart Kuwait. There is no legislation governing refugees. The Constitution prohibits the extradition of political refugees. The Ministry of Interior issues residency permits to persons granted political asylum. The Government does not deport anyone who claims a fear of persecution at home but it will often maintain such persons in detention rather than grant them permission to live and work in Kuwait. [\[\]

24090. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Iraq: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate. By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government claims that it is committed to equality for women, who necessary to support their families. The law stipulates that employees include women in protection from exploitation in the workplace and from sexual harassment; to permit women to join the regular army, Popular Army, and police forces; to require education for female children; and to equalize women's rights in divorce, land ownership, taxation, suffrage, and election to the National Assembly. It is difficult to determine to what extent these protections are afforded in practice. Casual violence against women, such as wife beating and rape, is known to occur, but little is known about its extent. Such abuse is customarily addressed within the tightly knit Iraqi family structure. There is no public discussion of the subject, and there are no official statistics. Excessive violence against women is grounds for divorce and criminal charges, but suits brought on these charges are believed to be rare. Continuing analysis of documents and testimony concerning the Anfal campaign of 1988 indicate that many women and children, including infants, were killed by firing squad and in chemical attacks during that operation and that many more remain unaccounted for. [\[\]

24091. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Iraq: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate. By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. No information is available on whether the Government has enacted specific legislation to promote the welfare of children. However, the UN Special Rapporteur and various human rights organization have collected a substantial body of evidence pointing to the Iraqi Government's continuing disregard for the rights and welfare of children. The Government of Iraq's failure to comply with the terms of UN resolutions has led to a continuation of economic sanctions against Iraq. As a result, general economic and health conditions throughout Iraq have deteriorated seriously. Children have been particularly susceptible to the decline in food and health care, increased in child mortality and disease rates have been reported. Under these circumstances, the Special Rapporteur observes, the Government of Iraq has special obligations to "take steps to the maximum of its resources" to ensure that the most vulnerable groups in the population have adequate food and health care. The Special Rapporteur stated in his November report that Iraq's ongoing refusal to implement UN Security Council Resolutions 706 and 712 (which would permit a one-time sale of oil in order to finance the import of humanitarian foods), has had an adverse effect on vulnerable populations, including children. The Special Rapporteur noted: "The Government's failure to act (regarding 706 and 712) bears heavily upon those in need and no doubt accounts for a significant portion of the large increases in mortality rates." The Special Rapporteur further reported that the Government's policy of diverting humanitarian aid to its own supporters has deprived vulnerable groups, including children, of essential food and medicines. Finally, the Special Rapporteur observed in his November report that the ongoing bombardment of civilian settlements in the southern marshes has resulted in the "deaths of large numbers of innocent persons including women, children, and the elderly." The Special Rapporteur stated that he had interviewed numerous orphans who had survived military attacks which had killed their parents. [\[\]

24093. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 01: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate. By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Kuwait's rulers (Amirs) drawn from the Al-Sabah family, have governed the country in consultation with prominent commercial families and other community leaders for over 200 years. The 1962 Constitution provides for an elected National Assembly and details the powers of the Government and the rights of citizens. Although the Constitution permits the Amir to suspend its articles only during a period of martial law, the Amir has twice (from 1976-1981 and from 1986-1992)suspended constitutional provisions by decree and ruled extra-constitutionally. The 10/1992 Assembly elections and the subsequent convening of the Assembly marked a return to parliamentary life. During 1993 the Assembly assumed an active role, enacting legislation, including the national budget. (See below for further details on the role of the Assembly The Ministry of Interior supervises Kuwait's security apparatus, including the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) and Kuwait State Security (KSS), two agencies that investigate internal security-related offenses. Kuwait's security forces continued to commit human rights abuses, particularly in their treatment of those Peoples whose leaders were associated with support for Iraq's invasion of Kuwait Iraqis, Jordanians, Palestinians, Yemenis, and Sudanese). Endowed with rich oil resources, Kuwait's market economy made substantial progress in recovering from the destruction caused by the Iraq occupation. By 1993 Kuwait had an estimated per capita income of approximately $17234. Reconstruction was largely complete, however, heavy costs accompanied the recovery. Over the past 3 fiscal years, Kuwait incurred a cumulative fiscal deficit of approximately $63 billion, a deficit that it covered by drawing down its foreign assets by half and increasing its public debt. Despite the emphasis the Government places on exports, its economy is not diversified and many businesses are subject to restrictive labor laws. In addition, the Government has ownership interests in most of the major banks and in many businesses, chiefly in the oil industry. Although Kuwait showed some progress in human rights in 1993, its overall human rights record was mixed. The Government relaxed its residency restrictions on Gazans, made it easier for foreign workers to sponsor their family members, agreed to begin investigating the cases of long-term detainees, and closed illegal recruitment agencies for domestic servants. The Human Rights Committee of the National Assembly and the press publicized important human rights issues, raising awareness of such issues at both the official and popular level. Nevertheless, serious human rights problems remained. There were continuing reports of torture and of arbitrary arrest, as well as limitations on the freedoms of assembly and association and women's rights. Political parties remain banned, and citizens do not enjoy the right to change the head of state and government. The Government banned all unlicensed nongovernmental organizations in August, thereby eliminating some organizations that had been engaged in human rights work. The Government continued to refuse to readmit stateless, Iraqi, and Palestinian individuals who had strong family ties to Kuwait, and Kuwaiti labor laws continued to exclude domestic servants from their protective provisions. [1]

24094. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 03: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (b) Disappearance", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There were no reported cases of permanent disappearances but there were credible reports of foreigners (particularly those peoples whose leaders were associated with support for Iraq's invasion of Kuwait) being taken from their homes by unidentified Kuwaitis, held for a few hours, and then released as a tactic of harassment. Numerous disappearances followed Kuwait's liberation in 1991 as elements of the military and vigilante groups sought retribution against persons, particularly foreigners, whom they suspected of being pro-Iraqi. While there is no reliable estimate of the total number of disappearances, over 100 cases remained unresolved in 1993. In additional cases where persons are known to be dead, law enforcement officials have failed to identify or indict suspects. According to the latest and most accurate figures provided to Iraq by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), 699 Kuwaitis and residents of Kuwait including 9 women, were taken prisoner by Iraqi authorities during the occupation and are still missing or detained in Iraq. The Government of Iraq has refused to comply with UN Security Council Resolution 687, which provides for the detainees' release. Iraq denies that it holds Kuwaiti detainees and refuses to account for missing Kuwaitis taken into Iraqi custody during the occupation. [1]

24095. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government restricts the travel of Saudi and non-Saudi women. Women must obtain written permission from their closest male relatives before the authorities will allow them to board public transportation between different parts of the country or travel within the country. The Government requires foreign residents to carry identification cards. It does not permit foreigners to travel outside the city of their employment or chane their workplace without their sponsor's permission. Foreign residents who travel in the Kingdom are often asked by the authorities to show they possess letters of permission from their employers. Foreign workers must also obtain permission from their sponsors to travel abroad. Sponsors generally retain possession of the workers' passports. If sponsors are involved in a commercial or labor dispute with foreign employees, they may ask the authorities to prohibit the employees from departing the country until the dispute is resolved. Some sponsors use this pressure tactic to resolve disputes in their favor—or to have foreign employees deported The Government seizes the passports of all potential suspects and witnesses in criminal cases, and suspends the issuance of exit visas to them, until the case is tried . As a result, some foreign nationals are forced to remain in the Kingdom for lengthy periods against their will. The authorities sometimes confiscate the passports of suspected subversives. The Government prevents Shi's Muslims believed to have pro-Iranian sympathies from traveling abroad. Citizens may emigrate, but the law prohibits dual citizenship. There are no provisions for long-term foreign residents to acquire citizenship. However, foreigners are granted citizenship in rare cases, generally through the advocacy of an influential patron. In April the Government revoked the citizenship of Osama Bin Laden, a wealthy citizen known to support Islamic terrorist groups, for refusing to return from abroad to answer charges concerning his activities. The Interior Ministry issued a statement that Bin Laden 'contradicted the Kingdom's interest and harmed its relations with sisterly countries'. After his citizenship was revoked, Bin Laden was prohibited from entering the Kingdom. Article 42 of the 1992 Basic law provides that 'the State will grant political asylum if the public interest mitigates' in favor of it. The language does not specify clear rules for adjudicating asylum cases. In general, the authorities regard refugees and displaced persons like other foreign workers: they must have sponsors for employment or risk expulsion at the border. After the Gulf War, the Government granted refuge to 36000 Iraqi civilians and former prisoners of war. At year's end, 16,000 have been resettled in third countries or were voluntarily repatriated to Iraq. Most of the remaining 18400 refugees are restricted to the Rafha Refugee Camp. In 1993 Human Rights Watch reported that refugees were forcibly repatriated to Iraq after staging a riot at the Rafha camp. However, the UNHCR has monitored over 2450 refugees voluntarily returning to Iraq since 1991 and found no evidence of forcible repatriation in 1993 or 1994. The Government has temporarily allowed some foreigners to remain in Saudi Arabia in cases where their safety would be jeopardized if they were deported to their home countries. The authorities also worked with the UNHCR to repatriate several hundred southern Yemeni refugees after the end of the Yemen civil war. [1]

Gulf of Ignorance: One of the big problems when we begin to talk about things is that we don't know our own history. And if you look at the whole question of how effectively the Gulf War was managed in this country, it was because people didn't even know where Iraq was. They were totally dependent on ITN news to put a map of the world up there and say that's Iraq and that little bit there, that's Kuwait and you see that dirty great big rocket country there, that marched into that tiny country there and everybody watching News at ten goes 'aah that's not fair!' Then they throw in a few phrases like 'democracy' and 'defending democracy in Kuwait'!! Almost everybody in this country gets at least the benefit of education until they’re sixteen years old and almost nobody challenged the notion of defending democracy in Kuwait during the Gulf War. You couldn’t have found it with a magnifying glass; it didn’t exist. Nobody knew anything about Kuwait until that issue came up. Nobody knew anything about Iraq. In this country when people hear of Palestine they think of when they were at school and learnt stories in the Bible. That’s what Palestine is. It belongs in the Bible. It’s not real. We don’t even challenge the authority of our own people. We’ve got to learn what we’re doing; we’ve got to learn the history of world struggles. And I don’t mean that we all take six weeks off and do nothing until we have read all the books.

But we’ve got to understand the factual history. People in this country have got to understand the central role that was played by Britain in creating all these problems. That doesn’t mean then, that you start running around like the Americans used to do, with a fit of the communal guilt, with heads held in a brown paper bag saying: ‘Don’t let anyone see me because I’m white, British and I’m not being oppressed other than as a woman’. I’m not saying that, but I’m saying that if we’re going to work together again we’ve got to know and respect not only what we share in common, but also the differences between us.

No Patronage Please, Sisters: Our culture, my language, her language, is not necessarily better than yours, it’s as good. If I choose because of the history of my own culture to behave in a certain way, don’t tell me you know a better way of doing it. I am capable of learning for myself and I am capable of choosing for myself. If I want to dress in the manner of my culture or yours, that is my decision. And while you’re at it don’t make an issue about whether my war, or my position is right or wrong. My development may not be totally even. We people in Ireland, we’ve all got our own internal difficulties. People in Ireland may not be as well-informed, as well-educated or as broad-thinking on a whole lot of issues like family reproduction rights, like the role of a woman in the family. We may not within the narrow confines of understanding the oppression of our sex, be in the forefront, though some of us might be. But don’t use that as a stick with which to beat my people in this war. Don’t use that, by saying the way forward in Ireland is to educate women on these issues. It is being said about women whose houses are being raided whose children are being dragged off to prison: ‘we’ll have to consider critical support here because the real problem is that these women are very bad on the question of gay rights, on the question of abortion information, so let’s actually do the revolution right here and let’s all head off to Ireland and make sure they get the question of reproductive rights right. Then when they have that right, we’ll be sisters and we can help them’. All of that has got to go out the window.

Irish Land in Irish Hands: We are women in struggle for the survival not only of our sex, not only for women and women’s rights! We are a group of women in our countries fighting for the survival of what we love, our children, our mothers, our partners, our sons. We are fighting for the survival of our culture, our race and our land.

And the parallels in all struggles just continue until they are frightening. I know what’s happening to the people of Kurdistan; I see them. Unlike the Palestinians and in many ways, to some extent, still like ourselves, they still actually have ground to hang on to. The Palestinians have no homeland; no state. And in the Brooke talks in Ireland, they are trying to make Palestinians of us. They are trying to say to the Northern nationalists: ‘Look, you have got it all wrong. The problem in Ireland is that there is this imperialist country called the Republic of Ireland which lays claim to the territory of the North and the way forward for peace is to change the Irish constitution and accept that the North of Ireland is not part of the nation of Ireland’.

People in the south of Ireland and people in Britain and liberal people, peace-loving people are saying to us: ‘That sounds like a good idea.’ Well let me tell you, you’re not doing that with me. Just before it comes up on the agenda, first I want to assert—which I’ve done at every conference I’ve been speaking at—you are not doing that to me, Mr. Brook or Mr. Collins or Anglo-Irish Agreement. You are not taking the land out from under my feet. You are not going to make me live in the same position as the Palestinians. Sitting in County Tyrone, where my people have lived for hundreds upon thousands of years and telling me suddenly, that as from some date next year, it is not Ireland. What is it? I get angry thinking of it–what will it be?

If Articles 2 and 3 of the Constitution are taken away and Tyrone is not part of the nation of Ireland, what will it be and what will I be? I am not a British citizen. Till the day I die I will never be anything other than an Irish citizen. If I have no land, if I can’t say County Tyrone is in Ireland—i was born there–I’m an Irish citizen but the place I was born in, which is in Ireland, is no longer Ireland because some piece of paper took it away, what will I be?

Or we might be beaten into South Armagh and up the Falls Road and to the top-of the mountains of Tyrone and then we will be in a position that the Kurdish people are in. Then people ask me if we can make links within these struggles. We don’t have to. They are beating us in the face. They are one and the same struggle and yet we are always told we are wrong.

Let’s Discuss Our Resistance: I think that the question that we as women have to discuss here today is not war; we don’t have to discuss war, it’s a real situation, it’s there. What we have to critically discuss is the resistance and how we women in the countries of oppression can look to you sisters here in the belly of the beast for added strength. What are you, our sisters, going to do to bring this struggle forward and to give us—not simply within the narrow confines of a separatist position on women–support? What are you our sisters in the belly of the beast, going to do for the rest of us? How can you help? How can we work together to beat off the oppressor, and in beating him off, educate ourselves and our brothers so that we can reconstruct in place of war; reconstruct in the face of oppression, free and equitable societies?

I think there are lots of things we can learn from each other on the question of resistance. One of the things that women by tradition are better at than anybody else is education. It’s because that has traditionally been our role. We bring children into this world, we educate them. We are the social organizers, we keep the family going, we keep the community going, we work within ourselves and we seem to have a longer history of sharing resources and sharing information. But we still have to learn.

We do not want to build societies where, having fought and won the war, our brothers say, “Thanks very much. Bernadette, you can go home now and, make the dinner.” But that’s the least of my problems at this time—whether or not Gerry Adams is going to send me home after the war to make the dinner. Don’t you worry about that, sisters, I can deal with Gerry Adams: it is the British army that is my problem. We have gained civil and political rights in Central and Eastern Europe have gained civil and political rights in the former Communist states; at the same time the introduction of the market economy often starts with the loss of women’s maternity and daycare benefits, and often their jobs as well. However, the emphasis on the public sphere in Communist societies over the private sphere led to a failure to address the fundamental contradictions between women’s productive and reproductive roles, and of gender relations within the family. Women’s independence was seen as a logical product of the broader socialist revolution, rather than as an explicit goal of such revolution. Just as socialist states emancipated women as worker-mothers, the new nationalisms of the region see the “cult of motherhood” as the basis of the renewed nationalisms. While it is agreed that gender inequalities within the family in Capitalist societies... are the basis of inequality, the dual role of women in socialist societies as worker-mothers helped to perpetuate gender inequalities in the Communist states. Even as the shortages of housing and consumer goods, coupled with long hours made women's dual role more difficult, Communist governments (especially Hungary) or the men of Communist societies (such as Poland) held very traditional views on the legitimate role of women. Notably, on his 1991 visit to Poland, Pope John Paul II denounced individualism as unsuitable for Poland, and posed the true values of the traditional family with the false collectivism of socialism. Women's reproductive rights, based in the absolute right of women to determine their own reproductive goals, even as women must never be forced to bear the full costs of their decisions, has been subordinated to both the needs of the Communists (such as the 1936 ban on abortion in the USSR) or the re-imposition of traditional religions: both ideological systems presuppose heterosexuality norms. At the same time, sex education in the Communist countries was rudimentary, and birth control uncommon (in the USSR only 18% of women used birth control, in Georgia only 3%). Abortion was a major means of birth control, but was discouraged by terrible quality of abortion services (a Georgian doctor relates stories of dark hospital wards shaken by screams of patients), while in post-Communist Poland the Church seeks to ban abortion, while Croatia associates aborted fetus with concentration camp dead in anti-abortion posters, and in Bosnia Serbs consciously used mass rape as a tool of genocide. Ironically, the end of Communism also began the rapid eclipse of the political role of women: whether in government or in emergent democratic opposition movements, the value women held as dissidents vanished at the same time that women who had risen in the Communist governments were marginalized. Significantly, feminism as an ideology was discredited by the co-option of feminism by the Communists (at least in name), while the renewed nationalisms of the region reject any new formulations of feminism under whatever name as an alien ideology. Nevertheless, the small feminist groups that have emerged have been very vocal: the small groups have often, as in Poland, coupled demonstrations for abortion rights with peace movement work (in 1991, condemning the Persian Gulf War as "patriarchal").

Q: Of course, getting into it means getting your hands dirty. Over all there was the problem of bringing the hostages home and for that, as we well knew, it would be necessary to advance into dirty terrain. I was clean enough last year to organize the demonstration in Jerusalem: it was the best of both worlds. This time, no. To go to Baghdad with Capucci, who wanted to choose the PLO as one of the two subjects of mediation (in fact we met Arafat in Baghdad). We knew already that inside the PLO there was a conflict and we thought that it would be useful to get all the sides into a dialogue, as Capucci, as Arafat, as Nemer Hammad. It shook them up. For them to be able to intercede for the hostages it was, it seemed to me, a way of helping the moderates in the PLO restore moderation. It was important for the world to know that the Palestinians were concerned with the hostages and for the Palestinians to be able to understand that this was the only way they might be able to maintain relationships with the West. I am convinced that at that phase there was a margin of negotiation, that the West burned that bridge by the intimidation of the ultimatum. It was seen as an insult to Arab pride. We, however, during these encounters around the hostages, we had many occasions to toss out a denunciation of the invasion of Kuwait (contrary to Formigoni who, interviewing the Iraqi Parliament, never mentioned it). The fact that we were able to express our opinions without its causing a big scandal demonstrated that there was room for negotiation. Then they all got radicalized.

Q: Without a doubt there is a one-sided image of Israel among young pacifists, seeing it only as the oppressor of the Palestinians but not also as a state under siege. Why?

A: It's true: the young people are very Ignorant about Israel and the Middle East; on the other hand, I can remember, 20 years ago, looking for Vietnam on a map. For three years they have seen the children of the Intifada, seen the repression to which they are subjected, why are you surprised that they identify with their contemporaries? The peace movement has, of course, worked on this a lot. We women, for example, two years ago, we had not been able to get Israeli pacifists to meet with Palestinians; last year, after a lot of hard work, it is finally possible. To make this possible, to know the other face of Israel, it is essential to break the sectarianism of the younger ones.

I recognise that at this moment it is difficult to reach an understanding with the Israeli pacifists: I think that the horror at their backs should not impede confronting the problems at hand and I believe, thus, that Israel, in order to change its image, ought to make a gesture, right now, towards the Palestinians.

I appreciate very much that Israel hasn't, until now, intervened in the war, but I consider it tragic that "Peace Now" has declared that peace... now wants to say war now. This collapse is terrible, it is a troubling return to the syndrome of encirclement: also among pacifists we find a terrible obstinacy, a big closing down at any notion of negotiation. In the end, refusing our solidarity because we are against this war. But I do not renounce dialogue with them and continue to deny myself being touched too much by my Israeli friends or my Palestinian friends in the territories. But you can imagine saying about this war, who is imprisoned by the occupation of the parties. And thus the question, there is a real danger that democracy has come to a complete standstill. We see it in the bias of the courts, we see it in the poverty and the despair of our communities, we see it in the empty voting booths that millions of Americans no longer bother to enter.

In the conclusion to his 12 page dissent, Judge Mikva wrote: "...whatever its proper role in correcting imbalances and imperfections in the status quo, government certainly must not abandon its posture of nonpartisanship. The government of any democracy, let alone one shaped by the values of our Constitution's First Amendment, must avoid tilting the electoral playing field, lest the democracy itself becomes tarnished...." If democracy is to be expanded and the electoral process opened up in the way that Judge Mikva has advocated, we need to take his ruling out to the grassroots. That's what my 1992 Presidential campaign is all about. I'm urging everyone who cares about fairness and justice to vote for Lenora Fulani and Abner Mikva in 1992! He lost the fight for democracy in the courts, so we need to win it in the communities. We need a sizable vote just because we can't win in the courts. They've been seized by the right wing— Clarence Thomas is just the icing on the oreo cookie! We already have strong evidence to show that if the electoral process is opened up—even with all its limitations—voting patterns alter considerably. For example, whenever independent candidates of national stature—such as John Anderson or George Wallace—have run for office, even in one-shot campaigns, large numbers of people turned out to vote for them. Just imagine what it would be like if the "electoral playing field" were tilted in favor of democracy and inclusion. Imagine what it would mean if the debates included four or five or six different candidates, each of them representing different political viewpoints, different social values, different solutions to the problems that confront our society. Imagine the media covering those viewpoints, examining those values and solutions. It would mean that the concerns of millions of ordinary Americans would be addressed and discussed; more than that, it would mean that our opinions, needs, and desires would be heard, heard and understood. In the end, pulling these candidates from the political vacuum at the grassroots. That's what my 1992 Presidential

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Q: Women and peace, "Women in Black", mother right. Are you also convinced that women are rightfully the vanguard of the peace movement?

A: Listen, I don't want to theorize too much about it. I take issue also with the opinion polls that say that women are more against war than men. The essence of that position cannot be so unequivocal. Too many things are mixed up together: mother love, the sense of limits, feminism, suspicions about power. Personally, I feel this is very extravagant. I don't look to grasp the fascination of the influence of the army, I perceive instead that it attracts men more than women, even those who are politically against the war. I believe then in leaving him experience of the old politics, that women have to have a decisive role in the building of the movement for peace because they are capable of not being dazzled by the political mediation, by its conspicuous pretensions. With the entrance of women as part of the movement, things get complicated—and that is good: questions such as "how is it that if I am against cutting the navy and you are in favor, we can both demonstrate against the war?" can be asked. Also, with feminists the relationships were not very simple: the experience of Women in Black was a break from the feminist tradition of emphasizing discussion. In fact we said, first we act, first we live these things, and later we'll talk.

From concrete experiences we could draw our culture together, we chose the body and not the mind as the primary vehicle for our message. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] == 24099. Fulani, Leonora. Press Release: Do We Need More Democracy? You Be The Judge. New York: Leonora Fulani For President [200 West 72nd Street, Suite 30, New York, NY 10023; Tel: 212-799-2100], N.D. [1992]. Recently a three judge panel ruled that I had no right ("standing") to challenge the tax-exempt status of the Commission on Presidential debates for failing to include me in the 1988 Presidential debates—despite the fact that, no less than Michael Dukakis and George Bush, I was on the ballot in every state and had received federal primary matching funds. The amazing thing is that the decision is not that two out of three federal judges ruled against me, but that one of them, Chief Judge Abner Mikva, had the guts to side with me—and with democracy. The Commission on Presidential Debates was established in 1987 by the national Democratic and Republican parties for the explicit purpose of taking over sponsorship—control —of the debates from the League of Women Voters. My lawyers have argued that the Commission is not entitled to enjoy tax-exempt status because it is not non-partisan, as the law requires, but bi-partisan—that is, it excludes everyone who isn't a Republican or a Democrat. The Commission on Presidential Debates said I wasn't eligible to be included in the debates because I wasn't a "legitimate" candidate. That's a Catch-22 situation, because minor party candidates can never be "legitimate" as long as the system says that the only legitimate candidates are major party candidates! By ruling in favor of the CPD, the court perpetuated a dangerous and unconstitutional political myth—which is that bi-partisan means the same thing as non-partisan. But it doesn't. Since the Constitution doesn't even mention political parties at all, in giving special privileges to two nongovernmental agencies—namely the Republican and the Democratic parties—the US government and its institutions are in violation of the Constitution. A ruling in our favor would have meant the unraveling of American electoral politics as we know it. It's clear that the powers that be are willing to do whatever they have to do—even if that means issuing criminally biased and partisan judicial decisions—to hold on to their to party political monopoly. Even if it means destroying democracy itself. From Gramm-Rudman (the so-called "balanced budget" legislation that turned Reaganomics into law, enacted with bipartisan support) to the war in the Persian Gulf, the history of the last ten years has been the capitulation of the Democratic Party to the Republicans' right wing agenda. As Judge Mikva pointed out in his 12 page dissent, there is a real danger that democracy has come to a complete standstill. We see it in the bias of the courts, we see it in the poverty and the despair of our communities, we see it in the empty voting booths that millions of Americans no longer bother to enter.

our approval: new constitution, ‘reformation’ of political parties, elections, ‘restoration’ of the parliament, and ‘all of these things’. The US has not given support to the Iraqi National Congress because they did not deserve such US support, inasmuch as they ‘didn’t get its act together’. The vindictive redrawing of the Iraqi-Kuwait border was done to punish Iraq and will be counterproductive, since Iraq will exist forever: even a democratic Iraq will want the return of those territories and it unnecessarily creates a ‘time bomb’. While Iraq’s only card in the region is Hezbollah, the PLO-Israeli agreement will end the Palestinian issue as a focal point for radicals in the region: ‘Arab-Israeli peace will be the single most powerful blow to the radical, ideological, despotic states in the Middle East’. [Fuller is a senior analyst at RAND Corp., and was interviewed 10/11/1993 by Thomas Mathar.]

24101. Garza, Laura; Trowe, Maggie. "China Meeting Highlights Women’s Rights", in Militant (SWP), September 25, 1995. p. 8. Beijing - More than 26000 women from throughout the world successfully held the largest forum ever of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to discuss women’s rights near this city. The forum in Huairou, China, included more than 5000 workshops, and ended as the UN Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing with official government delegations was still under way. The NGO gathering, which drew many women’s rights activist, was testimony to the fact that the fight for equal rights for women is a part of discussions and struggles occurring throughout the world. Most of the governments at the official conference have felt compelled to portray themselves as trying to advance women’s status. What came through in the myriad informal discussions and formal presentations was the fight women are forced to wage in country after country for equal legal rights, decent pay, and against exploitive working conditions. These struggles are spurred on by the greater integration of women into the workforce worldwide. “In Japan women earn 52% of the wages men earn,” said Michiko Hiroki. "There are many cases now of women using big companies for discrimination. The three big national union confederations, for the most part, have not fought for these women. 40% of working women are in part-time, temporary, or sub-contracted jobs. Immigrant women come from Korea, Philippines, Thailand, Malaysia, Iran, Bangladesh, and Iraq. Many are illegal and work the dirtiest and most dangerous jobs.” Hiroki works with the Asian Women Workers Center in Tokyo, part of a network of groups in the Community for Asian Women. The association is headquartered in Hong Kong and includes affiliates in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Philippines, Malaysia, Indonesia, India, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, and Nepal. [=]

24102. Garza, Laura; Trowe, Maggie. "China Meeting Highlights Women’s Rights: Burden of Foreign Debt", in Militant (SWP), September 25, 1995. p. 8. Many speakers from Asia and the Caribbean mentioned problems of the debt and social spending cuts imposed by international lending agencies as conditions for loans, but few joined in calling for cancelling the debt. Billie Miller, a Deputy Prime Minister from Barbados, stated a more common position: “Barbados has not been immune to the adverse effects of economic stabilization and structural adjustment programs.” Miller stated. “Despite Barbados’s ranking in social development performance, it still needs new and additional resources to maintain its record of gender performance.” Representatives of countries from the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe also painted a picture of a worsening economic situation. The representativeof Belarus, Uladzimir Rusakevic, said changes in that country had resulted in "a rise in women's unemployment,” and "increased infant and maternal mortality.” The transition from a centrally planned economy in Armenia has meant acute unemployment for women, who account for 64% of the unemployed, and who hold the lowest paying jobs when they do work, said Hranush Kakobian of the National Assembly of Armenia. Three-quarters of the World Health Organization’s European budget is devoted to Eastern Europe where once non-existent diseases such as cholera, diphtheria, and typhoid are on the rise along with maternal mortality rates. The budget for that region for the WHO is to be cut by 20%. Dr. Assia Brandrup-Lukanow from the WHO said, “The health of women, men and children is under threat.” The proposals from many third world countries for new and additional resources have been flatly rejected by representatives of the US and the European Union at the conference, whose stance is that governments should work on reallocating existing resources to achieve the goals of the conference. A number of right-wing forces, in most cases under the guise of defending religious rights, have attacked the draft platform of action for failing to condemn abortion, describe women’s central role as that of family, give greater weight to the family as a solution to women’s and society’s ills. Groups such as Real Women from Canada and Right to Life from the US have been joined by representatives from the Vatican, and countries including Iran and Guatemala, in repeating these themes.

They have not succeeded, however, in pushing back the discussion on reproductive rights, or in a wholesale attack on the conference. They have had to attend, participate, and couch their attacks on women’s rights in a way that portrays them as defending equality for women, while maintaining that women should have different roles than men in carrying out their responsibilities. During the exchange of views at the plenary session, Rosalyn Hazelle, of St. Kitts and Nevis, argued, "Women must have autonomy over their sexual and reproductive rights if they are to protect themselves from unwanted and unplanned pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases.” Cuba’s delegation is headed by Vilma Espin Guillois, president of the Federation of Cuban Women. Speaking at the event she stated Cuba’s stand in favor of a woman’s right to control her body, noting abortion is safe and legal in Cuba. She continued, “The independence and sovereignty we conquered is something the US tries to punish us for with the illegal and aggressive policies, imposed 33 years ago, of the harsh economic, financial, and commercial blockade.” Bassam S. Kuba, of Iraq, called for an end to the sanctions imposed against that country by the UN at the urging of Washington. “Owing to inflation,” she said, “wages earned by women are not enough to pay the costs for transportation.” The high prices, and lack of food and medicine have taken a harsh toll on the civilian population, she stated. [=]
As the official UN Fourth World Conference on Women got under way there were 17000 people in attendance, including some 4000 NGO delegates who went into Beijing to join in discussions and express their opinions about the issues - from abortions rights to marriage and divorce laws - that are being debated as the conference drafts a platform of action. Most of them encountered a very different atmosphere than in Huairou, as the discussion shifted from one of activists involved in fighting the blacklists, to the more muted and formal scene of government representatives discussing how to administer programs that affect women. The picture that has emerged here too, though, reflects the economic crisis facing the world capitalist economy and the toll being taken on workers and farmers, with the heaviest burden being borne by women. Speaking at a plenary session, Diakite Fatoumata N'Diaye, Minister and Commissioner for the Promotion of Women of Mali, noted that ten years after the last such conference on women in Nairobi, Kenya, “the situation of women is still characterized by low literacy rates. The situation of women cannot be separated from the situation of the country as a whole. Our economy is burdened by debt. In these conditions there can be no prospect for the increased well-being of women. The actual structural cause of poverty is the cycle of indebtedness which holds African countries in poverty. This problem has not been addressed by refinancing the debt or any other so-called remedy. The only solution is a radical one - cancelling the debt.”

In 9/83, the disastrous war between Iran and Iraq entered into its fourth year, a war that has cost 400000 lives, left half a million disabled and two to three million refugees in Iran alone. The economic losses of this war are equal to its human casualties. Iran has spent billions of dollars to keep the war machine going. As a result, poverty, the loss of husbands and sons, and unemployment have deeply affected family life and brought about terrible consequences for women. In order to visualize the situation, a brief economic analysis is needed.

Iran’s economy prior to Khomeini suffered from chronic production deficiencies on the one hand and enormous expenditures—mainly for the military—on the other. But, as difficult as this may have been, it doesn’t approach the tragic situation of today. The social and economic disorders beginning in 2/79, when Khomeini took power, were accepted as part of the price that had to be paid for revolution. But the subsequent and prolonged incapability of the Mullahs [religious leaders] to run Iran have turned the situation into a disaster. From 2/79 to 9/80, industrial production fell to its lowest level ever, producing, some say, at only 10% of its capacity.

The agricultural sector suffered as well; the failure of the new regime to provide support for the farmers further damaged the already fragile level of productivity in the countryside, resulting in massive food shortages and unemployment in the cities and peasant migration.

War “Saves” The Day: Prior to the war, Khomeini was deeply entangled both politically and economically in the domestic turmoil. His revolution had caused. Many of the leading Mullahs, including Khomeini, could not hide their fears of imminent political breakdown. With the advent of war, however, Peoples' attention was diverted away from domestic problems, and Iranians from the extreme right to the extreme left of the political spectrum were suddenly united against the foreign invader. Indeed, according to many political observers, the Iran/Iraq war was an important factor in the survival of Khomeini’s regime.

However, if war boosts the economy of the industrial nations that own the war supplies, it smashes the economy of the nations that consume them. Since Iran does not produce but rather buys its military hardware, it has not enjoyed the economic boom that often goes with war. Instead, it is the US, which had outfitted the Iranian army, that has emerged the real winner.

In the face of increasing military commitments to the war and declining economic possibilities, the jobless lower classes and particularly the peasantry were recruited for the army—a movement that further aggravated the crisis in the agricultural sector. Today, despite the fact that Iran is a massive importer, taking in 50 times more than it exports, shortages continue to proliferate. Inflation is unbearable for people from almost all walks of life. The price of rice for example has increased from about $7.00 a kilo on the black market, available yes, but who can afford it? For an average middle class family it means a month of work for a few days worth of food. In the midst of such chaos, the lives of women are literally a question of survival.

Women and War: When we talk about the effects of war on the Iranian women, not only do we mean those already poor or of the lower classes, but also the recently impoverished middle classes and even upper middle classes. In a general categorization, we can say that Iranian women fall into two major groups: urban women and rural women (which include village and tribal women). The latter form the majority of the female population and are an important element in the rural economy, but they are at the same time still far more under-privileged than their urban sisters. Socially and economically they are completely dependent on the man in the family, be he husband or son. They work on the farm and in rural factories producing foodstuffs and hand-made goods, but earn nothing for themselves in exchange for their labor. Their income is invisible and goes or adds to the property of the family which ultimately belongs to the husband or children. If a woman is divorced, she receives nothing. If her husband dies, she receives one-eighth of the cash and household—if there is any at that economic level. She has no right to the land or farm. As for the house, the price of the land must be deducted, and she receives one-eighth of the building price, which, in the rural context, means a pile of kah-gel (mud mixed with straw used as building material). And she is illiterate.

Although illiteracy is a structural phenomenon in rural Iran, it is far more widespread among women than among men. According to the last available statistics gathered in 1975, 91% of rural women are illiterate. By now, since there has been no effort made to change this situation, the figures must be close to 100%.

As a sub-effect of her illiteracy, a woman remains virtually unskilled apart from the nontransferable, unrecognizable hard work she does on the farm. All of this aggravates her extreme vulnerability to the slightest economic change within the family. The high number of deaths, injuries and unemployment caused by the war, particularly considering that one man’s responsibility may extend to his mother and sisters as well as his wife and daughters, causes hardships to an immense number of women. Moreover, it is an unfortunate fact that Iran lacks any kind of economic crisis facing the world capitalist economy and the toll being taken on workers and farmers, with the heaviest burden being borne by women. Speaking at a plenary session, Diakite Fatoumata N’Diaye, Minister and Commissioner for the Promotion of Women of Mali, noted that ten years after the last such conference on women in Nairobi, Kenya, “the situation of women is still characterized by low literacy rates. The situation of women cannot be separated from the situation of the country as a whole. Our economy is burdened by debt. In these conditions there can be no prospect for the increased well-being of women. The actual structural cause of poverty is the cycle of indebtedness which holds African countries in poverty. This problem has not been addressed by refinancing the debt or any other so-called remedy. The only solution is a radical one - cancelling the debt.”

Women’s Options: In order to survive, a woman has few options. If she is very fortunate she can remarry. For most though, polygamy, prostitution, servitude, or beggary are the most common solutions.

Economic disorders beginning in 2/79, when Khomeini took power, were of women. Moreover, it is an unfortunate fact that Iran lacks any kind of economic crisis facing the world capitalist economy and the toll being taken on workers and farmers, with the heaviest burden being borne by women. Speaking at a plenary session, Diakite Fatoumata N’Diaye, Minister and Commissioner for the Promotion of Women of Mali, noted that ten years after the last such conference on women in Nairobi, Kenya, “the situation of women is still characterized by low literacy rates. The situation of women cannot be separated from the situation of the country as a whole. Our economy is burdened by debt. In these conditions there can be no prospect for the increased well-being of women. The actual structural cause of poverty is the cycle of indebtedness which holds African countries in poverty. This problem has not been addressed by refinancing the debt or any other so-called remedy. The only solution is a radical one - cancelling the debt.”

Women and War: When we talk about the effects of war on the Iranian women, not only do we mean those already poor or of the lower classes, but also the recently impoverished middle classes and even upper middle classes. In a general categorization, we can say that Iranian women fall into two major groups: urban women and rural women (which include village and tribal women). The latter form the majority of the female population and are an important element in the rural economy, but they are at the same time still far more under-privileged than their urban sisters. Socially and economically they are completely dependent on the man in the family, be he husband or son. They work on the farm and in rural factories producing foodstuffs and hand-made goods, but earn nothing for themselves in exchange for their labor. Their income is invisible and goes or adds to the property of the family which ultimately belongs to the husband or children. If a woman is divorced, she receives nothing. If her husband dies, she receives one-eighth of the cash and household—if there is any at that economic level. She has no right to the land or farm. As for the house, the price of the land must be deducted, and she receives one-eighth of the building price, which, in the rural context, means a pile of kah-gel (mud mixed with straw used as building material). And she is illiterate.

Although illiteracy is a structural phenomenon in rural Iran, it is far more widespread among women than among men. According to the last available statistics gathered in 1975, 91% of rural women are illiterate. By now, since there has been no effort made to change this situation, the figures must be close to 100%.

As a sub-effect of her illiteracy, a woman remains virtually unskilled apart from the nontransferable, unrecognizable hard work she does on the farm. All of this aggravates her extreme vulnerability to the slightest economic change within the family. The high number of deaths, injuries and unemployment caused by the war, particularly considering that one man’s responsibility may extend to his mother and sisters as well as his wife and daughters, causes hardships to an immense number of women. Moreover, it is an unfortunate fact that Iran lacks any kind of social security or welfare system apart from that which the family itself provides. The few private charitable organizations that exist are hard pressed to do much more than provide very superficial relief to a lucky few under such adverse circumstances. The question, then, is what happens to the unskilled, illiterate woman who loses her husband and/or eldest son to the war?

Women's Options: In order to survive, a woman has few options. If she is very fortunate she can remarry. For most though, polygamy, prostitution, servitude, or beggary are the most common solutions.

Polygamy was outlawed in Iran in 1967 by the Family Code. But a few months after Khomeini took power, the Family Code was abolished, and polygamy is now officially recognized and even forcefully recommended by the regime. "Polygamy is beneficial to women," said Khomeini the day he repealed the Code. The grave nature of women's situation because of the war is used by the regime to propagate the idea of polygamy. Committees have been organized to manage these marriages, and monetary incentives are offered to men to encourage them to marry war widows.

Prostitution is another phenomenon that has increased as a reflection of the war time economic situation. The regime claims that prostitution was eradicated as it was anti-Islamic behavior. But the fact is that even though the brothels have been closed and prostitution is prohibited in its conventional sense, a different kind of prostitution, which might be called the Mullah's religious prostitution, is taking place.
Sanctioned by the regime and thus in many ways more forcible, this version of prostitution is named "temporary marriage." It is a verbal or written contract between a man and a woman before sexual intercourse based on two factors: the woman's price and the duration of the so-called marriage. The period can be anywhere from one hour to several years during which time the woman has no economic or moral claims on the man whatsoever. There is no need for formal divorce in this marriage since it expires automatically when the term of agreement has elapsed. Finally, the number of "temporary wives" a man can have is not limited, and since it is categorized as "marriage," it must be both respected and accepted by Iranian women.

Today, it isn't only war widows who are victimized by polygamy and prostitution, but also their young daughters who find themselves faced with the same struggle for survival. In the Muslim's opinion, girls can be married as soon as they reach maturity which, in their view, is from age nine or the first menstruation. Moreover, the increasing shortage of young men along with the deepening poverty of the peasantry has revitalized. It's not uncommon to find a 70 or 80 year old man with a wife that could be his youngest granddaughter.

The Keys to Heaven: Finally, amidst economic ruin and the hopelessness of having almost nowhere to turn for help, there is the final horrifying blow to mothers of having their adolescent sons "recruited" to clean minefields. The survival rate for this particular military job is very low and it has already claimed the lives of 50000 youngsters between the ages of 12 and 18.

When confronted by outraged international opinion, Khomeini denies everything calling the allegations of "suicide missions" imperialist slander against the Islamic government. In Iran, however, his rhetoric is, "The blood of our children washes the sins from our land." To the boys ready to leave for the war, his message is that their lives in the material world are pointless, that they are being given the opportunity to go to heaven, and that being killed in the war is the direct way to heaven. They are even given an actual key to wear around their neck so that they'll be able to open heaven's door. Their brainwashing is so thorough that if captured, the boys don't want to go home. Having promised to die for Khomeini, they are ashamed to be alive.

Since most of these children come from peasant and lower class families that have very likely already lost one or more males to the war, the mother may be desperate and ignorant enough to believe that she shares heaven with her sons and husband if she encourages and supports the recruitment of her family. Indeed, she has no other choice; after all, the war is for Islam and God, and resistance means execution.

The war between Iran and Iraq has had a disastrous impact on the Iranian society as a whole but for women in particular, it has been especially catastrophic. For an illiterate, unemployed, and already impoverished woman whose life and welfare are delicately balanced between the fragile security of absolute dependence on her men folk on one hand and complete ruin or even death on the other, any fluctuation damaged it. The challenges facing the Israeli peace movement make the obstacles before Israeli-Palestinian understanding are much greater than they were just months ago. At the same time, the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue has deep roots which give room to hope that, in spite of the blows dealt to it recently, it can survive. The Palestinian policy of seeking understanding and dialogue with the Islamic government is part of a wider strategy for enlisting world support, as other national liberation movements have sought to do. On the other hand, the Israeli left would lose its raison d'etre if it abandoned its struggle against occupation and for Palestinian rights. The accumulated network of mutual contacts and experience cannot be swept away, even if the current crisis has severely damaged it. The challenges facing the Israeli peace movement make possible a reassessment of the weight of each of its components. Cooperation with the more radical elements in the peace movement, small as they may be, should be resumed in light of the consistent commitment they have shown to the Palestinian cause. Past experience indicates that they played a key role in vitalizing the peace movement at the outbreak of the Lebanon war, when the Zionist left was still confused. Special attention should be paid to the moderate wing of the Zionist left. The moderates call for the continuation of the dialogue despite the conflicts which have arisen, and continue to view the PLO as the representative Palestinian body and to seek a political settlement with it. This camp includes various groups such as Women in Black and Yesh Gvul (There is a Limit), whose activists continue to perform acts of solidarity with the intifada despite internal conflicts over the larger international view. Explanations of the truth about the Palestinian position will find eager listeners among these elements, and will safeguard one of the intifada's most important gains.[-]
The largest US epidemiological study of Depo-Provera was conducted at the Grady Memorial Family Clinics in Atlanta, Georgia. Between 1967-1978, it is estimated that 11,000-14,000 women received at least one Depo-Provera injection at the Grady clinic. Both because of the study’s size and because the FDA weighs US data more heavily than foreign data in deciding on drug approval, the Grady study is an often cited addition to the human clinical literature on Depo-Provera. The Grady hospital and family planning clinics are located in a low-income section of downtown Atlanta. The hospital is built in the shape of an “H”; it was originally designed to accommodate segregated facilities, including two sets of reception areas, operating rooms, and entrances. Although it was desegregated in 1976, it soon served an over 90% black clientele, and is one of the largest charity hospitals in the country. The family planning clinic, run by Dr. Robert Hatcher, occupies the annex next door. At the clinic, pamphlets with titles like “The Joy of Birth Control” line magazine racks. Depo-Provera is one of the birth control methods described in the pamphlets, with no mention of the drug’s unapproved status. This oversight is consistent with the findings of an FDA audit conducted in 1978, involving interviews of clinic patients who had received Depo-Provera treatment in the clinic’s testing of the drug. As one of the FDA auditors, Dr. Alan Lisook, wrote—referring to both patients and clinic staff—“There was no common feeling that an investigation of an unproven drug was in fact taking place.” From 1967 to 1971, the Grady study was financed by Upjohn; in 1971 the FDA told Upjohn to terminate the tests. There are conflicting accounts as to why the testing was halted. Upjohn claims that the FDA told the company that it had submitted enough studies for approval. By 1974 testimony at Senate Health Subcommittee hearings on pharmaceutical companies revealed that FDA drug evaluation reports in 1971 had urged that all human testing of Depo-Provera be stopped within two weeks because animal studies indicated that the drug was too dangerous for continued human experimentation. In 1973, the FDA apparently changed its mind, and gave Hatcher and another Grady doctor approval to start a second test of the drug. “This was not any sort of scientific investigation,” admitted an FDA medical officer. “We really had a population of patients receiving treatment... approval of the study was really to allow them to continue receiving treatment.” But not all the patients continued. A new informed consent form was used, which explained that the drug could cause breast cancer and that it shouldn’t be used if the women wanted additional children. Of the 1200 women who were taking the drug, 500 dropped out of the study. Grady clinic did not submit any of the requisite annual reports on its study. Yet it took the FDA five years before it finally audited the study and revealed an array of abuses. After seeing the FDA’s written report of the audit, Rep. Ted Weiss (Democrat-New York), chair of the House Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, wrote to the FDA about some of the more flagrant abuses and virtual disregard of the law witnessed upon testing protocol: “It has come to my attention that FDA conducted an extensive on-site audit of the Grady study in 12/78,” Weiss wrote. “The FDA audit team cited serious deficiencies in the design and conduct of this study. These include:

1) On average the study lost 50 and gained 50 subjects per month, resulting in an overall turnover rate of 75%. Despite the large number of drop-outs, no provision was made for patient follow-up, including ‘longterm follow-up with regard to cancer.’

2) Although a 1973 protocol called for a total of 1100 subjects, FDA personnel estimated that 4400 women took the drug between 1973 and 1978.

3) Required reports to the FDA of deaths and adverse reactions to subject were not made. In addition, mandatory annual reports to FDA were not submitted.

4) Significant adverse reactions were not evaluated by the Grady clinical investigators.

5) The three-month interval between injections specified in the protocol was not followed. One woman, for example, received Depo-Provera injections on two consecutive days.

6) Women did not receive adequate protection as experimental test subjects: (a) The clinical investigation was carried out despite the unwillingness of the Emory University Institutional Review Board to approve it as ethically acceptable. In addition, the Emory Board never received required submissions, including safety reports, from the Grady clinical investigators. (b) Although it is thought to cause infertility, the drug was administered to teenagers, women without children, and women wanting more children in the future. (c) One woman was permitted to participate in the study even though she had a biopsy-proven carcinoma-in-situ of the cervix, a condition associated with Depo-Provera among women taking the drug in clinical trials. (d) Patients were kept on the drug despite the development of serious conditions. A woman was continued in the study despite terminal ductal hyperplasia, inflammation and stromal fibrosis as revealed by a breast biopsy. Another woman with hypertension and possible seizures was also continued in the Depo-Provera trials [experiments]. (e) Women received injections as much as one year before signing the required investigational drug trial consent forms. Perhaps not surprising, women interviewed by FDA personnel often did not realize they had been subjects in an investigation of an unapproved use of Depo-Provera.

According to FDA’s inspection report, both the study’s sponsor and the director of the Grady clinic agreed with all observations made by the (FDA) inspecional team.” When questioned about these problems during the Public Board of Inquiry hearings in 1983, Grady’s Dr. Hatcher commented, “To be very honest with you, we are not a research unit.” He admitted that he had not ever seen the protocol the clinic was supposed to be following until 1978, when the FDA audit team showed it to him. As for a protocol for long-term follow-up of patients who dropped out of the study, Hatcher explained, “We did not have a protocol, period, for our contacting them.” Despite the Grady study’s serious defects, the finding appeared in the 6/83 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association with this conclusion: “[T]his study indicates that there is not likely to be a strong association between medroxyprogesterone injections and cancer of the breast, uterine corpus, or ovary.” Rep. Weiss ended his letter to the FDA commissioner with the following questions: “...has FDA communicated with the Journal of the American Medical Association to request that it alert the medical community to serious deficiencies in data admitted by the agency?... Does FDA have an established policy for otherwise notifying the medical community of such information?” Other than terminate the Grady IND [Investigative New Drug status], did FDA take any other significant regulatory action in connection with several apparent violations of its investigational drug regulations?” The FDA’s answers to Weiss’ questions were all negative. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. [1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.] [= [24107. Greenberg, Eric J. “Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25. Alcohol and pornography magnate Edgar Bronfman broke with other Jewish leaders who have long refused to meet with Louis Farrakhan by meeting him over dinner; the dinner was arranged by Bronfman Denounces Farrakhan After Dining With Black Leader”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), November 22, 1996. p. A25.
references to the Holocaust were totally unacceptable to the Jewish community—indeed we called such usage inflammatory. I was hoping, as were you, that Minister Farrakhan had been serious when he discussed with you, after you had taped your interview with him, creating a new era in relations between the black Muslims and the Jews. We now know that he cannot find it in his heart to renounce his own anti-semitism. That is rather sad. Two things have become totally clear. One is that what Farrakhan and his gang are after is money. Number two, leopards don't change their spots, and this man is evil personified.*

In a letter to Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League, Bronfman wrote: "Looking back, your position has been reinforced. No self-respecting person, let alone a Jew, should have anything to do with him". Elian Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress notes: "It is not the first time that Edgar has taken a risk for the Jewish people, he put Farrakhan to the test and Farrakhan failed." [TXT]

Q: What is religious prostitution? Women are raised to accept their unfortunate destiny and believe that as a religious obligation. A: Under mullahism, it is called sigheh. Sigheh is a contract through which a woman rents her body for a certain period of time and for a certain amount of money. It could be for one night or many years and for any amount of money. Any ambiguity about these two conditions makes the contract invalid. The intercourse makes the contract effective and no divorce exists. The contract either dissolves when the duration is finished or the man doesn't want to continue. The woman has no right to dissolve the contract.

To make the contract, the woman only needs to say to the man in Arabic [as opposed to Farsi, the national language] that she sighehs herself to him, for how long and how much. Then the man says, "I accept." That's all! There are no witnesses and no registration. Is there any real fundamental difference between the way to sigheh a woman and to pick up a prostitute?

Yet the religious instructions and rules that a sigheh woman is subject to are extraordinarily oppressive for these women. A sigheh loses her freedom as soon as she goes through her contract and gets no long lasting benefit in return. She is treated and viewed as a slave. She has to give much more than the money she receives is worth.

A: Under mullahism, it is called sigheh. Sigheh is a contract through which a woman rents her body for a certain period of time and for a certain amount of money. It could be for one night or many years and for any amount of money. Any ambiguity about these two conditions makes the contract invalid. The intercourse makes the contract effective and no divorce exists. The contract either dissolves when the duration is finished or the man doesn't want to continue. The woman has no right to dissolve the contract.

To make the contract, the woman only needs to say to the man in Arabic [as opposed to Farsi, the national language] that she sighehs herself to him, for how long and how much. Then the man says, "I accept." That's all! There are no witnesses and no registration. Is there any real fundamental difference between the way to sigheh a woman and to pick up a prostitute?

Yet the religious instructions and rules that a sigheh woman is subject to are extraordinarily oppressive for these women. A sigheh loses her freedom as soon as she goes through her contract and gets no long lasting benefit in return. She is treated and viewed as a slave. She has to give much more than the money she receives is worth.

Q: Has the institution of prostitution changed in Iran since the money, but because of the position that she is in, she has to take what she can get. According to item 2515, Khomeini states that a sigheh woman is not allowed to have another contract for two months after her last contract has dissolved. At the same time, she receives no money during this period either.

The worst is another item (item 2426) which says that even if the woman, prior to the contract, doesn't know that she doesn't have these rights, her status won't change. She must continue the contract regardless. In these ways, as soon as she becomes a sigheh woman, she gains what is like a slave status, a status which adds to her oppression.

Q: How do the mullahs justify this practice?

A: Through a distortion of some Koranic verses, mullahs claim that there are two categories of marriages in Islam—permanent and temporary. A man can have four permanent wives and as many temporary ones as he can afford financially and handle physically. In this way, they say sigheh is marriage. But no matter what they call it, the nature speaks for itself.

Q: Do women who were prostitutes prior to Khomeini continue working under this new system?

A: Yes, they probably have not found other work. Now the work is the same except that they have to learn an Arabic sentence. But the root of the problem has worsened. Prostitution is the outcome of other fundamental social, economic, cultural and educational problems, which have reached their lowest point ever.

Q: What kind of payment do they earn?

A: These women who make sigheh contracts are from the lower class and are barely surviving. The sigheh woman receives very little money, but because of the position that she is in, she has to take what she can get. All of the humiliation in these religious instructions arise from the mullah's class attitude and sexual beliefs. The result is that a poor woman is viewed as an object for sexual satisfaction.

Q: If no one witnesses the sigheh contract except the man and the woman, who is to find out that a woman does in fact have sexual relations with another man before her two months is up?

A: If the woman was a prostitute before Khomeini, I don't believe that she would follow these religious instructions. But the problem remains for the women who had never been prostitutes. These women adopt the fanatical religious values, which in a man-woman relationship are almost always in favor of the man and repressive for the woman. Women are raised to accept their unfortunate destiny and believe that as women, particularly as poor women, this is the most they deserve. They fulfill the instructions voluntarily because they fear God.

Q: What would the status of a sigheh's child be?
A: This is one of the points that mullahs are very proud of and use to glorify sigheh and distinguish it from prostitution. They claim that in sigheh the status of the child is legal and the child benefits from the privilege of knowing the father. He or she is also an heir to the father. However, according to the mullahs' own instructions, a sigheh child and a child from a permanent marriage are treated differently even before being born. As I mentioned earlier, the father is not responsible for supporting his baby during pregnancy.

In social practice, in Iran, a child born of a sigheh marriage does not have the same dignity and respect that sisters and brothers from the permanent marriage have. Even if the sigheh wife lives with her husband, the child's life style differs greatly from that of the brothers and sisters. The simple fact is that sigheh women along with their children constitute a lower class, and the child suffers more than the mother from this status. I believe that a child would rather not know or inherit from the father than suffer lifetime humiliation.

Q: Do you think that religious sigheh women consider themselves more dignified than other prostitutes?
A: If the women are religious themselves, it seems that they would feel more dignity than other prostitutes who wouldn’t care for such laws. The prostitutes use the contract just to be able to work and live. But they are a small group. The majority of women who make sigheh contracts, because they are religious, do not consider themselves prostitutes. This is a very subtle point. Yes, they are religious, but their beliefs are being used against them. Their problem is that they are illiterate, unskilled, unemployed and poor. The war has crucially increased their numbers: hundreds of thousands of war widows and wives of war-disabled men are added to this section of the population. Furthermore, the economy is worsening daily. More than four million people are unemployed. As a result, today, the number of women in need is astronomical.

What I ask is why shouldn't these women enjoy a better life? I look at the matter in another way. I say that the regime is responsible for raising the standard of living of these women instead of dragging them into sigheh and leaving them as a slave-prostitute.

Q: How was prostitution under the Shah?
A: During the time of the Shah, prostitutes were segregated and lived in special quarters of the cities. Of course, there were some who worked on the streets. In Tehran, the quarter was called Qaleh, which was a kind of non-military fortress. Qaleh had high walls and was cordoned off by the police. The police kept the area from spreading and enforced some measures of cleanliness. There was little welfare for the prostitutes, except some measure of health control, literacy classes and school for their children.

A: What did Khomeini do with Qaleh when he took over?
A: When Khomeini took over, he started his so-called Islamic anti-prostitution campaign. His people attacked Qaleh and burned the brothels. Qaleh was closed and some prostitutes were taken to a house in the northern part of Tehran. Mullahs gave them religious and military instruction. They now use these women as sigheh women for themselves and the revolutionary guards. Militarily they are used to suppress women's opposition at demonstrations.

Mullahs also executed prostitutes. In Kerman, a major city in Iran, the method of execution was very brutal. They dug holes in the ground and buried the prostitutes up to their neck and then stoned them to death.

Q: What is the current situation of sighehs?
A: A letter, which was sent from Iran a few months ago by an Iranian women's resistance group to inform the world of the regime's anti-women campaign, explains that special centers have been established for the widowed women of the war. These women wait at the centers all day for a man to sigheh them. The letter mentions that this official market of religious prostitution has provided an opportunity for the influential men of the regime to select and possess "the best" for themselves. In addition, mullahs have made an effort to stress the "privileges" of sigheh contracts through the mass media which is totally in their hands.

Further Reading: "In God's Name," Connexions n. 11, Winter 1984. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712. Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] =

As thousands of American troops are being rushed to guard Kuwait, Kuwaitis are living their plush lifestyle in the expensive restaurants that fill the emirate. Many are socializing in the most visible symbols of the US liberation of Kuwait from Iraq, the fast food franchises: McDonalds, Pizza Hut, Kentucky Fried Chicken, Fuddruckers, and Baskin-Robbins. While Iraqis starve, the major social concern in Kuwait has become obesity: the Ministry of Health reports that half of all Kuwaitis are overweight. Most Kuwaitis are tended by foreign servants, and spend the evening channel surfing through satellite TV channels. A Danish study attributes the obesity to post traumatic stress; now many Kuwaiti women are trying to loose weight with diet pills prescribed by indulgent physicians. [TEXT]

As thousands of American troops are being rushed to guard Kuwait, Kuwaitis are living their plush lifestyle in the expensive restaurants that fill the emirate. Many are socializing in the most visible symbols of the US liberation of Kuwait from Iraq, the fast food franchises: McDonalds, Pizza Hut, Kentucky Fried Chicken, Fuddruckers, and Baskin-Robbins. While Iraqis starve, the major social concern in Kuwait has become obesity: the Ministry of Health reports that half of all Kuwaitis are overweight. Most Kuwaitis are tended by foreign servants, and spend the evening channel surfing through satellite TV channels. A Danish study attributes the obesity to post traumatic stress; now many Kuwaiti women are trying to loose weight with diet pills prescribed by indulgent physicians. [TEXT]

The widespread appearance in Iraqi children of a number of inexplicable new symptoms, including leukemia and childhood cancers, has been traced by UN and Iraqi medical workers to US radiological munitions. Massive amounts of such materials are scattered throughout Iraq. A report by the UK Atomic...
Energy Authority finds that at least 40 tons of depleted uranium munitions were used in the war, in both Iraq and Kuwait. Many of these uranium pellets are now being used as toys by Iraqi children. Iraqi public health officials fear that depleted uranium also contaminated soil and drinking water sources. This would create a contaminated environment that would expose Iraqis to excessive radiation for generations. Although the US claims that there is no significant radiation for such uranium, when the director of Switzerland's Institute for Nuclear Technology arrived in Berlin with an improvised radiometric equipment, he was immediately arrested for having dangerous radioactives: the pellet was immediately sealed in a lead lined case by the German government. Foreign doctors have seen children playing with the depleted uranium pellets. Notably, the depleteduranium is made available to munitions producers by nuclear weaponproduction facilities, thus allowing a path for disposal of radioactive wastes in the Third World as a byproduct of aggressive wars there. [Hospins is an MD who is working in Iraq; this report was originally published by the Communist Party of India in India.] [TXT]

24113. Hussein, Saddam. Excerpts of Remarks Exchanged between Saddam Hussein and Some British Families Detained by Iraq at Vital Iraqi Installations on August 23, 1990. Hussein: Good morning. We've come to see how you are doing. You are British? Of all of you? [Answer] Yes. We are a British family. [Hussein] When did you come here? [Answer] For myself, four days. [Hussein] Are all your needs, whatever you require available? Are you getting your milk, Stewart? [Answer] With corn flakes, too. [Hussein] I do not think all the Iraqi kids can get corn flakes now. Do you have any younger one? [Answer] I have a brother, fourteen. [Hussein] Do you have enough place for exercise? [Answer] Volleyball? .... [Hussein] And the ladies, how are you passing time? I am sure you prefer to be in Britain now. I am an Iraqi and I realize that if I were in your shoes I would rather be in Iraq, my country. But sometimes one is forced to face situations which are not of one's own choice. Your presence here and in other places is meant to prevent the scourge of war, to avoid the war. In Arabic, we say preventing danger. There is a semantic problem in the English language here. We, in our communique, used the dar' in Arabic, which means "to put away or to prevent or to avoid" the scourge of war or the danger of war. We use the word dar', which means in Arabic "to prevent." But when we used this word, the Western media used a different word. The pronunciation of the word dar' was changed into dar' [including the sound of the Arabic letter 'ayn ], which means "shield." And they thought that we were using people as a shield rather than as a dar', which we meant, which means "to prevent" war. So there was perhaps deliberate misinterpretation or inadvertent misinterpretation of our wording of the communiqué. [Hussein] Stewart, will, I am sure, be happy to have as part of life or his personal history that he played a role in maintaining peace. So when he, along with his friends and along with those present, here have played a role in preventing war, then they will be heroes of peace. I am sure that you all have your own journals, your own diaries, perhaps, and will jot down whatever you have as feelings or as recollections or as impressions of the day. And in any case your presence now and in this sort of atmosphere is not a source of pleasure to us. It does not make us happy. What would make us happy would be to see you back in your countries or to see you roaming the streets of Baghdad in the normal way, as you used to do. So please forgive us because we, like you, have our own children, like Stewart, and like Tan. And we also have our own women like you and have our own families. And we would know how you feel, but we are trying to prevent a war from happening. And we hope that your presence as guests here is not going to be for too long. Now I am prepared to listen to whatever you would want to say and to receive whatever questions you may have. And would like you see you as comfortable as you wish to be in a democratic atmosphere, because we in fact here are more democratic than some quarters which claim for themselves to be, because in the past few days I have come across articles published in Western newspapers, so-called democratic newspapers, in which the writers urge the President to actually strike at Iraq and actually use force against Iraq and Baghdad despite the fact of your presence here. And this, in fact is a sign of the falsehood of this so-called democracy and their so-called concern for human life. Because they talk about human life and humanitarian issues and yet they urge President Bush to strike despite your presence. We are truly concerned about your welfare and well-being here. We would want you to be safe and to return to your country. And this is not meant to be propaganda. I am not speaking for propaganda purposes, but it is truly a humanitarian concern that we want you to be safe. It is our religion, it is our duty, as both Iraqis, as Arabs, and as human beings that we would want you to be safe. We would like you to go back to your country, but I might say not because we are finding your-hospitality, or your presence as guests here, heavy on us. On the contrary, we only want you to have your freedom and go back to your country.

[Unidentified speaker] We appreciate that you have come in person, since nobody else had been able to answer questions. [Hussein] I am here to answer all your questions. [Unidentified speaker] You have school-going children here, right here. Who will begin, in about in a week's time, on the first of September. [Hussein] As for schoolchildren, we hope that your presence here is not going to be long. But despite that, if by the time school begins and you are still here in Iraq, we are going to exert unusual efforts to make sure that the children are not deprived of their school years. And we will send to you experts from our Ministry of Education to see the curricula and the levels of schooling so that everything that we can prepare so that the children will not lose the opportunity. All religions urge us to learn more and more, and to continue our learning. And in our religion, the first time God Almighty addressed the prophet Muhammad--blessings be upon his soul--through Gabriel, God said to Muhammad: "Read," and that was the first instruction. So, reading and learning is the fundamental thing in the life of a person, and we know what it means. One would have wished that the kind of circumstances could have been reversed. We would like to have the opportunity to see you in a different kind of situation. But it has happened, and we are faced with the outcome of actions, some of which have come by chance or coincidence, and some of which have come actually by deliberate scheme. But we, for our part, we shall try to treat you in the same way as we treat Iraqis, the people of Iraq, because you are not hostages. We want nothing from Britain or the United States. We want nothing from them. They owe us nothing. We owe them nothing. The question should be addressed to them: What had Iraq taken away from you which has made you bring your forces threatening Iraq and the land and territory of God and the Muslims? What has Iraq done to deserve so? We have taken nothing from London or from any other English cities. We have taken nothing away from the United States. We have our viewpoint, in any case the Arab nation is one nation, a single nation. British colonialism cut away the Third World as a byproduct of aggressive wars there. [Unidentified speaker] We appreciate that you have come in person, since nobody else had been able to answer questions. [Hussein] I am here to answer all your questions. [Unidentified speaker] You have school-going children here, right here. Who will begin, in about in a week's time, on the first of September. [Hussein] As for schoolchildren, we hope that your presence here is not going to be long. But despite that, if by the time school begins and you are still here in Iraq, we are going to exert unusual efforts to make sure that the children are not deprived of their school years. And we will send to you experts from our Ministry of Education to see the curricula and the levels of schooling so that everything that we can prepare so that the children will not lose the opportunity. All religions urge us to learn more and more, and to continue our learning. And in our religion, the first time God Almighty addressed the prophet Muhammad--blessings be upon his soul--through Gabriel, God said to Muhammad: "Read," and that was the first instruction. So, reading and learning is the fundamental thing in the life of a person, and we know what it means. One would have wished that the kind of circumstances could have been reversed. We would like to have the opportunity to see you in a different kind of situation. But it has happened, and we are faced with the outcome of actions, some of which have come by chance or coincidence, and some of which have come actually by deliberate scheme. But we, for our part, we shall try to treat you in the same way as we treat Iraqis, the people of Iraq, because you are not hostages. We want nothing from Britain or the United States. We want nothing from them. They owe us nothing. We owe them nothing. The question should be addressed to them: What had Iraq taken away from you which has made you bring your forces threatening Iraq and the land and territory of God and the Muslims? What has Iraq done to deserve so? We have taken nothing from London or from any other English cities. We have taken nothing away from the United States. We have our viewpoint, in any case the Arab nation is one nation, a single nation. British colonialism cut away the Third World as a byproduct of aggressive wars there. [Hospins is an MD who is working in Iraq; this report was originally published by the Communist Party of India in India.] [TXT] would be in a position to destroy this force in defense of your honor, national honor and sense of your own future. Same thing, same feelings, same situation is here now. We do not want war to come about despite the fact that we know that we can smash and crush any attack that may take place. So the question that has to be posed by all of us to Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Bush is: What has Iraq taken away from them which has made them bring their armed forces to the region threatening the people of the area, threatening Iraq with an attack and destruction? What has Iraq done against them? Had Iraq taken anything from them and Iraq does not know it, let them tell us what we have taken away from them so that we may be able to return it to them. In my opinion they will fail to find anything. I am sure they will fail, and they will find that world public opinion will turn against them, even inside England and inside the United States. I am sure you would be able to see Arab public opinion, which direction it takes. Arab public opinion is against foreign presence, or the presence of foreign forces on Arab territory. And if time drags on, with the presence of foreign forces still on our territory, you will find that the agents and regimes under foreign tutelage will fail one by one. But in any case, I hope and I pray that your presence here in this kind of situation will not be long, and that you will go back to your country, and perhaps we will become friends. Any more questions?

[Question] We realize your determination. Our families know we know of your determination, but we would like them to know that we are well and in good health?

[Hussein] Yes, we shall make sure that your messages will reach your families in England. So, as of now, you can write your letters, and if you want to send photographs...

[Hussein] I must say, I must be exact and accurate in saying to you now that, regrettably, nobody has conducted any negotiations or any dialogue as yet. Our foreign minister went to Amman and there he announced that Iraq would be prepared to get into negotiations. And the response came immediately after the foreign minister issued this statement--it was immediate, it was so quick--in this manner the US Administration has responded to all our initiatives. They said immediately that they were not prepared to conduct any dialogue with Iraq before Iraq has withdrawn or left Kuwait, as if Kuwait were Washington. Our response is that neither the Iraqis, nor the Arabs in general, would be prepared to accept dialogue under blackmail. You will notice in this situation that there is accusation of being un-democratic, that the Iraqis are now asking for dialogue when the so-called democratic West are refusing dialogue. But in any case, the situation will clear up.... We have so far issued two initiatives.... In any case, President Bush and others may learn a great deal from Iraq on the humanitarian level and even on the level of more accurate stands. And before all this, and more important than all of this, is the fact that the Iraqi people and the Arab nation will again teach them how to be civilized. I am happy to have met you and to know you, even though I would have preferred to have met you well and in good health?

[Hussein] Yes, we shall make sure that your messages will reach your families in England. So, as of now, you can write your letters, and if you want to send photographs...

[Hussein] I must say, I must be exact and accurate in saying to you now that, regrettably, nobody has conducted any negotiations or any dialogue as yet. Our foreign minister went to Amman and there he announced that Iraq would be prepared to get into negotiations. And the response came immediately after the foreign minister issued this statement--it was immediate, it was so quick--in this manner the US Administration has responded to all our initiatives. They said immediately that they were not prepared to conduct any dialogue with Iraq before Iraq has withdrawn or left Kuwait, as if Kuwait were Washington. Our response is that neither the Iraqis, nor the Arabs in general, would be prepared to accept dialogue under blackmail. You will notice in this situation that there is accusation of being un-democratic, that the Iraqis are now asking for dialogue when the so-called democratic West are refusing dialogue. But in any case, the situation will clear up.... We have so far issued two initiatives.... In any case, President Bush and others may learn a great deal from Iraq on the humanitarian level and even on the level of more accurate stands. And before all this, and more important than all of this, is the fact that the Iraqi people and the Arab nation will again teach them how to be civilized. I am happy to have met you and to know you, even though I would have preferred to have met you well and in good health?
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D. [=]

24114. Hussein, Saddam. Message on "Iraqi Child Day" from Saddam Hussein on October 12, 1990. In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate: Our message today goes out to the children, even if on this occasion we are also addressing ourselves to adult minds. As we celebrate the day of the Iraqi child, we also observe the day of the children of the Arabism and the children of the world, and not only the children of dear Palestine—the heroes of the stones, every one of whom is acting like a hero of our nation taking on injustice and Satan in the same camp as their fathers and their patient mujahidin brothers. When, on this day, we ponder the great significance of this particular day being named as day of the child, we must recall all the humanitarian principles, without which we do not believe man can become free or happiness prevail in human society. In this year, the invocation of the means to bring about the happiness of children will be fraught with all the dangers inherent in the economic blockade and the threat of military force by imperialism and invader armies. It is significant in the uniqueness of these circumstances and their implications. A few days ago, specifically on 10/3/1990, the whole world observed the international day of the child. The observance was attended, and speeches were made by anyone who could be there. Some of them proposed partial solutions to childhood conditions, just as they used to propose partial solutions to issues bearing on key issues of human society. Typical of those responsible for human tragedies when they distance themselves from universality, and thus distance themselves from the right thinking and the right remedy, they sought to divorce the question of childhood from the subject of life. For us, however, it is inconceivable that a happy childhood can be attained without happy lives for their adult fathers, mothers, and relatives. In that international gathering, some speakers argued that to eliminate starvation of children in the world, they would need several billion dollars. It is natural that the rich and those responsible for the travails of humanity should find it virtually impossible to admit that this human goal is achievable and that this sum can be made available for that noble objective. We see clearly that there is an inseparable link between children's happiness and the communities in which they live. We submit that there can be no freedom for the children without pure milk and pure clothing of a chaste mother. Such conditions are impossible to obtain in circumstances of hunger and want, or where the alleviations of affluence in a community sated in all its wants cause the envy of a community yearning for all that it wants and needs. We find that true happiness cannot be divorced from a sense of dignity, and that decent bread is only possible when it is mixed in dignity. A child will only be free in a free community. A child cannot be born free in a family enslaved by shackles of others, for in time, it is bound to become similarly enslaved. Children of the world become free and healthy when all the adults of the world become free and possess what it takes to be healthy. The children of the world can have no secure future except under circumstances of equality. The children of any society cannot be free except when their societies have equal opportunities with other societies and enjoy their freedom equally. In a world dominated by the rich whose humanity is eaten up by greed, the wealth of these rich can only spawn destitution causing hunger and disease.

A child whose parents are enslaved by denial of equal opportunities and livelihood, and whose mother's milk is soiled with vice, cannot be enslaved itself. And its sense of enslavement will haunt it, even if in adulthood, he manages to free himself of the shackles of material slavery. The big difference in the level of scientific and technological progress and economic development among societies will always effect the type of outlook and conduct that will give rise to a feeling of superiority in these fields and a kind of superior outlook and conduct on the part of the society of tyrants over societies that are less developed. All this will produce suffering afflicting the present and future of children, after having afflicted their parents, and causing them to lose their ability to deal properly with life. Wherever there is a difference in the opportunity to choose, a difference in freedom and liberation will result. Consequently, the difference in freedom at the expense of others will distance those who enjoy freedom without limit from God and from those who are deprived of freedom and its requirements without having any imminent hope. For, possessing absolute freedom of action over the destiny of other humans will keep those who practice this approach at a distance from God, just as those who are able to achieve all their wishes and whims are distanced from God. This applies to those who possess wealth that is not limited by law or morality in an impoverished society. It also applies to those who are capable and who use their capabilities negatively in weak societies.

We view national society as one society; the pan-Arab society as one; and the world as one human society. There is no room for discrimination, which creates differences in human dealings on any religious, ethnic or other basis, to prevail in these societies. It is on the grounds of misunderstanding of the above which is detailed in all religions, primarily the true Islamic religion—that the children in Africa and in other places have remained hungry and enslaved and died because of hunger. This is not because food and medicine are not provided by human organizations the way they should be, or because they have not provided them at all, but because the proper living conditions have not been made available to their fathers and mothers as they should be. And, if the adults are not provided with the proper living conditions, a living cannot be provided for the children. Consequently, if anyone wants to help children there, they should help adults as well, in terms of job opportunities and sound living. The decisions adopted by human societies should be replaced, or, other decisions issued by political leaders should be concomitant with the former. Moreover, the required funds should be spent on development projects, and not just on projects to provide food and medicine for children. This is because, if poverty remains, it will produce a continuing lack in children's milk and medicine. Happiness will never be achieved if poverty continues. Some of those who attended the celebration of the international day of the child and who delivered high-sounding speeches, including Bush, have spent more than $20 billion on the armies of invasion and other armies that came to the land of Najid and Hejaz [Saudi Arabia] and the Arabian Gulf. Specialized human organizations and societies have not been able to provide this sum for children who are dying of hunger or of disease because medicine is either scarce or not available at all. Those who are shedding crocodile tears, on the international day of the child, over the future of children that are dying in the world are the same ones, they and their regimes, who are responsible for those tragedies, and we hold them responsible today for the tragedy of any Iraqi child that dies because of a shortage of food or medicine caused by their unjust blockade. They and their regimes are responsible for all this. Also, they are responsible for all the tragedies of wars and civil wars in the world, be it directly or because of their intrigues and conspiracies. Therefore, they alone are responsible not only for the tragedy of the Palestinian people and the Zionists' oppression of them in general, but also for the persecution and crimes against the children of Palestine in particular. Those who believe that everything in the lives of others can be bought are true to their nature because they themselves put up everything in their lives for sale. This had been their feelings and behavior in their relations with Iraq before 2 August. Therefore, the Croesus of Kuwait and his henchmen were dragged into their schemes after their vision and hearts were blinded by the wealth that had been stolen from the great Iraqi people. They believed, curse them, that they were able, through their usurpation and wealth, to tamper with the values of the Iraqis and with the sacred virtues in which they believed. They thought they could not only enslave and corrupt the lives of adults but also enslave children in pursuit of their despicable aims. The duty toward God and the national and noble pan-Arab and human duty compelled us to carry out what overcame the Croesuses on 2 August, the victorious day of the call. Thus, not only were Iraqi men and women able to remain free, but a great opportunity was made for a freedom whose waves are expanding, God willing, across the Arab homeland and the entire world. My beloved children of Iraq, I am aware that you love sweets, despite the harm they cause to your beautiful teeth. Many of you, especially the very young, live on imported milk, and the quantity of this milk available in Iraq has been reduced because of the blockade that Bush has imposed. He is abetted in his crime by Zionism and its creation, Israel, which usurped the Palestinian land. I and your... comrades in the leadership feel with you, and we are living through what some of you are suffering. We will do what determined and valiant men should do whose conscience is filled with responsibility. Our aim is to alleviate your suffering to the best of our ability, as God wishes us to do. However, the shortage or unavailability of sweets is less harmful compared to what Bush wants. Bush wants to enslave you after enslaving your fathers and mothers. Shame on him and shame on those who stand behind him with bowed heads and shameless faces. Bush wants to take control of your present and that of your families so that he can dominate your future in order to satisfy Zionism, evil Israel, and imperialist ambitions. Therefore, your fathers have proudly rejected Bush's wishes and preferred what God wants for every free people, so that you might remain proud, O beloved ones. Abundance, sweets along with pride, a decent present, and a bright future are all coming with the steadfastness of your fathers and mothers. Honor will remain protected and safe, God willing. Children are the beloved of God. They are our beloved from all nationalities, races, and religions, be they in Iraq, Palestine, and the Arab homeland, or all over the face of the globe. God is great. Ignorosity to those who kill childhood and life and alienate themselves from God, the One and Only One. [signed] Saddam Hussein, 10/12/1990. [Reprinted from Fred Moore (compiler). Iraq Speaks: Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D.]

24115. Hussein, Saddam. Remarks by President Saddam Hussein During his Visit with Some Families on August 28, 1990. I have been told that we have a birthday today. Happy birthday Rachel. Sometimes even unpleasant coincidences open chances for friendship and pleasant results. I appreciate, under the circumstance, as I earlier told your comrades, your feelings of annoyance at not being allowed to travel because, if I were in your place, or if my family were in your place, then I would have the same feeling. However, politicians are forced sometimes to look at things in such a manner that is beyond what can be directly seen. For example, if it were to do with my human feelings toward you as individuals, I would have immediately said that you should leave. However, when we view matters through a wider perspective involving a much greater number of people and their destiny, be they foreigners or Iraqis. If a military conflagration takes place, God forbid, between Iraq and the armies brought by the United States and its allies, if we visualize the losses that will result from such a conflagration, if it were to happen and if we view your presence here as guests of Iraq at a certain time as something that may prevent such a conflagration, or that this presence may contribute toward preventing such a conflagration, then we would find ourselves in predicament in which are compelled to take decision we have taken. This means that a number of foreigners have been kept to prevent the death of many more foreigners. Of course, if war were to erupt, many Iraqis will also die, or, the way we look at it, will fall as martyrs, if the war were to take place, because they would be defending their homeland, their own existence, and their holy places. As you know, the economic and scientific installations in Iraq operate round the clock and workers are accommodated within the same scientific and economic installations. If war erupts, these installations will be the target of this war, as clearly stated by some Western officials and by Western media. Therefore, we expect that a large number of pretty Iraqi children, just like yours, would perish if these installations were to be attacked. Among the most important things that we should take into consideration is the inhuman act that the President of the United States has committed. It is he and his administration that should be asked why they have come to this area. Initially, they said they were coming to the area to defend Saudi Arabia. Once the weakness of this pretext had been discovered, they began saying that they came to defend oil. I think that each and every one of you know--and you have lived in the region--that the people of the region do not intend to keep the oil in their pockets; they want to sell it to the United States, Japan, and Europe. The revenues from oil would be used in development, and Western and Japanese companies in general are the ones that help carry out development projects, whether in Iraq or other places. So the oil would be sold to the West, and the revenues from oil will be used in projects in the region executed by Western companies. The claim of defending oil, therefore, is groundless. The question should be posed to the US Administration: Why do you want to embroil the world and yourselves--the American people--in a war that, by all standards and by the simplest scenarios, will not be an easy war. You know, and I think that the politicians in your country know that we do not beg the sympathy of anybody. We respect the views of people. When we go out of our way and open a dialogue with you--and you are ordinary citizens--it is not because we want to beg sympathy from your learning. We want to preserve the respect for the human being. God almighty and his Holy Koran taught us that there is no difference between whites and blacks, Westerners and Easterners, Arabs and non-Arabs except in the manner in which they worship God. The most difficult thing is to punish someone for doing something he did not know was prohibited. The war, if it erupts, will be a kind of severe punishment to people. As the Iraqis and the Arabs will lose sons, women, and children, the aggressive parties will also lose men, children and women. By this I mean the attackers and their allies.

If the United States attacks installations and the installations have children, women, and civilians accommodated inside them, these persons would be killed. The weaponry owned by Iraq might not be capable of reaching the United States, but it can reach its allies. When Iraq attacks installations and factories in cities, it is expected that children, women, men, and civilians inside the installations will also die, in addition to the soldiers who will die on the front in Iraq. This is of course in addition to the destruction in all aspects of life. When we face such a possibility--not an easy possibility--it would not be wrong to enter into dialogue with peoples concerned about the outcome of such action, especially after we have found that doors are shut or half-shut by the concerned administrations as regards starting a dialogue and holding direct talks to find solutions which would rule out the scourge of war. When I conduct such a dialogue with you and before you--we coincidentally found at a place we visited that all those present were British--I do so, first because we respect the human being, and second, because we depend on dialogue to convey to the people the actual facts as they are and not as the deeply-involved parties wish to portray them to their people. After the last meeting, we read the criticisms directed at us by some British politicians. They were very upset at the meeting. I do not see why they are so upset. It seems they were upset because they do not want the British people to learn facts from sources other than the British channels, which have become involved in faulty estimates. They even played a role in involving the US Administration, in addition to the roles played by some of those called the allies of the United States in the region. Their estimates were extremely dangerous and mistaken. Consequently, they have pushed events to the point they have now reached. Some Western politicians say that Iraq's measures are inhuman. I would agree with them that these measures are inhuman, had we had other options with which we could prevent the scourge of war. I also agree that it would be inhuman if the objective is inhuman. If it is merely revenge or aimed at causing harm it is inhuman. But this is hosting under difficult circumstances--and I know it is under difficult circumstances--this is one of the factors to prevent war. Therefore, it should have another description. For the sake of comparison even in this narrow field, in the wake of our measure, some Western states held Iraqis in order to keep them. Just because a number of their nationals were held, or hosted, a number of Iraqis were held. What will the situation be if what is taking place against Iraq is an attempt to invade Iraq, and not just holding a number of Iraqi citizens? What if the situation is reversed? If Iraq wanted to invade Paris, Washington, or London can we imagine the measures that would be taken by these states? They forgot all that they have been saying about democracy and freedom when they learned that some of their nationals are not allowed to travel outside Iraq; they held the Iraqi nationals who are in their states. Despite these details, some of which might be wrong, the question should be addressed to the people who brought their fleets, air bases, and armies: Why have you come to invade Iraq? Why have you excluded the opportunity of an Arab solution and holding a dialogue to reach a political solution that will achieve tranquility in the region away from war? Now, I will try to answer your questions and anything related to your situation. We may think of dispatching some of you to carry a message of peace to your Western governments in which you address the direct question: Why have you
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

---
come to the region as invaders although your legitimate interests are guaranteed in accordance with all criteria—present and past? Those of you who will undertake this mission will be heroes of peace contrary to those who seek heroism through reckless adventure from which they will only harvest disappointment and loss. The lecture is heavy, particularly on the children who do not understand politics. I am ready to answer your questions, suggestions, and needs.

[Question from an unidentified person] How can you leaders use children in an issue children cannot understand?

[Hussein] The question is legitimate and expected from a respectable lady the one who put this question. I ask myself the same question, but in another way. My answer is: As far as I am concerned, being in charge here, the question is: Is it acceptable to kill people without a legitimate objective? Except in self-defense, is it acceptable to kill people? Even in the case of self defense, would it not be better if there was another means other than to kill in self-defense? All of us have seen films about wars and know that if warplanes attack cities, they will kill beautiful Iraqi children just like the children sitting in front of me, and who have mothers too. Women will also be killed. This military buildup in the holy land came to strike at Iraq, to kill women, children, old men, as well as soldiers, who have neither attacked the United States nor Britain. My answer to the lady's question is that it is not acceptable to harm a human being outside the framework of self defense. Even a case such as that is a forced situation to which we have no alternative. So for my part, as being in authority in Iraq, I am ready for a direct, immediate dialogue with Mr. Bush and Mrs. Thatcher. If they wish, so that the public opinion can learn the logic of the concerned parties so as to be able to pass fair judgments, let the debate between them and me be televised in front of world public opinion as a whole. Therefore, Iraq, for its part, is neither responsible for detaining anybody, nor responsible for the intentional death of anybody, but Iraq found itself in a forced situation. Iraq believes that among the ways to prevent war is not allowing you to travel abroad until further notice.

[Comment by a man who is on a honeymoon with his wife] It would be better for us to be in our country rather than here, and that the best peace message is to be in touch with our families. We would like to be allowed to go to France to spend our honeymoon there where we can meet with fellow Frenchmen who are beginning to understand the situation and we can explain it.

[Hussein] I agree with what the questioner, who seems to be from France, has said. I said that from the humanitarian point of view, I am hurt as much as you are. Or let me say, to be accurate, some of you may be more hurt. I say I empathize as a human being due to the circumstances that led you to this situation. At any rate, I understand the humanitarian implications you are talking about, as being people who found themselves in a situation against their will. I am confident, or hope, that your stay here as forced guests will not be long.

[Question from an unidentified person] Is it possible to propose an initiative which could lead to a peaceful solution, and would such an initiative allow children and women to leave?

[Hussein] In the first place, anyone is expected to make such a proposal, which has been put forward by the US gentleman who posed the question. However, I wish you to know that some states did not appreciate our decision to allow some citizens to leave. In other words, some states did not consider this a gesture of goodwill that could lead to an in-depth dialogue to ward off the scourge of war from the region. Despite this, the proposal by the speaker is expected to come from anyone or any man because men always try to keep any harm from children and women. Despite this, the circumstances are difficult and people such as the Iraqis cannot make all the humanitarian choices they would like to make if the circumstances were different. Some of you might know the Iraqis and their character and can give them descriptions different from the descriptions given them by some governments. You might not have known that some of your governments have decided to deprive Iraq of food, children's milk, and medicine. Such a measure has never been taken before in the world. Ladies and gentlemen: Do you not know that when children are deprived of milk their health becomes weak, they will not be able to resist disease, and hundreds, if not thousands, will die? Do you know how many men, women, and children will die if they have no medicine? Do you not know that a person will die if he is deprived of food? If Iraq had not taken precautions for such a possibility, people would die, and if the land of the Euphrates is not generous with the Iraqis, people will die. While you are here in our country you are aware that we have neither deprived you of food or medicines, nor deprived your children of milk. If there is any shortage, please let me know directly because the instructions are clear and firm: the children of our foreign guests should have milk, medicine, and food. Therefore, the cutting off food and medicine is overt, not covert. It is not to talk to a journalist; it is the current blockade. This is illegal. We asked Mr. Waldheim when he visited Iraq: Is there anything in the UN Charter that deprives people of food, medicine, and children's milk? He said that nothing in the UN Charter allows this in any situation. However, this is the outcome of the American implementation of the idea of boycott and embargo. The British Government is cooperating with it. Regrettably, the European and Japanese administrations have not said that this is unacceptable in human terms. How do you expect the situation would be if such a blockade were imposed on you in Britain or France? Would you not be angry against whoever imposed such a blockade on you to kill you, your children, and your sick people because of the lack of medicine? Despite this, I believe that you have noticed through your contact with the people that our people do not harbor any rancor against anyone; they hate the decisions and acts, but not the people. Those who make such decisions do not have sufficient knowledge about the Arab mentality or Iraqi mentality. The Iraqis are ready to eat dirt and to not bow their heads to the aggressive invaders. I think they want to be the object of your respect and that of the world when they prove to the tyrants that they are people who can live without accepting humiliation and disgrace. The next months and years will prove--if the blockade lasts for years-- that all estimations made on the basis that the blockade can subjugate the Iraqis are incorrect and baseless. The president: I thank the French lady for her flattery. For, after all, I am only a human being who needs the ordinary people to tell him what is right and what is wrong concerning his conduct, because God Almighty has taught us such principles, when He said in His Holy Book, the Qutan: "If ye are grateful, I will add more favors unto you." This address is from God to man. You, as believers, know that God does only what is right; nevertheless, He asks man, who is his own creation, to do what He asks. God Almighty uses dialogue to convince his servant, the human being. So, we, the servants of God, no matter how intelligent anyone of us is, still need the help of each other to attain the image that we are supposed to attain, in human terms. I thank the lady for this flattery and I say to her: Yes, all French politicians are our friends. We had expected them, before doing anything, to talk with us and ask us about right and wrong, so that we could answer them. Regrettably, however, they have not done so.

Proceeding from this, therefore, and depending on other evidence that we found through our links with other countries, it became clear to us that the United States has reached a degree of arrogance and brute force - here, I mean the US Administration, not the US citizen--to the extent that there is no longer anyone who can simply say no, when this no is addressed to the United States. It seems that the economy and its repercussions in Europe have reached a point that is sometimes--unless the Europeans take notice of this--at the expense of their humanity. For what can the United States use to pressure the Soviet Union, France, or Italy? It can use the economy to apply this pressure. It seems that some political leaders of these countries are no longer capable of withstanding such pressure. Therefore, they have begun to appease the United States to the degree that this appeasement is a danger not only to the whole of humanity, but to Europe itself. It is obvious, therefore, that although Iraq is a friend of France--and we suppose that France can initiate a dialogue with do not have sufficient knowledge about the Arab mentality or Iraqi mentality. The Iraqis are ready to eat dirt and to not bow their heads to the aggressive invaders. I think they want to be the object of your respect and that of the world when they prove to the tyrants that they are people who can live without accepting humiliation and disgrace. The next months and years will prove--if the blockade lasts for years-- that all estimations made on the basis that the blockade can subjugate the Iraqis are incorrect and baseless. The president: I thank the French lady for her flattery. For, after all, I am only a human being who needs the ordinary people to tell him what is right and what is wrong concerning his conduct, because God Almighty has taught us such principles, when He said in His Holy Book, the Qutan: "If ye are grateful, I will add more favors unto you." This address is from God to man. You, as believers, know that God does only what is right; nevertheless, He asks man, who is his own creation, to do what He asks. God Almighty uses dialogue to convince his servant, the human being. So, we, the servants of God, no matter how intelligent anyone of us is, still need the help of each other to attain the image that we are supposed to attain, in human terms. I thank the lady for this flattery and I say to her: Yes, all French politicians are our friends. We had expected them, before doing anything, to talk with us and ask us about right and wrong, so that we could answer them. Regrettably, however, they have not done so.

Proceeding from this, therefore, and depending on other evidence that we found through our links with other countries, it became clear to us that the United States has reached a degree of arrogance and brute force - here, I mean the US Administration, not the US citizen--to the extent that there is no longer anyone who can simply say no, when this no is addressed to the United States. It seems that the economy and its repercussions in Europe have reached a point that is sometimes--unless the Europeans take notice of this--at the expense of their humanity. For what can the United States use to pressure the Soviet Union, France, or Italy? It can use the economy to apply this pressure. It seems that some political leaders of these countries are no longer capable of withstanding such pressure. Therefore, they have begun to appease the United States to the degree that this appeasement is a danger not only to the whole of humanity, but to Europe itself. It is obvious, therefore, that although Iraq is a friend of France--and we suppose that France can initiate a dialogue with Iraq through open doors-we do not know why some French politicians have committed such a series of mistakes to appease the dangerous US policy. If America's desire is to control the oil of the Middle East to the extent of being able to dictate to France, England, Italy, or Japan, the amount of oil, its type, and price, and a list of the amounts to reach European markets, and if America finds this to be in its interest, then is it in Europe's interest to see this happen? If this question were addressed to anyone who lives within the oil regions, he would say that it is not in Europe’s interest or Japan’s that America should take hold of Middle East oil, to the extent of allotting their quotas. Regardless of this debate, all Europeans and Japanese know that if war breaks out, not only might the oil fields in Iraq be set on fire, but also in other areas. They also know that if this happens, a good deal of the amount allotted to them will be cut off, because when the oil is ablaze it cannot flow to France, England, or Japan. At any rate, America will be in a better position to acquire its quota than Europe or Japan. It is certain, nevertheless, that even the United States itself will be affected. It is not in anyone’s interest, therefore, to see a war in the region. Why are they, then, pushing things toward the verge of the abyss? I think it weakness. The French need to invoke de Gaulle’s spirit of the independent decision. While saying this, I do not intend to instigate Europe against the United States. We want peace; we do not want conflict. I want to say, however, through this quick human survey of what we have said, in addition to the miserable condition of humanity in Third World countries, that the United States should not dominate humanity or it will become tyrannical; because if it becomes tyrannical, it will lose its humanity and others will lose their humanity. This is because when someone becomes tyrannical, he cannot see the basic conditions for others to enjoy their humanity. It is clear, therefore, that the United States does not have to win the military battle in order to confirm the humanity of the American citizen. On the contrary, if the United States wins the military battle against us, the American will lose his humanity and many will lose their humanity as well, while we, the Arabs and the Iraqis, should not be defeated by aggression. Our humanity dictates that we should not be defeated. In fact, the humanity of the entire world dictates that Iraq and the Arabs should not be defeated by aggression so that we can avoid disasters. Only God Almighty can be just when He dominates humanity. God, as you know, is already dominating humanity, because He is the One and Only One.

[Comment from an unidentified person.] As far as I know, not all the members of the same families are here. I would like to say to those who see this film that not all the families are here, but that all of our families are in good health. It goes without saying that we have come to this place without anyone telling us what to say, what questions we can and cannot ask, and how to answer this or that question. The world does not know this.

[Question from an unidentified person.] We have been in contact with our embassies for the past 11 days. We were unable to contact our families, and we neither received, nor sent letters to them. We hope that something will be done in this respect.

[Hussein] Things will improve in the future. We have given orders that you will always be allowed to exchange letters with your families.

[Question from an unidentified person.] I have two questions of a political nature. How do you intend to secure peace in this region and when will this be? And what are your conditions for peace?

[Hussein] We have no conditions and do not want to take anything from anybody. However, we refuse to give in to illegitimate demands from others. For example, we do not want to attack anybody, but we will confront any attack against us. If some people want to secure the continued flow of oil, we would like to tell them that we produce oil to sell it to them. Kuwait is part of Iraq and not the 52nd US state. Those who say that we want to attack Saudi Arabia, are saying inaccurate and untrue things. What we want is to live in dignity in our country and let others live in dignity in their country. If the foreigners cannot understand our problems, let them leave us as Arabs to solve our problems ourselves. We are more capable of solving them, as we have no other choice.

[Question from an unidentified person.] Thank you. Another question: We are living near Baghdad: Is there a shelter in this place in case something happens?

[Hussein] You will be the first to enter the shelter. First, the children, then the women, and then men, and finally the Iraqis.

[Request from an unidentified person.] Thanks. Is it possible to arrange for visits by a Japanese physician, because we have sick people? Regrettably, we do not speak any other language. As for Japanese, nobody speaks it here. If this is possible.

[Hussein] I think we have an Army physician who knows Japanese. We will send you an Iraqi physician who knows Japanese, address your government in this regard, or send a translator to translate into Japanese to work with an Iraqi physician.

[Comment from an unidentified person.] The Japanese Embassy in Baghdad has a Japanese physician.

[Hussein] Despite this, we will secure for you a physician who speaks Japanese, or supply the physician with a translator who knows Japanese.

[Unidentified person] Thank you, sir.

[Request from an unidentified person.] My question, Mr. President, concerns the same question addressed by the one to my right regarding letters. In addition to the usual letters, we know that there are letters that can be also addressed through telephone or telex. Our embassies in Iraq can get us telex messages. Would it be possible to install a device in our places to ensure that we continue to receive such messages?

[Hussein] I asked the secretary, to maintain continuous contact with your embassies through the Foreign Ministry so that the letters that reach your embassies can be received and given to you. We might consider a post office box that you can use for your mail. Thus, your correspondence would be collected daily and sent to you and from you to your relatives.

[Unidentified person] I have another request. You know that all those present in this session were separated from their wives last night for the sake of this meeting.

[Hussein] You will return to your wives. As for the wives, they will return to their husbands. We just wanted to see some of you.

[Unidentified woman] I would like to say that we are receiving very good treatment where we are living right now. Our needs are being met in dignity in their country. If the foreigners cannot understand our things. What we want is to live in dignity in our country and let others live widespread ownership of appliances, even in villages, had ended the era of a well-rooted country and in 750 the Abbasid Caliphate moved its capital to Baghdad. Baghdad has a Japanese physician.
capital to the new city of Baghdad. The city took four years to build and required 100,000 workers, and was first known as Medina al-Salaam (City of Peace). The Abbasid led an advanced society with a rich tradition in art and literature; many educated women became prominent. There was an opportunity for women to study medicine, law and theology in Abbasid Baghdad. In 1258, Baghdad was destroyed by the Mongols. In 1534, after a succession of ephemeral states, Iraq was conquered by the Ottoman Empire. In 1918, with the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, the British established a puppet monarchy. In 1920, there was a major uprising, in which women played a major role; at a cost of 2000 British deaths, the rebellion was suppressed. Formal independence of Iraq was declared in 1932, and Iraq joined the League of nations, but Britain retained control of Iraq. The monarchy was overthrown in 1958. After several years of coups, in 1968 the Baath Party took power. In 1979, VP Saddam Hussein became president.

24118. Ingrams, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 03: Minorities. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 31-40. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] Kurds are an ancient people with their own language and living in northern Iraq, and in Iran, Syria and Turkey. The Baath Party made a commitment in 1968 to solve what had become known as the "Kurdish Problem" by granting limited autonomy. In 1970 the government recognized the Kurdish nationality by guaranteeing the Kurdish language, with representation of Kurds in the administration, armed services, a Kurdish university at Sulaimaniyah, and the formation of students', women's and teacher's organizations. In 1974, the Kurdistan Region was given autonomy, with its own Legislative Council and an Executive Council. The General Federation of Iraqi Women has a special secretariat for Kurds (the secretariat has nine committees for culture, health, social activities, rural women, illiteracy, training, organization, legal affairs, and sports).

Turkmen are found in the NE of Iraq, with some in Mosul and Tell Afar. Most are town dwellers or tribal. They number 1.5-2.5% of the population; two-thirds are Sunni, one-third are Shiites.

Yezidis (they call themselves Dasnayi) are a Kurdish-speaking minority of about 30,000 in the Sanjar district. They are considered to be devil-worshippers. Their chief shrine is the tomb of Sheikh Adi on Jebel Sanjar, 70 miles west of Mosul. Some Yezidis attend Baghdad University.

Christians are 4.8% of the population and many occupy prominent positions in Iraqi society. There has been significant rural-urban migration among Christians, with the Christian population in Baghdad rising from 75,000 to 110,000 in 1963-1966. Christians are divided into Nestorians (Armenians), Gregorians and Jacobites. Chaldeans, numbering 200,000 are the largest Christian community.

Armenians number 4000-15,000 and they came to Iraq fleeing the massacres in Anatolia in 1915. As refugees, they collected in Basra, but have generally moved to cities throughout Iraq. Smaller communities include Mandeans (or Sabeans or Chists of St. John), Syrian speaking Christians, a few Jews, and some Lurs and Iranians. Iranians number 2.5-3.0% of the population, and most live in the Shiite Holy Cities of Najaf and Kerbala. [TXT]

24119. Ingrams, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 04: Islam and Women. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 41-54. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] In the Jahaliya, the pre-Islamic period, the status of Arab women was determined by tribal practice, but even in that society women had considerable freedom. The rise of women increased the rights or women and improved their status: "misconceptions about Islam among non-Muslims are widespread, and particularly as regards Islam and women". Polygamy is often a focus of critics of Islam, yet Islam reformed the universal practice of Islam and laid the basis (the issue of suitable treatment of wives) that has in more modern times led to the near disappearance of polygamy. Veiling was never universal among Arabs, being largely an urban practice. Sharia, Islamic Law, gives women specific rights, including requirement that a woman consent to marriage, her right to the dowry, and the right to divorce with cause. While the Sharia gives women lesser rights in divorce and child custody, it gives women more right in property and inheritance. Many women have traditionally been learned in religion, and are known as Mullayas (especially in Basra).

24120. Ingrams, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 05: The Girl. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 55-66. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] There are persistent misunderstandings in the West about the status of women in Islamic countries; so to there are misconceptions about the importance of daughters. Muslims love their children, whether sons or daughters. Traditional beliefs in the Evil Eye, which tended to emphasize the value of boys are falling aside as the general educational level of women advances: women do, after all, may the major role in the upbringing of children. Female circumcision is not practices in Iraq. Education is free from primary through higher education (with passage of examinations). Alternatives to universities include vocational training and professional schools. Veiling of girls was once traditional at age 12 but now is not done. Most marriages remain arranged.

24121. Ingrams, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 06: The Woman. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 67-78. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] The aspect of Muslim society that has caused the greatest misunderstanding in the West is the status of women, yet the status of women in Islam has always been better that believed in the West. Most problematic is condemnation of Western commentators of features of Arab society that remain true as well in the West. Women participate fully in Iraqi society, and modern Western dress is normal, except in religious institutions. Women do housework and increasingly also hold jobs outside the home. The high cost of living has forced women to work in many families. There is no wage discrimination between men and women having comparable employment. Industrialization has played a major role in modernizing the status of women in Iraqi society: literacy programs throughout the country, including among Kurds and Bedouin, were set up to accelerate the employability of women. The status of women is not advanced in villages, as opposed to cities, but is advancing even there.

24122. Ingrams, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 07: Pioneers. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 79-98. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] Arab women started organizing for more rights in the mid-nineteenth century, about the same time that British suffragettes started to organize. The first school for girls was opened in 1859, with the approval of the Ottoman government. By 1914 there were only 6 or 7 schools for girls in Iraq; however at the time education for boys in most areas was little more than Quran memorization. The first teachers' training college was opened in 1923. The King encouraged sports training for women and organized girls' sports teams at the palace under the direction of his daughter; he also opened a school for female nurses. The education of women received some support from Muslim religious leaders, such as the Shite elder Mirza Hussein al-Na'in. By the 1930s, it was becoming a normal expectation of urban classes that their daughters would be educated. One of the first women's rights organizations established was the Women's Renaissance or Awakenings Club, founded by Asma Zahawi in 1923. Although this group soon closed down, many other such groups were established in the 1930s: Red Crescent in 1933; Biyut al-Umma (Nation's Institutes) in 1935; as well as the Muslim Sisters Society, Child Welfare Society, Society for the Welfare of the Poor, a society for assistance to homeless women and children and YWCA. In 1944, the Club for Sisters of Freedom and the Anti-Nazi & Fascist Society were established; in 1951 the Society of the Muslim Sisterhood as a branch of the Muslim Brotherhood was established. Iraqi women began their participation in international conferences in the 1930s. In 1952, the Women's Union began a drive to implement the political rights that women were guaranteed by law, but which had not been implemented in fact.

24123. Ingmar, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 08: The Iraqi Government and Women. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 99-108. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] The Arab Baath Socialist Party (ABSP) forms the present government of Iraq. The ABSP has long endorsed women as full partners in Iraqi society. When VP, Saddam Hussein speaking at a conference of the General Federation of Iraqi Women noted: “During the 1920 revolution in which our people gave their response to the British colonial occupation and during mass uprisings against the imperialist pacts and alliances... women took part and played a role which gave an example of courage and initiative and inspired bravery and enthusiasm in the hearts of the struggling... The complete emancipation of women from the ties which held them back in the past, during the days of despotism and ignorance, is a basic aim of the party and the Revolution. Women make up one half of our society. Our society will remain backward and in chains unless its women are liberated, enlightened and educated.” As president, Hussein would state: “Strengthening the economic status of women through both legal rights and social conventions is part of the liberation process. Strengthening and expanding the conditions which prohibit polygamy is also part of that process. The same can be said about limiting divorce with additional restrictions and wider and stricter conditions... Anti-feminist acts and ideas should be extensively condemned by men as well as by women in every section of our people. Unjustified divorce ought to be condemned everywhere. Polygamy ought to be condemned in every corner of our society.” Milestones in women’s rights in Baath Iraq include: Labour Act of 1970, giving women and men equal pay and conditions, prohibits nightwork by women, and established free daycare in Iraqi industry; the Act of Judicial Institution of 1976 allowing women to become Public Notaries; and the Agrarian Reform Act of 1970, which “ended feudalism” in rural society. In 1980, a resolution of the government approved a national program of rehabilitation of the handicapped, with 20 rehabilitation centers being set up.

24124. Ingmar, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 09: The General Federation of Iraqi Women. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 109-116. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] During the monarchy an Iraqi Women’s Federation was setup. After the 1958 revolution the Women of the Republic Association was setup, it was disbanded but re-emerged in 1963, and in 1968 the General Federation of Iraqi Women (GFIW) emerged from it. The GFIW had its first conference in 1969, and now has a national organization represented by 250 deputies. Secretariats of the GFIW include: Information and Culture, Foreign Relations, Family Affairs, Social Mobilization, Organization of Secretariats, Finance and Administration, Bureau for Nurseries, Literacy and Adult Education. One project of the GFIW was to establish an all woman agricultural research center to provide productive work for impoverished rural women.

24125. Ingmar, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 10: Women in the Professions. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 117-128. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] Iraqi governments in this century have all promoted the education of women, with opportunities expanding from the early acceptability of women in medical and teaching professions. The first attempt to employ women in a professional sector was in 1923 through the establishment of the Teachers Training College. In 1947, Sabihah al-Sheikh Da’oud became the first woman attorney in Iraq. Women have now become judges and prosecutors. Nursing has long been a profession of marginal respectability, but professionalization beginning in 1933 through Ministry of Health training courses. Initially, many nurses were women from Christian families, who accepted nursing as a career for the reasons that their daughters somewhat earlier than Muslim families. Other professions in which women are well-represented include photography, engineering, architecture and archeology. In the 1950s Iraq women started entering the diplomatic service, however, just as in the British diplomatic service, few women have reached top ranks.

24126. Ingmar, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 11: Women in Art and Literature. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 129-154 [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] Women played a significant role in arts and literature in the Abbasid Caliphate during the 2-3 centuries of the Abbasid Golden Age. When VP, Saddam Hussein speaking at a conference of the General Federation of Iraqi Women noted: “During the 1920 revolution in which our people gave their response to the British colonial occupation and during mass uprisings against the imperialist pacts and alliances... women took part and played a role which gave an example of courage and initiative and inspired bravery and enthusiasm in the hearts of the struggling... The complete emancipation of women from the ties which held them back in the past, during the days of despotism and ignorance, is a basic aim of the party and the Revolution. Women make up one half of our society. Our society will remain backward and in chains unless its women are liberated, enlightened and educated.” As president, Hussein would state: “Strengthening the economic status of women through both legal rights and social conventions is part of the liberation process. Strengthening and expanding the conditions which prohibit polygamy is also part of that process. The same can be said about limiting divorce with additional restrictions and wider and stricter conditions... Anti-feminist acts and ideas should be extensively condemned by men as well as by women in every section of our people. Unjustified divorce ought to be condemned everywhere. Polygamy ought to be condemned in every corner of our society.” Milestones in women’s rights in Baath Iraq include: Labour Act of 1970, giving women and men equal pay and conditions, prohibits nightwork by women, and established free daycare in Iraqi industry; the Act of Judicial Institution of 1976 allowing women to become Public Notaries; and the Agrarian Reform Act of 1970, which “ended feudalism” in rural society. In 1980, a resolution of the government approved a national program of rehabilitation of the handicapped, with 20 rehabilitation centers being set up.

24127. Ingmar, Doreen. The Awakened: Women in Iraq: Part 10: Women in the Professions. London: Third World Centre for Research & Publishing, 1983. pp. 99-108. [Book dedicated to the General Federation of Iraqi Women.] The Arab Baath Socialist Party (ABSP) forms the present government of Iraq. The ABSP has long endorsed women as full partners in Iraqi society. When VP, Saddam Hussein speaking at a conference of the General Federation of Iraqi Women noted: “During the 1920 revolution in which our people gave their response to the British colonial occupation and during mass uprisings against the imperialist pacts and alliances... women took part and played a role which gave an example of courage and initiative and inspired bravery and enthusiasm in the hearts of the struggling... The complete emancipation of women from the ties which held them back in the past, during the days of despotism and ignorance, is a basic aim of the party and the Revolution. Women make up one half of our society. Our society will remain backward and in chains unless its women are liberated, enlightened and educated.” As president, Hussein would state: “Strengthening the economic status of women through both legal rights and social conventions is part of the liberation process. Strengthening and expanding the conditions which prohibit polygamy is also part of that process. The same can be said about limiting divorce with additional restrictions and wider and stricter conditions... Anti-feminist acts and ideas should be extensively condemned by men as well as by women in every section of our people. Unjustified divorce ought to be condemned everywhere. Polygamy ought to be condemned in every corner of our society.” Milestones in women’s rights in Baath Iraq include: Labour Act of 1970, giving women and men equal pay and conditions, prohibits nightwork by women, and established free daycare in Iraqi industry; the Act of Judicial Institution of 1976 allowing women to become Public Notaries; and the Agrarian Reform Act of 1970, which “ended feudalism” in rural society. In 1980, a resolution of the government approved a national program of rehabilitation of the handicapped, with 20 rehabilitation centers being set up.

24127. Iraqi Communist Party. “A Word on the Peasants’ Demonstration Which Was Exclusively Called by a Patriotic Quarter”, in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Itithad Al-Shaab), December 23, 1959. p. 19. [Published on 12/16/1959] Local newspapers reported yesterday the permission of a procession of rejoicing in the safety of Premier Kassim to be made by the “peasants associations.” We have contacted the headquarters of the General Federation of Peasants Associations asking for clarification on the issue, and an official in the General Federation stated to us that the Federation did not apply any request for the official authorities and that it did not call the peasants associations to take part in the procession which was said will be held on Friday next (12/18/1959), and that the Federation will not take part in it. It is obvious from this statement that those who called for the demonstration on 12/18/1959 must be from those who worked in the name of the peasants associations outside the sphere of the General Federation. Since this issue has been associated by various rumors, therefore it aroused a number of enquiries in the peasantry and patriotic quarters and among some citizens. The rejoicing in the safety of the leader Abdul Karim Kassim embraced all the sincere citizens of various patriotic tendencies. Naturally then this group and others have the right to express their patriotic sentiments through the legal democratic means, especially that the mentioned group has obtained an official permission for organizing this demonstration. Yet the sons of the people have the right to enquire: Is it true that the purpose of organizing this demonstration is confined to expressing the sentiments of rejoicing only and that there are no political motives and parochial purposes? When the citizens make these enquiries they remember the grand peoples procession of rejoicing which was held on the day that followed the release of the Premier from the hospital and which truly embraced the representatives of all the sectors of the people: “the peasants,” the workers, the merchants, the students, the intelligentsia, men and women and from various patriotic organizations and tendencies and varied nationalities. The citizens rightly enquire about the motive which drove the organizers of the new demonstration to isolate themselves from that grand procession without any reasonable justification and the reason why they did not join any of its contingents, such as the contingents of the journalists, the lawyers and others? Does not this private demonstration of them help, without their knowledge, the trumpets of hostile propaganda which described the previous grand procession, that it was the procession of a certain patriotic trend and not the procession of the people with their various classes, nationalities and religious communities? The citizens also enquire whether this quarter does not aim from this demonstration to parade its special forces and exploit that for purposes which have no relations with rejoicing - such as to render a support for the non-democratic biased measures which were pursued recently in connection with the licensing of the peasants associations in some provinces of Iraq? These aims may be legitimate from the point of view of democracy, but there are no less complicated ways for this purpose. In order to explain what we mean by the complication we enquire about the opinion of these brothers themselves in case others also resort to organize a similar peasantry procession, will this method of “display of forces” be useful from the point of view of the necessity of making the best efforts for the unity of the peasants and the unity of national ranks? And would it be useful from the point of view of the fruitful political activity for the backing of the Republic and its patriotic government?

In spite of all that, and since the brothers have decided to express their reverence of safety and the patriotic purpose by holding this demonstration, and since the patriotic government has licensed this demonstration, then we hope that these brothers will show the organizational and instructive ability necessary for steering the demonstration in a positive and constructive spirit which should be refrained from provocations, following the trails of the grand peoples procession which was held on the day which followed the release of Premier Kassim from the hospital which slapped the faces of the slanderers with its magnificence, powerful organization, and the soundness of its patriotic orientation. That procession was a victory for the Iraqi Republic and a reinforcement to the leadership of the government and a strength for all the patriotic quarters without exception. We stress on that point in view of our belief that the soundness of guiding this new demonstration assumes at the current circumstance a special significance in view of what we have experienced in the evil cliques who try to exploit every occasion to do something that harms the unity of national ranks and to spread the confusion and feed the slanderers and abuses against our dear republic. We have great confidence that the conscious masses of our people who have already performed their duty in their past grand national procession will refuse anything that can be exploited for spreading rumors to harm the prestige of our Republic. [x]

24128. Iraqi Communist Party. "Let the Banner of the Republic Continue Waving on the Skies of Our Flowering Fatherland", in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab), December 23, 1959, p. 12. [This article appeared on 12/4/1959.] Today flowery Baghdad receives the masses of the great people organized in their great procession carrying banners and slogans that express the insistence of this people to forge ahead in the path of defending everything good and noble in the fatherland. Today, the masses of the people, their democratic organizations and patriotic bodies meet in the great procession of rejoicing, celebrating the safety of the leader of the Revolution, Premier Abdul Karim Kassim, and his escape from the bullets of imperialist reactionary plotting. They are reaffirming their solidarity with the patriotic authority under his leadership, to preserve the course of the revolution which is reinforced by a democratic anti-imperialist and anti-reaction course of action. Together with the rejoicings of the people which are displayed by all the honest citizens from various nationalities, classes, political inclinations and social posts. Together with these rejoicings which express the adherence of the entirety of the people to their gains and victories, there appears very clearly the legitimate anger of the people and the sacred national hatred to the enemies of the republic and of its patriotic leadership, the imperialists, the covetous and all categories of agents. This process of the people is taking place at a time when the recent statements of Premier Kassim has revealed the identity of the enemies of the republic thereby dispelling the illusions which were constructed by the enemies of the people to complete their concealment. The imperialist reactionary grouping was proved, as was confirmed by life, to be a plotting terrorist grouping aimed to subvert the structure of the mighty republic and to enable the imperialists to stage a comeback to our holy land. All the branches of this imperialist reactionary grouping were proved by the premier to be, regardless of their “nationalist,” “religious” and “students” facades as organs of plotting and treason which deceive the naive citizens and drive them to the slippery paths and dangers. This procession of the people is taking place simultaneously with the official condemnation of these groupings and their rings whether in Mosul and the imperialist reactionary putsch there, or in Kirkuk where a massacre was staged by the imperialists and their agents, or the troubles which flared in the republic other than those of Mosul and Kirkuk.

This procession of the people is taking place at time when life and its realities have approved of and confirmed the significance of the democratic organizations which embraced the broadest masses of the people, workers, peasants, students, women and intelligentsia and at a time when these organizations emerged triumphant after surmounting the ordeals of the imperialist reactionary schemes. They have been patient and endurant and revealed in their patience their broad popularity and their solid foundations proving that they enjoy the confidence, support and loyalty of the loyal sons of the people. The great procession of the people is taking place at a time when the reactionary plotting forces went back to their hiding holes and rings, defeated, evading the anger of the people, and concentrating their efforts to find new guise and new methods to disrupt the ranks, organize new schemes and create anarchy, and exercise the means of subversion and destruction against the erect structure of the republic. The forces of the people, associated in solidarity, find themselves today facing an extremely noble task of standing in one rank and linked by the link of defending the republic and supporting its patriotic leadership in its initiatives and measures to liquidate the rings of treason and plotting so as to ensure the prevalence of stability and tranquility on the basis of the victory of the democratic course. On this day, the characters of this people will once again manifest themselves. The procession will clearly demonstrate organization, discipline and the compliance with what deprives the enemies of the chance to turn our celebrations and festivities into occasions of hostility to the republic and its course. There is no doubt that the broadest masses will reject the deceptive slogans and the extremist shouts which do not serve the unity of national ranks and which will only disguise the enemies of the republic. Let the process of today, then, be an expression to the unity of the people. Let the procession of today brilliantly reveal the solidarity of the people and he army. Let the procession of today be a demonstration for the backing of the patriotic authority which is impersonified in our patriotic government under the leadership of Premier Kassim. Let the procession of today be an expression to the legitimate anger of the people at the enemies of the republic, the imperialists, the covetous, the reactionaries and local agents both the disguised and the public ones.

Let us all meet in solidarity in the front of defending the republic. Let us all - communists, patriots, democrats, nationalists - stand in one rank to defend our republic with a barrier that smashes all the conspiracies and criminal endeavors. [x]

24129. Iraqi Communist Party. Editorial: “Editorials from the Arabic Edition: The Educational Policy in the National Charter of the Iraqi Communist Party (2/3/1960)”, in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab), February 24, 1960, p. 16. Article Fifteen of the National Charter of our Iraqi Communist Party was devoted to the education of the people and the sacred national hatred to the enemies of the republic and a reinforcement to the leadership of the patriotic government and a strength for all the patriotic quarters without exception. The bitter experiences of the imperialist reactionary forces” be useful from the point of view of the necessity of making the time when these organizations emerged triumphant after surmounting the ordeals of the imperialist reactionary schemes. They have been patient and endurant and revealed in their patience their broad popularity and their solid foundations proving that they enjoy the confidence, support and loyalty of the loyal sons of the people. The great procession of the people is taking place at a time when the reactionary plotting forces went back to their hiding holes and rings, defeated, evading the anger of the people, and concentrating their efforts to find new guise and new methods to disrupt the ranks, organize new schemes and create anarchy, and exercise the means of subversion and destruction against the erect structure of the republic. The forces of the people, associated in solidarity, find themselves today facing an extremely noble task of standing in one rank and linked by the link of defending the republic and supporting its patriotic leadership in its initiatives and measures to liquidate the rings of treason and plotting so as to ensure the prevalence of stability and tranquility on the basis of the victory of the democratic course. On this day, the characters of this people will once again manifest themselves. The procession will clearly demonstrate organization, discipline and the compliance with what deprives the enemies of the chance to turn our celebrations and festivities into occasions of hostility to the republic and its course. There is no doubt that the broadest masses will reject the deceptive slogans and the extremist shouts which do not serve the unity of national ranks and which will only disguise the enemies of the republic. Let the process of today, then, be an expression to the unity of the people. Let the procession of today brilliantly reveal the solidarity of the people and he army. Let the procession of today be a demonstration for the backing of the patriotic authority which is impersonified in our patriotic government under the leadership of Premier Kassim. Let the procession of today be an expression to the legitimate anger of the people at the enemies of the republic, the imperialists, the covetous, the reactionaries and local agents both the disguised and the public ones.

Let us all meet in solidarity in the front of defending the republic. Let us all - communists, patriots, democrats, nationalists - stand in one rank to defend our republic with a barrier that smashes all the conspiracies and criminal endeavors. [x] advance in this field, these schools have not yet assimilated all the children who are of school age. On the other hand, the illiterate people who are above school age, and who are vast in number, cannot at all be assimilated by these schools. This dictates that centers for combating illiteracy must be opened everywhere in the cities and the countryside to shoulder this patriotic duty in addition to the necessity of generalizing compulsory primary education. This great duty is placed in the first place on the shoulders of the Ministry of Education. Close cooperation be established between the peoples organizations particularly the Teachers Association and the Students Union and others. In face a serious fight against illiteracy cannot be accomplished without such cooperation. The elementary experiences in this field proved the possibility and importance of this cooperation and its success. They have also proved the great enthusiasm which drove tens of thousands of members of those organizations to take part in this combat action and the amazing enrollment of the people, to be educated in spite of the difficulties, among which were the arbitrary actions of some officials. This article of our National Charter stated that culture and education are among the natural rights of our people. We add here that education and cultivation of the people is one of the basic duties of the State. It is not enough to recognize this natural right. The Government should take all the necessary measures to enable the people to win this right.

The Charter dealt with other important issues including the “integration of education with practical life and with the economic, social and political development of our country.” This issue necessitates a radical upturn in the educational field. The governments of the old regime devoted all their efforts in the educational field to one single aim, namely to prepare the necessary personnel to satisfy the needs of the governmental machinery and the imperialist machinery and establishments which dominated the country. As for elevating the cultural standards of the sons of the people and the spreading of science and knowledge, they were never among the aims of the imperialists and their underlings. The people used to wrest them by force after making generous sacrifices. As for now, after the Revolution, the schools, institutes, colleges, their curricula and laboratories must all be subjected to the aims of the Revolution itself and to achieve a development in all the economic, political and social fields. Here, too, cooperation must be established between the government and the democratic organizations because some of these organizations have devoted their congresses to laying down a patriotic and democratic policy for culture and education. The Ministry of Education on her part took some steps in this respect. Therefore it is necessary to unite the efforts of the Ministry of Education and those of the social organization concerned to realize the best results in the field of culture and education. It is also necessary that the other governmental and popular organizations should work, each in her own field, for the promotion of the popular culture and for the revival of the progressive ideological heritage and for publicizing science, technology, art and human literature among the masses of the people. Full attention must be paid to the vocational schools and the institutes of specialization and scholarships for abroad for the skilled workers. The question of scholarships abroad is still important and urgent. The patriotic government had taken great steps in this respect, but we still demand more of them and demand assurance for the sons of the Kurdish people and the other national minorities to provide the necessary number of personnel as to lead into a speedy development of the culture of all the fraternal nationalities in this fatherland. This point should win attention with regard to the admission to the University and with regard to the opening of new colleges in the North, especially a college for Teachers Training.

The application of the National Charter of our Communist Party in the University and the assurance of its independence would provide the normal academic atmosphere, as well as supplying it with the necessary tutorial staff, scientific laboratories and experimental farms, care of the students and housing, books and all necessities, all that is something necessary because we are ambitious and long to see Baghdad - as it was in the past - a focus for scientists and men of letters from various parts of the globe. We have to compete with time to keep pace with the forward march of mankind. The aims which the National Charter of our Communist Party puts forward in the fields of culture and education are national and democratic aims and they require cooperation on the national scale with all the patriotic parties and all the people, party and non-party members, as well as the patriotic government for their realization in order to promote the standard of culture and education in the Republic. [...]

24130. Iraqi Communist Party. Editorial: "Editorials of the Week: The Iraqi People Who Proved the Originality of Their Consciousness Are Worthy of Exercising All Their Democratic Liberties (12/23/1959)”, in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab), December 30, 1959. p. 9. Only few days remained from the transitional period. All citizens were looking forwards towards the new period, the period of commencing the declaration of the democratic legislations that ensure the rise of the conditions for the new period. Naturally, if the permanent constitution and the other legislations ensured the democratic rights of the people and laid down the new foundations upon which the Republic will embark under its new conditions, that will help in providing the guarantees for stability and tranquility and the creation of the best relations of solidarity with the patriotic authority. It is also natural that the new period will start with the declaration of the freedom for political organization on the basis of the foundation of political parties after the people had exercised some of their organizational freedoms in other fields and after it has been clearly manifested what role can the democratic liberties play in mobilizing the people and their patriotic forces in the joint action for the consolidation of the pillars of the Republic and the safeguarding of its gains. The political freedom is not alien to the people or their awareness. The people have employed various means of struggle in order to realize their democratic liberties. The peoples' insistence to exercise these liberties was a feature which characterized the people with vitality, valiance and boldness. Under the old regime, the people offered sacrifices in order to win freedom and to score victory over the enemies of democracy until they developed a special sensitivity that developed and grew amidst the flames of the revolutionary struggle against the rulers of the extinct regime, the enemies of democracy. During the periods which the people imposed their enjoyment to their political liberties, they proved their worthiness for that and gave brilliant examples that amazed the enemies. On the morrow of the victory of the 7/7/1958 Revolution, the people set a brilliant example in responding with the patriotic authority and in devoting their efforts to accomplish the conditions of stability so as to enable the patriotic government to consolidate the victory.

When the people exercised some of their democratic liberties in the fields of democratic mass activity, they set the same examples. Demonstrations, public meetings and vast processions were organized without anything taking place which does not confirm the peoples realization to their tasks. Elections for the numerous democratic organizations were held such as the trade unions, the students unions, the Youth Federation, the League for the Defense of Women's rights, the Teachers’ Association and the rest of the professional and social organizations - all of which have furnished evidence to the vitality of the people and the originality of their democratic consciousness. Relations of respect and cooperation between the official patriotic authority and the democratic organizations were established. The problems between the trade unions and the businessmen were solved in the spirit of negotiations and understanding despite the intricacies of these relations. The conduct of solidarity became evident among the students themselves and among every sector of these organizations. The peasants associations took the initiative to solve many of the problems and disputes in the spirit of cooperation and harmony and overcame many of the difficulties that existed for many years and were able to spread the spirit of cooperation in various fields for the achievement of the accomplishment necessitated by the Agrarian Reform. All that have impelled the enemies of the Republic to stand against the democratic liberties of the people and to fan the suspicion and alertness from those liberties. When they failed in that they resorted to various means of deliberate subversion, but they once again failed in preventing the people from exercising those liberties. Hence they resorted to extremely base means for instigating against democratic organizations by slandering their reputations and stands hoping to influence some quarters to abandon the democratic organizations. They raised the slogan of disbanding the democratic organizations or the interference in their electoral and internal affairs. But Premier Kassim gave them a strong slap in his speech to the conference of the Journalists Association, in which he said that he will not dissolve any organization and he leaves it to the members of the organization to decide by their own vote to disband or continue with the path they pursued. The Premier Kassim and the Premier Government have announced that this transitional period will be ended on 1/6/1960, had a strong impact on the imperialists, the covetous and their reactionary agents. If threatened with the collapse their propaganda and falsehoods before Iraqi Arab and world public opinion. We shall reveal no secret to state that those circles and quarters are working now feverishly and through all means of intrigues, slanders and threats and the artificial creation of political crises both at home or in relations with neighboring countries in a desperate attempt to maintain the present transitional period and to sabotage the efforts exerted by the patriotic government and the patriotic forces and the broad masses of the people to lay down the foundations of public life on healthy basis that enable the entirety of the people to exercise their democratic, social and human rights and liberties. In our opinion, it is the duty of all the patriotic forces and elements who are sincere to the republic and keen to reinforce its democratic course to exert the maximum efforts they can with a spirit of cooperation and solidarity among themselves and with the patriotic authority to provide for the authority the best means and most secured ones for the transition towards the new era and to foil the endeavors of enemies which attempt to prevent this transition. There is no doubt that the patriotic forces and elements are responsible before the people and before history in the stands which they take and the activities they make in serving or not serving this great target.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

On our part, we have struggled since 7/14/1958 and are still fighting to safeguard the Republic, to safeguard this ripe fruit which our people won after bitter struggle and heavy sacrifices. We have put and are still putting ourselves and all our abilities to serve this sacred duty in cooperation with all the patriotic forces and the patriotic authority. We on our part have contributed, together with all the patriotic forces loyal to the republic, in the education of the masses with the spirit of solidarity with the patriotic authority and the spirit of patriotic cooperation and fraternity among the nationalities and the handling of all problems that arise after the very liberal revolution which releases the forces of the people and their aspirations and which explode their hatred to imperialism, feudalism, treason and oppression. The past period of our Republic, testifies to the good results of the stands of the working class towards her national duties and towards the expected problems and disputes with the businessmen. Many of the problems and disputes were solved through the friendly and constructive means thereby depriving on many occasions the saboteurs and infiltrators of the chance to drag the workers into strikes. This period also witnessed comparatively good results for the peasants who live and work under more difficult and complicated circumstances in view of the violent resistance made by the feudal elements and the quarters who are affected by the feudal influence and in view of the fact that the peasants are divided into many categories, the poor peasants, the middle and rich peasants and the small and middle landowners. All these factors render the settlement of the disputes in the countryside among these strata and their mobilization and the unification of their efforts for the task of safeguarding the Republic and backing the patriotic authority for the accomplishment of the Agrarian reform and the increase of production an intricate task. The loyal sons of the people, the students, youth and women and others displayed high vigilance towards the plotting activity. They have backed the patriotic authority in checking the dangers which menace our republic and in defending the gains of the Revolution.

In our opinion, the stubborn and triumphant struggle which was waged by our people against the enemies of the Republic was and still is imposing a common duty on all the patriotic forces and elements which they should perform through solidarity, each in his own field and according to his own way. It is well known, for example, that one of the means of imperialism in fighting the recently liberated countries is the pressure and subversion in the economic sphere: in the fields of industry, trade and finance. We have witnessed on the morrow of the Revolution the subversive role which was played by the foreign banks and companies as well as the big capitalists who ceased their activity and smuggled their money abroad or froze them, and who spread rumors about the chaos in the Iraqi economy which had a negative effect among several quarters of merchants and businessmen. Such thing also took place in the sphere of construction works and in the agriculture. Naturally the imperialists, the covetous and those who are enraged at the accomplishments of our revolution and its reforms that affected their selfish interests do not cease from placing the consequences of their subversive actions in economy on the responsibility of the Revolution, its new legislations and laws and on the popular masses. Here, some of the patriotic forces who can exercise their political and moral influence in the economic sphere can contribute their share in this sphere by establishing confidence and optimism in the future and by establishing the resolution to overcome the difficulties that usually arise after every revolution. The raising of the slogan of stability and insisting on it will continue to be of no use unless the patriotic forces take the initiative to struggle, in solidarity with each other and each in its private sphere of influence to accomplish the conditions for stability by creating the basis where the legitimate interests of all national classes meet, and correspond with the line of the revolution. The road towards stability, is the road of providing the conditions and circumstances that facilitate the task of the patriotic authority in the transition towards the new life. It requires from all the loyal patriotic forces and elements inside the patriotic government and outside it to fight patiently and persistently each in his sphere, abilities and special means with close solidarity with the patriotic government in order to establish the favorable ground for ensuring the stability. These tasks impose themselves urgently in this period in particular when the people are receiving with great hope the beginning of the new life which they expect will achieve for them their political and human rights. [=]

24132. Jasim, Latif. Interview with Latif Jasim, Culture and Information Minister by Unidentified Reporter for Der Spiegel published on October 8, 1990: Part 1. [DER SPIEGEL] Mr. Minister, will there be a war? [Jasim] War may break out at any time. However, this depends on the United States. [DER SPIEGEL] Why? [Jasim] Because it is increasingly massing troops in the region. Soldiers are being deployed here under the pretext that we want to attack Saudi Arabia. This is a dirty lie. We have a non-aggression pact with the Saudis. We do not have the slightest reason for attacking Saudi Arabia. After the crisis in Kuwait, King Fahd asked us to participate in a summit meeting of five Arab states. We immediately agreed to this. [DER SPIEGEL] Why did this meeting not come about? [Jasim] Because suddenly the Saudis no longer wanted it and called the Americans instead. [DER SPIEGEL] Do you have an idea what made the Saudis change their mind? [Jasim] As we now know, the whole thing was a perfidious plot which began long before things happened in Kuwait. It was initiated by the Zionists. Israel realized that it was no longer able to launch a big attack against Iraq on its own. As a result, it ganged up with the scoundrels in Kuwait and other shaikhs in order to start a plot against Iraq. So, we were forced to eliminate the shaikh of Kuwait. However, the plot is still going on and may lead to a war any time, as I just stressed. [DER SPIEGEL] Let me point out one thing before you continue with your plot theory: There had been no conflict without your attack on Kuwait, and the Americans would not have come to Saudi Arabia either. [Jasim] This was only a cheap excuse and has nothing to do with the villainy that is going on now. A long time before we invaded Iraq, the United States began an economic siege of Iraq. The entire dirty campaign that was unleashed against us in the United States and Western Europe--with London playing a particularly outstanding role--was already part of the plot. In no time the Americans arrived with their tanks, guns, and other heavy weapons. This proves that everything was carefully prepared a long time in advance. Why are they threatening with a war now, despite the fact that we suggested an Arab solution and are willing to agree to such a solution? [DER SPIEGEL] But why should the Saudis, without any need, place themselves in such a difficult situation? They are now seen as dubious guardians of the holy sites by the whole Islamic world, who called infidels to help them against their fellow believers. Do you think they would have risked this stigma if they had not felt threatened by Iraq? [Jasim] The Saudis know quite well that we never threatened them. This is an infamous lie. Why should we threaten or even attack Saudi Arabia? [DER SPIEGEL] Well, maybe because you wanted more oil. [Jasim] We do not need more oil. We have enough. [DER SPIEGEL] Now that you can no longer sell it, you have more than enough. Why should the Saudis maneuver themselves voluntarily into such a tricky situation? [Jasim] We, too, asked ourselves this question and prepared a detailed analysis. According to our 100% correct information, the Saudi Arabian ambassador to Washington, Bandar, played a key role. It was Bandar who, together with the Americans, initiated the whole thing. He also persuaded his uncle, King Fahd, to join the plot, thus exposing him to a great danger. The background to this intrigue is a conflict within the ruling clan. Fahd then dropped his proposition for a summit conference, which was to have provided an Arab solution to the problem of Kuwait. Thus, he would also be responsible for a possible war, which would destroy him as well. [DER SPIEGEL] Are you prepared for such a war? [Jasim] We are prepared. Our people’s morale is excellent, and we have the best weapons. We have a regular army comprising over 1 million men who have gathered experience in eight years of war. In addition, we have 5.5 million volunteers. If the United States really starts a war here, it will suffer one of its worst defeats in the desert. [DER SPIEGEL] What makes you so sure of that? After all, the United States is a world power, also in military terms. [Jasim] Because such a war will quickly develop into a world war. This is an extraordinarily explosive region; a lot of things can bum here. We have the means to set everything on fire or to blow everything up. [DER SPIEGEL] This may be true. But why a world war? First of all, the United Nations, and thus almost the entire world, is against you. [Jasim] Once a war breaks out, nobody can say when and how it will end. Oil prices will explode first, to $200-300 a barrel. How can the world endure this? Who can pay that? Already at this point, when we have not yet fired a single shot, the oil price stands a $40, which is nearly three times as much as a few months ago. [DER SPIEGEL] Many countries which do not even think of war are responsible for this. [Jasim] You may be right. However, can you imagine what will happen when a war starts? [Reprinted from Fred Moore (compiler), Iraq Speaks: Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D.] [=]

24133. Jasim, Latif. Interview with Latif Jasim, Culture and Information Minister by Unidentified Reporter for Der Spiegel published on October 8, 1990: Part 2. [DER SPIEGEL] Even your Soviet friends have abandoned you. Were you not completely taken by surprise by the strong international reaction to your invasion of Kuwait? [Jasim] I would like to point out once more that the whole thing was and still is an incredible plot. Imperialism, Zionism, and the whoremonger Kuwait and its helpers conspired against Iraq. The Kuwaitis pushed down our currency to one-fifth the value of their dinar. We had to defend ourselves against this step. At the same time, an opportunity presented itself for correcting history and for finally incorporating Kuwait into our country. [DER SPIEGEL] At the price of international isolation? [Jasim] We are by far not as isolated as you think. Those who are against us wanted to suppress us economically before that. However, we can rely on the support of the Islamic masses whose anger against the United States is growing day by day. They are ready to fight with us in a jihad, a holy war. For the first time in Arab history, nationalism and Islam have forged an alliance. You should not deceive yourselves. We are by no means alone.
[DER SPIEGEL] However, most of the Arab states are against you. Many even send troops because they do not like the idea that one Arab state was simply swallowed by its neighbor.

[Jasim] We only implemented our chartered right of 1913. Kuwait always belonged to us. Now we have incorporated it in our country. In addition, we struggle for the unity of all Arabs. You Germans, whom we wholeheartedly congratulate on your unification, should show particular understanding for this.

[DER SPIEGEL] However, Kuwait apparently did not want to be united with you. Do you see no possibility of a compromise, that you withdraw from Kuwait, for example, and keep only the disputed islands and the border region of Rumaylah with its oil fields?

[Jasim] No, never! Never! You can forget about that.

[DER SPIEGEL] We do not want to forget that you are still keeping thousands of foreigners as hostages who have nothing to do with the events. When will you release them?

[Jasim] They are not hostages but guests of the Iraqi people, as our president stated. Unfortunately—but for a noble reason—we were forced to keep them here. They help to prevent the outbreak of a war. We hope that it will soon be possible for them to be reunited with their families in their home countries. We only want the United States to provide a written guarantee that it will not attack Iraq. Then our guests can immediately go home.

[DER SPIEGEL] You always hold others responsible. How do you want to get out of this mess?

[Jasim] We did not start the whole thing. It was the conspirators who want to destroy us.

[DER SPIEGEL] You must live with the consequences resulting from your invasion of Kuwait. A worldwide embargo has been adopted against you. Nobody buys your oil anymore, and nobody supplies goods to you. How long can you endure this?

[Jasim] Of course we are suffering under this embargo. Pharmaceuticals and foodstuffs are becoming scare. Our children have no milk. This hurts. Nobody denies this. However, we are a big country with two big rivers. We have mobilized our agriculture to make up for the losses.

[DER SPIEGEL] This takes time.

[Jasim] Of course this will take time. We will not be able to harvest tomorrow what we sowed today. However, the embargo will not kill us.

[DER SPIEGEL] Abu al-'Abbas and other radical Palestinian leaders conferred with your government. Do you want them to open fronts all over the world in the event of war?

[Jasim] All Arab forces, no matter of what orientation, have their place in Iraq. We do not tell them what they have to do. We do not use terrorist methods. Also, we will not unleash terrorist activities against countries that do not terrorize us.

[DER SPIEGEL] Israel has now started to distribute masks among its population. Must Israel be afraid of Iraqi terrorism?

[Jasim] We will only attack those who attack us. If Israel makes preparations now, this indicates that it wants to attack us. If Israel launches the first strike, we will strike back. We are prepared for it.

[DER SPIEGEL] Do you consider it conceivable that your Arab brothers who supported Iraq in its war against Iran suddenly conspire with Israel and the United States against Iraq? Why should they do that?

[Jasim] Everybody knows that. Nobody wants to or can accept that an Arab country in this clearly divided world should become as powerful as Iraq is now. Everybody hoped that we would be completely destroyed after he war against Iran—economically, socially, politically, and militarily. The opposite was the case. We are stronger today than ever before. However, this is not allowed. No Arab country in this region must be stronger an Israel. Israel must remain the undisputed dominating power. We, who have always claimed that we want to berate Jerusalem, must be kept weak because they want it this way.

[DER SPIEGEL] Are things as simple as that?

[Jasim] Yes, they are. However, there is also another reason: oil. The United States wants to be in control here. During the Carter era the United States always tried to get access to the oil resources. Only those who control the most important oil resources can rule the world. In this way, Europe and Japan can easily be blackmailed any time. However, this is not possible as long as there is a powerful Iraq. Thus, they started a plot against Iraq. When Israel no longer succeeded in keeping us small because we had already become too strong, Kuwait assumed the role of the Zionists and pushed the oil price down by overproduction so that we lost billions, which endangered our economy. In this way, the scoundrel Israel wanted to force us on our knees and starve us. The emirates cooperated with Israel.

[DER SPIEGEL] You seem to be obsessed with the idea of the alleged front between the shaikhs, Israel, and the United States. It seems fantastic to us.

[Jasim] Well, this is the truth. The Kuwaitis acted in a particularly stupid way so we decided to kill two flies at the same time: To destroy the plot and to fulfill our historic duty, to incorporate Kuwait in our country.

[DER SPIEGEL] In this way you take the risk that the whole region might explode?

[Jasim] Let me explain the whole bitter truth: If this fire breaks out with an immense force now, the flames will reach the sky and sparks will fly in all directions. Heaps of corpses will be seen in the desert. But this will not be everything. Nobody—nobody, I would like to repeat this—can imagine what explosives will be released, and what will happen in the Islamic world. Will the Americans really be ready to sacrifice their lives if a war should break out? Will the French die for Kuwait? One billion Muslims will fight on our side, and US interests in the Islamic world will be destroyed all of a sudden.

[DER SPIEGEL] We will also be destroyed in such a fire.

[Jasim] In any case, we have the power to cause the destruction of the entire Gulf region in an inferno. You do not have the slightest idea of what we intend to do and what we can blow up virtually everything. We will not do this because we are vandals but because we will defend ourselves with all possible means if we are attacked. We possess means that you do not even dream of. We will not simply be slaughtered.

[DER SPIEGEL] Do you want as many people as possible to die with you?

[Jasim] We will not die. The others will die. [Reprinted from Fred Moore (compiler), Iraq Speaks: Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D.] [-]

24134. Karadaghi, Pary; Kurdish Human Rights Watch Inc.; Kurdish Women Delegation; Working Group on Kurdish Women. Press Release: Kurdish Women Delegation to the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing, China. Caucus Statement by the Working Group on Kurdish Women, September 6, 1995. This statement is the voice of Kurdish Women, September 6, 1995. This statement is the voice of Kurdish Women. The women who participated in the dialogue "Challenge to Peace, Freedom, Human Rights, socio-economic equity, Meeting the needs of Kurdish women." Human rights abuses against Kurdish women living in Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Syria have seriously blocked the road to peace and stability. This dialogue was held in conjunction with the NGO Forum on women in Beijing, China. This consensus document clarifies certain areas of concern with respect to the Platform for Action and strategies to address them regarding indigenous people, refugee and internally displaced women's protection, human rights, repatriation, and socio-economic development.

We Kurdish Women Delegation in the NGO Forum are deeply concerned about the fate of our Kurdish sisters in Iraq, Turkey, Iran, Syria and elsewhere. Escalating violence, wars, internal conflicts, and vast human rights abuses have caused deep distress and sufferance. We demand equality in the following areas:

- Refugee women and the internally displaced are not sufficiently protected by UNHCR, or other UN agencies in the region. The internal economic embargo imposed by Sadam Hussein has led life unbearable for the Kurdish population and more specifically for women. Added to that the UN embargo on the whole of Iraq. We demand the immediate separation of the north of Iraq from the rest of Iraq and the UN sanctions.

- Education, Iraqi Kurdish women and girls are deprived of education and many Kurdish women are removed from schools, higher education.
institutions and universities only because of their ethnic identity, that is being Kurdish. Prohibition against participation of Kurdish scientists and specialists at high-level cultural projects and important scientific research work. This is the case of our Kurdish sisters in Syria, Iran, and Turkey. The economic embargo imposed by the Iraqi government and the UN sanctions have their toll on Kurdish women living in Iraqi Kurdistan.

Employment, the working possibilities and layoffs are increasingly practised against the Kurdish people because of their ethnic identity. Prohibition of working at government positions because of their ethnic identity. This has increased the unemployment rate to more than 75% in Syria and 90% in Iraq. As a consequence this has led to a lower socio-economic situation more specifically for women.

Health, lack of health services, immunization and medical supplies to cover the needs of women.

Violence against Women, increased practices of rape, intimidation and violence as a weapon of war practised against Kurdish women.

Armed Conflict, eleven years of war in Turkey led to the loss of lives rendering thousands of victims specially women and children.

Economic Participation, the inequity of the economic participation and development in Kurdish inhabited areas has led to the non-participation of Kurdish women in the economic development of their respective countries.

Right to Citizenship and equal rights as other women in Countries of origin. The example of 150000 Kurdish women in Syria. In Syria, Kurdish men and women are looked upon as "second class citizens and immigrants" in their own ancestral land.

Freedom of Speech of journalists and writers, in the last four years 400 journalists have been arrested in Turkey for expressing their opinions on the situation of Kurds in the South-eastern region of Turkey.

Mine explosives and its danger on women and children. The Iraqi government has left thousands of mine explosives in 5000 villages. Every day the "mine fields of Sadam Hussein".

We demand the internal conflicts inside northern Iraq comes to a halt. A separate letter will be addressed from the Kurdish Women Delegation to the Kurdish leadership.

Press Release Prepared by Dr. Pary Karadaghi, Executive Director of Kurdish Human Rights Watch Inc. (KHRW) 10560 Main Street, Suite 205, Fairfax, Virginia 22030 USA Phone: 703-385-3806, Fax: 703-385-3643. [2]

24135. Khorasani, Rajaie. Lebanon: The Victim of Zionist Airraids, Aggressions, Crimes and Atrocities: A Speech Given To The UN Security Council on the Subject of Lebanon By Dr. Rajaie Khorasani, Permanent Representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the UN. On March 7, 1985. I would like to congratulate you for presiding over the Security Council and particularly for the masterly manner in which you have been conducting the affairs of the Council. I should also congratulate Ambassador Krishnan of India, who during the month of February, carried out the heavy responsibilities of the Council with great efficiency and diplomatic skill. Back to Lebanon, which has been the victim of Zionist air-raids, aggressions, crimes and atrocities even long before its occupation by the Zionist army. Lebanon is now the holy land of struggle and resistance. Muslim people of Lebanon have kept Beirut-based foreign journalists out of the area and have closed the smaller roads between the villages hindering local communications.

The scope of Zionist crimes increasingly widened, according to Mr. Rilmer's article. "The Red Cross said today that the Israeli forces had put 112 new prisoners into the Ansar prison camp in Southern Lebanon since the middle of this month, raising the number held there to 1602. Under normal practices, however, prisoners are often held and interrogated for days before being transferred to Ansar. The Shiite Imam, or religious leader, of the village of Burj al Shemali, who was seen being carried off by Israeli soldiers during a raid last week, was found today by a shepherd in a field near Beirut. The Israeli military authorities are using a West Bank prison as an "intimidation center" where prisoners are sometimes beaten and tortured, lawyers have alleged." As the Zionist atrocities increasingly continue, the scene of the crimes shows further uncontrolled madness of the Zionist crimes. Another article in the Christian Science Monitor by Jim Muir on 1/25/1985 reports: "Any house where arms or suspects are found is bulldozed. Several dozen villagers are usually taken for questioning. None has yet returned. They came in with tanks and troops shooting everywhere, one said. All the men between 14-60 were taken to the village school for interrogation. They took police dogs into the houses where the women were." The same article reports "When the village sheik tried to explain to the Israelis that they were turning the whole house against them, they shouted at him to get back in line... The Israelis were weighed down with arms, but they were more frightened of us than we were of them. We laughed at them." In his article in the New York Times of 2/25/1985 John Kilmer, reported-'Israeli soldiers besieged at least nine Shiite Moslem villages in Southern Lebanon today; continuing their crackdown on the underground resistance. He says Israel initiated the conflict with its Defense Minister, Yitzhak Rabin, called an iron fist policy,... To show its iron fist,"columns of Israelis backed by armored personnel carriers and tank carriers and tanks have surrounded and entered a string of Shiite villages just east of Tyre that have been centers of rebellion. They rounded up all the men of the villages for questioning, carried off suspected Shiite guerrillas and bulldozed or blew up houses." "Details of the Israeli action are coming out slowly because the Israelis have kept Beirut-based foreign journalists out of the area and have closed the smaller roads between the villages hindering local communications." The scope of Zionist crimes increasingly widened, according to Mr. Rilmer's article. "The Red Cross said today that the Israeli forces had put 112 new prisoners into the Ansar prison camp in Southern Lebanon since the middle of this month, raising the number held there to 1602. Under normal practices, however, prisoners are often held and interrogated for days before being transferred to Ansar. The Shiite Imam, or religious leader, of the village of Burj al Shemali, who was seen being carried off by Israeli soldiers during a raid last week, was found today by a shepherd in a field near Beirut. The Israeli military authorities are using a West Bank prison as an "intimidation center" where prisoners are sometimes beaten and tortured, lawyers have alleged." and redundant. It is particularly so because some conscientious member states of the Security Council know pretty well that their hands too are in the blood of the Lebanese Muslims deep up to their elbows. The basic question in front of the Council is not why the Council has been watching all these terrorist, criminal acts in cold blood.

The answer to this question considering the presence of Zionist supporters in the Council is quite clear. The basic and enlightening question that all the Arab and Muslim countries altogether are electricing, and the Zionists, forces, anything happened to the international peace and security or not? Was the sleeping conscience of the guardians of international peace and security bothered? Is it not the case that each one of us has been sleeping fairly well on the blatant and continued violation of international peace and security? Is it not that in all these two painfully slow moving years every hour of which for the people of Lebanon has lasted longer than a year for the Security Council, only the brave Muslims of Lebanon have been sacrificing to the last drop of their blood in defence of international peace and security? Do you not agree Mr. President, that ever since the enemies of mankind installed this dirty boil of Zionist base in the bottom of Palestine, international peace and security has perished from our region and that therefore, those who have come together here to defend the safety of expanding borders of Israel have been continuously betraying the cause of peace and violating the Charter? Do you therefore not agree that they are bloody liars who have sent their Zionist agents to our region in order to devastate, occupy and plunder?

Among the millions of Arabs and hundreds of millions of Muslims, the people of Lebanon, with all their genuine commitment to the liberating faith of Islam, have taken upon themselves to demonstrate a historic record of resistance, determination and struggle. For the first time they have defeated the champion of the 1967 Six Day War. The distinguished Ambassador of Egypt who is now attending the Council and remembers the size of the Arab army of 1967 war can well appreciate how great the achievement of the Muslim people of Lebanon is. Of all national and international entities, which have been some how pertinent to the Arab-Israel conflict and who have wished to be known as adversaries of the Zionist invaders, only the Muslim people of Lebanon have proved victorious under the banner of Islam. The international body and the Security Council are deeply indebted to the people of Lebanon. It is they who have been fighting against aggression and for the cause of peace and independence. They are the real defenders of international peace and security, not those who produce rhetorics in this chamber.

With an Islamic determination, they have punished the Zionist aggressor, and those behind them. They are thus paying the heavy price of that lawful punishment that they have brought, and shall by the grace of God continue to bring, to the Zionist enemy. And at the peak of this struggle of crime and punishment we, all of a sudden, observe a desperate oppressed can rely and which the Istickbary powers fear. They rather displacing the blame on the Islamic Republic of Iran, they do not in end to make it evident that the entire struggle in the Middle East is a confrontation between Islam and Kufr? Mr. President, The record of the Security Council and its governing principles show that those who can maintain their interest outside the Security Council in the real world can also maintain their interest in this chamber and those who are blindly fascinated by the material glamour of the satanic worldly powers, and has therefore adopted servility to them outside the United Nations, remain surrogate and tributary to those powers inside this chamber too. And therefore, until and unless the Muslim nations do bring together all their potential in a united Islamic front, they are bound to be scared of Islam as the enemies of Islam are and will not be able to contribute to the human society all the good and happiness that Islam requires of them to contribute. When Muslims identify themselves with anything other than Islam, then their new artificial, insecure identity fearfully departs from Islam and anything Islamic. It is this fear of Islam and the Islamic revolution, as today's article by Karen Elliot says in Washington Post, that encouraged certain Arab nations including Iraq to harken to Egypt's call for a broader Arab-Israeli peace. My first proposal is to our Arab brothers in the region who have mistaken the problem for the solution. Islam, I do not need to assure them, is the solution and the problem.

And a broader Arab-Israeli peace is only the problem and surely not the solution. To the Security Council, if it really wants to play “Security Council”, my proposal is a strong and straight forward resolution which condemns the Zionist aggressor for its recent crimes as well as for its illegal and over-due occupation of the Lebanese territory and which requires the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all Zionist forces from all the occupied territories. We also hope that professional vetoers will this time try to take side with the Arabs who have both plenty of cheap oil and a lucrative market: and not with the Zionist base, which up to now, in addition to a very heavy load of military and financial bills, has brought nothing to the United States other than deep animosity and hatred by the people of the Middle East. Finally the Islamic regime in Iran, due to its Islamic quality, is always blamed for all Islamic developments in the region and particularly in the Lebanon. In putting the blame on the Islamic Republic of Iran, they do not in end to make propaganda for Iran as a powerful Islamic state on which the oppressed can rely and which the Istickbary powers fear. They rather want to discredit the Muslim people of Lebanon, as if others besides Iran are neither entitled to nor committed to Islam. Let me assure those concerned, that first of all Islam is no body's monopoly. All people including our brothers in the Lebanon are equally entitled to Islam. Secondly, as soon as a nation like Lebanon refreshes its commitment to Islam, it will continue its constructive liberating role independently of the Islamic Republic of Iran and immediately on the basis of Islam and accordingly to it. Those who think otherwise are ignorant of Islam. What you are observing in Lebanon is simply the light of Islam which has happily enlightened a portion of the tiny population of Lebanon, who have resolutely decided to powerfully cleanse their Islamic homeland from the darkness of Zionism and imperialism. Nothing can stop them. The more you try to extinguish this light the more you force it up. The best advice to the enemy is to leave the area peacefully, though it is not easy to carry out this advice. I am told that the Israeli currency used to be equal to one dollar but nowadays more than, 9000 of it hardly make a dollar. Airline tickets in Israel are to be paid for in dollars. This means if the Ashkenazi Jews sell all their property and real estate, they can hardly get a return ticket to Brooklyn. This means even for those return tickets the poor American farmer has to pay. Second, to my Arab brothers, I wish to reiterate that the Zionist base is a balloon beast full of air. Don't fear it. It is nothing. An American Professor of Politics who once came to see me commented that the United States could never understand how weak and... defeatable this petty satan was. I therefore hope that American officials will no longer spend on a Zionist real non-entity. They have to live with Muslims; with independent and powerful Muslims. They would better start to learn to do it seen and with less casualties on both sides. To the Arab brothers I have to reiterate that the enemy is already defeated. You don't need to fear it. Let us join together and liberate Palestine. Believe me the beautiful flag of Palestine shall soon be hoisting in the entire occupied land. The sooner we establish our United Islaami Board, the sooner the liberation of Palestine and the rest of the oppressed people will come about. Since the victories of the Islamic forces in the Lebanon are usually taken as the fruit of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, then we can clearly understand why in spite of the 12 June agreement and the presence of the United Nations team in the two capitals, we have to be the target of huge devastating missiles in Desful, Abadan, Ahwaz, Sari-pole-Zhab and other places. Thank you. [=]

24136. LCOME. “POSTAL WORKERS FOR PEACE: Statement on the Persian Gulf Crisis”, in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter-Spring 1991. (Among the resolutions and statements on the Persian Gulf crisis the following from the Miami-based Postal Workers for Peace raised a number of the key issues the labor movement must confront in the coming months - EDITOR) The holiday season is a time to celebrate peace on earth, yet once again our government prepares a monstrous war in a far away land. Over a half million troops, mostly Americans, are assembled in Saudi Arabia for what has been predicted to be one of the largest and costliest battles in world history. While President Bush has solicited support from other governments, it is clear that American troops will do most of the fighting, and the American people will be expected to make the sacrifices and bear the brunt of this war. Already, 53000 body bags are in place to ship our dead soldiers back home. In a few short months, on the pretext of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, President Bush has brought us to the brink of a terrible war, possibly involving chemical, biological and/or nuclear weapons and over a million civilian and military casualties. The entire globe will feel the impact of this war. Drastic increases in the price of oil will precipitate economic collapse throughout the third world, resulting in increased misery and starvation for millions. As unemployment grows, the governments of Europe, Japan and the US will use repressive to beat down the labor movement and lower the standard of living of workers. Few would disagree that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait was a brutal act in violation of the right to national sovereignty. Iraq should withdraw from Kuwait. Yet no one should believe that that is why US troops are now massed in the desert. The war in Vietnam, the invasions of Grenada and Panama, and over a decade of military intervention in El Salvador and Nicaragua show that the US government has no principles when it comes to national sovereignty. In the Middle East, the US armed and financed Israel's murderous invasion of Lebanon in 1982, and continues to give massive aid to Israel in spite of its violations of Kuwait was a brutal act in violation of the right to national sovereignty. Iraq should withdraw from Kuwait. Yet no one should believe that that is why US troops are now massed in the desert. The war in Vietnam, the invasions of Grenada and Panama, and over a decade of military intervention in El Salvador and Nicaragua show that the US government has no principles when it comes to national sovereignty. In the Middle East, the US armed and financed Israel's murderous invasion of Lebanon in 1982, and continues to give massive aid to Israel in spite of its continued military occupation of land internationally recognized as belonging to Lebanon, Syria and the Palestinians. No, the US government is not interested in upholding any principle of territorial integrity. Neither are US troops there to defend democracy. The "legitimate" government of Kuwait is just like the Shah's regime in Iran or the ruling rich in Central America - families of reactionary billionaires which do Washington's bidding while crushing all dissent. Democratic rights for women and unions are slim to nonexistent in Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states. We are always told that war is necessary to defend "democracy" from "aggression", and we are getting tired of it. Many see this correctly as a war for oil. The troops are there to ensure that world oil production continues to be dominated by a handful of mostly US multinational oil companies. This is a war to maintain the unchallenged US domination of the production, pricing and distribution of world petroleum supplies. Workers are always the losers in war. It is we who suffer and die and kill our fellow workers in strange lands while at home the rich reap the profits and attack our unions and break our strikes in the name of "national defense." Congress no longer even mentions the so-called peace dividend or increased social services through hoped-for cuts in defense spending. In the inner cities, joblessness, run-down housing, homelessness, drug addiction, and a failed system of education and health care are pushing conditions to the breaking point. Yet this war will bring even deeper cuts in social services. Laying down their lives for the oil companies appears more and more to be the only job available to African-American and Latino youth. We see the effect of this lowering of social services in the post office, where budget cuts have led to the 30 cent stamp, casuals delivering mail, lower delivery standards, the contracting out of jobs, shorter window hours, an overall decline in the quality of service. The total breakdown of collective bargaining. Now we also see assignments and routes left vacant as postal workers in the reserves are sent off war. All of the major provisions in our contract now go to an arbitrator, as management seeks to gut our benefits and job security. The stage is set not only for war with Iraq, but also for war against the workers here at home. It is time for us to fight back - and our fight is here.

Postal Workers for Peace is proud to join the growing movement against this war. We know that the labor movement will not be able to move forward if we don't stop this war. As we struggle for a fair contract and workers' rights, we must also demand: "US Troops out of the Middle East!" "No War for Oil!" "Money for Jobs, Not for War!" Postal Workers for Peace rejects this war drive and calls for the immediate withdrawal of all US forces in the Persian Gulf, so that the countries in the region can be free to achieve a peace settlement respecting the national rights of all peoples in the region. We will work to support the massive united actions needed to stop this war. [Postal Workers for Peace, P. O. Box 37-0135 Miami, Florida.] [=]

24137. LCOME: Javidi, Ali. "From the Shah to Khomeni The Emergence of the Iranian Working Class", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Spring 1990. THE EMERGENCE OF THE modern Iranian working class had its origin in the Shah's land reforms of 1963-1968. The land reform program nationalized some of the land owned by big land-owners and "distributed" it among peasants. The small peasants who were financially incapable of using the land had no option but to sell their portion to the giant agricultural corporations and leave for the cities to find jobs as workers in the industrial zone. By 1974 thousands of factories were set up, most of which were initiated or subsidized by the government. The Shah's government made most of its revenue from oil explorations and sales, pouring into the country vast amounts of foreign capital. This meant that while the formal investment of foreign companies amounted to a mere 10% of the total annual investment, the Shah's government pumped the other 90% from oil revenues into the economy. Crash industrialization or what the Shah called rapid modernization of the society marked the beginning of the contemporary history of Iran.

INDUSTRIALIZATION: Industrialization on the one hand brought huge profits to foreign companies and created a set of very rich, affluent Iranian factory owners, a middle class and technocrats; on the other hand it created millions of young Iranian workers, deprived of minimum standards of living and basic labor rights including the right to strike and the formation of their own organizations and unions. The sharp rise in oil prices in the mid 70's brought a short "boom" period. The astronomical revenues at this time enabled the government to revise its development plans, accelerating the pace of industrialization. But the "boom" was shortlived and with the drop in oil revenues in 1977, the crash industrialization program went awry. The government then attempted to counter its huge budget deficit and adapted an austerity program to finance its development projects. Foreign companies began to see darkness rather than light at the end of the tunnel and began withdrawing their formal, directly invested capital from the country. Unemployment shot up to unprecedented levels and inflation grew to such an extent that even the Shah's legislation and propaganda campaigns to counter price rises ended in failure. A crisis had hit Iran and its latent effects embraced the country all at once and so deeply, that in addition to the working class, the middle class also observed a drop in the general level of subsistence. It was in such circumstances that members of the clergy which had been run to the fringes of the land reform and the cultural and social values that ran parallel with the industrialization, raised their voices against the Shah's modernization plans. Their hostility towards the Shah grew mainly from the land reforms that had taken most of the population to the industrial zones and had broken the clergy's traditional endowments. As the economic crisis deepened further and increasing numbers of Iranians turned against the Shah and his despotic rule, the revolution gathered momentum. From the second half of 1978 the workers' muscle proved the decisive force in toppling the regime. Khomeni, leading the clergy, exploited the workers' and peoples' discontent with the Shah while cunningly avoiding the specifics of his program. Despite his attempts and that of his pre-set government to accept a quiet transfer of power, the February revolution took place and swept away the monarchy. From the very beginning the new regime attacked the gains of the revolution (such as the 40-hour work week, the right to organize and participate in political activity) and its thugs attacked the demonstrations of unemployed workers; women demanding equal rights with men, etc. During the revolution, workers, on their own initiative, had formed councils in many factories. These workers' councils were the most advanced form of mass organization in which the workers participated in their struggles and was one of the highlights of the labor movement in Iran. Under the new regime these councils were attacked and replaced with the official Islamic councils.

IRAN-IRAQ WAR: The legacy of the Iran-Iraq war has been one million dead, many thousands permanently disabled, millions of refugees from war-torn areas, and hunger. The war-economy resulted in mass redundancy and unemployment in all branches of non-military industries. This had a major effect on the workers' living standards. During the eight years of war and the reign of terror, Iranian workers never submitted to the regime. Hundreds of strikes were organized and there were bloody confrontations. In many factories workers fought bare-handed against the gunfire of the regime's armed forces. They opposed the regime in every way possible to gain their right to jobs, improved working conditions, higher wages, the right to form independent organizations such as workers' councils and unions, and hold regular mass meetings to discuss and unify their actions. With the growth of anti-war struggles, the Islamic republic, sensing its weakness, accepted a ceasefire and began a new wave of repression, marked with torture and mass executions. The regime is now trying to impose the repression experienced in war-time in a time of "peace," driving workers to more poverty and higher unemployment. It is in such circumstances that Iranian workers are struggling. At the same time, international support is being sought to create external pressures for change and bring encouragement to the Iran labor movement. [Ali Javid is a member of AFT Local 1475 and the Iranian-American Labor Solidarity Committee. For information write IALSC, POB 25A72, Los Angeles, Ca. 90025.][=] 24138. LCOME; Webb, Carol; Traugott, Al. "North California Labor Councils Lead Nation In Opposing Bush's Preparation for War", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter-Spring 1991. IN THE MONTHS prior to the outbreak of the war the labor councils of Alameda, San Francisco, San Mateo and Santa Clara and San Benito Counties passed resolutions in October and November calling for withdrawal of all military forces from the Gulf region and all but San Francisco called for an international peace conference "at which the complex political and economic problems of the Middle East, including the invasion of Kuwait" could be resolved through diplomacy. Although the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was not mentioned by name, its inclusion in such a conference was implied. The resolutions, which were generally similar, detailed reasons why organized labor has a stake in the conflict: children of working people make up the bulk of all military forces; it means the end of the "peace dividend" when funds are desperately needed for domestic programs; and focus on this crisis diverts attention from the Bush administration's failure to deal with the growing recession and the S & L scandal. Simply stated, the labor councils' sentiments were that working people do not want to pay for or die in another war so far from home to protect the interests of large oil corporations. These resolutions emerged from a growing understanding of the US involvement. Bush did not commit more than 40,000 troops to the Middle East to "draw a line in the sand" beyond which Iraq must not pass. The most powerful country in the world can draw such a line with a few thousand troops.

BUSH SUPPORTED PREVIOUS INVASIONS: Nor could Bush be offended by the naked aggression of Saddam Hussein, for he supported Iraq's invasion of Iran, Israel's invasion of Lebanon, and, of course, the US invasions of Grenada and Panama. Neither does it seem likely that the goal is to restore the "legitimate rights" of the Kuwaitis or the "preservation of our way of life," which in this case seems to mean access to cheap oil. An attempt by Secretary of State James Baker to convince US workers that the intervention in the gulf was to "preserve" their jobs never got off the ground. Baker previously had announced the US intention of remaining in the Middle East in the future. That is what this foray is all about—the domination and control of the area and its resources. Recent pronouncements by government officials have made the point that if the US is to continue to dominate the international economy, we will have to depend increasingly on the military's capacity to make Third World markets secure and to guarantee access to raw materials. Since the November election, the Administration has made it clear that an invasion of Kuwait and the aerial destruction of Iraq's military capacity is what is intended. So what does this mean for labor? It means, first of all, the death of thousands of children of US and Middle Eastern workers—not the sons of sheiks or the sons and daughters of oil magnates. It is estimated that an invasion of Iraq, 20,000-30,000 US troops will be killed and hundreds of thousands of Arab soldiers and civilians will die. Of course, workers will continue to pay a disproportionately large share of the cost in four ways: through increased taxes, through the diversion of tax money, from much-needed social services to the military, by more wage and benefit concessions to guarantee high profit margins, and with our lives. In addition, military spending is inflationary and results in less employment then similar expenditures on housing or education or road construction. Spending on weapons pumps money into the economy while satisfying no consumer need or demands. The result is increased demand, higher prices and a further reduction in the real earnings of workers. One can see what is happening to the price of housing during the military buildup of the 1980s. The US, in its attempts to guarantee access to markets and to oil or other raw materials, must necessarily make deals with the most backward and oppressive elements in the countries it controls. Those are the ones who deny workers the right to organize, who kill those who struggle to achieve the most basic rights and even minimal standards of living. This has been the case in El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, as well as the Middle East. Such policies must inevitably undermine the labor movement in the United States. When General Motors can get away with paying subsistence wages in Mexico, it becomes more difficult for US workers to maintain, let alone increase, wage levels here. Our well-being as workers, as union members, surely lies in our support for a country's right to self-determination and workers' right to organize in every part of the world. The war that seems about to begin in the Middle East is not being fought for democracy, for human rights, for self-determination, or for any of the principles that we cherish for ourselves and our country. It is critical that we in the labor movement speak out against US intervention in the Middle East in every way that we can, for in this country, we are the ones who will pay. [Al Traugott is a long-time activist and Carol Webb is formerly secretary of the Santa Clara and San Benito Co. Central Labor Council. This article is updated from one in Labor Notes in Dec.][==] 24139. Lancaster, Pat. "Mosaic Of Fantasy and Legends: An Exhibition of the Paintings of Suad al-Attar Opens In London This Month; Being a Woman, A Painter, and Iraqi, All Of These Are Important", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter-Spring 1991. IN THE MONTHS prior to the outbreak of the war the labor councils of Alameda, San Francisco, San Mateo and Santa Clara and San Benito Counties passed resolutions in October and November calling for withdrawal of all military forces from the Gulf region and all but San Francisco called for an international peace conference "at which the complex political and economic problems of the Middle East, including the invasion of Kuwait" could be resolved through diplomacy. Although the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was not mentioned by name, its inclusion in such a conference was implied. The resolutions, which were generally similar, detailed reasons why organized labor has a stake in the conflict: children of working people make up the bulk of all military forces; it means the end of the "peace dividend" when funds are desperately needed for domestic programs; and focus on this crisis diverts attention from the Bush administration's failure to deal with the growing recession and the S & L scandal. Simply stated, the labor councils' sentiments were that working people do not want to pay for or die in another war so far from home to protect the interests of large oil corporations. These resolutions emerged from a growing understanding of the US involvement. Bush did not commit more than 40,000 troops to the Middle East to "draw a line in the sand" beyond which Iraq must not pass. The most powerful country in the world can draw such a line with a few thousand troops.
The UN Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) published in late 1995 a study in which it attributes to the US/UN sanctions against Iraq the responsibility for the death of over 500000 children. This genocide continues the line of manifold war crimes for which the US administration should be made accountable.

The sanctions are maintained by Washington because of strategical and politico-economical reasons and attempts--by holding the Iraqi people hostage--to uphold its superclass interests in the Gulf.

The main reasons for the maintenance of the embargo seem to me the following:

1. The sanctions should suggest that Iraq still constitutes a danger [to world peace]. Thus the fears of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait of Iraq are continually fuelled. The regimes of both Gulf states believe that they cannot be without the 'protection' of US troops. The permission to permanently station its troops in the Gulf--long-sought by Washington--with the aim to directly exert military and economic control of the oil fields, has now been granted by the regimes. The costs of stationing US troops is borne by these countries. In this connection one should point to the significant arms trade by the US with these countries, which does not increase their security but permits the flow of billions of petro-dollars back into the deficit-plagued US budget.

2. The lifting of the sanctions would lead to massive oil sales by Iraq. This would rapidly result in oil price reductions in the international market. This cannot be neither in the interest of Saudi Arabia nor of Kuwait. Both countries depend--as a result of the high costs of stationing US troops and of costly arms purchases--on a stable oil price. Such a situation would not be welcome by the US either. Saudi Arabia and Kuwait would not be able to honour their debts or reduce dramatically their expenditures, which would primarily affect their trade with the USA. An additional argument is that a declining oil price might negatively affect the standing of the dollar.

3. The current so-called peace negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbours would provide another reason for the maintenance of the sanctions. Here we are faced with two unequal parties: On the one hand militarily weak Arab countries, divided by intercne conflicts; on the other a state (Israel), possessing atomic, biological and chemical weapons of mass annihilation and backed by the main superpower. The aim of this superpower (the US) is to impose an order in the region which would ensure the long-range interests of its protege, Israel, and increase its own influence. If Iraq were permitted to regain its strength destruction was desirable (a report through the uncensored Irish radio).

Iraq's current so-called peace negotiations between Iraq and Kuwait are not in a position to influence the interests which underpin the sanctions. The interests affecting the continuation of the sanctions lie outside the reach of Iraq. It is thus irrelevant whether Iraq fulfills the US-imposed UN resolutions or not. These resolutions serve rather to hide the true motives of the Gulf war and the sanctions. They serve however very well to justify--for public opinion--the continuing genocide against the Iraqi population. Western media--serving Washington's agenda--have hitherto failed, alas, to question the compatibility between these resolutions and international law. It seems to me also urgent to discuss the legitimacy of resolutions made by a non-democratically legitimized Security Council.

In our regular visits to Iraq we were not only witness to continuously worsening conditions of existence for the majority of the population, but also to the extent of the destruction caused by disproportionate means of warfare (in relation to the war's declared intent). If the aim was to free Kuwait, it was not necessary to destroy human habitat, hospitals, schools, kindergartens as well as the civil infrastructure such as water and electricity supplies. Unless of course the aim of the war was different from what was publicly claimed. Those who demand compensations for the victims of Iraqi deeds in Kuwait, should also demand reparations for the Iraqi people who have been subjected to unmeasurable sufferings by allied bombings and the sanctions. [=] the Middle Eastern course from his Daily Record and Sunday Mail". Of course, such anti-Arab racism is routine in the US mass media, as in Stephen Spielberg's "Back to the Future" with its purely gratuitous characterization of Arabs as ‘mindless terrorists’. Press briefings by the military during the war were conducted with an air of unreality: briefers would not use the word ‘Iraq’, rather they talked about attacks on ‘Saddam’ in the new ‘language-bombardment of demarcation’. This tactic enabled Westerners to ignore the fact a nation was being destroyed. So, in an example of the kind of blackwhite statements that characterized the media onslaught that was part of the war, Pres. Bush could characterize the massacre of Iraq as ‘a victory for the human race’; “it seemed at one point as if the designer of the cruise missile would be in line for this year’s Nobel Prize for Peace”. At the same time, the very large opposition to the war in Parliament was completely silent in the mass media. Predictably, any such public opposition in Parliament would be greeted with cries of treason, as in the Falklands War. The Scottish Nationalist Party, with Scotland having 70% of its people opposing the war, has remained silent on the war, other than a few wimpsers about how a disproportionate number of the frontline soldiers were Scots.

Normality in reporting from the Gulf war remains total censorship. Typical is a recent BBC report of fighting between Iraqi forces and Kurds, with mention of refugees fleeing to Iran with napalm burns (falsely implying that the napalm burns were inflicted by Iraqi forces, when the napalmizing was actually conducted by US forces). There is still no reporting on the damage done by the air raids in Kuwait, and no report on the burning of the oilfields (such reports have been suppressed by the Army since any reports on the number of burning oil wells would be a ‘propaganda coup for the enemy’). Any TV reports of environmental damage are characterized as having been the product of Saddam Hussein’s barbarism, without a single word about the air raids being the direct cause of the suffering. “The deliberate destruction of a country, of its means of communications and of its population’s means of maintaining life and health; the deliberate refusal to consider peace terms until as many as possible of a conscript army has been exterminating using weapons against which they have no means of defending themselves: this to me is an act of genocide”, but Leonard notes that calling it an act of genocide would be denounced by Holocaustists, who believe that only Jews are sufficiently human to suffer. Leonard concludes “One would have thought that it might have at least occurred to people that there will be Iraqi survivors, or their descendants, who will feel that there will be Iraqi survivors, or their descendants, who will feel that if there is any justice in the world, the cities of Britain and America will one day get at least a little of what their citizens were apparently so indifferent to inflicting on the towns and cities of Iraq.” Leonard’s Shorter Catechism includes a set of questions and answers such as: (1) Who said ‘Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth’? This was once said by Jesus Christ on the Mount of Olives. He was quoting in anticipation of George Bush, who used the words in his address to the American people after ordering the mass bombing of Iraq. (2) What did you used to call someone who should feel guilty about their country’s past policy of genocide? A German. (3) What do you call a quarter of million Germans marching in 1991 against genocide? Anti-semitic. (4) What does UN Resolution 242 state? Shhh. [TXT]

24142. Leopold, Evelyn. "UN Plans Six More Months of Iraqi Oil For Food Deal", in Seattle Times, June 3, 1997, p. A13. The Security Council has extended the oil-for-food deal which will allow some food to enter Iraq. In Kurdish areas, 19.3% of children under 5 are malnourished, of which 26% are chronically undernourished and 5% acutely malnourished. UNICEF reports $13.5 million is desperately needed for vaccines for children. [TXT]

24143. Madrid, Ronaldo. "Book Review: How Bush Used Television to Manipulate America for the Persian Gulf War", in Crescent International, June 16-30, 1996, p. 9. The Persian Gulf TV War, by Douglas Kellner. Westview Press, Boulder, CO, US. 1992. pp. 402. Paperback: $19.95. The Bush administration had demanded that by 1/15/1991, the Iraqi army “pull out” of Kuwait which was considered an innocent victim of Iraqi aggression. The end result of this “line drawn in the sand” was war. The Persian Gulf Oil War, like other wars the US fought, is now of history books. But as with everything else that the majority wants to put behind, there are always a few who will continue to analyze and critique the war. In The Persian Gulf TV War, Kellner takes a close look at how America, democracy, and television itself on indifference to ignore the fact a nation was being destroyed. So, in an example of the kind of blackwhite statements that characterized the media onslaught that was part of the war, Pres. Bush could characterize the massacre of Iraq as ‘a victory for the human race’; “it seemed at one point as if the designer of the cruise missile would be in line for this year’s Nobel Prize for Peace”. At the same time, the very large opposition to the war in Parliament was completely silent in the mass media. Predictably, any such public opposition in Parliament would be greeted with cries of treason, as in the Falklands War. The Scottish Nationalist Party, with Scotland having 70% of its people opposing the war, has remained silent on the war, other than a few wimpsers about how a disproportionate number of the frontline soldiers were Scots.

Normality in reporting from the Gulf war remains total censorship. Typical is a recent BBC report of fighting between Iraqi forces and Kurds, with mention of refugees fleeing to Iran with napalm burns (falsely implying that the napalm burns were inflicted by Iraqi forces, when the napalmizing was actually conducted by US forces). There is still no reporting on the damage done by the air raids in Kuwait, and no report on the burning of the oilfields (such reports have been suppressed by the Army since any reports on the number of burning oil wells would be a ‘propaganda coup for the enemy’). Any TV reports of environmental damage are characterized as having been the product of Saddam Hussein’s barbarism, without a single word about the air raids being the direct cause of the suffering. “The deliberate destruction of a country, of its means of communications and of its population’s means of maintaining life and health; the deliberate refusal to consider peace terms until as many as possible of a conscript army has been exterminating using weapons against which they have no means of defending themselves: this to me is an act of genocide”, but Leonard notes that calling it an act of genocide would be denounced by Holocaustists, who believe that only Jews are sufficiently human to suffer. Leonard concludes “One would have thought that it might have at least occurred to people that there will be Iraqi survivors, or their descendants, who will feel that if there is any justice in the world, the cities of Britain and America will one day get at least a little of what their citizens were apparently so indifferent to inflicting on the towns and cities of Iraq.” Leonard’s Shorter Catechism includes a set of questions and answers such as: (1) Who said ‘Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth’? This was once said by Jesus Christ on the Mount of Olives. He was quoting in anticipation of George Bush, who used the words in his address to the American people after ordering the mass bombing of Iraq. (2) What did you used to call someone who should feel guilty about their country’s past policy of genocide? A German. (3) What do you call a quarter of million Germans marching in 1991 against genocide? Anti-semitic. (4) What does UN Resolution 242 state? Shhh. Relations firm, Hill and Knowlton, which coached the young girl in what stories he was reporting on the first night of the attack on Iraq. He also said that had started the war. This shallow excuse of blaming Saddam (only) was pounded into the American psyche on a daily basis. Kellner reminds us that during the Iraq/Iran war when Saddam was a US ally the media “invariably referred to Baghdad and Iraq as the agents in the war, but during the Gulf crisis and war the dominant mode of reference was to Saddam Hussein thus collapsing Iraq into Hussein” (p. 64). Another tactic used by the Bush administration, and later by the media, was their choice of rhetoric. In every major speech concerning the war, speakers resorted to the use of sexual words. For example, the invasion of Kuwait was often referred to as “rape” or “penetration.” They also spoke of Iraq referring to “pull-out” of Kuwait. Finally, general Colin Powell summed up this insidious language by stating that the US, in dealing with Iraq, had to “cut it off and kill it” (p. 65). Kellner states that by using sexual words, the US was justifying its future use of violence. He says that “throughout US history, vengeance for rape - especially the rape of white women by men of color - has been used to legitimize US imperialist adventures and military action” (p. 66). The demonization of Saddam was not confined to words. During the Gulf crisis, the US media constantly reminded the public about Saddam’s past brutal actions. This was highly hypocritical because when Saddam was a US ally, none of these reports ever surfaced. There were other dimensions of the demonization process. Kellner states: “Although the Iraqis were portrayed as brutal bullies, Bush and the US were presented as strong and honorable defenders of international law” (p. 65). Bush was praised as decisive and brilliant. Saddam on the other hand, was being molded as the new Hitler. According to the Gannett Foundation, there were 1170 references in the media linking Saddam to Hitler. If this were not enough to poison the public mind, the baby-incubator campaign surely was. It involved a young Kuwaiti girl who testified to congress that she saw firsthand 15 babies from incubators thrown to the floor and left to die, by Iraqi soldiers. The public and congress were outraged. America, the golden warrior, would have to uphold the moral decency of the world by killing the “savage” Iraqi people. After the war, it was revealed that the whole story was a lie. It had been made up by the American Public Relations firm, Hill and Knowlton, which coached the young girl in what to say. The girl, Naiyera, turned out to be the daughter of the Kuwaiti ambassador in Washington DC!

Throughout the book Kellner expresses how the public fell victim to biased reporting. His harshest criticism is reserved for Wolf Blitzer of the CNN. He says that Blitzer did not even wait to confirm any of the stories he was reporting on the first night of the attack on Iraq. He basically became the mouthpiece for propaganda campaigns which wanted to put a positive spin on the initial attacks on Iraq. Kellner states that Blitzer “claimed that US officials were claiming that scud missile sites were knocked out, that the Republican Guard was decimated, and that the Iraqi Air Force was destroyed, all totally specious claims” (p. 143). What reporting like this accomplished was to relay disinformation to an eager audience which began to feel that the war was going to be quick and decisive, without any American deaths. Blitzer accomplished another objective of the pentagon as well. By not questioning the veracity of any of the reports and spewing them through CNN, the most-watched news channel in the world, Blitzer actually helped ally fears in the public which facilitated keeping oil prices down. This was one of the objectives of the Bush administration. Kellner states that the “disinformation” campaign was “to convince oil markets, world stock exchanges, Israel and western opinion of the success of the attack” (p. 128). One of the most intriguing critiques Kellner has about the Persian Gulf War is that it helped for the first time America (or any other country for that matter) emerged in what has now become known as the “Technowar.” This means the use of science and technology to control the battlefield and decimate the enemy. What it tries to convey is that war is bloodless and nobody dies, only buildings get destroyed by “smart bombs.” It is an outlandish idea, something which is impossible to convey, but the impossible did happen. If a person who watched CNN or any other channel were asked whether they saw any dead bodies or chopped limbs, the overwhelming response would be “no.” The networks sold “Technowar” and the public bought it at the expense of reality.

The images of war were of missiles always hitting their targets. Blood and death were rarely shown on TV. This illusion gave Americans the feeling that their morality (pure and good) was winning out over barbarous enemies, even though in reality the US airforce were singing songs like, “If you kill for fun, you’re a sadist. If you kill for money, you’re a mercenary. If you kill for both, you’re a paraatrooper” (p. 248). So much for the good wholesome morals which Americans pride themselves on. Kellner concludes his critique by stating that “Iraq was the victim, therefore, of a neo-imperialist attempt to control its destiny. Iraq refused to submit to the will of the western neo-imperialist superpower and its allies” (p. 386). Kellner’s book is excellent. He brings to life the power which television has on society. He also exposes the dark side of the US which prides itself on being “pure and civilized.” Kellner is very methodical and meticulous in his arguments. He is also well-versed in his subject. Readers will no doubt be alerted not to digest everything from the US media. Kellner's book helps in creating the understanding that not everything in the media should be believed. He exposes the dangerous track the Americans are on, and will help more and more people to become educated about the effects of television before it is too late. [s]

24144. Makiya, Kanan; Al-Khalil, Samir. Cruelty and Silence: War, Tyranny, Uprising and the Arab World. New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 1993. [Kanan Makiya, under the name Samir Al-Khalil was the author of Republic of Fear (1986), a critique of the human rights abuses of the Saddam Hussein regime.] Makiya begins with the proposition that the Persian Gulf War was; at bottom an Arab moral failure of historic proportions, and that Saddam Hussein is merely a manifestation of the deep and pervasive sickness of all Arabs. Makiya argues that the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq was not a human act but was rather ‘a kind of malignancy … a kind of foul smelling plague … [that] came seeping out of pun-filled sores…’, noting that the nationalist argument made by Saddam Hussein (in condemning the pre-war prostitution trade that serviced Kuwaiti tourists), that, “To the Kuwaiti, the glorious Iraqi woman goes for a nickel!” He notes that the pervasive stench of the Iraqi occupation reflects the traditional Muslim distain of filth (noting that the nazzacheen Christian caste of Iraq that work as ‘cleaners of sweres’) was manifested by the Iraqi acts that made Iraq unclean. However, Arabs had little sympathy with the Kuwaitis suffering from occupation, for example, Moncef Mazrouki of the Tunisian Human Rights League who attributed pro-Iraqi demonstrations in the Maghrib to the ‘90% of Arabs’ who hate [the] dictatorial and archaic regime that have squandered Arab resources and honor’. [pp. 42-43] This is an accurate characterization of the pointlessness of Arab ‘mindless permanent anger’. [p. 46]. Arab poetry itself, long an emblem of Arab chauvinism, has been reduced to mere ‘namecalling, stereotyping and bigotry’.

Makiya tells of the Kuwait ‘Khalif’ whose life was saved several times by Palestinians during the occupation, whose childish belief that Palestinians had been victimized by Zionism was purified by his reconceptualization of the ‘Palestinian-as-collaborator’ [p. 55] and the ‘tenfold multiplication’ of his sex drive through the process of resistance to the Iraqi occupation [sic? p. 52]. Makiya tells of ‘Abu Haydar’, who is hypothetically supposed to have survived the war (after leaving an apology to Khalil in his home) and is then hypothesized as a participant in the anti-Saddam ‘intifadah’ in Basra. Makiya notes his account is a recitation of unverified rumors, until he reaches the account of an officer (who he merges into ‘Abu Haydar’) who first fought to banish Republican Guard forces from Najaf (rebels who cache themselves for months from the Baathist forces, for the prepositioned against possible American parachute troop attacks) and Kufa, and the who fought the Republican Guard as they fought to return to the Shiite city of Najaf. This Abu Haydar notes that he lost belief in the Baath Party when it ceased to be a real party and became an instrument of Saddam, and that he opposed the invasion of Kuwait because, “the world was imposing something on us and I accepted what it was imposing”. Abu Haydar participated in mass exclamations of supporters of Saddam Hussein in Najaf (such as the Baath revolutionary poet Falah Askar, who composed crueious verses such as “The whole people is a bouquet of flowers and the smell is Baath”, as well as other Baathite poets like Ridha al-Falahm and Hasan Amara). Nevertheless, the progressive, 2000 Wester stance of Shiite leaders like Abu Haydar was soon displaced by militia forces mobilized by the Supreme Islamic Assembly, that proclaimed an Islamic Republic based in Basra. The Republican Guard (reinforced by soldiers from the Yazidis (who have a traditional antipathy to Shites), and the towns of Hit, Mosul, Shirkat and Beiji) reasserted its power in Basra using napalm, cluster bombs, and at least 35 SCUD missiles; refugee columns advised to leave Basra were attacked by helicopter gunships. Shites were targeted for murder, rape and lotting; the Dar al-Hikma Library established by Ayatollah Muhsin al-Hakim and the public library of the Hakim family were burned; was the Dar-al-Ilm library of Ayatollah Khoie.

In Baghdad, the account of a man tortured for composing a song about the loss of Fao to Iranians (a city recaptured in the Iran-Iraq War only after 53000 Iraqis died in the fighting) is related (the man recalls the line: ‘Fao has gone, Out of my asshole it will come back’). Meanwhile, in the north, the Kurdish Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, reinforced by dejecting Kurdish soldiers from the Iraqi army, rose spontaneously in the north. The only serious opposition they confronted initially was the Peoples Mujahideen, an anti-Khomeini force led by Masoud Rajavi and armed by Saddam Hussein. Significantly, many Kurds who had fought for Saddam, and who switched to fight the central government, would later switch sides against to fight for Saddam Hussein, despite the memory of the use of chemical weapons on Kurdish villages, and despite the Anfal campaign (estimated by Kurds to have killed 180000, and by official records to have killed 100000; and including demolished villages, transfer points, poison gas, firing squads, mass graves [p. 152], and the sale of Kurdish women as sex slaves to buyers in the Gulf states [p. 158]). In 1988, Anfal entailed the destruction of 1276 villages, which is so much more serious that the Israeli elimination of a mere 369 Palestinian villages. [pp. 166-167].

The real criminals in this horror are Arab intellectuals: for even criticizing such crimes of the Arabs intellectuals, the author asserts he would be “no.” The networks sold “Technowar” and the public bought it at the expense of reality.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
==============================================================================
Elias Khoury liberates a Kuwait as occupied as Palestine by the great powers and their puppet monarchs, (4) the idea that Saddam's military power was somehow a general reflection of 'Arab' strength in the 'struggle' against Zionism [Makiya notes that any Arab struggle against Israel is inherently anti-democratic [pp. 264-265]]; (5) that linkage between ending the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq and ending the occupation by Israel was meaningful [Makiya notes that the support of the Iraqi regime for linkage was proof of Iraqi hypocrisy on the issue of linkage, and that support by Arab intellectuals for such linkage was proof that Arab intellectuals have no moral basis for criticizing the Israeli occupation [pp. 266-267]]; (6) the 'Arab Solution, the idea that there can be a meaningful role for Arab diplomacy in the Middle East; (7) the false belief by Arabs that oil played any role in the conflict (which has the corollary that the Arab oil economies are anything less than free agents in the world system [p. 275]); (8) that there is anything real to the idea of Western cultural imperialism (Makiya observes that 'Western culture today is immeasurably more tolerant of cultural, religious, and ethnic differences than Arab culture' and so the gifts of Western culture are rejected by Arabs only because of their racism against the West [p. 280]).

Makiya goes on to argue that the passivity of Arabs to repression, which he illustrates by noting that in 1982 the Syrian government killed 10000-40000 opponents to the regime in Hama and no Arab protested [sic: 10000-40000 opponents is surely not zero opponents, and protested over the Hama massacre were widespread]. Makiya goes on to argue that the normative nature of such violence is illustrated by the employment of Iraqis to rape women: 'violation of women's honor' [sic: it actually appears to be a criminal record, rather than a job description]; Makiya then builds upon this apparent confusion to argue that the Iraqi regime's depravity is thus revealed as a regime that is uniquely built on violation of what even the thugs of the regime believe is 'honor'. Makiya then argues that such official mass rape is unknown outside the Islamic world (noting that [Serbian] mass rape is merely the unofficial acts of 'some paramilitary organizations'), and cites a report in an Israeli newspaper (translated by Israel Shahak), of an honor murder by a man of his sister, whose body was left outside a Kibbutz so Jews would be blamed [generally, pp. 287-300; Kibbutz incident pp. 290-291]: Makiya goes on to argue that it is characteristic of Arab intellectual dishonesty to support Saddam's brutality while falsely accusing the Jews of being the real victims, when in fact, Jews are the real victims (Makiya notes that many of the many reported cases of rape of female Palestinian political prisoners by Israelis proves that conditions are so much worse in Arab countries (mentioning Jordan and Saudi Arabia), since Israeli society is democratic and open [p. 295]). He notes that rape has become a normal women; many have siblings or other close relatives who are Kuwaiti prisoners by Israelis proves that conditions are so much worse in Arab countries (mentioning Jordan and Saudi Arabia), since Israeli society is democratic and open [p. 295]). He notes that rape has become a normal women; many have siblings or other close relatives who are Kuwaiti

Makiya concludes with an attack on all Arab intellectuals and all their work in recent decades, concentrating on Edward Said: he attacks Said for asserting 'the morally wrong idea that the West is to be blamed in the here-and-now for its long and nefarious history of association with the Middle East', since the real problem cannot be any minor phenomenon like imperialism, but rather is Arab cruelty. [pp. 317-318] If there is to be a new Arab intellectualism, in the wake of the final death of Pan-Arabism [p. 327] it must find inspiration in the works of men like Salman Rushdie. [p. 324]. [TXT]

24145. Marcus, Aliza. "Turkey's Kurds Fight On Alone; The US Backed Government Claims Turkey Has No Kurdish Problem, Only a Terrorism Problem", in Nation, January 3, 1994, pp. 8-10. The war between Kurds and the Turkish Army continues in SE Turkey. Turkish troops, despairing in their ability to suppress the rebellion, have turned to ethnic cleansing: one-third of the village of Caglayan was burned down, and 600 villagers forced to leave at gunpoint. The Turkish Human Rights Association reports that at least 729 villages have been destroyed, in the same manner that Saddam Hussein destroyed 4000 Kurdish villages in northern Iraq in 1975-1991. In the last two years, 530 dissidents were executed by death squads, including three human rights activists. The US GRAF (German Rights Association for Kurds) has condemned the war for nine years and its military force has risen to 10000. This guerrilla army faces 18000 Turkish troops, with $400 million in annual US military aid. In addition, Turkey is a heavy buyer of US armaments: in 12/1992, Turkey paid $1.1 billion for 95 Sikorsky Black Hawk helicopters. Turkey still refuses to admit that the Kurds, who are 26% of the population and who number 12 million, even exist. PM Tansu Ciller, Turkey's first women PM, has intensified the rhetoric that there is no Kurdish problem (since there are no Kurds), but rather there is only a terrorism problem. Ciller has outlawed the Peoples Labor Party, the hitherto legal Kurdish party (although it resurfaced as the Democracy Party), a deputy investigating murders of Kurdish leaders was himself murdered, the pro-Kurdish paper Ozgur Gundem was shut down for four weeks; and now the prosecutor in Ankara is seeking to lift the immunity of Kurdish MPs (which would allow their trials for treason). Kurdish activists hoped President Clinton would have done something to advance the human rights of the Kurds during Ciller's state visit in 10/1993, but Clinton remained silent on the question. Clinton in fact promised support for the Turkish war on terrorism (i.e.-Kurds). [TXT]

24146. Middle East Watch-Middle East. The Bedoons of Kuwait. New York: Human Rights Watch, August 1995. [Ann Lesch, member of Advisory Committee, Kenneth Roth, executive director.] The 'bedoon' is from the Arabic 'bedoon jinsiyya', meaning 'without nationality' or 'without citizenship'.

Kuwait practices institutionalized discrimination against long-term residents known as Bedoons, who have been denied Kuwaiti citizenship (sometimes for generations) and who are now being made stateless. The Kuwait government had promised citizenship to some of theses people for decades, but after the end of the Persian Gulf War, the government reversed its position declared them illegal aliens.

There are some 300000 Bedoon, one-third of the entire population of Kuwait: about half are now in exile, mainly because Kuwait blocked their return to Kuwait after the end of the war. Most bedoon were born in Kuwait and lived there all their lives; 30000 are spouses of Kuwaiti women; many have siblings or other close relatives who are Kuwaiti citizens. Since 1985, Kuwait policies have displaced Bedoon from government positions (excepting a few thousand reinstated in the military and police). Bedoons are no longer issues civil ID cards, driver's licenses or travel documents; they are not permitted foreign travel (including travel for pilgrimage or medical emergencies) unless they are willing to never return. These policies were instituted in 1985 by then Minister of Interior Shiakh Salem al-Sabah to drive the Bedoon from Kuwait, although the policy still remains secret. In 1986, Bedoon were banned from attending universities, and were ordered expelled from the Kuwait Medical Association and Kuwait Lawyers Association.

After the end of Iraqi occupation, and despite the fact that most Bedoon backed the resistance, the government used the occasion to pursue more draconian measures against the Bedoon. Martial law trials failed to substantiate government allegations that Bedoons as a group were collaborators (the government tried to scapegoat the Bedoon for the Iraqi conquest of Kuwait). Hundreds of Bedoon are now held in the Talha Deportation Center (some remaining in the makeshift camp for years). Bedoons are subject to harassment and exploitation. Most Bedoon, impoverished by lack of employment (the percentage of Bedoon/tribesmen in the military has declined from 80% in 1985 to 25% in 1995; ultimately 'Kuwaitization' will eliminate all bedoon in the army), face eviction from their homes, mainly in slums. Kuwait law prevents judicial review of citizenship decisions, making such decisions not subject to judicial review; Courts have tried to intervene Bedoon from deportation but the government has ignored these rulings are issued

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
expulsion orders for 24000 Bedoon since the end of the war. Most Bedoon have documentation that would have allowed them to become citizens if the process had been conducted fairly; many bedoon were denied citizenship simply because the government has failed to act on applications for citizenship.

Denial of citizenship to bedoon violates international law, violates international law on gender-based discrimination (for Bedoon husbands of Kuwaiti women), violates international law on the unconquered human rights of children and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child; violates the universal right to due process; and violates Bedoons to their vested rights to citizenship and permanent residence.

Recommendations to the Kuwaiti Government: (1) for all Bedoon in the country (150000-180000): Kuwait should all the right to reside in Kuwait, release those held without charge, rescind deportation orders (afflicting 24000), and permit Bedoons to petition courts for redress; (2) for Bedoons outside the country (130000-160000): Kuwait should permit return all with Bedoon status before 8/2/1990 (many still remain in desert refugee camps, mainly in Iraq, with smaller numbers in Iran, and even smaller numbers outside the region), prioritize family reunification, and be allowed to collect back wages and retirement benefits from the Kuwaiti government; and (3) for Bedoon classified as such in 1985: allow travel within and outside the country, lift the ban on Bedoon driving cars, and end discrimination in education and health care. [=]

24147. Mirkarimi, Ross B. "Ecovoice: Life Struggles In Iraq: Is The War Over? 18-Month Old Baby In Karbala General Hospital Dies Dying From Malnutrition", in Buzzworm-The Environmental Journal. November-December 1992. p. 16. [Mirkarimi of the San Francisco-based Arms Control Research Center traveled to Iraq with the International Study Team; its report "Hidden Casualties" is available at (415)-397-1452.] Karbala General Hospital is filled with starving children and infants. Famine and childhood diseases are killing the children of Iraq in prodigious numbers as physicians can do nothing to assist them. The International Study Team notes: "Prior to the Gulf Crisis, Iraqis enjoyed a modern civilian infrastructure with sophisticated health care, water and sewage treatment, and electrical power systems. These systems have collapsed due to economic sanctions, Iraq is now one of the most impoverished countries in the world, and life is a daily struggle for most of its 18 million people." Baghdad appears to be recovering the fastest of the cities from the war (both the Iraq government and the United States prefer that the appearance of human misery be muted, at least in the capital), but outside the capital conditions continue to deteriorate. The Study Team notes, "women feel overwhelmed by their daily struggle to provide their children with even basic needs like food and water". South of Baghdad, at the Dijlah river, women interview had lost their husbands in the war, people drank from river water contaminated by untreated sewage and industrial wastes (locally a still-operating textile plant is discharging untreated wastes), and river fisheries (which before the war provide ample protein) had completely collapsed. UNICEF reports that outside Baghdad waterborne disease are ubiquitous: in Basrah much of the city remains flooded with sewage contaminated waters. The Study Team documented the death of 7000 children under age five in 1991, with infant mortality 300% that of pre-war levels; the main causes of such deaths are malnutrition and dehydration. The UN embargo has produced anger in Iraq that is directed at the United States. One Iraqi doctor notes: "Except for the Kurds and Shiites, Saddam is becoming the only "friend" that the Iraqi people have. Not by choice, but for survival". The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

Margarete Mitscherlich, psychoanalyst, published the book The Inability to Grieve in 1967 in collaboration with her husband. Twenty-four years later, she came to this conclusion: The Germans can grieve. The need to praise peace is very easy, but ineffective. "What we do need is active participation in the fight against war and everything that leads to war," Albert Einstein wrote in a 1953 letter to the Jewish Peace Fellowship. So, what shall we do?

There is no doubt that thinking in terms of friend/enemy categories presupposes a readiness for war. Once war has begun, it is whole nations and peoples who engage in worshipping themselves as "Good" while neglecting conflicts and grievances in their own countries by focusing on the "bad enemy." Constructing images of the enemy always seems to divert attention from one's own aggression and problems. We know very well that this tendency to fall back into these primitive psychological mechanisms exists everywhere. Still, it is frightening to be confronted with it once more in our Western civilized world, which as we hoped, would be more enlightened by now.

It is a precondition for peace that we liberate ourselves from a pattern of black and white thinking and resolve our conflicts through politics and diplomacy. This is exactly what Enzensberger finds foolish, especially when you are dealing with an opponent who is just plainly the "enemy of humankind." [Margarete Mitscherlich is referring to an article by Hans Magnus Enzensberger in Der Spiegel No. 6, 1991. Enzensberger sees Saddam Hussein as a second Hitler, whose motive is the death instinct, and the modus of whose rule is annihilation. According to Enzensberger, a "Hitter" or "Saddam" can only happen when a whole nation wishes for their occurrence. The "enemy of humankind" taps into the death energy of a whole nation.] Enzensberger, for whom Saddam Hussein is a "second Hitler", concludes: "Every thinkable political solution has no impact on such human beings. The death instinct of an "enemy of humankind" connects fatally with the resettlement of whole nations."

And according to Enzensberger: "Nations that feel like constant losers, as do the Germans and the Arab nations, are predestined to fall for the paranoid thinking of those leaders. They do not look for solutions, they are looking for redemption." Enzensberger feels that it is the never-ending love of and willingness to sacrifice for their leaders that made the Germans and Iraqis keen on killing, but even more willing to be killed themselves. To find a simultaneous ending with their leader is to be redeemed.

Such thinking in anthropological constants, however, would mean that we are the helpless victims of these "enemies of humankind." There would be no way to prevent a war with such an enemy and his sadomasochistic followers.

Is this indeed so? Do these human catastrophes for which we have no remedy which are supposedly unchangeable, exist? Is there no history, no economy, no socialization process, no religion, no psychology that contributes to those circumstances or could prevent them?

As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.

The paranoia of many Islamic fundamentalists who see in the West basically the devil himself is not totally removed from reality. However it cannot be treated as equivalent to the delusion of the Nazis, who saw the Jews as the embodiment of all evil. Iraqis are not the Germans of 1939-45, or vice versa. German history, culture, religion and socialization cannot be compared with the historical development of the Arab people. As a psychoanalyst not only do I find such a historical argument about the unconquered human death instinct incorrect, I consider it dangerous. This concept ignores reality and alleviates everyone's guilt. A "Third World War," which we know would be our last, would be preprogrammed and unavoidable under such philosophy.
ourselves from prejudice, false ideals and gender-fixed role models. The fight against war, societal violence, and injustice in general is a pointless endeavor for people who think like him.

Not only that, by doing this little trick of equating Saddam with Hitler, war becomes a moral obligation. We then have our “justified” war. A man like Enzensberger must know that by using the idea of the “enemy of human kind” he is tapping into the ever ready human psychological need to think in terms of “Good” and “Bad.” I guess Enzensberger uses it simply to cover up a presumably “morality-free” interests of power.

The peace movement opposes such hypocritical and fatalistic thinking in every way and with all its energies. The peace movement in Germany, its fight against war and worldwide self destruction is often misunderstood abroad...What is the matter with Germany? We hear from all sides. Barely reunited, an economic giant, now a world political actor, it refuses to send its soldiers to the Gulf. The Germans are bad allies, cowards and want their own special way.

“While there are supposedly 110000 Muslims waiting in Pakistan for Iran to open its borders so they can join Saddam's troops, in Germany more and more young men refuse military service. Before, the conscientious objectors objected on the grounds that they could not kill for reasons of conscience. Since the beginning of the Gulf war, more and more of them refuse military service because they do not want to die.

It is our constitution, after all, which says no war shall be fought away from German soil. Wasn't that exactly what our former enemies wanted from us? Doesn't anyone remember that the victors, at the end of WWII, seriously thought of putting Germany back into an agrarian state?

This was expressly so that we would never have the power or means to murder other people or oppress them again.

Just a few months ago, the media in those same countries that accuse Germany now of cowardice and disloyalty voiced their fear of a superpower Germany, and a “Fourth Reich.”

Now that so many young Germans do not want to fight anymore, now that they protest against senseless destruction, Germans are accused of weakness and hypocrisy instead of being hard and barbarous. Such contradictions only motivate our young generation even more to protest for peace and against war.

This generation shows responsibility. It shows responsibility by refusing to be part of a catastrophic game that despises humanity.

Other criticism is all too justified. The German economy with the permission of politicians did supply Iraq with poison gas, the gas which now threatens Israel. Germany helped build the leader's bunker, in which he sits safely while his people die under the hail of bombs. But trade in ABC weapons does not seem to contradict the general world economic morality.

There are, however, unavoidable and terrible historical associations, because the German economy also developed the gas for Auschwitz.

Considering our past it seems self-evident that we ought to protect Israel from the criminal deeds of our German industry. But I cannot help thinking that German soldiers would probably not be welcome in Israel, neither could they help the dilemma between Israelis and Palestine. One Israeli women wrote to Zeit, “Everyone who is demonstrating against the war in the Gulf, is demonstrating for the Hitler of the end of this century.”

This women neither considers the differences between then and now, nor does she consider the existing potential of total destruction of nature and humankind--she neglects to see that it is impossible to equate the historical, social and religious factors of that time and this one.

Certainly, it would be an illusion to think that there is no longer anti-Semitism in Germany. Especially in times of war a process goes on that reinforces the psychological mechanisms which establish images of the enemy in order to create a sense of belonging and unity. Enzensberger tries to do so, as do all the Western nations engaging in the Gulf war. But Germany is no longer the country of the hard, disciplined, militaristic men who love war. Here a people are evolving who do not want to be killed, who fight for peace and rationality.

The ideology of the German “Herrenvolk” (master race) has been put to rest, and with it the submissive identification with “powerful leaders.” This should be a relief for all nations. To turn it around and suggest that the the peace movement, its desire for peace, is really hiding a desire to help Hitler-Saddam to victory and destroy Israel, becomes rather absurd and very sad.

The Germans, indeed, have learned from their history. Never before have we talked so much so openly about our past as we do now. Never before have we talked so much about the terrible wars Germany initiated, about Auschwitz, the symbol of insane destruction and contempt for humanity.

Until recently I have had the impression that repressing the past had been successful; that we were unable to grieve, to look back, and confront our historical guilt. This is changing. The past is with us more then ever before. During the cold war our uncritical identification with the victors of WWII served to ward off our guilt and grief. This is over.

Precisely because of our past we do think differently from our western allies, detest war even more then they do, and believe we have to oppose war at all costs. Even the youngest participants in demonstrations have learned these lessons, despite the rumors that they have been instigated by their teachers. These young people have internalized the burden we carry as Germans and they are particularly sensitive to the unholliness of “holy wars” and “holy nations.”

The past has always weighed heavily on this country and this used to produce more defensiveness than insight. The past stayed dark and as such created fear. We whistled it away, as a kid whistles away the fear of the dark. The Gulf war has confronted us very immediately with the horrors of the past and its terrible ideals.

Now that the hard German men, the victorious soldier and war comrades are no longer our ideals, now that men fear death and admit their fear of killing, haven't we become more straight forward and much less "German" in the traditional sense? "Values" are questioned as to their origin and content. "Manliness" no longer seems to be an ideal. This gives me hope that death will not be again "an officer from Germany"--even though we might not escape a world catastrophe.

German youth, more consciously than ever before, fights against the thinking in terms of friend/enemy: which does not allow perception of the realities. These young people try to liberate themselves from the notions of their parents and grandparents, such as self-idealization hypocrisy, and distortion.

The delusion and celebration of manhood in the Nazi era permitted violence and contempt for certain people to thrive while idealizing the "holy fatherland" and personal ego. As this kind of male conflict resolution has become more and more apparent people refuse it.

The younger generation of the peace movement does not take sides unconditionally, or hope for "victory," they resist the division of"Good" and "Bad" while looking for a conflict solution, that is most appropriate for a complex and complicated situation. Germans are, after all, the survivors and descendents of Hitler's delusions. So indirectly we have been involved in a million-fold murder.

Confronted again with the issue of war, more and more of our contemporaries must deal with the consequences of the last war. We cannot refuse a critical reevaluation of our previous value system, even if it temporarily questions our own sense of self-worth, if we want to escape the vicious circle of destructive interaction. A solid sense of self-worth does not come from denial, idealization and considering things evil.

It is our ability to discover, to learn from the past, to be critical of ourselves and others which establishes a solid sense of self-worth.

Whether we do have personal guilt as Germans or not, we as Germans carry a heritage of guilt. In many ways, it is our responsibility to make sure that Auschwitz which is synonymous with total human cruelty, never happens again. To forget and deny does not liberate our younger generation. The only thing that can liberate us and change us, is the laborious effort to openly meet our past and learn from it.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

President: Saddam Hussein; Vice-President: Taha Muhieddin Maruf.

Revolution Command Council: Chair: Saddam Hussein; Vice-Chair: Izzat Ibrahim; Secretary-General: Khaled Abu al-Moneim Rashid; Members: Taha Yassin Ramadan, Sa`adoun Shaker Mahmoud, Tariq Mihayl` Aziz, Hassan Ali Nassar al-Amiri, Dr. Sa`adoun Hammadi, Taha Muhieddin Maruf.

Council of Ministers: President and Prime Minister: Saddam Hussein; First Deputy Prime Minister: Taha Yassin Ramadon; Deputy Prime Minister: Dr. Sa`adoun Hammadi; Deputy Prime Minister & Minister of Foreign Affairs: Tariq `Aziz; Minister of Defense: Saadi Tuma Abbas Juburi; Minister of Transport and Communications: [blank]; Head of Presidential Cabinet: Ahmad Husseind as-Samarrai; Minister of the Interior: Samir Muhammad Abu al-Wahab Hash-Shaykhali; Minister of Education: Abu al-Qadir Izudin Hammid; Minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research: Dr. Mundhir Ibrahim; Minister of Youth Affairs: Abu al-Fattah Mahmod Amin; Minister of Justice: Akram Abu al-Qadir Ali; Minister of Housing and Construction: Taher Muhammad Hassoun al-Marzouk; Minister of Planning: Salam Majid Faraj; Minister of Health: Raya al-Jazairy; Minister of Oil: Hussein Kamel Hassan; Minister of Trade and Finance: Muhammad Mahdi Salih; Minister of Agriculture and Irrigation: [blank]; Minister of Culture and Information: Latif Nasil al-Jasim; Minister of Labor and Social Affairs: Umeed Madhat Mubarak; Minister of Religious Endowments/Religious Affairs: Abdulla Fadel `Abbas; Minister of Local Government: Ali Hassan al-Hajid; Minister of Industry and Military Industrialization: Hussein Kamel Majid; Minister of State for Foreign Affairs: Mohammed Sa`eed al-Salhahh; Minister of State for Military Affairs: [blank]; Minister of State at the President's Office: Hashim Aqrawi Subhi; Minister of Internal Security: Sa`adoun Shaker; Ministers of State: [blank]; Advisers to the President: Subhi Yasin Khudair, Abu al-Ghani Abu al-Ghafur, Samir Muhammad Abu al-Wahhab, Abu al-Hasan Rabi` Fir`aww, Sa`adi Mahdi Salih, Mzabian Kadhri Hadi, Khaled Abu al-Moneim Chief of Staff: General Hussein Rashid; Commander of the elite Republican Guard: General Iyad Khalil; Rawi Air Force Advisor: General Hassan Shabban; Air Defense Commander: General Muzahim Saab Hassan; Arab Ba`th Socialist Party Intelligence Service Chief: Sabawi.

Legislature: National Assembly: 250 elected members (including 33 women); Speaker of the National Assembly: Saadi Mahdi Salih; Kurdish Legislative Council with 57 elected members: Chairman: Ahmad Abu al-Qadir an-Naqshabandi; Political Organizations: Arab Ba`th Socialist Party, Kurdistan Democratic Party, Kurdistan Revolutionary Party.

Governor of the 19th Governorate (Kuwait): `Aziz Salih al-Numan.

Iraqi Ambassador to the US: Mohamed Sadiq al-Mashat; Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN New York: Abdul Amir al-Anbari; Iraqi Representative to UN in Geneva: Barzan Tikriti; US Ambassador to Iraq (before 8/1990): April Catherine Glaspie; US Acting Ambassador to Iraq at present (former Charge d'Affairs): Joseph C. Wilson IV. [=]

24150. Nash, Douglas E. "Civil Affairs in the Gulf War: Administration of an Occupied Town: Part 1", in Special Warfare, October 1994. During the Gulf War, US Army Civil Affairs units performed a variety of tasks, including liaison duties with the host-nation government, humanitarian-relief activities, planning for noncombatant evacuation operations and educating US units about Saudi Arabian culture. These are missions for which all CA units train regularly. A task that is rarely practiced, however, is the administration of an occupied town or city in enemy territory. The Army gained considerable experience in this task during World War II and the Korean War, but it had little opportunity to engage in it since. During Operation Desert Storm, Company B of the 96th Civil Affairs Battalion had the mission of administering the town of As Salman after its seizure by the French 6th Light Armored Division.

Employment: Company B's mission during Operation Desert Storm was to support the XVIII Airborne Corps and its reserve-component units with Civil Affairs teams. From the beginning of Desert Shield in August 1990 until reserve-component CA units were activated and deployed in December 1990, Co. B was the only CA unit supporting the entire corps. Its first teams arrived in Saudi Arabia with the lead elements of the 82nd Airborne and 24th Infantry divisions. During this five-month period, Co. B located water wells and negotiated contracts for their use, assisted in use, assessed and evaluated potential sources of labor, produced bilingual instruction cards for guard personnel, established liaison with local officials to minimize the impact of incidents between US forces and the Saudi populace, and provided assistance to the corps staff judge advocate and Saudi officials on claims against the US government. The company also developed and coordinated plans for the evacuation of civilians in the eastern province, and developed and coordinated a noncombatant-evacuation-operation-plan for US and third-country nationals. Authorized 36 personnel, Co. B had only 22 personnel present for duty when Desert Shield began. Soldiers from other companies of the 96th CA Battalion were attached to the company, giving it a peak strength of 54 personnel in November 1990. Attached to the XVIII Airborne Corps, the company assigned teams to each of the corps' major subordinate commands--the 1st Cavalry, the 24th Mechanized Infantry, the 82nd Airborne and 101st Airmobile divisions. The XVIII Airborne Corps Artillery, the 1st Corps Support Command, the 16th MP Brigade, and the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment. Teams varied in size from two to four personnel. Their equipment was limited to trucks, radio sets and individual weapons, and they were completely dependent upon the units to which they were attached for support.

Support to French forces: Early in 1991, the company was notified by the XVIII Airborne Corps G-5 that it would be attached to the French 6th Light Armored Division for the liberation of Kuwait. Co. B began movement on Jan. 17 to the 6th LAD's tactical area assembly area north of the village of Rafha. En route, some of the company's teams also supported the convoy movement of the corps. By Jan. 29, these teams had rejoined the company, which was then busily engaged in supporting the French forces in the Rafha area, providing much the same operational and planning support as it had for the XVIII Airborne Corps units. Company B was somewhat of an oddity to the French, who had no Civil Affairs capability in their force structure. After an initial adjustment period, curious French soldiers who wanted to meet "les Americans" and trade for highly prized souvenirs sought out members of the company. Other French soldiers were more curious about what a Civil Affairs unit could do for them. The XVIII Airborne Corps had requested that the company be attached to the 6th LAD because the division would have the task of seizing and administering the only sizable Iraqi town in the area--As Salman. Although other Civil Affairs units were available, they had only recently deployed into the theater. Company B had the most experienced and best-trained CA assets, and a number of its officers and NCOs spoke French. Before the ground-attack phase of Desert Storm began, Co. B became acquainted with its new division and the area around Rafha. The company conducted area surveys and assessments and established working relationships with the emir of Rafha and other local authorities. These relationships proved invaluable to the 6th LAD and the XVIII Airborne Corps in dealing with the inevitable conflict involved in massing thousands of soldiers and vehicles in a civilian community.

Mission: While the air war continued, the company received an updated mission statement from the French division commander, General Michel Roquejoffre. The mission directed that Co. B conduct civil-military operations to reduce civilian interference with military operations, identify and acquire local resources, fulfill legal obligations and moral considerations in accordance with international law and
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

agreements, and terminate hostilities with conditions favorable to the long-term national interest of the allied coalition. Implicit in this mission was that the company would assume responsibility for the administration of the town of As Salman. As conditions permitted, it would receive administrative and logistics support from the French to carry out its mission. Since the 6th LAD had no staff position equivalent to a G-5, the Co. B commander wrote the Civil Affairs annex to the 6th LAD operations plan. The company's two French linguists translated the document, and it was published as part of the division's plan. The concept of operations for Co. B was that during preparation for the ground campaign, the unit would update area studies, refine CA plans, identify stockpiles of humanitarian-relief supplies and pre-position them as far forward as possible. During the ground campaign itself, the company would concentrate on population control to minimize civilian interference with military operations. Unit personnel would also conduct early assessments of the attitudes and basic needs of Iraqi civilians. Once As Salman was seized, tasks would be prioritized as follows: (1) Coordinate and execute a civil-information program to create a favorable image with the Iraqi civilian population; (2) Locate local resources and assist in their acquisition for use by allied forces and the civilian population; (3) Conduct displaced-civilian operations; (4) Alleviate human suffering among civilians in accordance with Article 56 of the Geneva Convention; (5) Assist French commanders in fulfilling their obligations under international law; (6) Conduct civil administration of occupied areas, including the re-establishment of essential services; (7) Plan for the transfer of civil-military operations functions to follow-on elements of the 360th CA Brigade.

To accomplish these tasks, the unit developed an approach best described as civil affairs triage. Similar to categorizing wounded personnel, the process enabled the company's teams to decide what could be fixed quickly and placed back into operation, what could be fixed in the long-term, and what could not be fixed. To carry out its mission, the company reorganized along functional lines and established five teams. The public-works team would locate and assess Iraqi government facilities: the public-services team would assess the civilian population's requirements for survival; the law-and-order team would handle population control and enforcement of directives targeted at the Iraqi populace; the civil-information team would coordinate psychological operations targeted toward the Iraqi populace; and the public-health team would determine health and medical requirements and the condition of civilian housing. Each team consisted of an officer, an NCO, an operations specialist (usually a military policeman), and a volunteer Kuwaiti translator. The volunteers, militiamen from a training camp north of Dhaarten, added a much-needed Arabic language capability. [Typical Team Organization: (1) PERSONNEL: 1 RAM LEADER=E-7/SPC; 1 TEAM NCOIC=E-7/SPC; 1 OPNS SPECIALIST=E-4/SPC; 1 TRANSLATOR--KUWAITI. (2) EQUIPMENT: 1 M-I 009 3/4 TON TRUCK; 1 AN/VRC-46; 1 BULLHORN.]

Objective: As Salman: One of the most difficult tasks the unit had before the ground war started was to acquire reliable information about As Salman. Unit members made acquaintances with local merchants, police, Bedouins and administrators and, through these sources, gathered enough information to generate a detailed picture of As Salman and the entire French sector. Using its area study and the application of 14 political-military analytical factors taught in the Regional Studies Course at Fort Bragg's John F. Kennedy Special Warfare Center and School, the company developed a plan to administer As Salman once it had been seized by the French. Founded approximately 1800 years ago, As Salman was home to 4500 people, many of whom were nomadic Bedouins who lived there only during the winter. Located about 70 miles north of the Saudi Arabian-Iraqi border, the town had served as a watering hole for caravans along the "Darb al Hadji," the historic pilgrimage route from Baghdad to Mecca. This route, recently paved, had been renamed major supply route 'Texas' by the XVIII Airborne Corps. It became one of the major avenues of approach to the Euphrates valley. With the coming of the Iraqi Baath regime, As-Salman became a major governmental/corporate town. In addition to housing a border police battalion in a fortress two miles east of the town, As-Salman aslo housed a military garrison, a military school and a local Baath party headquarters. It boasted a modern health clinic, running water, several schools, a weather station and many other amenities not common to Iraqi towns in the region. Once the air war began, large numbers of the town's residents fled north to avoid the bombing. An Iraqi reserve division, the 45th (composed mostly of Kurds), was moved to As-Salman and ordered to defend the Iraqi far right flank while it continued to incorporate large platoons of reservists into the structure. So B would not enter As Salman until it had been secured by the French division's 3rd Colonial Marine Infantry Regiment, the 3rd RIMA. On the morning of Feb. 26, the company commander was told to link up immediately with the 3rd RIMA for the attack on As Salman. Fortunately, the unit had planned for this contingency, and its teams were prepared. After a hasty conference, one CA team was attached to each of the four French infantry companies to deal with civilians and EPWs encountered during the attack. One remaining team would move with the French battalion trains to receive displaced civilians and EPWs from the forward teams and hold them at a collection point for interrogation by French military-intelligence personnel. When the armored vehicles of the 3rd RIMA reached the edge of As Salman, the troops dismounted and began clearing the town house by house. The Iraqis did not defend As Salman, and all that allied troops had to show for their efforts were 17 Iraqi prisoners and 13 civilians. The EPWs were shipped to Rafha, but the civilians were allowed to remain. After interrogation by the unit's Kuwaiti interpreters, each civilian was escorted back to his home by a CA team and told not to leave the dwelling. [-] town, the team discovered that the secular mayor, who held an Iraqi civil-service position, had fled, as had all members of the Ba'ath party political structure. However, the traditional tribal leader of the town, the muhktar, had remained. The company commander decided that the allies should formally recognize the muhktar as the sole legitimate civilian leader of As Salman, and the French garrison commander concurred. The civil-information team was given the mission of enhancing the muhktar's authority, establishing his legitimacy, and introducing the town's new "administrators" to its inhabitants. Since the muhktarate was being used by the French, Co. B's commander set up the muhktar's new office in an unused room in the boys' school, near the company command post. The civil-information team also arranged daily town-council meetings with the muhktar and various tribal and family heads, in which details of the administration of the town were worked out. The muhktar was also briefed on directives issued by the French area commander that would affect the town's population. Important information, such as the need to boil drinking water and the dangers posed by unexploded munitions, was regularly disseminated during the meetings. The meetings were also a forum for grievances. The fact that there were no instances of rebellion or outbreaks of hostility during the town's administration is indicative of the success of the meetings. Every evening, team leaders met with the company commander to share information and to update the As Salman area assessment. To keep both the 6th LAD and the Corps G-5 informed of its activities, the company submitted daily situation reports that detailed its activities and provided estimates of supplies required for the town's population. The French, for their part, did not intrude into this process. They remained satisfied with the company's performance as long as the town did not demand too much in terms of security or logistics support and did not interfere with military operations. However, the French commander stipulated that only prewar residents of As Salman would be allowed to return. All others were to be turned away.

Population returns: By 3/5/1991, the teams had completed their inventories. All foodstuffs had been moved to a storage site in the company's compound. Military equipment had been removed from most of the residential areas of the town. Tons of gear, ammunition and weapons had been collected by French Foreign Legion sappers and destroyed north of the town. Several wells had been placed back into operation, and the town clinic had been cleaned in preparation for the daily sick call that would begin when the population returned. Company B's mechanic had repaired a garbage truck and two water trucks, making them operational. All these services would be badly needed when the estimated 2500 townspeople returned. An estimated 500 townspeople were camping in the desert. Although they were notified by the muhktar that it was safe to return to their homes, they did not trust the Americans at first—Iraqi propaganda had painted the allies as barbarians. The villagers sent representatives to As Salman to see for themselves. If the Americans were telling the truth, the villagers would return. Word was also passed along by Bedouins to those townspeople who had fled north that it was safe to return home. These groups also sent representatives to see what the Americans and the French were up to. By Mar. 9, the trickle of returnees had become a flood. To establish control of the returning townspeople, the law-and-order team set up a checkpoint at the northern entrance to the town. All other routes into the town were sealed off by the French. At the checkpoint, all returning traffic was stopped and vehicles and personnel were searched for weapons and other contraband. Because of Islamic customs regarding the treatment of women, the unit's sole female soldier was joined by three other female soldiers from the Corps G-5 and the CA Brigade to assist with searches of women. The law-and-order team quickly discovered that most Iraqis had no identity documents. Many had had their identity cards confiscated by the Iraqi secret police; others had thrown them away to hide their identity. The lack of identity cards made screening the legitimate inhabitants of the town difficult, but the Kuwaiti translators were adept at ferreting out the required information. For example, they could tell by an Iraqi's dialect whether he was a local Bedouin or a resident of Baghdad. Questionable cases were checked against the captured police files. Iraqis who were not returnees were turned away. Many were found to be Iraqi Army deserters, and when their numbers began to pose a threat to security at the checkpoint, they were taken to the EPW cage in Rafha. Returnees who had been screened were in-processed and issued an American-made identity card and four days' rations. All returnees were briefed by the muhktar on the allied administration and its rules. They were also told that they would have to go through the muhktar with questions or complaints—they were not allowed to deal directly with the allies. This helped to establish the muhktar as the legitimate Iraqi authority over the town.

Challenge of 'military government': By Mar. 24, the company had processed 2768 returnees, most of whom chose to return to their homes. Others, mostly Bedouins, returned to their pastures in the surrounding area. Most of the unit's personnel were heavily involved in the day-to-day duties required to administer a town of more than 2000 inhabitants; only the law-and-order team remained at the checkpoint north of town, where it continued to screen and in-process the few remaining returnees. Realizing that the unit was not large enough to adequately administer the town, the company commander decided to transfer as many duties as possible to the muhktar once he was able to handle them. For example, the civil-service team had initially staffed the food distribution point and had managed the issuing of rations. The muhktar was directed to pick a staff to run the food-issue point. One of the company's operations specialists would supervise the operation. Soldiers from Co. B had initially driven the water trucks and the garbage truck, but an Egyptian national later volunteered to perform this duty. He "hired" several local assistants, who were usually paid with extra rations of food. By the end of Co. B's stay, water distribution and trash hauling were civilian responsibilities. As food stocks were exhausted, the French Army provided military rations for issue to the townspeople. Although the allies could have flooded the town with food, the company commander believed that it would not be in the Iraqis' best interests to raise their standard of living higher than it had been before the war. They received what was adequate to sustain their day-to-day needs, and local merchants slowly began to fill in the gaps. The public-health team administered sick call at the town clinic. Since all Iraqi public-health personnel had fled north, the French Army medical personnel performed this vital service, often seeing more than 100 patients each day. Care provided at the clinic played a major role in developing favorable attitudes toward the allies in general and the Americans in particular. As a result, the Iraqis cooperated with their American administrators, even going so far as to compel their neighbors to follow the allies' rules and regulations. By Mar. 20, the town was virtually self-sustaining except for food and medical supplies. On Mar. 23, the company moved from the boy's school to an abandoned border-police fortress on the northern edge of town. This move was necessary because the town council had decided to reopen the schools, probably the most conclusive evidence that normalcy had returned to As Salman and that the unit's mission had been successful. That same day, the company commander met with the commander of the 354th CA Command from VII Corps to discuss the hand-off of responsibility for As Salman. The following day, the company was relieved by VII Corps units and began its redeployment to COUS.

Conclusion: During Operation Desert Storm, Co. B was able to execute a classic Civil Affairs mission—the administration of an occupied town in enemy territory. With little prior experience in performing such a task, a small unit was able to complete its mission with a minimum diversion of allied resources. A combination of factors contributed to the unit's success: planning, experience, service support, training, initiative, PSYOP, and cultural and language training. Planning was crucial to the success of the mission. Not only was it a solid operations plan important, but also constant rehearsals, updated area studies, and coordination with supported and supporting units. The operations plan was adjusted constantly during the administration of As Salman, ensuring that the company was flexible enough to adapt to changing circumstances. Area assessments were important because they were used as tools to teach company members about the village they would soon be administering. Soldiers knew each street, each building, and the ethnic makeup of the town before they ever saw it. Experience was another crucial factor. Although all the members of Co. B had received some formal Civil Affairs training, six months in the theater—working with the inhabitants

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
and dealing with real problems--gave the unit experience in locating local resources, dealing with local officials and operating in a desert environment. The unit's success could not have been achieved without administrative and logistics support from the XVIII Airborne Corps G-5 and the 6th LAD. The company learned to live without support from ARCEN or CENTCOM: these organizations were too remote. Although As Salman was administered in an austere logistical environment, the company's needs were largely met by energizing the considerable assets of the corps. Fortunately, the rapid cessation of hostilities enabled the 6th LAD to divert a larger amount of resources for the Iraqi populace than it ordinarily would have. Company B trained throughout the air campaign to conduct its mission. Team members were fully aware of their individual roles and of the general concept of the operation. Teams conducted rehearsals of their assigned missions, and when the ground war began, each soldier was ready. The importance of collective and individual initiative was also reinforced. All things do not come to those who wait. Unit members must often aggressively seek information and gather resources without waiting for help. This is especially important on the modern battlefield, where Civil Affairs units compete with other services for the same limited assets. Another lesson learned was the need for Civil Affairs and PSYOP to work closely together. Each must have a working knowledge of the other's job. Because both specialties are in short supply on the battlefield, CA and PSYOP soldiers may have to fill in for each other. This was the case in As Salman. Because PSYOP support was unavailable, Co. B improvised loudspeakers, leaflets and other media. All indications showed that these attempts, although crude, were successful, in part because several of the unit's members had attended formal blocks of instruction on PSYOP or had worked closely enough with PSYOP units to gain an understanding of the fundamentals. Finally, cultural and language expertise proved to be the company's most crucial advantage. The knowledge of Arabic culture gained after six months of dealing with indigenous peoples on a daily basis enabled the unit to approach its mission with the required degree of sensitivity. The Americans showed respect for Islamic culture and gained the trust of the local leadership, and the people of As Salman were receptive to American administration. Cultural sensitivity is the most difficult skill to learn and the most perishable, but it is one of the crucial factors that make SOF an effective combat multiplier. As the Army and other services prepare for a future characterized by operations other than war, episodes such as the administration of As Salman may become commonplace. Commanders may find themselves responsible for the safety and well-being of thousands of enemy citizens within their area of operations. While in many respects As Salman was an ideal laboratory for revalidating CA concepts and principles, all units can benefit from the lessons learned by Co. B's operations.

Lesson learned: PSYOP should be incorporated into all aspects of planning for humanitarian missions; Language and intercultural skills are crucial to success; CA units cannot provide security for towns--that is an MP mission; US forces should be prepared to work with allied and international forces; Political-military factors taught in the Regional Studies Course are excellent analytical tools for Civil Affairs and PSYOP units; Infantry skills are necessary in preparing for combat operations. CA units may have to accompany the ground-assault force; Flexibility and ingenuity are crucial--don't wait for detailed guidance or try to fit the doctrinal template to real-world situations; METT-T applies to the planning process for CA and PSYOP units too; JRTC must continue to emphasize the administration of occupied population centers during its exercise play; CA units should view an administrative mission as a temporary one. If they become indispensable, they may remain indispensable. Reactivate the indigenous leadership as soon as possible; Use local resources as much as possible--don't be a distractor for the maneuver commander; All members of CA units are workers--the only way to get an administration mission moving is to practice hands-on leadership. [Maj. Douglas E. Nash is currently attending the Army Command and General Staff College, Fort Leavenworth, Kan. His most recent assignment was commander of the Regional Studies Detachment, 3rd Battalion, 1st Special Warfare Training Group, Fort Bragg, N.C. His other assignments include service as commander of Company B, 96th Civil Affairs Battalion, where he served during Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm, Operation Provide Comfort and Operation Guantanamo. A graduate of the Civil Affairs Course and the Regional Studies Course, he holds a bachelor's degree from the US Military Academy and a master's degree from Troy State University.] [=]

24152. National Wildlife Federation; Great Lakes Natural Resource Center. EPA's First 'Great Waters' Report to Congress: Deposition of Air Pollutants to the Great Waters: Comments of National Wildlife Federation: Part 05: Air Toxics Are Causing Serious and Widespread Adverse Effects: Mercury. District of Columbia: National Wildlife Federation, Great Lakes Natural Resource Center, May 1994. (Questions or comments may be directed to: National Wildlife Federation, Great Lakes Natural Resource Center, 506 E. Liberty St., Ann Arbor, MI 48104; tel: 313/769-3351; fax 313/769-1449,) The case against mercury is clear. Due to ubiquitous, high mercury levels in fish, sport fish consumption advisories are in place in virtually all waters of many states and in the province of Ontario. The Great Lakes states of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana recently called on EPA in a joint letter to propose steps for mercury as part of the upcoming medical waste incinerator regulations. The states concluded: "Even when fully diluted, there is too much mercury in the environment." The serious human health risks from mercury exposure, particularly to neonates, are well-known. Mercury exposure can cause developmental toxicity, reproductive toxicity, acute toxicity (death through exposure to lungs, mouth, or skin), chronic toxicity, neurotoxicity, and environmental toxicity (harm to wildlife through water, soil or consumption of contaminated fish). Mercury can bioaccumulate (is not easily expelled from living plants and animals thus concentrates over time and repeated exposure) and persist (does not disintegrate). Although widespread adverse public health effects have not been documented at this time, immediate preventive actions to eliminate mercury emissions are imperative: "Mercury levels in the blood of Michigan adults who do not consume large amounts of fish may be only ten-fold lower than those calculated to have possibly produced adverse effects in children born to methylmercury exposed women in Iraq... The margin of safety for mercury appears relatively low compared to those for many human-derived (anthropogenic) environmental pollutants." [=]

24153. New American View. "News Notes: Preparing For The Future", in New American View-News and Informed Commentary on US Relations With Israel and the Middle East, Vol. 6(1), January 1, 1991. Shoshana Cardin, 64, former chairwoman of the National Conference of Jewish Women, was unanimously elected last month to serve as chairwoman of the powerful Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. She succeeds Seymour Reich, president of B'nai B'rith International. During the past two years, according to Reich, there has been a surge of official US criticism of Israel and rising antisemitism in America. Cardin said, "The priorities [for the future] almost identify themselves." She predicted the conference will spend much of the new year in assuring that the US government makes no linkage between Iraq's occupation of Kuwait and Israel's "administration" of the West Bank and Gaza. In addition, she said, "There is a relation between the exciting, massive aliyah [the Soviet Jewish exodus to Israel] and the ability of Israel to maintain a secure [military] position at the same time [it is] welcoming incredible numbers of olim [Jews from abroad]." (Jewish Telegraphic Agency.) (Translation: The conference will concentrate on squeezing still more money from the American taxpayer to help Israel absorb its new Jews.) [=]

24154. New American View. "News Notes: War of the Womb", in New American View-News and Informed Commentary on US Relations With Israel and the Middle East, Vol. 5(18), September 15, 1990. Israeli efforts to raise the number of Jews in the Zionist state depend exclusively on the mass immigration of Soviet Jews. So far this year, 80,000 Soviet Jews have come to Israel. Still, the number of Jews in Israel remains at slightly more than 80%, 3.7 million out of a total population of 4.6 million. The remaining 20% are mostly Palestinians. The continuing low Jewish birthrate, as well as the high level of emigration (largely to the US), is barely keeping the Jews ahead of the Palestinians inside Israel. Meanwhile, the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza, now estimated to be as high as 2 million, continues to climb. At the same time, many of the 350,000 refugee Palestinian workers from Kuwait are seeking to return to their homeland, as are some of the 2.5 million Palestinians now living in Jordan. Counting those living in Israel, the occupied territories and Jordan, there are now more than 5 million Palestinians living in the Middle East. (JTA and Palestine News Agency.) [\textit{\bibitem{[24155. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. Table: "Major Sources and Locations of Refugees, 1980: Country of Origin: Middle East", in Connexions, Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 2, October 1, 1981. p. 3. Iraq: 30,000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: Jordan, Gaza Strip, West Bank, Lebanon, Syria. [Source: Worldwatch Paper 43.][Reprinted with permission of the publisher.]]}

This decision indicates a dismantling of the Arab ranks and a deterioration in Arab unity. Not only that, but it also signals that they are giving up on the question of Palestine and Jerusalem. The Gulf countries which severed all relations with the Palestinians during the Gulf War, even cutting off-aid, hurried to make peace with Israel immediately after the Madrid Talks. Many also welcomed Israeli delegations to their countries and making yet another move toward the normalization of relations with Israel, despite, the Israeli aggression against the Palestinians in the occupied territories, the Judaization of Jerusalem, forgetting the Islamic character of the city.

This move is due to US pressure, on the Arab countries, even Warren Christopher declared that this decision is a victory for the Clinton administration in its efforts to get rid of the discrimination against US companies that deal with Israel. Christopher asked the Gulf states to lift the direct boycott on Israel, and these countries complied to US pressure. The Secretary of State also declared that during his meetings with Prince Hassan of Jordan and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouq Shara, he will ask them to do the same as the Gulf states did, and open their markets to Israeli goods, at a time when Israeli still has a grip on the occupied territories, confiscating more land, building more settlements, controlling more water and giving a larger section of the Ibrahimi Mosque to the Israelis.

This Gulf decision is a breach of the Arab League ruling that was taken 47 years ago to boycott Israel, and no one has the right to change this ruling except for the League.

The Gulf decision also comes after the tightening of the Iraqi embargo, despite the fact that many countries have asked that this embargo be lifted since Iraq has complied with UN requirements. Many children and infants are dying in Iraq due to lack of milk and medicine, but the embargo continues.

It was natural that the decision was welcomed by the Israelis, with Peres calling it another step toward demolishing the wall of hatred and forming a new Middle East. And this is considered one of the biggest successes for the Israelis ever since their Jewish state was formed, when they started marketing the notion of the Palestinians as refugees and asked the rich countries to find them shelter in their own countries, rather than admit the fact that the Palestinians were deprived from their own homes and land. And many countries accepted this idea, either consciously or unconsciously, and now many of these countries are falling into yet another trap set by the Israelis, and this one is the new "Middle East" of development and economic growth, where joint economic ventures will be set, tourism will flourish, there will be normalization of relations psychological barriers will be destroyed and "Islamic terrorist fundamentalism" will be fought.

The Gulf decision means economic development for the Israelis, since many companies will now set up plants in Israel, a thing that will encourage more immigrants into Israel, which means more land confiscation, more settlement building and more stealing of waters from the occupied West Bank, occupied Golan Heights and Sough Lebanon.

What is strange is the fact that this decision comes at a time when there is pressure on the Arab countries from Israel, the US and other countries not to submit the issue of the Palestinians to the UN General Assembly including the right to return, the withdrawal from the occupied territories and Jerusalem, dismantling settlements, and the issue of the Israeli nuclear weapons. The gulf decision comes at a very bad time, and doesn't serve the arab negotiator as Syria's Foreign Minister Shara's said when he commented on the decision. The decision proves that many Arab states consider the Palestinian question a burden, and found a chance to rid themselves of it when the PLO and Israel signed the peace agreement. [\textit{\bibitem{[24158. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. "Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf, Part 1", in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 3. As we go to press, the United States is continuing the war threats against Iraq by deploying 30,000 ground troops and 500 aircraft to the Persian Gulf - even though all reports indicate that Iraq's elite Republican Guard divisions have been pulled well back from the border with Kuwait. The US government says it will order military strikes against Iraq - with or without a UN stamp of approval - if it decides Iraq is "misbehaving."
Clinton administration officials are discussing plans to greatly increase permanent US military presence in the region and to set up a "no-go zone" inside Iraq's territory where Israeli ground forces will not be allowed to enter. The US justification for these huge military moves is that they are in response to "Iraqi aggression." The US ruling class and their media portray Saddam Hussein as "crazy" for challenging the US once again or say he "made a big miscalculation.” This is a twisted logic that turns reality upside down. It is the US that is sending a huge military contingent thousands of miles away. The US has been the big power aggressor in the Persian Gulf - a region that the US imperialist ruling class feels they must dominate at all costs because it is strategically vital to their worldwide empire. In 1991 the US government launched a war against the Hussein regime and killed more than 100000 Iraqis to enforce this domination. For over four years, the US and its allies have maintained a cruel war of sanctions against Iraq - causing many deaths and deep suffering for the Iraqi people. The US has refused to ease the deadly sanctions, even after the Iraq government agreed to a humiliating “weapons inspection program” that put UN spies and cameras in important Iraqi factories. And now the US has geared up its bloody war machine again. At the end of the Gulf War, many people who had remained silent or were sucked into supporting the war felt a deep sense of shame. They saw the immense death and destruction caused by the US military - to protect reactionary pro-West kingdoms like Kuwait and US control over the oil-rich Gulf. The US rulers are once again trying to get the people to back their bullying moves in the Gulf. [=]

24159. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. “Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf, Part 2”, in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 3. It is not in the interests of the great majority of people in this country to side with these international criminals and their dirty wars. The US imperialists have no right to dominate and push around other countries. Our interests lie in standing with our brothers and sisters - the masses of oppressed people in the Middle East - and against the US aggression in the Gulf. [=]

24160. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. “Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf: Mass Murder Through Sanctions, Part 1”, in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 3 & 10. A recent article in the New York Times contrasted the hunger facing the 18 million people in Iraq with the situation in Kuwait, the US-protected oil kingdom: “To the north, in Saddam Hussein’s Iraq, food rations have been cut in half and there are lines for bread and cooking oil. Inflation is rendering the Iraqi dinar worthless and many on fixed incomes have trouble buying enough food for their families. Food has become a daily concern. “But Kuwait, whose oil wealth and small population give it one of the highest per-capita income in the world, has no such worries. Obesity has been steadily on the rise since the end of the Persian Gulf war, and Health Ministry officials say that at least half of the population is overweight.” The anti-Iraq economic embargo is being carried out under the UN banner - but they are basically enforced by the US and British military. Iraq has the world’s second largest oil reserve after Saudi Arabia. But the sanctions have prevented the foreign sale of Iraqi oil, eliminating what used to be Iraq’s main source of income. The sanctions have cut off purchases of key goods on the world market - food, medicine, machinery and parts to repair and maintain sanitary systems and many other necessities. The Iraqi government recently announced a 50% cut in rations of basic food. According to a just-released report from the UN Children’s Fund (UNICEF), more than 2.5 million Iraqi children, pregnant women and mothers of infants are at risk of malnutrition. The US embargo has created a horror story for Iraqi people’s health. The president of Jordan’s Red Crescent Society reported that there was a ten to twenty-fold increase in deaths among children and a three-fold increase in adult deaths in 1994 compared to statistics from before 8/90, when the sanctions first began. Medicine and medical equipment are in such short supply that newborn babies in intensive care must share incubators and hypodermic needles are being used over and over again. Iraq used to import $400 million each year in drugs and medical supplies - now it gets only one-tenth of that. Diseases that used to be under control - such as polio, cholera and tuberculosis - are coming back. And many people, especially children, are dying of diarrhea and intestinal diseases because the sanctions have prevented the repair of sanitation and water cleaning systems. [=]

24161. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. “Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf: Mass Murder Through Sanctions, Part 2”, in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 10. For four years, the US has been committing mass murder of Iraqi people through economic sanctions. The US cold-bloodedly refuses to take responsibility for this suffering and instead blames the Iraq government. US officials claim that Saddam Hussein has been given a “humanitarian offer” to sell $1.6 billion worth of oil, which the Iraq government has refused because the money from the oil sale would be completely under the control of the UN, which would have the power to decide how to spend it. In other words, this so-called “humanitarian offer” that the US talks about is nothing but a deed that the Iraqi government turn over control of oil sales - the lifeline of this country’s economy - to outside forces. [=]

24162. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. “Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf: US Provocations Against Iraq, Part 1”, in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 10. In 1993, just as Clinton was taking over the presidency from Bush, the US government ordered a new fly-by-bombing of Iraq. The US claimed that the bombing was in retaliation for a “pattern of provocations” by Saddam Hussein. What actually happened was that the US had stolen a large part of the skies over Iraq by setting up “no-fly zones” patrolled by US jet fighters in the northern and southern parts of the country. When Iraq moved some defensive missiles into the southern zone, the US denounced this as a “provocation” - even though the missiles posed no threat to the US planes. In fact, it is the US that is guilty of carrying out a “pattern of provocation” against Iraq. At the end of the Gulf War, the UN said that the economic sanctions against Iraq would be lifted after the Hussein regime complies with several demands - the key one being that Iraq agree to destruction of large missiles and a strict monitoring of its industry to prevent manufacture of more heavy weapons. After repeated US bombings and military threats, the Iraqi regime agreed to the stationing of a large contingent of UN “weapons observers” and the installation of a sophisticated “industrial monitoring system” in many of the factories. The system includes TV cameras, sensors, radars and hundreds of miles of wiring. An American engineer with the monitoring team said, “This is the most sophisticated and intrusive industrial monitoring system ever devised.” The Iraqi government expected that the agreement on weapons monitoring would lead to the easing of sanctions. And they began negotiations with foreign businesses in anticipation that oil exports could start up again soon. France’s two major oil companies signed agreements this summer to develop oil fields in Iraq once sanctions end. Russia, Japan and other countries have also been eager to make economic deals with Iraq and to get repayments of billions of dollars in loans to the Hussein regime. But the US and Britain made it clear that they oppose the lifting of sanctions - until Saddam Hussein is removed from power and replaced by another ruler more obedient to US demands. Even the New York Times had to admit, “The US and Britain are refusing to acknowledge Saddam Hussein’s compliance with the UN’s stated terms for lifting sanctions. . . . In fact, Britain and the US are changing the rules.”[=]

24163. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. “Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullies: At It Again in the Gulf: US Provocations Against Iraq, Part 2”, in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994. p. 10. In short, the US has forced Iraq to accept outright violations of its national sovereignty; at the same time, the US is refusing to loosen the sanctions noose. It is unclear what Saddam Hussein’s intentions were in moving the elite Republican Guard divisions into southern Iraq near the Kuwaiti border during the past few weeks. Some bourgeois analysts say that it was meant as a pressure tactic to show that Iraq had the potential to make military trouble if the sanctions were not lifted. In any case, it is shameless hypocrisy for the US to try to drive the Hussein regime into the corner through a series of provocations, bullying and war threats - and then accuse Iraq of “aggression” for moving troops within its own territory! This situation is reminiscent of what happened leading up to the Gulf War. In the early 1980s, the US and other big powers pushed Saddam Hussein to make war with Iran. After the Iran-
Iraq war. Hussein argued that Iraq's huge debts to Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and other oil kingdoms should be cancelled. But the Gulf monarchs, with US backing, pushed for repayment. Kuwait put more pressure on Iraq by raising oil production and driving down world oil prices, and Kuwait even siphoned off oil from the Rumailah field that runs between the two countries. It was after these repeated provocations that Iraq took military action against Kuwait in the fall of 1990. This was seized on by the US as a justification for a massive power play in the Gulf. [ =] 24164. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. "Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullyes: At It Again in the Gulf: US Imperialist Calculations in the Gulf, Part 1", in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994, p. 10. Why is the US so intent on attacking Saddam Hussein? Why is the US still sending a huge military force to the Gulf, even after the withdrawal of Saddam Hussein's troops from southern Iraq? This is not a matter of a US "vendetta" against Hussein. These moves are based on cold-blooded calculations of the US empire. The US rulers are compelled by the needs and drives of their system to carry out big-power aggression in the Persian Gulf. Here are the key factors behind the recent US moves in the Gulf: (1) The US needs to get rid of Saddam Hussein, as part of asserting control over the whole Persian Gulf. For the US rulers, keeping a dominant position in the Gulf and the Middle East overall is crucial to their status as the top imperialist superpower. The US itself gets a relatively small percentage of its oil from the Gulf, but the area is a lifeline for Europe and Japan. Saddam Hussein remains in power despite the devastation of the Gulf War, and the US imperialists are afraid he has become a symbol of the limitations of their power. And they do not want to look like they are being forced to respond militarily by the maneuverings of Saddam Hussein - or anybody else. So they want to replace Hussein with a new set of rulers that they can more easily control. (2) Even as they attack Saddam Hussein, the US wants to prevent Iraq from sinking into chaos and giving an opening to Iran. Although the US rulers want Saddam Hussein replaced, they do not want various sections of oppressed people in Iraq to rise up in rebellion, possibly leading to the break-up of Iraq as a country. The US wants to see Hussein replaced by another repressive government that will keep the oppressed people down and Iraq open to domination by imperialism. This is why the US is requiring Hussein to only pull back the 200,000 Republican Guard troops that recently moved near the Kuwaiti border, not the 50,000 regular Iraqi Army troops who were already there. The New York Times put it this way: "The Iraqi leader would be allowed to keep in place the regular Army divisions that he has used over the last year to repress the Shiite residents, many of whom have been vocal in their opposition to the government in Baghdad." The US aim is to keep both Iraq and Iran in check - in order to keep the Gulf under firm US control. In the Pentagon, they call this the policy of "dual containment." (3) The US wants to increase permanent military presence in the Persian Gulf. As the Iraqi military withdrew from the area near the border with Kuwait, US Defense Secretary Perry unveiled a plan to keep a large amount of planes, tanks and armor on bases in the Gulf kingdoms. Even after the 1991 Gulf war, Saudi Arabia and other kingdoms were reluctant to agree on a large permanent US military presence, fearing it would make them targets of anti-US sentiments among Arab masses. The US is pointing to what they call the "continuing threat from Saddam Hussein" to push for a division worth of military equipment to be stored in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates. This will allow the US to quickly fly in 15,000 troops to "match up" with the equipment - as well as conduct regular "training exercises." (4) The US is countering moves by other major powers to horn in on "their turf" in the Gulf. In the last few months, differences between the US (and Britain) and other powers on policy toward Iraq have come more to the surface. While the US refuses to even consider easing the anti-Iraq sanctions, France, Russia, Turkey and some other countries have been holding discussions with Iraqi officials and planning economic ventures. As the US poured troops into the Gulf last week, the Soviet foreign minister travelled to Baghdad, met with Saddam Hussein and announced they had come up with an agreement in which Iraq made some concessions in return for a promise that sanctions will be lifted soon. And the French foreign minister criticized the US military buildup, implying that Clinton was only trying to build up his domestic popularity. These are all signs that there is an intensifying contentiortbetween the various imperialist vultures over the Gulf. By making a big show of force, the US wants to make clear that it is still the "world cop" - the leading power in the "new world order," the only imperialist country capable of deploying such a huge military force thousands of miles from its "home base." 24165. Revolutionary Communist Party; RCP. "Iraq: The War of Sanctions and the Threat of War: US Bullyes: At It Again in the Gulf: Hands off Iraq", in Revolutionary Worker, October 23, 1994, p. 10. During the 1991 Gulf War, many people became confused by the US ruling class tirades against Saddam Hussein. Today, once again, the oppressors are using the same tactic to fool people into getting behind them. They are threatening more attacks and more killings if Saddam Hussein does not "behavior." But the people must not be played for fools by the oppressors. The oppressed people, and everyone who is against US crimes around the world, have to be clear on what's really going down. The main problem for the people in Iraq is imperialism. Imperialist domination has meant reactionary wars, oppressive regimes backed by foreign powers, a distorted economy, big debts to the Western powers and suffering for the people. From the standpoint of the international proletariat, the real problem with Saddam Hussein is that he is very much tied in with this imperialist domination of Iraq. What justice can there be in a big power like the US beating up on a Third World country already devastated by war and economic sanctions? What right does the US have to punish the oppressed people of Iraq by denying them food and medicine, stomping on their country and threatening to bring cruise missiles down on their heads? The US and other imperialists have never helped the people of Iraq and the whole Middle East. The Arab people are not our enemy - they are our sisters and brothers. The masses of people in the US have a common cause and common enemy with the people of Iraq - US imperialism. And we have a responsibility in standing with them to oppose the latest US war moves in the Gulf. US hands off Iraq! US troops out of the Persian Gulf! [ =] 24166. Rowley, Storer H. "Deal Struck On Abortion Language; Compromise In Population Plan", in Seattle Times, September 5, 1994. p. A3. The Clinton Administration has promised the Vatican that it will not promote abortion as a means of birth control in the draft document to be produced at the UN Population Conference. Clinton has condemned the Roman Catholic Church and some Muslim groups 'as out of step with the rest of world'. As a Roman Catholic Bishop warned that the Clinton stance on abortion at the UN conference could become a domestic political issue, Gore stated that the US position had never been to assert abortion as a method of birth control, Gore also (oddly) never mentioned contraception other than abortion as important. Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Sudan have boycotted the meeting. Many Third World countries complain that the conference which claims to address both development and population has ignored economic development for the world's poorest peoples. 24167. Ruane, Michael E. "Parents of Air Force Pilot Killed Over Iraq Qant Justice", in Seattle Times, November 18, 1994. p. A11. Parents of an Air Force officer (Lt. Laura Piper) killed in the mistaken shoot down of two US helicopters in Kurdistan by US Air Force jets are enraged that only one of the officers involved remains accused. On 11/16/1994, a judge dismissed five of the six officers accused. 24168. Salih, Sadi Mahdi. Letter to American People from Sadi Mahdi Salih, Speaker of the National Assembly, on 8/24/1990. In the name of God. We send you greetings of civilization, freedom, and democracy, wishing you and all peoples of the world well being, happiness, and peace. We have decided to address this message to you because we believe you will better understand and interact with us than President George Bush's administration does, because people better understand other people. Ladies and Gentlemen, The Bush administration seeks to distort the image you have of the Iraqis and to depict them as terrorists and as harsh men who love war, as well as barbarians who have no consideration at all for international laws, the interests of other nations, and human values. However, we the Iraqis are not like that. We are not what the Bush administration is describing us to be. We are an ancient people of successive human civilizations, the most ancient of which dates back to about 6000 years ago. We are the nation of the Mesopotamia, the inheritors of Sumer, Akkad, Babylon, and Ashor. Our people wrote the first written language and the first to promulgate laws and specify rights 4500 years ago as detailed by the Hammurabi law. We were the first to establish schools, compose verses and epics, and formulate the most ancient mathematical and astrological theories. And when the sun of Islam rose on the land of the Arabs, Iraq was the first to receive it and open its heart and mind to its light. Iraq strove for it and carried its banner to the world, and with Islam Iraq became a center of world civilization and its capital Baghdad the capital of peace when Europe itself was still plunged in the darkness of the Middle Ages. This means, ladies and gentlemen, that civilization, the love of justice, and respect for law, and belief in God, have been handed down to the Iraqis and so became a built-in part of their psychological and spiritual fabric in contrast to Bush's contention and what he has been spreading abroad. The Iraqis are at the same time as self-respecting a people as are the American people, and they will not have their dignity compromised nor their rights taken away from them or any one pointing guns at them. The Iraqi people are also a resilient, militant, and courageous people, as past history has shown them to be. In short, the Iraqis are not what they are perceived to be by Mr. George Bush and painted by US and other Western propaganda. We the Iraqis are today, unjustifiably and under false pretexts, on the receiving end of a conspiracy led by and built up by the Bush administration. Just because we retrieved part of our country which British colonialism had built into a grand hotel called the State of Kuwait and installed there backward, subservient rulers, the Bush administration began making charges that now we want to invade Saudi Arabia, and now we threaten Western interests, including American interests. All this is sheer slander. Like Iraq, Saudi Arabia is an Arab country and the two are bound by a non-aggression pact signed in 1989. We honor the agreement and abide by its letter and spirit. We have emphasized as much to Saudi Arabia and to the Bush administration and the international community, and we have stated our readiness to give sufficient guarantees bilaterally, or in an Arab or international context, that we do not want to threaten any interests of the United States or the West, or any other nation for that matter, since we have a vested interest in regional peace and in a smooth flow of oil to the world and the United States itself in an atmosphere of security and stability. You must know that before the present crisis erupted we sold one third of our oil to the United States. Perhaps you do not know we are now importing up to 20% of the world's oil needs. Is it in our and the United States' interest that the entire region with its oil go up in flames? Contrary to the Bush administration's perception of us, we respect others' legitimate interests and appreciate their circumstances and requirements and want to see oil sold at moderate prices; our policies within OPEC bear witness to that. And more than anything else, we respect international law and are mindful of our responsibilities toward the world and appreciate the importance of the region in which we live and its impact on world politics. Only, we do not like anyone interfering in our domestic affairs, nor do we want for ourselves to become puppets manipulated by others. Neither will we have our dignity and freedom compromised or anyone dictate to us. All we want is for the Iraqi and Arab individual to enjoy the same rights as the Americans in their country.

These ambitions, we believe, are legitimate if others view them from a neutral perspective. However, it is obvious that Mr. Bush's administration has not understood this--or maybe it does not want to understand it. The Bush administration wants to decide for us what we should or should not do. It has not accepted the idea that the southern part of Iraq, Kuwait, should unite with its north, the way the south of the United States united with its north. The Bush administration wants us to be like those submissive puppets it can manipulate with strings in certain parts of this world, including our region; this would be doing injustice to us, our history and future. Therefore, the Bush administration aroused the feelings of hostility held by some toward us, urged those who went along with it to impose an economic blockade on us, and started to prevent everything from reaching us, including food, medicine, and milk for the infants. It has also recruited fleets, squadrons of planes, and soldiers to commit aggression on us--an act of war and a violation of the UN Charter, whose clauses it interprets anyway it wants--and used all that is available to it from among the methods of persuasion, pressure, and encouragement so that other countries would follow suit. It seems, however, that the Bush administration has not considered in the least the results of what it has planned or put into action. Neither has it remembered the tragedy of Vietnam and the effects on the American people which they are suffering still today. Therefore, it found it easy to push American soldiers into the desolate desert quicksand. It has not taken notice that Iraq is not like Vietnam and that its weapons are not like those of Vietnam. It has not heeded what this aggression would cause for us--feelings of hostility and enmity toward the American people along with the millions of Arabs and Muslims who have begun to volunteer to join us. Mr. Bush's administration has made itself believe that the Arabs are siding with it. It has not realized that Arabs are not like some of their rulers; they are the masses of the people who are seething with anger against it, and who are preparing to strike at US interests should aggression start against us. Moreover, the Arabs are those nationalist honorable rulers who are clearly siding with us. Ladies and gentlemen: It is easy for Mr. Bush to fan the flames of war, but it would be very difficult for us and you to bear its tragic consequences. Therefore, and to avoid together this outcome, we call on every American citizen who advocates right, justice, freedom, and peace to raise his voice in protest against the policies of Mr. Bush's administration toward us. We call them to ask Mr. Bush's administration to lift its illegitimate, inhuman blockade, and to stop the conspiracy to starve our people, kill our children, and inhibit our progress. We call them to ask Mr. Bush's administration to withdraw US armies from Arab land and waters, and to stop humiliating our nation and Islamic sanctuaries. We call Mr. Bush, through you, by virtue of his being an American citizen, to reconsider his hostility toward Iraq before deliberating with his advisers, and to join the protesters, because this protest will render a service to the American and Iraqi people and to all the Arabs and humanity at large, because Mr. Bush is threatening to set a fire whose victims will undoubtedly be thousands of Americans and Arabs. May God keep you and us away from the evil and atrocities of war, and away from the evil of hatred and craving for revenge. Peace be upon him who thinks, contemplates, and follows the voice of reason and the call of conscience[Signed] Sa'di Mahdi Salih, speaker of the Iraqi National Assembly. [Reprinted from Fred Moore (compiler), Iraq Speaks: Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D.]

24169. Scigliano, Eric. “Rough Sailing At Greenpeace; Environmentalism; Just As The Worldwide Action Group Struggles With Declining Funds and Midlife Crisis, Its Seattle Office Is Riven By PC Feuds and Charges of Harassment, Discrimination and Mismanagement; The Pot-Smoking Field Managers, Very Popular With the Seattle Workers, Were Reprmanded, Demoted and Fired”. In Seattle Weekly, November 27, 1996, pp. 9-15, 17. Greenpeace is struggling against a lawsuit alleging sexual harassment, and sex and race discrimination. A former canvasser leader charges she was driven out because she is female, African-American and Lesbian, and that the very successful Seattle office is a veritable Animal House of harassment, vandalism, nepotism, drug use and mishandling of donated money. Another former canvassing manager agrees with the charges and noted he was discriminated against as a middle-aged white male. Greenpeace refuses comment. However, whatever the truth of the matter, the question illustrates the problems faced by environmental organizations seeking to make common cause with other progressive movements.

The woman suing for harassment (given the name Samantha in the article) came to the Seattle office after working as a canvasser in Austin, Texas, in 1992 (not only was Austin hostile to a Black canvasser, the Austin Greenpeace office had a Confederate flag hanging in it): a period when Greenpeace started a financial decline that continues to the present. (While Greenpeace paid canvassers only a percentage of their nightly take, the fact they were frequently moved around the country made in briefly attractive to many young people who wanted to see the country. Samantha was a prize for the Seattle Greenpeace since it, like many environmental organizations, wanted a more diverse workforce (e.g., Sierra Club created a special gay and lesbian group). Greenpeace management has traditionally been uneasy with minorities, being reluctant to canvass in Black areas, and only gradually ending its confrontations with Canadian and Alaskan natives over subsistence hunting of seals and whales. Yet when Samantha started working in Seattle, she was greeted by fellow workers with hostility, since they believed she had been promoted over thus to affirmative action (actually her transfer from Austin was a lateral transfer). She also came into conflict with the local corporate culture due to her concern with professionalism, which focused on alcohol and drugs, and included week-long closures of the office when the Grateful Dead came to town so the staff could party-their-brains-out. She also objected to the loose handling of funds, with some officers routinely skimming sums off the revenues, or borrowing money to buy drugs or bail out someone who had been arrested for drugs (and then losing the IOUs). While an ally of Samantha in the office, Stephen Schafer, a middle-aged White male, confirms most of her charges (although states he was unaware of money problems), he notes that the pervasive anti-White male attitudes made it difficult to implement any kind of managerial controls: he had come into Greenpeace to revamp its canvassing system. Schafer observes: “Political correctness is the source of tyranny. It makes for arbitrary decisions about everything”. His efforts to modernize the canvassing system earned him the nickname “Hitler”.

Samantha noted that after Greenpeace hired and then decided not to retain a diversity consultant, the fatal problem for her was the continuing problem of drugs and money. Samantha may exaggerate the scale of drug use in Greenpeace Seattle (seeing sales of small amounts between staffers as drug dealing) but drug use was pervasive. The incident that led to a serious confrontation was her report that canvassers on a trip to Montana had smoked marijuana in a Greenpeace-owned van during its risk: its classification: it led to the reprimanding, demotion and firing of the field managers. This led to months of insults and harassment by the canvassers under her, and the refusal of her managers to address the problem. Samantha and Schafer received bad performance reviews; she found a hangman’s noose on her desk, and the verbal harassment accelerated.

Canvassing is the core of the Greenpeace mission: the individual canvasser is often the personal embodiment of Greenpeace for most people. Canvassing is the entry path into the movement for most of the people who later become managers and leaders in Greenpeace, and is also the source of researchers, demonstrators and action campaigners (on chlorine, toxic wastes, overfishing and other high profile issues). Fueled by outrage over the French secret service bombing of the Rainbow Warrior in 1985 in New Zealand, the canvassing operation of Greenpeace grew rapidly, and provided an annual budget approaching $200 million at its peak. Beginning in Vancouver, British Columbia, in 1971, as it grew its center moved from Vancouver, to San Francisco, to Washington DC, to London and to Amsterdam; even Canadian operations moved to Toronto.

However, for Greenpeace, the drive to generate revenues remains a constant. Paul Watson, a Greenpeace co-founder expounded because of his desire to use aggressive methods to confront sealers and whalers, scorns the canvassers as “the Fuller Brush men of the environmental movement”. Samantha and others note that the pressure to produce revenue gradually creates jaded hard-sell artists, who become progressively obsessed with generating ever more revenue. However, Greenpeace USA revenues in the 1990s started a continuing decline: from $42 million, to $26.6 million in 1994, and $23.4 million in 1995; membership has declined from 1.6 million to 700,000; and the Seattle canvassing staff has fallen from 40 to 12.

Many Greenpeacers blame the decline on the Persian Gulf War: Greenpeace took a conspicuously stand against the war. The Seattle office was very active in the local anti-war movement. However, other factors may be more important: (1) the decline in the number of publicity to its activist efforts (some have been dubious or ill-informed); as budgets became tighter activists were cut from the budget, rather than marketing campaigns. At the same time, environmental issues confronting Greenpeace now are more complex that the early days when it could just say no to nuclear testing or whaling: questions of pulp mill effluent levels have a much smaller constituency that earlier issues. Two-thirds of Greenpeace canvassing offices have closed (returns were modest in the first days of the war, $200 million at its peak. Beginning in Vancouver, British Columbia, in 1971, as it grew its center moved from Vancouver, to San Francisco, to "adultery" by hearing snatches of songs broadcast in between the news. In the first days of the war, the Haredim moved to Toronto. rather venial. It means that they sinned each time they heard women music. Usually, the strictly observant religious Jews - the so-called Haredim - refrain from listening to the radio while being prohibited to watch TV. During the crisis, when the missile alarms, the all-clear signals and other security-related instructions were broadcast by radio, the Haredi rabbis enjoined their flocks to listen to the radio for life and the instructions of army authorities. This immediately created problems, because Jewish signals and other security-related instructions were broadcast by radio, the Haredi rabbis enjoined their flocks to listen to the radio for life and the instructions of army authorities. This immediately created problems, because Jewish music. Usually, the strictly observant religious Jews - the so-called Haredim - refrain from listening to the radio while being prohibited to watch TV. During the crisis, when the missile alarms, the all-clear signals and other security-related instructions were broadcast by radio, the Haredi rabbis enjoined their flocks to listen to the radio for life and the instructions of army authorities. This immediately created problems, because Jewish women in the Middle East and North Africa Iraq www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads and the seculars. The first issue was over whether the war will break out; the second, over the real reasons for its outbreak and for the damage inflicted by the missiles; and the third, over what to do to terminate the war by a speedy American victory. The overwhelming majority of prominent Haredi rabbis were of the opinion that either the war cannot break out, or, if it nevertheless does, "no Israeli Jew will be in any way hurt by it." (The Lubavitcher Rabbi’s words pronounced from the safe distance of New York). have been written on iron spits. Third, the rite should have been performed in a cave rather than in a Synagogue. And fourth, the 10 performing rabbis must have never before committed any covert sin. Nothing much could have been done to rectify the last "error," much as many Haredim suspected that it was decisive in turning the ritual into a fiasco. But the first three "errors" were duly rectified in a repeated ceremony, held already in a cave on the midnight of 2/2-3/1991, which was again described by the press at length. Since the second ceremony has proven no more effectual than the first, the discoveries of errors in its performance can be expected. There were some attempts at performing magic in public. Some rabbinical authorities proclaimed that the right way of making Saddam Hussein die would be to announce his funeral in print, in a form closely conforming to the usual pattern of such announcements. This was indeed done, and distributed in hundreds of thousands of copies, which can now be seen in all public places conceivable. Other rabbis suggested that Saddam Hussein will surely die if all the Jews of Israel pronounce the death curse on him at exactly the same moment. But, since so many infidels live in the Jewish State, and the believers clash over the content of their beliefs, not all the methods suggested can be put to a test. One effect of described practices is certain. They motivate the secular Jews to acquire knowledge of the living Judaism in order to resist it. But an assessment of consequences of this fact must be left for the future. [=]

24171. Simpson, Alan. Letter: "Some Questions About Kuwait", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, February 7, 1993. Before we even begin to discuss the latest approach from Kuwait to send British troops in, we must go back to Kuwait and ask some very important questions. We must ask the emir of Kuwait what he has done to extend the democratic franchise in the country since it was handed back to the royal family at the end of the Gulf war. We must ask for an explanation of why over 200,000 of the 400,000 permanently settled Palestinians have fled or been deported from Kuwait since its 'liberation'. We must ask why the remaining Palestinians are denied access to schools for their children or the right to health care and why the systematic harassment of Palestinians has gone unchallenged in Kuwait. Finally we must ask ourselves where in the UN mandate was anyone given the authority to annex sovereign Iraqi territory and give it to Kuwait? Why have western forces chosen to do this rather than to address the territorial dispute which had already been lodged with the UN by Iraq over the territory in the region? The Government’s actions so far demonstrate only a la,mentable willingness to use military power to conceal a political vacuum. There is no strategy for the development of peace, stability, democracy and social justice in the region—has to be the starting point of a discussion that begins and ends with Arab states in the region, not the bombing schedules of a departing US president.[Alan Simpson, MP, Notts South, House of Commons.] [=]

24172. Smith, Sharon. “Slaughter in Bosnia Can Be Stopped by United Workers Movement: Don’t Give a Feminist Cover for Intervention by US/UN”, in Socialist Worker (International Socialist Organization), March 1993, p. 2. Over the last several months, many feminists in the US have begun calling for a United Nations (UN) response to the mass rapes of Bosnian women in the ex-Yugoslavia. The National Organization for Women held a demonstration in Washington, D.C. and the Women’s Action Coalition (WAC) has begun a nationwide campaign calling for greater UN intervention in the former Yugoslavia. A campaign letter by Chicago WAC states, “The raping of Muslim and Croatian women in Bosnia-Hercegovina seems unprecedented in the history of war crimes. “Women and girls are raped by Serbian soldiers in an organized and systematic way in what seems to be a planned agenda to destroy, both physically and psychologically, the Muslim culture." Among its other demands, WAC has called for increasing the number of UN peacekeeping troops and that the UN establish a "United Nations War Crimes Tribunal" to try soldiers accused of raping Bosnian women. The raping of women in the former Yugoslavia is deplorable. But these recent feminist campaigns are ill-informed and seek demands - in particular, greater UN intervention - which will only worsen the the war in the former Yugoslavia and strengthen then US imperialism. It is now widely accepted among feminists that Serbian soldiers are the main culprits in the rape of women in Bosnia. In a recent issue of The Nation, Slavenka Drakulic argued that the rapes by Serbian soldiers are qualitatively different than rapes in other wars: "What seems to be unprecedented about the rapes of Muslim women in Bosnia (and, to a lesser extent, the Croat women too) is that there is a clear political purpose behind the practice...a systematic attempt to cleanse (to move, resettle, exile) the Muslim population from certain territories Serbs want to conquer in order to establish a greater Serbia." [=]

24173. Smith, Sharon. "Slaughter in Bosnia Can Be Stopped by United Workers Movement: Don't Give a Feminist Cover for Intervention by US/UN: Had Committed Rapes", in Socialist Worker (International Socialist Organization), March 1993. p. 2. The War Resisters League has also compiled claims by observers that some UN troops had committed rape in Bosnia as well. A senior European Community (EC) official explained recently, "The Red Cross, the UN and we know that some mass rapes have been committed by non-Serbs. The information has come from similar sources: the victims. That didn't stop the EC's 12/92 summit, also pitted against the Serbs in the former Yugoslavia, from finding that the mass rapes in Bosnia had been committed by Serbs "in the context of expansionist strategy," or ethnic cleansing. By taking the claims of the US government or its allies in the Balkans at face value, feminists have simply joined the anti-Serbian chorus clamoring or ministers had changed the policy and decided to export weapon-making materials to Iraq. She also said the change to the policy was hardly an appropriate response to rape. More UN ground troops in the former Yugoslavia will only intensify the war there, and increase the chances that innocent women and others will be victimized by the barbaric actions of soldiers on all sides. Even a UN war crimes tribunal is a step in that direction. But most importantly, a UN war crimes tribunal would place the US once again in the position of passing judgment on the war crimes of others, when US imperialism has a record of slaughter and barbarism surpassed by no other country in this century. Only two years ago, the US slaughtered 250000 Iraqis in the Gulf War, most of them civilians and 47000 of them children under the age of five. [=]

24174. Smith, Sharon. "Slaughter in Bosnia Can Be Stopped by United Workers Movement: Don't Give a Feminist Cover for Intervention by US/UN: Pulled Out of Vietnam", in Socialist Worker (International Socialist Organization), March 1993. p. 2. And just two decades ago, the US finally pulled out of Vietnam, bringing to an end the war in Southeast Asia, that killed between 3-4 million people. Rape and other atrocities against civilians are a tragic by-product of capitalist wars, particularly by conquering armies. US soldiers in Vietnam were no exception. Although no statistics exist about the frequency of rape in the Vietnam War, it was commonplace. As journalist Peter Arnett described, "It was so easy to rape on a squad level. Soldiers would enter a village without an interpreter. Nobody spoke Vietnamese. It was an anonymous situation. "Any American could grab any woman as a suspect and there was little or no recourse to the law by the people." But no UN war crimes tribunal was set up to try US soldiers for raping Vietnamese women. Between 1/1/65 and 1/31/73, only 50 US soldiers were convicted of rape or sexual assault in Vietnam. WAC's claim that the rapes in Bosnia are "unprecedented" in the history of war crimes is therefore patently untrue. Such a claim only heightens the anti-Serbian hysteria, which will bring the US closer to armed intervention in the former Yugoslavia - and which will ultimately benefit only Western imperialism. [=]

24175. Smith, Sharon. "Slaughter in Bosnia Can Be Stopped by United Workers Movement: Don't Give a Feminist Cover for Intervention by US/UN: Qualitatively Different", in Socialist Worker (International Socialist Organization), March 1993. p. 2. Estimates of the number of women raped vary wildly - ranging from 20000-50000. And, as Aryeh Neier argued in the same issue of The Nation, "the numbers being bandied about appear to have little basis in careful, independent fact-finding." Most estimates rely either on the claims of the Bosnian or the US governments, both of which seek to portray the rapes as primarily carried out by Serb soldiers in order to bolster their own war drives against Serbia. Just over two years ago, the US made similar claims that Iraqi soldiers had committed mass rapes against Kuwaiti women as part of its campaign against Iraq, which culminated in the US's six-week war against Iraq in early 1991. There is plenty of evidence from first-hand observers in Bosnia that mass rapes have been committed by all sides in the conflict. Croatian and Muslim soldiers have also taken part in raping Bosnian women. As Amnesty International wrote in 1/93, the rapes are "systematic...with the deliberate detention of women for the purpose of rape and sexual abuse." Amnesty went on to conclude that "forces from all sides in the conflict have been rapists, and women from all backgrounds have been victims, although Muslim women have been chief victims, at the hands of Serbian armed forces." [=]

24176. Stevenson, Richard W. "Thatcher Denies That She Knew About Iraqi Sale: British Panel Examines Military Deal of 1988", in New York Times, December 9, 1993. p. A3. London: On 12/8/93 High Court Lord Justice Scott formally questioned Margaret Thatcher about her former government's activities concerning arms manufacturing equipment and technology sales to Iraq in 1988. In 1989, former prime minister Thatcher reported to the House of Commons that the policy of no-weapons-sales to Iraq had not been changed since its formulation in 1984. Thatcher claimed she had no idea, and was never informed, that in 1988 her junior ministers had changed the policy and decided to export weapon-making materials to Iraq. She also said the change to the policy was not fundamental and did not require her approval. [TXT]

24177. Sundin, Olof. Letter to "Papal Visit: Look At Our Own Behavior Before Using Cuba Cliches", in Seattle Times, November 23, 1996. p. A13. "Castro Gets Religion" proclaims a 11/20 Times editorial on the Pope's visit to Cuba. Castro, continues the editorial, "will get exactly what the Polish general (Wojciech Jaruzelski) received: a public flogging on human rights". Why are we incapable of looking beyond cliches? Is not the US-led embargo that leaves hundreds of thousands of Iraqi children dead and dying, a human rights (and life) violation that leave the excesses of the small Caribbean dictatorship a most distant second? Why do we chase Castro and not our own business? Now, what about 'getting religious'? Could possibly the Cuban nation with its pre-Castro history of corruption, abject poverty of the masses, exploitation and US manipulation, that in a few short decades created one of the finest public health care and education systems in the world, be closer to the communities of the early Christian followers than to our proclaimed One Nation Under God? The infant mortality in God's Own Country is higher than among those Godless Communist Hispanics. And the Pope himself, is he not clad more finely and living and working in Vatican palaces that make both the villas and dress of the powerful in Cuba--both pre- and post-Batista--pale in comparison?

Are editorialists such as the one in the Times not more about our own confusion, cold hearts, fear and anger than about the true state of affairs in today's Cuba? What are we truly afraid of? In a few years Castro will be gone and Cuba will have reentered the Realm of Capitalism. Will some of us, then, begin to grasp what hope and promise the Cuban Experiment (in all its frailty and imperfection) briefly held for humanity? [=]

24178. TDN Parliament Bureau. "Opposition Blasts Motherpath Program", in Turkish Daily News. Turkish Embassy in the USA: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, March 11, 1996. [DSP leader Ecevit says despite indirect support for government they will not be held responsible for its actions) ANKARA- The minority government formed by the Motherland Party (ANAP) and True Path Party (DYP) under the leadership of ANAP leader Mesut Yilmaz faced its first trial by fire in Parliament on Sunday when it came under direct attack from opposition parties.

Bulent Ecevit, the leader of the Democratic Left Party (DSP), told the Turkish legislature his party would not be responsible for the government's actions.

Ecevit, whose DSP has promised to help the government's chances of getting a vote of confidence by abstaining in the vote, added that they would continue to act as an opposition party despite their indirect support for the ANAP-DYP coalition.

The debate in Parliament on the government program, which was read out by Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz last Thursday, proved that the new cabinet's work will by no means be an easy task.

The vote of confidence in the new coalition government is due to be held on Tuesday.

The accusations levelled on Sunday by the pro-Islamic Welfare Party (RP) -- which came first in the elections but failed not only to get the necessary majority to govern but also to find a coalition partner -- showed that this party will test the coalition very severely.

Meanwhile, remarks by Ecevit to the effect that his party would be indirectly supporting the new government in order to prevent the prospect of the RP forming a government received an angry reaction from Welfare benches.

Ecevit for his part responded by indicating that the reason for his party's suspension about the RP stemmed from the latter's apparent lack of commitment to a secular republic.

He said that the fact that the RP had not produced even a single female candidate for Parliament proved that they were fully justified in this concern.

"Even in Egypt, which (RP leader) Erbakan has described as an exemplary country, produced 178 women as candidates for deputy.

Hoping not to see in government a party which treats women as second-class citizens is our right," Ecevit said.

Ecevit continued by indicating that he had not promised any support for the government's actions or program.

"As a party we have no outstanding debt to or dependence on the government," Ecevit said.

He said that they would support government projects to the extent that they saw these to be in keeping with the principles governing the DSP.

Ecevit also expressed satisfaction that the government had decided to take out of its program plans to dismantle state social security institutions and hand these over to the private sector.

The DSP leader went on to indicate that the lifespan of the present government could not be predicted at this stage, and added that it would be the government itself which in the end would determine how long it lasted.

Because of this uncertainty, Ecevit said, there was the need for Turkey to be constantly ready for the prospect of early elections.

Pointing out that DYP leader Tansu Ciller had taken on many functions of government, Ecevit said the time had now come for the prime ministry to return to its traditional function of securing coordination between the various branches of government.

Ecevit also expressed satisfaction over the fact that one of the first things done by Mesut Yilmaz on assuming the prime ministry was to get rid of the prime ministry emblem put up in an irregular fashion by Ciller when she came to power.

Adding that they would be closely following the implementation of the government's self-avowed commitment to fighting corruption, the DSP leader said one proof of sincerity in this respect would be whether the government makes the Prime Ministry Inspection Board totally independent.

On the subject of Provide Comfort, the allied military force deployed in eastern Anatolia to protect northern Iraqi Kurds, Ecevit said this force should stay in Turkey for just a short while longer. "During this period Turkey should develop its own policy on Iraq independently of countries that are not part of the region," he said.

Ecevit declared that the DSP would fulfill its role as an opposition party in a constructive, not destructive, manner.

He vowed however that they would struggle to the end against corruption and "those who rob the people." Speaking on behalf of the RP after Ecevit, Aydin Menderes, said his party objected to the DSP leader's remarks about the Welfare Party.

Menderes' remarks were enthusiastically applauded by his fellow RP deputies and protested angrily by DSP deputies.

Referring to the RP-ANAP coalition that was almost formed but which fell through at the last minute when Yilmaz said there were deep differences between the two parties, Menderes said this government had been prevented by "rentiers." He accused the present government of representing these rentiers and said that both ANAP and the DYP, when they were previously in government, had implemented an economic policy geared towards rolling the public through high interest rates.

Menderes also accused DSP leader Ecevit and said that in the 1970s he had promised to change the system whereas now he had become the guard of the system.

Referring to speculation that the military did not want to see his party in government, Menderes characterized this as a "fabrication."

"The military is dedicated to democracy, and has sworn to uphold democracy. This army is not the army of rentiers but of the people," Menderes said.

He add that remarks by President Demirel, the chief of the General Staff, and the speaker of Parliament had clarified speculation about the military and the RP, and had proved these rumors to be nothing by lies.

Menderes also responded to public questions as to whether the RP was part of the current system or not.

"It is being asked if we are in the system or outside of it. The RP is within the limits of the system drawn up by the Constitution and it is the only party that is so," Menderes said.

Menderes also claimed that the customs union accord Turkey has concluded with the European Union meant in effect that the rights and privileges of the Turkish Parliament had been transferred to Brussels.

He said this would become another of the crucial issues that would be brought on to this Parliament's agenda.

Following that the Motherpath government was formed in order to protect Tansu Ciller and said this would become apparent when his party submitted certain files to the legislature.

Reading passages from the government program relating to religious rights, Menderes asked Prime Minister Yilmaz if "the oppression directed against Friday prayers, headscarves and the hides of sacrificial lambs" would continue.

The last reference was to an annual debate as to whether religious groups and orders have the right to collect sheep hides after the animals have been slaughtered during the Feast of the Sacrifice holiday.

Menderes also asked whether increasing primary education to 8 years was aimed at blocking the secondary levels of schools that give religious education. [-]

24179. Thompson, Jennifer. "Sanctions Bring Iraq To The Brink", in Greenleft News, October 19, 1994. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein appears to have lost a desperate gamble. Despite the sickening hypocrisy which portrays Iraqi troops in Iraq as a "threat" and US troops half way around the world as "peacekeepers", the movement of Iraqi troops near the Kuwait border has allowed US President Bill Clinton to conduct a new military build-up without arousing widespread domestic opposition. Hussein's gamble can be seen as an attempt to disrupt the virtually automatic continuation of the murderous US/UN sanctions against Iraq. These sanctions have been regularly renewed by the Security Council despite the fact that perhaps a majority of the permanent members would prefer that they be dropped or phased out. The March meeting of the council could not agree on a formal statement announcing the continuation of the sanctions. France, Russia and China, in addition to some non-permanent members, were insisting on the inclusion of a commendation of Iraq for moving towards meeting UN terms on disarmament: this was opposed by the US. At the July meeting the US again refused to endorse a statement appreciating Iraq's cooperation with UN Special Commission on Iraq. The US and Russia issued their own separate statements. The Russian UN ambassador said that September should be the starting point for a new period of cooperation and a deadline set beyond which the council should consider lifting the oil embargo. Britain and the US, in contrast, insisted on including human rights peremptorily. The UN sanctions commission, already recognized by more than 50 nations, including several other countries' businesses and even semi-official delegations are frequently seen in Baghdad... There are many who now question whether the US insistence that sanctions remain is part motivated more by economic than political factors. "A European Commission official Went so far as to say: 'We suspect that the US may put a heavy price on the lifting of sanctions, a price that may include exclusive trade terms.' He compared this to the situation in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia after the Gulf War. when US companies got nearly all the big contracts." The continuing low price for oil which followed a sharp drop in oil prices in late 1993, has been a concern for the oil-producing Gulf allies of the US. While oil exporters have been concerned more to increase production to boost oil export income, the re-entry of Iraq into the world market might further depress the price of oil. The US/UN policy is designed to bring Iraq to its knees, by inflicting massive suffering on the people and damaging its economy so that it will remain under the burden of war reparations, reconstruction costs and debt repayment for years, ending any potential to challenge US hegemony in the region.

Campaign against sanctions: An International Appeal to End Sanctions against the Iraqi People is being coordinated by former US attorney general Ramsey Clarke and others in the International Action Centre in New York. The campaign takes the form of letters addressed to members of the UN Security Council demanding an end to the sanctions. The centre is calling for human rights groups, unions, women's, religious, youth and other organisations to add their voices to the demand for an end to sanctions. To obtain a copy of a standard letter and a mailing list of countries presently on the UN Security Council, contact the Committee to Save the Children of Iraq, PO Box 146, Petersham NSW 2049. [=] 24180. Tinnon, Damon. "Turkish Government Launches Assault on Kurds", in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), April 10, 1995. p. 3. The Turkish government unleashed the largest military assault in the Middle East since the Gulf war on 3/20/1995, pouring 35000 troops into the predominately Kurd-populated region of northern Iraq. The invasion force included warplanes and commando, mechanized, and armored units. The aim of this offensive is to deal a crushing blow to the struggle of the Kurdish people for national self-determination. Some 20 million Kurds live in the region where the borders of Iraq, Iran, Syria, and Turkey converge. Turkish prime minister Tansu Ciller has vowed to wipe out all Kurds, in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), April 10, 1995. p. 3. The PKK, and establish a "buffer zone" at the border. Turkish officials justify this offensive by pointing to the PKK's recent ambush of a Turkish military convoy, which resulted in the deaths of 18 soldiers. The PKK, which took up arms in 1984, is one of several organizations fighting for an independent Kurdistan. More than 15000 have been killed in the conflict - most of them by the Turkish army - since 1984. In 1992, some 20000 troops swept the border and then withdrew, allowing Kurdish fighters to regain their positions. Ciller has vowed not to allow that this time.

With Iraq and the race to get in on lucrative reconstruction contracts, the continuing depressed state of the world oil market and other longer term aims of the US in consolidating its hegemony in the region. According to Mariam Shahin, writing in the September 9 Middle East International, "US companies are competing with their European counterparts for preferential terms of trade, particularly in the areas of reconstruction and oil. French, German, Turkish, Russian, Italian, Polish, Romanian, Japanese, and even Indonesian European companies are also reported to be involved. A call for trade with Iraq despite UN approval for the sale of such items. A common practice by many governments has been to delay the approval for food and medicine until the expiration dates have passed. Competing for spoils The differences in the Security Council are related to competition associated with the reopening of trade homes under the pretext of suspected membership or involvement in the PKK. The Kurdistan Democratic Party, based in northern Iraq, flatly stated that, “The Turks know that these were not PKK villages. The targeted area has no PKK bases and it is strictly populated by Iraqi Kurds.” A villager from Hizaw, a town along the Turkey-Iraq border, reported beatings of his neighbors by Turkish troops. A teacher in the same town said that school books not meeting with Turkish government approval were confiscated. Some 3.5 million Kurds live in the invaded region. Iraqi Kurds are mounting protests against the bombing of civilians. Ciller claims that the “utmost effort is being made not to harm civilians.” The military campaign brought the sharply divergent interests of the main imperialist powers to the surface. The governments of Germany and France are calling for a withdrawal. Germany, which has a large Turkish population, has already begun to feel the political backlash, as Turkish mosques, travel agencies, and cultural centers were fire-bombed. Although no group has taken responsibility for the attacks, German authorities are blaming the PKK, which is outlawed in Germany. Paris has made the sharpest criticism of the Turkish military assault. French foreign minister Alain Juppe said that the attack violated Iraq’s territorial integrity. The French government has pressed for an end to the UN embargo imposed on Iraq, since French capitalists stand to profit from expanded trade with Baghdad. [suggest]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

---

24182. Tinnon, Damon. “Turkish Government Launches Assault on Kurds: Washington Seesaws”, in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), April 10, 1995. p. 3. The administration of US President Bill Clinton initially gave strong support to the Turkish offensive. The State Department approved Ankara’s use of force as “necessary and appropriate to defend itself.” The Pentagon suspended flights providing “humanitarian” aid to Kurds in the region so as not to interfere in Turkish bombing runs. The affected area of northern Iraq is currently under Washington’s military control in the guise of a UN mandate. The administration, however, began to backtrack after press reports shed light on the conduct of the offensive. Claiming Washington’s interest was in “human rights,” Secretary of State Warren said on 3/28/1995, “We told them that we thought support of the US and the international community would be forthcoming only if troops were promptly withdrawn.” The Wall Street Journal editors defended the invasion in a 3/24/1995 editorial, stating it was necessary “to get the job done.” The big-business newspaper added, “Turkey, all agree, remains an important adjunct of Europe and a key member of the Atlantic Alliance. It is a friend in a troubled region and it deserves our support.” The New York Times editors said, however, Washington should oppose the invasion, warning that “harshly repressive army tactics in Kurdish areas of southeastern Turkey have created a million and a half internal Kurdish refugees,” and driven millions more to other parts of Turkey. The Iraqi regime, which has a long history of attempting to drown the Kurdish struggle in blood, remained virtually silent. There are 12 million Kurds living in Turkey. The Turkish government perpetuates a host of discriminatory measures against them. It is illegal for the Kurdish language to be spoken in schools or used in the media. It is also illegal to discuss the political situation of Kurds in Turkey. In fact, eight Kurdish members of Parliament who spoke out against the oppression of Kurds were recently thrown in jail. The pro-Kurdish daily Ozgur Ulke has been closed, and many artists, intellectuals, and Kurdish independence fighters remain behind bars. Ciller has “promised” reforms of repressive laws aimed at Kurds - once Kurdish rebels in the border region have been crushed. [suggest]

24184. Tyler, Patrick E. “China Villagers Recall Gorm Attack; Chinese Villages Were Attacked With Plague in the 1940s; Techniques With the Japanese Army Dissected Live Victims of Biological Warfare”, in New York Times, February 4, 1997. pp. A1, A6. In 8/1942 Japanese aircraft staged a biological weapons attack on the village of Congshan, China, exposing the village to bubonic plague. Some 392 out of 1200 villagers died in the next two months. In 11/1942, Japanese troops appeared and burned the village down. Now, after 50 years of recriminations, Japan has agreed to assist China in the destruction of abandoned biological and chemical warfare depots left in China. Old Japanese depots in Manchuria hold an estimated 0.7-2.0 million chemical bombs, most loaded with mustard gas, and many badly eroded. Congshan and several other Chinese villages are the only confirmed targets of biological weapons in modern history. The home of Wu Xiaonai has been made a shrine, since she was lured to a nearby Japanese monastery with claims that they had medical treatment: she was dissected alive without anesthesia.

Leonard Cole at Rutgers University argues that allowing Iraq to get away with the use of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq War led many to conclude that such weapons could be effective, such as Aum Shinri Kyo.

24185. Viorst, Milton. “Crushed Between Two Worlds: An Iraqi Artist Killed By a Rocket”, in New York Times, July 10, 1993. p. 15. The US cruise missile attack on Baghdad on 6/26/1993 killed Leyla al-Attar, a ‘celebrated Iraqi artist’ and her husband. Their previous home had been destroyed in American airraids, and they were now living in temporary housing. Neither she nor her husband ever joined the Baath Party; she did head the Saddam Art Center in Baghdad, where her work was presented, includingnudes. She noted that her themes were not Islamic. Artists were cultivated in Iraq, but, Viorst concludes: “…the thug in [Saddam Hussein] prevailed, crushing what Leyla al-Attar represented to Iraq's future. A stray American rocket did the rest'. [TXT]

24186. Weiner, Tim. "Citing Security, US Jails Iraqis It Used in Plot; Are They Refugees Persecuted By Saddam Hussein or Potential Terrorists?", in New York Times, May 10, 1997. pp. 1, 6. A group of Iraqis used by the CIA in a failed $20 million coup against Saddam Hussein and offered refuge in the United States, are now in jail and facing deportation to Iraq. Thirteen of the refugees are termed by the INS as being "a danger to the security of the United States". The charges come from suspicions of the FBI that the men may be Iraqi spies. Many of the men's attempts to be falsely accused by inflight in the resistance groups backed by the CIA (including the Iraqi National Accord and the Iraq National Congress) and would face death if their plea for political asylum is refused and they are deported. They could be deported to Turkey, which has refused to take them, or to Iraq. Civil Rights lawyers Susan Campos notes: "Some of the men are depressed and nearly suicidal. They have questioned whether being in a US jail is any better than being subjected to the tyranny of Saddam Hussein". [TXT]

24187. Whiston, Gaetan. "Protests Against Bombing of Iraq Continue: Protest in Minneapolis", in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), September 23, 1996. p. 8. Chanting "US Hands Off Iraq!" and "No Blood for Oil!" 60 people gathered in front of the Federal Building here on 9/4/1996 to protest the US bombing of Iraq. Some of the protesters were activists from the Committee in Solidarity with the People of El Salvador, Women Against Military Madness, Veterans for Peace, the Socialist Workers Party, and the Young Socialists. They distributed leaflets to passersby, denouncing both the latest war moves and the five-year economic embargo against Iraq. Immediately after the third bombing was announced, organizers of the first action called another demonstration at the Federal Building for 9/13/1996. [=]

24188. Wilcox, Clyde; Hewitt, Lara; Allsop, Dee. "The Gender Gap in Attitudes Toward the Gulf War: A Cross-National Perspective", in Journal of Peace Research, February 1996. pp. 67-82. A number of recent studies have found that women are consistently less supportive of war than are men, but most studies are based on polls undertaken in the United States. The Persian Gulf War was a popular North-South conflict that was intensively supported by the mass media. Research on US attitudes found a wide gender gap before the war, which narrowed during the war, and widened again after the war. Two [rather absurd] testable theses are the feminist thesis (which would argue for a larger gap since feminists educate women to 'seek peaceful solutions', as in a large gender gap in Europe) and the maternalist thesis (which would argue that women care for their babies, and would be demonstrated by the absence of a gender gap in Israel and Turkey since 'they saw a weaker Iraq as less threatening' to their babies). Strong opposition to the war was voiced by women in Mexico City and Tokyo; there was no significant gender gap in Ankara or Lagos. The data conforms to no proposed model, and the authors cannot 'offer a definitive explanation' for the results.

24189. Williams, E. Faye. "About the Author", in The Peace Terrorists; A Personal Story On The Middle East Crisis; Day By Dat 12/3/1990-1/16/1991. WashingtonDC: EFW Publishers [1245 Fourth Street SW Suite E102, Washington DC 20024], September 1991. pp. [i-ii]. E. Faye Williams is a lawyer, teacher and human rights activist. She was 19 when a congressional staffer for Rep. Mervyn Dymally of California. She is a member of Delta Sigma Theta, National Political Congress of Black Women, Congressional Black Associates, NAACP and other organizations. As a candidate for Congress from Louisiana's 8th Congressional District, Williams came under intense attacks from the Jewish lobby: "of the numerous vicious right wing attacks against Williams during her campaign for the Congress was a last minute attack by the pro-Israel lobby, because her platform called for a balanced Middle East policy, and because her campaign manager was Samuel Burgan, an Arab-American friend whom she met in law school. After confirming her campaign manager's ethnic origin, which she had made no attempt to hide, the pro-Israel lobby sent a telegram to all elected leaders and the news media which said 'withdraw your support from Williams. She is a PLO sympathizer'. This served as just one more incident in a series of negative campaign tactics used to chip away at Williams' strong support. She lost the election by a mere 0.7% after this racist attack by the lobby, after a suspicious computer breakdown, and among other things, a bizarre incident in which the helicopter in which she was riding on the eve of the election was ordered to land in the midst of an Air Force Base. Upon landing, Williams was ordered out of the helicopter, surrounded by a full show of military readiness and held at gunpoint until the last evening news before the election was over. On the morning of the election, with no opportunity to respond, the news carried an incredible, uncertified and extremely damaging story that Williams was 'rude, abusive and threatening' to the military, despite the fact that the Air Force, not Williams, had the guns and battle equipment. It was obvious that all these dirty tricks, and more, were designed to steal and election..." Williams has since written a book, 'Be Angry: Be Constructively Angry'. [TXT]

24190. Williams, Maurice. "Washington Steps Up Threats Against Iraq; US Embargo Increases Misery in Iraq", in Militant (SWP), September 11, 1995. p. 3. Washington's campaign to isolate the regime in Baghdad is seen "as throwing its weight around the Middle East to the detriment of Arab interests," according to the New York Times. The UN Children's Fund reported last year that, as a result of the embargo, 3.3 million Iraqis were at risk of malnutrition and disease, including 625000 infants and children under five. US diplomats have pressured the regime in Jordan to stop buying Iraqi oil, which provides Baghdad with hard currency. Some 75000 barrels of oil a day are shipped to Jordan at reduced prices in repayment for debts, an arrangement authorized by UN officials. Jordanian merchants are owed almost $1 billion in unpaid bills from Baghdad. Reacting to these pressures, King Hussein asserted that he would not consider closing the country's borders with Iraq, saying it would cut off essential supplies of food and medicine to the Iraqi people. "As far as closing the borders with Iraq, this is unthinkable," he declared in a nationally televised speech on 8/23/1995. The rulers in Saudi Arabia have also expressed their hesitation about moves to topple the Saddam Hussein regime. At the same time they are not anxious for the anti-Iraq embargo to be lifted. Saudi oil barons are raking in handsome profits from Iraq's share of the world oil market, raising their output to 8 million barrels a day. The Iraqi regime exported 3 million barrels of crude oil a day before 1991. "Nobody is interested right now in any serious change in Iraq," a senior Saudi official told the Times. "It means we will have to sell less oil or sell it at lower prices." [=]

24191. Willson, Ruth; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Women in Exile At Home and Abroad: A Nation Severed by Borders- Kurdistan", in Connexions. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 26, June 1, 1988. pp. 16-18. The Kurds are the 4th most numerous people in the Middle East, but there is no independent state known as Kurdistan. It is rather "geographical expression," an area lying within 5 different independent states: mainly in Turkey, Iraq and Iran, with enclaves in Syria and the USSR. The area Kurdish groups claim as their Kurdistan stretches from the Taurus mountains in the west to the Iranian plateau in the east, and from Mount Ararat in the north to the plains of Mesopotamia in the south, and it spills into Soviet Armenia and Azerbaijan.

The Kurdish nationalist movements within each state have mostly functioned independently of each other, because most of the kurd population live in inaccessible mountain areas and are subject to the malice of repressive governments. Moreover the Kurds do not gain any long-term benefit from the animosity between the states of the region. For example, long before war broke out between Iran and Iraq in 1980, Iran was giving material and moral support to the Kurdish national movement in Iraq, attempting to weaken that country to gain territorial advantages. Iran doesn't believe in autonomy for Iraqi Kurds any more than for Iranian Kurds. Without any actual agreement, states with Kurdish minorities have been practicing collective repression against this people. [Reprinted from an article written by Ruth Willson, Outwrite, British womens newspaper, issue 54, 1/1987.]

==============================================================================

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================
Kurdistan is a rugged, mountainous territory covering the border areas of Turkey, Syria, Iran and Iraq. The Kurds have a long history, going back over 3000 years, but their land has always been claimed by larger powers. Today their rights are severely curtailed, and they suffer violent government repression. About 85% of Kurds are Sunni Muslim, but there are also Jews, Christians, and other religious groups. The Kurdish language is spoken throughout Kurdistan, though with some marked regional differences. In political, cultural, and geographical terms, Kurdistan is a crucial part of the identity of millions of Kurds. By the 13th century, the Kurds had gradually moved into the plains and mountains which they occupy today. The area is always being isolated and inaccessible, and Kurdish leaders have tried to balance paying allegiance to the dominant power with retaining as much autonomy as they could. From the 16th century until the outbreak of WWI, a large part of Kurdistan came under the Ottoman Empire. It was divided into fiefdoms run by local Kurdish leaders in the 19th century. Private ownership of land became prevalent; a land-owning class emerged among the chiefs, while the majority of Kurds, who had no land, became impoverished laborers.

Political Background: In the 19th century, the Ottomans began to feel threatened by European imperialism. After losing the Balkans, they promptly crushed all signs of Kurdish autonomy. In WWI, the Kurds had to fight for the Ottoman Empire against Europe and Russia, yet at the same time the Ottomans killed thousands of Kurds and deported thousands more because they thought the Kurds might defect to Russia. The end of WWI, the Ottoman Empire was defeated and Britain occupied most of what is now Iraq. The allied forces took charge of dividing the territory; oil interest was a determining factor. In the process of establishing clearly defined national boundaries, Kurdish claims for autonomy were completely ignored.

In the 70s and 80s, Kurds, along with other opponents of the Turkish government, continue to be arrested, tortured and executed. The Kurds have collaborated with the Turkish left, but frequent neglect of Kurdish issues has caused widespread disillusionment. There are a number of Kurdish parties, at least one of which is armed and fighting, but there are also divisions between traditional groups and radical left-wing parties.

In recent years, the eastern and southern provinces of Turkey have become military zones, with US and NATO military bases. The aim is to ensure a strong Western presence on the Afghan-Iran-Iraq-US SSR border, but the build-up of troops also enables the Turkish government to suppress Kurdish political movements. Since the incursion of the Iraq-Iran war, Turkey has also massacred troops along the Iraqi border, where Iraq's vital oil pipeline lies.

The Kurds also suffer continuing oppression in Iran; Kurdish identity is scarcely recognized. For a brief period during WWII, some of the Kurds established the independent republic of Mahabad. This happened in 1946 when British troops occupied southern Iran, and the Russians were in the north. The republic was outside the Russian area, but depended on it for trading links. When the Russians withdrew, the Iranian troops regained control.

In 1979, most Iranian Kurds supported the overthrow of the Shah, and began to petition for greater self-determination, but the negotiations didn't get very far. In 1980, the Iran-Iraq war brought another government clamp-down on the Kurds in Iran. Since then, two political groups have come to the forefront both of which are engaged in armed struggle: the Kurdistan Democratic Party, which aims for Kurdish autonomy within Iran's frontiers and Komala, a communist organisation with a strong Kurdish identity. There are many women activists and fighters in Komala, which upholds the equality of men and women. The guerrillas control areas of the countryside near Iran's north-western border with Iraq.

Iraq was granted independence by the British in 1932. The Kurdish opposition to the Iraqi regime has at times been a major force controlling wide areas of Iraqi Kurdistan. The government has continually tried to crush the Kurdish resistance, which is periodically supported by the Iraqi government. The Iraqi war has had a huge impact on the Kurds in Iraq. In addition to bringing greater suffering, it has provided the Kurds with greater opportunity to attack the beleaguered Iraqi government. The Kurdistan Democratic Party and The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan have more than 20000 fighters and control extensive liberated zones. In recent months, they have attacked the vital oil fields in Iraq's Kurdish territories and have severely damaged two power stations. With sophisticated weapons from Iran, they appear to be launching sustained attacks, despite the ruthless attacks and reprisals of Iraqi troops.

In Syria, many Kurds are denied citizenship, and the government has an "Arabization" policy. In the Soviet Union Kurdish language and culture were preserved, but men and women are increasingly part of the service sector and work in the service sector as women didn't get very far. In 1980, the Iran-Iraq war brought another government clamp-down on the Kurds in Iran. Since then, two political groups have paid work force. In particular, they work in the service sector as cleaners, teachers, nurses, and doctors. The government is encouraging this as part of "the war effort." How ever, women remain responsible for home and family, and government provision of childcare facilities is severely damaged two power stations. With sophisticated weapons from Iran, they appear to be launching sustained attacks, despite the ruthless attacks and reprisals of Iraqi troops.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
Iraq: The Embargo Holocaust

24192. Dialogue For a Just Peace. Press Release: Children of the Sanctions. Poulsbo, Wash.: Dialogue For a Just Peace. c/o Ground Zero [16159 Clear Creek Road NW, Poulsbo, WA 98370], June 1997. Lealey Stahl: We have heard that a half million children have died as a result of sanctions against Iraq. I mean, that is more children than died in Hiroshima... Is the price worth it?

Madeleine Albright (then US Ambassador to the United nations): "I think this is a very hard choice, but the price - we think the price is worth it." [Sixty Minutes - 5/12/1996.]

For Noora Taibbi, a young girl at Al-Mansur Pediatrics Hospital in Baghdad, the price is emphatically not worth it. Noora is in her third relapse with acute lymphoblastic leukemia, and there is no treatment available for her. In this most modern of Iraqi hospitals, 90% of required therapeutic agents are not available. Doctors classify the rise in childhood leukemia as an epidemic and blame it on the tons of radioactive debris left by the nearly one million depleted uranium tipped shells fired by the US during the war. Mortality for children is up five to six times what it was before the Gulf War. There are many relapses due to lack of medicine. Many children die from severe infections because there are no antibiotics. Parents have sold their homes to buy treatment for their sick children, only to discover no treatment is available. The streets en route to Al-Qadisiyya General Hospital in Saddam City, a densely populated suburb of Baghdad, are filled with raw sewage. Goats graze on huge mounds of garbage. The city's fleet of trucks for garbage collection is incapacitated due to lack of spare parts (not allowed in because of the sanctions). In Basrah, conditions are even worse. Children walk barefooted through the streets overflowing with raw sewage. It is a cesspool of disease and potential epidemic. The sewage pumping station remains broken now for four years. The US media continues to portray UN Resolution 986, the celebrated oil-for-food agreement approved last December as the potential savior of Iraq. This Resolution in truth does not begin to meet the overwhelming needs of the civilian population and does nothing to repair the infrastructure of the country or reopen the intellectual and academic lifelines many Iraqi professionals cry for. Former US Attorney General Ramsey Clark wrote last June in a letter to Rolf Ekeus, Chairman of the UN Special Commission on Iraq, "No failure to comply with any United Nations condition can possibly justify the collective punishment of the entire nation and the direct deaths of infants, children, the elderly population and the handicapped."

If these infants, children, elderly, handicapped were members of our families would we agree, "...the price is worth it." Can we be silent and let these deaths continue? The United Nations will again vote to extend the sanctions during the week of 6/8/1997. Please contact President Clinton today urging a vote to end these immoral sanctions. [The information in this leaflet was taken from articles written by Brad Simpson, a graduate student in history at Northwestern Univ. and Chuck Quilty of Voices in the Wilderness of Chicago, IL. Chuck has traveled several times to Iraq carrying medical supplies, risking arrest and fines for violating the sanctions. For more information on the current situation in Iraq contact: Voices in the Wilderness, 1460 W. Carmen Ave, Chicago, IL 60640; (773) 784-8065; fax (773) 784-8837; mmail: kkelly@olgc.apc.org.][461]
United Campaign in Support of the People of Iran; Womens Strike for Peace; International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions; Iraq Action Coalition; Bridge to Baghdad; International Athens Conference Against the Embargo on Iraq; Spanish Campaign for Lifting the Sanctions on Iraq; Voices in the Wilderness; Organization in Solidarity with the People of Africa Asia & Latin America; OSPAAAL; Kerbala Hospital Fund; Peoples Rights Fund. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq, reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 01: Sanctions Violate International Law. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. [International Action Center, 39 West 14th Street, Suite 206, New York, NY 10011 (or F.O. Box 1819, Madison Square Sta., NY, NY 10159); Phone (212) 633-6646; fax (212) 633-2889; E-mail: npc(a)pipeline.com; and, International Relief Association, 24522 Harper Avenue, St. Clair Shores, MI 48080; Phone (800) 827-3543; fax (810) 772-3159.]

Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions—1977: Part IV, Section 1, Chapter 111, Article 54:
(1) Starvation of civilians as a method of warfare is prohibited.
(2) It is prohibited to attack, destroy, remove, or render useless objects indispensable to the agricultural areas for the production of foodstuffs, crops, livestock, drinking water installations and supplies, and irrigation works, for the specific purpose of denying them for their sustenance value to the civilian population or to the adverse Party, whatever the motive, whether in order to starve out civilians, to cause them to move away, or for any other motive.

International Conference on Nutrition, World Declaration on Nutrition, FAO/WHO, 1992:

We recognize that access to nutritionally adequate and safe food is a right of each individual. We affirm that food must not be used as a tool for political pressure.

UN General Assembly Resolution 44/215 (Dec. 22, 1989.)
Economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries:

Calls upon the developed countries to refrain from exercising political coercion through the application of economic instruments with the purpose of inducing changes in the economic or social systems, as well as in the domestic or foreign policies, of other countries;

Reaffirms that developed countries should refrain from threatening or applying trade and financial restrictions, blockades, Embargoes, Famine, and other economic sanctions, incompatible with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and in violation of undertakings contracted bilaterally and bilaterally, against developing countries as a form of political and economic coercion that affects their political, economic, and social development.

Constitution of the World Health Organization, 1946:
The enjoyment of the highest standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic, or social condition.

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948:
Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age, or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control. [–]

24194. International Action Center; et. al.; Flounders, Sara. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 02: Acknowledgements. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Hundreds of people made possible the many meetings around the world that, on the fifth anniversary of the Gulf War, cried out for an end to sanctions on Iraq. It is impossible to acknowledge them all, but we hope that this book, by providing a permanent record of those events, serves as a memorial to their dedicated labors. Many people also contributed the necessary funds to make this book possible. Most are listed as signers of the International Appeal. We would especially like to thank the International Relief Association for its assistance. The distinguished Voices of Opposition cited within, and the authors of the FAO Report, need no further acknowledgment here. We would like to thank individually, however, those who have made this book possible by putting in long hours assembling, writing, editing, typing, proofreading, and organizing its many components into a coherent volume. Sara Flounders and Deirdre Griswold Stapp edited the material in collaboration with the production team of Frank Alexander, John Catalinotto, Hilile Cohen, Paddy Colligan, Stephanie Hedgecocke, Lyn Neeley, and Lal Roohik. Additional assistance was provided by Kaduri Al-Kaysi, Committee in Support of Iraq People; Ali Azad, United Campaign in Support of the People of Iran; Pete Dovidack; Gregory Dunkel; Lenora Foerstel, Women for Mutual Security; Jack Gabryelecki; Betsy Gimbel; Marie Jay; Joyce Kanowitz; Saul Kanowitz; Gloria La Riva; Henri Nereaux; Sonia Ostrom, MetroPeace Action; Cleo Silvers; Johnnie Stevens; Edith Villastrigo, Women's Strike For Peace; and WBAI Radio. [–]

24195. International Action Center; et. al.; Flounders, Sara. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 03: Introduction: Break the Silence. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Sanctions are war. They are the most brutal form of war because they punish an entire population, targeting children, the future, most of all. Sanctions are a weapon of mass destruction. Since sanctions were imposed on Iraq, half a million children under the age of five have died of malnutrition and preventable diseases. Sanctions impose artificial famine. A third of Iraq's surviving children today have stunted growth and nutritional deficiencies that will deform their shortened lives. Gathering and sifting through the material included in this book revived the turmoil of my own impressions of Iraq when, in 2/1994, I saw the damage wrought by war and sanctions. Three years earlier, bombs with a 15 kiloton explosive power equal to seven Hiroshima nuclear blasts had crumpled the sewage lines, water pipes and electrical grid. I saw how a modern industrializing society is built on a fragile, vulnerable network. Vast modern housing developments with wide boulevards, built so proudly on the outskirts of Baghdad, had become fetid swamps, lacking pumps or sewage lines for drainage. Chlorine to purify water and pesticides for the swarms of mosquitoes and flies are both banned under UN sanctions. These sights all came back to me as I went over the contributions to this book from doctors, journalists, photographers, and film makers. They have recorded vivid personal impressions of a policy that invades every crevice of Iraqi society. The book uses many different resources to explain the catastrophe in Iraq today. Cold, hard statistics about crop output, caloric intake, water purification, and infant mortality prove the crime. Photos make the victims' faces unforgettable. Impassioned letters and testimony to the United Nations Security Council show the anger against the criminals. Documents and resolutions of international conferences show how opposition is mounting.

This book reflects a growing world movement that speaks in many languages. Political campaigns expose the crime. Groups try to send medical supplies through international relief agencies. Others organize, resistance, zeroing in on the laws and resolutions imposing sanctions. A few shed light on the horrors of the military use of depleted uranium. A growing number of world leaders and internationally prominent human rights activists have added their voices to the opposition. We need to break the silence and expose the crime. A generation ago in Vietnam, the Pentagon had other weapons to terrorize the civilian population. They were called napalm, white phosphorous, Agent Orange defoliants, fragmentation bombs, and other "anti-personnel" weapons. The early movement against the Vietnam war was small, but was able to put a human face on the suffering caused by the Pentagon. The images of Vietnam burned into the minds of a whole generation, especially the youth, who mobilized into a powerful force that helped end that war. That is what we have to do today. We have to reveal the human face of those targeted by the new weapon of sanctions. We have to get this book, with the reports from the United Nations' own Food and Agriculture Organization and others into every library, onto every campus, into community centers, churches, mosques, synagogues, and union offices to ensure that no public figure can say, "We didn't know." Anyone who wants to end human suffering must know what causes it. This book is a tool for that fight. The official report from the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, written by a team of doctors and nutritionists who measured this catastrophe firsthand, is a powerful indictment of the UN Security Council's policy by an agency of the world body itself. In the period following World War II, the United Nations General Assembly and various international bodies passed a number of conventions and resolutions on the conduct of hostilities to protect non-combatants—especially children. The US government signed such conventions, resolutions, and lofty statements as the UN Charter the Geneva Conventions, and the Nuremberg Convention. The hard facts, the photos, and the eyewitness accounts herein make an irrefutable case that the UN Security Council, at the insistence of the United States, imposed sanctions in violation of international law. Every two months for five years, former US Attorney General Ramsey Clark has defined the political implications of the criminal sanctions policy. Clark has sent letters to every member of the UN Security Council before its bimonthly vote to continue sanctions against Iraq. Some of his correspondence is included in this book. His letters have gained a wide circulation internationally as a voice of conscience.

Iraq is home to one of the world's oldest civilizations. Ancient Mesopotamia, the land between two rivers, flourished for 6000 years because of its water resources and irrigated agriculture. During the Gulf War, irrigation canals, bridges, and food-processing plants were systematically targeted for destruction. Now fertilizers and preservatives, along with parts for tractors, are a memory of another age, of ancient history, before 1991. Despite the heroic efforts of doctors and other medical personnel, Iraq's new, modern hospitals are now wards of belligerent policy. Many people who feel outrage over the war and the years of blockade are overwhelmed by the enormity of the injustice. Is it hopeless? Is there nothing we can do? The facts show we are far from helpless. When Washington politicians debate the reasons why they stopped the war after forty-two days, and why the Pentagon didn't occupy Baghdad with thousands of troops it becomes clear that the war ended when it did because the politicians and generals here were afraid. They feared that a foreign occupying army would awaken resistance throughout the Middle East. They feared that any US casualties would awaken mass opposition at home. They feared the Pentagon's allies would collapse in the face of an outraged mass movement, that the criminal coalition would come apart. Sometimes we forget that what we do enters their calculations. The authorities fear opposition—from the poor and working people here at home. They fear exposure of the magnitude of their crimes. We have the evidence of the crime. And we can do something about it. We need to act with determination. Let the children live. [=]

24196. International Action Center; et. al.; Clark, Ramsey. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 04: Text of Ramsey Clark's Report on the Civilian Impact of UN Sanctions to Members of the UN Security Council, 3/1/1996. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. One issue between Iraq and the United Nations exceeds all others in importance. That issue is the Security Council sanctions imposed against Iraq at the insistence of the United States. The whole world knows, and history will permanently record, the fact that those savage sanctions have cruelly killed more than one million people in Iraq these last five years, injured millions more, and damaged the population and society for generations to come. Is this the legacy the United Nations wishes to support by failing to completely end the sanctions now? While February statistics are not yet available, more than 6000 children under age five and 6000 persons five years or older died in 1/1996 as a direct result of the sanctions. More than 20000 human beings have died since the Security Council reviewed the sanctions this January. Added injuries affected millions and four million remain at risk of death from malnutrition. A continuation of sanctions for another sixty days will cost as much in life, justice, and respect for Security Council members that continue the sanctions.

During last week, which I spent in Iraq, my fifth annual inspection since the sanctions were imposed, I visited ten hospitals in four governorates which have nearly 15% of all rationed items are usually made by midmonth. At the end of February, we found warehouses stocking up for March, but, with few exceptions, retail stores empty of all rationed goods and with few food items for sale.

If the present agreement pursuant to Resolution 986 is finalized in March, it will be months before this ration can increase and by the most optimistic estimates it will be far short of basic needs, providing Iraq with only a lower level of malnutrition. If the entire allocation of Resolution 986 oil-sale income available for health was spent on medicine and medical supplies, there would still be severe shortages causing deaths and protracted illness. Billions of dollars will be required over and above funds available under Resolution 986 for adequate levels of food and medicine, to replace and repair machinery and parts, rehabilitate medical facilities produce fertilizers and insecticides, to increase food production; build and repair food storage, processing, distribution facilities and transportation equipment; to rebuild water systems, water treatment facilities, pipe lines; to rebuild sewer systems, treatment and disposal plants; to repair schools, provide desks, benches, chairs, books, supplies; and to provide an acceptable standard of nutrition, health care, and education for the people of Iraq. The quality of life will continue to deteriorate even with the implementation of Resolution 986. The Security Council, which tragically bears the responsibility for so much death and destruction in Iraq, must act now to completely end the sanctions, to help meet the emergency needs of the Iraqi people, and to help Iraq rebuild its society. The lawlessness and cruelty of such death-dealing sanctions, which are a crime against humanity and genocide, must be recognized. Their use against whole populations, killing first infants, children, elderly, and chronically ill, must be prohibited. Until then no poor people on the planet are safe from the UN, or the superpower whose will it enforces. [a] cold afford to feed his people.” But only a fool would offer or believe such propaganda. If Iraq is spending billions on the militia, then the sanctions are obviously not working. Malnutrition didn’t exist in Iraq before the sanctions. If Saddam Hussein is building palaces, he intends to stay. Meanwhile, an entire nation is suffering. Hundreds are dying daily and millions are threatened in Iraq, because of US-compelled impoverishment. If the United Nations participates in such genocidal sanctions launched against the threat of military attack, it consents to the murder of the people of the world fail to prevent such conduct, the violence, terror, and human misery of the new millennium will exceed anything we have known. I am enclosing a copy of the summary to the FAO report. ou must vote against these genocidal sanctions. Your nation should not share responsibility for the deaths of more than 10000 Iraqis who will die before the Security Council review in March if sanctions are not lifted in January. [The preceding two letters are only the most recent sent by former Attorney General Ramsey Clark to all members of the Security Council before its scheduled votes on UN sanctions on Iraq. Since 8/1990, this vote has come up every two months. Clark’s letters have been widely circulated to the media and on the Internet. They hal e become a voice of conscience against sanctions, citing ethical and legal standards widely agreed to by all nations but consistently disregarded. (At the back of this book is a list of the names, addresses, phone, and fax numbers of the current members of the UN Security Council].) [=]

24198. International Action Center; et al.; Zaidi, Sarah. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 64: Letter to the Editor, The Lancet, Vol. 346, 8988, p. 1485, December 2, 1995. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Sir, Under the auspices of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) we conducted a community survey of the nutritional status of and mortality among children under the age of 5 in Baghdad, Iraq (Aug. 23-28, 1995). A random sample of 25 clusters representative of neighbourhoods in Baghdad was selected from clusters included in a nationwide survey conducted by the International Study Team in 8/1991. [Ascherio A, Chase R, Cote T, et al. Effect of the G-IIlf war on infant and child mortality in Iraq. NEnglJMed 1992; 327: 931-36.] The number of clusters for each city district within Baghdad was determined on the basis of the population size of each district according to the 1987 census. Within each cluster, contiguous households were screened until 24 were identified as eligible. Eligible households included women aged 15-49 who had a live birth after 1/1/1985. All eligible women within each household were included in the survey. Among eligible households, children under age 5 within the first 12 households were weighed and measured for assessment of nutritional status with UNICEF standards. From this sample, Z-scores based on the National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS) standardised distributions were calculated (EPI-INFO v6). 3 Malnutrition was defined as having a Z-score more than 2 SD below the median for the NCHS standardised distributions for height-for-age (stunting), weight-for-age (underweight), and weight-for-height (wasting). Children with extreme Z-scores [Centers for Disease Control. EPI-INFO, version 6. Atlanta: CDC, 1994.] and who were 60 or more months old were excluded from the analysis. Information was collected on 2120 children under 10 years of age; anthropometrical measurements were done in 594 children. Infant and child mortality rates before the beginning of sanctions were compared with mortality rates after sanctions. There was a two-fold increase in infant mortality and a five-fold increase in under-5 child mortality (Table 28).

These results correspond with an increasing prevalence of malnutrition—namely, a two-fold increase in stunting and a four-fold increase in wasting between 8/1991, [Smith M, Zaidi S. Malnutrition in Iraqi children following the Gulf war: results of a national survey. Nutr Rev 1993; 51: 71-78.] and 8/1995 (Table 26). These findings illustrate a strong association between economic sanctions and increase in child mortality and malnutrition rates. In the 1991 survey baseline mortality for the under-5 population rose from 43.2 to 128.5 per 1000, reflecting a three-fold increase in child mortality related to the Gulf war and the economic sanctions. In the present study, the under-5 mortality rate increased five-fold. When we looked at cause-specific mortality we found a three-fold increase in diarrhoeal-disease-related mortality among children under 5 (odds ratio 3.2 [95% CI .74-13.9]). This two-fold increase in infant mortality was observed subsequent to the Gulf war in 1991, while the economic sanctions were implemented. A three-fold increase in infant mortality has been sustained despite the fact that the war ended 4 years ago. Furthermore, in 8/1991, rates of malnutrition in Baghdad were similar to those observed in Kuwait. Current estimates of malnutrition in Baghdad (Table 26) are similar to levels seen in lesser developed countries—eg, underweight rates in Ghana and Mali are 29% and 31%, respectively; stunting rates are 28% in Sri Lanka and 27% in the Congo; and wasting levels are 12% in Madagascar and 11% in Myanmar. [Wardlaw T, Carlson B. A global, regional and country assessment of child malnutrition (staff working paper no 7). New York: UNICEF, 1990.] The data are consistent with the economic and social realities seen in Iraq. Food prices are high, purchasing power is low, water and sanitation systems have deteriorated, hospitals are functioning at 40% capacity, and the population is largely sustained by government rations which provide 1000 kcal (4.2 MJ) per person per day. The deadlock between the UN Security Council and Iraq over acceptance of various UN resolutions demonstrates a continued disregard for the deteriorating health of the Iraqi people, especially children. The UN’s humanitarian arm offers palliatives for the suffering while the Security Council is intent on continuing the sanctions. The moral, financial, and political standing of an international community intent on maintaining economic sanctions is challenged by the estimate that since 8/1990, 567000 children in Iraq have died as a consequence. [Sarah Zaidi, Mary C Smith Fawzi, Center for Economic and Social Rights, New York, NY 10010,USA; and Harvard School of Public Health, Boston.] [Note: Tables 26 and 28 can be found in the Table section of the FAO report.]=] 24199. International Action Center; et al.; Pellett, Peter L. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 65: A bankrupt policy: Letter to the Editor of the Guardian Weekly, England, by Dr. Peter L. Pellett responding to a Washington Post editorial reprinted in the 1/7/1996, issue of the GW. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Sir, While dismay in certain circles at the exposure of child deaths in Iraq as a consequence of the economic embargo is understandable, nevertheless the Washington Post Editorial (Guardian Weekly, 154 1: Jan 7) is breathtaking in its hypocrisy. The argument appears to be that sanctions are blameless—resisting them is the evil. To condemn Saddam Hussein for not giving in to the sanctions is as a Weapon on War: Part 65: A bankrupt policy: Letter to the Editor of as baby milk (about 50% of needs) for infants, which is almost free of cost. Thus, this is also an enormous income subsidy in the face of hyperinflation and a 5000 fold increase in food prices. The prevention of absolute disaster is, however, at the cost of a colossal drain on currency reserves and the future collapse of such an unsustainable system cannot be ruled out. In nutritional and health terms, the five years of sanctions have moved Iraq from an almost 1st world status to that of sub-Saharan Africa. Of course, selling of additional oil for humanitarian purposes would alleviate the situation and in our report we urged the GOI and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]

24200. International Action Center; et. al.; Harris, Sue. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on: constructed his own incubator made from a baby’s bed and plastic By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]

24200. International Action Center; et. al.; Harris, Sue. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on: constructed his own incubator made from a baby’s bed and plastic By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]

24200. International Action Center; et. al.; Harris, Sue. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on: constructed his own incubator made from a baby’s bed and plastic By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]

24200. International Action Center; et. al.; Harris, Sue. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on: constructed his own incubator made from a baby’s bed and plastic By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]

24200. International Action Center; et. al.; Harris, Sue. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on: constructed his own incubator made from a baby’s bed and plastic By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council to come to an agreement. Even were this to occur it could never be a complete solution. Painless sanctions are a contradiction in terms and child deaths especially in the poor and vulnerable are an inevitable consequence of economic pain. Having seen the effects of the embargo in Iraq both in 1993 and the summer of 1995 as well as comparing this and the prewar situation, malnutrition, beggars, crime, street children, a collapsed health care system, hyperinflation, and widespread suffering are the new realities. I cannot believe that continued sanctions are the answer. After five years the policy seems practically and ethically bankrupt. The question must be whether our humanitarian principles should support the continuation of these actions which literally are killing people. The incessant trumpeting of “human rights” at the same time as we continue to approve the sanctions seems to be blatant hypocrisy. Finally let me emphasize that this letter is written on a personal basis and is in no way officially endorsed by the UN Agency which supported the mission nor by the University of Massachusetts [Peter L. Pellett Professor of Nutrition University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003 Team Leader, UN/FAO Mission to Iraq, 8/1995.] [=]
choice by the United States and by the Security Council of the United Nations at the urging of the US and its allies, are weapons of mass destruction directed at a whole people. These blockades have been used only against poor countries, and while the entire people is punished by their economic impact, the greatest harm is overwhelmingly on the poorest and weakest—infants, children, the chronically ill, and the elderly. There is no crueler violation of fundamental human rights than this sanctions policy. The case of Iraq has demonstrated that the US and its allies do not stop short of the deliberate creation of a new zone of death and destitution, with thousands of deaths monthly, dehydration, organ failure, and pain without relief, permanent physical or mental disability, and generalized shortening of life. All humanitarian law from its inception has endeavored to limit violence to combatants, to prevent use of cruel and unfocused weapons, to protect civilians from the scourge of war, and to outlaw the principle of collective punishment. The sanctions policy is clearly a "Crime Against Humanity" as defined under the terms of the Nuremberg Principles. It also clearly violates the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Convention and other fundamental documents of contemporary international law. Ahmed Ben Bella, first President of Algeria, Daniel Ortega, former President of Nicaragua, Ciro Gómez Almeyda, former Deputy President of Chile, Karmenu Mifsud Bonnici, former Prime Minister of Malta, Romesh Chandra, President, World Peace Council, Roosevelt Douglas, Member of Parliament, Dominica, Ben Dupuy, former Ambassador at Large, Haiti, Sir Gaetan Duval, Former Deputy Head of Government of Mauritius, Sheikh Mohammed Rashid, former Deputy Head of Government of Pakistan Mror Ghaleb, former Foreign Minister of Egypt, Fr. Miguel D'Escoto, former Foreign Minister of Nicaragua, Tony Benn, Member of Parliament, Britain, Ramsey Clark, former Attorney General of the United States Margaretta Papandreou, former First Lady of Greece.

The above Appeal was drafted by Ramsey Clark and introduced by the International Commission on Inquiry on Economic Sanctions. It will be submitted to the next UN Security Council session that takes up the continuation Of sanctions. To make a contribution and have your name added please contact: International Action Center, 39 W. 14th St., Suite 206, New York NY, 10011, USA. Tel: (212) 633-6646; fax: (212) 633-2889. The IAC would like to give special thanks and acknowledgment to the signers of the Appeal listed below for their assistance in this project. Initiators: Kadouri A-Kayssi, Committee in Support of Iraqi People, Jaime Ballesteros, OSPAAAL, Madrid, Adel Barakat, President Arab American Chamber of Commerce & Professionals, Dr. Arthur W. Clark, Dr. Irna Parhad (Clark) In memoriam, Hillel Cohen, Bean & Alan Finneran, Marion Grevelle Kenucky Dominican Family, Center of Ecumenism & Reconciliation, Dr Khalil Jassem, International Relief Association, Phyllis J. Lucero Rania MaSi Founder and Coordinator, Iraq Action Coalition, Hugh Stephens International Coalition on Inquiry on Economic Sanctions, Britain. [Lists of Benefactors and Sponsors, Supporters, Endorsers, Signers omitted; [Affiliations listed for that time I didn't see a single hospital that wasn't damaged. I didn't see a which means that we shot them! He didn’t mention the African American family who were told their son died a hero’s death, virtually in hand-to-hand combat with the Iraqis, when nobody got within 3000 meters of Iraqi ground troops. What really happened to their son? He was in a Bradley armored personnel carrier and his legs were cut off by a depleted-uranium rocket, a silver bullet as we call it. It came right through and cut his legs off. His family finally got a letter a month later describing how they tried to save him, how the tourniquet he couldn’t stand up, how they couldn’t get him over. What’s the matter? He doesn’t have any legs. He dies by an American rocket and they tell his family . . . well, they’re nauseated. We’ve lost a son, our hearts are broken, and our government lies to us about how it happened. It never mentions the tons of depleted uranium that will infect the lives and health of the Iraqi people with a radioactive half-life of 125000 years. Why didn’t they go to Baghdad? A general on the Rather show said they could have been there in a goddamn 36 hours, there was not one soldier to stand in the way, Republican Guards or anything else. But they needed a demon to bring the country down for five years, they didn’t want the Iraqi people mobilizing under new Iraqi leadership. Never forget Vietnam. Our war against the Vietnamese people was awful. But our twenty years of sanctions after the war were far crueler, far deadlier and never even recognized. That’s what brought them down to utter poverty, that’s what brought their living standard below that of Mozambique, that’s what forced them out into the sea m open boats mto settlements in Hong Kong and places like that. They were crushed. A people who during the bombing were so proud they could raise five tons of rice per hectare, working night and day, cut off from everything for twenty years, until finally there is nothing left except an agreement. And the next day Pepsi blimps flying over Ho Chi Minh City. Free at last, thank God almighty, free at last.

One crime against humanity exceeds all others in its magnitude, its cruelty in all the ways that humanity has discovered to be cruel to each other, and most significantly in what it means for the future: sanctions. The sanctions against Iraq are the most dramatic, crushing unbearable example. And let me tell you that in Cuba today, the food intake, caloric and otherwise, is still less than two-thirds what it ought to be. One of the great human beings of our time is there today with a million dollars worth of medicine for a people who are deprived of medicine. His name is Muhammed Ali. He’s got a lot of medicine for Parkinson’s disease. The United States alone imposes that embargo on Cuba, killing or ten million people in Cuba. Every man, woman, and child there. And it does it in defiance of all the nations of the world. Over one hundred nations have voted in the UN to condemn the United States for its unilateral blockade against Cuba. These sanctions are a killer beyond compare. They have killed five or ten people for every person who died from the typhus on Iraq. They have injured far more. You’ve got over 20% of the population under ten stunted in their physical and mental development from malnutrition in the early years of their lives, the number of underweight births is five times what it was before. If you are born under two kilos [4.5 pounds], you’re going to have a hard time, you eliminated. [From speech to London meeting against sanctions, 1/20/1996, New York.][4]

24203. International Action Center; et. al.; Ben Bella, Ahmed. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 69: ‘A disease of the world system’ Ahmed Ben Bella First President of Algeria. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The question of the blockades can only be properly understood when seen in a wider context. We live under a world system in which 35 million people die of starvation every year, in which a quarter of the world’s population suffers from tropical diseases, and in which the countries of the South have seen no development in their position during the last thirty years. We live in a world where the goal of development held out by the US, the IMF, and the World Bank cannot possibly be supported by the planet we live on. Three quarters of the world’s population live in the countries of the South, and there will quite simply never be the possibility that all these people could consume energy and other resources at the rate the US does; we should need ten or fifteen more such planets to provide the necessary resources! The countries of the South owe $2000 billion in debt; they cannot even pay interest on this amount, let alone ever pay it back. In short, the whole of the South is blockaded. The blockades of Iraq, Cuba, Libya, People’s Korea are, in fact, merely the most extreme examples of the use of this policy. The constitutions of many countries now ban racism. What we must struggle for is that blockades should also be banned in the same way. These blockades are a disease of the world system; we want these blockades to be eliminated from the face of the earth, just as smallpox has been.

[From speech to London meeting against sanctions, 1/17/1996.]

Iraq is a symbol of struggle against a barbaric system, like north Korea, north Vietnam, Libya, and Iraq. Cuba is a human revolution. That’s why the US has had sanctions on Cuba for over thirty years. There are millions of poor in the US Many are Blacks and Mexicans. The US cannot accept the extraordinary example of thriving Black and Latin women and children in Cuba. Sanctions have moved to the center of attention in this conference. The sanctions against Cuba, Iraq, and Libya are an act of warfare without war. They affect every country and the stability of the world. The imposed legality of the embargo is a UN takeover by Washington. The powers can force their own concept of legality. Economic sanctions are a declaration of war. They intend to force change, to destroy Iraq. That’s oppression. It’s worse than the effect of the Hiroshima bomb. The US treats the world like a teacher in a classroom. There are always certain students who are in trouble, like Koreajo Cuba, Iraq. That’s liberal [laissez-faire] capitalism. Either you apply rules they want or you are destroyed. They offer the paradise of liberalism but one has only to look at those who are out of work. The conflict, the struggle is against imperialism, against its system, against the men who are the symbols of this barbaric system. We must continue to fight. The US controls everything in the United Nations Security Council. It has been transformed into a council of war. What did they do with Iraq in a month? They made a declaration of war there without informing the General Assembly. It's the Security Council of the United States alone. We have to organize in the United States more than in London because we have to talk with the American public. I am convinced that there are progressive Americans. There are brothers and sisters from South America. There are African Americans. American society is very diversified. There are possibilities of a good outcome. We have to reform. After fifty years of the UN, I do not understand why five countries have the right to vote against the rest. Is this democracy? We have to reform the Security Council because it has direct contact with the money of the US. We have to reform that. It's a catastrophe. The way the Security Council acts is with blind force against the public. We have to transform the United Nations in the direction of more democracy and less military force. It is time to do this. The unions can play a very important part because they are organizations that have experience. They represent the working class, the poor, those who most want things to change. The unions have to play a central role. [From speech to International Commission of Inquiry of Economic Sanctions, London, 8/1995.] [n]

24204. International Action Center; et. al.; d'Escoto, Miguel. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 70: 'We have a moral imperative' Father Miguel d'Escoto, Former Foreign Minister of Nicaragua. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The people we have here are the converted, that is to say, people who understand the gravity of the problem and are committed to doing something about it. What I should say to you is, keep up the good fight. But not only keep it up—double, triple your efforts. We have a moral and, for many of us, a religious imperative to call things by their rightful names. Sanctions in the case of Iraq are certainly the continuation of that awful war. It never stopped. But it's more than war, because even in war, you have certain laws regulating wars. Sanctions, especially as being applied in the case of our brothers and sisters in Iraq, is not only war. It's murder. It's international terrorism, it's genocide. Once when we in Nicaragua were in the middle of our own sufferings—which continue, which never stopped, just like the war in Iraq never stopped—at one juncture I called upon people to accompany me on what I called a fast for life. It was a kind of religious thing. Thousands and thousands of people in Nicaragua joined, but many also came from abroad. At one point, when I was close to thirty days into the total fast, I received a delegation from the United States. There were something like twenty-five people, and a young woman led the group in song. I really appreciated the song and said, Will the young lady care to lead the group in another song? And she says, oh, Father, thank you for calling me a young lady, I am the mother of five. I said to her, What are you doing here? She being young, the five had to be very young. She said, you know, my husband and I in Boston have been praying and reflecting and talking about what our government in the United States is doing to the people of Nicaragua. And when our children grow up and they learn about what went on during the eighties, they are going to ask us, what did you, our father and mother, do when this was being perpetrated against the people in the name of the United States? It was this kind of reflection that said we must go and express our solidarity. They decided that the mother should go and the father should stay home minding the children. She went down and was kidnapped, along with other Americans. The kidnapping took place on the San Juan River on the border between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, by the Contras, with the help of the American Embassy in Costa Rica. This is the most difficult country to work in on behalf of causes, not because the people are not wonderful. The people are wonderful. But this is the most systematically deceived, lied-to people on Earth. Noam Chomsky, a very wonderful man and dear friend, has written a book called Manufacturing Consent, where the whole methodology for the robotization of the American citizenry is put forth and explained. This is a nation of robots. It isn't that they don't care, they don't even know. And they are led to believe that it's not even good manners to inquire into certain things. We are the ones who suffer the consequences. We in Nicaragua, our brothers and sisters in Cuba for so long, and our dear brothers and sisters in Iraq and in Libya and in so many places. People ask me all the time in Nicaragua, Father, you know the nature of the beast that you are facing, going to the States and appearing on "Nightline" or whatever television programs. We can't help but notice that you have a certain optimism, you have hope. How can you have hope? How do you keep the torch alive? I believe that no matter how powerful those bent on crime and lies and greed might be, God is more mighty. It isn't that God is on our side. We are on His side when we're struggling for brotherhood and sisterhood, for peace and for a better world. Those who are more committed to fighting for a better world will get one. Our people in Nicaragua, they dare to dream, and for that, they continue to suffer. The enemy would like people to say: We won't try to dream any more. What's the use? It's too difficult, and you will pay the consequences for a long time. Why don't we just accept that things must be this way? The world we all want will be the result of courage and not of cowardice, and the degree of courage and heroism that is necessary is quite large, but it will be forthcoming if we stick to our guns—our moral guns. God bless you. [From speech to New York anti-sanctions forum, 1/20/1996.] [n]
Let me thank the International Action Center on behalf of the United States government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 72: Hypocrisy and sanctions on Haiti. Ben Dupuy, Former Ambassador-at-Large, Haiti. Co-Director Haiti Progress. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. It is a very difficult job in this country to fight the big media machine that manufactures pretty soft budget cuts. One of the logic of Zbigiew Brzezinski of the Trilateral Commission, one of the famous think tanks in the United States, is that “for democracy to work there has to be a sensible amount of apathy.” He said that during the Vietnam War. Obviously, the ruling circles in this country were quite afraid of the danger of a new consciousness among the people who would represent for their form of democracy. Not too long ago Fidel Castro was around here. Mayor Giuliani did not want to receive him at Gracie Mansion. So he had no choice but to go and see his old friends in Harlem. During his speech he compared the blockade of Cuba to a silent nuclear bomb, because this embargo has been killing thousands of innocent people. This is exactly what is happening in Iraq today. Maybe by talking about another form of embargo we can see better the hypocrisy of the policy makers in the United States. The embargoes they impose on Cuba and Iraq are real. But what about Haiti? After the CIA engineered a coup in Haiti against Father Jean Bertrand Aristide, whom they did not like because he was too close to the people, they adopted a policy with two faces. Officially, they were supporting the legitimate government of Haiti, which had just been toppled by a military coup. Secretary of State James Baker, at an OAS meeting three days after the coup, said that the military were thugs and would have no friends. Yet they lasted three years. There was supposed to be an embargo against the Haitian military leaders. But, in fact, that embargo was not directed against these military leaders, it was directed against the people of Haiti. At the same time the United States was reinforcing the military dictatorship. The Navy, stationed around Haiti to supposedly enforce the embargo, was, in fact, taking the boat people, the refugees fleeing the military dictatorship, and returning them to Haiti. But this Navy could not detect the tankers bringing fuel and all sorts of other supplies to reinforce the military dictatorship? They organized and financed a terrorist organization known as F.R.A.P.H. The United States could then come back and say, “We are coming to deliver you, to help you.” This is the kind of hypocrisy that must be understood. Haiti has a long experience with embargoes and blockades. Let us discuss a little history. Haiti became independent in the beginning of the 19th century, in 1804, after the slaves overthrew their masters and declared the country independent. Haiti was the first country in Latin America to become independent. This was really unacceptable, especially for the United States. We have to remember that the power in the United States was in the hands of the slaveholders. They were afraid that if the slaves could become free and independent in Haiti, then maybe in the whole Caribbean and the southern part of the United States the slaves would revolt. And that would be an end to their domination. So Haiti was put under an embargo. The United States, in cahoots with Great Britain and France, isolated the country for 60 years. Nothing would go out and nothing would come in. Today you can hear constantly over the media that Haiti is the poorest country in the Western hemisphere. They want to prove that if a black country becomes free and independent, they are still unable to govern themselves. They are still unable to succeed. Today they consider Iraq, Libya, Cuba, and other countries to be trash in a basket. Whoever is trying to climb up is kicked Tottenham Three. A number of Irish militants were jailed in Britain for ten years, but they were allowed to return to Ireland; they cannot offer their citizens to Britain or the United States. Whoever is trying to climb up is kicked Tottenham Three. A number of Irish militants were jailed in Britain for ten years, but they were allowed to return to Ireland. Today you can hear constantly the talk of sanctions against the Hussein government. Without even waiting to ask what the conditions were in our country, he donated $1 million with no strings attached to help in our reconstruction. This is the kind of assistance and solidarity that the people and government of Iraq have been giving to people who have been struggling. Whether you go to southern Africa or Palestine—wherever you go, whatever negative criticism has been made of the Iraqi government—you get the same word from people who are fighting. That the Iraqi government was always willing to assist people struggling for their national liberation. For that reason I visited Iraq in 12/1990. In fact, I left Baghdad two days before the war really began, on probably the last flight out. They had first imposed sanctions in 8/1990. So even at that time, children were already dying because of a lack of medicines. I visited hospitals and saw it. And that was six months into the sanctions and before the war actually began. So you can imagine how after five years, with a tightening of those sanctions, the children of Iraq are suffering. All children have a right to a decent life, all children have a right to benefit from the fruits and resources of their country. What is good for the children of America is also good for the children of Iraq, Iran, Cuba, Vietnam, China, all over the world. Our country got political independence in 1978 after 400 years of colonial rule—Spanish, French, then British. And in that period from the beginning of slavery until 1978, they trained just four doctors. But between 1978 and today, although we have had governments hostile to the Cuban government, Cuba has trained over thirty doctors for Dominica. And Cuba itself has been under sanctions. That is the kind of anti-imperialist solidarity, that is the kind of reaching out and touching people’s lives, that we need in this world. Because the very same budgets that they’re cutting back on the poor people of America, they’re doing the same thing to us in the Third World. So we have a common enemy and a common struggle, and if we do unite, they will pick us off one by one. We have to put our heads together, put our resources together, put our commitment and our lives on the line to ensure that this planet, which we all inherit, will survive the vicissitudes of imperialism and move to be a real democracy with real human solidarity. Because without that we are all doomed. Brothers and sisters, I have had the opportunity to work also in Libya. It is another country under the weight of sanctions because there are two people in Libya the imperialists want for the Lockerbie bombing. The international media have investigated and found that Libya is completely innocent, but the Libyans have still offered to allow these two people to be tried in the International Court of Justice—not in Cuba, not in Iraq, under Sadaam Hussein, but in the Hague. And they refuse. They insist the two must be tried in Britain. Look at the history of justice in Britain. A number of people were killed—the Birmingham Six, the Guildford Four, the Tottenham Three. A number of Irish militants were jailed in Britain for ten to fifteen years only to be told afterwards that in fact they were innocent. The Libyan people cannot offer their citizens to Britain or the United States to be tried in their courts because there is no justice in those courts. And that is why the sanctions against Libya are unconscionable, are immoral, and have to be lifted. When you had what was called the oil windfall, the United States was saying that countries should give 1% of their profits to the poor. But Libya, the country that has given 1% of its gross domestic product to foreign aid. Yet there was a time when Libya gave 27% of its gross domestic product to foreign assistance, to countries fighting for liberation. And it is the only country inside Africa today where you can see what was done with that oil money. At a cost of $25 billion, Qaddafi was able to bring water from... under the Sahara desert to the Mediterranean coast to irrigate land, to conquer the damages of the Sahara, to move towards industry, public health, and a number of projects. The money has gone towards the development of the Libyan economy, and at the same time they gave so much assistance and solidarity to South Africa, to Namibia, to Palestine, to Zimbabwe—you name it. Libya gave assistance. Standing up against sanctions is a struggle that is just, a struggle that is necessary. We came from the battle last weekend, and even with all the problems from the UN, over 15000 foreign students on scholarships studying in Cuba. The will to survive is in the Cuban Revolution, is in Libya, is in Iraq. They’re afraid of those countries because of their stand against imperialism. And brothers and sisters, comrades all, it is not an easy struggle now because of the unbalanced situation in the world, the dominant military power of the United States. But I can tell you that will to survive under conditions of sanctions is burning inside the hearts and minds and souls of the Iraqi people, of the Libyan people, of the Cuban people, and those of us who believe that the Third World is going to continue to struggle. We ask you to stretch out your hands to us so that we can work together as one team. As Maurice Bishop often said, in the Grenadian Revolution, “Forward ever, backward never.” [From speech to New York anti-sanctions forum, 1/20/1996] [a]

24208. International Action Center; et. al.; Benn, Tony. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 74: ‘The rich threaten the poor’ Tony Benn, Member of Parliament, Britain. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The sanctions question has been on the margins of the world political agenda for some years now, but this conference moves it to the center. The way sanctions are being used now is really an act of political and economic warfare without war. But it has the effect of imposing the most terrible suffering, contrary to the Charter of the UN. They have become a threat to the stability of the world political and commercial system. They symbolize the way the UN has frankly been taken over by Washington. I strongly urge your government to take action at the [Security Council] meeting to redress this shameful situation. [From a letter sent to the London embassies of UN Security Council countries, 10/11/1995.] [a]

24209. International Action Center; et. al.; Bonnici, Karmenu Mitsud. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 75: ‘Silence and inaction are complicity’ Karmenu Mitsud Bonnici, Former Prime Minister of Malta. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. It is inconceivable that the United Nations Organization, which is set up to promote the well-being and development of peoples; should itself, through its sanctions, be the cause of the widespread misery and death of so many people, and bring about the economic destruction of countries, the foremost being Iraq. It is morally unbearable that the United Nations Organization, which raises and spends millions of dollars to combat malnutrition, hunger, and disease, should cause hunger, malnutrition, and disease to so many people, the foremost being the Iraqi people. It is ethically unacceptable that the United Nations Organization, which in its Charter professes to express the will of “We, the peoples of the world,” should arrogantly flout our feelings of abhorrence and opposition to the adoption of measures which run counter to and suppress the fundamental human rights of so many people, the foremost being Iraqi children, mothers, and the aged. Our silence and inaction would amount to complicity in the perpetration of the crimes against humanity which the United Nations Organization is committing through its sanctions. If our governments are willing to be accomplices to such crimes against humanity, we, today, through these activities organized on the fifth anniversary of the UN aggression against Iraq, want to be counted as fierce defenders of human rights and moral values, and pledge ourselves to strive to bring about an end to such crimes. [From message to New York anti-sanctions forum, 1/20/1996.] [a] established during the Gulf War by a group of Americans originally from Iraq. It was very clear to us from day one that this war was going to drag on through fighting or sanctions for an indeterminate period of time. But even we were unprepared for the unspeakable violation of human rights, especially towards children. So we decided to establish a nonprofit charitable organization. Little by little we grew to be a major relief organization in the United States supporting the innocent people of Iraq, with the cooperation of the religious or political-affiliated independents, not a favor we do for anyone. I want to paint a picture from inside Iraq, not as a visitor or as someone who comes and goes, but from somebody who has had the chance to really know both societies. My dear friends, what is going on inside Iraq is beyond description. The human degradation, humiliation and feeling have been pushed to the limit. They cannot be documented. A couple of stories have been brought to my attention—not through Peter Jennings or Dan Rather's broadcasts, but by those who were eyewitnesses. They are stories of a people who only a few years ago were the richest nation in the Middle East. Zahraa, a fourteen-year-old girl, was asked by her teacher to stand up to write something on the blackboard. When she reached the board and turned around to face the class, she collapsed. The teacher put some water on her face and she woke up. Asked what was wrong, she said, "It's not my turn to eat today. We are six, we only eat food on alternate days. It's not my turn today." That is one example of how the children of Iraq live. Yesterday I was contacted by a person twenty-five years old who had to sell one of his kidneys for 200000 Iraqi dinars, equivalent to less than seventy-five US dollars. Iraq today is the place to buy body parts. I am from a relatively well-off family, but I've seen my own nephew almost die because he needed asthma medicine. I lost my sister-in-law for the same reason. Every Iraqi has lost loved ones to the ongoing sanctions. These stories go beyond what anyone could really say. If they don't move us to do something, what will? The Iraqis have no way of expressing themselves to the outside world, to explain their point of view, because it's not only sanctions on food and the basic necessities of life, it's a total mass media blockade. It's silent starvation, killing, and murder, but in the middle of the day where all the world is watching silently. What we are doing, basically, is collecting donations for food and medicine to help the most needy and vulnerable. We ask good people all over the United States, especially the Muslim communities, to donate generously to this cause. Thanks to Allah (God), we have had some success. Last year we sent two big shipments of medicine to the north, and one to the south and central regions. We're also distributing basic food, mainly rice and flour, especially during the season of the holy month of Ramadan. We are trying to help them stand on their feet. And we are trying to get the outside world to see that what's happening is simply wrong and violates everything the United States and United Nations stand for. From the few thousand of dollars we were able to collect a few years ago, we have raised more than one million dollars to send medicine and food to those inside Iraq. We have an office in Michigan—our East Coast representative and the board members are here with me—and we are working in Canada, the UK, and Turkey. But what we are doing is but a drop in the bucket compared to the actual need of the people. We are lagging behind in reaching out to the American public at large. We need every bit of help to reach your mosque, church, community center, universities, and everywhere. Americans in general are one of the most generous people, especially when there is an appeal for medicine and food. Many people among you say, keep going, we will support you. We need your help and action to alleviate these inhuman conditions imposed on the innocent children. I hope that with time the American people will become more aware of this tragedy, and realize that every bit of support, no matter how tiny, will make a difference in someone's life. I think we already have made a difference. My heartfelt thanks to the International Action Center. They are performing a beautiful job in helping us. Thank you and may Allah bless you. [From speech to New York anti-sanctions forum, 1/20/1996.] [c]

24211. International Action Center; et. al.; Safwat, Safia. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War; Part 77: 'Iraq complied with UN resolutions' Dr. Safia Safwat, Member of the Permanent Bureau of the Union of Arab Jurists. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. For more than two years, Iraq has been subject to severe sanctions and blockade. The people of Iraq have faced the most intensive and vicious air war campaign in which hundreds of thousands of civilians were killed and the country's telecommunications network. An essential basis for this complex and extensive infrastructure was trade. For example, most of the machinery, as well as the spare parts to keep it running, was obtained from outside the country. Approximately 70% of the food needs of the country were met through imports from abroad. What primarily paid for this level of imports was revenue from the sale of oil. After the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi forces on 8/2/1990, the situation started to change abruptly. From August 6, the Security Council imposed a comprehensive package of financial and economic sanctions (Resolution 661). The war in 1/2/1991 brought about massive destruction in many elements of physical and service infrastructure. Further major damage was created by the civil conflicts that ensued. A final factor was the economic and financial sanctions imposed on Iraq, including the freezing of its foreign assets and a ban on the international sale of its oil. Numerous reports of international missions have indicated the size of destruction caused to Iraq as a result of the war and the imposition of economic blockade and sanctions. These reports have also explained the suffering and hardship they caused to the population. Despite the unjust and arbitrary nature of the United Nations resolutions on sanctions and other resolutions, Iraq has met the obligations imposed, namely, those which relate to the economic embargo. However, although all this has been done, the state of the iniquitous embargo imposed on Iraq remains unchanged. Among the important early reports on the effect of sanctions are: (1) the call by the UN Secretary General for an urgent humanitarian plan in 4/1991; (2) Under Secretary General Martti Ahtisaari's report in 5/1991; (3) the report of the Harvard Medical Team in 5/1991; (4) Sadruddin Aga Khan's report in 7/1991; (5) the report by the International Committee of the Red Cross in 10/1991; and (6) the report by the General Federation of Iraqi Women in 11/1992. All these reports have pointed out severe shortages in clean drinking water, destruction and stoppage of the sewage systems due to the total collapse of electricity power supply, which resulted in spread of disease causing dire consequences among the population and in particular among the infants, sick, and old people.

During the Gulf crisis the Security Council issued twenty-four resolutions in one case, an unprecedented matter even in far more serious circumstances. The said resolutions were passed with a great deal of haste, one after the other without giving any time to see the results of each resolution. For instance, Resolution 660 demanding Iraq withdraw from Kuwait and hold immediate negotiations with Kuwait was passed on the evening of 8/2/1990, and was followed on August 6 by Resolution 661 determining that, as Iraq had failed to comply with Resolution 660, it thereby imposed a total blockade on Iraq. At this stage the issue of negotiations between Iraq and Kuwait has been completely forgotten. The swiftness with which the Security Council's resolutions were drafted and passed gave the impression that such resolutions had been prepared in advance—especially as the United States carried out the task of drafting them and even announced them before the Security Council.
Council did. Further, the resolutions have deliberately opted to employ the severest provisions available. The said resolutions as measures designed for restoration of international peace and security in the area failed to observe the conditions of reasonableness and proportionality required by the UN Charter. Moreover, the parties involved in their adoption and implementation did not enjoy impartiality. Resolution 678 included violations of the UN Charter inasmuch as it authorized member states cooperating with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council Resolution 660. In spite of these violations, let us assume for the moment that these resolutions were fully within the Security Council's legal capacity and in exercise of its powers according to the United Nations Charter. Going back to Resolution 661 passed on 8/6/1990, we find that it had relied on one reason: the noncompliance of Iraq with Resolution 660 demanding it withdraw from Kuwait. The Council relied on the same reason to pass its subsequent Resolutions 665 on August 25 and 678 on November 29. It is clear therefore that the imposition of economic sanctions against Iraq was designed to achieve the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and Iraq's compliance with the resolution in this respect. Such a measure should therefore have ended with the end of the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. Further, in spite of this striking paradox and grave injustice inflicted upon it, Iraq has complied with its obligations under the resolution despite its arbitrary nature. In addition, Iraq has complied with Resolution 687 demands that it reaffirm its obligation under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and other treaties restricting the production of chemical and other mass destruction weapons, yet the sanctions have remained in place. It is evident that no matter what Iraq does in fulfillment of its obligations under the Security Council resolutions, the unjust sentence passed by the Council to starve the people of Iraq and deny them the right to life continues, simply because this is the will of certain influential governments in the Council; the very same will that was behind the drafting and adoption of the Council's resolutions, the will that was and continues to be behind the unjust manner in which Iraq has been treated in both intentions and deeds. The post-war attack on central Baghdad by cruise missiles on 1/15/1993, which resulted in deaths of innocent civilians, is yet another proof not only that sanctions are designed to continue but also of the constant threat of aggression against Iraq and its people. [From speech before the British Commission of Inquiry of the IWCT, House of Commons, London, 2/10/1993.]

24212. International Action Center; et. al.; Stephens, Hugh. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As A Weapon on War; Part 7B: A wave of Security Council blockades" Hugh Stephens, Coordinator of the International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Following the Gulf crisis and war of 1990-1991, we in Britain worked to support the call issued by Ramsey Clark, former US Attorney General, to indict the US government and its allies for war crimes in provoking this war, in waging it in a criminal manner, and in extending it through the use of the blockade on Iraq. This work took the form of an International War Crimes Tribunal on US and Allied War Crimes in the Gulf, and in the course of our work in this country, we held public hearings in London, Manchester, Birmingham, Nottingham and Bradford. These proceedings were submitted to an International Hearing in New York. Since then I have worked with a number of public figures and other concerned people to carry forward its work in the form of the International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions. This project is now gaining recognition, and next month we shall hold a major international event here in London. In the fifty years since the inception of the United Nations there have been ten instances of economic sanctions imposed by its Security Council. Eight have been during the 1990s. The fact that this new wave of blockades has been a feature of only the past five years has led to a situation where it is only slowly and belatedly that the enormity of their violation of all legal, humanitarian and other norms of international behavior is becoming exposed. To help remedy this situation is a central task of our Commission. These sanctions have transgressed the recognized human rights and freedoms enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) and subsequently reiterated and confirmed by numerous international and regional agreements up to and including the Vienna Declaration on Human Rights (1993). These sanctions in addition violate international humanitarian norms as expounded in the Geneva Conventions of 1949, and other conventions which outlaw collective punishment and reprisals affecting innocent civilians, as well as the principle of proportionality in international law, which demands that the damage incurred by civilians is proportionate to the damage incurred in the area of military operation. The principle also intertwines with internal affairs, freedom of navigation, freedom of international trade, sovereignty over natural resources, and international norms relating to migrant workers, etc. The embargoes not only violate in this way the system of international law and norms which has been so earnestly fought for, but also violate the standards of behavior set by the relevant international organizations such as the WHO, FAO, UNESCO, UNICEF, and UNHCR. These organizations, like the United Nations itself, have at various times and in various ways been fought for and utilized by the Non-Aligned Movement and other forces which manifest the independence struggle of the developing countries. To raise the question of these violations of international law and standards by the Security Council of the United Nations is not to campaign against the United Nations or indeed to call for a revision of its Charter. On the contrary, it is to rally to the defense of the United Nations and help rescue it from disrepute and disintegration. These sanctions bring to bear on the credibility of the United Nations and indeed also on the credibility of regional organizations such as the Arab League, the Organization of African Unity, the Organization of American States, etc. All have, like the United Nations, played a role in the defense of the state sovereignty of the countries of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, and all have seen their standing and effectiveness corroded by the existence of these blockades. The current embargoes have involved the arbitrary use by the Security Council of the United Nations of Chapter VII of the UN Charter, which is designed to be used only in emergencies with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression. The fact that four years had elapsed before Chapter VII was invoked against Libya over the Lockerbie incident illustrates the degree to which not only the spirit but even the letter of the United Nations Charter is violated in these cases. In contrast, there is a conspicuous lack of use of Chapter VI of the United Nations Charter which would have brought to the fore the use of pacific means of dispute settlement—procedures such as negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means. Even the most general principles of law are violated in the case of these sanctions. For example, despite the fact that the universal principle of "innocent until proved guilty" is recognized in the systems of law of the various individual states as well as in the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice and other competent international tribunals, the Security Council has blatantly violated this principle in its repeated demands made on Libya to make reparations to the US, UK, and France for alleged terrorist actions without any legal proceedings having taken place whatsoever. We hear much, of course, of the exceptions or exemptions supposedly existing in the application of the sanctions, namely medical and other humanitarian goods. In fact, of course, if a country's entire supply system is totally disrupted—its market, its foreign trade and its communications and transport—then to claim that humanitarian supplies are exempted is to add insult to injury. It is clear, in short, that these sanctions have increasingly become an instrument for the imposition of the foreign policy goals of a small number of big powers rather than an instrument for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. In this respect sanctions represent a continuation of the policy of unilateral sanctions imposed by the US, notably its embargo on Cuba which has continued for over 30 years and the undeclared embargo to which the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (north Korea) has, in effect, been subjected by the US since 1953. Their goals at various times have included isolating China and preventing the expansion of the socialist camp, securing control of the oil resources of the Gulf and the Indian Ocean waterways, and now, in the case of the former Yugoslavia, gaining control of the roads, waterways, and communications in general in that strategic part of Europe. We should in addition call for the United Nations to establish a mechanism for paying compensation for the damage inflicted in contravention of its own charter and of international law generally damage which has taken years to repair. Lost revenue, however calculated, is only one rather simple criterion, which clearly provides only the crudest reflection of the material damage to a country which has seen the total disruption of the economic and cultural development of a whole generation. We may nevertheless recall that Iraq could have benefited from its $25 billion in foreign reserves. After these 4 million barrels of oil a day were cut, the value of which would now be around $131 billion. I urge those present never to assume that the principles of international law and other norms of international behavior are wellknown and propagated and that somehow, some other body somewhere will heed them. This is far from our experience. Indeed, the actions of the Security Council of the United Nations rely precisely on vagueness and indeterminacy. It remains up to us, to popular pressure groups and campaigns, to demand that these principles be upheld—principles which were achieved by the weak and poor countries of the world in their struggle to establish independence from the big powers, and which are thus part of the legacy of all who work for peace and justice in the world. I propose that this meeting has the status of a Preliminary Public Hearing of the British Commission of Inquiry, and that its proceedings be submitted to the Presidency of our Commission. [From speech to a meeting of Third World Solidarity and the Non-Adjusted Students & Youth Organization, London, 7/20/1995.][=]

24213. International Action Center; et. al.; Aziz, Barbara Nimri. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 79: ‘In 1994, economy ground to a halt’ Barbara Nimri Aziz, Writer, Broadcast Journalist. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. As the United Nations trade embargo against Iraq enters its fourth year, the country’s economy is slowly grinding to a halt. “This is as bad as the bombing; it is a slow death,” laments a once comfortable woman in Baghdad, who is now unemployed. Food and medicine, despite being exempt from the embargo, are in dangerously short supply, Iraqi doctors say. Industry and agriculture are limping along with broken or jerry-rigged machinery desperately in need of raw materials and spare parts—tractors need tires and farmers need pesticides. “Lack of spare parts cripples all industry: health, agriculture, or transport,” says a medical doctor, who, like almost all Iraqis, requested anonymity. The impact of sanctions, which were imposed after Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait in 1990, has been exacerbated by the country’s heavy dependence on oil revenues and food imports before the Gulf War. Three years ago, Iraq had a modern economy built on oil sales, which accounted for 90% of its hard currency revenues. The Baath government did not permit dissent, but provided its 18 million people with national health care, school meals, overseas training, housing, and electricity. After the war, Iraq astonished many observers with its aggressive reconstruction campaign. Within months of the cease-fire, the government had restored electricity and 50% of water supplies. It rebuilt bridges and roads; repaired damaged hospitals; reopened schools; and started a nationwide food-rationing program. But many state-run programs were shelved as the embargo began to bite. And imports such as medicine could not be replaced. “Our doctors and modern hospitals cannot function without medicines, and those, Iraq cannot supply,” says Deputy Health Minister Showki Marcus. He notes that “although the UN embargo does not apply to the purchase of medicines, foreign drug companies are unwilling or forbidden by their individual governments to sell to Iraq, even where we paid in advance.” Dr. Marcus dismisses present, emergency medical aid. “It amounts to barely 5% of our needs,” he says. In the past, Iraq imported $500 million annually in pharmaceuticals. Food is also scarce in part because of a prewar dependence on imports. During the 1980s, the country used its oil revenues to buy food imports at the expense of developing its agricultural policy—by necessity. Farmers, for example, are offered bonuses to expand arable land and grow cash crops. At the same time, however, Iraqi officials charge that the UN has sabotaged food programs by preventing farmers from spraying crops by plane and blocking the import of animal vaccines. Last winter’s abundant wheat crop in the Mosul region brought temporary relief. “It may stave off famine—this year,” says a householder, echoing the widespread belief that only lifting the embargo can save the country. A 1993 UNICEF report, which the United Nations funded but has since disclaimed because it faults the direct link drawn between health statistics and sanctions in Iraq, found that hunger is growing and disease increasing. The unpublished report cites multifaceted increases in low-weight births as country imported food items into the country. Government officials admitted that during the previous years, the value of which would now be around $131 billion. I urge those present never to assume that the principles of international law and other norms of international behavior are wellknown and propagated and that somehow, some other body somewhere will heed them. This is far from our experience. Indeed, the actions of the Security Council of the United Nations rely precisely on vagueness and indeterminacy. It remains up to us, to popular pressure groups and campaigns, to demand that these principles be upheld—principles which were achieved by the weak and poor countries of the world in their struggle to establish independence from the big powers, and which are thus part of the legacy of all who work for peace and justice in the world. I propose that this meeting has the status of a Preliminary Public Hearing of the British Commission of Inquiry, and that its proceedings be submitted to the Presidency of our Commission. [From speech to a meeting of Third World Solidarity and the Non-Adjusted Students & Youth Organization, London, 7/20/1995.][=]

24214. International Action Center; et. al.; Becker, Richard. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 80: ‘Sanctions are collective punishment’ Richard Becker, Co-Coordinator. International Action Center, San Francisco, New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. A modest article in the 1/8/1996, edition of the San Francisco Examiner revealed a very startling fact: On 6/27/1980, a joint NATO squadron of US and French jets shot down a civilian Italian airliner over the Mediterranean. All eighty-one people aboard were killed. The US and French jets were trying to ambush a plane carrying President Muammar Qaddafi of Libya. This was six years before the US/NATO bombing of Libya, allegedly in retaliation for an explosion in a nightclub in West Germany, which itself was later blamed on someone else. This 1980 shoot-down was covered up by the Italian, US, and French governments. The downing of the plane was attributed to a “terrorist bomb.” And it was a terrorist attack—a state terrorist act by the US and France. Shouldn’t the French and US governments be subject to sanctions for this act? As well as for the 1986 bombing of Libya in violation of all international law? But today Libya is under severe sanctions. It is barred from all international air traffic. No planes can fly into or out of Libya, allegedly because the government won’t turn over to Britain and the US two accused suspects in the Lockerbie, Scotland, downing of a airliner. Shouldn’t air traffic in and out of the US and France now be halted, until those responsible for the downing down of the Italian airliner are brought to justice? But France and the US are permanent members of the UN Security Council. That’s not who sanctions were designed for. No such resolution will be brought before the Council—no allegations of war crimes, crimes against humanity, crimes against peace. Yet all of these were committed, not only against Libya, but of course far more extensively in Iraq. The InternationalAppeals to End Sanctions says: “Economic sanctions and blockades are a weapon of mass destruction directed at a whole people. These blockades have been used only against poor countries.” A blockade, attempting to shut off another country’s trade, has always been understood as an act of war. Iraq today is suffering from probably the most total isolation of any country in modern history, under the polite term “sanctions.” Before the war, Iraq sold highgrade oil on the world market, using a large part of the earnings for development that benefitted the people (unlike the oil-rich USpuppet emirates). It purchased 70% of its food and 65% of its medicine on the world market. Iraq developed widely respected health care, education, and social welfare systems based on oil exports. Today Iraq can export nothing and so can no longer buy the raw materials, food, medicine, and other products needed to sustain economic life. Relief efforts, no matter how vigorous, can supply at most 5% of the country’s needs, according to the relief agencies themselves. So, Iraq is starving, the people of Iraq are starving. Maybe Madeleine Albright and Warren Christopher and Bill Clinton aren’t aware of what their insistence on the continuation of sanctions means? But, of course, they are more than aware. Because this is not a new tactic. In 1919, then President Woodrow Wilson said in Versailles: "The one who chooses this economic, peaceful, quiet, lethal remedy will not have to resort to force. It is not such a painful remedy. It doesn't take a single human life outside the country exposed to boycott, but instead subjects that country to a pressure that, in my view, no modern nations can withstand." Of course, we have seen US embargoes and blockades imposed on China, Korea, Cuba, Chile, Libya, Vietnam, Iran in 1953 and again in 1979, Nicaragua, and other countries that dared to rebel to end the domination of the US. Particularly for the smaller countries, great devastation was done to their attempts to develop and provide for the needs of their people. Nixon and Kissinger vowed to make Chile scream. Reagan swore he would make the Sandinistas say "uncle." The US-sponsored Contra war killed 75000 Nicaraguans outright and impoverished this nation of only 4 million people. In both cases, economic destruction paved the way for overthrowing their governments. It is sometimes said, citing South Africa, that sanctions can be used in a progressive way. But the divestment campaign called for by the mass organizations was very different. The apartheid regime was never subject to a blockade.

In the last few years, the use of this weapon of economic warfare has accelerated. What is new about the use of sanctions in this post-Cold War period? Until recently, blockaded countries like Cuba could turn to the Soviet Union and the socialist bloc. Western blockades hurt, but they could survive. That option no longer exists for the developing countries. It was removed with the destruction of the Soviet Union—which was also accomplished to a very large degree by economic warfare plus a trillion-dollar arms race. In this new period, the US corporate/Pentagon establishment is moving very quickly to establish and reinforce its domination in key regions of the world. For the developing countries this often takes the form of an offer they can't refuse. Accept the dictates of Washington or face the starvation and slow death of your people, especially the very young, the elderly, the sick. And/or military attack. They've always gone hand in hand. The blockade against Iraq is enforced today by naval, ground and air forces, twenty-four hours a day. Those who have not fully accepted the new world order, joined the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade or the North American Free Trade Association, allowed US bases if requested, accepted the International Monetary Fund/World Bank plans to cut food subsidies, privatize, and turn their economies into subsidiaries of USA, Inc., are subjected to a familiar formula. First their leaders are vilified and demonized in the mass media. They are a "new Hitler," or "drug runners," or "violators of human rights," or "war criminals." Of course, this is never applied to the leaders of Saudi Arabia, or Turkey, or Guatemala. It is never, never applied to the leaders of the US, who killed millions in Vietnam, or the French who killed over a million in Algeria, or the British on whose empire the sun never set. All this is done in the name of defending human rights. But how can those who kill millions with sanctions be defenders of human rights? Human rights were also used as the justification for securing and extending US domination in the part of the world that they consider most vital: the Middle East with two-thirds of the world's petroleum reserves. In the past year when we have been fighting the Contract on America, which means to deprive millions of poor people of food, housing, and health care, people have often asked, "How can these politicians do this?" The answer is that they've had a lot of practice on people around the world, and they and the corporate interests they represent don't have any more regard for people here than there. It is of critical importance for the anti-war and progressive movement to make an analysis of the current strategy of imperialism. During the Gulf War, there was a division in the anti-war movement. One side said, "Let the sanctions work." Well, we have seen just how they do work. Three or four times as many Iraqis have died from sanctions as from the bombing. Sanctions are an instrument of war and often an instrument of genocide. They must be opposed as a collective punishment of a whole people, a crime against humanity, not just in Iraq or Cuba, but anywhere. The focus of this meeting is, as it should be, on ending the blockade against Iraq.

That is the greatest human rights violation in the world carried out in the name of sanctions. At the same time, we as a movement need to be prepared for new situations. When we see this government and the corporate media raising the need for sanctions against Azerbaijan, or China, or Nigeria, or Yugoslavia, whatever the justification given, we will say NO! End the sanctions! [From speech to San Francisco anti-sanctions forum, 1/21/1996.]
big problem, since most water systems were destroyed or made dysfunctional during the war. The water of Baghdad is reported to be 10% contaminated and potable water is available to less than half the rural population of the country, whereas before the war 95% was potable. The social structure of Iraqi society is disintegrating. The people are destitute. This was not the case before the sanctions. The strong middle class of the seventies and eighties is being wiped out. Poverty and desperation are increasing. In order to survive the trip from Jordan, Babil, Baghdad, and the blockade doesn't extend to medical equipment and supplies, but, in fact, few of those items actually get through. The sanctions have closed air and sea routes, so all imports must make the 500-mile trip through the desert from Amman, usually strapped to a dusty roof or stashed in the trunk of a dilapidated taxi or bus alongside a leaky, makeshift spare fuel tank. Under the best circumstances, the sixteen-hour trip can be fatal to sensitive vaccines or antibiotics that need refrigeration. Even if Iraq succeeds in obtaining their permission from the United Nations to transport them within the country, a procedure that can take months and is sometimes denied, depending on the substance. Several years ago Iraq asked for permission to import from Britain about $150000 worth of Angised tablets, a common medication containing glyceryl trinitrate that's used to reduce the risk of heart attack in angina patients. Prior to the war, Iraq bought about three times that amount of Angised each year. After months had passed with no response, a company official finally wrote the Iraqi health ministry saying that the British government had refused to issue the necessary export license. The official said he had tried to explain that glyceryl trinitrates are not banned under UN sanctions. But he said the government informed him that their rejection of the export license was London's decision and not that of the UN Sanctions Committee. Eventually, Iraq was told that the refusal was based on the fact that glyceryl trinitrate could be used in the manufacture of explosives—the same reason given for prohibiting radionuclides used to scan for cancer; the same reason that's given for banning pencils. Before the Gulf War, Iraq spent $500 million a year to import medicine.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

-------------------

24216. International Action Center; et. al.: Casa, Kathryn. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 82: 'A timelbomb depleted uranium' Kathryn Casa, Journalist. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Five years after the Gulf War, we've heard a lot of debate about who won. The British are unhappy because the conflict didn't spark sales of British military equipment as it did for US weapons. Americans—when they think of the war at all—are unsure what to make of it. Was it the resounding allied military victory we were told it was? Did it put that bad taste of Vietnam definitively behind us? The Gulf War did turn a decisive corner. It was the conflict that pioneered and guaranteed a place for a dangerous radioactive poison now commonplace in so-called conventional weapons around the world. It was the war that resulted in UN agencies created to protect human life abandoning or selectively carrying out their mandates. It was a war that killed children, women, the elderly—and that killing has not stopped. Last spring during a trip to Iraq, I visited a children's hospital in Baghdad. The doctors there work twelve-hour shifts seven days a week. They have been unable to read current medical journals or books for five years. But those are among the least of their worries. About 150 new patients a day are admitted to this hospital, virtually each one showing signs of rickets. It's the result of a simple vitamin D deficiency in an infant's diet that leads to inadequate bone growth in children. Most of the new patients have diarrhea and vomiting and need intravenous fluid, but with just five IV lines on the ward, only the most serious cases can be treated. The others must be treated orally. Often they can't tolerate it, and they vomit more. If a needle is inserted in the vein, the mother must keep her hand over it and not let the baby move until it's finished. There is a critical shortage of nurses—I didn't see one on the entire ward—so mothers usually must leave other children at home to stay with the one who is hospitalized. They sleep and eat on the floor next to their children, who are often housed two to a bed, with up to eight beds in a room. The shortages in Iraq extend to all types of medicine and equipment. At the hospital I visited, all the oxygen tents are ripped. But that's beside the point, since the three oxygen tanks on the pediatrics ward had broken two years before. Windows are missing from most of the incubators, and mothers stand near the ones with broken thermometers, making sure the devices don't overheat with their infants inside them. With jaundice on the rise, the hospital doesn't have the blood transfusers necessary to treat severe cases. Left unchecked, the ailment can lead to epilepsy and brain damage. In one room was a young woman standing over her child who lay listlessly on a dirty sheet, too weak to do much more than whimper, his abdomen swollen to the size of a large melon. This incredibly tiny, four-month-old baby boy dressed in an old yellow cotton slip, with no diaper on, with an IV in his head, and flies crawling in and out of his eyes and mouth—this little Iraqi, whose country sits atop some of the largest known oil reserves in the world—was starving to death.

The malnutrition among Iraqi children is exacerbated by a lack of vaccines, antibiotics, and clean drinking water, since chlorine is banned under the sanctions. According to UNICEF's own, admittedly outdated, statistics, there has been a dramatic rise in the number of deaths of Iraqi children under five. Birth weights have dropped significantly and there have been sharp increases over the past five years in typhoid fever, diabetes, giardiasis, scabies, cholera, and viral hepatitis. In theory, the under the age of five. Magnesium occurs naturally in the human body. Added to DU to make it burn faster, it allows the stuff to move freely throughout the body, crossing organs, including the placenta. This could explain the increase in reported miscarriages and birth defects among the children of those exposed. As time goes by, the depleted uranium is expected to become even more apparent with the increased likelihood of cancer as the oxide particles lodge themselves in the lungs. Those who managed to avoid ingestion of DU during the actual battles are still not safe. A child who collects a spent DU shell weighing, for example, two thirds of a pound, and holds the shell close to the body for one hour, would receive the equivalent of fifty chest X-rays. Last May, Iraq complained to the United Nations that the widespread use of DU was causing serious illness and death among Iraqi civilians and that "balling pathological cases have appeared." The US Army itself carried out a major review of the health and environmental effects of used depleted-uranium weapons after the British Atomic Energy Agency warned of dangerous contamination of battlefields and after Washington determined that Army personnel had been inadequately trained to handle DU weapons. Yet at the same time, proliferation of these weapons continues. DU weapons are right now being deployed in Bosnia. Besides the United States and Britain, countries known to have developed or to be in the process of developing weapons containing DU include Russia, Turkey, Pakistan, Thailand, France, and Israel. Washington has sold these weapons to Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, among others. Meanwhile, on the front lines of this five-year-old war are the children, their parents, and the doctors I met, who are armed with little but the ability to stand by and watch as children die. Like many people, I don't know who won the Gulf War. But I have met those who lost it, and their eyes reflected back at me the other losers—all of us who allow this war to continue. [From speech to San Francisco anti-sanctions forum, 12/1/1996] [ ]

24217. FAO; International Action Center; et al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 06: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Executive Summary: New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. [ACRONYMS AND ABBREVIATIONS: CARE: an NGO operating in Iraq; EMOP: Emergency Operations Programmes (World Food Programme); GOI: Government of Iraq; ID: Iraqi dinar; IMR: infant mortality rate; ITI: Impact Teams International; MOH: Ministry of Health; NGO: non-governmental organization; NRC: Nutrition Rehabilitation Centre; PDK: Democratic Party of Kurdistan; PKK: Kurdish Workers' Party; PUC: Patriotic Union of Kurdistan; SD: social deviation; UNDP: United Nations Development Programme; UNICEF: United Nations Childrens Fund; UNIRCU: United Nations Iraq Coordination Unit; WFP: World Food Programme; WHO: World Health Organization.] An FAO Mission visited Iraq from 7/25-9/1/1995 with the task of investigating the nutritional status of the population and assessing the crop and food availability situation which prevailed after the imposition of an embargo in 1990. The Mission received full cooperation from the staff of UN agencies (UNICEF, UNDP, WFP, WHO) based in Baghdad and elsewhere in the country and from the government agencies and NGOs involved in food and nutrition activities. The Mission travelled extensively in various parts of the country including the Northern Governorates, visited health, agricultural and food distribution facilities, interviewed farmers and concerned professionals and carried out independent market surveys for a cross sectional assessment of food availability and market prices. With the cooperation of the Nutrition Research Institute of the Ministry of Health, the Mission conducted a survey in Baghdad to assess the nutritional status and mortality of children under-five years of age. The Mission also reviewed existing and available data on foodproduction, food consumption, food availability and nutrition and health status obtained from a wide range of governmental, UN and NGO sources. The estimated total population of Iraq is 20.7 million with 42% being aged less than 14 years. The population is mainly urban (71%) and has an annual growth rate of 2.7%.

Adult literacy is high (95%) and there are 22 Universities and Institutes of Higher Education. Until 1990 there were very significant advances in the provision of health care and major construction projects gave the country a first class range of medical facilities both in large towns and through a series of clinics in rural areas. As a result of these improvements infant mortality rate (IMR) had declined to a value of about 40 per 1000 live births by the late 1980s. The Iraqi economy was dominated by the oil sector from the early 1950s until the major cessation of exports in 1990. During this period there was improving prosperity for the vast majority of the population. With the embargo on oil exports (except for limited sales to Jordan) economic decline has proceeded rapidly over the last several years and is reflected by the exchange rate of the US$ which currently (8/1995) is in the order of 1 US$ = 2000 Iraqi dinars (ID). This decline has precipitated severe problems throughout the whole country which were described by earlier missions in 1993 as demonstrating pre-famine conditions. The agricultural sector has been given high priority by the government to ensure food security through greater self-sufficiency. However, there continues to be a high dependence on imported foods which is increasing. Following the Gulf war, the country is now divided into two regions: the Government of Iraq (GOI) consisting of 15 governorates and the North composed of the Governorates of Erbil, Dohuk and Suleimanya. [ =] 24218. FAO; International Action Center; et al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 07: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Executive Summary: Crop Production and Food Availability. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Cereal production for 1994/95 has been estimated at 2.5 million tons, about 10% lower than last year and about 16% lower than the average harvest of the previous 5 years. Moreover, the consumable output of wheat, which accounts for about half of the cereal output, is further reduced by the presence of high levels of non-grain impurities. To reflect this the conversion ratio of wheat into flour has been reduced to 80%. It was earlier forecast that the cereal output in 1994/95 would increase relative to the previous year; but, in spite of good performance of the rainfall and efforts of the government and international organizations, severe constraints relating to agricultural machinery, particularly nonavailability of essential replacements and spare parts, good seeds, fertilizers, pesticides, and herbicides has resulted in a decline in output. Livestock, poultry and fish subsectors also suffer from severe setbacks because of shortages of machinery, equipment, spare parts and essential drugs. The shortages of basic foods are enormous. Rough calculations show that an amount of US$ 2.7 billion would be necessary to import basic foods to meet the shortages anticipated for 1995/96. In view of such food shortages, there is a renewed emphasis on the production of vegetables and fruits to supplement other food items. The production of vegetables, however, remains rather limited. The output of dates is about the same as last year but better than the average of the last few years. Very little is now exported and dates are widely used as asupplementary food. Prices of basic foodstuffs have risen phenomenally. For example, the price of wheat flour in 8/1995 is 11667 times higher than in 7/1990 and 33 times higher than in 6/1993. The increases are in the order of 4000-5000 times in the case of several other items compared to 7/1990 and 30-60 times compared to 6/1993. On the other hand, household incomes have virtually collapsed for a large majority of the people (about 70%). The average civil service emoluments are ID 5000/month and unskilled in various parts of the country including the Northern Govemorates, 5000 times in the case of several other items compared to 7/1990 and involved in food and nutrition activities. The Mission travelled extensively 33 times higher  than in 6/1993. The increases are in the order of 4000-vulnerable groups, both in terms of quantities supplied and the number of people served. Only if donors adequately respond can WFP provide food assistance to the targeted groups. Due to lack of supplies, WFP could not provide any food assistance in south and central Iraq during 6/8-1995 and in the north during August. People in institutions and hospitals are given priority and now being served the allocated amount. The situation of famine has been prevented largely by an efficient public rationing system which provides a minimum food basket to all with the Basrah area (1 million population) being the most serious. The basic reason is the lack of spare parts for a variety of equipment throughout the system which cannot be purchased without foreign exchange. In addition specific Sanctions Committee approval is also required for most of the items. Overall the situation concerning sewage disposal in Basrah has deteriorated even further since 1993. Given these difficulties, the whole system is unsustainable and its collapse will have disastrous consequences for a significant majority of Iraqi people.

24219. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As A Weapon on War: Part 08: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Executive Summary: Nutrition and Health: New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. As noted above, catastrophe in the Republic of Iraq has been avoided by the widespread availability of the Government food ration. This, however, provides only about one-third of the food energy and protein availability when compared to 1987/89. The ration, moreover, is deficient in a number of minerals and vitamins especially iron and vitamins A and C. Animal protein is also lacking, and hence such a cereal based diet is deficient in lysine. All additional nutritional needs must be provided at market prices which are beyond the means of most families. For children less than 1 year of age the monthly ration (1800 g baby milk) provides about one-half of needs for food energy and protein and a somewhat higher proportion of minerals and vitamins because of the fortification present in such products. Since 1993 the situation has become much worse for the majority of the population, with malnutrition, including undernutrition and micronutrient deficiencies, commonly seen both in hospitals and in the general population. Both marasmus and kwashiorkor were widely observed in paediatric wards throughout the country and presented many of the classically recognized signs such as pedal oedema for kwashiorkor and severe wasting, especially visible in the ribs and limbs together with "old man faces" for marasmus. The monthly average number of cases of kwashiorkor and marasmus has increased 50 fold since 1989 while the monthly average number of deaths (denominators unspecified) for children under five years has increased nearly 8 fold. These data were provided by Iraq and were unable to be confirmed by the Mission. In view, however, of the malnutrition observed, the health hazards in the water supply, the degree of inflation throughout the period and hence the inability of many to purchase food together with the decline in the overall health care system, these data are plausible. Vitamin A deficiency showing Bitot's spots and xerophthalmia was reported from a number of centres. The frequency of observation remains low but any evidence of clinical vitamin A deficiency must be taken seriously. An increasing prevalence of iron deficiency anaemia was observed in both children and pregnant women. Increased availability of iron supplementation programs is recommended. In the present circumstances flour fortification with iron as well as other micronutrients such as calcium, thiamine, niacin and lysine, while desirable is impractical given the limited resources and deteriorating infrastructure. Distribution of anthelmintic drugs would potentially reduce the burden of anaemia in the population. While food is readily available in markets the purchasing power of the average Iraqi has declined, especially for the salaried civil servants and pensioners. The Ministry of Health estimates that 109720 persons have died annually between 1990-3/1994 as a direct result of sanctions. The Mission had no way of confirming this figure. Famine has been avoided by the widespread availability of the Government food ration. This Government ration is not available in the northern region and all food there must be purchased on the open market. For this and for a number of additional reasons which include factional fighting, the decline in external assistance, high prices and many previous government employees not receiving salaries, child malnutrition is also widespread in the North. The water and sanitation system remains critical throughout the country and presented many of the classically recognized signs such as pedal oedema for kwashiorkor and severe wasting, especially visible in the ribs and limbs together with "old man faces" for marasmus. The parallel problems of waterlogging and salinity of agricultural land with consequent reduction in water supply and sewage system is a significant factor associated with both malnutrition and excess infant mortality. The parallel problems of waterlogging and salinity of agricultural land with consequent reduction in the area available for food production should be noted. The interaction between nutrition and sanitation is such that poor water quality and sanitation are contributory causes to both growth failure and acute malnutrition requiring hospitalization in children. The lack of capital for repair and updating of the water supply and sewage system is a significant factor associated with both malnutrition and excess infant mortality. The parallel problems of waterlogging and salinity of agricultural land with consequent reduction in the area available for food production should be noted. The causes relating to lack of spare parts for pumps and equipment are identical. The food industry was returned to the private sector in 1990 but despite this, total production is only a fraction of the earlier level. This is due to a variety of causes including nonavailability of both raw and packaging materials as well as restrictions on the use of sugar in manufacturing. It has generally been more profitable to import products from the cheapest of these areas were grossly unhygienic and much of the city smelled badly as a result of these overflows. This of course produces severe hazards to health which can seriously influence nutritional status in children. Under these circumstances it was not surprising that there were many cases of infectious diseases including typhoid fever and infective hepatitis in the hospitals as well as widespread gastroenteritis in the hot summer months and in consequence many cases of nutritional marasmus. What remains surprising, however, is that the city has been able to avoid major epidemics in the presence of these very bad sanitary conditions.

In contrast to the general deterioration in sewage disposal, water availability may have marginally improved with the very large number of strategically sited water tanks throughout the city where drinking water is sold. Despite the slight increase in availability of potable water, the quality for the piped water supply remains poor with 65% of samples failing either microbiological or mineral purity tests. While these descriptions are for Basrah, similar problems exist in many towns and cities throughout the country including Baghdad. The hazards of water supply and sewage disposal are thus nationwide and the effects on health are serious. As an example government statistical office figures show 1819 cases of typhoid fever in 1989; this had risen to 24436 cases in 1994. Similarly there were no reported cases of cholera in 1989 but 1345 cases were recorded in 1994. The interaction between nutrition and sanitation is such that poor water quality and sanitation are contributory causes to both growth failure and acute malnutrition requiring hospitalization in children. The lack of capital for repair and updating of the water supply and sewage system is a significant factor associated with both malnutrition and excess infant mortality. The parallel problems of waterlogging and salinity of agricultural land with consequent reduction in the area available for food production should be noted. The causes relating to lack of spare parts for pumps and equipment are identical. The food industry was returned to the private sector in 1990 but despite this, total production is only a fraction of the earlier level. This is due to a variety of causes including nonavailability of both raw and packaging materials as well as restrictions on the use of sugar in manufacturing. It has generally been more profitable to import products from the cheapest sources which are often past their expiration dates or declared unfit for human consumption. One of the few growth areas in production is date syrup which, because of the nonavailability of sugar for sweets, is sold widely as a substitute for jams and preserves. Additional problems for food production from small manufacturers in the private sector lie in poor quality control and the use of non-food grade materials for food use. The latter can include emulsifiers, thickeners, dyes, and other chemicals. Regulations are unable to be enforced and very real food safety hazards exist. Adequate mechanisms for food safety need to be reestablished although it is recognised that these will have low priority in relation to the paramount needs of supplying food energy to the population. The 1995 Baghdad nutrition and mortality survey of children under-five years of age, conducted between August 23 to 28, was a collaborative effort between the FAO Mission and the Nutrition Research Institute (NRI), part of the Ministry of Health. Six hundred and ninety-three households were visited and 768 mothers were interviewed. Information was collected on 2,120 children under 10 years of age, and a total of 594 children under-five years of age were measured for anthropometry. Percentiles and Z-scores for height-for-age, weight-for-age and weight-for-height were calculated using EPI-info, version 6. Malnutrition was defined as the percentage of children less than -2 standard deviations (SD) below the median values for the NCHS (United States National Centre for Health Statistics) standardized distributions for the indicators: stunted (height-for-age), underweight (weight-for-age) and wasted (weight-for-height). The percentage of children below -2 SD in urban Baghdad was 28% for stunting, 29% for underweight and 12% for wasting. Severe malnutrition, defined as the percentage of children below -3 SD, was noted among children: 10% for stunting, 7% for underweight and 3% for wasting. Mild malnutrition, defined as the percentage of children below -1 SD, was: 56% for height-for-age, 65% for weight-for-age and 39% for weight-for-height. The level of wasting was highest among children 1-3 years of age with a second peak occurring at age 4-5 years. In addition, a high prevalence of wasting was noted among children with illiterate mothers (16%) as well as those with secondary (14%) and post-secondary level of education (13%).

The deteriorating nutritional status of children is reflective of events which are occurring in Iraqi society—loss of purchasing power and high prices for basic food items, poor water and sanitation quality, and high burden of infectious and parasitic diseases. Since 1991, shortly after the inception of the sanctions, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad has significantly deteriorated. Compared with 1991 estimates, the current survey demonstrates a 4-fold increase in wasting for the city of Baghdad. Prevalence estimates for stunting and underweight have also risen dramatically. The deterioration in nutritional status of children is reflected in the significant increase of child mortality which has risen nearly fivefold since 1990. For Baghdad, a highly advanced urban society, the prevalence of underweight children (29%) has increased to a level comparable with children from Ghana (27%) and Mali (31%). For stunting, prevalence rates are similar to estimates from Sri Lanka (28%) and the Congo (27%). Furthermore, the prevalence of wasting in Baghdad is comparable with estimates from Madagascar (12%) and Myanmar (11%). The prevalence of severe wasting is comparable to data from northern Sudan (2.3%). In contrast, 1991 estimates of malnutrition from Baghdad were comparable with estimates from Kuwait (12% for stunting, 6% for underweight, and 3% for wasting). The current nutritional situation among children in Baghdad is more similar to less developed countries with a larger percentage of the population residing in rural settings which may be a reflection of the inability to maintain systems for sanitation and clean water under sanctions. Due to the increasing problem of food insecurity and the inability to repair the infrastructure for provision of sanitation and potable water, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad will continue to deteriorate unless the economic embargo is lifted and high burden of infectious and parasitic diseases. Since 1991, shortly after the inception of the sanctions, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad has significantly deteriorated. Compared with 1991 estimates, the current survey demonstrates a 4-fold increase in wasting for the city of Baghdad. Prevalence estimates for stunting and underweight have also risen dramatically. The deterioration in nutritional status of children is reflected in the significant increase of child mortality which has risen nearly fivefold since 1990. For Baghdad, a highly advanced urban society, the prevalence of underweight children (29%) has increased to a level comparable with children from Ghana (27%) and Mali (31%). For stunting, prevalence rates are similar to estimates from Sri Lanka (28%) and the Congo (27%). Furthermore, the prevalence of wasting in Baghdad is comparable with estimates from Madagascar (12%) and Myanmar (11%). The prevalence of severe wasting is comparable to data from northern Sudan (2.3%). In contrast, 1991 estimates of malnutrition from Baghdad were comparable with estimates from Kuwait (12% for stunting, 6% for underweight, and 3% for wasting). The current nutritional situation among children in Baghdad is more similar to less developed countries with a larger percentage of the population residing in rural settings which may be a reflection of the inability to maintain systems for sanitation and clean water under sanctions. Due to the increasing problem of food insecurity and the inability to repair the infrastructure for provision of sanitation and potable water, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad will continue to deteriorate unless the economic embargo is lifted and high burden of infectious and parasitic diseases. Since 1991, shortly after the inception of the sanctions, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad has significantly deteriorated. Compared with 1991 estimates, the current survey demonstrates a 4-fold increase in wasting for the city of Baghdad. Prevalence estimates for stunting and underweight have also risen dramatically. The deterioration in nutritional status of children is reflected in the significant increase of child mortality which has risen nearly fivefold since 1990. For Baghdad, a highly advanced urban society, the prevalence of underweight children (29%) has increased to a level comparable with children from Ghana (27%) and Mali (31%). For stunting, prevalence rates are similar to estimates from Sri Lanka (28%) and the Congo (27%). Furthermore, the prevalence of wasting in Baghdad is comparable with estimates from Madagascar (12%) and Myanmar (11%). The prevalence of severe wasting is comparable to data from northern Sudan (2.3%). In contrast, 1991 estimates of malnutrition from Baghdad were comparable with estimates from Kuwait (12% for stunting, 6% for underweight, and 3% for wasting). The current nutritional situation among children in Baghdad is more similar to less developed countries with a larger percentage of the population residing in rural settings which may be a reflection of the inability to maintain systems for sanitation and clean water under sanctions. Due to the increasing problem of food insecurity and the inability to repair the infrastructure for provision of sanitation and potable water, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad will continue to deteriorate unless the economic embargo is lifted and high burden of infectious and parasitic diseases. Since 1991, shortly after the inception of the sanctions, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad has significantly deteriorated. Compared with 1991 estimates, the current survey demonstrates a 4-fold increase in wasting for the city of Baghdad. Prevalence estimates for stunting and underweight have also risen dramatically. The deterioration in nutritional status of children is reflected in the significant increase of child mortality which has risen nearly fivefold since 1990. For Baghdad, a highly advanced urban society, the prevalence of underweight children (29%) has increased to a level comparable with children from Ghana (27%) and Mali (31%). For stunting, prevalence rates are similar to estimates from Sri Lanka (28%) and the Congo (27%). Furthermore, the prevalence of wasting in Baghdad is comparable with estimates from Madagascar (12%) and Myanmar (11%). The prevalence of severe wasting is comparable to data from northern Sudan (2.3%). In contrast, 1991 estimates of malnutrition from Baghdad were comparable with estimates from Kuwait (12% for stunting, 6% for underweight, and 3% for wasting). The current nutritional situation among children in Baghdad is more similar to less developed countries with a larger percentage of the population residing in rural settings which may be a reflection of the inability to maintain systems for sanitation and clean water under sanctions. Due to the increasing problem of food insecurity and the inability to repair the infrastructure for provision of sanitation and potable water, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad will continue to deteriorate unless the economic embargo is lifted and high burden of infectious and parasitic diseases.
improving prosperity for the vast majority of the population. With the embargo on oil exports (except for limited sales to Jordan) economic decline has proceeded rapidly over the last several years and is reflected by the exchange rate of the US$ which currently (8/1995) is in the order of 1 US$ = 2000 ID. This decline has precipitated severe problems throughout the whole country which were described by earlier missions in 1993 as demonstrating pre famine conditions. In Iraq the agricultural sector has been given high priority in attempts to ensure self-sufficiency through greater self-sufficiency. Despite this a high dependence on imported food remains. Since 1993 the situation has become much worse for the majority of the population, beggars and street children are seen widely, crime has increased and infantile malnutrition can be observed in both hospitals and the general population. In Iraq, catastrophe has been avoided by the widespread availability of the Government food ration. This Government ration is not available in the autonomous region of the North and all food must be purchased on the open market. For this and for a number of additional reasons which include factional fighting, the decline in external assistance, high prices and many previous government employees not receiving salaries, child undernutrition and malnutrition is also widespread in the north, especially for the poor. [=]

24222. FAO; International Action Center; et al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 11: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq; Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Production in 1994-1995: Cereals. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. An earlier forecast by FAO Representation in Iraq that the 1994/95 cereal output would be larger than last year's based on good performance of rainfall and increased efforts by the government and international organizations, has not materialized. The total cereal production in 1994/95 is estimated at 2.5 million tons, about 10% lower than last year's production and about 16% lower than the average harvest during the past five years. Compared to 1989/90, the last year before the embargo, the cereal production in 1994/95 is down by about 27% (Table 2). Moreover, the consumable cereal output in 1994/95 is further reduced because of much larger than usual presence of non-grain impurities such as dust, straw, weed seeds and remains of insects/pests. By examining samples of wheat and barley from stores, seed processing units and silos, the Mission found nongrain impurities of up to 20% in certain cases while, in the case of the mechanically harvested crops in Iraq, about 5% would be an acceptable level. Both the total cropped area and the per hectare yield in 1994/95 are lower compared to 1993/94 (Tables I and 3). Although per hectare yields of both wheat and barley, the two main food crops of Iraq respectively accounting for about half and about one-third of the total cereal output, were somewhat higher compared to last year, a steep reduction in the acreage under both outweighed the gain in yields, causing a reduction of about 8% in the output of each. In the case of rice and maize, which together account for 15-20% of the total cereal output, the opposite has occurred, i.e. an increase in acreage and a proportionally larger decrease in yield, with the result that the output of each has declined. South and central Iraq accounts for 78.7% of the total 1994/95 cereal output, while the autonomous northern region (governorates of Dohuk, Erbil and Suleimania) for 21.3%. Per hectare yield is somewhat higher in the northern region compared to south and central Iraq for both wheat and barley but not very significantly so (Tables 4 and 5). The main problems faced are virtually the same in all the regions. Prior to the embargo the Iraqi population were accustomed to highly subsidized imported foods with only about 30% of its cereal consumption being from domestic production. The government has been unable to continue with this practice and government policy is now to increase domestic food production to feed the population. Government efforts to encourage and facilitate agricultural production includes the raising of purchase prices which rose very sharply in 5/1995 to provide incentives to the farmers (Table 6). Farmers must, according to regulations, sell all their wheat, barley, rice, maize and sunflower to the government at the prices fixed by Council of Ministers. Farmers interviewed have indicated that they are reasonably satisfied with the prices currently being paid. However, under increasingly adverse input supply conditions, their costs of production are increasing. International organizations, mainly FAO, have extended some help toward raising agricultural production in Iraq. For example, about 276000 dunums (69000 hectare) in Nineveh governorate, which produces about half the country's total cereal output of mainly under rainfed agriculture, were given significant assistance through greater self-sufficiency. Despite this a high dependence on imported food remains. Since 1993 the situation has become much worse for the majority of the population, beggars and street children are seen widely, crime has increased and infantile malnutrition can be observed in both hospitals and the general population. In Iraq, catastrophe has been avoided by the widespread availability of the Government food ration. This Government ration is not available in the autonomous region of the North and all food must be purchased on the open market. For this and for a number of additional reasons which include factional fighting, the decline in external assistance, high prices and many previous government employees not receiving salaries, child undernutrition and malnutrition is also widespread in the north, especially for the poor. [=]
Meal and Dubas. This is adversely affecting the production of dates. 1995/96 are: food grains 66%, pulses 58%, vegetable oil 61%, poultry infesting the date palm fields and are harbouring insects/pests such as is grossly inadequate to meet national requirements—the shortfalls for and spare parts, insecticides and herbicides. An abundance of weeds is New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Domestic production of basic foods about 18 million. Under conditions of food shortage due to the embargo, of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Production in 1994-1995: Livestock, Poultry and Fish. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The animal population in Iraq has declined steeply since 1990 (Table 9) under the post-embargo conditions. Between 1 990 and 1 995, the number of cows declined by 34%, the number of buffaloes by 46%, the number of sheep by 42%, and the number of goats by 81%. Traditionally, Iraqi people have depended heavily on meat and other livestock based products in their regular diet. The embargo has reduced the availability of red meat, poultry meat, milk, eggs and fish to very low levels, as shown in Table 10. Critical shortage of animal products have caused their prices to increase steeply and beyond the purchasing capacity of the majority of the Iraqi people. Most Iraqis are unable to eat meat or poultry meat even once a week. The main factors limiting livestock and poultry production are critical shortages of feed, veterinary services and drugs, and machinery and equipment and their spare parts. Moreover, a further constraint is gaining in importance and that is the diversion of pastures into grain production. The production of milk and milk products have virtually collapsed due to poor health of milking cows and lack of equipment. Before the Gulf war (1990), 2.5 million tons of feed stuffs (corn, protein concentrates, soybeans, wheat bran and barley) were available, but now none can be imported or spared from the local harvest under the existing food shortages. Livestock farmers have, however, been advised to try to save the animals using whatever other alternative feed they can find. The central meat supply system has collapsed. The animals are now slaughtered on road sides openly and indiscriminately, creating health hazards. Reportedly cattle are being smuggled out to neighbouring countries because of the weak Iraqi dinar and the attractive profits that can be made from smuggling. In poultry production, there were 8353 small and 25 big chicken projects during the pre-Gulf war period, which provided estimated 1688 million eggs, 106 million hatching eggs, and 250000 tons of chicken meat. However, many of these projects are now just empty compounds with some remains of equipment and machinery scattered around. Fish production has also been seriously affected. The only central facility for rearing and supplying fish fingerlings to fish farmers and to rivers, ponds, lakes and dams to renew and maintain the fish population in the country is now functioning only at half its capacity. The seasonal capacity of this fish hatchery was 50 million but the deterioration of its machinery, equipment including laboratory chemicals and feed and hormone supplies, its performance has drastically declined. [1] 24223. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 13: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Production in 1994-1995: Livestock, Poultry and Fish. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The animal population in Iraq has declined steeply since 1990 (Table 9) under the post-embargo conditions. Between 1 990 and 1 995, the number of cows declined by 34%, the number of buffaloes by 46%, the number of sheep by 42%, and the number of goats by 81%. Traditionally, Iraqi people have depended heavily on meat and other livestock based products in their regular diet. The embargo has reduced the availability of red meat, poultry meat, milk, eggs and fish to very low levels, as shown in Table 10. Critical shortage of animal products have caused their prices to increase steeply and beyond the purchasing capacity of the majority of the Iraqi people. Most Iraqis are unable to eat meat or poultry meat even once a week. The main factors limiting livestock and poultry production are critical shortages of feed, veterinary services and drugs, and machinery and equipment and their spare parts. Moreover, a further constraint is gaining in importance and that is the diversion of pastures into grain production. The production of milk and milk products have virtually collapsed due to poor health of milking cows and lack of equipment. Before the Gulf war (1990), 2.5 million tons of feed stuffs (corn, protein concentrates, soybeans, wheat bran and barley) were available, but now none can be imported or spared from the local harvest under the existing food shortages. Livestock farmers have, however, been advised to try to save the animals using whatever other alternative feed they can find. The central meat supply system has collapsed. The animals are now slaughtered on road sides openly and indiscriminately, creating health hazards. Reportedly cattle are being smuggled out to neighbouring countries because of the weak Iraqi dinar and the attractive profits that can be made from smuggling. In poultry production, there were 8353 small and 25 big chicken projects during the pre-Gulf war period, which provided estimated 1688 million eggs, 106 million hatching eggs, and 250000 tons of chicken meat. However, many of these projects are now just empty compounds with some remains of equipment and machinery scattered around. Fish production has also been seriously affected. The only central facility for rearing and supplying fish fingerlings to fish farmers and to rivers, ponds, lakes and dams to renew and maintain the fish population in the country is now functioning only at half its capacity. The seasonal capacity of this fish hatchery was 50 million but the deterioration of its machinery, equipment including laboratory chemicals and feed and hormone supplies, its performance has drastically declined. [1] 24224. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 14: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Production in 1994-1995: Livestock, Poultry and Fish. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The animal population in Iraq has declined steeply since 1990 (Table 9) under the post-embargo conditions. Between 1 990 and 1 995, the number of cows declined by 34%, the number of buffaloes by 46%, the number of sheep by 42%, and the number of goats by 81%. Traditionally, Iraqi people have depended heavily on meat and other livestock based products in their regular diet. The embargo has reduced the availability of red meat, poultry meat, milk, eggs and fish to very low levels, as shown in Table 10. Critical shortage of animal products have caused their prices to increase steeply and beyond the purchasing capacity of the majority of the Iraqi people. Most Iraqis are unable to eat meat or poultry meat even once a week. The main factors limiting livestock and poultry production are critical shortages of feed, veterinary services and drugs, and machinery and equipment and their spare parts. Moreover, a further constraint is gaining in importance and that is the diversion of pastures into grain production. The production of milk and milk products have virtually collapsed due to poor health of milking cows and lack of equipment. Before the Gulf war (1990), 2.5 million tons of feed stuffs (corn, protein concentrates, soybeans, wheat bran and barley) were available, but now none can be imported or spared from the local harvest under the existing food shortages. Livestock farmers have, however, been advised to try to save the animals using whatever other alternative feed they can find. The central meat supply system has collapsed. The animals are now slaughtered on road sides openly and indiscriminately, creating health hazards. Reportedly cattle are being smuggled out to neighbouring countries because of the weak Iraqi dinar and the attractive profits that can be made from smuggling. In poultry production, there were 8353 small and 25 big chicken projects during the pre-Gulf war period, which provided estimated 1688 million eggs, 106 million hatching eggs, and 250000 tons of chicken meat. However, many of these projects are now just empty compounds with some remains of equipment and machinery scattered around. Fish production has also been seriously affected. The only central facility for rearing and supplying fish fingerlings to fish farmers and to rivers, ponds, lakes and dams to renew and maintain the fish population in the country is now functioning only at half its capacity. The seasonal capacity of this fish hatchery was 50 million but the deterioration of its machinery, equipment including laboratory chemicals and feed and hormone supplies, its performance has drastically declined. [1] result of the embargo, the country’s ability to import food stuffs has declined drastically despite some flexibility being allowed for food imports. With a view to ensuring a minimum of food availability to the population as a whole, the government of Iraq introduced a public food rationing system with effect from 9/1/1990, i.e. within less than one month following the imposition of the embargo on 8/2/1990. It provides basic foods to the population at 1990 prices which means they are now virtually free. This system was introduced in such a way that it supported the original lower levels to the 1993 level shown in Table 12, that provided 53% of the 1987-89 average per capita food energy availability. The basket for adults was sharply reduced on 9/24/1994, presumably due to increasing difficulties in ensuring adequate supplies. Vegetable oil was however increased by 25%. This reduced basket has been supplied until the present and provides only some 34% of the average 1987-89 per capita food energy availability. Not only does the ration basket provide only about one-third of food energy needs, but being carbohydrate-based it is deficient in essential micronutrients and animal proteins. Hence, while the rationing system has forestalled the occurrence of any massive famine under conditions of critical food shortages and high food prices since the embargo, it has not checked increasing malnutrition and morbidity in a large section of the population which is too poor to adequately supplement the rations with other essential food items. About 3.5 million people, comprising all civil servants in active service, military, police and security and other elite forces, civil servant pensioners, military pensioners, social welfare beneficiaries, and war veterans with a 60% or greater disability also have been receiving a monthly allowance of ID 2000 (equivalent to one US$ at the current free market exchange rate) since 10/1/1994. This allowance, however small, is certainly a welcome relief for those who receive it. However, 17.2 million people are not covered by this programme, with many of these being in extremely difficult economic conditions. Of these, some 3.6 million people of the northern region are not receiving any, or only negligible, food supplies through the public rationing system.

However, the northern farmers are not required to sell their foodgrains to the central government. The food basket supplied through the rationing system is a life-saving nutritional benefit which also represents a very substantial income subsidy to Iraqi households. The monthly subsidy to a household of 5 adults is ID 42895 and for one of 6 members, $482, with ID 58,912, with ID 6000 being paid at average prices of ID 10000, ID 6000, ID 135000 and ID 70000 per ton for wheat, barley, paddy and maize respectively and another ID 5000 for vegetable oil and 0.9 kg sugar to the two core commodities of 5 kg wheat flour and 0.5 kg pulses. This reflects a reduction in the daily food energy value from about 1800 kcal/day to some 650 kcal/day. In centre and south, the number of beneficiaries has been reduced to 250000 (from 750000) in the north and the food basket/On (kg/person/month) reduced from the four commodities of 12 kg wheat flour, 0.9 kg pulses, 0.9 kg vegetable oil and 0.3 kg sugar to the two core commodities of 5 kg wheat flour and 0.5 kg pulses. This reflects a reduction in the daily food energy value from about 1800 kcal/day to some 650 kcal/day. The rationing system is a life-saving nutritional benefit which also represents a very substantial income subsidy to Iraqi households. The monthly subsidy to a household of 5 adults is ID 42895 and for one of 6 members, $482, with ID 58,912, with ID 6000 being paid at average prices of ID 10000, ID 6000, ID 135000 and ID 70000 per ton for wheat, barley, paddy and maize respectively and another ID 5000 for vegetable oil and 0.9 kg sugar to the two core commodities of 5 kg wheat flour and 0.5 kg pulses. This reflects a reduction in the daily food energy value from about 1800 kcal/day to some 650 kcal/day. The rationing system is a life-saving nutritional benefit which also represents a very substantial income subsidy to Iraqi households. The monthly subsidy to a household of 5 adults is ID 42895 and for one of 6 members, $482, with ID 58,912, with ID 6000 being paid at average prices of ID 10000, ID 6000, ID 135000 and ID 70000 per ton for wheat, barley, paddy and maize respectively and another ID 5000 for vegetable oil and 0.9 kg sugar to the two core commodities of 5 kg wheat flour and 0.5 kg pulses. This reflects a reduction in the daily food energy value from about 1800 kcal/day to some 650 kcal/day.
a potentially rich country, to import foods to meet its entire requirements. [-]

24227. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 16: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Supply Position and Access of Population to Food: Assess to Food-Prices and Income. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The rations are grossly inadequate both quantitatively and qualitatively. People must therefore supplement their food intake by purchases from the open market. Prices of basic food stuffs have increased phenomenally—in all parts of the country. The Mission carried out independent market surveys in Baghdad and several governorates in the central and south Iraq and also in the north. The prices are not only very high, but also extremely volatile. Some prices have gone up by 15-30% over a two week period, as indicated by spot surveys conducted in Baghdad on 8/14-27/1995. Prices of basic food stuffs as of end 8/1995 are reported and compared with prices in 6/1993 and 7/1990 in Table 15. It is mind boggling that the price of the most basic food item, wheat flour, has risen by 11667 times compared with 7/1990 and by 33 times compared with 6/1993. Prices of rice, vegetable oil, milk powder, and sugar have risen by 4375-5500 times compared with 7/1990 and by 37-58 times compared with June 1993. Prices of poultry meat, eggs, tea, potatoes, and lentils have risen by about 1000-2000 times compared with 7/1990 and by 37-62 times compared with 6/1993. Red meat and fish prices have risen the least—respectively 193-240 times compared with 7/1993 and 17-21% compared with 6/1993. The Mission during its visits to markets in Baghdad, Mosul, Basra, Ahvaz, Nasiriya, Najaf, Dohuk, Erbil and Sulaimaniya saw reasonable supplies of food stuffs in shops, except in Erbil where some shortages were noticed. Apparently, the private sector is active in procuring and displaying supplies. But the prices everywhere are out of the reach of the common people. The Mission noticed very little purchases being made in the various markets. If there were adequate purchasing power in the hands of the people, the available supplies might not last very long—of course, in that case, more supplies will be brought in by the traders. That the national and family economies are in crisis can be easily gauged from the fact that the Iraqi Dinar has experienced a free fall in the unofficial exchange market. Currently at 2000 Dinars to the US dollar, the unofficial exchange rate is 6400 times the official exchange rate. A large part of the recent steep increases in the market prices of food stuffs and other commodities, which are mostly imported by traders who have to mobilize their own foreign exchange resources for imports, can be attributed to the collapse of the ID. There has been a simultaneous collapse of the personal incomes in terms of purchasing power. In central and south Iraq, the monthly emoluments (salary + allowances) of lower level government employees are ID 500-600. The average monthly emoluments of all civil servants are about ID 5000 (US$ 2.50 at the unofficial exchange rate). There is very little work in the private sector. Unskilled workers can earn about ID 500 a day provided they find work. Interviews with groups of unskilled prospective employers, in Baghdad and other places have revealed that it is not often that they find work for more than one day a week. In the northern region, the situation is equally bad if not worse. Civil servants in Erbil and Sulaimaniya have not been paid salaries over the past several months. In Dohuk, however, civil servants have been receiving their salaries, but these are too low in relation to the prices of food stuffs and other necessary products. Jobs in the private sector are very hard to find and it should be remembered that the basic government food ration is not available to the people in the north. Also WFP assistance for most of the vulnerable people has been substantially cut back on account of supply shortages caused by inadequate donor responses. The economic problems of the region has been further compounded by the recent fighting and continued antagonism between the two Kurdish factions PUK and PDK, as well as the cross-border actions of Turkey in pursuit of the PKK.

There is a prevailing view and it has been confirmed through investigations conducted by the Mission that, in general, rural people, particularly farmers are doing better than the urban population. Farmers can, for example, grow vegetables, raise chicken or cattle towards augmenting their food availability and incomes from crop production. On the other hand, in urban areas such opportunities rarely exist. The urban population accounts for about 71% of the total population of Iraq, of the total population, rural farmers constitute about three-quarters. That is, about 21% of the total population are farmers. The other 8% or so living in rural areas are in bad shape in the absence of income earning opportunities. Of the urban population, about 10-12% or about 7-9% of the total population may be doing very well through trade and access to other attractive means of making money. Hence, when the farmers (21%) and the rich (7-9%) are excluded, about 70% of the total population is in precarious conditions. Many have been surviving by selling household goods and personal effects; but this option is also closing for most of them because either they have run out of things to sell or buyers are becoming hard to find. It was observed in a collective village in the north that people were literally selling their houses, i.e. bricks and other materials of their houses, with more than one family then congregating in a single remaining room. It has been shown earlier that the ration basket for an adult that provides 34% of the normal food energy intake by an Iraqi costs ID 8588 at current market prices. If the shortfall of 66% were to be made up by a family of 5 adults from the same food items, i.e. without considering the quality of the foods, it would need ID 83354 to purchase the necessary supplies from the market and the amount would be larger if a more balanced diet were to be secured. If the family has a baby under one year for whom the ration (baby-milk powder) provides about 50% of the need, it would need another ID 16020 for procuring the additional food for the baby. These sorts of financial resources are clearly beyond the command of the majority of the Iraqi population. The solution lies in adequate food supplies in the country, restoring the viability of the ID, and creating conditions for the people to acquire adequate purchasing power. But, these conditions can be fulfilled only if the economy can be put back in proper shape enabling it to draw on its own resources, and that clearly cannot occur as long as the embargo remains in force. [-]

24228. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 17: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Food Availability: Food Supply Position and Access of Population to Food: Basic Food Import Requirement. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Prior to the Gulf crisis, Iraq produced about one-third of its basic food needs and spent about US$2 billion to import the balance of the requirements. Since then, despite emphasis on increasing food production, the situation has deteriorated due to many problems relating to agricultural inputs as has been explained earlier. It is estimated that Iraq will need US$2.7 billion to import basic foods to meet the shortages in 1995/96 (Table 16). Short of lifting the embargo, the only other source of such a huge amount of foreign exchange for Iraq is its frozen assets, the use of which is strongly encouraged by the Mission to enable Iraq to import the essential basic food stuffs to feed its population. [-]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq

The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An and 43% of total protein, other nutrients, in particular vitamin A and 24230. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: needs. While the food energy of the ration supplies 38% of adult needs faced with the far more basic task of providing a daily ration of food to as a convenient yardstick for comparing nutritional availabilities. These problems, while real, can only have low priority when the Government is of course, not fully appropriate for the Iraqi population but they do serve in re-establishing adequate mechanisms for food safety. These The United States recommended daily allowances for an adult male are, thickeners, dyes and other chemicals. Regulations are unable to be (1988-90 average) was also calculated using appropriate food private sector lie in poor quality control and the increasing use of non-contaminated with a mixture of weed seeds and non-food material. The sugar for sweets, is sold widely as a substitute for jams and preserves. with wheat flour reflecting the nominal composition of 60% wheat and in production is for date syrup which, because of the nonavailability of the most appropriate values for food composition of the items concerned locally by humans and by animals as feed. One of the few growth areas in production is for date syrup which, because of the nonavailability of sugar for sweets, is sold widely as a substitute for jams and preserves. Additional problems for food production from small manufacturers in the private sector lie in poor quality control and the increasing use of non-food grade materials for food use. The latter can include emulsifiers, thickeners, dyes and other chemicals. Regulations are unable to be enforced and major food safety hazards exist. FAO help may be needed in re-establishing adequate mechanisms for food safety. These problems, while real, can only have low priority when the Government is faced with the far more basic task of providing a daily ration of food to meet food energy needs. [=] cereal based diets and improving the bioavailability of vitamin A. There is no recommended daily allowance for fat but in order to supply 30% of the food energy as fat at 2.900 kcal/day some 97 g/day would be needed; the 22 g/day in the ration thus falls short of this value. The ration supplies a very important part of daily dietary needs, especially for food energy and protein and has prevented catastrophe for the Iraqi people over the five years of the embargo. It is, however, far from being nutritionally balanced. In view of daily needs, about 26% of the caloric intake was available in 1988-1990. The foods needed to bridge the gap between the ration and daily needs are mainly fruits, vegetables, oil, dairy products, legumes and animal protein, all of which are expensive in the market place and, as a consequence of the reduced purchasing power for the majority of the population, are unable to be obtained in adequate quantities. [-]

24231. FAO; International Action Center; et al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 20: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq; Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: General Health and Nutrition Background. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The accomplishments in health and nutritional status of the Iraqi population achieved over the last two decades in part due to the oil wealth are rapidly deteriorating due to prolonged sanctions. While food is readily available in markets the purchasing power of the average Iraqi has declined, especially for the salaried civil servants, pensioners and destitutes. The Ministry of Health estimates that 109720 persons have died annually between 8/1990-3/1994 as a result of the delayed effects of sanctions. The Mission was unable to confirm these numbers. According to the Ministry of Health, the health and nutritional status of children has been seriously affected. Moderate to severe malnutrition using the criteria of less than 80% weight-for-age was 29% for children under-five, the percentage of low birth weight babies (<2.5 kg) is estimated at 21.1% and infant mortality and under-five mortality are reported at 92 per thousand live births and 128 per thousand live births. In comparison, the infant mortality rate in 1989 was about 40 per thousand live births. As a result of 5 years of sanctions, most of the Iraqi population is suffering from reduced food intake. Although basic food items are available in the market, prices are prohibitively expensive for most wage earners, pensioners and those that rely on monetary assistance from the Government. Thus the nutritional status of much of the population, especially the most vulnerable groups including children under-five, is in decline. The Ministry of Health has reported a significant increase in cases of malnutrition, such as kwashiorkor and marasmus and other micronutrient deficiencies. Monthly average numbers for kwashiorkor, marasmus and for other cases of malnutrition are shown in Table 19. The very large increases in all categories are obvious. Doctors in paediatric hospitals observed that before 1990 kwashiorkor was a rare phenomenon but is now common. The number of marasmus cases has also increased significantly and reflects the role of infections especially gastroenteritis in the summer months and respiratory infections in the winter. Total number of deaths and monthly averages for deaths of children under five years of age between 1989-7/1995 are shown in Table 20. Average numbers of deaths can be seen to have increased dramatically over this period. These data were provided by the Government’s health statistics department and are unable to be confirmed by the Mission. In view, however, of the malnutrition observed, the health hazards in the water supply, the degree of inflation throughout the period and hence the inability of many to purchase food together with the decline in the overall health care system, these data are plausible. Several surveys which were carried out immediately after the war revealed high levels of malnutrition in hospitals and health clinics (Harvard Study Team, 1991). One drawback of these surveys was that they were based on hospital visits, and thus not representative of the nutritional situation of the overall Iraqi population. In 8-9/1991, the International Study Team conducted a nationwide survey of the nutritional situation among children under five years. Their results showed a considerable degree of stunting among children under the age of 5 years (21.8% of children under 5 years were below -2 SD from NCHS Ht/ Age median values). However, the percentage of children with weight for height below 2 SD (wasting) was 3.47 similar to the NCHS standard. The most vulnerable age group for all nutritional indices was between 12-23 months. Studies conducted between 1991-1993 showed deteriorating nutritional status of children in Baghdad with 51% of Kindergarten children in 19 schools in Baghdad serving different socioeconomic classes showed that those from low socioeconomic classes had the highest percentage of stunting (14.6%) (Naoush and Obeid, 1992). The authors noted a negative correlation between wasting and socioeconomic status. The Z-score distribution for all three nutritional indicators (height for age, weight for age, weight for height) shifted to the left of the NCHS reference but did not suggest significant malnourishment. UNICEF assessed the nutritional status of children in the Wasit governorate south of Baghdad and noted that the percentage of wasting was higher in urban areas (4.6o) compared with rural areas (0.8%). Nutritional assessment of children in Al-Muthana governorate (adjacent to Wasit) showed that the percentage of wasting was 10.3% and infants under 6 months were seen to be most affected.

A survey was conducted in 1993 by the FAO mission in collaboration with the Nutrition Research Institute. This was in a less privileged area of Baghdad and covered part of the same areas in Saddam City that were examined by the 1991 International Team Survey. One hundred and twenty-one households were visited and a total of 506 subjects were measured: 194 were children under 5 years of age, 136 were between 5-15 years and 172 were above the age of 15 years. The results showed that for those under 5 years and using the criteria of Z-score of less than -2 SD as signifying malnutrition, 30% were stunted (h/age), 35% were underweight (wt/age) and 16% were wasted (w/h). For those between 5-15 years the corresponding values were 33%, 31% and 11%. It was concluded by the 1993 mission that there had been a significant increase in both stunting and wasting among children since 1991 and that there was evidence of both chronic and acute malnutrition in children below 15 years of age. In 3/1994, the Ministry of Health conducted its first nutritional assessment covering 50% of all children under five enrolling in kindergarten—25% of the sample was from Baghdad and the rest from other governorates excluding the 3 northern governorates (30089 children). The average height for 4-year-olds was 92 cm and weight was 17.4 kg. Indicating a state of chronic malnutrition. Since the sample represents those who attend school, the degree of stunting would be expected to be more severe in children who are not at school. As a further indication of economic decline and hence probable malnutrition in the community, the Mission noted a greater presence of street children selling cigarettes or other items polishing shoes and begging in comparison to that observed in 1993.

According to Obeid (1994), the rate of stunting in the age groups 6 months and 7-12 months had increased compared with 1993. The rate of underweight in the age group 7-12 months was also higher than in 1993. However, there was no major change in the rate of wasting for these age groups. The Mission noted a few cases of marasmus in Mosul, Saddam Hospital. The hospital does not keep statistics on malnutrition, but according to the Head of the Paediatric Department the hospital has seen an increase in the number of cases that were referred as failure to thrive complicated with diarrhoea (Table 21). It was also noted that the hospital was seeing more cases of gastroenteritis in the 0-3 years age group. No cases of vitamin A deficiency were reported by this hospital. The Paediatric Departments of the Saddam Hospitals were also visited in Amarah, Kerbala, Basrah and Nasiriya. Many cases of both marasmus and kwashiorkor were observed in the wards along with cases of infectious disease such as typhoid fever and infective hepatitis which were associated with the generally poor state of sanitation. Some 30% of all admissions since mid-1993 have been for diagnosed malnutrition. Both marasmus and kwashiorkor presented many of the classically recognized signs. For kwashiorkor oedema especially of the face, legs and feet, thin and wispy hair and skin changes were all observed. Skin changes were, however, minimal compared to the severe flaky paint dermatosis with ulceration often seen in children from Africa. Severe wasting, especially visible in the ribs and limbs together with old man faces was seen in the marasmic children. Here weight-for-age was invariably below 60% (Gomez III) and when height/length was determined w/h was below 80% of the international median. Generally cases of kwashiorkor were older than 1 year while those diagnosed as marasmic were younger. All three hospitals were unable to operate at full capacity because of lack of facilities and medicines and were admitting the most severe cases. In addition, cases were discharged as rapidly as possible so as to free beds. Baby incubators were also suffering from lack of spare parts with only 8 from 36 being functional in the Basrah hospital. The situation in Amarah hospital had improved slightly since 1993 since 4 incubators were now functional. Vitamin A deficiency was reported as being on the increase in Basrah with both Bitot's spots and xerophthalmia having been observed. In both Basrah and Nasiriya, hospitals, CARE was providing daily food supplements for mothers and children. This consisted of 50g sweet biscuits (Marie), 25g milk powder and 30g processed cheese. While the value of the supplements was highly appreciated, it created problems for the staff since the timing of programmes was intermittent and no long-term continuity could be planned for. It is an interesting reflection on the overall severity of the food shortage in the country that this supplement was also available to the doctors involved in treating the children. General shortages also affect the working of hospitals such as nonfunctioning air-conditioners, absence of light bulbs and fluorescent tubes as well as the no longer functioning piped oxygen. In Basrah and Nasiriya, sewage disposal was difficult because the tanker trucks needed spare parts and in Basrah, in common with much of the city, sewage back-ups were occurring. The hospital in Kerbala noted an increasing problem of rodents, flies and mosquitoes. Few insecticides or pesticides are available and those available are often potentially harmful. In response to the worsening nutritional situation, UNICEF, WFP and MOH have proposed to establish Nutritional Rehabilitation Centres (NRC) in paediatric hospitals and primary health care centres. The following activities are to be undertaken: clinical examination and course of treatment (estimated for 20 days on average) and nutritional education for the mothers. Each child is expected to receive 50 gm/day of therapeutic diet, 50 gm/day of weaning food, and 100 gm/day of skimmed milk powder. The accompanying mother will also receive food which is regularly provided by WFP to hospitals. The Ministry of Health will provide the appropriate staff, monitor the programme and arrange for warehousing of WFP food supplies and distribution of weaning food and milk powder. Some of these centres were functional in the autonomous North with NGO assistance, but they were not yet established in Central and South Iraq. [-]

24232. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 21: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: Vitamin A Deficiency. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Vitamin A deficiency has been of great concern to both the MOH and UNICEF, since the observation of even relatively few cases can be a reflection of a very serious underlying nutritional situation. No information had, however, been collected or documented the prevalence of vitamin A deficiency in 1993 but several physicians had reported occasional cases of children observed with Bitot's spot as well as two cases of keratomalacia in Al-Mansour Children's Hospital. In 1994, the Nutrition Research Institute conducted a survey covering 8575 underfive children (4436 boys and 4139 girls) in 3 governorates of Nineveh, Baghdad and Basrah. The prevalence of night blindness was reported for boys and girls at 1.2% in Nineveh for both sexes, 1.7% for boys and 2% for girls in Baghdad, and 1.3% for boys and 1.2% for girls in Basrah. The WHO definition for a vitamin A deficient population is 1% prevalence amongst children. Moreover, Bitot's spots were reported at a level of 0.3% for boys and O.1% for girls in Baghdad. For Basrah, Bitot's spots were reported in 0.1% of boys only. No cases of Bitot's spots were reported for Nineveh. Vitamin A deficiency results from severe curtailment of intakes of both preformed vitamin A and of the various carotenoids especially beta carotene. This is often due to the high prices of food containing these nutrients. In 1993, the mission was informed that UNICEF, in agreement with the MOH, has agreed to distribute Vitamin A capsules: 100000 IU at birth and 20000 IU at 12 months of age when children are vaccinated for DPT at 18 months of age with the DPT booster vaccine. However, this programme has not yet been implemented in the field. The current Mission recommends that necessary steps should be taken immediately throughout the country to give Vitamin A to children to protect their health. [-]

24233. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 22: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: Iodine Deficiency and Goitre. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Goitre had been an endemic problem in Iraq, yet by 1979 goitre had been virtually eliminated in the country. A 1992 survey conducted in Mosul with the assistance of UNICEF revealed a prevalence of 40.7% among females. In 1993, a study of patients referred to Aloshah hospital in Baghdad revealed that about 56% of patients had several types of thyroid disease. Prevalence was highest among 15-44 years old. The government is planning to provide iodized salt. Nevertheless, his Excellency, the Minister of Health, while recognizing the importance of this and other fortification schemes indicated that his priorities must remain in ensuring that basic food energy needs are met. [-]

24234. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 23: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: Low Birth Weight (less than 2.5 kg) and Anaemia Amongst Pregnant Women. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The Ministry of Health has reported a categorical increase in the occurrence of low birth weight infants: 4% in 8/1990; 19.2% in 8/1993; and 21.1% in 7/1995. The Nutrition Research Institute collected birth weights in 1-2/1993 from 4 hospitals in Baghdad, and reported a low birth weight incidence of 19.45%. However, statistics that were made available to the Mission from the Ministry of Health, Nutrition Research Institute and several hospitals, did not include denominators necessary to calculate incidence rates. The 1993 mission had visited the Basrah governorate and obtained raw data collected from 60 health centres which included birth weights and total number of births by month for 1993. The incidence of low birth weight (based on 33971 births, 2-9/1993) was 3.86%. The Basrah maternity hospital reported to the Mission that 4.8% of births (based on 13089 births) were below 2.5 kg in 1994-1995. Similarly, the Mosul Saddam Hospital reported an incidence of low birth weight of 3.7% (Table 22), ranging from 1.0-4.2%. A large percentage of births takes place at home, and thus there could be a low birth weight problem which is not visible. In the Mission's household surveys, pregnant women were often noted to be suffering from anaemia. Iron fortification or iron supplementation would normally be recommended in these circumstances. In the present situation, in relation to the other priorities of ensuring access to food, it is unlikely that any action can be taken with regard to fortification greater availability of medication for iron supplementation could alleviate the problem to some degree. [-]
Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations; End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 24: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: Other Problems in the Health Sector. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Major surgical interventions have been reduced to 30% of pre-sanctions levels. In 1996 it was told that a surgical operation per week. From the monthly average of 15125 major surgical operations per month in 1989, the average reported by the Ministry of Health for 1-7/1995 was 4640. There is a general lack of anaesthesics and disposable equipment such as gloves, syringes and catheters. Laboratory tests have also been affected by the severe shortage of reagents. Moreover, hospitals and pharmacies continue to suffer from the lack of life-sustaining drugs for treatment of cardiovascular diseases, diabetes and other metabolic and endocrine diseases. No member of the Mission was medically qualified but, nevertheless, the situation can be recognized as serious. It is recommended that a Mission under the auspices of an appropriate agency, should be charged with examining the overall problems and deficiencies in the health care delivery system in Iraq. [ ]

24236. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations; End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 25: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: The Health and Nutrition Situation in the North. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The nutrition situation in the northern governorates of Dohuk, Erbil and Suleimaniya is still reported to be critical by UNICEF, various NGOs and regional authorities. The recent fighting between the two main political factions has disrupted the flow of resources and has also affected access to health care and food. Basic food items are available but expensive. Various groups including those classified as internally displaced due to the 1991 civilian conflict, refugees returning from Turkey and Iran, recent exiles from Kirkuk, residents of collective villages and civil servants are experiencing difficulties in meeting their nutritional needs. Because the government in Erbil has no current source of revenue, consequent to the factional fighting between the PUK and PDK, civil servants, including doctors and teachers, had received no pay for more than six months. Doctors were still working in the hospital without pay but were surviving on the incomes generated from their private clinics. Persons living in collectivized villages are unable to produce their own food or other displaced persons and poor urban dwellers are also entirely dependent on WFP food assistance. The Government of Iraq does not provide food rations on a regular basis to these governorates, and what is provided meets less than 0.1% of the needs. In the North, all food must be purchased from the free market. Lack of fuel for heating is another major concern of the regional government and will become more acute as winter approaches. In Dohuk, Suleimaniya and Erbil governorates malnutrition amongst children appears to have plateaued at around 20% using weight-for-height less than 90% of the NCHS median. This is according to two UNICEF 30 cluster surveys conducted in 1993 and 1994. In the 1994 survey, stunting was found to be more prevalent in the 3-5 year age group (43.5%), while wasting was more prevalent among those 0-3 years old (31.5% for under 1 and 50.4% for 1-3 years). No significant differences were found between male and female children, and rural areas reported higher prevalence rates than urban areas. This may be due to diminishing humanitarian assistance to the rural sector and the adverse effect of political instability, in particular the internal conflict between PUK and PDK. Using the criteria of weight for height less than 90% median, values for malnutrition in the three governorates were 21.8% for Dohuk, 20.2% for Suleimaniya and 20.1% for Erbil. The Mission visited the main paediatric hospital in each of the three governorates. The Mission noted the presence of severely malnourished children in all three locations, many were marasmic and some were suffering from kwashiorkor. Statistics from the paediatric hospital are reported in Tables 23 and 24. There is a considerable degree of seasonal variability with winter months being the most severe. Dr. Robin Mills and Dr. Najmuddin Ahmed from UNICEF reported that paediatric admissions for malnutrition had substantially increased from the previous year in the nutrition rehabilitation centres. In 1994, there were 90-110 admissions per month per centre while in 1995 the number increased to 150-200 per month. Of the cases were kwashiorkor and 70% marasmus, most were less than 3 years old. In the centres, malnourished children are given K-MixII and vegetable oil. However, nothing is given on discharge and thus the same child often returns to the centres.

Impact Teams International (ITI) is an international NGO operating in Erbil. Working closely with the paediatric hospital, they administer a supplementary feeding programme and nutritional rehabilitation centre. Data for 1994 collected by ITI showed 6.8% severe malnutrition (children less than 70% weight-for-height) and 2.6% amongst children under five in the in-patient therapeutic feeding programme in Erbil’s paediatric hospitals (Table 24). In addition, the total case load of malnourished children (less than 90% weight-for-height) in six health centres in Erbil ranged between a minimum of 1214 to a maximum of 1765. The prevalence of gastroenteritis was estimated at 46% and the case-fatality rate due to gastroenteritis was 32.9 (Table 25) per 100 child deaths. Malaria cases have also increased in the past year. In 1/1995, 928 cases were reported for Northern Iraq and by 6/1995 there were 4124 cases. The spraying campaign of the WHO malaria vector control programme in the Northern region had been completed in 7/1995. Sporadic cases of xerophthalmia are also appearing in hospitals in the North. However, UNICEF is administering vitamin A at the same time as measles vaccination. Vaccination coverage is satisfactory for individual vaccinations (BCG = 74.5%, DPT3 = 47.2%; measles = 60 1%), but rates were low for a complete set and were estimated at around 22% by UNICEF staff. There are no reliable data on breastfeeding but according to Zerfas (UNICEF consultant) about 50% of infants were bottle fed. Many of the pregnant women are reported to be anemic. However, no data are available to validate this claim. A household survey conducted by Ward and Rimmer (9/1994) found that 11.6% of non-pregnant women had a body mass index below 18.5 in the population. This compares with around 3-5% in developed countries, and 5-15% in many developing countries. Moreover, a body mass index below 18.5 is associated with low birth weight babies and is also indicative of chronic energy deficiency. These data were compatible with expenditure data collected during the same period, and parallels the general decline in the purchasing power of the population. Not all groups are affected equally and only a minority (although a substantial one) has been sufficiently affected to result in adult malnutrition. In 8/1995 the pockets of vulnerable groups had increased with the internal fighting increased market prices and reduction in WFP food assistance. [ ] administrators, Dr. Ahmad arranged visits and the team were able to discuss the problems and limitations of the system in the head office for Basrah, visit pumping stations and see many local sites where huge areas of sewage water, often green with algae and sometimes showing visible faecal material, produced small lakes in streets and in common and domestic areas. These areas were grossly unhygienic and much of the city smelled badly as a result of these overflows. Overall it is our assessment that the situation concerning sewage disposal in Basrah has deteriorated even further since it was last seen and described as serious in 1993. This of course produces hazards to health which can seriously influence nutritional status in children. Under these circumstances it was not surprising that there were many cases of infectious diseases including typhoid fever and infective hepatitis in the hospitals as well as widespread gastroenteritis in the hot summer months and in consequence much nutritional marasmus. What remains surprising, however, is that the city has been able to avoid major epidemics in the presence of these atrocious sanitary conditions. The team was informed that before 1990 the costs of imports solely related to water and sanitation equipment and spare parts for repair and replacement exceeded US$ 100 million/year for the whole country. In contrast, the total of aid for the same purposes during the last five years from international agencies has totalled less than US$ 10 million. Oh viously in these circumstances, with both the need for permission and with little foreign exchange available for purchases, water and sewage systems are both in continuous decline. Contracts for various stages of the sewage renewal project for the Basrah area were agreed before 8/1990 but delivery could not be completed because of the embargo. Although pipes may have been laid in earlier stages, many were never connected to the pumping system. Since they were believed to be functional many private connections were made to these pipes often leading to small sewage rivers in the middle of many streets and frequent backing-up of the liquid sewage into houses because of the high water table and the inability for natural drainage to occur. Of more importance is the fact that under flat land conditions all sewage is required to be pumped. The team was informed that of the 65 pumping stations in the Basrah area none were able to operate at full capacity because of nonavailability of spare parts for essential components such as the electric motors. A typical situation at a pumping station would show one functional pump from the four required to meet operational needs. Old motors are used extensively with parts being cannibalized in order to keep other motors functional. This procedure has its limits and a common sight throughout all Iraq, in almost all sectors, are massive piles of machinery, equipment, engines and motors which are providing spare parts to keep an ever decreasing number in service.

In the sewage and waste water disposal system street drainage and sewerage lines eventually meet; with functional pumps this is no hazard but without pumps in very flat areas such as for Basrah such sewage backs up into houses and street drains producing foul smelling areas and very large health risks. The Governor cited families living on roofs as well as those using concrete blocks and planks in their houses so that they can live above the level of the backflow sewage. Other areas of the town were described where the sewage accumulation was so extensive and prolonged that vehicles could partially sink. Even the hospitals are not immune since lack of spare parts for tanker trucks can prevent the special disposal of waste from these areas. Further environmental contamination is caused by the illegal use of private tankers that discharge raw sewage into waterways. The observations in the area made by the Mission confirm those made by previous groups, including various Needs Assessment Missions that the water and sanitation situation in Basrah continues to remain critical. Governmental and international agency activities attempting to alleviate the situation are extensive but are nowhere near enough to repair and replace systems that are so extensively devastated. The health risks are serious and continue to cause excessive and preventable mortality especially since intravenous fluid supplies are often problematic both in quality and quantity. Oral rehydration salt mixtures as provided by UNICEF were, however, generally reported as being sufficient. In contrast to the general deterioration in sewage disposal, water availability may have marginally improved with the very large number of strategically sited water tanks throughout the city where drinking water is sold. Despite the slight increase in availability, water quality remains poor with 65% of samples failing either microbiological or mineral purity tests. Drinking water for Basrah city is from the Shatt al Arab which also receives discharged sewage. Because of the 2000 ton/yr deficit in chlorine supply only drinking water is chlorinated often at a lower than desirable level.

In Basrah there are 256 pumping stations for a city of some 4 million. The water treatment from 2.5 mg/l to 1.5 mg/l for sewage disposal, in Baghdad there are 1819 cases of typhoid fever in 1989; this had risen to 24436 cases in 1994. Similarly there were no reported cases of cholera in 1989 but 1345 cases were recorded in 1994. The interaction between nutrition and infection is such that poor water quality and sanitation are contributory causes to both growth failure and acute malnutrition requiring hospitalization in children. The lack of capital for repair and updating of the water supply and sewage system is a significant factor associated with both malnutrition and excess infant mortality. The parallel problems of waterlogging and salinity of agricultural land with consequent reduction in the area available for food production should be noted. The causes relating to the inability of purchasing lack of spare parts for pumps and equipment are identical. [=] years of age, conducted between August 23-29, was a collaborative effort between the FAO Mission and the Nutrition Research Institute (NRI), part of the Ministry of Health. Mission members were responsible for the methodology, including the selection of the sample. In the field, interviews were conducted by NRI staff supervised by FAO Mission members, a UNICEF member and physicians from the NRI. Data were inputted in Ep-Info primarily by NRI staff with assistance from Mission members. Once completed, the data were reviewed by FAO Mission members and duplicate records were removed. A total of 693 households were visited and 768 mothers interviewed. Information was collected on 2120 children under 10 years of age. A total of 594 children under-five years of age were measured for anthropometry, with measurements on 184 children from the eight clusters in Saddam City that had been surveyed in 1995 by the previous FAO Mission. [+]

24239. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War; Part 28: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq; Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: The Baghdad Child Nutrition and Mortality Survey: Methods. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Selection of clusters for the 1995 Baghdad survey was based upon a random cluster sampling design taken from the nationwide survey of infant and child mortality and nutritional status conducted in 1991. In that survey the number of clusters for each governorate was determined by the population size of the governorate according to the 1987 census. Seventy-three clusters were selected for Baghdad for the 1991 survey. The distribution of clusters within Baghdad was determined by the population size of each district using the 1987 census, representative of the city. Within each district the clusters for the 1995 survey were selected randomly from the 1991 clusters using a random number generator (EPIINFO, version 6). The minimum number of clusters required for the 1995 survey was determined to be 25, making the conservative assumption that for 24 contiguous households selected from each cluster between 1-2 children under the age of 10 would be living in each household on average. The assumptions for the sample size for nutritionalanthropometry (n = 420) were as follows: a baseline prevalence of wasting of 3.1% (from 1991 estimates from Baghdad); a 2.5-fold increase in wasting observed in 1995; power of 80%; and an alpha level of 0.05. The weight of children between ages 1 and 5 years was ascertained using a calibrated hanging scale to the nearest 0.1 kg. Height was measured to the nearest 0.1 cm, using either a length board (for children under age two) or a height board. Infants under the age of one were measured using an infant scale. Children were measured wearing loose clothing and without shoes. Age was determined primarily through registration cards. Surveyors were from the Nutritional Research Institute (NRI). Percentiles and Z-scores for height-for-age (stunted), weight-for-age (underweight) and weight-for-height (wasted) were calculated using EPI-Info, version 6. Malnutrition was defined as the percentage of children less than -2 standard deviations (SD) below the median values for the NCHS (United States National Centre for Health Statistics) standardized distributions for the indicators: stunted, underweight and wasted. The criteria for exclusion of observations were:

1. Extreme outlier, defined as values of Z-scores:
   - less than -4 SD or greater than 6 SD for weight-for-height;
   - less than -6 SD or greater than 6 SD for weight-for-age and height-for-age;

2. Age equal to or greater than 60 months.

Anthropometric indicators (stunted, underweight and wasted) are presented for Baghdad and for the 8 clusters in Saddam City examined in 1993. In addition, anthropometric indicators were stratified for the overall sample by the following characteristics: child age (1 year intervals), maternal education, pointprevalence of diarrhoea (defined as 3 loose stools within 24 hours during the past 2 days) and gender. Infant and child mortality estimates are reported comparing pre and post economic sanctions. Effect modification by maternal education in relation to infant and child mortality is also examined. [+]

24240. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War; Part 29: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq; Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: The Baghdad Child Nutrition and Mortality Survey: Results. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The percentage of children below -2 SD in the 8 clusters of Saddam City was 25% for stunting, 22% for underweight and 7% for wasting in the overall sample (25 clusters) for Baghdad, 28% of children were stunted, 29% were underweight and 12% were wasted (Table 26). Severe malnutrition, defined as the percentage of children below -3 SD was noted among children: 10% for stunted, 7% for underweight and 3% for wasted. Mild malnutrition, the percentage of children below -1 SD, was: 56% for height-for-age, 65% for weight-for-age, and 39% for weight-for-height. A comparison of the prevalence measures for malnutrition by child age, maternal education and diarrhoeal disease. No significant gender differences were noted in this population. However certain districts within Baghdad demonstrated higher prevalence estimates of underweight in central part of the city, in neighbourhoods of Rasafah, Karada and New Baghdad. For wasting higher prevalences were noted in Karakh and New Baghdad. Table 29 reports results from the mortality analysis. Infant and child mortality prior to the institution of economic sanctions (8/1990) was compared to the mortality rates for the year prior to the interview (9/1994 -8/1995). Infant mortality had increased approximately two fold compared with the year prior to the intitiation of economic sanctions. Further analysis indicates a two fold increase in infant mortality during the first year of economic sanctions which included the Gulf War (8/1990-9/1991). This two fold increase in infant mortality has been sustained since 1990 until the present. Child mortality had increased nearly five fold, comparing the rate prior to the economic sanctions with the rate observed during the past five years. Table 29 stratifies infant and child mortality rates by maternal education. The effect of the sanctions on infant and child mortality is most pronounced among children of illiterate mothers. Infant mortality increased about 3.6 times and child mortality increased 8.5 times compared with pre-sanction estimates for this sub group. [+]

24241. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War; Part 30: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq; Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Nutrition and Health: The Baghdad Child Nutrition and Mortality Survey: Discussion. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Nutritional status of Iraqi children before the Gulf war and sanctions was similar to children in Kuwait. Since 1991, shortly after the inception of the sanctions, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad has significantly deteriorated. Compared with 1991 estimates, the current survey demonstrates a 4-fold increase in wasting for the city of Baghdad. Prevalence estimates for stunting and underweight have also risen dramatically. For the Saddam City district of Baghdad, there appears to be a modest reduction in the prevalence of wasting compared with the FAO mission report from 1993 that reported a wasting prevalence of 16%. There are several reasons for observed changes in level of wasting which is acutely sensitive to external factors. Since the 1993 survey was conducted in November and the current study was conducted in August, secular variation may in part explain the observed reduction in prevalence. Differential child mortality may also explain the lower prevalence of wasting observed in Saddam City in 1995 if severely wasted children were more likely to die in 1995 than in 1993 due to deteriorating conditions. In addition, this population may be better able to... cope with adversity since there are more economic options such as bagging or peddling goods which were not available in 1995. The Mission noticed that fewer male members were at home during the current survey as compared to the 1993 survey. For Baghdad overall, the prevalence of underweight children (29%) has increased to a level comparable with children from Ghana (27%) and Mali (31%). For stunting, prevalence rates are similar to estimates from Sri Lanka (28%) and Madagascar (28%). The prevalence of wasting in Baghdad is comparable with estimates from Madagascar (12%) and Burma (11%). The prevalence of severe wasting is comparable to data from northern Sudan (2.3%).

In contrast, 1991 estimates of malnutrition from Baghdad are comparable with estimates from Kuwait (12% for stunting, 6% for underweight, and 3% for wasting). The current nutritional situation among children in Baghdad is more similar to lesser developed countries with a larger percentage of the population residing in rural settings which may be a reflection of the inability to maintain systems for sanitation and clean water under sanctions. The observed increase in under five mortality may also be related to the sanitation/water problem in Baghdad, where the occurrence of diarrhoea-related deaths has increased nearly threefold compared to the time period prior to the sanctions. Due to the increasing problem of food insecurity and the inability to repair the infrastructure for provision of sanitation and potable water, the nutritional status of children in Baghdad will continue to deteriorate unless appropriate measures are taken to secure food and to provide a safe environment. The Mission recommends that a nation-wide nutritional surveillance system be put in place immediately in light of the poor nutritional status of children in Baghdad in order prevent the further deterioration of the nutritional status and mortality of children under five years of age in Iraq. Moreover, it should be noted that the nutritional status of children in southern Iraq and North is likely to be even worse than reported in Baghdad. [=]

24242. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 31: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Conclusions and Recommendations: (A) Food Production and Access. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. (1) The only viable long-term solution is for Iraq, a potentially rich country, to use its own resources for earning foreign exchange and hence be able again to feed itself and provide for the sick and vulnerable. The GOI and the Security Council are urged to come to an agreement on the sales of oil so that these needs can be met.

(2) Recognizing that Iraq faces enormous shortages of basic foods in 1995/96, the Mission urges that the country be enabled through appropriate and agreeable mechanisms to import necessary foods to feed its population. The estimated foreign exchange required for the purpose is US$ 2.7 billion.

(3) Recognizing that rehabilitation and promotion of the agricultural sector has a crucial role towards ensuring food security in the country, the Mission recommends that suitable arrangements be made urgently to enable Iraq to import on a priority basis agricultural machinery including those used in drainage/irrigation—replacements and spare parts—and necessary seeds, fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides for the rehabilitation of agriculture.

(4) Taking into account the linkages between nutritional status, health, and the quality of water and sanitation the Mission also recommends the importing of spare parts and equipment to ensure adequate access to potable water and the safe disposal of sewage material.

(5) Recognizing the deterioration in the whole health care system including hospitals, clinics and primary health care facilities, the procurement of needed medical supplies, equipment and diagnostic material including essential drugs is urgently required.

(6) Such suitable arrangements could entail the authorization by the Security Council of the release of additional funds, in particular from Iraq's frozen assets, for the import of the essential items mentioned above through a mechanism that both GOI and the Security Council would recognise and accept. FAO can play a significant role in facilitating these actions, particularly in the case of seeds, fertilizers, pesticides, herbicides and spare parts and providing institutional support.

(7) Recognizing that the most vulnerable people need food assistance for survival, the Mission urges that the WFP food assistance be restored to previous levels and provided regularly for the targeted beneficiaries in the country on the basis of need (in both the North as well as in South and Central Iraq). [=]

the vast majority of the population and nutritional status continues to go from bad to worse. If no additional funds or resources are provided the Mission recommends that the following steps should be taken:

(8) In the light of the reduced public food ration the GOI should as far as possible ensure the ration is nutritionally balanced, in particular with regard to good quality protein, oil and micronutrients.

(9) It is recommended that WFP give consideration to increasing the amount of rice, pulses and oil, essential items in the Iraqi diet, in the food aid they provide, particularly for consumption in social institutions and hospitals.

(10) In order to improve the nutritional status of school children as well as those not attending school, the Mission recommends that: (a) food aid be provided to children through school feeding programmes and (b) new programmes should be developed to address the needs of the increasing population of street children in the large cities.

(11) Recognizing the need for households to supplement the ration with nutritious and least expensive foods, the continuation and expansion of current mass media campaigns in nutrition education is encouraged. How best to utilize the food available at the household level how to prepare appropriate weaning foods and the benefits of breastfeeding are examples of important nutrition messages. Breast-feeding is particularly important given that the effects of malnutrition on mortality is much greater in the absence of breast-feeding.

(12) The Mission endorses the various actions taken by the Government and UN agencies to improve nutritional status such as salt iodization, vitamin A supplementation with EPI and the establishment of nutritional rehabilitation centres and calls for their continuation and expansion.

(13) The Mission views with concern the increasing prevalence of iron deficiency anaemia in both children and pregnant women and recommends the expansion of iron supplementation programmes. The distribution of anti-helmintic drugs would also be of value here. The Mission believes that the fortification of flour with iron as well as other micronutrients such as calcium, thiamine, niacin and lysine, while desirable is unrealistic in the present circumstances.

(14) It is recommended that an appropriate Agency be charged with examining the overall problems and deficiencies in the health system in Iraq with the view to provide advice on the most cost-effective ways to utilize limited resources for delivering promotive and preventive health care.

(15) The Mission calls for the continuation and expansion of public health campaigns. Simple messages such as promoting the boiling of drinking water and safe sanitary practises are effective in reducing the occurrence of infection, especially among children under the age of 5 years.

(16) In order to improve the efficiency of corrective actions and to establish priorities in the allocation of the existing resources, including targeting of food aid to the most vulnerable groups, it is recommended a nationwide nutrition surveillance system be set up in Iraq with special emphasis on urban and periurban areas. An outline of a proposal for monitoring the food and nutrition situation is presented in Annex 2.

(17) Given the critical health and social problems confronted by the population, the Mission recommends that academic and governmental institutions should be encouraged to perform relevant applied research and interventional programmes in nutrition and public health.

(18) The Nutrition Research Institute and appropriate Governmental agencies should strengthen their efforts to reduce the number of products on the market which contain non-food grade components and do not meet minimum standards of food safety. FAO can provide assistance to the Government in this area if requested. [\]

Barley: area 1.25 million ha; production 790000 tons; yield 632 kg/ha.
Paddy: area 175000 ha; production 315000 tons; yield 1800 kg/ha.
Maize: area 75000 ha; production 90000 tons; yield 1200 kg/ha.
Total: area 2.5 million ha; production 1.993 million tons; yield 773 kg/ha.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

kg/ha. [-]

24255. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 44: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Table 11: Domestic Food Shortages in Iraq, 1995/1996. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Wheat flour: estimated production 989000 tons; total requirements 3.209 million tons; shortage or import requirement 2.22 million tons; shortage 69% or total requirement. Rice: estimated production 221000 tons; total requirements 994000 tons; shortage or import requirement 773000 tons; shortage 78% or total requirement. Barley: estimated production 892000 tons; total requirements 1.217 million tons; shortage or import requirement 327000 tons; shortage 27% or total requirement. Maize: estimated production 90000 tons; total requirements 213000 tons; shortage or import requirement 123000 tons; shortage 58%
or total requirement.

- Pulses: estimated production 50000 tons; total requirements 120000 tons; shortage or import requirement 700000 tons; shortage 58% or total requirement.
- Vegetable oil: estimated production 100000 tons; total requirements 298000 tons; shortage or import requirement 198000 tons; shortage 66% or total requirement.
- Red Meat: estimated production 94000 tons; total requirements 227000 tons; shortage or import requirement 133000 tons; shortage 58% or total requirement.
- Fish: estimated production 50000 tons; total requirements 62000 tons; shortage or import requirement 57000 tons; shortage 92% or total requirement.
- Eggs (million): estimated production 150 million; total requirements 1966 million; shortage or import requirement 1816 million tons; shortage 92% or total requirement.
- Milk: estimated production unknown; total requirements 372000 tons; shortage or import requirement 223000 tons; shortage 93% or total requirement.
- Sugar: estimated production 80000 tons; total requirements 814000 tons; shortage or import requirement 734000 tons; shortage 90% or total requirement.
- Baby Milk: estimated production negligible; total requirements 43000 tons; shortage or import requirement 43000 tons; shortage 100% or total requirement.

[Notes: (a) Estimated production is government and mission estimates. Conversion ratio of wheat into flour is 80%, reflecting the high rate of non-grain impurities in the 1995 wheat output; the recovery rate in the case of paddy into rice is 70%. (b) Total requirements are calculated using standard per person annual requirement of each item in Iraq. (c) If maize for feed for poultry and livestock is included, the shortage quantity will be much larger. (d) Pulses include peas, green grain, lentil, broad beans, beans. (e) Milk production in the country has declined sharply. It has been generously assumed that some 40% of the requirement will be met through domestic production of fresh milk or that many poor people may not consume milk. (f) Total population 1995/1996: 20.7 million.]

- Vegetable Oil: (1993) 0.50; (1995) 0.625.
- Sugar: (1993) 1.50; (1995) 0.50.
- Tea: (1993) 0.075; (1995) 0.10.

[Note: Baby milk is provided for infants 0-1 years (four tons weighing 450 grams each for each infant). The estimated number of infants in Iraq is one million, of whom 0.826 million in Central and South Iraq. The quantity provided meets about 50% of the baby's need.]

24257. FAO; International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

---

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Product</th>
<th>Unit Price</th>
<th>Daily Supply</th>
<th>Daily Supply Percentage Covered</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Wheat flour</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $224 per ton</td>
<td>$497 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poultry meat</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $950 per ton</td>
<td>$197 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eggs</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $18 per box of 360 eggs</td>
<td>$91 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vegetable oil</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tea</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $1500 per ton; $93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk powder</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poultry meat</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $950 per ton</td>
<td>$197 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eggs</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $18 per box of 360 eggs</td>
<td>$91 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vegetable oil</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tea</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $1500 per ton; $93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk powder</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poultry meat</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $950 per ton</td>
<td>$197 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eggs</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $18 per box of 360 eggs</td>
<td>$91 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vegetable oil</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tea</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $1500 per ton; $93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milk powder</td>
<td>(CIF Baghdad) $3000 per ton; $2200 per ton; $1500 per ton</td>
<td>$93 million import cost.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

---

[Note: Recovery rate used for wheat is 85% and for paddy 70%. Total Iraqi population 20.7 million minus one million children under one year; southern and central Iraqi population 17.1 million minus 0.826 million children under one year.] [=]
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Nutrient</th>
<th>FBS 1988-1990</th>
<th>Adult RDA</th>
<th>Daily Ration</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Thiamine (mg)</td>
<td>3.2</td>
<td>1.5</td>
<td>1.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Riboflavin (mg)</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Folate (microgram)</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.7</td>
<td>1.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vitamin B6 (mg)</td>
<td>2.6</td>
<td>2.0</td>
<td>2.0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lysine (mg/g)</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

[Note: RDA values (NAS-NRC 1989): adult male 25-50 years. Lysine mg/g protein is indicative of protein quality. This is not an RDA but is the value recommended by FAO/WHO 1991.]
1995 (January): total patients, 505; number of diarrhoeal cases, 211, 41.8% of total cases; total deaths, 12; deaths due to diarrhoea, 1.
1995 (February): total patients, 530; number of diarrhoeal cases, 208, 39.2% of total cases; total deaths, 35; deaths due to diarrhoea, 0.
1995 (March): total patients, 546; number of diarrhoeal cases, 125, 22.9% of total cases; total deaths, 29; deaths due to diarrhoea, 3.
1995 (April): total patients, 490; number of diarrhoeal cases, 109, 20.2% of total cases; total deaths, 18; deaths due to diarrhoea, 3.
1995 (May): total patients, 557; number of diarrhoeal cases, 435, 78.1% of total cases; total deaths, 34; deaths due to diarrhoea, 3.
1995 (June): total patients, 607; number of diarrhoeal cases, 554, 91.3% of total cases; total deaths, 27; deaths due to diarrhoea, 6.

[Source: Statistical Department, Mosul Saddam Hospital.] [=]

February: total births, 341; 3.8% EBW.
March: total births, 368; 3.8% EBW.
April: total births, 354; 2.5% EBW.
May: total births, 297; 3.4% EBW.
June: total births, 306; 1.0% EBW.
July: total births, 367; 2.7% EBW.
Aberage: total births, 363; 3.7% EBW.

[Source: Statistical Department, Mosul Saddam Hospital.] [=]

April: Ainkawa, 59; Datartoo, 201; Badawa, 142; M. Baiellan, 932; Beneselawa, 185; Terawa, 246; Totals, 1765.
May: Ainkawa, 79; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, 224; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 185; Terawa, 226; Totals, 1214.
June: Ainkawa, 79; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, 224; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 185; Terawa, 226; Totals, 1214.
July: Ainkawa, 79; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, 224; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 185; Terawa, 226; Totals, 1214.
August: Ainkawa, 106; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, 156; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 215; Terawa, 337; Totals, 1394.
September: Ainkawa, 201; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, 140; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 220; Terawa, 341; Totals, 1402.
October: Ainkawa, 209; Datartoo, not reported; Badawa, not reported; M. Baiellan, 500; Beneselawa, 220; Terawa, 34; Totals, 1270.

[Source: Miller, Cathy. Impact Teams International.] [=]

24268. FAO: International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 57: Technical Cooperation Programme: Evaluation of Food and Nutrition Situation in Iraq: Terminal Statement Prepared For the Government of Iraq (Rome 1995): Table 24: Number of Under-Five Years of Age Admissions To Suleimaniya Paediatric Hospital for Malnutrition (January, June, July and December 1993-1995): x. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. 1/1993: total paediatric admissions, 1820; total malnutrition admissions, 78; malnutrition 4.3% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 16, 20.5% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 14, 18.0% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 30, 38.5% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 18; deaths, 3.
6/1993: total paediatric admissions, 3385; total malnutrition admissions, 65; malnutrition 1.9% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 17, 26.2% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 15, 20.0% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 25, 38.5% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 10; deaths, 0.
7/1993: total paediatric admissions, 4086; total malnutrition admissions, 122; malnutrition 3.0% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 30, 24.6% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 23, 18.9% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 52, 42.6% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 17; deaths, 0.
12/1993: total paediatric admissions, 1847; total malnutrition admissions, 138; malnutrition 7.5% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 33, 23.9% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 18, 13.0% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 50, 36.2% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 37, deaths, 0.
1/1994: total paediatric admissions, 2104; total malnutrition admissions, 108; malnutrition 5.1% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 35, 32.4% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 13, 12.0% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 47, 43.5% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 13; deaths, 0.
6/1994: total paediatric admissions, 3109; total malnutrition admissions, 326; malnutrition 10.5% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 94, 25.8% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 66, 20.2% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 149, 45.7% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 27; deaths, 18.
7/1994: total paediatric admissions, 3286; total malnutrition admissions, 606; malnutrition 18.4% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 195, 32.2% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 94, 15.5% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 290, 47.9% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 27; deaths, 10.
12/1994: total paediatric admissions, 1303; total malnutrition admissions, 234; malnutrition 17.9% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 78, 33.3% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 37, 15.8% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 106, 45.3% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 13; deaths, 4.
1/1995: total paediatric admissions, 1240; total malnutrition admissions, 362; malnutrition 29.2% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 97, 26.8% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 79, 26.8% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 170, 47.0% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 16; deaths, 2.
6/1995: total paediatric admissions, 2304; total malnutrition admissions, 592; malnutrition 20.4% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 188, 31.8% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 106, 17.9% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 293, 49.5% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 5; deaths, 6.
7/1995: total paediatric admissions, 2368; total malnutrition admissions, 502; malnutrition 21.2% of total admissions; marasmus-severe cases, 177, 35.5% of total malnutrition; marasmus-moderate cases, 75, 42.4% of total malnutrition; marasmus-mild cases, 298, 49.4% of total malnutrition; kwashiorkor cases, 2; deaths, 14.

[Source: Sulaymaniya Pediatric Hospital.] [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

February: children admitted, 757; children with GE, 128; prevalence rate, 16.9%; children who died, 76; number of children dying with GE, 12; case fatality rate, 15.7%.

March: children admitted, 512; children with GE, 91; prevalence rate, 17.8%; children who died, 45; number of children dying with GE, 7; case fatality rate, 15.5%.

April: children admitted, 649; children with GE, 184; prevalence rate, 28.4%; children who died, 46; number of children dying with GE, 11; case fatality rate, 23.9%.

May: children admitted, 654; children with GE, 294; prevalence rate, 45.0%; children who died, 49; number of children dying with GE, 16; case fatality rate, 32.7%.

June: children admitted, 1278; children with GE, 850; prevalence rate, 66.5%; children who died, 71; number of children dying with GE, 37; case fatality rate, 52.1%.

July: children admitted, 848; children with GE, 527; prevalence rate, 62.1%; children who died, 60; number of children dying with GE, 29; case fatality rate, 48.3%.

August: children admitted, 952; children with GE, 542; prevalence rate, 57.0%; children who died, 36; number of children dying with GE, 12; case fatality rate, 33.3%.

September: children admitted, 1040; children with GE, 578; prevalence rate, 55.6%; children who died, 43; number of children dying with GE, 11; case fatality rate, 25.6%.

October: children admitted, 918; children with GE, 506; prevalence rate, 55.1%; children who died, 52; number of children dying with GE, 24; case fatality rate, 48.1%.

November: children admitted, 852; children with GE, 410; prevalence rate, 48.1%; children who died, 61; number of children dying with GE, 27; case fatality rate, 44.3%.

December: children admitted, 792; children with GE, 351; prevalence rate, 44.9%; children who died, 57; number of children dying with GE, 24; case fatality rate, 42.1%.

Total: children admitted, 10165; children with GE, 4686; prevalence rate, 46.1%; children who died, 674; number of children dying with GE, 222; case fatality rate, 32.9%.

[Source: Cathy Miller, Impact Teams International.]

Height for Age (n=585):
- Age: 0-11 months, 23%; 12-23 months, 38%; 24-35 months, 26%; 36-47 months, 30%; 48-59 months, 24%.
- Maternal education (n=585): illiterate, 32%; primary, 35%; secondary, 21%; post-secondary, 16%.
- Diarrheal disease (n=576): yes, 26%; no, 29%.
- Weight for Age (n=593):
  - Age: 0-11 months, 25%; 12-23 months, 25%; 24-35 months, 35%; 36-47 months, 24%; 48-59 months, 25%.
  - Maternal education (n=593): illiterate, 36%; primary, 28%; secondary, 29%; post-secondary, 24%.
  - Diarrheal disease (n=584): yes, 31%; no, 29%.
- Weight for Height (n=588):
  - Age: 0-11 months, 13%; 12-23 months, 12%; 24-35 months, 13%.
  - 36-47 months, 5%; 48-59 months, 17%.
  - Maternal education (n=588): illiterate, 16%; primary, 9%; secondary, 14%; post-secondary, 13%.
- Diarrheal disease (n=579): yes, 16%; no, 11%.

- Number of deaths: reference period, 16; during economic sanctions, 36; relative mortality (95% confidence interval), 2.0.
- Number of live births: reference period, 199; during economic sanctions, 224; relative mortality (95% confidence interval), 1.15, 3.49.
- Risk of infant deaths: reference period, 0.0804; during economic sanctions, 0.1607.
- Child Mortality (less than five years of age):
  - Number of deaths: reference period, 33; during economic sanctions, 245; relative mortality (95% confidence interval), 4.88, 10.0.
  - Number of live births: reference period, 812; during economic sanctions, 1236; relative mortality (95% confidence interval), 3.43, 6.94.
  - Risk of infant deaths: reference period, 0.0406; during economic sanctions, 0.1982.

[Note: Reference period for infant mortality includes all children born between 8/1989-7/1990; reference period for child mortality includes all children born between 8/1985-7/1990. Index period during economic sanctions for infant mortality includes all children born in the year prior to the date of interview (9/1994-8/1995); Index period for calculation of child mortality includes all children born from 8/1990 to the date of interview (under the age of 5).]
to end racism, sexism, and poverty in the United States with opposition to US militarism and domination around the world. The IAC was the first organization in the US to expose the damages of US bombing of innocent Iraqi civilians and the massive destruction of the Iraqi infrastructure. This evidence was compiled and published in the book War Crimes. The Centercoordinated an International War Crimes Tribunal that held hearings in twenty countries and thirty US cities probing the Pentagon's systematic destruction of Iraq. Evidence presented at this War Crimes Tribunal, which implicated the United States in gross violations of international law, was published in Ramsey Clark's ground-breaking book The Fire This Time. For the last five years the IAC has been a leader of the movement to unconditionally end US/UN sanctions against Iraq. It has coordinated international meetings and teach-ins, held demonstrations, published news releases and fact sheets, and, in collaboration with the Peoples Video Network, produced several video documentaries on sanctions. The IAC has also mobilized opposition to the thirty-five-year US blockade of Cuba, and organized shipments of medical aid to the socialist island. The IAC continues to actively oppose US military involvement throughout the globe from Haiti to Somalia, from Panama to Bosnia, from the Philippines to Palestine. One of the main purposes of the International Action Center is to expose the intricate web of lies the Pentagon weaves before, during, and after each military intervention. The IAC shows that US intervention is dictated by big business's drive for profits, and that even as military funding continues to grow, schools, hospitals, and social programs are slashed in the hands of the US war machine. The International Action Center is a volunteer activist organization. In its campaigns opposing US intervention, the Center relies totally on the donations and assistance of supporters around the country. To be part of a growing network, or to make a donation, request a speaker, or volunteer your support, contact the IAC. [International Action Center: 39 West 14th St., Suite 206, New York, NY 10011, USA (212) 633-6646; fax (212) 633-2889 e-mail: ncpa@pipeline.com; 2489 Mission St., Room 28, San Francisco, CA 94110, USA (415) 821-6545; fax (415) 821-5782 e-mail: afreeman(at)igc.apc.org] [=]

24277. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations; End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 85: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: International Relief Association. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The International Relief Association (IRA) is a charitable, taxexempt public organization established in 1992 by a group of Iraqi Americans. Its main objective was to ease the suffering of the people of Iraq and to extend a hand to the poor, needy, and less fortunate people elsewhere. The IRA mission statement is summarized by a verse in the holy Quran: "If anyone saved a life, it would be equivalent to saving the entire humanity." Another part of the IRA mission is to help needy women and their families. The IRA was and is the most active nonprofit organization helping the people of Iraq. IRA resources are: direct contributions from mosques, Islamic centers, churches, and others; in-kind contributions, mainly medicine; mail campaigns; fund-raising; return on investments. The IRA fulfills its humanitarian obligations and commitments by: delivering food and medical supplies; preventive education; establishing medical clinics; sponsorship of orphans and poor families; providing work opportunities for women and heads of household. In the last four years the IRA has extended its operation to Canada, the United Kingdom and Turkey, and has joint projects with a wide spectrum of other relief organizations inside Iraq and in the United States and elsewhere. The IRA is one of the fastest-growing nonprofit organizations. Its annual income increased from less than $100,000 to more than $2 million in just four years. The budget of the medical program grew from zero to more than $500,000 and is expected to reach more than $1 million by the end of 1996. The operating expenses of the IRA are one of the lowest for this type of organization, being less than 10.1% throughout its entire operation. The entire system is built on volunteers plus a few employees. The
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Iraq

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Association has extended its help to the people of Bosnia, Somalia, Kashmir, Africa, and others. Its ambition is to establish field offices in northern Iraq and Africa and to build a network of partnership with others. Contact the International Relief Association to make a donation, request speakers, or volunteer your support. [International Relief Association: 24522 Harper Ave. St. Clair Shores, MI 48080, USA Phone: (800) 827-3543; fax: (810) 772-3159.]

24278. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations; End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 86: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions was established in London to coordinate international work against sanctions. The organization includes on its board former heads of state Ahmed Ben Bella of Algeria and Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua, former Premier of Malta Karmenu Mifsud Bonnici, British Member of Parliament Tony Benn, former First Lady of Greece Margarita Papandreou and former US Attorney General Ramsey Clark. On 8/19-20/1995, this organization drew over 600 people to the London Conference of the International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions. The main meeting of 350 people heard international delegates from more than twenty countries present eyewitness testimony and help build the campaign for an International Convention to end the use of these sanctions and blockades. The findings of the Commission were as follows: Members of the International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions meeting in London on 8/19-20/1995, having heard testimony from lawyers, government officials, members of parliament, human rights activists, medical experts, religious leaders, journalists, youth, trade unionists, and others, from fifteen countries and twenty-five nationalities, hereby resolve that: (a) Sanctions have increasingly become the weapon of choice, a brutal instrument of foreign policy carried out by the big powers, particularly the United States and Britain. (b) In the recent period, the target of these sanctions has exclusively been the people of developing countries; those who suffer the most, and those who are the most vulnerable, the young, the old, the ill. (c) Sanctions are a new weapon of racism and colonial domination. (d) These criminal sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council against Iraq, Libya, and other countries are a continuation of the policy of unilateral sanctions imposed by the US, most notably the blockade of Cuba, and on north Korea, Nicaragua, Panama, and Vietnam. (e) Sanctions as a form of collective punishment are a violation of all international laws, conventions and humanitarian norms. We therefore condemn all sanctions. Embargoes, Famine, and blockades as a continuing crime against humanity and urge public mass action to prevent new aggression. [International Commission of Inquiry on Economic Sanctions: Hugh Stephens, coordinator BM 2966, London WCIN 3XX, Britain Tel/fax: (0171) 436 4636 E-mail: justice(a)easynet.co.uk] [a]

24279. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations; End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 87: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Iraq Action Coalition-Internet. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The Iraq Action Coalition is a broad-based network dedicated to providing information on the devastating consequences of the blockade against Iraq and to providing assistance to the people of Iraq. The Iraq Action Coalition was formed in 1995 as a “grassroots” response to the blockade’s lethal destruction against Iraq and to providing assistance to the people of Iraq. The Iraq Action Coalition has set up a homepage on the Internet that presents detailed information on the effects of the deadly blockade, the illegitimacy of the blockade, the use of chemical and biological weapons in the military war against Iraq, and the associations and relief organizations working to lift the blockade. In addition, updated news and urgent appeals for needed action to stop the war against Iraq are continually added to the page. [Rania Masri, Founder and Coordinator Iraq Action Coalition home page: http://www4.ncsu.edu/rmasri/ww/iac/Tel/(919)848-4738 and (919) 846-8264; fax: (919) 846-7422 E-mail:rmasri(a)ncsu.edu Address: 7309 Haymarket Lane Raleigh, NC 27615, USA.] [a]

24280. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq; reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 88: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Bridge to Baghdad. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. A Bridge to Baghdad has sent delegations to Iraq to gather information and report back in Italy on the consequences of the blockade. It has also organized international conferences on this subject. This group, with the support of many other progressive and working-class organizations in Italy, coordinated protest actions in Rome, Milan, Naples, Reggio Emilia, and other areas of Italy on 1/16-17/1996, the fifth anniversary of the Gulf War. The following are excerpts from their call for those demonstrations: Never has such a complete embargo been imposed for so long on an entire population. In the same way, never since the Second World War has there been a bombardment as massive as the one on Iraq in 1-2/1991. At the same time the “new world order” that was supposed to be born in the Gulf War has revealed itself to be an order singularly founded upon the domination of the most industrialized nations over the rest of the world. The economic divergence between rich and poor countries has widened since that time, fed by the mechanism of indebtedness and by the policies of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Even the peace process in the Middle East risks being heavily determined by Western neocolonial control. The countries of the ex-Eastern bloc, abandoned to the “free market,” are experiencing an unprecedented economic and social crisis. In recent years there have been a hundred “local wars” that have produced millions of civilian victims. To these victims can be added those suffering under the embargoes of Libya and of Serbia as well as that against Iraq and of the thirty-year-long economic blockade by the US against Cuba. We demand: the immediate revocation of the embargoes against Iraq, Libya, and Cuba. [A Bridge to Baghdad—Campaign of Solidarity with the Civilian Victims of the Gulf War Via della Guglia 69/a, 00186 Roma, Italy; Tel: 00396/6780808; fax: 00396/65000650 E-mail: fa.alberti(a)agora.stm.it.] [a]

24281. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 89: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Call To Action from the Second International Athens Conference Against the Embargo on Iraq. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The Second International Athens Conference Against the Embargo on Iraq denounced embargos against any country as a new and terrible weapon of mass destruction that affects most severely women, children, the elderly, the sick. All international law is based on protecting the defenseless from the consequences of hostility, yet sanctions make them the first target. It is particularly shameful that sanctions have become a weapon in the hands of the rich and powerful countries, which they use against developing nations. We hold those responsible for the continuation of the sanctions on Iraq to be fully liable, legally and morally, for the consequences of their actions. The conference, which was attended by 400 participants from more than 20 countries, was appalled to hear of the catastrophic consequences of the embargo, which worsen day by day. We therefore call on all human rights, peace, labour, women’s, religious, youth and other organizations to take urgent action to ensure that this crime against humanity is terminated immediately. (a) Present letters and petitions to the Secretary General of the UN and to the governments of the member states of the UN Security Council, focusing particularly on the US Congress and the British Parliament, demanding the lifting of the sanctions. Conduct publicity activities around these actions. (b) Hold demonstrations or present petitions at the UN of fices located in various countries, for
24282. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 90: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Spanish Campaign for Lifting the Sanctions on Iraq. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The Spanish Campaign for Lifting the Sanctions on Iraq organized an International Conference Against the Embargo on Iraq in Madrid on 9/30-10/1/1995. This conference evaluated the effects of the sanctions on Iraq and took steps to improve solidarity with the Iraqi people, including sending delegations to Iraq and bringing Iraqi children to Spain for medical treatment. The group also organized protest meetings throughout Spain in 1/1996 on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the Gulf War. The following is part of a statement issued at the demonstration outside the US Embassy in Madrid: The embargo is a weapon of mass destruction that must be banned from international relations. It is a weapon of intervention more pernicious than war, managed by the Security Council and which in the case of Iraq particularly serves the interests of the United States in the Middle East: defense of Israel, military control of Arab petroleum reserves, and the neocolonial restructuring of the entire region. We condemn the use of economic sanctions and of all types of embargoes or blockades. We condemn the continuation of the blockade of Cuba by the United States and the economic sanctions imposed on Libya. We want to reiterate here today, in front of the US Embassy, our solidarity with the Iraqi people and our condemnation of the continuation of the sanctions against that country, a true genocide developed by the Security Council under the domination of the US and which has to be considered a crime against humanity. [Spanish Campaign for Lifting the Sanctions on Iraq: de Correos 14, 180, 28080 Madrid, Spain Fax: (1) 531 75 99.]

24283. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 91: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Organization in Solidarity with the People of Africa Asia & Latin America (OSPAAAL). New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. OSPAAAL Madrid has organized international conferences opposing blockades and sanctions. It has also circulated the following appeal which, like the International Appeal, has gotten support from prominent personalities.

Against Blockades and Economic Embargoes: Resolution 44/215 of the United Nations General Assembly of 12/22/1989 condemned "blockades embargoes, and other economic sanctions," qualifying them as "incompatible with the foundations of the UN charter," and proclaiming that "developed countries must stop threatening and applying financial and economic restrictions, blockades, Embargoes, Famine, and other economic sanctions, against developing countries as a form of political and economic coercion that affects their political, economic, and social development." In spite of this resolution of the General Assembly, the Security Council as well as the United States and other countries keep using this cruel instrument in their dealings with countries whose governments or regimes they do not approve of. This is the case of the blockades and economic embargoes from which the people of Cuba, Iraq and Libya, among others, are suffering. We back the condemnation of blockades and economic embargoes expressed in Resolution 44/215 of the United Nations General Assembly. These economic sanctions applied to a whole nation are real crimes against humanity that, sometimes, cause more deaths and damage than war itself. They punish indiscriminately, against every juridical principle, entire nations, their victims being preferably the most vulnerable sectors of the population: babies, children, ill and old people, pregnant women, etc. Because of their cruelty and inhumanity, this type of indiscriminate economic sanctions, which are actually hunger weapons, should be banned from international relations. They are chemical and biological weapons. Therefore: (1) We demand that the Security Council fulfill Resolution 44/215 of the General Assembly of 12/22/1989. (2) In accordance with this resolution, we demand the immediate lifting of the blockades and economic embargoes inflicted on the peoples of Cuba, Iraq and Libya among others. [OSPAAAL—Jaime Ballesteros Valverde, 28-2804 Madrid, Spain Tel/fax: (01) 523 18 29.]

24284. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 92: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Voices in the Wilderness. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. Objectives: (a) We intend to deliberately violate the United States/United Nations' economic sanctions against the people of Iraq. (b) We demand that the government of the United States end these immoral and unjust sanctions or prosecute us to the full extent of the law. (c) We invite others to join us or to begin their own project to lift these sanctions. (d) We will personally and publicly declare our intention to the US Attorney General. (e) We will solicit medical relief supplies and continually campaign to lift the sanctions. The war of economic sanctions, which began in 8/1990, continues even now. (f) Members of our group will openly and publicly transport supplies through US Customs and UN checkpoints and into Iraq. There, they will be delivered to the people. We recognize that we could be stopped at any point for a variety of reasons. In that event, we will rely on nonviolent action to continue our effort.

Why are we doing this? In the five years since the Persian Gulf War, as many as 576000 children have died as a result of sanctions imposed against Iraq by the United Nations Security Council, according to a report by the UN Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO). If the blockade continues, UNICEF tells u.s., 1.5 million more children will eventually suffer malnutrition or a variety of unchecked illnesses because the sanctions make antibiotics and other standard medicines impossible to get. Yet the UN Security Council and the US government continue to defend a blockade whose highest casualty rate is among those under five years old. We can no longer remain party to this slaughter in the desert.

Who are we? We are teachers, social workers, parents, church workers, friends. Five years ago we opposed the Persian Gulf War in a variety of nonviolent ways. Some lived on the border between the opposing armies before and during part of the war; others traveled to Iraq immediately before and after the war. Still others filled the streets of the US to decry the war. Many have witnessed the consequences of sanctions firsthand and maintained contact with NGOs that continually attempt to deliver relief supplies to neediest groups and individuals in Iraq. We oppose the development, storage and use—in any country—of any weapons of mass destruction, be they nuclear, chemical, biological or economic. We advocate active development of effective nonviolent methods of social struggle. What is the penalty for violating these sanctions? We understand that the maximum penalty for violating the Treasury Department law regarding shipments to Iraq is a $1 million fine, twelve years in prison and an administrative penalty of $2500000. If you would like to add your name or your support, travel with a future delegation to Iraq, send medical supplies or donations, organize a similar campaign in your area, or publicize this project, please contact us at the address below. [Voices in the Wilderness, 1460 W.st Carmen Ave., Chicago IL 60640, USA; (312) 784-8065; fax: (312) 784-8837; e-mail: kkelly@alics.apc.org]
By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 93: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Kerbala Hospital Fund. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The Kerbala Hospital Fund, Iraq, is a project initiated by Barbara Nimri Aziz. Its goal is to generate and funnel assistance to a specific hospital that was brought almost to a standstill by the five years of sanctions. Funds are sought to purchase food and basic medical supplies according to priorities set by the hospital’s doctors. Kerbala Hospital is no different than most hospitals across Iraq today. Wards are closing and surgery has come to a halt because of lack of supplies. Trained doctors cannot work because of the conditions. Medical journals have been available for over five years. The hospital has two ambulances where it once had thirty-six. It no longer functions as an emergency center for more than forty local clinics throughout the governorate. Dr. Kirim Naffi and Dr. Aziz Ali are dedicated senior staff at the hospital. With their advice and ongoing cooperation, Aziz established the Kerbala Hospital Fund to help reequip the hospital with some of its most basic equipment and supplies. The monies collected will be used to purchase supplies in Jordan for shipping to Iraq, the quickest and least expensive method. Iraqi officials have no objection to these supplies being designated for the Kerbala Hospital Center. They can be readily imported. The first shipment is expected in 4/1996. Funds are sought for basic supplies. $100 can purchase 40 kg of milk, or twenty sheets, or seven blankets, or sets of wires and discs for cardiovascular treatment and basic antibiotics. We are also seeking to accumulate several thousand dollars to obtain an oxygen machine to be used locally to manufacture oxygen to distribute to other hospitals to help them restore their surgical services. Please send $100, or more if you can. This is tax-deductible. Make check out to “Islamic Center of Long Island” and designate the “Kerbala Hospital Fund.” Send to: Dr. Barbara N. Aziz, 160 Sixth Ave., New York, NY 10013, USA. [=]

24286. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 94: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Peoples Rights Fund. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The People’s Rights Fund is a small foundation with limited resources that has channeled its support to projects often considered too controversial for more traditional funders. This has included the production of educational material opposing sanctions against defenseless populations, and combating racism and anti-Arab bigotry during the buildup to the Gulf War against Iraq. Its grants allowed the production of leaflets and other materials for the first US demonstrations against the Gulf War. It has also helped provide informational material for major rallies against the blockade of Cuba. A grant from the People’s Rights Fund initiated the work on this book, the children are dying. The People’s Rights Fund is a nonprofit, tax-exempt, educational organization. It depends on contributions from people who understand that grassroots activism can mobilize progressive public opinion into a powerful force. It has supported projects that use literature and/or video and have mobilized both small groups and great public assemblies to protect and advance the rights of the poor, the powerless, and the oppressed. For more information or to send a donation, write to: People’s Rights Fund 39 West 14th Street, 206 New York, NY 10011, USA. [=]

24287. International Action Center; et. al. The Children Are Dying: The Impact of Sanctions on Iraq: reports by FAO, Ramsey Clark: An Appeal By World Leaders To The United States Government and the Security Council of the United Nations: End the Use of Sanctions As a Weapon on War: Part 95: Organizing Opposition to Sanctions: Other Organizations. New York: World Forum Inc., 1996. The following organizations are among the many groups that are organizing against sanctions on Iraq: Women for Mutual Security, Coordinator: Margarita Papandreou 1, Romilias Str., GR. 14671 Kastri, Greece Tel: (01) 88 43 202; fax: (01) 80 12 850. Gesellschaft Kultur des Friedens, Am Lustnauer Tor 4, 72074 Tuebingen, Germany Tel: (07071) 52200; fax: (07071) 24905.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

26000. "Education and Health: Schoolbag; Suspension of Classes at Al-Umma College", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 17, 1995, p. 12. Students at Al-Umma College in the Dahiyet Barid neighborhood of Jerusalem announced the suspension of classes for two lectures. During that time, students held a sit-in protest against the College Board of Trustees' decision to allocate the college for women only. The Students' Council called on the board to reconsider the decision showing them the results of a questionnaire which stated the majority of students support the idea of keeping the college co-ed. Twenty-three male students along with three hundred and twenty-three female students are studying at Al-Umma College. Sa'id Jamjoum, the college president, said he is hurt by this decision, but it is not the right time for students to call for a strike. The Board of Trustees Chairman, Hassan Qiq said the board has found it is more suitable to allocate the college for girls only for reasons of order. On the other hand, the partial strike announced by the teachers of Al-Umma college has entered its second week 11/15/1995. The teachers are determined to continue their strike protesting against the denial of the administration to pay their health and national insurance contributions, which have stopped after Jordan announced its severance of administrative ties with the West Bank. [=]

26001. "Foreign Visitors Honor Memory of Late President Kim II Sung", in People's Korea, October 8, 1994, p. 3. Many delegations and delegates from various countries, foreign diplomatic envoys and embassy officials in Pyongyang paid condolence visits to the statue of late President Kim II Sung on Mansu Hill in Pyongyang. Listed below are their names carried by the Korean Central News Agency in 9/94: Narto Erawan, department director of the Ministry of Information of Indonesia; Bhichai Rattakul, former leader of the Democratic Party of Thailand and Chairman of the Party Advisory Committee; Sawanit Kongsiri, Thai Ambassador to Korea; Pallab Sen Gupta, secretary general of the World Federation of Democratic Youth; Anthony Logulu Butele, minister of State of the Presidential Office of Uganda; Gouk Dure, secretary general of the International Liaison Committee for Reunification and Peace in Korea; Ogami Kenichi, secretary general of the International Institute of the Juche Idea; Aleksand Kaputo, former Soviet Ambassador to Korea; Marwan Sudah, secretary of Information and Foreign Affairs of the Arab Islamic Democratic Movement of Jordan; Candelaria Rodriguez, Cuban lawyer; Giancarlo Elia Valori, secretary general of the Italian Institute of International Relations; Fukuda Hajime, member of the Central Executive Committee and Director of the Organizational Department of the Social Democratic Party of Japan; Inoki Kenji, leader of the Sports Peace Party in Japan; Giancarlo Elia Valori, secretary general of the Italian Institute of International Relations; Ioan Lazar, Romanian Ambassador to Korea; Ramadan Muhamad El Labbi, acting secretary of the People's Committee of the People's Bureau of Libya in Korea; Sarat Sinkaya, professor of the Institute of Buddhism of Japan; The delegation of the Foreign Ministry of Thailand led by Don Pramudwinai, minister of the Foreign Ministry of the People's Republic of Thailand; The delegation of the Forestry Science and Technology of the Academy of Forestry of Heilongjiang Province, China; The delegation of the Beijing Foreign Studies University headed by their President Wang Fuxiang; The family of Otto Grafewohle, former chairman of the Council of Ministers of the German Democratic Republic; The delegation of the Russian Research Center of Kimjongilism headed by its Chief Mikhail Konkin; The delegation of the researchers of the International Institute of the Juche Idea led by Takara Yusei; The Jilin City Friendship Delegation of China; The delegation of the Jilin Provincial Exports Exhibition; The delegation of Japanese Scholars led by Mushakoji Kinhide, professor of Meiji Gakuin University of Japan; The delegation of the Spanish Communist Party led by Antonio Joaquin Solera Lopez, general secretary of the Murcia Regional Committee of the Party; The delegation of the Center of Indian Trade Unions; and The friendship visiting group of the Italian Committee for Reunification and Peace in Korea. [=]

26002. "Girl, 12, Dies Before Operation [Heba Shaaban of Jordan died while waiting for an operation in Israel; her parents had sought operation in Israel to save her life; the Israeli government pledged $6000 toward the $40000 operation, but the girl died before the balance of the money could be raised; the Israeli offer of medical services was seen as a landmark in better relations between Israel and Jordan, but the price demanded was too high for the impoverished family, and the time to raise the money demanded by Hadassah Hospital too much]", in Olympian, November 13, 1994, p. A4. [TXT]

26003. "Hillary Rodham Clinton In Solidarity With Zionism, Shuns Muslims and Christians", in Prime News (CNN), October 27, 1994. While Bill Clinton has tried to give the appearance of impartially on his Mideast mission, Hillary Clinton, as first lady, has taken advantage of her time in Israel to visibly state her loyalty to the state of Israel. Hillary Clinton signalled her unmistakable commitment to Israel and Zionism by her worshipping of the Wailing Wall in annexed East Jerusalem, while she publicly rejected any visit to the Holy places of Muslims and Christians. Her public solidarity with Zionism presented a measured insult to Christians and Muslims, presenting in public what her husband Bill must dissimilate. [TXT]

26004. "News In Brief: "The Middle East", in Crescent International, June 1-15, 1996, p. 2. The New York-based Human Rights Middle East Watch, unable to condemn zionist brutalities outright, watered down its criticism of Israeli crimes in Lebanon by accusing the Hizbullah also of attacking civilian areas. The American group perhaps believes that fighting to liberate one's territory from foreign aggressors is a crime. The Hizbullah attacked Israeli occupation troops on May 19 inside the so-called zionist security zone in Southern Lebanon. The Hizbullah announced that two Israeli soldiers were killed while the zionists admitted to one being wounded. Israeli tanks then shelled a Lebanese village wounding one woman, in complete violation of the accord they had signed with US help at the end of April. Jordan's Medical Association condemned on May 15 the organizers of an Amman medical congress for inviting Israeli doctors to participate. Bassem Dajani, head of the 11000-strong JMA, said organizers in the Royal Medical Services, failed to tell local doctors that 20 Israeli doctors were taking part in the international meeting which had started a day earlier. Jordan's 80000 professionals --doctors, engineers and nurses-- are completely opposed to any dealings with the zionists. While professionals in Jordan were maintaining their boycott of the zionist invasion, a Jewish woman, Avital Harel, working at the zionist embassy, decided to have her baby in Amman on May 20. This was the first (official) Jewish birth in Jordan. Perhaps the zionists would now lay claim to this part of Jordan as well. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

26005. -------. "Peace Pact Comes Too Late To Save Sick Jordanian Girl", in Seattle Times, November 13, 1994. p. A12. [TXT] Heba Shaaban, a 12-year old Jordanian girl, died in an Israeli hospital, waiting for an operation her family could not afford. Rabin had publicly offered the operation as an emblem of the benefits of peace, but soon privately changed the offer to a 10% discount on the operation.

26006. -------. "Weekly Review: Qalqilya Calls for Waqf Representation", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), February 22, 1993. p. 12-13. 2/14/93: Qalqilya's Chamber of Commerce called upon the secretary general of the Waqf (Islamic Trust) to establish and office in the city. They said that according to Jordanian law, Qalqilya is considered an independent unit, separate from Tulkarm.

Currently, Qalqilya residents are forced to travel to Tulkarm for everything from marriage certificates to inheritance hearings.

On the same note, the Chamber of Commerce asked the Waqf to persuade Saudi Arabian authorities to allow a greater number of pilgrims from Qalqilya access to Mecca this year.

Only 400 people were allowed to register. Among those, 100 are considered to be on the waiting list. [Al-Fajr] [=]

26007. -------. "Women Demand Empowerment", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), September 23, 1994. pp. 1, 14 A four-day conference on women, justice and law was officially inaugurated 9/15/94 in East Jerusalem, titled "Toward the Empowerment of Palestinian Women."

The conference was organized by a committee of Palestinian activists concerned with women's rights and affairs, and sponsored by Al-Haq, an affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists.

The conference was the culmination of a year long campaign throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip to raise awareness about the law can be used to secure better civil, political and economic rights for Palestinian women, particularly those living under the Israeli occupation.

The aim of the conference was to adopt a plan of action to improve the rights of Palestinian women through the law in six areas of concern: education; health; social welfare and work; civil and political life; protection against violence; family and personal status. Six working groups were formed to examine target areas and to draft a plan to be discussed and approved in the plenary.

"Between my family and my husband, I have lost my rights to education." This was the conclusion of one Palestinian woman participating in the conference, whose personal testimony was presented in a mock trial.

The court heard testimonies from four women from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. They exposed the complex pressures of living in a harsh and unforgiving, traditional patriarchal society. It also demonstrated that Israel's prolonged military occupation has only served to reinforce the archaic religious and traditional laws.

Islah Jad, a lecturer at Birzeit University, discussed the effect of law between the theory and practice, and confirmed that women must concentrate their efforts on abolishing all political discrimination against women. She emphasized that there must be equal work opportunities in Palestinian society.

Jad insisted that it is important to establish a women's department in the authority to promote a clear program, to supervise the commitment of the various ministries and departments to women's rights.

Lawyer Hanan Bakri, from the Women's Center for Social Legal Guidance, talked about the legal and social realities of women in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. She clarified the existence of two different concepts: the economic and social equality for men and women, which has led to difficulties in dealing with the issue of women as a main and fundamental matter.

Bakri insisted that there should be awareness and an improvement in the literacy level of women in order to change society's negative concepts. "We have to legislate special laws in the interest of women rights."

During the second day of the conference, discussions were held on the women's experiences in legislating laws in the countries in the south hemisphere.

Hafiz Shuqeir, a representative of the Tunisian Democratic Women's Society, pointed out that in spite of the fact that women represent 40% of the population in Tunis, only 4% participate in political life. Furthermore, there is only one woman government minister.

Lawyer Asma Khader, head of the Jordanian Women's Union presented the topic of Jordanian women's experience in enacting laws. She pointed out to the other participants that the law is not absolute and can be changed. "The law is just when it is based on democracy."

She recommended that Palestinian women should benefit from the experience of Jordanian women and not repeat the same mistakes.

Rosaline Neiman, representative of the Legal Services Center at West Cape Town University in South Africa, talked about the transitional period in her country. She described the period as a transformation from a racist to democratic regime.

Other women participating in the conference discussed many important issues in the life of women in the West Bank and Gaza. They talked about arranged marriages in the context of the current family status law and the rigid social custom disenfranchise women legally and socially. They also discussed the fact that women have no rights to child custody and her status as a divorcee makes her a social liability to her own family.

According to one woman's testimony, the husband habitually exploited the weakness of his wife's position, beating her to the extent that she lost her second child, stealing her gold, and using her a a cover for his affairs with other women.

The participants argued that divorce in such cases, even for educated women, results in the woman losing her children. In addition, she faces enormous difficulties of social re-entry, and often education, work and social opportunities are barred to her.

In another case presented to the tribunal, the corruption of the Christian courts has allowed a husband to delay, for 10 years, divorce proceedings brought about his wife, as he bribes the clerks and officials to keep the case open, to prevent her re-marrying.

In another case, a physically handicapped woman faced intense hostility from her friend's family, even though he himself is physically handicapped.

The working group that examined the issues of social welfare and work, confirmed that the society should provide equality in wages. The group prepared a plan to protect the rights of women in case they are fired as a result of marriage or pregnancy.

As for the group that examined family and personal status law, it agreed on the importance of raising the legal age for marriage for women to 18. The group also agreed that no marriage should take place if either side disapproves. It also insisted that the subject of family and personal status be taught at schools and demanded to have an obligatory medical checkup for couples before marriage.

Regarding the group that examined the civil and political life, it gave high priority to equality and democracy, and called for the amendment or abolishment of all laws that lead to discrimination between the two sexes.

The group that discussed the protection of women against violence insisted on the importance of establishing special centers for the victims of violence. It agreed on the importance of commitment to human rights and that the PNA should fight against all kinds of violence in society.

The working group that examined the issue of education underscored the importance of making education obligatory but free until the age of 18. It also insisted on providing equal opportunities for work between the sexes, and called on the PNA to provide equal opportunities and raise educational standards for women.

As for health, the group confirmed that health services should be provided and that society must guarantee free medical care, including psychological care to all of the Palestinian citizens.

The four-day conference ended 9/19/1993 with the adoption of the accordes issued by the UN to eradicate all kinds of discrimination against women. It called on the Palestinian National Authority to enforce equality between women and men in Palestinian society.
In their final statement, the conference participants called on the PNA to consider the accords a reference for the constitution of the future Palestinian state. [-] 26008. AID. "Appendix B: Fact Sheet: AID's Women in Development Program: Highlights of the Agency's Women in Development Actions: Revolution and Pilot Activities: Part 2", in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger. United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 87-97. e) PPC/WID will continue the Gender Resource Awareness in National Development (GRAND) project, a micro-computer simulation model that demonstrates the economic impact that effective participation of women and girls can have in different economic sectors. Models for gender resource analysis have been developed for Pakistan and Jordan, and work is nearing completion in Lesotho and Senegal. The programs are tailored to each country situation incorporating such sectors as agriculture, small and micro enterprise, education, and water/sanitation/health. This microcomputer policy-dialogue project will assist Agency personnel and host-country policy and decision-makers in gaining a better understanding of the direct and indirect benefits of women's contributions to economic development. In the long term, the GRAND project objective is to institutionalize the process of gender-relevant analysis to maximize the efficiency of development planning.

f) PPC/WID also co-funded with USAID/Ecuador the compilation of conference papers presented at a PPC/WID co-funded seminar in Quito, Ecuador. The recently completed book, "The Informal Sector, Micro-Enterprise and Women's Work in Latin America," by ICRW, focuses on low-income women's access to credit and includes chapters on technical assistance and training, the role of lending institutions, case studies of selected micro-enterprise credit programs, and the impact of credit programs on the poor. A Spanish version will be published by the Instituto Latinoamericano de Investigaciones Sociales in Ecuador in summer, 1988.

g) PPC/WID, through ICRW, has also completed analysis of several key development issues with regard to their impact on and importance for women. One such area of analysis is AID's trade development policy and support for the development of ties between private enterprises in developed and developing countries, including offshore production by US companies abroad. An analysis of "Women and Export Manufacturing: A Review of the Issues and AID Policy" shows that AID's emphasis on export promotion has more potential to contribute to women in development goals than previously realized. Moreover, the consideration of gender issues has implications for policies to improve the overall development impact of AID's export promotion activities. [-]

USAID's efforts to assist Chad in restarting its economy have focused on the Volunteers in Technical Assistance (VITA) credit project. PPC/WID technical assistance has provided a study of gender-related problems experienced by the project. Specifically, USAID is concerned about the lack of credit applications from women. The scope of work (SOW) written by the technical assistance team will involve surveying women to determine the constraints to their applications for loans.

In 1988, PPC/WID developed a grant to the International Executive Service Corps (IESC) and Women's World Banking (WWB). These two organizations will team up in the Dominican Republic to select up to 8 women-owned or operated businesses in a pilot project to test a new credit model. IESC will provide technical assistance to the firms, and WWB will follow-up with loan guarantees. The objective is to assess if the combination of technical assistance, training, and credit can assist small, local women's businesses to expand in the domestic market as well as the international market.

The Bureau for Science and Technology's (S & T)'s Assistance to Resource Institutions for Enterprise Support (ARIES) project is designed to help increase the effectiveness of institutions that promote micro and small-scale enterprises. ARIES enhances USAID's capacities to implement women in development policies in the small-scale enterprise sector by integrating gender issues into strategies and programs, analyzing constraints faced by women entrepreneurs, and developing administrative capacity within the intermediary organizations charged with implementing income-generating activities for women. In Jordan, a technical assistance team from PPC/WID provided assistance to the Mission in the design of the Small Entrepreneur Project, which has as its objective the promotion of growth and employment within the micro and small-enterprise sector of the economy. In this ARIES sectoral study, PPC/WID technical assistance served to guide the team to focus on specific issues relating to women small-scale entrepreneurs.

The Office of WID plans to expand its capability to address small and micro-scale enterprises with a "buy-in" to a major AID contract by the Bureau for Private Enterprise. This buy-in will provide PPC/WID with access to a wide range of expertise to support Missions in market-based economic growth strategies, to provide technical and policy assistance to Missions, to consolidate and institutionalize private sector programs, and to promote policy dialogue with foreign governments in order that they make necessary public policy reforms and revisions to encourage investment and jobs-creation in the domestic economy. [-] expanding the selection of contraceptives at pharmacies.

(3) Protecting the Environment: Improved Quality and Increased Quantity of Water Available for Use. Social progress and sustainable economic growth is critically linked to making good use of limited natural resources. USAID’s environmental strategy emphasizes water quality improvement and conservation to help reverse the critical degradation and accelerated depletion and improve the management of Jordan’s limited water resources. USAID is in the process of setting achievement targets and collecting baseline data for this component of its strategy.

(4) Building Democracy: More Efficient and Accountable Governance. Assistance to Jordan is provided under USAID’s regional strategic objective to achieve more efficient and accountable governance. No regional strategic objectives have been developed. Building on the successful 11/8/1993 multiparty parliamentary elections, Jordan will be receiving USAID support to carry out democracy-related pilot activities.

USAID MISSION RESULTS: USAID’s current strategy began in FY 1993. A report on performance of this strategy is planned for late in 1994 when data become available.

(1) Broad-Based Economic Growth: Increased Foreign Exchange Earnings. USAID assistance has helped the Jordanian Government change policies and regulations that inhibit foreign trade and investment. Jordan has enacted a harmonized system of tariff rates; import and export license requirements have been eliminated; tax incentives for exporters have been increased so that 70% of profits are exempted from taxes, up from a 40% exemption previously in effect; and Jordan has applied for membership in GATT (General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs). USAID activities have led to the formation of two new export associations, which will help their members overcome the problems private firms face in financing, producing and marketing internationally competitive goods. Steps to improve resource management at cultural and environmental sites, such as Madaba, Mount Nebo and Petra, are underway and support the tourist industry as part of a broad-based attempt to enhance Jordan’s foreign exchange earning capacity.

(2) Stabilizing Population Growth: Reduced Fertility. USAID’s work at the national level has resulted in increased awareness among policy makers of the negative consequences of rapid population growth. A national birth spacing plan, developed by the National Population Commission with USAID funding, was approved recently by the Government. Family planning services will be integrated with ongoing health care services offered by government health centers and clinics. US assistance has reached down to the grass-roots level, helping 270 pharmacies provide family planning devices to couples in their neighborhoods. To ensure effective participation by indigenous agencies in USAID-supported birth spacing activities, capacity-building technical assistance is being provided for the National Population Commission and the Jordanian Association for Family Planning and Protection (JAFPP). The number of JAFPP clinics has increased from six to twelve and its annual intrauterine device (IUD) insertions have increased from 12000 in 1980 to 17000 in 1993. JAFPP now serves one-third of all IUD clients in the country.

(3) Protecting the Environment: Improved Quality and Increased Quantity of Water Available for Use. Social progress and sustainable economic growth is critically linked to making good use of limited natural resources. USAID’s environmental strategy emphasizes water quality improvement and conservation to help reverse the critical degradation and accelerated depletion and improve the management of Jordan’s limited water resources. USAID is in the process of setting achievement targets and collecting baseline data for this component of its strategy.

(4) Building Democracy: More Efficient and Accountable Governance. USAID has already provided support for a parliamentary needs assessment and, based on that assessment, is furnishing computer equipment and software to establish an information and document management system for the Parliament is being provided by USAID. The equipment will be installed in 3-4/1994. USAID supported a voter education campaign aimed at Jordanian women in the 11/1993 parliamentary elections. Its impact is being assessed, but indications are that women’s registration and voting increased as a result. Two electoral opinion polls also were supported.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-MANAGED ACTIVITIES: None.

OTHER DONORS: In 1992, the United States was the third largest donor with about 16% of total donor funding. Other leading donors are Japan, the World Bank and Germany.

FY 1995 PROMOTING PEACE AND SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT REQUEST: The Administration requests $8.75 million in Promoting Peace funds, which includes $1.55 million of regionally funded activities, and $7.495 million in Sustainable Development funds for: broad-based economic growth ($600000), stabilizing population growth ($6.75 million), protecting the environment ($640000) and building democracy ($45000). [USAID Mission Director: William T. Oliver.]

26011. Amnesty International. Press Release: Jordan Grants Amnesty International Groups Legal Recognition. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [1992] The Jordanian government granted legal registration to Amnesty International groups on Oct. 1 during a visit by an Amnesty International delegation. The 250 Jordanian members will now be able to undertake wide range of campaign activities. The government also reiterated its commitment to human rights protection. The Amnesty International delegation visited Amnesty International groups in Amman and Irbid and attended the opening session of “Amnesty International Week,” organized by members in Amman and opened by Queen Noor al-Hussein. Delegations of children from around the country performed songs and plays on human rights themes, then conducted a three-day seminar on the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. A Public Security Department helicopter showered the surrounding areas with thousands of copies of the Convention. A.F’s Secretary General Ian Martin was received by King Hussein bin Talal and Crown Prince Hassan bin Talal and met with the Prime Minister, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Education, as well as with members of parliament. The Amnesty International delegation discussed Jordan’s role in human rights promotion regionally and nationally and A.F’s membership development in the country. Amnesty International welcomed the lifting of the state of emergency but urged the authorities to strengthen safeguards for detainees: introduce the right of appeal before the State Security Court; and end all executions. Amnesty International also welcomed the government’s clearly expressed commitment to human rights education.

26012. Bishara, Ghassan. "Arab & Diaspora News: Christopher addresses ADC conference, Part 3," in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 3, 1993. p.7. By touching on Islam, Christopher was trying to draw a line between Islam and what are considered to be extremist groups which operate in the name of Islam and which seek to establish Islamic states. US officials have pointed to Hamas, the Islamic Jihad and Hizbullah, accusing them of sponsoring what the United States calls “acts of terrorism.”

President Aristide of Haiti, also a speaker at the convention, was received very warmly. He described ADC members as belonging to the global family of peace, and its purpose as being an honorable one. He appealed to the audience to help his country and people by writing letters to their Congressmen and women, to assist Haiti in reinstating democracy.

Deputy Bosnian Ambassador to the UN Soffet Cotovic, who substituted for Muhamed Sacibey, presented a very moving speech about the conditions in Bosnia. For more than year now, he said, Bosnia and its Muslim population has been facing what has been regularly described as the worst atrocities witnessed by Europe since World War II. Thousands of men, women, children and old people have been killed there at the hands of Serbs, and no less than 80,000 Bosnian Muslim women have been raped.

505
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

=================================================================================

Jerusalem. PM Yitzhak Rabin became interested in the case, announcing protests in Gaza and 17 had been injured by rubber bullets in the West and Jordan, her parents sent a fax to the Hadassah Hospital in reported that 18 Palestinians had suffered gunshot wounds during Includes photograph of Heba Shaaban. Jordanian child Heba Shaaban. According to a report by the Associated Press, on 25 March four Marrow Transplant In Israel”, in Seattle Times, November 8, 1994. p. A9. and the West Bank. One Palestinian was deported by Israeli troops to needing a bone marrow transplant, may be going to an Israeli hospital for Palestinians were killed and 35 others were injured in some of the 26013. Bishara, Ghassan. “Culture: Washington Loses a Palestinian Landmark: Part 2”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), June 14, 1993. p. 11. Mama Aysha received some schooling in a Muslim school for girls in Jerusalem. And like most Arab girls of her generation, she married her first cousin. She divorced soon after. She married again, but this time her husband died. The third time, she married a businessman.

The political conflict of the late '40s in Palestine affected Mama Aysha like it did many other Palestinians, and forced here to look for other venues in which to continue her life.

According to Helen Thomas, longtime White House Correspondent for United Press International, who became Mama's best friend in town, the Palestinian woman came to America after "getting in trouble with the Jordanian government."

"As I remember, she had been cussing the king," Thomas explained. "One day, at the market, she said to the king, 'Abdullah, you can't rule us like this.' The king, of course, had heard what she said. He sent her husband to prison. So she left her husband and came to America."

In Washington, Mama Aysha began to work as a cook at the Syrian Embassy, where she met Thomas for the first time. The two became instant friends and kept in touch all through the years.

Mama's ambition pushed her in the direction of ventures of her own. She left the Syrian Embassy and, with a Syrian partner, opened a restaurant called the Desert Inn. Mama Aysha later opened another restaurant, The Caravan, with an Arab-American she had met. She and the American soon married. Finally, Mama opened the Calvert Cafe in 1960, and that's the one that flourished to become one of the best-known ethnic restaurants in the American capital.

Among her guests over the years were former US Secretary of state Henry Kissinger, prominent members of the Arab diplomatic corps in Washington, Middle East professors from and many universities here, and many others.

"Once she made a friend, she kept them for life," Thomas told the Washington Post.

Mama Aysha who could not live in the Middle East, kept much of that area's customs and generosity. Those who know here recall that, when she sensed that a customer didn't have enough money to pay for a meal, she'd let him/her eat on the house. Another tradition she kept from the Old Country was her inherent mistrust of banks. Al-Majal wrote that she kept her day's income in her pockets. When she had to pay for a delivery, she would pull out the cash and pay, instead of writing a check--which she could not do, because she couldn't read or write.

It is true that she was illiterate, "but she sure knew what the figures on the bottom line said," Thomas told the Post.

The woman will surely be missed in this city. [—]

26014. Boustany, Nora. "The Gift of Peace: Jordanian Child To Get Marrow Transplant In Israel", in Seattle Times, November 8, 1994. p. A9. Includes photograph of Heba Shaaban. Jordanian child Heba Shaaban needing a bone marrow transplant, may be going to an Israeli hospital for the operation. After the signing of the peace agreement between Israel and Jordan, her parents sent a fax to the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. PM Yitzhak Rabin became interested in the case, announcing to the Jordanian child: 'you shall receive the first gift of peace'. Israel has stated it would cover the full cost of the $65000 operation as a sign of goodwill toward Jordan. The girl noted: 'I am not afraid at all, but I pray every day to God to heal me. When I see Israelis, I can do nothing but thank them, thank peace and thank the governments of Jordan and Israel because they have made all these procedures so simple for us. When I get better, I will become a doctor and then I will treat all the children. I will cure Jordanians and Israelis'. [TXT]

26015. DPR. "Action Taken By The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People", in Division of Palestinian Rights, April 1989. In a letter dated 4/3/1989 addressed to the Secretary-General (A/44/209-S/20564), the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People drew attention to an excerpt from the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1988 issued by the United States Department of State, which contained information on the human rights situation in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967. In view of the importance of this information, the Committee, at its 162nd meeting, held on 3/10/1989, decided to request that it be issued as an official document of the General Assembly and of the Security Council. The Chairman accordingly conveyed this request to the Secretary-General. A letter also dated 4/3/1989 (A/44/208-S/20563) conveyed the following information to the Secretary-General:

"In my capacity as Chairman of th Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, I wish to draw your urgent attention to the continuing policy of repression by Israel, the occupying Power, against Palestinians in the occupied territory. Several grave incidents have again taken place since my letter to you of 3/3/1989 (A/43/999-S/20505), as reported below. On 7 March, as reported by Reuters, Israeli troops stormed a United Nations medical clinic at Jabalia refugee camp in Gaza and, according to the medical staff, 15 Palestinians were wounded. A doctor said that the soldiers, who stormed the clinic after residents hurled stones at them from inside the building, broke everything, including windows and the laboratory equipment. Ha'aretz. The New York Times and Al-Fair reported, on 7 and 8 March, that Israeli troops had shot and killed a Palestinian in Nablus while "hunting for the killers" of a soldier who had died there 10 days earlier. The troops also arrested two Palestinians suspected of responsibility for the soldier's death, then blew up their houses. It was also reported that about 130 Palestinians were injured in the West Bank. In the Gaza Strip, 32 Palestinians were wounded by army gunfire in widespread protests against the deaths, on 6 March, of three Gaza residents, of whom two had been shot and one had died in a Gaza Strip gaol after allegedly having been beaten to death by Israeli interrogators. On 9, 10 and 12 March, Ma'ariv and Al-Fair reported the killing of four Palestinians, of whom three were shot by the army and one was electrocuted when soldiers ordered him to climb an electricity pole to remove a Palestinian flag. Over 20 Palestinians were injured in various incidents. According to Al-Fajr of 13 and 15 March, at least another 21 Palestinians were shot and wounded during those two days. The New Yor Times reported on 20 March that, the day before, four Palestinians had been killed and 18 had been wounded by the Israeli army. On 22 March, according to The Washington Post of 23 March, Israeli soldiers fired on protesters in Tulkarm refugee camp, killing an 11-year-old boy and injuring at least 30 others. The same source also reported that dozens of Jewish settlers from Ariel in the West Bank had driven to the Palestinian village of Bidya, smashed windows and burned trees and tires in a factory courtyard. Israeli sources said the raid had followed a firebomb attack on an Ariel vehicle and the stoning of a bus, neither of which had caused injuries. According to Aience France Presse, one Palestinian was killed and 12 others were shot and wounded on 23 March in various incidents in Gaza and the West Bank. One Palestinian was deported by Israeli troops to Jordan. According to a report by the Associated Press, on 25 March four Palestinians were killed and 35 others were injured in some of the bloodiest outbreaks of anti-Israeli protest in the occupied territory. It was reported that 18 Palestinians had suffered gunshot wounds during protests in Gaza and 17 had been injured by rubber bullets in the West Bank. The New York Times reported on 28 March that, a day earlier, a 4-year-old Palestinian boy had been shot to death during a demonstration in the West Bank village of Rur Rad. The paper also reported that a freelance Palestinian journalist, Hassan Jibril, had been beaten and shot by Israeli soldiers. Acence France Presse reported on the same date that eight other Palestinians had been injured, three of them gravely. On 30 March, according to Aaence FrancPresse, 18 Palestinians were shot and wounded in the area of Hbron. On the same date, The New York Times reported that the entire Gaza Strip and several towns and refugee camps in the West Bank were placed under curfew and that Palestinians from the occupied West Bank were being barred from entering Israel to prevent demonstrations in connection with the Land Day observance. According to the New York Times of 31 March and 2 April, five other Palestinians were shot to death in the occupied territory during the said observance. A result of the Israeli policy of armed repression, Palestinian fatalities since the beginning of the intifadah in 12/1987 have reached at least 545 by the end of March, based on figures published by the Data Base Project on Palestinian Human Rights. At the same time, the imposition of collective punishment on an increasingly large scale has resulted in massive destruction. According to information collected by the organization just mentioned, over 100000 trees were uprooted by the Israeli army in 1988. Al-Haq (Law in the Service of Man) has estimated that at least 672 Palestinian homes have been bulldozed since the beginning of the intifadah. View of the persistent resort to armed force by Israel, the occupying Power, and the continuing suffering and devastation in the occupied territories, the Committee wishes once again to protest vigorously against these repressive policies and practices, and to reiterate its appeal to you to take all possible measures to ensure the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under occupation and to intensify your efforts towards the convening of the International Peace Conference on the Middle East, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 43/176 of 12/15/1988.

506

In a subsequent letter addressed to the Secretary-General on 14 April 1989 (GU/1005-S/2092), the Chairman of the Committee drew urgent attention to the extremely serious escalation of violent attacks by Israeli troops and settlers against Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territories. The full text of the letter is as follows:

"In my capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, I wish to draw your urgent attention to the extremely serious escalation of violent attacks in the last few days by Israeli troops and settlers against Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territory. On 9 April, as it was reported by the New York Times, a 12-year-old boy died in Gaza after he was shot through the heart with a plastic bullet. In the West Bank a 60-year-old Palestinian was shot and killed when troops clashed with demonstrators. On 10 April, also according to the New York Times, an unidentified gunman opened fire with a submachine-gun at an entrance to the Old City of Jerusalem, killing one Palestinian and wounding three others. Witnesses said the assailant, who fled, was wearing an Israeli army uniform. Later the Israeli radio reportedly said it had received an anonymous phone call from a man who claimed responsibility for the attack on behalf of an underground Jewish organization, called the Sikarikim. On 13 and 14 April, Reuters and the New York Times reported that para-military Israeli border police accompanied by men in civilian clothes believed to be settlers, shot and killed five and possibly as many as seven Palestinians during a pre-dawn raid on the West Bank village of Nahalin, near Bethlehem. At least 25 other Palestinians were reported wounded, two of them critically, in what hospital officials who treated the victims called "a massacre". The shooting took place when the Israeli police encountered unexpected and strong resistance from the villagers, who were already up and about at the early hour because of the Ramadan observance. The reports indicated that this was one of the highest casualty tolls in a single incident since the beginning of the intifadah. The same sources also reported that another Palestinian shot during demonstrations in Bethlehem last week has died of his wounds. With these latest victims, the total number of Palestinians killed by Israeli soldiers since the beginning of the intifadah has now reached at least 553.

On behalf of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, I wish to strongly protest the escalation of repression by Israel, the occupying Power, against Palestinians in the occupied territory, and particularly the growing involvement in such attacks by armed Israeli settlers. The Committee considers that the international community is duty bound to redouble its efforts to ensure protection of the Palestinians under occupation and the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied Palestinian territory, in accordance with the provisions of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Person in Time of War of 8/12/1949, and United Nations resolutions. The Committee also considers that it is incumbent on all parties concerned to further intensify all efforts towards the convening of the International Peace Conference on the Middle East, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 43/176 of 12/15/1988, which provides the only comprehensive, practical and overwhelmingly accepted framework for peace. [–] without a screening process. Palestinian males between the ages of 16 and 25 who cross the bridge into Jordan must remain outside the territories for 9 months. Expedited entry for Palestinian residents crossing into Gaza at Rafah, and into the West Bank from the Allenby Bridge, went into effect in November. Travel documents and identification card for the residents of Gaza and Jericho are issued by the Palestinian Authority; residents in the rest of the West Bank continue to be issued documents by Israeli authorities. Obstacles to emigration, the parliamentary elections held in 1993 were free and fair. Voters may elect municipal officials and the lower house of Parliament, but overall decisionmaking authority remains with the King. [–]

26018. DS. "Jordan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Citizens are free to travel abroad and within Jordan, except in and through military areas. The law requires that Jordanian women and foreign women married to Jordanians must obtain written permission from a male guardian to travel abroad or apply for a passport. This requirement is normally enforced only when a married woman plans to travel abroad with children. Legal authorities will enforce requests from fathers to prevent their children from departing the country, even when traveling with their mothers. Many Palestinian residents are Jordanian citizens—with all the rights of citizenship. The Government authorizes other Palestinians to carry Jordanian travel documents. Palestinians must obtain permits from the Ministry of Interior for travel between the East Bank and the Israeli-occupied territories and neighboring states. The permits are routinely granted. In May the Government eased travel restrictions on Palestinians, allowing residents of the Occupied Territories to enjoy unlimited residence and travel in Jordan. Over 1.2 million Palestinian refugees are registered with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. The Government cooperates with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in assisting refugees. There have been no reports that the Government has expelled anyone with a valid claim to refugee status. [–]

26017. DS. "Jordan: Introduction", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan is a monarchy. Its Constitution concentrates a high degree of executive and legislative authority in the King, who determines domestic and foreign policy. The Prime Minister and Cabinet manage the daily affairs of government. The Parliament, which consists of a 40-member Senate appointed by the King, and an 80-member Chamber of Deputies elected by the people, is relatively weak and not an effective check on executive authority. The General Intelligence Directorate (GID) and the Public Security Directorate (PSD) share responsibility for maintaining internal security and have broad authority to monitor the activities of persons believed to be security risks. They continue to be implicated in human rights abuses. The Government revoked martial law in 1991, but important aspects of martial law remain, such as broad police powers. Jordan has a mixed economy with significant government participation in industry, transportation, and communications. Jordan has few natural resources and is financially dependent on foreign assistance and remittances from Jordanian nationals working abroad. Because of the Government’s policies during the Gulf War, Arab countries in the Gulf discontinued financial aid. The economy has been buffeted by high unemployment and inflation, and a sharp reduction of exports to Iraq due to United Nations sanctions. Human rights abuses include arbitrary arrest, mistreatment of detainees, prolonged detention without charge, lack of due process, official discrimination against adherents of the Baha’i faith, and restrictions on women’s rights. Citizens do not have the right to change their form of government, although in recent years the King has taken some steps to increase participation in the political system. In 1992 the Government legalized the establishment of political parties and has held five parliamentary elections to date. The parliamentary elections held in 1993 were free and fair. The King may propose specific legislation for consideration. The King may also grant or deny citizenship, and has broad parameters of public policy. Appointments made by the King to Government seats and those appointed by the King, and an 80-member Chamber of Deputies elected by the people, is relatively weak and not an effective check on executive authority. The General Intelligence Directorate (GID) and the Public Security Directorate (PSD) share responsibility for maintaining internal security and have broad authority to monitor the activities of persons believed to be security risks. They continue to be implicated in human rights abuses. The Government revoked martial law in 1991, but important aspects of martial law remain, such as broad police powers. Jordan has a mixed economy with significant government participation in industry, transportation, and communications. Jordan has few natural resources and is financially dependent on foreign assistance and remittances from Jordanian nationals working abroad. Because of the Government’s policies during the Gulf War, Arab countries in the Gulf discontinued financial aid. The economy has been buffeted by high unemployment and inflation, and a sharp reduction of exports to Iraq due to United Nations sanctions. Human rights abuses include arbitrary arrest, mistreatment of detainees, prolonged detention without charge, lack of due process, official discrimination against adherents of the Baha’i faith, and restrictions on women’s rights. Citizens do not have the right to change their form of government, although in recent years the King has taken some steps to increase participation in the political system. In 1992 the Government legalized the establishment of political parties and has held five parliamentary elections to date. The parliamentary elections held in 1993 were free and fair. The King may propose specific legislation for consideration. The King may also grant or deny citizenship, and has broad parameters of public policy. Appointments made by the King to Government seats and
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

during the next session. At year's end, 6 of 31 ministers and 11 of 80 parliamentarians were of Palestinian descent. This representation is in large part the result of an electoral system which gives greater representation to south Jordan, which has few inhabitants of Palestinian origin. Women have the right to vote. Three women ran for Parliament in the 1993 election; one was elected to a seat reserved for Circassians. Women's groups encouraged women to vote, and in the Amman area, nearly half of those who voted were women. [=]

26020. DS. "Jordan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives. By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Although the law prohibits children under the age of 16 from working, child street peddlers may be observed on the streets of Amman. The Ministry of Social Development has a committee to address the problem and in most cases removes the children from the streets, returns them to their families, and provides the families with a monthly stipend. Corporal punishment in schools is prohibited. Although social workers say there is a significant incidence of child abuse within families, the problem is difficult to quantify. [=]

26021. DS. "Jordan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives. By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Women experience legal discrimination in matters of pension and social security benefits, inheritance, divorce, and the value of testimony in court (see Section I.e.). Under Islamic law, or Sharia, female heirs receive half the amount of a male heir's inheritance, while the non-Muslim widows of Muslim spouses have no inheritance rights. A sole female heir receives half her parents' estate; the balance goes to designated male relatives. A sole male heir inherits all his parents' property. Male Muslim heirs have the duty to provide for all family members who need assistance. Under Sharia's law, the testimony of two women is required to equal the testimony of one man. This technically applies only in religious courts but is sometimes imposed in civil courts as well irrespective of religion. Men are able to obtain divorce more easily than women under Islamic law. Marriage and divorce matters for Christians are adjudicated by special courts for each denomination. The Government provides men with more generous social security benefits than those for women. The Government continues pension payments of a deceased male civil servant to his heirs, but it discontinues the pension payments of a deceased female civil servant. By law, a married woman requires her husband's permission to obtain a passport. Married women do not have the legal right to confer citizenship on their children. However, they may confer citizenship on their non-Jordanian husbands who then may obtain citizenship for the children. Civil law grants women equal pay for equal work, but in practice this law is sometimes ignored. Social pressure against women pursuing a career is strong. Nonetheless, women have employment opportunities in many professions, including engineering, medicine, education, and law. Women's groups stress that the problem of discrimination is not only one of law but also of women's lack of awareness of their rights or unwillingness to assert those rights. The Jordanian chapter of the Business and Professional Women's Club gives seminars on women's rights and assists women in establishing small businesses. Medics experts acknowledge that spousal violence against women occurs. Cultural norms constrain victims from seeking medical or legal help and frustrate a scientific assessment of the extent of the abuse. Abused women have the right to file a complaint in court against their spouses, but in practice, familial and societal pressures discourage them from seeking legal remedies. Nongovernmental organizations provide assistance to victims of domestic violence. Wife beating is technically grounds for divorce, but the husband may seek to demonstrate in court that the beating occurred because the wife was irreligious or did not obey him. This defense stems from a Koranic injunction that an irreligious or disobedient wife, not to live with him, to show her the error of her ways. It is within the discretion of a Shari's Court judge to deny a divorce in such cases. The Criminal Code stipulates a sentence of 1 year for persons found guilty of committing a 'crime of honor', which is the murder of a female, usually by a male relative, for alleged sexual misconduct. Even if the defense cannot meet the stringent condition to plead a crime of honor defense—the defendant must have witnessed the female victim engaging in intercourse-offenders rarely spend more than six months to two years in prison. By contrast, the penalty for murder is life. Women may not invoke the crime of honor defense for murdering a male relative under the same circumstances. The law restricts a crime of honor to one who surprises his wife or any close female relative committing adultery." [=]
Government may dissolve Parliament, and is the ultimate arbiter of domestic and foreign policy. In practice, the King sets the broad parameters of foreign and domestic policy while the Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers exercise management of daily affairs. The Parliament—consisting of a 40-member Senate where members are appointed by the King and an 80-member lower house whose members are elected—is subordinate to the executive branch. The General Intelligence Directorate (GID) and the Public Security Directorate (PSD) have broad responsibility for internal security and wide powers to monitor segments of the population thought to pose a threat to the security of the regime. Although the Government revoked martial law directives in 1991, important elements of martial law, such as the broad scope of police powers, remain operative. Jordan has a mixed economy, with government participation in key sectors, including industrial production, transportation, and communications. The country has few natural resources and one of the highest population growth rates in the world. Jordan's stance during the Gulf war caused Arab Gulf states to suspend flows of financial aid. Nevertheless, the economy continued to show surprising strength in 1993, growing by a projected 6-7%. Growth during this period is in part attributable to investment of repatriated savings by returnees from the Gulf. Jordan continues to remain highly dependent on foreign assistance and remittances from its nationals abroad. The Jordanian economy was adversely affected by a reduction of exports to Iraq, a major trading partner, as a result of United Nations' sanctions against Iraq. The unemployment rate was at least 14% for the year, while the inflation rate moderated to approximately 5%. Jordan continued to show process in liberalizing the country's political system. As a result of the legalization of political parties in 1992, 20 political parties, running the gamut of leftist, centrist, and Islamist conservative parties, were licensed in 1992-1993. The King ratified a change from the previous bloc-voting system to a "one person, one vote-system in August. On 11/8/1992, the Government of Prime Minister Abd Al-Salam Al-Ma'ali supervised the country's first multiparty parliamentary elections since 1956. While there were some minor irregularities on polling day, international and domestic observers agreed that the parliamentary elections were essentially free and fair. Nevertheless, citizens still do not have the right to change their government. Other continuing human rights problems included the broad scope of police powers, abuse of prisoners, prolonged detention without charge, lack of fair trial in some security cases, official discrimination against adherents of the Bahai faith, and restrictions on women's rights.

26024. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Jordan: Part 13: Respect For Human Rights: Section 4: Governmental Attitude Regarding International and NGO Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. February 1994. Women experience legal discrimination regarding pension and social security benefits, inheritance, and divorce. Under Shari'a law, which applies to all Jordanian citizens, inheritance matters, a female heir's inheritance is only half that of a male heir. In practice, non-Muslim women occasionally have been able to obtain rulings based upon their own religious laws. The divorce law allows men to obtain a divorce more easily than women, but men may have to pay considerable compensation based on the original marriage contract. A woman whose husband takes additional wives may seek and obtain a divorce under Shari'a law. The law grants women equal pay for equal work, but in practice the law is sometimes ignored, and women are paid less. Under Shari'a law, a woman's testimony in court carries only half the value of that of a man. Tradition also constrains women's freedoms, particularly their entry into professional and academic realms. Nevertheless, some women have successfully entered the fields of engineering, medicine, and law, and women's issues are receiving increasing attention in the media and at symposia. Women's groups stress that the problem is not only one of law but also of social constraints, including women's lack of awareness of their rights or unwillingness to assert these rights. The Jordanian chapter of the Business & Professional Women's Club gives seminars on women's rights and assists women in establishing small businesses. Club members traveled to communities throughout Jordan during the election campaign and succeeded in increasing female voter registration and raising women's consciousness about the election process and their rights. Despite progress in these areas, overall change in women's status has been minimal. The Koran allows a husband to discipline his wife, which some men apparently interpret as a license to discipline with force. Sources in the medical field say that, while they know wife beating occurs, family and cultural norms constrain victims from seeking medical or legal help and prevent any realistic quantification of the extent of abuse. Many Jordanians consider it culturally unacceptable to highlight what is considered a private, family matter. The issue also is considered a private one by the police and the judiciary, and public discourse rarely focuses on incidents of spouse or child abuse. Legal avenues to pursue redress in cases of spouse abuse do exist. If a woman is abused by her husband, she can visit a medical doctor obtain a report documenting her injuries, submit the report to the police, and file a complaint in court based on this evidence. The court will then charge and try the husband. Assistance to victims of domestic violence is provided by nongovernmental organizations (nearly all of which operate with a government license). Wife beating is technically grounds for divorce, but the husband may demonstrate in court that the beating occurred because the wife was irreligious or did not obey him. It is within the discretion of the judge to deny a divorce in such case.

Jordanian labor law prohibits children under the age of 16 from working. It is only in the past few years that employment of underage children, child street peddlers, and child beggars have appeared. The Ministry of Social Development has set up a committee to address the problem and in most cases removes the children from the streets, returns them to their families, and provides them a monthly stipend. A November report of a 12-year-old girl's engagement to her 11-year old cousin, who reportedly had dropped out of school to work, reportedly caused a public outcry. The Jordanian Women's Union called on government officials to take strict measures, and the Secretary General of the Ministry of Social Development concurred that the engagement was unjust and unacceptable. Children under the age of 18 are excluded from capital punishment. Children convicted of crimes are held in special reform centers where they receive vocational training and are not detained with adults. Corporal punishment at schools is prohibited. There have been problems regarding custody of children born to foreign female domestic servants. For example, if such a child has been fathered by a Jordanian man, that child is subject to Sharia law. Currently, the Jordanian government is considering a law that would make it difficult for single foreign mothers to obtain a residence permit for children with a foreign father not present in Jordan. [↩]

26027. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Jordan: Part 17: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (e) Religious Minorities", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government does not recognize the Baha'i faith as a religion and Baha'is have suffered various forms of official discrimination. Baha'i identity cards are blank where religion is indicated. In September the Ministry of Education issued regulations that made the previously mandatory study of Islam by Baha'i students optional. In December the Ministry of Interior agreed to accept Baha'i marriage certificates as proof of marriage for the issuance of passports and other official identity documents. However, the Baha'i community still does not have its own court to handle personal status and family matters. Instead, these matters are handled by Islamic Sharia courts. Baha'i community property cannot be registered in the name of the community but must be registered in the names of individual members. [↩]

26028. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Jordan: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The labor laws forbid children under age 16 from working except in the case of professional apprentices, who are allowed to leave the standard education track and begin part-time (6 hours per day, no night shift) training at age 13. Ministry of Labor inspection teams attempt to enforce these laws. In practice, some underage children work, primarily in family businesses. Despite compulsory education (education is compulsory up to the 10th grade or age 15), a small number of children in more remote areas are kept from school by their parents in order to work. [↩]

26029. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Jordan: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There is no national minimum wage, but the Government periodically prepares and adjusts a minimum wage schedule for various trades, based on recommendations of an advisory panel composed of representatives of workers, employers, and the Government. The absolute minimum wage rate is estimated at $140 per month, inclusive of all allowances. Unskilled workers earning the lowest scheduled wage face increasing difficulties earning enough to provide a family a decent living by local standards. Laws mandate maximum work hours and paid leave, but these protections are not supposed to be enforced properly. Premium wages are not paid for work more than 40 hours per week (54 hours for hotel, restaurant, and cinema employees), and may not work more than 16 hours in any continuous period or more than 60 hours overtime per month. Employees are entitled to 1 day off each week. Domestic servants in Jordan are not protected by Jordanian labor laws. Therefore, there is no legal forum to address their labor grievances. Large numbers of Sri Lankan and Filipino workers do not have the benefit of embassies in Jordan to lobby for their interests. The Labor Ministry maintains a group of full-time inspectors to oversee occupational health and safety standards. A parliamentary committee works with the Ministry to monitor conditions in the workplace. Jordanian law specifies a number of health and safety requirements for workers, including standards for bathrooms, drinking water, and safety and first aid equipment. The Government appears to administer and enforce its labor laws fairly, but the deployment of too few inspectors hinders its effectiveness. In addition, under the present Labor Code, inspectors lack the power to make, or have issued, orders having immediate force and no obligation is imposed with respect to notifying the Labor Inspectorate of Industrial Accidents & Occupational Diseases. Parliament declined to consider a draft labor law during its last session that would revise and update legislation dating from 1960. [↩]

26030. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 14: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Women in Kuwait suffer discrimination in both law and practice in many areas. Women are denied the right to vote and are traditionally restrained from freely choosing certain roles in society. There are no female judges or prosecutors, and only a few female Kuwaiti diplomatics are stationed outside of Kuwait. While spousal abuse exists in Kuwait, there are no shelters for women who have been abused by their husbands. Instead, cases are referred to the psychiatric department at the Ministry of Health. Police station and Ministry of Interior employees who handle complaints of spousal abuse are specifically instructed to try to reconcile the dispute within the family before opening a case. Each of the country's 50 police stations receives approximately one to two complaints of spousal abuse each week. Offending spouses are asked to sign a statement at the police station stating that they will not continue the abuse. Kuwaiti women who wear Western attire and foreign women are subjected to sexual harassment. The physical and sexual abuse of some expatriate Asian women (especially from the Philippines, Sri Lanka, and other South Asian countries) who work as domestic servants received considerable attention in the press. Some observers believe that the problem worsened after liberation. On several occasions, the Philippine Embassy sheltered over 100 women at once. Although most of these women sought shelter due to contractual or financial problems with their employers, some cases involved physical and sexual abuse. Domestic servants may take legal recourse against their employers for abuse but generally do not because of a generally substantiated fear of reprisal and a sustained fear that the police and the judicial system will side with the Kuwaiti employer. In March the Court of Appeal reduced a 10-year sentence that had been imposed on a Jordanian couple who had been convicted of "unintentionally" killing their Philippine maid through starvation and beatings. In July, however, a Kuwaiti man and his Lebanese wife were sentenced to 7 years in jail for the "unintentional murder" of their Philippine maid. Although cited as an example of the Court's willingness to sentence a Kuwaiti for a crime committed against a domestic servant, the conviction on the basis of unintentional murder appeared highly questionable in view of the maid's injuries, which included a broken pelvis, broken arms, and burns over all her body. The Government said it acted to punish abusers, but government action did not deal effectively with the problem. The Government established an office to investigate crimes and complaints involving domestics but has not yet acted on plans to establish a systematic investigation service. Under the interim measure, the authorities designated a central police station to handle maids' complaints and shelter a small number of maids. In addition to assisting foreign embassies with the repatriation of some of these women, the Government began to regulate recruitment agencies and close down unscrupulous ones. Kuwaiti courts have the authority to dissolve a marriage if a woman is in danger of being harmed by her husband; Kuwaiti judges have also found husbands guilty of spousal abuse, prostitution, although prohibited by Kuwaiti law, takes place. Some legal discrimination against women exists, particularly with respect to Kuwaiti women married to foreign men. Such women receive no government housing assistance and must pay residence fees for their husbands; residence is not guaranteed for their husbands unless the husband is working. In contrast, Kuwaiti men married to foreign women do not have to pay any fees for their spouses, whose right to residence is automatic. Females do not receive social security benefits. Under the Islamic laws of inheritance, male heirs receive twice as much as do female heirs. (These laws apply only to Muslims; a special judge handles cases for non-Muslims.) Women may own property and have the same property rights as men do. Women are restricted from working in "dangerous industries and trades harmful to the health." They are promised "remuneration equal to that of a man provided she does the same work. This promise is respected in practice. Kuwaiti women may drive and do not have to follow a dress code. They have full access to government-provided higher education, and an estimated 60% of women of working age are employed. Women work as doctors, engineers, lawyers, and professors. A few women have reached senior government positions. In July a woman was appointed to the Amiri Diwan (royal court) as Director of Political Affairs, a July Amiri decree named the first female president of Kuwait University. In September the woman Director of Political Affairs in the Amiri Diwan became Under Secretary in the Ministry of Higher Education. Kuwait named its first woman ambassador in 1993 and the state-owned Kuwait Petroleum Corp. (KPC), which runs Kuwait's oil industry, named a woman as its Managing Director for Administration and Economic Affairs one of KPC's four top positions. While a number of individual Kuwaiti women speak openly about the need to grant more rights to women, Kuwait lacks an organized women's rights movement. Before the invasion, the Kuwait Trade Union Federation (KTUF) had a Working Women Committee. The Committee has not yet resumed full activities since the Gulf war. Another group, the Women's Social-Cultural Society, has committees dealing with cultural affairs, social activities, alms, nurseries, cancer, the media, cooking, tailoring, literacy eradication, and the Kuwaitis presumed detained in Iraq. The Society also concerns itself with statistical studies on women, cases of Kuwaiti women married to non-Kuwaitis, legal and psychological counseling for women, and children's welfare. [26031. Division for Palestinian Rights. "Commissioner-General of the UNRWA Reports to The General Assembly", in Division for Palestinian Rights, October-November 1994. The Commissioner-General of UNRWA submitted his annual report to the General Assembly (A/49/13). A number of other reports relevant to the same item were submitted by the Secretary-General. The item was allocated to the Special Political and Decolonization Committee (Fourth Committee) of the General Assembly. The reports were summarized as follows in a press release issued at Headquarters (GA/SPD/42): "The Commissioner-General states that the historic developments occurring during the year under review had a profound impact on the Agency's work and responsibilities. With the establishment of the Palestinian Authority in the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, and the anticipated extension of self-rule to the rest of the West Bank, UNRWA entered a new era in its relationship with the Palestinian people." In addition to maintaining the services it has provided for over 40 years, the Agency would soon begin a process of preparing for eventual hand-over of its installations, services and programmes to the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In the period under review, the vision of peace was expressed by the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Agreements signed by Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) on 13 September 1993, the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area signed at Cairo on 5/4/1994, the report states. Following a 6/1994 decision of the Secretary-General, UNRWA began plans to move its headquarters to the Gaza Strip by the end of 1995, at an estimated cost of the some $22 million. That is in addition to costs involved in relocating certain Vienna-based operational units to Amman. The report states that a task force on development of the Gaza Strip and Jericho, of which UNRWA was a member, proposed that while the Agency should preserve and enhance its ongoing programmes and services, new investments should also be made in basic physical and social infrastructure, to improve public services and create jobs. The UNRWA has identified projects valued at some $138 million for immediate implementation. A letter of 9/15/1994 from UNRWA's Advisory Commission included in the report, cites a cash shortfall in the Agency's regular and emergency budget for 1994 of some $43 million, at a time when additional demands were being placed on the Agency. It also points out that the Agency ended 1993 with a deficit of $10 million, despite austerity measures of some $17 million. The Commission expresses appreciation for the Agency's programmes of assistance for more than 3 million Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip and Jericho area, the remainder of the West Bank, and in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. It welcomes the developments that have contributed towards transforming the region, including the Paris and Cairo accords signed by the two parties; the early empowerment agreement signed on 8/29/1994; the partial withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Gaza Strip and Jericho area; the arrival of Chairman Arafat; and the setting up of the Palestinian Authority and related administrative structures. On 01/6/1993, the Agency launched its Peace Implementation Programme (PIP) to benefit refugees and other needy Palestinians, the report states. Public sector investment by the international community through PIP would contribute to stabilizing socio-economic conditions, especially in the Gaza Strip, where the situation was particularly volatile and critical. By 6/30/1994, $46 million in project proposals for the West Bank and $76 million for the Gaza Strip had been developed under PIP, the report states. That enabled the Agency to construct and upgrade schools and health centres; implement projects to improve sewerage systems, solid waste collection and water quality; undertake extensive shelter rehabilitation for poor refugees; build new women's centres; and expand the revolving loan fund and small business training programmes for the Palestinian private sector. On 10/18/1993, UNRWA, the European Commission and the Palestine Council of Health held a ground-breaking ceremony for the new Gaza General Hospital, whose completion was expected by the end of 1995, the report states. On 5/12/1994, the Agency and the PLO's Department of General Education signed a memorandum of understanding to further cooperation and coordination in improving the educational process and upgrading the skills of some 12000 public-sector teachers. The report states that in late 1994, concurrent with implementation of provisions of the Cairo Agreement, the Government of Israel proposed the establishment of a tripartite committee with representatives of Israel, the Palestinian Authority and UNRWA, to arrive at new arrangements relating to UNRWA operations in the Gaza Strip and Jericho area. With attention focused on developments in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the Agency has stressed the centrality to the peace process of Palestinian refugees in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. By the end of June, contributions for PIP projects in those countries had totalled $10 million. Also in May, the Secretary-General appointed a Special Coordinator in the occupied territories, the report states. The Coordinator's functions include facilitating United Nations efforts in the West Bank and Gaza, representing the United Nations in various bodies and, when possible, leading its delegation to the multilateral working groups of the Middle East, North and South. In these negotiations, the Agency has supported the principle of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace settlement with Israel on the basis of Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, and the Madrid Conference principles.
East peace process, and, as requested, supporting the implementation of the Declaration of Principles. Among other developments cited in the report is an 8/1993 agreement between Israel and the Palestinians on arrangements allowing the return to the West Bank and Gaza of more than 400 Palestinian refugees who had been deported to Lebanon in 1992. Addressing the ongoing conflicts in the occupied territories, the report states that between the signing of the Declaration of Principles and implementation of the Cairo Agreement, previously surmising that 'by 160 Palestinian and 40 Israelis lost their lives. With implementation of that Agreement, clashes virtually ceased in the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, although clashes continued in the rest of the West Bank throughout the reporting period. On 2/25/1994, the Palestinian people experienced one of the worst episodes in their recent history when a lone Israeli settler opened fire with a machine-gun in the Mosque of Ibrahim in Hebron, West Bank, killing 29 worshippers and injuring many others. In the hours following the massacre, nine Palestinians were shot and killed in the West Bank and three in the Gaza Strip by Israeli security forces during protests and clashes. By mid-March, 15 more Palestinians from the West Bank and 11 from the Gaza Strip had also been killed in circumstances related to clashes with Israeli security forces. The Commissioner-General’s response on the Agency’s ‘excellent’ relationships with Jordan, which contains about 40% of the total number of refugees registered with UNRWA and the largest Palestine refugee population everywhere. The services provided by the Government to Palestine refugees there were of critical importance. UNRWA’s financial constraints had prevented it from expanding programmes to keep pace with population growth. In the areas of education and health, austerity measures had led to a hiring freeze, increasingly crowded classrooms and heavier patient loads for the Agency doctors. The Agency continued its efforts to meet changes called for by Jordan’s education reform policy of 1987, which required that teachers in basic education possess a four-year university-level degree. In 9/1993, UNRWA opened its first Educational Sciences Faculty in Amman, where a four-year teaching certificate programme for training new teachers replaced the Agency’s two-year programme. The UNRWA received $2.86 million under PIP for projects in Jordan. In Lebanon, the ongoing normalization of national life continued to enhance the security and safety of Palestine refugees, the report states. However, violence continued to erupt sporadically in Israeli-controlled south Lebanon and in the Beq’a region. The Government continued its policy of addressing the problem of persons displaced by the years of conflict, including facilitating the return to the lawful owners of property occupied by displaced persons. The UNRWA received $3.66 million under PIP for projects in Lebanon. In the Syrian Arab Republic, historically close contacts with the Government contributed to the smooth functioning of UNRWA programmes, the planning of new forms of assistance and the relative social and economic stability in refugees’ lives, the report states. The UNRWA received $3.1 million under PIP for projects in Syria. The Agency itself advanced funds to enable essential improvements to be made within the Damascus Training Centre, which had not been upgraded since its establishment in 1961. By 6/30/1994, more than 3 million Palestinian refugees were registered with UNRWA, entitling them to receive a range of education, health, and relief and social services. There were 398805 children enrolled at UNRWA’s 641 primary and preparatory schools and more than 4500 in its vocational training centres. Refugees had guaranteed access to primary health-care through the Agency’s 120 health centres and mother-and-child health-care clinics, 71 dental clinics, as well as 32 specialist clinics for pediatrics, obestics and gynaecology, cardiology and ophthalmology. In addition to clinics for treatment of ear, nose and throat and chest diseases, there were 210 special-care clinics treating diabetes mellitus and hypertension. The report of the Working Group on the Financing of UNRWA (document A/49/570) states that UNRWA failed to receive sufficient funding to deliver all parts of its planned programmes in 1993 and expected to be unable to do so again in 1994. The Group notes that the Agency was particularly concerned about the negative cumulative effect of austerity measures taken by the Agency, and carried over from year to year, to reduce its chronic budget deficits. The report cites the Commissioner-General as saying the Agency would need contributions of some $21 million to avoid running down its operational capital reserves, as well as $22 million to maintain its present standard of services in 1994. Thus, there was a total requirement of $43 million to fund its regular 1994 budget and its budget covering emergency measures in Lebanon and the occupied territories. The Group notes that efforts of the Commissioner-General and his staff to raise funds for PIP has succeeded in attracting financial support for UNRWA programmes and projects from some donor states and international bodies. The Group also notes the previous contact of Secretary-General expressed concern that, despite the Agency’s success in raising funds for new and special projects under PIP, there might be insufficient funds forthcoming to finance staffing and recurring costs of some with programmes being established under PIP. The Working Group supports the Commissioner-General’s strict policy of giving priority to operational programmes, the report states. It strongly urges all Governments to consider increasing their donations to UNRWA and to consider additional contributions in support of ongoing emergency-related and special programmes in Lebanon, as well as present and future phases of PIP, without decreasing or diverting funds from the contributions to the Agency’s regular programmes. It also urges them to consider making special additional contributions for construction projects, again without affecting their contributions to the regular programmes.

The Secretary-General’s report on offers by Member States of grants and scholarships for higher education, including vocational training, for Palestinian refugees (document A/491439), states that Japan and Switzerland offered scholarships to Palestine refugee students through UNRWA’s university scholarship programme. During the 1993-1994 academic year, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) awarded 28 scholarships to Palestinian students under the regional project ‘Scholarship fund for higher education for students of Arab occupied territories’, 17 scholarships for its regular programme and budget, three scholarships under its Participation Programme, and two scholarships under the inter-university cooperation programme, PEACE, funded by UNESCO and the European Union. The Secretary-General’s report on Palestine refugees in the occupied territory (document A/49/440), states that Israeli authorities continued to demolish and seal refugee shelters in the Gaza Strip and West Bank on punitive grounds. The situation of 87 families categorized as living in hardship conditions remained the same. During the reporting period, no new plots of land in housing projects in the Gaza Strip were allocated by Israeli authorities for refugees living in camps. However, developments were underway for the movement of approximately 70 additional families to Tel Aviv and the Negev. According to information available to the Commissioner-General of UNRWA, Israeli authorities have up to the present allocated approximately 3914 plots of land in Gaza Strip for housing projects. A total of 2605 plots have been built on by 3714 refugee families comprising 22946 persons. Buildings on 236 plots are under construction, 936 plots are vacant and 137 have been built on by non-refugee families. In addition, 3034 refugee families, consisting of 18823 persons, have moved into 2666 completed housing units consisting of 5893 rooms. *The Secretary-General’s report on the return of populations displaced since 1967 (document A/49/441) states that the Agency is not involved in any arrangements for the return of refugees nor is it involved in any arrangements for the return of displaced persons who are not registered as refugees. It would not necessarily be aware of the return of any registered refugees who did not request the provision of services. However, the number of displaced registered refugees known by the Agency to have returned to the occupied territories since 6/1967 is about 13200 – and even those records may be incomplete.

The Secretary-General’s report on the protection of Palestine refugees (document A1491442) states that the Commissioner-General of UNRWA has continued his efforts, with the Secretary-General in support of the safety, security and legal and human rights of the Palestine refugees in the occupied territories. Its refugee affairs and legal officers continue to play an important role in helping defuse tensions in situations of potential and actual violence. It also provided help for refugees coping with day-to-day problems of their lives under occupation. The Commissioner-General has protested to Israeli authorities against incidents of excessive use of force, collective punishments and other such measures, the report states. However, with the redeployment of the Israeli security forces away from large areas of the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, there had been a consequent decline in violent incidents involving the Israeli security forces and Palestinians there. The ‘passive protection function’ which had been provided by the refugee affairs, officers there was discontinued. The Secretary-General’s report on the protection of Palestinian students and educational institutions, and safeguarding of UNRWA facilities in the occupied territories (document A/49/1433) states that, during the reporting period, there were 63 cases of unauthorized Israeli entry into West Bank facilities, and 113 cases at Gaza Strip facilities. There were also 63 cases of injury, though fatalities, among students and trainees at UNRWA educational institutions in the West Bank. The corresponding figures for the Gaza Strip were 1375 injuries and no fatalities. The three UNRWA training centres in the West Bank began the 1993/94 academic year in 10/1993 and ended in 6/1994, the report states. An average of 24% of academic time was lost owing to general strikes, curfews and closures of the occupied territory. Following the 25 February massacre at Al-Ibrahimi mosque in Hebron, the occupied territories were sealed off from Israel and East Jerusalem. The Agency required and obtained permits from the Israeli authorities for students from Gaza attending UNRWA training centres there. However, of 333 such students, 51 did not receive permits to study in the West Bank. A special schedule was arranged for Gaza students at the West Bank training centres to enable them to complete their course requirements. In the West Bank, a total of 9% of school time was lost between 9/1993-6/1994, owing primarily to military closures, general strikes and curfews, the report states. In the Gaza Strip, the corresponding amount of school time lost was 10%. The Agency provided students in the West Bank and Gaza with distance education and self-learning materials, but such measures could provide only partial compensation for lost classroom The Secretary-General’s report on revenues derived form Palestine refugee properties (document A/49/148) is issued in response to resolution 48/40 G, in which the Assembly requested that he provide information on his efforts for the protection and administration of Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel, and the establishment of a fund for the receipt of income derived therefrom, on behalf of the rightful owners. The report describes his communications to Israel and all other Member States, as well as the quotation from Israel’s note verbal of 27 July. It also cites a note verbal of 9/15/1994 from Norway which indicated that Norway was not in possession of any pertinent information relative to the item. The Secretary-General’s report on University of Jerusalem ‘Al-Quds’ for Palestine refugees (document A/49/505) concerns the Assembly’s request that he continue taking all necessary measures to establish such a university. In it, he states that such a task would require the completion of a functional feasibility study requested in earlier Assembly resolutions. He had, therefore, sought the assistance of the Rector of the United Nations University, who made available a highly qualified expert to assist in preparation of the study. The expert was to visit the area and meet with competent Israeli officials.

In a note verbal of 8/10/1994, the Secretary-General requested that the Government of Israel facilitate the visit of the expert, at a mutually convenient date, the report continues. In a response dated 23 August, the Permanent Representative of Israel stated that Israel had voted consistently against the resolution entitled ‘University of Jerusalem “Al-Quds’ for Palestine refugees’ and that its position remained unchanged. It is clear that the sponsors of this resolution seek to exploit the field of higher education for political purposes totally extraneous to genuine academic pursuits’, the Permanent Representative states. Accordingly, the proposed visit ‘would serve no useful purpose’. A note verbally dated 7/27/1994 form the Permanent Representative of Israel is quoted in the above-mentioned reports of the Secretary-General. In it, he states that the Assembly’s 1993 series of resolutions on UNRWA ignores the new political reality following the agreement between Israel and the PLO, as well as the bilateral and multilateral negotiations’. Major progress has been achieved in the framework of the peace process. Israel believes that UNRWA can play an important role in promoting the social and economic advancement foreseen in the agreements between Israel and the PLO, and accordingly looks forward to continuing the cooperation and good working relationship with UNRWA. The Permanent Representative also states that the Assembly’s resolutions on UNRWA should focus directly on issues relating to its humanitarian tasks. They should refrain from adopting resolutions relating to political issues irrelevant to its work and detached from the new reality. The Assembly’s resolutions on UNRWA should be considered into one resolution, an approach which would also be compatible with the need to rationalize the Assembly’s work. He says. The report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, contained in a note by the Secretary-General (document A/49/509), states that the Commission has nothing new to report since submission of its report of 10/7/1993 (document A/48/1474, annex). That report states that the Commission had been unable to find means of facilitating the work of an Assembly of Palestine refugees to be given the choice between peaceful repatriation and compensation. The circumstances that had limited its possibilities of action had remained essentially unchanged.‘[

26032. Earthstewards Network. Earthstewards Network Invites You To Co-Creat Our Global Future. Pamphlet. Bainbridge Island, Wash.: Earthstewards Network, N.D. [1996?] The Earthstewards Network began as a dream late in 1979. It started as a loose network of those who care for the earth and its inhabitants. Since then, the vision and depth of our work has expanded to include projects in people-to-people diplomacy, environmental service, global networking and conflict resolution—co-creating simple, effective models of grassroots leadership for innovative change. We get results. People’s lives change for the better. We have a global track record in clearly making a difference in our hearts, in our communities and around the world. On every continent, in all walks of life, we are finding ways to say YES to a more humane, sustainable future.

Global Community and Networking: Do you need ideas for your own project? Are you experiencing a lifestyle change and want to contact others who can relate? Are you looking for something important to commit your time, energy, and talent to? There is someone in this network who can help. Our underlying strength is our global community of caring members. When we connect with each other through our shared visions, we create opportunities for people to get and give support. You can participate in the quarterly newsletter, service directory, special interest circles, local focus groups, community projects, and international gatherings. Sponsor your own neighborhood citizen diplomacy trip or explore our extended travel host network. Whatever your desires, this is a place to make your dreams come true.

Essential Peacemaking. Women & Men: All over the world, women and men are waking up to the importance of creating new models of leadership. Our male/female gatherings, gender communication trainings, and co-leader accreditation programs are helping to heal the wounds of gender as they inspire in us healthy models of collaboration and co-leadership. Facilitators in over 25 countries are helping women and men to communicate clearly and work together to heal themselves and the planet.

Middle East Citizen Diplomacy Project: Since 1990, we have led ten citizen diplomacy delegations to the heart of one of the most protracted areas of conflict on the planet. Traveling to Israel, the West Bank, Gaza, and Jordan, we’ve learned firsthand from our hosts about their lives, struggles, and perspectives. Living with host families and working side-by-side on a variety of service projects, we have forged lasting and unforgettable friendships. In addition, beginning in 1996, we will offer The Listening Project, an opportunity for Jews from around the world to collect oral histories from Palestinians. Through the gift of listening, each side will have the chance to connect heart to heart, and to see the human being behind the “enemy.”
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

river bank in Costa Rica or reclaiming the desert in Southern India, participants learn communication and conflict resolution skills needed to create lasting trust. What's not so easy to convey is the spirit, the hope and the inspiration: Youth from Serbia, Croatia, Palestine, Germany, and Holland gather during the "Healing the Wounds of War" Conference in Berlin, Germany in 7/1995 how ranger district offices are "transformed" and their employees feel "reconnected with life again;" how an urban youth-at-risk stated, "It feels good to see a lot of people come together from all over the world to lend a helping hand... The earth is dying on us and this is the only planet we live on, so I think we should take care of it the right way." We have sponsored projects from Central America to South Africa, from Switzerland to Southern India, from inner cities to rain forests and deserts. Soon we will be planting, laughing, crying and trusting each other during projects in Berlin, Germany; Vietnam; the Himalayas; Salt Lake City, Utah; and Oakland, California. Wherever we go, PeaceTrees empowers our youth and encourages everyone to take a fresh look.

PeaceTable: This highly successful program utilizes the unique method of resolving conflict through the preparing and sharing of food. PeaceTable leads culinary diplomacy trips around the world. It has fed thousands in our PeaceTrees program, in addition to creating bountiful international suppers where participants share their recipes from home.

Grassroots Citizen Diplomacy: The Earthstewards Network has created precedents in people-to-people exchanges throughout the world. We have arranged for Soviet and American families to visit each others homes. We have lived in Northern Ireland homes, and hosted them in the US We have also traveled to Europe, Central America, the Middle East, India, Nepal and Tibet. [Project expenses in 1994-1995: PeaceTrees 46%, Gatherings 15%, Network Program 12%, Administration 11%, Essential Peacemaking Women and Men 9%, Middle East Citizen Diplomacy 6%, Workshops 1%. FY 10/1/1994-9/30/1995: total income $22,1201; total expenses: $21,1577] [=]

Kansas: Incumbent: Robert Dole (Republican) [PAC contribution]. Except for his important role in US-Israel Free Trade bill, Majority Leader Dole has not been among stronger supporters in recent years. Did not oppose Jordan arms sale or recent Saudi sale. Challengers: Dole's re-election in Kansas looks assured. With no real Democratic opposition expected, Dole, actively seeking GOP presidential nomination, will benefit from the big win he is sure to get. Kentucky: Incumbent: Wendell Ford (Democrat) [PAC contribution]. Good record of support, raising funds, looks safe. Challengers: Attorney Jackson Andrews is the GOP nominee - not a significant threat to Ford.

Louisiana: Incumbent: Russel Long (Democrat). Retiring after long and colorful Senate career, with support for Israel never one of his leading attributes.

Challengers: The race between Rep. John Breaux (Democrat) and Rep. Henson Moore (Republican) is tightening up - after Moore bids and is now almost even. Moore's financial advantage is considerable. Breaux's records on issues of concern has been more consistent than Moore's. PAC has contributed to Breaux. [=]

26034. Giacaman, Rita. "Health As a Social Construction: The Debate In The Occupied Territories: Enduring Intifadah Injuries", in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. p. 18. Ahlam, from the village of Yabud, was gassed by Israeli helicopters while in a demonstration in 2/1988. The tear gas ulcerated her skin in several patches on her body; she has suffered permanent central nervous system damage and impaired use of arm muscles. In the Amman Hospital in Jordan, doctors state that the serious medical damages suffered in skin and muscles is a result of tear gas inhalation.

26035. Haj Hussien, Jalal Mohd. The Impact Of Child's Gender, Level Of Mental Ability, And Sex Of Parent On Parents' Stress Levels In Jordan. The University Of Wisconsin-Madison. Dissertation. 168pp. AAC 9314982. [Advisor: Gardner, William I.] The purpose of this study was to investigate the impact of the sex of parent, child's level of mental ability, child's gender, and interaction between child's level of mental ability and child's gender on mothers' and fathers' stress levels. Ninety mothers and 90 fathers of both boys and girls without disabilities, with mild mental retardation, and with severe mental retardation completed the Jordanian version of the Questionnaire on Resources and Stress-Short Form. Factorial analysis of variance, Least Significant Difference (LSD), Wilcoxon signed-ranks test, Mann-Whitney test, and other nonparametric procedures were employed to analyze these data. The results of these analyses did not reveal significant differences between mothers' and fathers' stress levels in any subscale or the total score of QRS-S. In addition, significant differences between mothers and fathers of boys and mothers and fathers of girls were found only in the following three subscales: Life span care, Personal burden and Lack of personal reward. Moreover, the results indicated that mothers and fathers of children without disabilities reported significantly less stress than did those of children with severe or mild mental retardation, and mothers and fathers of children with mild mental retardation reported significantly less stress than did mothers and fathers of severe mental retardation in any subscale or total score of QRS-S, with the exception of the following subscales: Life span care, Lack of personal reward, Family disharmony, Physical limitations, Financial stress, and Prefer institutional care. Finally, the results showed significant effect of the interaction between the child's level of mental ability and child's gender on the mothers' and fathers' scores in the following subscale Life span care, Family disharmony, Physical limitations, Financial stress, and Prefer institutional care; with the exception of Family disharmony in which the interaction effect was not significant on fathers' scores. However, there was no significant effect on mothers' and fathers' scores in the other subscales or the total score of QRS-S. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,] [=]

26036. Jawad, Saleh Abdul. "The Balance of Power Among the Political Forces in the West Bank: Seizing Control of Institutions: Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993. p. 8-10. On the unionist level, Hamas achieved important an noticeable successes, particularly in the elections of the workers' committees of Makassed Hospital and the Jerusalem Electricity Company–both locations traditionally considered as strongholds of the national movement. It also achieved crucial penetration of other unions, such as the one at an-Najah University. But at the Birzeit University University elections, it did not nominate anyone. Generally, it is safe to say with some simplification, that Hamas enjoys 35-40% of the votes in the elections its decide to participate in.

Nevertheless, there are many locations and unions in which Hamas has no weight to be mentioned. For example, the General Federation of Palestinian Workers, womens' unions, and other committees like the Jordan Valleye Farmers Committee, and the Palestinian Karate Federation, which enjoys a membership of scores of thousands.

Hamas tries to concentrate on the results of the elections in places where the elections were distinguished by fierce competition. If we look at the situation comprehensively, however, it is clear that Hamas does not enjoy more than 25-30% of the votes. This range forms the base level, which may go up or down in accordance with the prevalent political circumstances. In case an acceptable political settlement is reached, the influence and power of Hamas will decrease. But if the negotiations remain stuck in place, then Hamas will be able to achieve additional successes in the Palestinian street. [=]

26037. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. “Part 04: The Profession’s Composition and Activism”, in Lawyers and Human Rights in the Arab World: The Legal Profession in Jordan. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 1993. There are 2000 regular lawyers in the JBA. There are an additional 300 lawyers in the West Bank who legally are considered members of the Association. The total number of female lawyers is 400. Lawyers of Palestinian origin constitute the majority of the members of the Bar Association. There are also lawyers from other Arab countries practicing in Jordan. Palestinian groups are influential in the political life of the Bar, although in the election of the members of the Bar Council usually every political party presents its own list of candidates. The current president of the Bar Association is a pro-Iraq Ba’athist, and the Council consists of three Fatah [The ministry faction of the PLO led by Yasir Arafat] members, one member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), one member of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP) [A brother of the PFLP leader Nabil Hawatma serves as the Vice-President of the Bar Association.], and the others are Pan-Arabs. [Lawyers Committee interview with Dr. Kamal Nasser, Secretary General of the JBA and law professor, Amman, 3/3/1992; Lawyers Committee interview with Asma Khidir, attorney, Amman, 3/3/1992.]

26038. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. “Part 08: Assessment: The Jordanian Legal Profession and the UN Basic Principles On The Role of Lawyers: (B) Openness of the Profession”, in Lawyers and Human Rights in the Arab World: The Legal Profession in Jordan. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 1993. The requirements for joining the legal profession in Jordan are: to be a Jordanian national for at least 10 years (other Arab nationals are allowed to practice in the country according to reciprocal arrangements with the country involved); to be at least 23 years of age; to reside continuously in Jordan; to enjoy a good reputation and not have been convicted of any act breaching honesty, honor, or discipline or to have been or is accused of a previous job for one of these reasons; to have a law degree from a recognized university or institute (to be determined by the Bar Council); and to have completed successfully the specified internship period and not to be in the employ of the government or any municipality. Lawyers working in the public sector are therefore excluded from membership in the Bar Association. [Id., Article 8.] There is discrimination against people who may have been suspected of having committed an act involving breaches of honesty, honor or discipline but whose guilt had never been established by a court of law. The law excludes this category of people from joining the legal profession, thus opening the door to abuse in the interpretation of candidacy requirements. Applications for registration as a member of the Bar Association or as an intern must be submitted to the Council of the Bar Association. The applicant receives no reply within two months of filing the application, his application is considered rejected. [Id., Article 15.] Bar admission decisions may be contested before the High Justice Court (an appellate court), but its decision is final. The period of internship is two years for the holder of one degree in law and one year for the holder of two graduate diplomas, a Master’s or a Ph.D. The period required for each category may be extended up to one year by a decision of the Bar Council. [Id. Article 27.] During the training period the intern is obliged to attend the lectures organized by the Bar Association. While the Lawyers Committee was in Jordan it learned that the Council was considering extending the length of the internship to three years. [Lawyers Committee interview with Mazin Arshidat, Amman, 3/3/1992.] Barleaders interviewed by the Lawyers Committee denied the existence of any discrimination based on race, color, sex, ethnic origin, religion, political or other convictions, property, birth, or economic or others status. They insisted that the law considers any attempt to invoke such differences among Jordanian nationals an offense against the security of the state. In the opinion of other lawyers interviewed, including the Council member in charge of the intern lawyers, discrimination among lawyers does exist in three areas. First, lawyers from wealthy and prominent families receive privileged treatment from courts and other public agencies in comparison with lawyers of humble origins. For example, intern lawyers from wealthy backgrounds are usually admitted to the Bar Association even if their performance during the period of internship was not satisfactory, while other, more qualified candidates may be rejected to make room for them. Moreover, law graduates from privileged families are more likely than others to find law offices in which they can complete their internships. [Joint interview with Asma Khidir, Mazin Arshidat and Waddah Haddadin. Also interview with lawyer Imad Shargawi, Amman, 3/3/1992.] All these practices contravene Article 10 of the UN Basic Principles. Second, although there are 400 licensed female lawyers, only ten of them have private offices; the overwhelming majority of them earn wages in other lawyers’ offices. Male lawyers are frequently offered partnerships. Also, the health care service organized by the Bar Association does not cover child birth, although a male lawyer is given a stipend if he is arrested or forced temporarily stop his work due to sickness. Furthermore, the health care benefits organized by the Bar Association cover the family of a male lawyer but do not extend to the family of a female lawyer. Third, lawyers also complained of arbitrary treatment by the Bar Council. In one recent case, they claimed that the Bar Association decided to admit a judge who had been dismissed from the judiciary for corruption while it refused to admit another person who had been suspected of giving a bribe to a public servant, although the suspicion was never confirmed or brought before a court of law. [=]

26039. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. “Part 12: Recommendations", in Lawyers and Human Rights in the Arab World: The Legal Profession in Jordan. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 1993. In order to comply with the UN Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, the Jordanian government and Bar Association should take the following steps:

(1) The state of emergency should be lifted so that the rights of lawyers and other citizens can be guaranteed consistent with Jordanian and international law.

(2) The legal right of an accused person to have access to a lawyer of his/her own choosing at the investigation and trial stage should be scrupulously enforced. In accordance with Article 7 of the Basic Principles, all persons arrested or detained should have access to a lawyer not later than 48 hours from the time of arrest or detention.

(3) Provisions of emergency law allowing indefinite preventive detention should particularly be abrogated. The powers of the executive branch of government to dissolve the Bar Association and replace it with one of its own choosing, although never exercised before, should be abolished. These powers have a chilling effect on the Bar's independence.

(4) Article 108 of the legal profession statute, forbidding trade unions including the Bar Association from participating in joint gatherings and undertaking joint projects, should be abolished.

(5) Article 102(6) of the statute, denying the Bar Association the power to accept donations except upon the approval of the Council of Ministers, should be abolished.

(6) The government and the Bar Association should enact laws and regulations preventing discrimination among lawyers for reasons of sex, ownership of property and social origin with regard to both admission into and practice of the profession.

(7) The government and the Bar Association should establish programs aimed at informing the public about their rights.

(8) Effective means should be adopted by both the government and the Bar Association to make the right to legal aid a reality.

(9) The practice of preventing lawyers and other citizens from traveling abroad for lawful purposes should be abolished. This practice is particularly objectionable when it intervenes with a lawyer’s ability to carry out professional duties. Any person so impeded should have the right to seek redress from a court of law including compensation for any losses caused by the denial.
(10) The present oath required for admission to the profession should be changed to one providing for the respect of the Constitution and the law. [=]

26040. Miles, Bernard. "The Uprising of Youth: Intifada", in British Imperialism and the Palestine Crisis. Selections from the Anarchist Journal Freedom 1938-1948. London: Freedom Press, 1989. It is exciting, sometimes frightening, to witness as an outsider the birth of any new movement, to watch it from its uncoordinated, hesitant start, gather confidence, momentum, purpose and appeal until it reaches a stage of worldwide recognition. I was in a privileged position, as the senior UN official in the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip, to observe the genesis of the intifada as a movement, from its schoolyard origins in the Gazon city of Rafah in 10/1986 until the time it successfully challenged long-established attitudes and positions on the core problem of the Middle East-the Israeli/Palestinian dispute. Second, it has shaken the hitherto uncritical support by world Jewry for the Israeli government's hardline attitudes in its relations with the Palestinians. Third, it has enabled the PLO to make radical changes in its policies and now to pursue actively the path of peaceful territorial compromise with Israel over the land of Palestine. Finally, it has forced increasing numbers of Israelis to realize that the pre-intifada status of occupied lands and subject peoples can never be returned to, and that the days of Palestinians playing the role of helots to an Israeli Sparta are over. The Palestinians are now for the Israelis and entity, a people to be reckoned with... World leaders who whom to help should be clear as to the raison d'etre of the intifada. It is a movement started by the generation born or brought up under the Israeli occupation, knowing no other form of rule. Young people disillusioned by the lack of real interest in the world in solving the Palestinian problem; the charade of American shuttle diplomacy; the Jordanian illusion, which was no option in their opinion; the failure of the UN and the Arab League to project their case, and of the PLO leadership to achieve anything for them; even their parents and community leaders for having acquitted so docilely the humiliation of the status quo of occupation for so long. Young people sensing the contempt the average Israeli felt for all things Palestinians, the indignity of seeing their fathers go smiling, cap in hand to an Israeli official to seek approval for almost any activity, domestic or business. It was the young who sensed correctly that if they wanted to be free of Israeli rule, they must achieve it by themselves. It was the young who decided to take to the streets to show the world their contempt for Israeli rule. It was the young who agreed to defy death, maiming, beating and imprisonment to continue their campaign, who knew that for them a hero's death was better than a life of slavery. It was they who breathed life and self-respect again into their elders and led the whole community into the intifada. The young, in the course of action they chose, were certainly not the dupes and pawns of the PLO; indeed the PLO was taken almost as much by surprise as the Israelis at the onset of the Intifada. While the Intifada has entrusted the PLO with the negotiations, it is my opinion that the parameters are clearly laid down. They want the Israelis out of the West Bank and Gaza, but they want to live in peace with them. They will not accept autonomy under Israeli auspices because the young will not endorse it. They will not accept as the Israelis might want negotiations through traditional Palestinian dignitaries in the territories, because again the young will not agree to it. They will not accept elections under Israeli auspices, because they distrust the process and believe the candidates putting themselves forward are placing themselves at risk of incarceration in Israeli detention camps or deportation. They will not accept any scaling down of the intifada, unless it is accompanied by bottom-up guarantees that their objectives will be realized, for they know that the continuance of the Intifada, however painful, does much more harm to Israel. I believe these are the realities which must be taken into consideration by any country seeking to bring about an end to the Israeli/Palestinian dispute. The intifada has given the best possible opportunity for a secure, prosperous and peaceful future for both Israelis and Palestinians, living side by side in their own lands as neighbors, trading partners and future friends, it should not be missed. [=]

26041. New American View. "Israel: Civil War of Word: What Peace, If Any?", in New American View-News and Informed Commentary on the Pro-Israeli Lobby in America. Vol.8(12). June 15, 1993. Once upon a time, the Israelis used to tell their American cousins in no uncertain terms to keep their big mouths shut and their fat wallets open. The Israelis knew what was good for Israel and Zionism. American Jewry's job was to keep the money flowing into the Jewish state, and if American Jewry chose to load itself to the back of the loaded train, the Israelis would have no complaints. Jews who should make aliyah or raise the even tougher question of who is a Jew. Those days seem gone forever. Now, American Jews are openly getting deeply involved in Israeli politics. Some even think it is their right to criticize—and work against—the current Labor government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Last week's international edition of the Jerusalem Post illustrates the evolving relationship between the diaspora and Jewish state. There are side-by-side opinion pieces by Norman Podhoretz, editor-in-chief of the American Jewish Committee's neoconservative monthly Commentary, and the Anti-Defamation League's (ADL) national director Abraham Foxman. Foxman takes the traditional subservient position of American Jewry: "Israeli democracy should decide, diaspora Jews should support: the issue is not one of rights, but responsibility." We should remember, however, that Foxman's ADL is in serious criminal trouble, on the verge of being indicted by San Francisco's district attorney for stealing the confidential police files of its critics and political rivals—and providing at least some of the data to Israeli intelligence agencies. On the other hand, Podhoretz, who has made a career (after his Marxist days) of supporting the Greater Land of Israel strategy of Menachem Begin's and Yitzhak Shamir's Likud bloc, argues the contrary position. An Israeli at peace with its Arab neighbors would put Podhoretz and Commentary out of business. He writes: "The political dangers involved in American Jewish criticism of Israel's policies have faded. In the meantime, Israel may be confusing yearning for peace with opportunity." The debate is not really about the right of American Jews to criticize Israel. It's about the concept of land-for-peace. On one side are those Israelis—Rabin's Labor alignment, most of big business and investment—and the diaspora Jews who believe it is a worthwhile trade to give up the occupied areas of Gaza, the Golan Heights and the West Bank for peace and a chance to make Israel a viable economic state—perhaps even the Silicon Valley of the Middle East. On the other side are those Israelis—the Likud's Benyamin Netanyahu and the Zionists zealots, many already encamped in the occupied Arab lands—and the Jewish American neocon lobbyists whose paychecks and careers depend on an Israeli under siege by hostile neighbors. Peace and economic growth for the Jewish state have no meaning to these fanatics. Their Israel is a land of outdated Zionist dreams, of romanticized Masada suicides and glorious Bar Kochba slaughters—Jewish death wishes. As the peace process sputters and President Bill Clinton's "full partner" leadership lags, the situation is deteriorating swiftly—especially in Israel. The Likud is ready to pounce the moment that Labor falters. Peace resistance movements are springing up in the Jewish state. The Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz reports that the followers of dead radical Rabbi Meir Kahane are training at several camps in the US with the intent of returning to Israel and forming military units to resist the transfer of territory to the Arabs. And there are other new activist groups agitating against the peace policies of the Rabin government. "Women for Israel's Tomorrow" advertises itself as an Israeli grassroots national movement against the return of the Golan Heights to Syria. "Pro Israel" is a new New York-based movement dedicated to preventing the return of the occupied territories and countering the views of such Jewish groups as "Americans for Peace Now." The conflict is reflected elsewhere within the Jewish American activist community. Officially, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) takes the position of not siding with either Labor or Likud. But according to the newspaper Davar, Harvey Friedman, vice president of AIPAC's Florida division who was in Israel last week, viciously attacked the peace policy of Prime Minister Rabin. Friedman said that Rabin's policy was based on Israeli concessions. He said that he believed the Palestinians should be transferred to Jordan, and that Jordan should be designated as the Palestinian state. Unlike old soldiers, old Zionists don’t just fade away.

The Israelis are arguing with each other over the peace process and the concept of land-for-peace. So are the Jewish American lovers of Israel and Zionism. And the American factions are arguing with the Israeli factions. It’s getting messy, and maybe dangerous. [=]

26042. New American View. “Transfer Has Begun”, in New American View-Monitoring the Special Relationship Between the United States and Israel. Vol. 5(4), February 15, 1990. The Israeli government is quietly deporting hundreds of Palestinians from their homes in the West Bank, in what many describe as a “dry run” for a massive “transfer” of the Palestinian population from the West Bank and Gaza to Jordan or other Arab countries. Israel rationalizes these actions in the name of stricter enforcement of residency requirements for Palestinians living in the occupied territories. These requirements are so strict and so technical that they apply in many cases to individuals whose families have lived in the same village or house for generations. While the Israeli government says that 251 Palestinians have been deported under these new policy, other sources estimate that at least twice this number have been expelled to Jordan in the last year. The deportations are supposedly military operations, but many of the deportees are women and children. Typically, soldiers will come to a village after dark, with a list of village residents who are declared “illegal aliens,” subject to immediate deportation. The victims are granted only minutes to pack up their possessions, are bundled into military vehicles, and driven directly to the Jordanian border. To add insult to injury, the victims are often required to pay a fine for their “violation” as well as a fee for the transportation costs incurred by the government in deporting them, leaving them penniless. Israel’s deportation of Palestinian activists has received much publicity and worldwide condemnation, and the US government has put pressure on Jordan to end these politically inspired deportations. But the much more insidious practice of deporting average citizens has gone largely unremarked. The matter recently came to the attention of the US State Department, however, which called upon Israel to cease the practice immediately. Without acknowledging any wrongdoing, and without saying the policy was wrong, Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin said they would halt, but only temporarily. Rabin repeated the official Israeli line that the deportations were a simple matter of enforcing Israeli residency requirements. “We can’t allow everyone who comes to visit to stay without permission,” he said. But, he added, “We will deal with it more gently and tactfully. The policy hasn’t been changed,” he emphasized, “only frozen for the time being.”

Through many Palestinians admit they are in technical violation of Israel’s rules on residency in the occupied territories, they say that the Israeli law is purposefully written to destroy the framework of marriage and family upon which Palestinian life is built, and is designed to dash any hopes that families broken up by the occupation will ever reunite. According to Israeli law, the only Palestinians with any right to continue living in the territories are those who were registered during a census carried out on one day in September of 1967. According to Israeli authorities, those who were not there on that day, for whatever reason, are classified as aliens which the government has every right to expel. Palestinian women are particularly vulnerable because most were sent out of the country during this time to ensure their safety. Even persons who were born in the territories and who have married legal residents are denied permits. Children born to legal resident fathers, but whose mothers are not, are also subject to deportation. There are as many as 120000 Palestinians living in the occupied territory who are subject to deportation under these rules. Palestinians and Israeli human rights groups fear that the implementation of this policy may be renewed with a vengeance in order to make room for the expected wave of Jews from the Soviet Union. Despite international pressure being brought to bear on Israel to end these politically inspired deportations. But the much more insidious practice of deporting average citizens has gone largely unremarked. The matter recently came to the attention of the US State Department, however, which called upon Israel to cease the practice immediately. Without acknowledging any wrongdoing, and without saying the policy was wrong, Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin said they would halt, but only temporarily. Rabin repeated the official Israeli line that the deportations were a simple matter of enforcing Israeli residency requirements. “We can’t allow everyone who comes to visit to stay without permission,” he said. But, he added, “We will deal with it more gently and tactfully. The policy hasn’t been changed,” he emphasized, “only frozen for the time being.”

Jordan

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Jordan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

=================================================================================================

26043. Noakes, Greg [Compiler]; American Education Trust. “Issues in the News: From the Middle East Press: Jordan May Ban Mixed Sports Club”, in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (American Education Trust, Box 53062, Washington DC 20009), April/May 1993. pp. 55-57. The Jordanian Parliament, dominated by the Muslim Brotherhood, passed a draft law banning mixed-sex sports clubs, recreational centers and swimming pools. Arguing against the law, which would exempt hotels and tourist establishments, the Jordanian Times wrote that “Liberal and reasonable-minded people in this country should not sit idle while they see ‘the people’s representatives’ infringe on their rights and freedoms as citizens.” The legislation still must pass the Jordanian senate and be ratified by King Hussein. [=]

Despite this optimistic assessment, it is evident that human rights is still a significant issue. One leading Jordanian human rights source said that Jordan is still subject to the “entrenched interests of 40 years of authoritarianism.” This has left Jordan with a “martial law mentality,” that continues to surface in the implementation of new laws and regulations. Thus, according to the source, abuse and torture are no longer prominent, but neglect and mistreatment continue to exist. The source criticized the Jordanian judiciary’s continued subservience to the executive branch, and castigated the government for relying on martial law holdovers such as indefinite detention and the use of state security trials.

It is also clear that Jordan’s human rights situation has been affected by the increasing power and prominence of the Islamists. This was painfully evident, the human rights source argued, in the diminishing protection of women’s rights in Jordan. The source noted that Jordan’s National Womens Federation had been dissolved on a technicality, and that women were losing rights due to new restrictions on travel, inheritances, and pensions. The source pointed out that additional restrictions were under consideration in parliament and could be expected shortly. [=]

26045. Rifkind, Simon H.; Frank, Jerome N.; Fuld, Stanley H.; Tulin, Abraham; Handler, Milton; Guenlein, Murray I.; Fortas, Abe; Eno, Lawrence R.. The Basic Equities of the Palestine Problem: A Memorandum: Part 16: II: The Judicial and Moral Principles of Espostoe Forbid the Nullification or Abridgement of the Pledge to the Jewish People: Part 1 of 2. New York, September 10, 1947. We can do no better in opening the discussion of this subject than quote the unanswerable words of Winston Churchill in the House of Commons in 1939, in the debate on the White Paper. Referring to the "great experiment and bright dream" of the Jewish National Home policy, Churchill said: "It is stranger still that we should turn away when the great experiment and bright dream . . . has proved its power to succeed. Yesterday the Minister responsible descanted eloquently in glowing passages upon the magnificent work which the Jewish colonists have done. They have made the desert bloom. They have started a score of thriving industries, he said. They have founded a great city on the barren shore. They have harnessed the Jordan and spread its electricity throughout the land. So far from being persecuted, the Arabs have crowded into the country and multiplied till their population has increased more than even all world Jewry could lift up the Jewish population. Now we are asked to decree that all this and what has been done, all this is to come to an end... it is 20 years ago, since my right hon. friend (Prime Minister Chamberlain) used these stirring words: ‘A great responsibility will rest upon the Zionists, who, before long, will be proceeding, with joy in their hearts, to the ancient seat of their people. Thers will be the task to build up a new prosperity and a new civilization in old Palestine, so long neglected and mis-rulled.’ Well, they have answered his call. They have fulfilled his hopes. How can he find it in his heart to strike them this mortal blow.” [PDC, Vol. 347, No. 108, Cols. 2188-2189.]

Jews have indeed answered the call, as Churchill stated. They have done so with their substance, their manpower and their very lives on the faith of the pledge of the Nations. Hundreds of thousands of them have moved into Palestine with the backing of millions of Jews throughout the world, staking their own futures and the futures of their children on the continuing and ultimate fulfilment of that pledge. They did so on the assurance that they came “as of right” and that more and more of their fellow Jews would follow them to reconstitute with them that Jewish National Home which was the impelling motive of their coming, their sacrifices and achievements. They were never warned that after a short time further Jewish immigration would be artificially restricted or stopped and that they were to remain a permanent minority in the land under the Arabs. On the contrary, both the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate, and the world statesmen who expounded them, promised those pioneers the exact opposite; and they acted in reliance on that promise.

The principles of both legal and moral estoppel therefore apply—principles which obtain in international law as well as in the municipal jurisprudence of every civilized nation in the world. These principles forbid the Nations now from abrogating or abbreviating their pledge to the Jews. To repeat once again the words of Lloyd George: “The notion that Jewish immigration would have to be artificially restricted in order to ensure that the Jews should be a permanent minority never entered into the heads of anyone engaged in framing the (Jewish National Home) policy. That would have been regarded as unjust and as a fraud on the people to whom we were appealing.” [PDC, Vol. 347, No. 108, p. 22.]

The moral aspect of the situation was stated by the Archbishop of Canterbury in the House of Lords in these words: “I cannot feel that it (the 1939 White Paper) holds out a prospect of reasonable justice to the Jews... In 1914, they were 8000; they are now (1939) more than 45000. They have been encouraged to enter the country; they have been encouraged to invest great sums of money in industrial and other enterprises. They have erected very noble buildings, and, apart from the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after tramping the earth responded to kind treatment. “The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better”, T. E. Lawrence wrote in 1909, after trampling through the desolation of Syria and Palestine, “their colonies are bright spots in a desert.” [Quoted in Nathan, Gass & Creamer, Palestine: Problem and Promise (1946), p. 51.]

Later, under the Mandate, the Jews had to struggle with the political obstacles which the Mandatory Power itself, in derogation of the administration of the very first ignored that injunction. Jewish settlers had to and did purchase land at ever higher prices. They bought desert areas, malarial valleys, swamps, hills and sand, on the theory that scientific methods and human devotion could resuscitate the derelict earth. Much or this land was purchased not from small Arab farmers but from large proprietors, most of whom were absentee owners. Full protection was given—by law to the small Arab cultivators. But the Jews have so far been able to acquire only a mere 1,802 million dunams out of the 26.3 million (around 6.5 million acres) which make up the total area of Western Palestine. This means that the Jews own a mere 6.4% of the land. The rest of the total area belongs to Arabs, other non-Jews, and the... government; large sections of it are still derelict and practically uninhabited. The obstacles, both natural and political, only spurred on the new settlers. Dry land was irrigated, swamp land was drained, exhausted land was reclaimed. A striking example was the reclamation of the Valley of Esdraelon, which was a swamp when the Jews bought it. How these 136,000 dunams (about 34,000 acres) were made cultivable and habited is shown in the Report of the High Commissioner. Sir Herbert Samuel, in 1925: "By an expenditure of nearly £90,000 about 51 square miles of the valley have now been purchased by the Jewish National Fund and other organisations; twenty villages have been founded, with a population numbering at present (1925) about 2600; nearly 3000 donums (about 700 acres) have been afforested. Twenty schools have been opened. There is an Agricultural Training College for Women in one village and a hospital in another. All the swamps and marshes within the area that has been colonised have been drained, and cases of malaria are proportionately rare. An active trade in dairy produce has sprung up, mostly finding a market, by means of the railway, in Haifa. The whole aspect of the valley has been changed. . . . what five years ago was little better than a wilderness is being transformed before our eyes into a smiling countryside." [Colonial No. 15, 1925, pp. 34-35. Matter in second parenthesis is Sir Herbert's.]

Another type of problem had to be solved in the desolate and rocky hills. Here the Jewish settlers had to dynamite the rocks, build terraces, and fertilize the meagre soil in the fissures before they could plant trees. This was done with striking success, so that today many hill colonies grow peaches and apricots and grapes, while others are engaged in dairy farming.

In other places land has been reclaimed from the salt by intensive and ingenious efforts. The fertility of this land is frequently four times that of ordinary land. An English agricultural authority describes the Jewish agricultural achievement in enthusiastic terms. Sir E. John Russell writes: "Regions that but a few years ago were barren sand dunes, bare hills or pestilential swamps have been converted into fertile agricultural land dotted with pleasing villages, and where the people can live in the faith of their fathers and the children grow up happily. The labour was arduous, but it was cheerfully, even joyfully, undertaken and it was lightened by the generous help given by Jews all over the world." [Foreword by Sir E. John Russell to the English edition (Cameoil Press) of W.C. Lowdermilk, Palestine, Land of Promise (1944), p. 7.]

In the last two years 33 new settlements were established, some of them in the Negeb, the "desert" in Southern Palestine. These Jewish settlements in the desert cover an area of about 90,000 dunams and are serving as experimental farms for dry farming. Water was, of course, the primary problem. The pioneers dug wells to a depth of from 110-140 meters. So far dry farming on these "experimental settlements" has yielded double the crops of those previously obtained by the primitive Arab cultivators. These and various other land experiments of the Jews in Palestine show what can be made of the rest of the desolate country and the entire Middle East. Indeed, it has been authoritatively called an object lesson for the whole world: "Inhabitants of larger and richer countries," wrote Dr. Lowdermilk, the foremost American soil conservationist, "may wonder at these superhuman efforts to reclaim land. But the time may come in thickly populated and semi-starving countries . . . when men, instead of being amazed by the efforts of Palestine's terrace-builders, swamp-drainers and soilwashers, will begin to imitate them." [W.C. Lowdermilk, Palestine, Land of Promise (1944) p. 147.]

The important thing about these "superhuman efforts" is that they created an agricultural base on which the Jews can continue to build their commonwealth. They were undertaken and made for that express purpose. The Jews have thereby created a varied and rich agriculture in their small sector of Palestine. Their agricultural settlements rose from 70 in 1922 to 290 in 1946. Indeed, of all the countries in the Middle East, Palestine has for that reason shown the greatest progress in agriculture for the whole population.

Industry did not exist in Palestine in any important sense before the Jewish resettlement began. Nablus had a few primitive soap factories, Jaffa and Haifa some flour mills. Here and there Arab and oriental Jewish craftsmen fashioned ornaments or carved olivewood mementos for tourists. The country had a few tanneries, potteries, kilns, and oil presses. Before World War I the total capital investment in these industries amounted to around £1 million and provided a livelihood for 50 of the total population. [—]

26046. Rifkind, Simon H.; Frank, Jerome N.; Fuld, Stanley H.; Tulin, Abraham; Handler, Milton; Guerfein, Murray I.; Fortas, Abe; Eno, Lawrence R.. The Basic Equities of the Palestine Problem: A Memorandum: Part 17: II: The Judicial and Moral Principles of Estoppel Forbid the Nullification or Abridgement of the Pledge to the Jewish People, Part 2 of 2. New York, September 10, 1947. Establishing a modern industry in the backward land presented as many difficulties as did the agricultural problem To begin with, there was no skilled labor, no experience, no credit, no power, no natural resources except unused water power and the long ignored mineral salts in the Dead Sea, few transportation facilities, no domestic market and no tariff protection. Everything, including the fuel to generate the electricity in the plants at Tel Aviv and Haifa, had to be imported or created.

But the most important resource brought in from the outside was, of course, the Jewish immigrant. These immigrants carried with them enthusiasm, skill and will; and a few brought capital. Ingenuity and faith overcame obstacles. Industry has been successfully developed by Jewish effort; and its promise for the future is now conceded. As the Royal Commission of 1937 said: Two new points stood out. First, far more future immigrants were going to be 'absorbed' into industry and urban life than by agriculture and land-settlement. Secondly, so far from reducing 'economic absorptive capacity,' immigration increased it. The more immigrants came in, the more work they created for local industries to meet their needs, especially in building: and more work meant more room for immigrants . . . Unless, therefore, the Government adopted a more restrictive policy . . . there seemed no reason why the rate of immigration should not go on climbing up and up." [Cmd. 5479, 1937, p. 62.]

Electrification is one example of what the Jews have wrought in industry. The Palestine Electric Corp., organized with capital which only the Jews could raise, built the first hydroelectric plant in the country at Tel Aviv, using the power of the Jordan. Rutenberg, a Zionist engineer and financier, is now the largest industrial enterprise in the country and supplies it with 92 of its electricity. Part of the power comes from a hydroelectric station at the Jordan, which Rutenberg was the first to harness, and the rest from oil-powered plants at Tel Aviv and Haifa. The Palestine Electric Corp. has increased its production of electric current about twenty times in fourteen years. It sold 11,500,350 kwh in 1932 and 233,055,000 kwh in 1946. The additional electrification and irrigation possibilities of the proposed Jordan Valley Authority are enormous.

Since the early Jewish settlements were rooted in the soil, a large part of the new industry was directly connected with agriculture. But as time went on, new manufactures grew up, such as the manufacture of textiles, leather, paper, clothing, light metals, chemicals, machinery, electrical appliances, and building materials. A number of specialized industries, which do not depend upon local resources, have also taken root. Among them are artificial teeth, which have found an export market, and diamond cutting, an industry that was transplanted from the Low Countries after the Nazi invasion. The diamond enterprises, in 1945, overcame obstacles. Industry has been successfully developed by Jewish effort; and its promise for the future is now conceded. As the Royal Commission of 1937 said: Two new points stood out. First, far more future immigrants were going to be 'absorbed' into industry and urban life than by agriculture and land-settlement. Secondly, so far from reducing 'economic absorptive capacity,' immigration increased it. The more immigrants came in, the more work they created for local industries to meet their needs, especially in building: and more work meant more room for immigrants . . . Unless, therefore, the Government adopted a more restrictive policy . . . there seemed no reason why the rate of immigration should not go on climbing up and up." [Cmd. 5479, 1937, p. 62.]

Electrification is one example of what the Jews have wrought in industry. The Palestine Electric Corp., organized with capital which only the Jews could raise, built the first hydroelectric plant in the country at Tel Aviv, using the power of the Jordan. Rutenberg, a Zionist engineer and financier, is now the largest industrial enterprise in the country and supplies it with 92 of its electricity. Part of the power comes from a hydroelectric station at the Jordan, which Rutenberg was the first to harness, and the rest from oil-powered plants at Tel Aviv and Haifa. The Palestine Electric Corp. has increased its production of electric current about twenty times in fourteen years. It sold 11,500,350 kwh in 1932 and 233,055,000 kwh in 1946. The additional electrification and irrigation possibilities of the proposed Jordan Valley Authority are enormous.

Since the early Jewish settlements were rooted in the soil, a large part of the new industry was directly connected with agriculture. But as time went on, new manufactures grew up, such as the manufacture of textiles, leather, paper, clothing, light metals, chemicals, machinery, electrical appliances, and building materials. A number of specialized industries, which do not depend upon local resources, have also taken root. Among them are artificial teeth, which have found an export market, and diamond cutting, an industry that was transplanted from the Low Countries after the Nazi invasion. The diamond enterprises, in 1945, employed about 3600 people and exported about £5.9 million worth of diamonds.

Building is a sure indication of confidence and progress. In 1936 about 11,000 Jewish workers—11% of the Jewish labor—were engaged in building projects, for which much of the stone and lime was supplied by Arabs. The war restricted operations, but on its conclusion an immense increase in building activities occurred. In 1946 an estimated £10 million were invested in building and some 18,000 rooms were completed.

Jewish industry in general has expanded steadily and its growth has not been halted even by the usual crises that accompany post-war periods. Industrial expansion is shown in the following table: [Excluding handicrafts which numbered in 1937, 4050 establishments with a
women in the middle east and north africa
jordan
www.referencecorp.net/downloads

1926: 583 establishments; 5711 employed.
1937: 1556 establishments; 21964 employed.
1943: over 2000 establishments; over 45000 employed.

In 1943 the total value of Palestine's industrial output amounted to about $173 million. [This does not include mineral oil, or the product of Government workshops and handicrafts] of which the Jewish share was 85%.

That the industrial and business sector of the Jewish economy is both sound and growing, is shown by the war and post-war developments. Palestine's Jewish economy had geared itself completely to the war effort. About 350 of its industry had produced directly for the armed forces. Under the pressure of urgent war needs, this industry expanded enormously—in the case of spindles and looms the increase was fivefold—and new enterprises were started where none had existed before. Some experts doubted whether this economy, with its war-inflated prices, would withstand the shock of post-war readjustment.

But the economy has held up remarkably well in the reconversion period. It has actually been purchasing capital goods abroad in order to re-equip old establishments and start new ones. It has shown its resilience by its ability to reabsorb the demobilized 26,000 Palestinian Jewish men and women in the British armed forces—all volunteers—quickly and smoothly. At the same time at least 31,000 Jewish immigrants, nearly all of whom were destitute, found a place in the economy between 1945 and 1946. Unemployment, never high before the war, is now below 30% of the total labor force—a negligible figure that is considered more or less "normal" in any economy even in periods of high prosperity. This post-war conversion, be it remarked, was achieved without any assistance from the Administration and sometimes, especially in matters of immigration, in the face of its opposition.

Before the war around 11% of Jewish industrial output was exported, and of this, only one-third went to the middle eastern Arab States. During the war industrial exports spurted up to 17.5% (£8.2 million) of the total industrial production, and again about one-third of it went to the states of the Arab League. The present Arab boycott, which became effective in 1946, in part reduced the value of exports to Arab countries from £2.7 million in 1945 to £5000000 the net year. A large part of this loss however, has been made up by increased exports to non-Arab countries. Palestine industry has found new markets and is developing others. As regards the countries of the Arab League, sooner or later Palestine will have the possibility of protecting its commercial interests even there, for when the present world-wide shortages have inevitably been transformed into surpluses, the Arab countries will be more than ever in need of markets for their main products; and Jewish Palestine will be the nearest and most important of such markets.

Thus have the Jews of Palestine and the Jews in all parts of the world wrought in the land on the faith of the international pledge which was made to them. Thus have they prepared that land and demonstrated its economic potentialities for the rapid absorption of the hoped-for and expected new mass Jewish immigration.

Nor have they done this with any injury to the Arab inhabitants. On the contrary, the Arabs have prospered and benefited both materially and culturally—with a large increase of population—from the Jewish resettlement, regardless of the clamorous propaganda to the contrary of Arab agitators and politicians.

Ten years ago, the Palestine Royal Commission, after considering all the evidence, came to the following conclusions [Cmd. 5479, 1937, p. 93]: (1) Jewish capital has had "a general fructifying effect on the economic life of the whole country." (2) Arab industry and citriculture "has been largely financed by the capital thus obtained." (3) "Jewish example has done much to improve the Arab cultivation . . ." (4) "Owing to Jewish development and enterprise the employment of Arab labour has increased in urban areas . . ." (5) Jewish anti-malaria work and reclamation "have benefited all Arabs in the neighbourhood." (6) Jewish public health and welfare institutions have also served Arabs. "Hadassah, for example, treats Arab patients, notably at the Tuberculosis Hospital at Safad and the Radiology Institute at Jerusalem, admits Arab country-folk to the clinics of its Rural Sick Benefit Fund, and does much infant welfare work for Arab mothers." (7) The beneficent effect of Jewish immigration is shown by the marked Arab population increase in urban areas affected by Jewish development. "A comparison of the Census returns in 1922 and 1931 shows that, six years ago (i.e., in 1931), the increase in Haifa was 80%, in Jaffa 62%, in Jerusalem 37%, while in purely Arab towns such as Nabulus and Hebron it was only 7%, and at Gaza there was a decrease of 2%.

Far from being economically harmed by Jewish immigration, Arab wealth and prosperity have steadily increased. This is shown by the tables in a Survey of Palestine (2 vols., 1946), which the Palestine Administration submitted to the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry in 12/1945 and January 1946.

A few comparative figures from those tables will illustrate this: In 1928 the total Arab winter crop was 118978 tons and the summer crop 83888. In 1942 the figures stood at 234674 and 488452, respectively.

In 1928 the Arabs produced 15576 tons of melons; in 1945 they grew 40627 tons. The Jews supplied the market.

In 1939 the Arabs had £3760000 deposited in their two banks; in 1945 this had leaped to £6.971 million. During the same period Arab banks increased their paid-up capital by about 600%.

In 1900 Arab land planted to citrus was around 45000 dunams; in 1945 it was about 133000. The Jews had supplied the impetus, the "know-how" and the marketing facilities. Increased Government revenue resulting from the Jewish resettlement enabled the Administration to spend more money on social services for the Arabs. "Arab witnesses . . . could not deny that such public services as had in fact been provided had benefited their people; nor could they deny that the revenue available for those services had been largely provided by the Jews."

The Jewish contribution to the revenue from income tax in Palestine amounts to approximately 68% of the total. Similarly, the Jewish contribution to the whole revenue amounts to 62.7% of the total, although Jews constitute but 33% of the population. The Arab and others' share is only 37.3%; but it is the Arabs for whom the great bulk of the revenue is spent.

Social services supported by the Government revenue are of benefit to them especially, since the Jews take care of so many important public services by themselves at their own separate expense. Thus 85% of the patients entering Government hospitals in 1944 were non-Jews. In the course of the Jewish resettlement the Palestine Department of Health expanded its budget of £34440 in 1924-25 to £543000 in 1944-45. Malaria, once the scourge of Palestine, has been reduced to a negligible figure by Jewish anti-malaria work—for the benefit of Arabs as well as the Jews. In 1922 malaria patients amounted to 7.17% of all patients treated; in 1942 this percentage dropped to 0.40%. Owing to improved health conditions, Palestine's Arab population has increased. Employment opportunities have furthermore attracted Arab immigrants from Syria and Trans-Jordan, thus reversing an historic trend. In 1913, for example, 2,000 Arabs emigrated from the Jerusalem district alone. In 1922-27 between 20000-30000 Arabs immigrated into Palestine; at the same time an average of 9300 Arabs emigrated from Syria annually.

Jewish public health stations, clinics, and improved hygienic conditions have sharply cut down the Arab death rate and, particularly, infant mortality. In 1924-30 the average infant mortality rate among Palestinian Arabs was one of the highest in the world—192 per 1,000 live births. By 1939 this was reduced to 121, compared with 203 for Egypt (1936-39). By 1946 this was further reduced to 90.7.

Not only has the Arab infant mortality thus been sliced by over 50%, but Arab school attendance has increased fivefold since the Jewish resettlement began.

Speaking in the House of Commons on 11/24/1938, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, Secretary of State for the Colonies, summarized Jewish Palestine's boon to Arabs as follows: "If not a single Jew had come to Palestine after 1918, I believe the Arab population of Palestine to-day would still have been round about the 600000 figure (instead of over 1
Evidence Regarding the Allegations of Soliciting Employment

Sen. Packwood's Spouse: (D) Ron Crawford: (1) Background.

Resolution for Disciplinary Action. Senate Report 104-137. District of Columbia: US Senate, Select Committee on Ethics, September 7, 1995. p. 187. Ron Crawford first met Sen. Packwood in 1968 during the recount of his first election. Mr. Crawford described the Senator as one of his closest friends. Mr. Crawford's consulting business is called F.P. Research Associates and he is a registered lobbyist. There is also a fundraising component to his business, but that is handled by his son.

In Senator Packwood's 1992 campaign, Mr. Crawford's firm was involved in raising money from PACs around the country. In a diary entry dated 10/8/1991, Senator Packwood recorded the following: "The advantage Ron brings to me in the Washington PAC scene is that much of his income is dependent upon his relationship with me." Senator Packwood testified that he does not know how much Mr. Crawford earns or how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford has been active in fundraising in every one of Senator Packwood's campaigns. In 1991-92, Senator Packwood's reelection campaign paid Mr. Crawford's firm approximately $60,000 for fundraising, consulting and event management.

Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

While Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor.""

Mr. Crawford's lobbying activities have been well documented, there is still a question of how much of his income is dependent on him. Mr. Crawford is a registered lobbyist for the National Cable Television Association and the American Bus Association and has been so since the early 1980's. At the time of his deposition, he had recently registered as a lobbyist for the Sturm Ruger Company. He has a ten year business relationship with this company. At the time of his deposition, he also recently had become a lobbyist for the National Restaurant Association. He has previously represented Shell Oil. Mr. Crawford recorded an entry in his diary that Mr. Crawford was in to see him on behalf of Shell Oil. He noted the following conversation: "He [Crawford] said, "I know how much you hate the oil companies." I said, "...I still hate the oil companies but I'll do you a favor." Senator Packwood testified that whenever anybody comes in like this and if you're going to do something anyway, you let them think it's a big favor."" the Israeli ministry of Justice, who both heads the Ministry's Department of Civil Claims and deals with seizures of land owned by the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. The leak acquired some notoriety. After having been reported by other papers, it was mentioned by several MKs in the Knesset. Most Israeli newspapers (with the predictable exception of the Jerusalem Post) dealt with it at length. Gradually, its discussion began to focus on what might be termed the spirit of the Israeli Law when applied to Arabs, but the discussion has also delved at certain points into the nature of the legal order established by Israel in the Territories conquered in 1967: both in those areas which, like East Jerusalem (or the Golan Heights which will remain outside the scope of this report) were subsequently formally annexed, and in those areas which remain formally outside the borders of the State of Israel, under the authority of the military governors. The present report will be confined to the examination of Pi'a Albek's role within the area of the State of Israel, and of the deeper implications of her activities there. Her role in the Occupied Territories will be explored in the next report.

The Civil Claims Department, among its other duties, processes the claims of the Palestinians from the Territories whose relatives are killed by the Israeli troops under the circumstances not involving any "disturbance of public order." Yet the Israeli legal authorities often refuse to charge anyone responsible for the killings. According to the Israeli law, the State of Israel can in such cases be sued for financial compensation in a civil Israeli court. For many years the PLO and the Intifada leadership forbade the Palestinians from the Territories to engage in any such litigation. With the decline of the Intifada and the loss of its leadership's power, several Palestinians in the last year didn't nevertheless bring lawsuits to Israeli courts. A case in point is the lawsuit brought to the District Court of Tel Aviv by Mr. Muhammad Jarjun, the widower of the deceased Mrs. Safiya Suleiman Jarjun of Khan Yunes [Gaza Strip], who was clubbed by the soldiers and then shot in her belly and back from a close range, while doing nothing more than watering the garden in front of her house. In conformity with the usual procedure, the Tel Aviv district prosecutor approached Albek, in her capacity of the Head of the Civil Claims Department. Replying, Albek wrote the following instruction: "In addition to the usual defense arguments used in such cases, you should claim that the plaintiff could only benefit from the death of his wife, because he now no longer needs to support her as he did before. In the very least, therefore, he sustained no damage at all." (Quoted by the entire Hebrew press of 10/15/1991). Somebody subsequently brought the instruction to the notice of the minister of Justice, Dan Meridor (of Likud). He not only countermanded it, but also officially rebuked Albek, while imposing secrecy on the matter. In the end Albek's instruction was not followed, but Meridor's imposition of secrecy was not followed either.

The entire Hebrew press denounced Albek and her peculiar instructions, and so did a number of public figures such as the chairman of the Israeli Bar Association Advocate Khoter-Yishay. But three groups sprang to her defense. One such group were the settlers, particularly the religious ones. Speaking in their name, a settler leader Daniela Weiss extolled Albek as "that noblest woman." The second group were the leaders of the extreme right-wing parties, such as MK Elyakim Ha'etzni (who once had compared the Arabs to rats). Finally, the religious parties and their rabbis also rallied in Albek's defense. They may have been influenced by Albek's devout religious faith, by her being a descendant of a religious family and by the fact that her husband is a professor of Talmud at the religious Bar Ilan University. But no single Likud member dared stand up in her defense. Even such extremists as Sharon who, as will be shown later, had cooperated closely with Albek in the past, on this occasion preferred to keep silence. This only proves that a chasm still exists between Likud (which not only admits but also solicits Arabs as members and the three listed groups which stand for a rabid and undisguised Jewish racism and religious zealotry. As it turned out, other instructions of Albek concerning legal cases involving the Arabs have also been discovered by the Hebrew press. Some opinions are worth quoting. The leading article of Davar (10/16/1991) links these instructions of her to various official anti-Arab pronouncements made at various times in the past. Davar lists such pronouncements, among them "the 1956 'Allah will have mercy on them' blessing of a high Israeli army commander [general Ieka Shadmi] to the Arabs about to be killed in Qafq Qassem, or the suggestion of the former Chief of Staff and a present agriculture minister [Rafael Eitan] that the Arabs from the Territories, being no more than 'drugged cockroaches' might as well put into the bottles." After stating that "quite a lot of high rank officers and senior officials have nothing but contempt and loathing for the inhabitants of the Territories," Davar concludes that "although the attitude toward the Arabs as subservient beings is certain and unceasing, the individuals can and do vary a great deal. But the tone of official statements should refrain from expressing it."
abound. Let me give just one example out of many available. In an interview held after two years of Intifada ("I have nothing to be ashamed of," Haaretz, 12/8/1989), the retiring commander of the Israeli forces in Gaza Strip, colonel Tzvi Pogel, claimed that ordering all the male residents of a refugee camp to stand all night in a sewage pool was not punishment but "education," necessary in view of "the insufficient maturity of the Gaza Strip inhabitants to assume responsibility" which contrasts with the European "tradition of governance." The Custodian already operating under Sharon's authority, she gave instruction to confiscate the tiny shop. Of the two methods of "Judaizing East Jerusalem," as correctly explained by Danny Rubinstein ("The presence of the Absentees," Haaretz, 10/18/1991), all Jerusalem" in current use, Albek's is clearly superior to Sharon's other Arab residents formally became Absentees.... Theoretically, the Custodian of the Absentee Property could confiscate all houses and other property of all East Jerusalem Arabs on the ground that they were no longer its legal owners."

However, the minister of Justice at the annexation time, Ya'akov Shimshon Shapira, who was a little more mindful of legal implications than the usual run of Israeli ministers, noticed the absurdity of this situation. He submitted to the Knesset an amendment to the 1950 Law "by which East Jerusalem Arabs could legally own their property." The amendment was enacted by the Knesset, but it did not affect the inhabitants of West Bank (or of any other place) who had property in East Jerusalem. "Arabs from Bethlehem, Ramallah and all other locations in the Territories, as well as from outside of the Territories, suddenly found themselves no longer the legal owners of their houses, shops, land and whatever else they may have possessed in East Jerusalem." Nor did the amendment affect the status of Arabs, from either East Jerusalem or the Territories, in regard to property located in Israel which they had owned in the past or may acquire in the future. In regard to such property they remain "Absentees." This is why Albek could argue that any compensation, if paid in Israel, was to be transferred to the Custodian. Until recently, however, this law was not acted upon, except "under turnkey emergency." Rubinstein provides an example of such "emergency" which occurred "in Kfar-Akab, north of Jerusalem. The Custodian came to a local peasant, and after taking measurements carefully, determined that half of his house's courtyard was located on the territory annexed to Israel. In regard to this half of his courtyard, the peasant was to be considered an Absentee, and that half was confiscated from him. Ordinarily, however, the Custodian refrained from using his 'legitimate' but venomous authority."

Enrages Ms. Albek, though. Acting in coordination with Sharon, and with the Custodian already operating under Sharon's authority, she carefully scrutinized East Jerusalem property archives in order to discover "the Absentees," so as to confiscate maximum property. In this job, Albek was remarkably successful. As noted in some press reports, nothing was too insignificant to escape her attention. On an inspection tour in the Muslim Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem, she noticed a tiny shop which looked as if temporarily shut down. Right on, she radioed her office computer, to find that the shop owner was a resident of the Territories, banned by order of the authorities from entering Jerusalem. "For me, these strangers are not human beings, but animals," said Albek as proposing to load them "like animals" on trucks and expel all of them from Germany. Rosenthal stresses that in Israel the advocacy of a "solution of the Palestinian problem" in the spirit of that neo-Nazi, commonly referred to as the "transfer," is not only popular, but also considered a legitimate policy option. Furthermore, "Pli'a Albek has clothed this solution in a legalistic phraseology." He adds: "Hatred needs to be cultivated and argued for. It consumes time that could be spent on cogitating on something else. After all, hatred is an all too human emotion. But once a target of hatred - a Jew, an Arab, a foreign laborer in Germany - is perceived as a mere object, one can relax, take a rest and treat him as one would wish, efficiently.... The perception of Palestinians as objects to be processed can be detected anywhere: at roadblocks, in the courts, during the Shabak interrogations and in [Israeli] political debates." I agree with Rosenthal wholeheartedly. But for me, his analysis warrants a conclusion that indiscriminate harassment and humiliation of the Palestinians in the Territories, which is inflicted everyday, carry greater weight than relatively rarer instances of killing, or even inflictions of wounds and torture. It is because the constant harassment and humiliation shows the Israeli authorities in the Territories as wanting to treat the Palestinians as mere objects, in contrast to Jewish religious zealots who do hate them.

However odious Pli'a Albek's functions in her capacity of the director of the Department of Civil Claims of the Ministry of Justice may be, she also performs a rather undefined but highly consequential role by establishing legal grounds for seizures of land owned by Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, including East Jerusalem. The Hebrew press has devoted much space to ingenuity of her legal pretexts. She has experience, because she began her work in the winter of 1977-78. After Sadat's initiative, land confiscation and settlement construction was sped up drastically. Even today, only 20% of the already confiscated West Bank land has been used for settlement. The rest is still unused by settlers. [5]

26050. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 87: Pli'a Albek or the Spirit of the Israeli Law: Part 2. Israel, October 27, 1991. Ms. Albek's legal talents have blossomed in particular in cases involving land in East Jerusalem (and the Golan Heights). Their discussion must be separated from cases involving the Occupied Territories which have not been annexed, where the legal situation is different. As correctly explained by Danny Rubinstein ("The presence of the Absentees," Haaretz, 10/8/1991), all land and property of the Palestinian inhabitants of East Jerusalem was not legally owned by them, but by the State of Israel. Rubinstein recalls that a 1950 Israeli law was meant to apply without distinction to any conceivable territory which might fall under Israeli sovereignty. (The law was also retroactive.) As Rubinstein points out, "the law stipulated that anyone who either lived in any Arab country or was present on enemy territory after 11/1947, was to be transferred to an Absentee, which meant that all his property was to be transferred to the Custodian of Absentee Property) who was to administer it but who in fact owned it." The Custodian's office operates within the ministry of Housing, which, as Rubinstein notes, "is now headed by the minister Sharon." Rubinstein further explains that the law in question applied not only to genuine refugees absent from Israel, but "also to Arabs who had become Israeli citizens...even if they had been elected as Knesset members. Legally, they are still considered Absentees which means that legally, all their property belongs to the State of Israel. Hence their description as Present Absentees." Incidentally, no legal procedure has been instituted for proving that a given person is an Absentee. The Custodian, supposedly "acting on information received," has full authority to define any Arab as an "Absentee" arbitrarily, and confiscate a part or the whole of his property accordingly. In the process, he does not even need to notify the person affected, who may well have stay for no more than a single night on enemy territory. The law was applicable in East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, as parts of sovereign Israel. As Rubinstein observes, "after the annexation of East Jerusalem to Israel, all Arab residents formally became Absentees.... Theoretically, the Custodian of the Absentee Property could confiscate all houses and other property of all East Jerusalem Arabs on the ground that they were no longer its legal owners."

The perception of Palestinians as a mere object, one can relax, take a rest and treat him as the Territories as wanting to treat the Palestinians as mere objects, in contrast to Jewish religious zealots who do hate them.

However odious Pli'a Albek's functions in her capacity of the director of the Department of Civil Claims of the Ministry of Justice may be, she also performs a rather undefined but highly consequential role by establishing legal grounds for seizures of land owned by Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, including East Jerusalem. The Hebrew press has devoted much space to ingenuity of her legal pretexts. She has experience, because she began her work in the winter of 1977-78. After Sadat's initiative, land confiscation and settlement construction was sped up drastically. Even today, only 20% of the already confiscated West Bank land has been used for settlement. The rest is still unused by settlers. [5] various churches which cannot be defined as “Absentees.” Albek’s distinct method of “Judaizing East Jerusalem” does therefore run upon obstacles. Yet it makes progress. The way it works was quite minutely described by the Hebrew press in 4-5/1990, after the Jewish settlers took over St. John Hospice in the Christian Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem.

As described by Nahum Barnea (“The House: They all lie about it,” Yediot Ahronot, 5/11/1990), Gaby Baron (“The Mysterious Redeeming of Land,” Yediot Ahronot, Financial Supplement, 4/24/1990) and Israel Tomer (“Whose Custodian?,” Yediot Ahronot, Financial Supplement, 4/24/1990), Albek’s genre of the “Judaization of East Jerusalem” heavily relies on two key institutions. One is the Custodian of Legacies & Gifts, who operates within the Ministry of Justice, separately from the mentioned Custodian of Absentee Property. The other is the “Heimanuta” company which is a branch of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), an agency of the World Zionist Organization. The Custodian of Legacies and Gifts is a junior official dealing with money or property donated or bequeathed to the State of Israel. His office’s budget is quite tiny. His utility lies in the fact that the assets he processes do not need to be included in the government budget and, therefore, are not subject to Knesset controls. As Tomer explains: “No law commands the Custodian to report to the Knesset or to anybody else the assets which he holds in trust. If there are any rules on how should he distribute the funds at his disposal, they are secret and not open to public inspection.... His decisions are not accountable to anyone.” Quite possibly, this innocuous Custodian Office may be a branch of the Israeli intelligence. In addition, the office has another advantage, which, by the way, the “Heimanuta also has. In Barnea words, “they are both the Labor [party] bailiwicks, at least for the time being.” Both agencies are staffed exclusively by Labor’s old timers. This means that if a scandal breaks open in either of them, the Labor faction in the Knesset cooperates with the government in hushing it up.

How exactly do these agencies operate? A high government official authorizes a payment to the Custodian from the reserve funds of his ministry. The payment does not need to be countersigned by the minister. In case of the St. John Hospice, such a payment of 3.6 million Shekels [$1.8 million] was according to Barnea authorized by Amsor Unger, the Director General of the ministry of Housing, who did not even bother to notify his minister. David Levy: The Custodian then transfers the money to the “Heimanuta.” Upon obtaining it the “Heimanuta” paid it to a mysterious Panamanian company. Together with some additional funds of unknown origin, the money was used by this company for bribing the Arabs subletting the Hospice to allow its takeover. Repossessed in this manner, the Hospice was subsequently offered free of charge to the notorious “Ateret Kohanim” Yeshiva for the sake of settling the place with Jews. According to Barnea, “Heimanuta” is engaged in this sort of wheeling-and-dealing all over Israel. For example, if suspicion arises that some “Upper Nazareth apartments reserved solely for Jews” may be sold or rented to Arabs, “Heimanuta” would “secretly provide their Jewish owners with some relief” so as to fend off the “danger.” Barnea believes that nothing comparable can be spotted even in South Africa, especially since “all operations of ‘Heimanuta’ are clandestine.” He comments: “On surface, this may look like a vital service for the Jewish settlers. Yet it makes progress. The way it works was quite minutely described by the Hebrew press in 4-5/1990, after the Jewish settlers took over St. John Hospice in the Christian Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem. In light of what Baron discloses about the “Heimanuta’s” operating procedures (the responsibility for which lies squarely, via the JNF, with the World Zionist Organization), Barnea’s conclusion seems fully vindicated. It appears that “Heimanuta,” supposedly a non-governmental organization, has for many years “operated under the direct control of a ministry of Justice department headed by Ms. Ph’a Albeck.” Baron found “a rare interview” conducted a number of years ago with “the central figure in all such dubious purchase deals, Avraham Hilley, the director of the JNF Land Department.” Hilley, “who had been born in Aleppo, Syria,” was chosen to head this department on account of his mastery of Arabic and “expertise” in the so-called “Arab mentality.” “Hilley explained that the registry of land in ‘Heimanuta’s name restricts its use to Jews alone, irrespective of who might have paid the taxes out of which that land was purchased. It is because this kind of restriction is stipulated by the JNF statutes, and ‘Heimanuta’ is no more than a JNF subsidiary. But this condition is perfectly legitimate. Israel is entitled to place its lands at the exclusive disposal of the Jews. ‘Heimanuta’ is merely trying to get hold of every piece of land not yet owned by the Jews.”

Once the Palestinians become thus dispossessed, their expulsion, in popular parlance “transfer,” becomes a logical consequence of sorts. [4] countries, whereas the Bucharest Conference had been initiated in response to the concern of the industrialized nations. This shift in concern and commitment was not surprising in view of the changing patterns of population growth.

(39) She emphasized that when individuals were deprived of essential services, there was a population problem, but when basic human needs were satisfied, population problems began to fade away. There are widespread fears that the world is facing a demographic crisis, but many of these problems were not attributable to high fertility rates or economic imbalances alone. By way of example, she pointed to the plight of the millions of refugees and victims of political conflicts. In particular, she described the terrible cost to the people of her own country and to the Palestinians of the continuing instability in the region.

(40) She referred, in conclusion, to possibilities for progress that might be achieved, for example, through an improved status for women, better education for both men and women, integrated rural development, and most fundamentally a renewed commitment to meeting basic human needs.

26053. UN: UN World Conference on Women. Impact On Women Of Recent Economic, Social Changes In Europe To Be Discussed At October Meeting In Vienna: Week-long Sessions To Set Regional Priorities; Preparation for Next Year's Fourth World Conference on Women. Vienna: UN Information Service, July 15, 1994. The impact of recent economic and social changes in Europe on the lives of women, the world-wide "feminization of poverty" and the need to improve women's participation in decision-making are among the issues to be addressed when high-level representatives of countries in Europe and North America meet in Vienna in October to forge a regional contribution to preparations for next year's World Conference on Women. Under the theme "Women in a changing world -- call for action from a regional perspective", the event will be the first high-level intergovernmental gathering in the region to address women's concerns. It is being organized by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), in cooperation with national committees, United Nations agencies, European institutions and non-governmental organizations working on women's issues. The ECE region consists of 54 countries in North America and Europe, including the Commonwealth of Independent States and Israel. Scheduled for 17 to 21 October at the United Nations International Center, the meeting is expected to review trends in the region and in individual countries, and to formulate proposals for inclusion in a "Platform for Action" to be considered by the Fourth World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing from 9/4-15/1995. Among the questions to be examined at the Vienna meeting is how the changing economic environment -- particularly in countries in transition to market economies -- affects women's role, including their participation in decision-making, and their situation in general. It will analyse the impact of economic trends on women's contributions to sustainable development, covering a wide range of economic sectors, including the "informal economy". Participants will consider adopting a regional plan of action on women and the economy, with special emphasis on efforts to improve women's situation in countries in transition. Debate on demographic issues is expected to focus on new insights and proposed methodologies for improving statistical research on women, as well as on the effect of demographic trends on women in the ECE region. Gender disparities in access to jobs and domestic responsibilities and the "feminization of poverty" will also be addressed, along with such matters related to women's entrepreneurship as women's need for commercial credit and property rights. The meeting will provide an opportunity for Governments in the region to share experience with strategies and instruments aimed at avoiding gender bias and improving women's participation in political and economic decision-making. Women's role in both the public and private sectors will be explored, including their role in the media. Proposals concerning decentralized forms of governance and women's role in promoting community-based development will also be considered. The meeting will be preceded by an ECE Regional Non-Governmental Forum from 12 to 14 October, in preparation for the 1995 World Conference.

26054. United National Information Center. UN Women's Conference Backgrounder: Part 10: Gearing Up For Beijing. United National Information Center, November 8, 1993. Preparations for Beijing are already under way at the global, regional and country levels. Ms. Mongella, the Conference Secretary-General, feels that preparations at the national level are especially crucial, as they are likely to have the most immediate impact on people's lives. All sectors of society should be a part of the process, she says, from Governments, NGOs, the private sector and the media to individual women and men of all ages. Preparations "should be a process of national reflection and reach the women at the grass roots, whose voices are seldom heard". Both nationally and regionally, Governments and NGOs are preparing reports on the situation of women since 1985, assessing obstacles and progress as well as stimulating broad national debate. These reports will be discussed at five regional preparatory meetings, scheduled to take place in 1994 in Indonesia, Argentina, Austria, Jordan and Senegal. At the same time, many of the issues to be debated in Beijing will also be considered at other upcoming international conferences, including the International Conference on Population and Development (Cairo, September 1994) and the World Summit for Social Development (Copenhagen, March 1995). The 50th anniversary of the United Nations (1995) will provide yet another opportunity for highlighting women's issues. NGOs will play a vital role at the Conference and at a parallel NGO Forum. Planning for this event is progressing under the auspices of the Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Status with the Economic and Social Council (CONGO). As with previous United Nations conferences, the Beijing Forum is being planned as an event open to all. It will take place at the Beijing Workers' Sports Service Center, a site close to the Beijing International Convention Center where the World Conference will convene. Gathering and disseminating information on the situation of women will be one of the most important activities of the Conference and its preparatory meetings. In addition to the Platform for Action, the Conference will consider a second, updated edition of the United Nations publication The World's Women: Trends and Statistics; the 1994 World Survey on the Role of Women in Development; and an update on the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. For further information, contact: Department of Public Information, Room S-1040, United Nations, New York, NY 10017, USA, tel. 212/963-5086, fax 212/963-3463. Published by the United Nations Department of Public Information Printed by the United Nations Reproduction Section, New York DPI/1424-November 1993-15M [="=]

The leadership King Hussein showed in signing a peace treat with Israel last 10/1994 reinforced Jordan's role as a partner in the Middle East peace process. US economic assistance bolster this role by supporting a stable and moderate government and aiding Jordan's economic and social development. USAID's strategy has been designed to stimulate economic growth in Jordan, to address rapid population growth and to improve the quality and availability of water.

To stimulate economic growth, USAID assistance has helped the Jordanian government take the steps necessary to improve prospects for Jordanian exporters, including eliminating export licenses, simplifying customs procedures, and redrafting laws that act as barriers to increased trade and investment. To slow population growth, USAID is helping Jordanian health and family planning programs improve outreach, education, services, and access to contraceptives. Jordan's fledgling democracy, its ability to "wage peace" and its continuing efforts in the regional peace process will depend on political and economic stability, which can only be achieved with US and other donor assistance. [=]

Who approves projects for USAID funding in Gaza/Jericho? Who makes the decision whether to fund long-term infrastructure projects or short-term projects?

Does the US have AID officials monitoring, Palestinian Authority spending of US foreign assistance? Where are the personnel located? How often do they visit Gaza/Jericho or other areas?

What monitoring mechanisms does the US have in place to ensure that no US funds go to individuals who support rejectionist groups like Hamas? Has there ever been any evidence that private voluntary organizations receiving US funds have diverted any of their funding to any individuals or organizations involved in rejectionist acts or terrorism?

When Vice President Gore met with PLO Chairman Arafat last month, he announced a $65 million pledge of assistance to the Palestinians. Is this new money or part of the $100 million per year pledge the US made at the donors conference in 10/1993?

Answer. The USAID program, from its inception 20 years ago and even today benefits all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. It has never been limited to Jericho alone in the West Bank. Prior to the Declaration of Principles, our West Bank/Gaza program aimed primarily at community development, small scale private sector promotion, health, and training/technical assistance. Subsequent to the DOP, we and most donors increased the size of our programs, but not necessarily the focus (although several signed on to the World Bank's Emergency Rehabilitation program which focused on infrastructure), and the US inaugurated a new housing program. By 5-6/94, it became clear that Gaza-Jericho was not economically self-sustaining, and we and other donors began shifting resources to help cover the day-to-day operations of the Palestinian Authority, including police. Most donors agreed informally to allocate up to 25% of 1994 pledges to start-up costs. By 12/1994, donors again reevaluated the impact of their programs, and determined that there should be more emphasis on visible and immediate infrastructure improvements, public works projects and long-term job creation, and private sector support. As a result, in 1/1995, we reprogrammed almost $40 million of our FY 95 funds to support these new objectives. The first of these projects ($8 million for public works projects and $11 million for a Gaza wastewater project) were announced in 3/1995.

The USAID Mission Director in Tel Aviv approves projects for funding. His decisions are taken on the basis of policy guidelines that have been worked at senior levels of USAID, in close coordination with the Department of State.

US project assistance for the West Bank and Gaza is administered by USAID through private voluntary organizations, other grantees, US contractors, or UN agencies. These projects are administered in strict compliance with USAID's procurement, accountability, and reporting requirements, with USAID staff in the field monitoring project implementation. The USAID staff is posted at Embassies in Tel Aviv and Consulate in Jerusalem, and visit Gaza/Jericho daily.

Monitoring mechanisms and the recipients of our aid funds are described elsewhere in great detail. There is no evidence that any recipient of US funds in the West Bank and Gaza program has diverted any funding to individuals or organizations involved in rejectionist acts or terrorism.

The $65 million announced by Vice President Gore in 3/1995 was part of our total 5-year pledge of $500 million. However, only $22 million of the $65 million is relected in our FY 95 pledge of $100 million; the remainder reflects expected outlays for the life of the two projects that the Vice President announced.

Question. The US has provided the Palestinian police with Department of Defense vehicles and other equipment. From where did the equipment come? Are such equipment transfers counted in the $100 million per year the US has donated to the Palestinians?

Answer. The DOD assistance announced by Secretary Christopher in 3/1995 consisted of 200 vehicles and medical supplies. The vehicles, spare parts, and medical equipment that is being transferred--together with a previous shipment of 200 vehicles and spare parts--comes from both excess equipment and active stocks of the Department of Defense. The total value of these shipments is approximately $11 million. These equipment transfers have not been counted as part of our 5 year pledge. The Palestinians' need for health care equipment is large enough that DOD contributions would complement donations from other sources.

Question. When Secretary of State Christopher visited Gaza last month, he announced that the Department of Agriculture would provide assistance to farmers, and that Department of Defense would provide medical and humanitarian aid. Is this new assistance, or part of the $100 million pledge that the US has committed to since the donors' conference in 10/1993? What is the value of the USDA assistance? For how long will the DOD assistance differ from the health care already being provided to the Palestinians through other sources?

Answer. The Department of Agriculture (USDA) has provided some technical assistance through its Agriculture Research Service (ARS). ARS horticultural experts have travelled to the West Bank and Gaza to evaluate the potential for cultivation of new flower varieties in response to Palestinian requests for assistance in promoting export crops that might substitute for more water-intensive citrus now grown in the areas. USDA, State and AID are now discussing possible follow-on steps, including procurement of tissue and training for Palestinian growers. The duration and overall value of USDA assistance has not yet been determined.

Question. What is the annual US contribution to the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) for Palestinian refugees? What percentage of the US contribution to the UNRWA does to Gaza/Jericho recipients?

Answer. In FY 95, the US has contributed $70 million toward UNRWA's Regular Program Budget for FY 95 of $323 million. The US contribution supports core programs of education; health and relief services to over 3 million Palestinian refugees registered with the agency in Jordan, the West Bank, Gaza, Syria and Lebanon.

The US contribution is not earmarked for specific geographic regions. UNRWA's CY 95 Regular Program Budget includes expenditures of $73 million for Gaza and $53 million for the West Bank.

Question. What US assistance has been channeled to the forthcoming Palestinian elections? What indications have we received from the various parties?
that women will be allowed to vote freely and for candidates of their own choosing?

Answer. US assistance for Palestinian elections is channeled through USAID's "Democratic Understanding and Development" project. This 5-year (1994-99), $20 million project ($10 million has been authorized to date) is designed to promote the development of democratic institutions and a civilian political culture in the West Bank and Gaza. The project has four components: elections, rule of law, civil society and governance.

USAID has awarded grants to private US voluntary organizations for projects on election monitoring, public opinion polling, and the establishment of an election resource center. There is also an ongoing project aimed at encouraging women to participate as candidates in the elections and in other civic activities. That program has revealed a great interest on the part of Palestinian women to participate fully in the elections. From the on-going Palestinian-Israeli negotiations on elections and electoral laws, it appears that gender will not be a factor in determining voter and candidate eligibility.

Question. What US assistance is being allocated to institution-building and the rule of law? How are these efforts progressing?

Answer. Both the US Information Agency (USIA) and the US Agency for International Development (USAID) have been funding institution-building and rule of law programs in the West Bank and Gaza since 1994.

USAID has initiated six subprojects under a general project definition of "Democratic Understanding and Development", a $20 million project for five years (1994-99), for which $10 million has been authorized. The subprojects include elections monitoring a resource center for education and training civic education on democratic principles, training for pollsters, journalists and broadcasters, commercial law reform assistance; and public opinion polling. The first phase of the commercial law reform project is near completion, with recommendations for developing dispute resolution mechanisms and sets of model contracts for financial transactions. In addition, USAID has granted AMIDEAST both an Institutional Development Project and a Legal Development Project, totalling $5.99 million for 3-year implementation. The first phase of the project, including a needs assessment of the judicial sector in the West Bank and Gaza, is near completion.

USIA has allotted $721,000 for rule of law projects in the West Bank and Gaza from 1994-96. USIA's three-phase judicial reform project includes an overall assessment of the Palestinian criminal and civil processes conducted by the Mayo group its final report will be issued in early 7/1995, and is expected to emphasize the implementation of correct procedures rather than the nature of the legal system. Follow-on projects plan to focus on criminal justice and alternate dispute resolution.

Question. Last summer, President Clinton expanded the definition of a Palestinian refugee so as to make available additional funds controlled by the Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM) at the State Department. How much money has been allocated to date for the benefit of Palestinian refugees? Are the funds being channeled to private Palestinian voluntary organizations? To which organizations are the funds being transferred, for what kinds of programs are they being used, and which Palestinians are the recipients?

Answer. The Presidential Determination (PD 94-33) of 7/14/1994, did not obligate funds nor did it make available additional funds, nor did it affect the definition of Palestinian refugees. The purpose of the PD was to provide flexibility for PRM to work with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) as well as UNRWA, should there be a need for specific projects or activities.

In FY 1995, PRM has contributed $70 million to UNRWA for its core programs of education, health and relief services for over 3 million Palestinian refugees registered with the agency in Jordan, the West Bank, Gaza, Syria, and Lebanon. During FY 1995, PRM has not funded NGO activities on behalf of Palestinian refugees. In FY 1994, PRM provided $40,000 to an American NGO, AMIDEAST, for a program to train 8 nurse-midwives from Gaza in maternal and child care.

Question. The US pledged $500 million to the Palestinians over a 5-year period. Based on AID's assessments, and given level funding over each of the five years, how much of the $100 million each year will go to private voluntary organizations, AID contractors, the Palestinian Authority, the PLO, and how much to the Holst Fund at the World Bank? Are there any other Palestinian recipients of US aid?

Answer. The following is a summary of the distribution of FY 1994 and an estimate for the distribution of FY 1995 funds available to USAID. The annual funding level for the West Bank and Gaza is $75 million. Given the evolving situation in the West Bank and Gaza, we cannot accurately project FY 1996-1998 disbursements at this time. However, we anticipate that our support for recurrent costs through the World Bank Holst Fund will decrease in future years and that assistance provided through contractors will increase. Other than the $5 million provided to the Palestinian Police Force in FY 94, no funds go directly to the Palestinian Authority (PA) or PLO.

Question. To whom does the US usually present foreign assistance checks—the economic minister of the Palestinian Authority, to Chairman Arafat, to the Holst Fund? Are different projects handled differently? If so, how?

Answer. No checks are presented to the Palestinian Authority nor are cash payments made to any AID grantee or contractor. In the case of the USAID grant to the Palestinian Police Force, funds were deposited in the Arab Bank of Cairo and disbursement to the police was managed by the US accounting firm Coopers and Lybrand. Disbursements to contractors and grantees such as US PVOs, the World Bank and the UN are made incrementally through letters of credit or federal reserve bank accounts for international organizations. The amount disbursed to a grantee or contractor is based on an annual budget that is incorporated into a rant agreement or contact and on a review of expenditure vouchers which are submitted by the grantee or contractor to USAID quarterly or more frequently.

Question. What procedures exist in Gaza-Jericho for granting permits, issuing licenses, establishing codes, and conducting inspections of construction projects in Gaza and Jericho? Does the US insist that certain standards be established and met for the projects it finances?

Answer. Construction projects using USAID funds are supervised by American contractors which verify design and specifications, make regular site inspections, review reports and insure sound construction standards. For example, the firm Louis Berger provides on-site design, engineering, and implementation monitoring for the Gaza Housing Project under which 192 apartment units are being built by one American and three local construction firms. [=]

26057. United States House; House Committee on International Relations, Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Appendix: Questions for the Record Submitted to Asst. Secretary of State Robert H. Pelletreau by Representative Hamilton: Jordan. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia: Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995, pp. 68-69. Question 1. Other than debt relief, what are we doing to help Jordan develop its economy and obtain financing for the large-scale regional cooperation it would like to carry out?

What is your response to the allegations that the US reneged on a longstanding commitment to modernize Jordan's armed forces if Jordan made peace with Israel?

What is your assessment of the strength of Jordanian opposition to the peace treaty with Israel? Are you concerned that Jordan may find itself isolated if the Palestinian and Syrian tracks stall?

Answer. Debt relief remains our highest priority in terms of assistance for Jordan. Our FY 96 budget request includes 7.2 million in Economic Support Funds (ESF) $15 million in P480 Title I (food aid) and $7.97 million in Development Assistance (DA). The ESF and DA funds are used to fund USAID programs in Jordan that support water projects, tourism as a foreign earner and family planning.

We are also working with Jordan and Israel in the context of the Trilateral Economic Committee. This Committee is overseeing the creation of a Jordan Rift Valley Master Plan, which combines public and private sector projects to enhance regional development and cooperation. A follow up to last year's successful Middle East/ North Africa Economic Summit in Casablanca will be held in Amman at the end of 10/1995. This Summit should enhance private sector investment in Jordan and in the region.

The President and Secretary Christopher have committed to support Jordan's legitimate security needs. In 8/1994, a team of DOD experts identified serious deficiencies in the Jordanian Armed Forces (JAF) capabilities. In the FY 96 budget submission, the Administration requested $30 million in Foreign Military Financing (FMF) and $1.2 million in International Military Education and Training (IMET) funds. These figures reflect increases of $22.7 million in FMF and $0.2 million in IMET from FY 95 figures. We continue to consult with Congress and the Government of Jordan to explore ways to support Jordan's military modernization further.

King Hussein and the Government of Jordan are moving forward with implementation of the treaty and have reiterated their commitment to make this peace with Israel a warm peace. However, we have seen signs of increasing skepticism in the Jordanian populace. Although organized opposition to the treaty is not strong at this point, the recent disturbances among university students is a reminder of the potential for widespread dissatisfaction with the perceived lack of benefit of peace.

Jordan took enormous risks for peace when it signed a peace treaty with Israel, becoming only the second Arab state to do so. While King Hussein took this courageous step because it was in Jordan's interest, he clearly hoped peace would bring the support of the international community and economic benefits to his people. President Clinton and Secretary Christopher made a commitment to support Jordan as it took risks for peace and exposed itself to the enemies of peace. Jordanians are anxiously awaiting the outcome of the Administration's efforts to secure $275 million in FY95 and FY96 to forgive the remainder of Jordan's debt. Debt forgiveness would alleviate Jordan's high debt burden and encourage foreign private sector investment. News of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations decision to cut the Administration's request for $275 million for debt-forgiveness to $50 million was received in Jordan with deep disappointment.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Kuwait

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

Kuwait

28000. -------. "Congressional Delegation Vistis Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Syria", in Presidents Report (National Council on US-Arab Relations), Spring-Summer 1992. A delegation of Congressional leaders was escorted by Dr. Anthony and Ms. Cindy Malvncini, Congressional Relations Coordinator at the National Council, on a fact-finding mission through Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Syria in April. The visit sought to acquaint staffers with the views of respective governments and US embassy officials to help them better understand the issues at stake for the United States in its relations with these countries. The delegation comprised senior staff members from several congressional committees, among them Foreign Affairs, Armed Services, Intelligence, and Foreign Relations. Delegates spoke enthusiastically about the experience. As one staffer commented, "it was more than 'fact finding' in nature; the trip embodied 'perception finding' or, better yet, 'misperception losing.' We generally only hear one side of the story in the US, and it is important that more of us become aware of the very real arguments made by those in the Arab world." While in Saudi Arabia, the delegation had the opportunity to meet with Mr. Abdullah Dabbagh, Secretary General of the Council of Saudi Chambers of Commerce and Industry; Dr. Saeed Badeeb, Jaber Al-Sabah, Chief of Staff of Kuwait's Armed Forces. Senior Advisor for H.R.H. Turki Al-Faisal of the Intelligence Directorate; US Embassy staff; American business groups; H.E. Abdalla Bishara, GCC Secretary General; H.E. Abdallah El-Kuwaiz, GCC Assistant Secretary General for Economic Affairs; and H.E. Saif Al-Maskari, GCC Assistant Secretary General for Political Affairs.

In Kuwait, the group met with Foreign Affairs Under Secretary H.E. Sulaiman Al-Shaheen, Armed Forces Chief of Staff Shaikh Jaber bin Khalid Al-Sabah, and Dr. Rasha Al-Sabah and other leaders of the women's rights movement. In Syria, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs H.E. Yusuf Shakkour, Speaker of the Parliament H.E. 'Abd Al-Gadir Qaddoura, University of Aleppo President Dr. Mohamed Ali Hourieh, Golan Province Governor 'Abd Al-Monem Hamwy, and US Embassy officials met the delegation. Highlights of the trip included visiting the Israel-destroyed town of Qunaitra in Syria's Golan Province; meeting Shaikh 'Abd Al-Aziz Al-Tuwairj, Deputy President of the Saudi Arabian National Guard; discussing future regional security arrangements with Kuwaiti foreign and defense ministry officials; and observing the implications for US foreign policy stemming from the diversity of US interests vis-à-vis the three countries. The National Council has organized 12 Congressional study visits to the Arab world since 1986 in order to help bring about a more informed national debate on issues of vital concern to the United States. [ - ]

28002. -------. "Kuwait [former judge Emilio Gancayao, touring world to see condition of Filipina domestic workers, sees the low wages they earn as no compensation for the 'tragedies' they suffer]", in Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 14, 1995. p. A2. [TXT]

28003. -------. "Kuwait Women Push For The Rights To Vote", in Seattle Times, March 12, 1996. p. A6. Forty Kuwait women lawyers, scientists and academics protested outside the legislature in a rare public dissent. The women, some members of the resistance to the Iraqi occupation, accused the Kuwaiti government of renegeing on a promise made during the war to give women political rights. Women have been struggling for political rights for 30 years. Women in Kuwait hold low positions in the civil service, oil industry and education, may drive and wear Western clothes, but lack political power and do not have social equality with men. [TXT]

28004. -------. "Lifting Women From Their Second-Class Status In Much of the Arab World Requires New and Better Educational Opportunities[Rashaal-Sabah, Undersecretary of Kuwait Ministry of High Education issued call in Suffolk University, Boston; she notes declining illiteracy rates among area's women]", in Chronicle of Higher Education, May 2, 1997. p. A47.

28006. -------. "Slavery and Resistance: The Trade in Maids: A Crime of the Capitalist System", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 10, 1995. p. 13. Exposed by the cases of Flor Contemplacion and Sarah Balabagan, governments have tried to act more concerned. Roy Seneres, the Philippine ambassador to the United Arab Emirates, admitted to the Reuters news service that contract domestic work "is a highly hazardous occupation that can be life-threatening." This year, for the first time, Persian Gulf courts convicted two employers of beating their foreign maids to death (though the sentences handed out were remarkably light). But the truth is that the governments of the Third World support and encourage this trade in human beings - because their capitalist ruling classes rely on this exploitation. For example, arrangements between imperialist banks and the Philippine ruling class have sunk the Philippines into about $35 billion of debts. Some estimates say there are three to four million Filipino workers abroad who sent back between $6.5-8 billion a year - much of which is siphoned off in various ways to pay the billions that Philippines must pay annually in debt interest alone. (Nation, 4/17/1995) A similar picture can be drawn of El Salvador, Mexico, Turkey, and many other Third World countries. It has been estimated that the 100,000 women forced from the Dominican Republic into the global sex industry represent a quarter of that country's foreign earnings. This means that the world's reactionary governments and leading banks strongly support the worldwide system of contract labor. In the Philippines, for example, the global trade in human beings is openly described as essential to the government's pro-imperialist "national economic strategy." The Philippine government calls immigrant maids "heroes of the Philippine economy." and Philippines President Ramos describes the migrant worker as "the Philippines' contribution to other countries' development." Capitalism mercilessly moves millions of human beings around the world - to better exploit them and extract the blood money of profit. The trade, exploitation and brutalization of millions of migrant workers is vital to the world capitalist system. These outrages must be exposed and fought, until the day comes when the world's revolutionary movements succeed in abolishing them forever. [ - ]

28007. -------. "Slavery and Resistance: The Trade in Maids: Introduction", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 10, 1995. p. 6. Sarah Balabagan was 15 when she left her Philippines home in 5/1994 to go to Mexico, Turkey, and many other Third World countries. It has been estimated that the 100,000 women forced from the Dominican Republic into the global sex industry represent a quarter of that country's foreign earnings. This means that the world's reactionary governments and leading banks strongly support the worldwide system of contract labor. In the Philippines, for example, the global trade in human beings is openly described as essential to the government's pro-imperialist "national economic strategy." The Philippine government calls immigrant maids "heroes of the Philippine economy." and Philippines President Ramos describes the migrant worker as "the Philippines' contribution to other countries' development." Capitalism mercilessly moves millions of human beings around the world - to better exploit them and extract the blood money of profit. The trade, exploitation and brutalization of millions of migrant workers is vital to the world capitalist system. These outrages must be exposed and fought, until the day comes when the world's revolutionary movements succeed in abolishing them forever. [ - ] simple self-defense. Protests broke out in the Philippines and among Filipino workers in the Persian Gulf. Meanwhile, powerful forces within the UAE insisted that this first sentence was not extreme enough. In 9/1995, a new trial was held. This new court sentenced Sarah Balabagan to execution by firing squad. From prison Sarah wrote: "Even if I am ultimately executed, I still believe that what I did was right." Protests mounted worldwide. And the governments of both the Philippines and the Gulf states became more concerned. More than 2000 Filipinos were reported to have been trafficked from the Philippines to the UAE protested the death sentence at "prayer sessions" - a daring event, since local fascist laws forbid proletarian people to gather in public. New protests broke out in the Philippines. The Philippines government feared if Sarah Balabagan was executed, it could trigger a massive wave of revolt inside the Philippines. Another Filipina maid, Flor Contemplacion, was hanged in Singapore in 3/1995 after being framed for murder by her employer. The response of the masses in the Philippines to Flor’s execution deeply shook the government of General Ramos.

Under pressure, the president of the UAE had the execution of Sarah Balabagan called off. A new ruling announced that Sarah would be forced to pay the rapist's family $41000, serve a year in jail and be beaten publicly with 100 lashes. This is how the case now stands as we go to press. Sixteen-year-old Sarah Balabagan has already been in prison for 14 months - and still faces more brutal punishment for defending herself against a wealthy rapist. Look at the story of Sarah Balabagan: Here is the modern world of capitalism’s so-called "Free Market" - where the wealthy are "free" to buy and sell human beings at will. The trap that seized Sarah involved extreme poverty of the Philippines and semi-slavery in the Persian Gulf states - both of which are areas of the world dominated by US imperialism. In the main Gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, United Arab Emirates, Oman, Qatar and Kuwait, foreign workers make up 10 million of the 23 million population. More than a million are maids. And the brutal conditions faced by the workers of the Gulf - the extreme wealth built on oil and the extreme poverty of enforced slavery - are exactly the social relations defended and propped up by the US military who invaded this region during the recent Gulf War. The story of Sarah Balabagan is a living example of the capitalist "freedoms" that the US uses its military power to defend. The case of Sarah Balabagan has touched a deep nerve around the world because her oppression is all too common. Millions of proletarian people have been forced to leave their homes and villages - to travel to distant countries to perform the hardest and dirtiest work. Many work in slave-like conditions - hoping to send pennies home to feed their families. Millions of us want to see the worldwide capitalist trade in poor women stopped - and want a world where such poverty and mistreatment is abolished.

The International Labor Organization estimates that in 1990, 25 million people lived as migrant workers in other countries - not counting "illegal workers." Altogether, it is estimated that 70 million people work outside their home countries - not counting the one million people who settle permanently in new countries each year. In South Asia, there is a constant flow of people from the poorest countries - the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh and others - to countries where wealth has been concentrated - Japan, Middle East oil states, Singapore. Many thousands of people cross the Pacific from the Philippines and China to the US. Rings of recruiters often smuggle Chinese workers in the holds of broken-down boats. In the western hemisphere, there is a constant flow of human beings northward from Latin America and the Caribbean islands up to the US. This traffic in human beings often takes the form of "contract labor". Global networks of recruiters who force people in the poor countries to pay huge fees and work years for no pay - on the promise that they will be able, some day, to send money back home to their families. In 1985, there were about 3.5 million contract workers in the Middle East alone - largely from the East Asian and South Asian countries of the Philippines, Thailand, Bangladesh, India and Pakistan. This traffic in people has been growing rapidly and changing. Twenty years ago, the contract trade largely involved male workers for the oil fields, construction industries and skilled jobs. Over the years, much of it has become a trade in women. Malaysia's Asian-Pacific Development Center (APDC) estimates that between 1 and 1.7 million migrant women workers as domestics throughout Asia and the Middle East. In 1994, more than 300000 women workers left the Philippines, mostly as domestics. There are about 75000 working in Singapore, 50000 in Hong Kong, 40000 in England, 80000 in Italy, 60000 in Spain, 20000 in Greece, and 75000 in the Middle East.

In the US there was a scandal a few years ago - the Zoe Baird affair - where a ruling class woman was denied a top government post because she had employed an "illegal alien" as her household worker. In the Middle East alone - largely from the East Asian and South Asian countries - the average income is $730 a year - while the average income is $19000. Most of the women who leave the Philippines to work are in their late twenties and early thirties, often with children left behind in the Philippines. For example, Flor Contemplacion, the Filipina domestic worker who was hanged by Singapore's government, was 42 and had three children living in the Philippines. There is a recruitment network that trickles down to the villages and urban barrios in countries like the Philippines, Thailand, the Dominican Republic and El Salvador. It is a transnational business - complete with newspaper ads and radio campaigns - and it siphons profits off of this human trade at every step. Often local businessmen do the direct recruiting work, using networks of families. For example, Sarah Balabagan's older brother was already working as a contract worker in the Persian Gulf when Sarah's family decided to send her too. The labor brokers often recruit workers by making big promises to their family - that the young women will be working as teachers or as nannies of wealthy families. But the biggest promise that is made is money.

A common wage of women in the Philippines, for example, is $2.50-3.00 a day. Even the Philippine government admits that this is only half of what it costs to live. Unemployment is so high that many people can't even get those wages. Women from Thailand and the Philippines, recruited to work in Singapore as maids, are told they can make six times the wages they could make in their own countries. And those sent to work in the Gulf states are told to expect 15 times as much as in the Philippines. Because of this, families often band together - selling lands, mortgaging homes or going into debt - to pay off recruiters and send off one of their daughters, in hopes that the money she sends back will help keep them all alive. Fees range from hundreds to tens of thousands of dollars. It is estimated that $820000 Filipinos leave their country every year. One estimate says that about 60% of the families in Manila, the Philippines capital, count on money sent from abroad to make it. This story is repeated throughout the poor countries of the world: Mexico, El Salvador, Nigeria, Senegal, India, and so on. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Kuwait

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

28009. ------. "Slavery and Resistance: The Trade in Maids: The Reality: Modern Capitalist Slavery", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), December 10, 1995. p. 13. Arriving in distant countries, filled with recruiter promises and hopes of a new life, women like Sarah Balabagan often run hard into a bitter reality. They have been recruited as the lowest paid workers -with typical salaries of $130 a month. Employers usually pay for their airfare - often $1500 or more - and consider that to be enough that the worker must repay before getting any wages. This creates a modern-day form of slavery called "peonage," where workers are legally forbidden to quit without repaying "debts" they owe. Such workers often have to work years for no money at all - and are held completely enslaved to their employer. Over and over again, these women have told how they were forced to work around the clock at backbreaking work, with no days off. Many work 16-hour days and are forced to sleep on mats under the stairs or near the toilets. Often their employers refuse to pay wages, forbid them to go outside the home, prevent them from contacting their families. In one case in India, the servants were locked into the house like animals when the employers left for a month. The keys were left with neighbors who came periodically to deliver food. In many countries, the contract women are forced to give their employers both their money and their passports - so they cannot quit or leave. Saudi Arabia requires this by law. Canada forbids migrant women workers to live in their own apartments. Singapore does not allow domestics to change jobs. The women often discover that they are expected to serve as sex slaves for their employers as well. The Chicago Tribune (11/17/1991) reported: "Social workers and government officials assert that 80% of Asian women exported to the Middle East are molested sexually. They say 1 in 9 Filipinas working abroad are raped. In households in Singapore, Hong Kong and Taiwan, immigrant women complain they are cheated out of wages, badly fed and, after a day's cleaning and cooking, expected to bed down with their 'male masters.'" Documented cases of beatings, rape and even murder are common. One woman, a former Philippines embassy official in Singapore, described how in one six-month period in 1990 there were 792 cases of employer abuse of Filipina domestic servants: including 6 suicides, 80 physical assaults, 2 murders, 144 beatings, 20 rapes, 128 cases of women wanting to return home, 66 cases of nonpayment of wages, and 5 cases of torture. There are reports of contract workers who have had teeth pulled out as punishment.

A government report in Sri Lanka reported that 2000 Sri Lankan boys below 14 were sent to work in the United Arab Emirates as racing jockeys. Some were deliberately underfed - to keep them down to "riding weight." Those who demanded to be sent home were burned with red-hot irons. (Chicago Tribune, 11/17/1995) Over this past summer, at least three maids in Kuwait died in one month from employer beatings; two Sri Lankans and a Filipina. In 1994 alone, about 600 Filipino workers returned home in coffins - many from murder, accidental death and suicide. Yet throughout the world the authorities defend and enforce the slave-like conditions of these workers. In the US, many immigrant maids are considered "illegals" and often cannot get even the basic legal protection. In the Gulf states, according to Human Rights Watch in Spring 1993, no employer has ever been convicted of abusing an Asian maid. At the same time, the Saudi government has executed at least 11 "servant women" over the last several years, and has had hundreds of women publicly lynched. In one documented case, Leonarda Akula, a Filipina working in Saudi Arabia, was publicly beheaded for killing her employers (a husband, wife and grown son) after she had been forcibly imprisoned in their household and sexually abused. In 1991, the Philippines Foreign Minister was asked what maids in the Gulf should do about rape. He responded, "Enjoy it." In short, Sarah Balabagan's story is the story of many hundreds of thousands of women. [=]

28010. Amnesty International. Press Release: Freedom of Information, London: Amnesty International, June 1992. [In countries around the world, journalists attempting to expose human rights violations have themselves become victims. Some have been killed outright. Others have been silenced by threats, harrassment and imprisonment. Writers, novelists and poets whose work is deemed critical of the authorities also risk detention, imprisonment, torture and, in some cases, death. Some of these journalists and writers are prisoners of conscience, jailed because of their professional activities or for exercising their right to freedom of expression.] On 7/8/1991, Luis Antonio Morales Ortega, a journalist well known for his investigations into human rights abuses in his native Peru, announced via Radio Wari, a local radio station, that he had received threats from the Anti-Terrorist Liberation Command, a paramilitary group believed linked to the security forces. Just five days later, two men in a passing car shot Luis Morales dead as he tried to escape into the house of a relative in the city of Huamanga in Ayucacho department. During the previous month the Anti-Terrorist Liberation Command had threatened staff at Radio Wari and forced them to broadcast death threats against two other journalists who had accused the security forces of committing human rights violations in Ayucicho. The text of the threats included the following: "We tell this rat, delinquent, terrorist, disguised as a journalist, this bloody dog Magno Sosa Rojas... that he will die like a beheaded dog... we are following his steps very closely, his days are numbered..." Since 1982, when Ayucicho was first placed under military control, at least 15 journalists have been killed by the security forces or groups linked with them. Journalists in other parts of Peru are also at risk. In 8/1991 the Anti-Terrorist Liberation Command issued death threats against Jorge Chaves Morales, a journalist with 'La Republica', a Lima daily newspaper which has given extensive coverage to human rights issues. In Colombo, Sri Lanka, in the early hours of 2/18/1990, Richard de Zoysa, a journalist, broadcaster and actor, was dragged from his home by six armed men, some of whom were reportedly wearing police uniforms. The following day his naked body was washed up on a nearby beach. An autopsy found that Richard de Zoysa died instantly from gunshot wounds to the neck and head fired at close range. The Sri Lankan and international press has speculated about the possible reasons for the abduction and murder of Richard de Zoysa. His killing may have been linked to the "disappearance" in 1/1990 of Lakshman Perera, who had produced a play written by Richard de Zoysa called "Me Kauda? Mokada Koranne?" ("Who is he? What is he doing?"). a phrase used to describe President Ranasinghe Premadasa during the presidential elections in 12/1988. Other reports suggest Richard de Zoysa was killed in retaliation for his news reports on the human rights situation in Sri Lanka. In 6/1990 Richard de Zoysa's mother, Dr. Manorani Saravanamuttu, and Batty Weerakoon, the lawyer appearing on her behalf at the magisterial inquiry into the abduction of her son, received death threats warning them to stop pursuing the case. DrSaravanamuttu, who had witnessed her son's kidnapping, had named a senior Superintendent of Police as one of the abductors. The magisterial inquiry was discontinued on 8/30/1990, and no action has been taken against the police officer allegedly involved. Foreign and national journalists in Guatemala continue to receive threats, apparently from members of the security forces or those acting with their acquiescence. Some have fled the country. Others have been openly attacked. Byron Barrera Ortiz, a Guatemalan journalist, was shot by two men on a motorcycle while driving his car in Guatemala City in 10/1990. His wife, Refugio Araceli Villanueva, also in the car, was killed instantly. Shortly after the attack, Byron Barrera and his two children went to live abroad. Byron Barrera later stated that his life was saved only because he was wearing a bullet-proof vest. He said that he had been followed by two men on a motorcycle the day before the attack, an incident he reported to the police officer as one of the abductors. Byron Barrera had returned to Guatemala in 1985 after several years in exile. He was the director of the Central American News Agency, and vice-president of the Guatemalan Journalists Association. Byron Barrera had been the editor of the weekly newspaper, La Epoca, until 6/1988 when the newspaper's offices were fire-bombed, reportedly by members of the security forces. The newspaper, which had published many articles critical of the government, never reopened. In an open letter in 11/1990, Byron Barrera stated that "Guatemala continues to be a land for no one, a land of impunity, death and desolation". He added, "I have had to explain the truth to my children; the people of their country who are conspicuous for the ideas of freedom are assassinated." On 8/10/1990...
women in the middle east and north africa

kuwait

www.refrencecorp.net/downloads

1991, Byron Barrera returned to Guatemala to present evidence in the Fifth Court of Penal Justice in Amatitlan, Department of Guatemala, which was investigating the case. At a news conference he declared that he believed members of the armed forces were involved in the attempt on his life. Guatemalan journalists were anonymously warned not to continue publishing information on the Barrera case. In 8/1991, Juan Carlos Ruiz, Hugo Garcia and Silvino Velasquez received anonymous death threats, warning them to stop reporting on well-publicized cases concerning the alleged involvement of military personnel in human rights violations, including the attack on Byron Barrera. The Prosecution's Office of the Public Ministry which was investigating the cases reportedly received similar threats. Two lawyers hired by Byron Barrera were also threatened and have since withdrawn from the case. According to Byron Barrera, the authorities have shown little determination to proceed with the investigation into the attempt on his life and the killing of his wife despite evidence implicating members of the armed forces. Some countries bring criminal charges against those who publish real or implied criticism of the authorities. Such charges include "showing contempt", "spreading false information" and "sedition". Two journalists in Cameroon were convicted in 1/1991 of publishing an article critical of the government in Le Messager, a Douala newspaper. In 12/1990 the Cameroon government had introduced laws which tightened press censorship. The legislation enables the government to seize or ban newspapers "in case of conflict with the principles of public policy". On a number of occasions in early 1991 the authorities seized copies of Le Messager. One such confiscation followed the publication in April of the names of all those convicted or held in administrative detention in connection with a 1984 coup attempt. The article described poor prison conditions and named the prisoners who had died in detention since 1984. In September the authorities banned Le Messager and four other newspapers. In South Korea, Chang Ui-gyun, a publisher specializing on books on ancient Korean history, is serving an eight-year prison sentence under the National Security Law. In 1982 his publishing licence was withdrawn after he published a book of poetry which was critical of the government. Chang Ui-gyun then spent two years in Japan where he studied ancient Korean history at Kyoto University. While there he is said to have discussed North Korea's proposals for the reunification of the Korean peninsula. In 5/1986 he organized a meeting on Korean unification, where a song which he himself had written on the subject was performed. Shortly after his return to South Korea in 1987, Chang Ui-gyun was arrested and charged on several counts under the National Security Law, including that of transmitting state secrets. He denied all charges of espionage but was convicted by the court and jailed. Amnesty International believes that Chang Ui-gyun is detained for his peaceful political views and activities and that the charges of espionage against him have not been substantiated. In Rwanda at last 30 people accused of offences related to freedom of expression and association were tried between 3-10/1990. Further arrests and trials of journalists occurred in 1991. Although many newspapers have begun publication over the past two years, the government has been unwilling to tolerate open criticism of government officials or practices. Rwabukwisi Vincent, the editor of Kanguka newspaper, was arrested in 7/1990 and charged with "endangering the security of the state", apparently because he had travelled to the Kenyan capital, Nairobi, and met Rwandese exiles, including the former King of Rwanda. The State Security Court twice failed to convict him due to lack of evidence. But in 10/1990, after Uganda-based Rwandese exiles attacked Rwanda's northern border, the same court sentenced him to 15 years' imprisonment, apparently without hearing any new evidence. In 5/1991 Rwabukwisi Vincent was released by order of the Supreme Court, pending a new trial. A month later he was one of four journalists arrested for publishing articles critical of the authorities. Rwabukwisi Vincent was charged with endangering the security of the state, apparently because the authorities said that he had written for publication expressed support for the rebels. He was released in 9/1991 but the charges against him reportedly were not dropped. It is not clear whether or not he will be brought to trial.

Amnesty International continues to be concerned by the Iranian government's endorsement of threats against the life of Salman Rushdie, the British author of "The Satanic Verses". In 2/1989 Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa (religious edict) stating that the book was blaspemous and that it was the duty of Muslims everywhere to put the novelist to death. Amnesty International was not aware of any direct attempt by agents of the Iranian government to kill Salman Rushdie, but there were reports of attempted murder, including an attack on his public appearance in London in 1990. Amnesty International has repeatedly called on the Iranian authorities to withdraw their support for any threat to Salman Rushdie's life. Kenyan writers and journalists have been imprisoned for advocating multi-party democracy. In April Gitobu Imanyara collapsed from a severe migraine headache at the Nairobi Law Courts, where he was awaiting a ruling on an application for bail. He was returned to prison and held in a cell with no bed, mattress or other furniture. Although later admitted to hospital, he was kept chained and under armed guard. He was released on 5/29/1991, and the sedition charges against him were dropped. Gitobu Imanyara received the Golden Pen of Freedom award from the International Federation of Newspaper Publishers in early 1991. Following his release, he resumed his work at the Nairobi Law Monthly, despite continuing police harassment. Edward Oyugi, a writer and Professor of Educational Psychology at Kenyatta University, was sentenced on 7/11/1991, with three others to seven years' imprisonment for holding a "seditionous" meeting. He has been a consultant with the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the World Council of Churches and has written books and articles on philosophy, sociology and psychology. Edward Oyugi and the three others had been arrested one year earlier following public debate on the issue of multi-party democracy in Kenya which led to widespread unrest in July 1990. Amnesty International expressed concern about the fairness of their trial and, in particular, that no steps were taken during the trial to investigate the prisoners allegations that they had been tortured.

No evidence was brought by the prosecution that the four had discussed or planned violence against the government. The sedition laws in Kenya have frequently been used to jail government opponents. Edward Oyugi was released on bail on 2/14/1992, along with the three others pending their appeal to the High Court later that year. In 1990 the Vietnamese authorities arrested several critics of the government - including journalists and writers - beginning a crackdown on intellectuals and dissenters which continued into 1991. Duong Thu Huong, a prominent Vietnamese writer and dramatist, was arrested in 4/1991, reportedly for trying to send "sensitive documents" out of the country, and held without trial until 11/1991. The author of many novels, poems, articles and plays, Duong Thu Huong has emerged as one of the most significant writers in post-war Vietnam. A former member of the Communist Party of Vietnam, she has since become one of its sharpest critics. In Saudi Arabia, Saleh al-Azzaz, a prominent writer and journalist, was arrested in 11/1990, reportedly while taking photographs of a demonstration. He was reportedly arrested on suspicion of being one of the organizers of the demonstration, in which dozens of Saudi women drove cars in convoy through the streets of Riyadh in protest against the country's prohibition of women drivers. At the time of his arrest, Saleh al-Azzaz was editor-in-chief of the magazine of the Saudi Arabian Chamber of Commerce and Industry. Amnesty International considered him to be a prisoner of conscience, detained because of his involvement with a peaceful demonstration. He was released in March 1991, after four months of detention. In many countries journalists sympathetic to prohibited political parties or organizations, or working for publications aligned with them, have been subjected to human rights violations. Nawan Hamawi is one of a group of Syrians arrested in the mid-1970's on suspicion of having links with the pro-Iraqi wing of the Ba'th Party. At the time of his arrest in 3/1975, he was the director of SANA, the Syrian news agency. He was detained without charge or trial in al-Mezze Military Prison. "Abd al-Karim Qutaifar, a playwright and actor, was also
Kuwait

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

detained without charge or trial in Syria. He was arrested in 7/1983 on suspicion of being a member of the Party for Communist Action (PCA), a prohibited political party. Members of the PCA have frequently been imprisoned and tortured because of their opposition to the government, their demands for more democratic freedom and for the release of all political prisoners. Marwan Hamawi and 'Abd al-Karim Qutaifan, both of whom had been adopted by Amnesty International as prisoners of conscience, along with over 1000 other prisoners were released in 12/1991. Hamadi Jebali, editor of the Tunisian weekly al-Fajr (Dawn), was sentenced by the military court in Tunis in 1/1991 to one year in prison for publishing an article calling on the abolition of military courts in Tunisia. Mohammed Nouri, the author of the article, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Both men were charged with "defamation of a judicial institution". Although Mohammed Nouri's sentence has expired he remains in prison, apparently under investigation for new charges. Al-Fajr, now banned, was the organ of an Islamic organization, al-Nahda, which does not have official recognition from the state. Members, sympathizers and suspected sympathizers of al-Nahda have recently been targeted for arrest, detention and torture. Dozens of writers and journalists were detained without charge or trial in Sudan after a military government, backed by the National Islamic Front, seized power from the elected civilian government of Sadiq al-Mahdi in 6/1989. They were imprisoned because of their peaceful opposition to the military government. Most were released after a general amnesty for political prisoners was announced in 4/1991. Arop Madut Arop, head of the Information Center at the Sudan Council of Churches, was arrested in 3/1990 after requesting a visa to attend a Church Service Development meeting in Germany. He was held without charge or trial until 5/1991. Under the government of Sadiq al-Mahdi, Arop Madut Arop was the editor of the English language weekly newspaper, Heritage, until it was ordered closed by officials in 1988. Heritage had called for an end to the conflict in southern Sudan between the government and the armed opposition Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA) and had published a long interview given to Arop Madut Arop by the SPLA leader, John Garang. Shortly after the 6/1989 coup, the first part of the interview was reprinted in an Arabic language newspaper. Publication of the second part of the interview was stopped. Arop Madut Arop's arrest is thought to have been related to the government's disapproval of the article. Journalists in Turkey are frequently targeted for abuse while pursuing their professional activities. In 9/1991 the Turkish Press Council reported that during the first eight months of the year 44 journalists had been physically assaulted, in most cases by state employees, including police officers. Amnesty International has received numerous reports of journalists being tortured in police custody in Turkey. In 3/1991 eight journalists working for the weekly political review, Century, were arrested in Ankara and charged with membership of the Kurdish Workers Party, an illegal organization. While detained they were blindfolded and interrogated about their sources for articles they had written about the Kurdish conflict in the southeast of Turkey. Some were tortured; one said he was stripped naked, suspended by the wrists, and given electric shocks. The main charges against the eight were soon dropped but they continue to stand trial for alleged possession of firearms which they say they obtained for their personal protection after receiving anonymous death threats. Journalists and writers working in countries where governments face civil unrest have been particular targets for the authorities. In Kuwait Osamah Suhail Hussain, a Palestinian, was sentenced to death by the Martial Law Court in mid-6/1991, after an unfair trial which did not conform to international standards. Osamah Suhail Hussain and 23 others were accused of "collaboration with the Iraqi authorities" because they continued to work for the newspaper, al-Nida', during the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. A Kuwaiti newspaper, al-Qabas, was taken over by the Iraqi authorities and renamed al-Nida' shortly after the Iraqi invasion in 1990. It was the only newspaper allowed to publish during the occupation. At the trial the identity of the chief prosecution witnesses was concealed and the defence was not allowed to cross-examine them. Trial documents presented to the court were not made available to the defendants or to their lawyers. Osamah Suhail Hussain was reportedly tortured with electric shocks, beatings and cigarette burns. On 6/26/1991, his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. The rights to freedom of expression, freedom of association and freedom of belief are enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). The ICCPR has been ratified in many of the countries in which journalists have been the victims of human rights violations. Governments which deny civil and political rights to journalists flout international law and often flout their own constitutions. The struggle for human rights depends to a large extent on the free flow of information and on the courage and commitment of journalists and writers. Those who become victims of human rights violations because of their efforts to expose violations by governments deserve the full support of the international human rights movement.

28011. Amnesty International. Press Release: Kuwait: Amnesty International Raises Concerns With Government Officials. London: Amnesty International, August 1991. In November an Amnesty International delegation visited Kuwait to assess the current human rights situation and meet government officials. In meetings with the Minister of Interior, the Public Prosecutor and Foreign Ministry officials, A's representatives raised issues of concern including torture, "disappearances", extrajudicial killings and forcible expulsions. The organization also reiterated its call for a review of the cases of all defendants tried and sentenced by Martial Law courts in 5-6/1991. In June Amnesty International had submitted a memorandum to the government detailing its concerns about the unfair trial proceedings, and had received no response. During the visit, officials told Amnesty International that a review of these cases was not possible on legal grounds; although martial law ended in June sentences passed under Martial Law courts were final. A's representatives visited nine women sentenced by these courts at Kuwait Central Prison. Information was also obtained on over 50 cases of Palestinians and Iraqis who were arrested after the withdrawal of Iraqi forces and subsequently "disappeared" in custody. Amnesty International also received information on the scores of Kuwaitis and other nationals arrested by Iraqi forces during the occupation who are believed now held in Iraq.

28012. Bollag, Burton. "New Parliament May Reconsider Plan to Separate Kuwait University Students By Sex", in Chronicle of Higher Education, November 15, 1996, p. A55. The plan to segregate Kuwait University's five campuses by sex, approved last year by the National Assembly, may now be deferred in the wake of an election in which political parties are outlawed in Kuwait, it is unclear how the question has been sharply debated in Kuwait, both in newspapers and in the university itself. The five vocational colleges are already segregated by sex. Rashaa al-Sabah of the Ministry of Higher Education warns that segregation of Kuwait University could be followed on a ban on the education of Kuwaiti women abroad.

28013. Carpio, Sheila. "Despots and Democrats: Political Change in Arabia: Elections and Mass Politics in Yemen", in Middle East Report, November-December 1993. pp. 2-7. The Yemeni parliamentary election has changed the parliament. The question has been sharply debated in Yemen, both in newspapers and in the university itself. It is unclear how the question has been sharply debated in Kuwait, both in newspapers and in the university itself. The five vocational colleges are already segregated by sex. Rashaa al-Sabah of the Ministry of Higher Education warns that segregation of Kuwait University could be followed on a ban on the education of Kuwaiti women abroad.
external support that each regime depended on, and by the longstanding goal of unification demanded by both sides. During the transition period, authority was shared by the two former national ruling parties (General Peoples Congress (GPC) in the north, Yemen Socialist Party (YSP) in the south), each of which retained control of formerly independent military and police apparatus. Some 40 political parties quickly emerged, of which the most prominent were Islah (Reform) Party (Saudi-backed alliances between the Israeli military, and the need to focus on continuing attacks on Palestinian children) and the Left-Green Line, and appropriate Israeli organizations and researchers. A list of such organizations and persons should be published in an upcoming NACC newsletter “Connections”.

We must continue to push the United States Government to tie its foreign aid to human rights. In the case of Israel, aid should not be given while a pattern of gross human rights violations exists. We must also assert that Israeli housing projects and settlement activities, whether in the West Bank, Gaza, Jerusalem, or inside the Green Line, are racist in character as long as they exclude non-Jews and therefore, should not receive any financial or other support, including loan guarantees for the settlement of Jewish immigrants. NGOs should engage in issue-focused, coordinated activities, using resources and documentation available within our network or otherwise available to our network. The NACC Fax Tree provides a good mechanism for such communication and coordinated activity. It should be used, expanded, and supported. The NACC can also produce sample letters to elected representatives for use in this issue-focused work. [=]

28016. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (b) Disappearance”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There were no reports of disappearances. Of the numerous disappearances that occurred in 1991, about 100 cases remain unresolved. The Ministry of Interior claims that, in cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), it has renewed its efforts to resolve the cases, but has not yet done so. The Government has failed to issue death certificates in cases where those who disappeared are known to be dead. The Government’s failure to resolve these cases stems from an unwillingness to open and pursue criminal investigations into the causes of the deaths. According to the ICRC, Iraqi authorities took prisoner 609 Kuwaitis and residents of Kuwait, including 9 women, during Iraq’s occupation. These people are still missing or detained in Iraq. The Government of Iraq has refused to comply with UN Security Council Resolution 687, which stipulates that the detainees be released. Iraq denies that it holds Kuwaiti detainees and refuses to account for missing Kuwaitis taken into Iraqi custody during the occupation. [=]

28017. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (i) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The constitution provides for individual privacy and sanctity of the home. The police must obtain a warrant to search both public and private property, unless they are in hot pursuit or suspect the presence of alcohol or narcotics. The warrant can be obtained from the state prosecutor or, in the case of private property, from a judge. The security forces occasionally monitor the activities of individuals and their communications. By law males must obtain government approval to marry foreign-born women. However, the Government does not vigorously enforce the restriction, and Kuwaitis routinely obtain exemptions from the Ministry of Justice. The Government also advises women against marrying foreign nationals. [ ]

28018. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Kuwaiti citizens cannot change their system of government. Women and many others are disfranchised, only 30% of adult citizens are eligible to vote. Under the Constitution, the Amir holds executive power and shares legislative power with the National Assembly. The Prime Minister presides over a 16-member Cabinet. In accordance with the practice of the ruling family, the Prime Minister is always the Crown Prince. The Constitution empowers the Amir to suspend its provisions and to rule by decree. In 1986 the Amir effectively dissolved the National Assembly by suspending the constitutional provisions on the Assembly’s election. The Assembly remained dissolved until 1992. The Amir had previously dissolved the Assembly from 1976 to 1981. An election was held for the National Assembly in 1992 in which 303 candidates ran for the Assembly’s 50 seats. Members serve 4-year terms. The Constitution empowers the Assembly to overturn any Amir decrees made during the dissolution. After the election, the Assembly used its power to revoke some decrees issued from 1986 to 1992. Since the Government prohibits political parties, Assembly candidates must nominate themselves. Nonetheless, informal political groupings are active in the Assembly. Approximately 82000 citizens, almost the entire franchised male population at the time, registered to vote in the 1992 election. In 1994 the Assembly passed legislation extending the right to vote to the sons of naturalized Kuwaiti citizens, about 110000 males. Previously, the law had restricted suffrage to adult males who had resided in Kuwait before 1940 and maintained a residence there until 1959, and their male descendants. According to the 1994 law, naturalized citizens who have been naturalized citizens for at least 30 years will also be eligible to vote in 1996. A majority of candidates elected in 1992 have stated that they favored extending the vote to women, but Proposals to do so have been delayed in a legislative committee. The Amir and the Prime Minister have publicly stated that they support political rights for women, but have made no apparent effort to persuade the National Assembly. [ ]

28019. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Religious Minorities”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government is committed to providing for the welfare of children providing free education and health care to all children and a variety of other services. There is no child prostitution, child labor problem, or any pattern of societal abuse of children. However, in 1993 the Minister of Interior ordered all public and private schools not to enroll the children of parents without valid residence permits. Moreover, the Government orders the children of persons awaiting deportation to be held with their mothers at the women’s detention facility, in conditions unsuitable for children. [ ]

28020. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or repatriation or a change in employers. On several occasions, the Philippine Embassy has sheltered over 200 women at one time, roughly half of whom complain of physical or sexual abuse and half have contractual complaints against their employers. The Government discontinues family entitlements to divorced women, but continues to make such payments to the divorced husbands who are expected by law and custom to provide for the children. The law discriminates against women married to foreign men. These women are not entitled to government housing subsidies which are available to other citizens. The law also requires Kuwaiti women to pay wedding fees for their foreign-born husbands and does not recognize marriage as the basis for granting residency rights to foreign-born husbands. Instead, the law grants residency only if the husband is employed. By contrast, men married to foreign women do not have to pay residency fees for their spouses and their spouses’ right to residency derives from marriage. [=]

28022. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (c) Prohibition of Force or Compulsory Labor”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution prohibits forced labor except in cases specified by law for national emergency and with just remuneration. Nonetheless, there have been credible reports that foreign nationals employed as domestic servants have been denied exit visas if they seek them without their employers’ content. Foreign workers may not change their employment without permission from their original sponsors domestic servants are particularly vulnerable to abuses because they are not protected by the Labor Law. In many cases employers exercise some control over their servants by holding their passports, although the Government prohibits this practice and has acted to retrieve passports of maids involved in disputes. By law domestic servants who run away from their employers may be treated as criminals. In some reported cases, employers illegally withheld wages from domestic servants to cover the costs involved in bringing them to Kuwait. The Government has done little, If anything, to protect domestics in such cases. [=]

28023. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The legal minimum age is 18 years for all forms of work both full- and part-time. Employers must obtain permits from the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor to employ juveniles between the ages of 14-18 in certain trades. Education compulsory for children between the ages of 6-15. These laws are not fully observed in the nonindustrial sector, although no instance involving children have been alleged. There are an undetermined number of underage foreign maids who have given false information regarding their ages in order to obtain work. Some small businessmen employ their children on a part time basis, and there have been unconfirmed reports that some South Asian domestic servants under is falsified their age in order to enter Kuwait. Juveniles may work a maximum of 6 hours a day on the condition that they work no more than 4 consecutive hours followed by a 1-hour rest period [=]

28024. DS. “Kuwait: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor is responsible for enforcing all labor laws. There is no legal minimum wage in the private sector. In 1994 the minimum wage in the public sector, administratively set by the Government, was approximately $630 a month (180 dinars) for citizens and $316 a month (90 dinar) for non-citizens. The Law establishes general conditions for work both the public and the private sector, with the oil industry treated separately. The Civil Service Law also prescribed additional conditions for the public sector. Labor law limits the standard work week to 48 hours with 1 full day of rest per week, provides for a minimum of 14 workdays of leave each year, and established a compensation schedule for industrial accidents. Domestic servants, who are specifically excluded from the private sector law labor, frequently work hours greatly in excess of 48 hours. The ILO has urged the Government to guarantee the weekly 24-consecutive-hour rest period to temporary workers employed for a period of less than 6 months and workers in enterprises employing fewer than five persons. The law governing in the oil industry provided for a 40-hour work week, 30 days of annual leave and sick leave. Laws establishing working conditions are not always applied uniformly to foreign workers. The Labor Law also provides for employer-provided medical care and compensation to workers disabled by injury or disease due to job related causes. The Law also requires that employers provide periodic medical examinations to workers exposed to environmental hazards on the job (chemicals, asbestos, etc.). The Government has issued occupational health and safety standards; however, compliance and enforcement are poor, especially regarding unskilled foreign laborers. Employers often exploit workers’ willingness to accept substandard conditions. Foreign workers, especially unskilled or semiskilled south Asian workers, frequently face contractual disputes, poor working conditions, and some physical abuse. Workers have the right to remove themselves from dangerous work situations without jeopardizing their continued employment, and legal protections exist for workers who file complaints about such conditions. Latest available figures for occupational injuries show 798 such occurrences in 1992, primarily in the sectors of construction and building, manufacturing, hotels, restaurants, and transportation. To cut accident rates, the Government periodically inspects establishments to raise awareness among workers and employers and ensure that they abide by the safety rules, control the pollution resulting from certain dangerous industries, training workers who use new machines in specialized industries, and report violations. [=]

28025. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 07: Respect For Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The right to individual privacy and sanctity of the home is provided for in the Constitution, but there were credible reports that authorities continued to ignore this right. Kuwaiti law requires search warrants issued by the court or the prosecutor unless the police are in hot pursuit of a suspect fleeing the scene of a crime or there is an indication of the presence of alcohol or narcotics on the premises. The prosecutor issues search warrants to conduct searches on public premises. Kuwaiti police frequently manned checkpoints on major roads to search for weapons, infiltrators, or persons without legal residence permits. Although drivers could legally refuse to have their vehicles searched, most allowed the police to do so. There were numerous credible reports of harassment and arrest of foreign nationals (especially peoples whose leaders were associated with support for Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, as well as bidoon) at checkpoints. Foreigners without residence permits were also subject to arrest and detention. In 1986 the Government restricted the right of Kuwaiti males to marry foreigners, decreeing that advance official approval would be required. Government officials said that concern about meeting the State’s responsibilities for the children of non-Kuwaiti spouses residing outside the country motivated the action, but the Government was also known to be concerned about the growing number of Kuwaiti males marrying foreigners rather than Kuwaiti women. Kuwaiti women were publicly advised against marrying foreign nationals. The Government has only sporadically enforced the law. There is occasional surveillance of individuals and communications. [-]

28026. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 12: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Kuwaitis do not enjoy the right to change the head of state and government. The 30% of adult Kuwaitis eligible to vote (see below) choose the membership of the National Assembly. Under the Constitution, executive power is vested in the Amir and under him in an appointed Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister who, in accordance with family politics, has been the Crown Prince. Following the 1992 elections, the Prime Minister formed a 16-member Cabinet which included 6 elected Assembly members. While the Constitution places legislative power in the hands of the Amir and the Assembly, that has not prevented the Amir from twice suspending constitutional provisions and ruling extracomstitutionally. The most recent dissolution of the Assembly, decreed by the Amir in 7/1986, lasted until the 10/1992 elections. Although the Constitution grants the Amir the right to suspend the Assembly, it also obliges him to hold elections for a new Assembly within 2 months of the dissolution, otherwise the old Assembly regains its authority until the new one is elected. The 1986 decree circumvented the election requirement by suspending the section of the Constitution that called for new elections. The Constitution gives the Amir the authority to suspend its articles only during periods of martial law. The Amir declares martial law. The Amir had previously dissolved the Assembly from 1976 to 1981. In the Assembly's absence, the Amir rules by decrees having the force of law. He has the constitutional right to review and approve or overturn Amiri decrees made in its absence. After its convocation, the 1992 Assembly reviewed all of the Amiri decrees and revoked some of them, including the official secrecy law and an amendment to the law on public associations. Constitutionally, elections for the Assembly are to take place every 4 years by secret ballot. The electoral law provides that candidates for the Assembly be self-nominated, with multiple candidates permitted for the 50 seats. In 1992, 303 candidates registered for parliamentary elections. Kuwaiti law prohibits the establishment of political parties; however, the Government tacitly accepted the existence of several opposition political groups which acted much as political parties during the 1992 Assembly elections and the ensuing Assembly session. The law limits suffrage to adult males who resided in Kuwait before 1920 and maintained a residence there until 1989 and to their adult male descendants (21 years of age and older). According to current nationality law, naturalized citizens who do not meet the pre-1920 qualification but who have been naturalized citizens for at least 30 years must wait until 1996 to acquire the right to vote. This waiting period means that a large number of citizens do not have the right or the ability to participate in Kuwaiti elections. Distinctions based on parentage, length of residence, and gender limit suffrage to approximately 30% of the adult population. In the 1992 elections, approximately 82000 eligible Kuwaitis (almost the entire enfranchised male population) registered to vote. While a majority of candidates elected to the National Assembly expressed opinions favoring women's right to vote during their election campaigns, a public backlash after the election resulted in several proposals on this issue being held in committee. While both the Amir and the Prime Minister have publicly stated that they favor political rights for women, they have maintained that the National Assembly must decide the question. Non-Kuwaiti residents do not exercise any political rights, nor do they participate in decisions affecting their interests. [-]

28027. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government demonstrates its commitment to children's human rights and welfare through financial means. For example, the Government provides child benefit allowances and provides free education and healthcare to all Kuwaiti children. The Government also subsidizes infant formula. Governmental expenditures on children's welfare cover orphans, fosterchildren, handicapped children, and mentally impaired children. The Government also provides monthly financial assistance to approximately 10000 limited-income families with children. There is no pattern of societal abuse (including child prostitution) of children. Children of persons awaiting deportation are held along with their parents at the main deportation facility. The Ministry of Interior forbade schools, public and private, from accepting children who do not have valid residence permits. [-]

28028. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (c) National, Racial, Ethnic Minorities", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The plight of the bidoon (long-term residents of undetermined nationality) remained one of the most pressing human rights abuses in 1993. In the late 1980s and up to the time of Iraqi invasion the Government promulgated a series of measures that, inter alia, dropped the bidoon from the census rolls and stripped them of civil identification cards which had entitled the bearer to a variety of social services. Many of these persons were in limbo, without the legal right to work, attend school, travel in and out of Kuwait, or marry. The Government established a screening process to grant residence permits to bidoon who had served in the Kuwaiti military and security forces and their families and to bidoon in special categories (children of Kuwaiti/bidoon marriages). In 1993 the President of Kuwait's Martial Judicial Authority announced that bidoon may no longer join the Kuwaiti army. (This decree reversed a 1967 law which allowed bidoon to enlist, but did not affect the bidoon already in the army.) Foreign nationals are prohibited from having majority ownership in virtually every business other than certain small service-oriented businesses and may not own property. The Government continued its Kuwaitization policy, begun in 1991, applying significant labor and educational access restrictions to foreigners, especially Palestinians and other "suspect" nationalities. These persons found it difficult to obtain work and resident permits. The Government's tying of access to education to possession of a valid identification card which had entitled the bearer to a variety of social services. Many of these persons were in limbo, without the legal right to work, attend school, travel in and out of Kuwait, or marry. The Government established a screening process to grant residence permits to bidoon who had served in the Kuwaiti military and security forces and their families and to bidoon in special categories (children of Kuwaiti/bidoon marriages). In 1993 the President of Kuwait's Martial Judicial Authority announced that bidoon may no longer join the Kuwaiti army. (This decree reversed a 1967 law which allowed bidoon to enlist, but did not affect the bidoon already in the army.) Foreign nationals are prohibited from having majority ownership in virtually every business other than certain small service-oriented businesses and may not own property. The Government continued its Kuwaitization policy, begun in 1991, applying significant labor and educational access restrictions to foreigners, especially Palestinians and other "suspect" nationalities. These persons found it difficult to obtain work and resident permits. The Government's tying of access to education to possession of a valid identification card which had entitled the bearer to a variety of social services. Many of these persons were in limbo, without the legal right to work, attend school, travel in and out of Kuwait, or marry. The Government established a screening process to grant residence permits to bidoon who had served in the Kuwaiti military and security forces and their families and to bidoon in special categories (children of Kuwaiti/bidoon marriages). In 1993 the President of Kuwait's Martial Judicial Authority announced that bidoon may no longer join the Kuwaiti army. (This decree reversed a 1967 law which allowed bidoon to enlist, but did not affect the bidoon already in the army.)
House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Constitution prohibits forced labor “except in cases specified by law for national emergency and with just remuneration”. Nonetheless, therecontinue to be credible reports that foreign nationals employed as domestic servants have been denied exit visas if they seek them without their employers’ consent. Foreign nationals must obtain a Kuwaiti sponsor in order to obtain a residence permit and cannot change their employment without permission from their original sponsors. Domestic servants are particularly vulnerable to abuses from this practice because they are not protected by Kuwaiti labor law. Sponsors frequently hesitate to grant their servants permission to change jobs because of their financial investment in the servants. In many cases employers exercise some control over their servants by holding their passports, although the Government prohibits this practice and has acted to retrieve passports of maids involved in disputes. Domestic servants who run away from their employers can be treated as criminals under Kuwaiti law. In some reported cases, employers illegally withheld wages from domestic servants to cover the costs involved in bringing them to Kuwait. The Government has done little, if anything, to protect domestics in such cases. [=]

28030. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Kuwait: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The minimum age under Kuwaiti law is 18 years for all forms of work, both full- and part-time. Compulsory education laws exist for children between the ages of 6-15. These laws are not fully observed in the nonindustrial sector. Some small businessmen employ their children on a part-time basis, and there have been unconfirmed reports that some south Asian domestic servants are under 18. The Minister of Social Affairs & Labor is charged with enforcing minimum age regulations. Employers may also obtain permits from the Ministry to employ juveniles between the ages of 14-18 in certain trades. Juveniles may work a maximum of 6 hours per day on the condition that they work no more than 4 consecutive hours followed by a rest period of at least 1 hour. [=]

28031. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The 1946 labor and family code stipulates a minimum age of 8. Workers between the age of 8-16 cannot work in excess of 7 hours, with 1 hour of rest provided after 4 hours. They are also prohibited from working between the hours of 7 p.m. and 6 a.m. There is a general prohibition against “jobs out of proportion with a worker’s age.” The labor code also prohibits certain types of mechanical work for children aged 8-13, and other types for those aged 13-16. The Labor Ministry is tasked with enforcing these requirements, but the civil war left it with few resources and a demoralized and sometimes corrupt staff. The law is not rigorously applied, and many younger children work in family businesses. [=]

28032. Evans, Kathy. “Prof. Alia Shoairb Sacked For Daring to Speak of Gay”, in Manchester Guardian Weekly, April 6, 1997, p. 5. Kuwaiti Prof. Shoaiib, in an informal conversation with a student, noted witnessing sex between women in a university bathroom (one being heavily veiled, indicating association with fundamentalist Islam); she was quoted in a local magazine, Al-Hadaf. Shoaiib has been dismissed from her position at Kuwait University, and the magazine is being sued for obscenity. Shoaiib, considered by some the first radical feminist in the GCC, is under investigation and is faced with loss of her citizenship.

Arab countries employ Asian workers not only because they provide a cheap labor force but because their “temporary” status prevents their integration into Middle Eastern societies, thus allowing them to be more easily exploited. In Kuwait, foreigners make up almost 70% of the population, yet they are treated with suspicion and disdain. Filipina contract workers living in Kuwait must abide by Islamic law, but do not themselves have any political rights.

Although both skilled and unskilled workers in the Middle East generally earn four to five times more than they would in the Philippines, overseas workers face extensive discrimination. Wage levels are set according to nationality and religion rather than skill, and at least three distinct “levels” are maintained. Americans and Europeans are paid the most, followed by the local nationals. Workers from the Philippines and other Asian countries are paid the lowest rate. A domestic worker receives an average of US $150 monthly, down from US $200 in earlier years.

The lack of legal protection in the host countries is another problem. The Philippine Department of Foreign Affairs has consistently received reports from Philippine embassies abroad of abuses against the 10-15000 Filipino domestic workers in the Middle East. These workers suffer physical abuse, maltreatment, overwork, sexual harassment and rape, and violations of contract—employers changing terms of contracts, failing to provide promised living and working conditions, and recruiting or firing employees illegally.

According to Philippine Ambassador to Kuwait Alunan C. Glang, there were more than 5000 Filipina maids in Kuwait in 6/1987, most of whom had previously been teachers. In the first half of 1987, the Philippine embassy in Kuwait received complaints from 271 workers who had run away from their employers. Glang said that the most common problems were long working hours, no overtime pay, no days off, and violation of contracts.

Reports of rape of domestic helpers in Kuwait are frequent. At least 30 Filipina domestic workers were repatriated in 1987 after they complained of sexual abuse by their employers. Four domestic helpers in Kuwait who were made pregnant by their employers had to struggle to avoid penalties for “immorality.” The maximum penalty for fornication is death by stoning.

GABRIELA, a women’s organization, and KAIBIGAN, a group concerned with the welfare of migrant workers, staged protest actions. The Philippine Department of Foreign Affairs ordered the Philippine Embassy in Kuwait to negotiate for the repatriation of the Filipinas. After a week of hard battle, a little justice was finally won by three of the four pregnant Filipina domestic workers. Found guilty of rape by the Kuwait Islamic court, two of the attackers were sentenced to a seven-year prison term; a third was given only a 2-year term. Earlier, the employers had refused to acknowledge that they were the fathers. The three women gave birth the first week of 6/1987 in Kuwait hospitals which had earlier denied them admission. Ambassador Glang said that the Kuwaiti government allowed the women to deliver after the intercession of the Philippine embassy. He called the move very “generous.”

In order to stop abuses of domestic workers in the Middle East, the Philippine Department of Foreign Affairs may soon completely ban the sending of workers to that region. An alternative would be the recruitment of workers by the government itself instead of by private recruiters—who have been sending workers to Kuwait illegally despite a ban on exporting labor to that country in effect since 10/1986. Finally, the Philippine government might negotiate agreements with the host countries under which they would enact laws protecting domestic helpers.

Dear Sir: We are a group of women’s organizations who are extremely pained at learning that four of our fellow Filipinas in Kuwait, abused by their Kuwaiti employers and now pregnant, are being denied the right to medical attention. They face the barbaric punishment of death by stoning if found “guilty” under Kuwaiti law, when they should in fact be indemnified for their physical, emotional and psychological pain and suffering. They have had to face the risks and uncertainty of working in a foreign country because of the inability of our own society to provide decent jobs for them.

We demand that the Department of Foreign Affairs (DFA) extend, through our Embassy in Kuwait, full protection to these Filipinas against any form of harm. Our urgent concern is for their medical care during their pregnancies, because of the importance of medical attention during gestation.

Realizing the gravity of their situation, we demand the immediate repatriation of these Filipinas with sufficient indemnification from the government of Kuwait and an assurance that they will be allowed to bring home their babies.

We know that these women are not isolated cases. We are aware of so many cases of Filipina women who have become victims of sexual abuse by their employers, not only in Kuwait, but also in other countries where we export domestic helpers.

In this light, we also forward the following demands:

1. Establishment of bilateral agreements with countries where we export labor, especially Filipina workers.

2. Justice for all Filipina overseas workers.

We expect speedy action towards the resolution of this problem.

For the Dignity of Filipina Women.

Contact: Gabriela National Office, P.O. Box 4386, Manila 2800, Philippines. Philippine Resource Center, 2288 Fulton, Berkeley, CA 94720. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

The South Asian region is relatively set apart from other areas, is well endowed with minerals and energy resources; there are significant hydroelectric resources; there is considerable potential for irrigation development, although there is annual flooding and droughts are common. The regional population of 1.1 billion is divided among India (850 million), Pakistan and Bangladesh (110 million each); the other states have small populations. Regional population growth rates are high; population densities are high; and 70% of the region’s people remain in rural areas. All countries of the region are classified as low-income, and four (Maldives, Bangladesh, Bhutan and Nepal) are classified as least developed; recent regional growth rates have been modest but there is hope for higher rates. Regional investment rates are significant (India 23%, Pakistan 23%), but the manufacturing sector remains uncompetitive and largely state owned. Infrastructure development has been significant, but Nepal and much of the region still relies on wood energy; telecommunications infrastructure remains sparse. Poverty is very high (Bangladesh 70-80%, Nepal 60%, India and Pakistan 30-40%, Sri Lanka 20%).

South Asia is one of the main areas that has received World bank and IDA loans. India ($35.3 billion) is the largest borrower; Pakistan (seventh at $7.4 billion) and Bangladesh (thirteenth at $5.3 billion) are also large borrowers. The region has received 12.5% of World Bank global loans, 50.8% of IDA loans, and 21.4% of the combined loan total (this total is magnified by the creation of Bank-sponsored financing consortia that included the Asian Development Bank, Arab development funds, EC, and the International Fund for Agricultural Development). Some 93% of all loans were project loans; Bangladesh has received the largest proportion of non-project lending (28.2%). Sectoral lending shifted from agriculture and social sectors in the 1970s, to energy development in the 1980s.

The sectoral experience of the World Bank in the 1970s and 1980s is summarized below:

Energy: has been the major focus of World Bank development loans, claiming almost one-third of all loans at $14.6 billion; rising from 15% before 1970, to 22% in the 1970s, to 35% in the 1980s. Energy loans have tried to stress local capacities (power plants in India, pipelines in India and Pakistan). In India, the emphasis in the early 1970s was state-level power development and regional transmission grids; in the late 1970s the emphasis shifted to large, coal-burning generation facilities built by the National Thermal Power Corp. (NTPC). Only a small part of the loans were routed through state electricity boards, the Rural Electrification Corp. or the Power Finance Corp. In Pakistan the Bank initially provided loans for the hydroelectric sector in the 1960s, in 1970-1972 to the Water & Power Development Authority (WAPDA) when Bank lending for energy development slowed. Much funding has been provided for pipelines and energy resource exploration in Baluchistan. In Bangladesh, due to a lack of alternative energy resources, lending has focused on natural gas development. In Sri Lanka, energy development loans were made only in the period when the United National Party was in power. Regionally, the power sector remains plagued by low productivity and poor system performance; network losses are high (India and Sri Lanka 20%, Pakistan and Bangladesh 25-40%). Investment has focused excessively on increasing supply, rather than to efficiency, economy in operations, demand management, or energy conservation.

The Bank has had some success in reducing high subsidies by the energy sector to agriculture by the State Electricity Boards in India, but generally, it has not been able to influence energy policy in much detail.

