Transportation: before 1970, transportation was the largest sector of lending at 37%, but declining to 7-8% in the 1970s and 1980s. The Bank has loaned $1.5 million to Indian Railways since 1949 in sixteen loans: while early loans focused on increasing the rail network and equipment, later loans have focused on centralization, modernization and rationalization and have been less successful. Railroad loans to Pakistan have numbered eleven totaling $110 million: implementation and compliance problems were similar to those in India, with the loans generally less productive in Pakistan than in India. Numerous loans for roads and bridges have been made region-wide, with much of the total being used to repair flood damage in Bangladesh. Such projects have had serious overruns and delays in Pakistan and Bangladesh. Road loans have been significant only in Bangladesh and two Indian states due to the unwillingness of the Bank to become involved in the management of such small scale, dispersed projects. The Bank has funded transport coordination studies and studies on energy conservation, but has not followed up on these initial studies.

Industry: Bank assistance to industry include International Finance Corp. (IFC) operations. The majority of regional industrial development funding has been focused on fertilizer and petrochemical (41%) and development financing institutions (DFI) (48%). The Bank has supported fertilizer production since fertilizer inputs are required for higher agricultural production. In 1971-1986 the Bank loans $1.598 billion to India for fertilizer plants (including $811 million for plants for the Indian Farmers Fertilizers Cooperative (IFFCO), after some hesitation by the Bank to lend to the public sector. The implementation of these projects has been slowed by Indian reluctance on Indian expertise and technology, but this has supported the emergence of a broader technical and engineering sector in India. In the 1980s, the Bank paused in making loans to the fertilizer sector: concluding in a 1987 study that the second generation natural gas based fertilizer plants had such high energy costs that they were not economically viable. The Bank has responded by trying to have the highest cost plants mothballed. Loans to Pakistan, beginning with that for the venture between Dawood Industrial Group and Hercules Inc. in 1968. In Bangladesh, the Bank has financed the gas-based project in Ashuganj and financed the rehabilitation of three other plants. The Bank has made significant loans to the petrochemical industry in India through the state-owned Indian Petrochemical Corp. ($500 million), and provided refinery improvement loans to India, Bangladesh and Pakistan. The major DPI the Bank has operated in India has been the Industrial Credit & Investment Corp. (ICIC), with lesser involvement in the public sector Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI). In Pakistan, the Bank operated through Pakistan Industrial Credit & Investment Corp. (PICIC), and through the public sector Industrial Development Bank of Pakistan (IDBP) and National Development Finance Corp. (NDFC). The Bank has worked with the Bangladesh Shilpa Bank but has had problems with political interference and the very low level of educational development in Pakistan. The first promote national identity in a society dominated by expatriate workers.

In 1960s, such loans to Pakistan totaled $77.5 million in 1977-1986, despite attitudes towards work. Much of the Kuwaiti women's role was to balance of payments problems, and inflation. Longva, Anh Nga. “Kuwaiti Women at a Crossroads: Privileged Society in a Land of Contrasts” in Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Kuwait. (and in Maharasthra and Madhya Pradesh, where most people were displaced) has made clear how very inadequate environmental planning of such projects has been, both by the Government of India and by the Bank (ignoring claims of indigenous peoples, los custodes, marginal farmers; poor implementing relief aid, lack of data on impacts, health hazards, and impact on fisheries). In Pakistan, Bank lending for irrigation breaks into three periods: the Indus Waters treaty in the 1950s, large dams and canals in the 1960s, and problems of waterlogging and soil salinity in the 1970s and 1980s. The Bank has been more successful in convincing the Government in Pakistan that irrigation projects should seek full cost recovery. In Bangladesh, flooding is the most serious problem, and UNDP and the Bank have sought to develop a coherent strategy to address the problem of flooding: only a few small projects proved to be cost effective enough to find Bank support. Minor irrigation development has been support by the Bank through the Bangladesh Agricultural Development Corporation Corp. (BADC): most of these projects have mainly benefited local landlords, who have emerged in many areas as ‘waterlords’. Singificantly, in 1987-1988, floods in Bangladesh displaced 30 million people, highlighting the unresolved nature of the flooding issue in that country. In Sri Lanka, lending for irrigation development has focused in the Mahaweli Development Master Plan, which received four loans for as a part of the Bank lending. The next decade will see the Bank having

In Sri Lanka the Bank has worked through the Development Finance Corp of Ceylon (DFCC). Agriculture: some 29% of cumulative loans by the Bank were made in the agricultural sector, rising from 19% in pre-1970s to 39% in the 1970s, declining to 26% in the 1980s, seeking to back the Green Revolution through irrigation credit and extension, crop diversification, development of allied activities (agro-industries, dairies, fisheries, and tree crops), and improved resource management. Irrigation system development took 47% of Bank loans in the region as a whole, with agricultural credit at 19%. In India, irrigation has expanded from 23 million hectares in 1950 to 54 million hectares in the mid-1980s, and expanded into states where it was previously unknown (Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh, Bihar, Orissa). However, while it has been relatively easy to boost the extent of irrigation, it has been harder to increase the efficiency of the systems. Project design has often been poor, and technical soundness and economic viability has often been overlooked in the haste to implement projects. Bank focus in the environmental aspects of irrigation has been limited to dam safety and resettlement of people displaced by the projects: the well-known Narmada Dam project in Gujarat (and in Maharashtra and Madhya Pradesh, where most people were displaced) has made clear how very inadequate environmental planning of such projects has been, both by the Government of India and by the Bank (ignoring claims of indigenous peoples, los custodes, marginal farmers; poor implementing relief aid, lack of data on impacts, health hazards, and impact on fisheries). In Pakistan, Bank lending for irrigation projects have collapsed. The bank has failed, until recently, to blend other resource commitments, has often negatively affected other projects by loan recipients. Project monitoring and evaluation has been consistently weak: the Bank has only a very limited notion of whether its projects prove to be successful once direct funding ends. Bank efforts to extend the reach of projects sector-wide by financial covenants of various kinds have been generally quite unsuccessful. The Bank has provided some support for institution building at the national level, but has never been interested in institution building at a local level, ignoring many such opportunities. While the Bank has stated a major goal as being reduction of poverty in South Asia, it is not clear to what extent that has been successful: poorly designed Social Forestry projects in Sri Lanka have raised water prices, and local rural development projects in Bangladesh have been uniformly unsuccessful.

Conclusions: Bank project lending has fallen far short of expectations in the last 40 years. Resource transfer considerations have had negative impacts on the projects. The Bank has pursued an incremental strategy in attempts to influence national policy formulation: the approach has been generally unsuccessful due to the unwillingness of the Bank to use its sole option of exit. Sometimes, the Bank’s incremental approach has allowed complications to accumulate to the point that projects have collapsed. The bank has failed, until recently, to blend project and non-project funding; similarly, there has often, as in Pakistan, been no real linkage between projects and sectoral reforms. The late 1990s will require a higher rate of return from Bank projects, never a strong point for the Bank in spite of its willingness to subordinate other objectives to maximizing project return, even as project lending declines as a part of the Bank lending. The next decade will see the Bank having less resources, even as South Asian economies are undergoing macroeconomic and sectoral adjustments. [TXT] 28035. Longva, Anh Nga. “Kuwaiti Women at a Crossroads: Privileged Development and the Constraints of Ethnic Stratification” in International Journal of Middle East Studies, August, 1993. pp. 443-456. This article examines the position of Kuwaiti women and its socioeconomic context prior to the Persian Gulf War. The main areas examined are dress and attitudes towards work. Much of the Kuwaiti women's role was to promote national identity in a society dominated by expatriate workers. Little of this has changed following the war. And opportunity for change appears less.

A thief in the night, he sets himself apart from any claim to the sympathy and has banned workers from going to Kuwait because of the abuses once again demonstrated that when one chooses the path of cowardice as Philippine economy. The government attempts to look after its citizens PLO instead has chosen to attack the soul of the nation. By doing so it has treated that badly and expatriates contribute $1.79 billion to the fury was esp Rape and virtual slavery can be the results of working in countries like or influential benefactors—often members of the US Congress. Reid's workers find that the hoped for new life overseas is often a nightmare.

This despite the fact that the Palestinians have farmed the land for that he feared the sentence would intimidate other writers from taking up the oft-stated propaganda that the Jews have made the desert bloom. better for us to put down our pens and go home," Al-Hashem said, adding that the government chose instead to feed the insatiable Saudi appetite for arms. The Saudis, according to Levine, have no legitimate security concerns. Iran is a "paper tiger," and Israel poses no threat. "Clearly, there is no legitimate rationale for these enormous arms purchases," he said. "Except perhaps to satisfy the Saudi addiction to Western weapons." This sentiment was echoed, and expanded upon, by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who spoke for nearly an hour on "the tendency for this administration, but, even more, other nations in the world to step up the pace of weapons sales to Arab nations in the Middle East." The apparent logical discrepancy between condemning the Arabs for purchasing, with their own money, arms from the US and other suppliers, while the American taxpayer is forking over billions to Israel so that it can arm itself to the teeth, is explained this way: "We have a very small nation [Israel] which receives a large mount of aid . . . because through no fault of its own and against its strongest wishes it has been forced from its very existence to maintain a level of armament that is disproportionate. "What is disproportionate with regard to the state of Israel is not the amount of assistance that it gets in some abstract context; it is the burden that is imposed on Israel to arm itself, to devote much of its resources to armaments in self-defense." Frank then launched into a rationalization of Israel's seizure of the West Bank and Gaza, and their continued occupation. He described Israel's 1967 blitzkrieg (the Six-Day War) as an act of self-defense, and falsely claimed that these areas were "set aside and occupied because they were being used as bases for terrorist attacks on Israel. Frank's speech boils down to yet another long, dreary apologia for congressional rejection of any arms sales to the Saudis or any other Arab state—regardless of the benefits to the American people. To the likes of Frank, Levine and the other pro-Israeli stalwarts in Congress, what benefits Israel is far more important. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Neb.) tackled an altogether different issue regarding Israel on the floor of the Senate recently. Reid railed against recent arson attacks on the forests of Israel, allegedly orchestrated by the PLO. The forests of Israel have a special significance in Zionist mythology, lending credence of a sort to the oft-stated propaganda that the Jews have made the desert bloom. This despite the fact that the Palestinians have farmed the land for centuries, producing bountiful harvests. But perhaps of even greater significance is the fact that the forests of Israel are superb fund-raising gimmicks. Millions of dollars are raised in the US every year to plant trees in the Judean hills. And forests are named after especially generous or influential benefactors—often members of the US Congress. Reid's fury was esp eccially venomous toward the Palestinians. "Unwilling and unable to stand in fair combat against a nation outnumbered by millions," he shouted, "the PLO instead has chosen to attack the soul of the nation. By doing so it has once again demonstrated that when one chooses the path of cowardice as a thief in the night, he sets himself apart from any claim to the sympathy or respect of the civilized world. "We know the truth of Joyce Kilmer's thought that only God can make a tree, and we know the character of those who would destroy a forest by arson. I want the PLO to understand that we know, and that we will not forget," he concluded. This statement contains just about every tired myth promulgated by the Israelis and their vocal lobby in America. To wit, the Palestinians are cowardly, uncivilized, and murderous; Israel is the underdog, bravely standing up to bullies; and that when "the children of Israel returned from their diaspora in the latter 19th century . . . time, misuse and the travails of 2000 years . . . had laid waste their promised land." [=] 28037. Nimranee: Resource Center for Community Groups; Womens Unit of the Resource Centre for Community Groups. "Tragic Story of Migrant Workers in Middle East," in Nimranee-Sri Lanka Newsletter (Internet), Electronic Issue, n. 11, November, 1995. [You are free to post all or part of this information to other relevant places in Electronic or Printed form. Information is Free!]

In the economy of developing countries such as Sri Lanka, foreign exchange earnings are of greatest importance. Through total earning from the garment industry is the highest in figures, it is the migrant workers who bring in the highest net earnings of foreign exchange, in our country. The non-aligned summit conference held in Sri Lanka, in 1976 opened the gate for employment in the middle-east to Sri Lankens. Through brain-drain to western countries was prevalent before, those migrants aid not contribute much to our economy as they settled down in those developed countries.

The government that came into power in 1977 introduced the open economy which resulted in an exodus of migrant workers and boom of foreign employment agencies.

Many prostitutes in Colombo were among the house maids that left for middle east initially and they continued the oldest profession in the world there too. This created many problems for the urban and rural women who followed later some of these women who opposed the advances of their employers were maimed by brutal assaults while some committed suicide or became mentally deranged. Some were imprisoned and few were killed by their employers.

Those who left the torture houses to seek refuge in the employment agencies or the High Commissions fall from the pan into the fire. Children of the migrant women too suffer various consequences on their mothers are not around them.

"Tears of Kuwait" is an exhibition of photographs relating to the above, which should be an eye opener to our authorities to take immediate remedial measures. [=] 28038. Noakes, Greg [Compiler]; American Education Trust. "Issues in the News: From the Middle East Press: Kuwait Jails Journalist", in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (American Education Trust, Box 53062, Washington DC 20009), April/May 1993. pp. 55-57. A Kuwait court upheld a 3-month prison sentence imposed on journalist Fuad Al-Hashem for his criticism of Islamism and women who wear the niqab, or traditional facial veil while driving, the Saudi Gazette reports. Al-Hashem wrote in what benefits Israel is far more important. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Neb.) for his criticism of Islamism and women who wear the niqab, or traditional facial veil while driving, the Saudi Gazette reports. Al-Hashem wrote in

Noakes, Greg [Compiler]; American Education Trust. "Issues in the News: From the Middle East Press: Kuwait Jails Journalist", in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (American Education Trust, Box 53062, Washington DC 20009), April/May 1993. pp. 55-57. A Kuwait court upheld a 3-month prison sentence imposed on journalist Fuad Al-Hashem for his criticism of Islamism and women who wear the niqab, or traditional facial veil while driving, the Saudi Gazette reports. Al-Hashem wrote in

"Tears of Kuwait" is an exhibition of photographs relating to the above, which should be an eye opener to our authorities to take immediate remedial measures. [=] 28039. Rhodes, Belinda. "Service Without a Smile", in Far Eastern Economic Review, November 4, 1993. pp. 54-55. Expatriate Philippine workers find that the hoped for new life overseas is often a nightmare. Rape and virtual slavery can be the results of working in countries like Kuwait. Underemployment in the Philippines feeds the numbers of those seeking work overseas, a number that is growing 17% annually. Not all are treated that badly and expatriates contribute $1.79 billion to the Philippine economy. The government attempts to look after its citizens and has bashed workers from going to Kuwait because of the abuses there.

28040. Selsky, Andrew. "Democracy Elusive In Kuwait; Prosperity's Back, But Emir Still Calls Shots", in Seattle Times, September 20, 1996. p. A18. Five years after the Persian Gulf War, Kuwait has been rebuit, yet tensions with Iraq remain and the monarchy completely dominates the country. Democracy remains a remote ideal, although 2 million b/d of oil are produced by a largely foreign work force. Many Kuwaitis had hoped that there would have been some movement toward democracy in the wake of the war, but the US restored the complete power of the monarchy. The Parliament has no real power, political parties are banned, and women do not have the vote. Kuwait foreign reserves of $100 billion were almost erased during the war, with $70 billion being sent to hire coalition troops and finance other aspects of the war. [TXT]

28041. Wockner, Rex. "Kuwait [Kuwait University may dismiss Prof. Alia Shoab who states Lesbianism is rampant atthe University; officially Homosexuality does not exist in Kuwait; novelist Leila Otham faces obscenity charges for two stories dealing with gays]", in Just Out (Portland), May 2, 1997. p. 4. [TXT]
France came on 11/8/1994, when 300 French police swooped on Muslim families needed Mr. Birri to secure their re-election. In addition to having it too transparent to take anyone in. The latest attack on Muslims in commented that, unlike the past, the representatives of the traditional process.” But he stressed that Paris would not spare any effort to enlist factor attracting votes to Mr. Birri’s list was its inclusion of prominent finding great difficulty in convincing its allies to work for an “independent both doctors living and practicing in the eastern Sayda and Jizzin area, engineering a rapid Arab capitulation to Israel in the so-called peace other projects, through her brother Saudi-Lebanese businessman Rafiq al-Zayn, Mr. Mustapha Sa’ad, leader of the Sayda-based Popular Nasriite Organization, to write in his name and have him elected. The candidates who won parliamentary seats in the South were, for the fourteen Shi’a seats: Mr. Nabih Birri Mr. Muhammad Fna'ysh, Mr. Muhammad Ra’ad, Mr. Habib Sadiq, Mr. Ali Usayran, Mr. Muhammad Baydoun Mr. Ayoub Hmayid, Mr. Abd al-Latif al-Zayn, Mr. Abdullah al-Amin, Mr. Said al’As’ad, Mr. Ali al-Khalil, Mr. Hasan Alawyyeh, Mr. Ahmad Ajami, and Mr. Imad Jabber; for the three Sunni seats: Mrs. Bahiyaa al-Hariri, Mr. Ahmad Suwayd, and Mr. Mustapha Sa’ad; for the two Maronite seats: Mr. Samir Azar and Mr. Sulayman Kan’lan; for the two Greek Catholic seats: Mr. Namd Salem and Mr. Michel Musa; for the single Greek Orthodox seat: Mr. As’ad Hardan, and for the single Druze seat: Mr. Anwar al-Khalil. Among the most interesting aspects of elections in the South was the makeup of the list headed by Mr. Birri. The list was the result of an alliance of interests among Amal, Hizballah, Mr. Rafiq al-Hariri represented by his sister, members of the traditional South Lebanese families, prominent allies of Syria, local leaders, and independent Christian candidates. This alliance, which was recognized as a tactical one and which is unlikely to endure inside parliament, had the advantage of gathering all the factors necessary to secure votes. The first of these was the cooperation between Amal and Hizballah, the two most influential militas in the region. Amal had four candidates on the list: Nabih Birri, Muhammad Baydoun, Hasan Alawyyeh, and Ayoub Hmayid; Hizballah had two: Mr. Francesco Sefir, who also met French parliamentrians and Lebanese exiles, which was recognized as a tactical one and which is unlikely to endure inside parliament, had the advantage of gathering all the factors necessary to secure votes. The first of these was the cooperation between Amal and Hizballah, the two most influential militas in the region. Amal had four candidates on the list: Nabih Birri, Muhammad Baydoun, Hasan Alawyyeh, and Ayoub Hmayid; Hizballah had two: Mr. Francesco Sefir - who went to Paris fresh from his appointment as cardinal (the highest rank next to the Pope in the Roman Catholic Church) by Pope John Paul II - was given a red-carpet treatment during his three-day visit. The new cardinal had talks with French prime minister Edouard Balladur and defense minister Francois Leotard. No eyebrows were raised, as they normally would be, over a meeting between a spiritual leader and a minister of war, presumably because the cardinal was not in France to promote peace in his country, but to help usurp power for fellow Maronites.

Sefir, who also met French parliamentarians and Lebanese exiles, reserved his main energies for conducting a bitter campaign against the Syrian presence in Lebanon. Syria maintains 40000 troops to underpin efforts to settle the Lebanese civil war under the Arab League-brokered 1989 Taif accord. Syria and Lebanon signed a “Brotherhood and Coordination” pact on 5/20/1991, which was opposed by the Maronites who felt it would marginalize them. The pact bitterly divided the Maronites, whose militias began to fight each other. France, which at the time demanded the withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon, opposed the pact and collided with Israel to sabotage it. Israel began to bomb targets in Lebanon, especially areas near Beirut, on the announcement of the pact, and Paris publicly warned Damascus against the folly of trying to incorporate its former colony. Sefir tried to revive French interest in overturning the pact and the Taif accord. But while receiving warm welcome and strong backing for his project from the French government and legislators, it became obvious that the west's main interest in Lebanon’s Maronites at the present time was subordinated to that of engineering a rapid Arab capitulation to Israel in the so-called peace process. Juppe admitted in his newspaper interview that France was finding great difficulty in convincing its allies to work for an “independent Lebanon based on confessional co-existence as part of the peace process.” But he stressed that Paris would not spare any effort to enlist the support of its European allies for the cause. While France pursues a Christian campaign in Lebanon it insists that its war on French Muslims is being waged to preserve French secularism. This catch-22 response is too transparent to take anyone in. The latest attack on Muslims in France came on 11/8/1994, when 300 French police swooped on Muslim homes in Paris and its suburbs and arrested 95 Muslims said to be “Islamic terrorists.” At least three Imams have been expelled because they refuse to toe the French line on the question of hijab. In its attack on the hijab in schools, Paris has claimed that wearing the hijab is against French educational secularism, that it is a symbol of subjugating women and of Islamic fundamentalism. One of 24 Muslim pups was told that unless they remove their hijab by 11/8/1994, they will be suspended from school near Paris. This effectively refutes the French authorities’ claim, Sonia, 18, says, “They have claimed that the hijab is a sign of the submission of women, that it is propaganda, that it is a sign that we are fundamentalists. But we are not forcing anyone to do anything against their will. It is the State that is forcing us. It is the State that is fundamentalist.” [—] 5001. -------. “Birri List Easily Sweeps South”, in Lebanon Report, October 1992. On September 6, the third round of legislative elections took place in the South. Elections were conducted on the basis of a newly created electoral district uniting the two muhafazas of the South and Nabatiyyeh. Candidates in the South were competing for a total of twenty-three seats. The list headed by Amal leader, Mr. Nabih Birri, won an overwhelming victory, with all twentytwo of its members getting elected to parliament and the number of votes ranging from 90000 to 117000 each. The place left empty on the list for the third Sunni seat allowed supporters of the independent candidate, Mr. Mustapha Sa’ad, leader of the Sayda-based Popular Nasriite Organization, to write in his name and have him elected. The candidates who won parliamentary seats in the South were, for the fourteen Shi’a seats: Mr. Nabih Birri Mr. Muhammad Fna'ysh, Mr. Muhammad Ra’ad, Mr. Habib Sadiq, Mr. Ali Usayran, Mr. Muhammad Baydoun Mr. Ayoub Hmayid, Mr. Abd al-Latif al-Zayn, Mr. Abdullah al-Amin, Mr. Said al’As’ad, Mr. Ali al-Khalil, Mr. Hasan Alawyyeh, Mr. Ahmad Ajami, and Mr. Imad Jabber; for the three Sunni seats: Mrs. Bahiyaa al-Hariri, Mr. Ahmad Suwayd, and Mr. Mustapha Sa’ad; for the two Maronite seats: Mr. Samir Azar and Mr. Sulayman Kan’lan; for the two Greek Catholic seats: Mr. Namd Salem and Mr. Michel Musa; for the single Greek Orthodox seat: Mr. As’ad Hardan, and for the single Druze seat: Mr. Anwar al-Khalil. Among the most interesting aspects of elections in the South was the makeup of the list headed by Mr. Birri. The list was the result of an alliance of interests among Amal, Hizballah, Mr. Rafiq al-Hariri represented by his sister, members of the traditional South Lebanese families, prominent allies of Syria, local leaders, and independent Christian candidates. This alliance, which was recognized as a tactical one and which is unlikely to endure inside parliament, had the advantage of gathering all the factors necessary to secure votes. The first of these was the cooperation between Amal and Hizballah, the two most influential militas in the region. Amal had four candidates on the list: Nabih Birri, Muhammad Baydoun, Hasan Alawyyeh, and Ayoub Hmayid; Hizballah had two: Mr. Francesco Sefir - who went to Paris fresh from his appointment as cardinal (the highest rank next to the Pope in the Roman Catholic Church) by Pope John Paul II - was given a red-carpet treatment during his three-day visit. The new cardinal had talks with French prime minister Edouard Balladur and defense minister Francois Leotard. No eyebrows were raised, as they normally would be, over a meeting between a spiritual leader and a minister of war, presumably because the cardinal was not in France to promote peace in his country, but to help usurp power for fellow Maronites.

Sefir, who also met French parliamentarians and Lebanese exiles, reserved his main energies for conducting a bitter campaign against the Syrian presence in Lebanon. Syria maintains 40000 troops to underpin efforts to settle the Lebanese civil war under the Arab League-brokered 1989 Taif accord. Syria and Lebanon signed a “Brotherhood and Coordination” pact on 5/20/1991, which was opposed by the Maronites who felt it would marginalize them. The pact bitterly divided the Maronites, whose militias began to fight each other. France, which at the time demanded the withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon, opposed the pact and collided with Israel to sabotage it. Israel began to bomb targets in Lebanon, especially areas near Beirut, on the announcement of the pact, and Paris publicly warned Damascus against the folly of trying to incorporate its former colony. Sefir tried to revive French interest in overturning the pact and the Taif accord. But while receiving warm welcome and strong backing for his project from the French government and legislators, it became obvious that the west's main interest in Lebanon’s Maronites at the present time was subordinated to that of engineering a rapid Arab capitulation to Israel in the so-called peace process. Juppe admitted in his newspaper interview that France was finding great difficulty in convincing its allies to work for an “independent Lebanon based on confessional co-existence as part of the peace process.” But he stressed that Paris would not spare any effort to enlist the support of its European allies for the cause. While France pursues a Christian campaign in Lebanon it insists that its war on French Muslims is being waged to preserve French secularism. This catch-22 response is too transparent to take anyone in. The latest attack on Muslims in France came on 11/8/1994, when 300 French police swooped on Muslim homes in Paris and its suburbs and arrested 95 Muslims said to be “Islamic terrorists.” At least three Imams have been expelled because they refuse to toe the French line on the question of hijab. In its attack on the hijab in schools, Paris has claimed that wearing the hijab is against French educational secularism, that it is a symbol of subjugating women and of Islamic fundamentalism. One of 24 Muslim pups was told that unless they remove their hijab by 11/8/1994, they will be suspended from school near Paris. This effectively refutes the French authorities’ claim, Sonia, 18, says, “They have claimed that the hijab is a sign of the submission of women, that it is propaganda, that it is a sign that we are fundamentalists. But we are not forcing anyone to do anything against their will. It is the State that is forcing us. It is the State that is fundamentalist.” [—]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.

Marjayoun in south Lebanon.
Palestinian refugees inflicted in the Israeli terror attacks. Kessel claimed that, 'Israel has been bloodied by Katysha missiles' [sic: total dead in Israel zero], while noting that much of southern Lebanon is devastated. New Israeli airraids were made across southern Lebanon. The mayor of Kiryat Shmona called for further attacks on southern Lebanon since the Arabs cannot be trusted.

Warren Christopher termed the agreement a big step forward, and noted that the only goal was the extricate Israel from the crisis by 'ending the fighting'. Christopher makes no mention of any justice for the people of devastated southern Lebanon, speaking only to the needs of Jewish settlers in northern Israel and Jewish soldiers occupying southern Lebanon. Christopher concluded the fighting in southern Lebanon 'had been a good week in the peace process ... don't underemphasize the merits of the agreement' a sentiment Christopher noted, that was shared by Pres. Clinton, who was delighted by the results of the Israeli attack on southern Lebanon. Oddly, the agreement is characterized as an Israeli victory since the agreement calls for an end to the 'targeting of civilians', but every civilian death has been of a Lebanese or Palestinian at the hands of Israeli terror attacks.

A young Jewish woman in very high heels: "We should not feel guilty because they are doing this same thing to us [Jews]". A young Jewish man: "This is war. There is no problem." Two young women noted: "We have to kill them there because otherwise they would kill us here".

The report concluded with video coverage of Israeli attacks on Palestinian refugee camps, refugee columns and villages. No Jew has died in the bloody, US-backed war. [TEXT] civilians. Israel reported 340 IDF [Israel Defence Force] soldiers killed in the population more closely. More than 60 Palestinians were served with

By late December, the Lebanese police estimated the numbers control money going to families and institutions in the Occupied government investigation estimated that 90% of the casualties were popular committees proscribed. Currency restrictions were introduced to 17,825 known to have been killed and over 30,000 wounded including activities, the Israeli authorities resorted to various measures. A number Fateful Triangle. Two quotations to illustrate the cost in human lives and activities and create alternative structures to the Israeli Civil ' massacre' would be a more accurate description) in great detail in The Territories, and popular committees have been set up to coordinate such Professor Chomsky has dealt with that campaign (or perhaps boycotts have been organised by Palestinians in the Occupied

Anarchist Journal Freedom 1938-1948. London: Freedom Press, 1989.] More than 360 Palestinians were reported to have been killed by early

A number of PLO killed was given as 4000. As to the methods adopted: "The first target was the Palestinian camp of Rashidieh south of Tyre, much of which, by the second day of the invasion, 'had become a field of rubble'. There was ineffectual resistance, but as an officer of the UN peace-keeping force swept aside in the Israeli invasion later remarked: 'It was like shooting sparrows with cannon'. The 9000 residents of the camp—which had been regularly bombed and shelled for years from land, sea and air—either fled, or were herded to the beach where they could watch the destruction of much of what remained by the Israeli forces. All teen-age and adult males were blindfolded and bound, and taken to camps, where little has been heard about them since." This is typical of what happened throughout southern Lebanon. The Palestinian camps were demolished, largely bulldozed to the ground if not destroyed by bombardment; and the population was dispersed or (in the case of the male population) imprisoned. Reporters were generally not allowed in the Palestinian camps, where the destruction was worst, to keep them from witnessing what had happened and was being done. There were occasional reports. David Shipler described how after the camps were captured the army proceeded to destroy what was left. An army officer, when asked why bulldozers were knocking down houses in which women and children were living", responded by saying: "they are all terrorists", is statement accurately summarises Israel's strategy and the assumptions that underlie it, over many years." It is interesting to note that General—as he then was—Sharon justified the massacre in the Lebanon as the way to maintain 'quiet on the West Bank'. How wrong he has proved to be!

According to Amnesty International (June 1989): "On 12/9/1987 demonstrations against the Israeli occupation erupted throughout the West Bank and Gaza, marking the beginning of the period of unrest soon to become known as the intifada. Since 9 December almost every day Palestinians, including children, have staged demonstrations in which stones, petrol bombs and other missiles have often been thrown at Israeli soldiers and settlers. The Israeli authorities have responded with force, which has often been excessive and indiscriminate, using such means as live ammunition, rubber and plastic bullets, teargas and gravel cannons. More than 360 Palestinians were reported to have been killed by early 4/1989 in shootings incidents alone. Thousands have been injured, many of them requiring hospital treatment. A number of Israeli soldiers and civilians too, as well as several Palestinians suspected of collaborating with the Israeli authorities, have been killed in violent attacks by Palestinians. As well as demonstrations and riots, mass strikes and tax boycotts have been organised by Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, and popular committees have been set up to coordinate such activities and create alternative structures to the Israeli Civil Administration. They have organised, among other things, food distribution, medical relief, and educational programs. Some Palestinian employees of the Israeli Civil Administration, particularly police officials, have resigned from their posts. In their attempt to suppress such activities, the Israeli authorities resorted to various measures. A number of Palestinian newspapers and institutions were closed down and the popular committees proscribed. Currency restrictions were introduced to control money going to families and institutions in the Occupied Territories. New identity cards were issued in the Gaza Strip to monitor the population more closely. More than 60 Palestinians were served with deportation orders and 48 were actually deported. Villages, towns and refugee camps have been put under prolonged curfew, sometimes for a month or more, during which time electricity, water and telephones have often been disconnected. Trees have been uprooted and crops ruined. Dozens of Palestinian homes have been demolished or sealed up as punishment. During the first few months of the uprising hundreds of teenagers and young men were arrested, summarily tried on criminal charges, and sentenced to up to 18 months' imprisonment for throwing stones and setting up roadblocks. In March 1988, however, the Israeli authorities decided to make more use of administrative detention. More than 5000 Palestinians have been in administrative detention since the beginning of the Palestinian intifada most of them for six months; some repeatedly. At least 1,100 are reported to be on detention at present, the vast majority in harsh conditions in the Ketzlot detention centre in Israel. Administrative detention in Israel and the occupied territories can and has been abused to detain prisoners of conscience, held for the non-violent exercise of their right to freedom of expression and association.

The International Committee of the Red Cross, one of the few organisations still able to travel relatively freely in the occupied West Bank and Gaza, has accused the Israelis of deliberately stirring up tensions which culminated in Thursday's killing of at least four Palestinians in the West Bank village of Nahhalin "For five or six days before the killings, Israeli border guards had been systematically provoking the villagers by making religious and personal insults", an ICRC spokesman, Mr Carlos Bauverd, said. During the pre-dawn Israeli raid on Nahhalin, part of which was witnessed by the ICRC, Israeli soldiers opened fire "without discrimination and without restraint" he said. ... From the Nahhalin killings, the ICRC condemned Israel for an "increasingly frequent use of firearms and acts of physical violence against defenceless civilians". Mr Bauverd said that among recent violations of the Fourth Geneva Convention had been systematic violence against medical teams and ambulance drivers who were employed by the Red Cross and by the UN Works and Relief Agency for Palestinian Refugees. "These people have been pulled from their vehicles and beaten by Israeli soldiers. When drivers have tried to dismantle roadblocks to get to wounded people they have been arrested". ... Singled out for particular criticism was Israel's policy of deporting Palestinian activists to Lebanon, something which is outlawed under Article 49, collective punishments and the destruction of houses, and excessive violence against demonstrators. (Guardian 4/15/1989)

The role of the paramilitary Border Police in one of the bloodiest single incidents of the uprising has brought more unwelcome attention to a force that has often attracted controversy since it was founded as a professional frontier guard in 1953. Until the intifada erupted in 12/1987, its green-bereted men—known by their Hebrew acronym, Magavniks—had carried out most of the routine security duties in the West Bank. ... The Border Police, which answers to the Ministry of Police rather than Defence, is a 5500-strong regular force, although many of its lower ranks arrive after being rejected even as cooks or drivers by the army. Many hold extreme rightwing political views. ... (Guardian 5/8/1989)

Mr Shamir said in Tel Aviv that no effort would be spared to catch the murderers of Steven Rosenfeld, a 48-year-old American immigrant, found stabbed to death... near an Arab village adjoining the West Bank settlement of Ariel. He was the 21st Israeli to be killed during the intifada. About 520 Palestinians have been killed... "Israel's security forces will uphold this violence with an iron fist" Mr Shamir said, ... Ariel, with a population of 6,000, attracted controversy recently when it ordered refugees camps to be closed... (Guardian 6/25/1989)

In chilling proof that the Israeli Army has learned nothing in the 17 months since the intifada began, three Palestinians were killed and more than 140 injured in the Gaza Strip... hospital sources said, in the highest daily casualty toll since the uprising began 18 months ago. ... While the chief Israeli army spokesman, Brigadier-General Ephraim Lapid, said 77 people were taken to hospital. Gaza Strip hospitals reported treating twice as many victims. However, the UNRWA in Gaza said 400 Arabs were injured by gunfire, beatings or teargas inhalation on Saturday, Arab hospitals in Gaza said troops shot and wounded eight people in continuing protests yesterday. The violence occurred during the Muslim holiday of Id al-Fitr which is marked by prayers and visits to the grave of relatives. Gen Lapid said residents of Nuseirat refugee camp provoked the most serious violence. ... helicopter dropped teargas canisters and troop reinforcements were called in. In the clash, two people were shot and at least 42 people, including two Israeli soldiers were wounded. (Guardian 5/8/1989)

... Mr Shamir said in Tel Aviv that no effort would be spared to catch the murderers of Steven Rosenfeld, a 48-year-old American immigrant, found stabbed to death... near an Arab village adjoining the West Bank settlement of Ariel. He was the 21st Israeli to be killed during the intifada. About 520 Palestinians have been killed... "Israel's security forces will uphold this violence with an iron fist" Mr Shamir said, ... Ariel, with a population of 6,000, attracted controversy recently when it ordered Palestinian refugees camps to be closed... (Guardian 6/25/1989)

In chilling proof that the Israeli Army has learned nothing in the 17 months since the intifada began, three Palestinians were killed and more than 140 injured in the Gaza Strip over the weekend, while one soldier suffered a broken jaw... A second depressing aspect of the latest events is that the Israelis are still using lethal force against youngsters with stones and sling-shots—a seven-month-old girl was among those hit by bullets. Most depressing of all is that with 466 Palestinians dead, in spite of the renunciation of violence by the PLO and its recognition of Israel's right to exist within secure borders, a change of administration in Washington and a more moderate line from Mr Gorbatchev's Moscow, peace in the Middle East is as distant as ever. (The Independent 5/8/1989)

The Israeli Prime Minister, Mr Yitzhak Shamir, said yesterday that proposals for Palestinian elections in the occupied territories were more public relations than substance, reinforcing Arab accusations that the initiative was aimed at ending the intifada without conceding real political power to the Palestinians. He told a parliamentary committee that those elected would not form a parliament: "The elections have more importance from a public relations point of view than in a practical sense." (Guardian 6/27/1989)

As well as joining the kidnappers in the Lebanon the Israelis have been extending their territory there too. The Independent reported on the 25th April: While world attention has been focused on the crisis affecting Beirut and South Lebanon, Israel has been quietly extending the hold in areas to the south within its self-declared security zone. At the weekend, 300 farmers were evicted from their land just over the border from Israel. About 40 square miles of Lebanese territory were effectively annexed by the Israeli forces, according to Lebanese sources. It was the second instance this year of Lebanese citizens being expelled from their property in the south. In January, dozens of people were evicted from the Israeli-occupied town of Chebaa, on the eastern slopes of Mount Hermon, the snow-covered mountain ridge which forms the southern-eastern frontier between Israeli-occupied south Lebanon and Syria. It is at Chebaa that the 300 farmers have now arrived, together with what flocks and other possessions they were able to take with them. Having received no compensation for their lost land, they are now penniless and homeless.

Eight Palestinians, described by Israel as leaders of the uprising in the occupied territories, were deported to Lebanon yesterday, as the army went on alert to guard Jewish settlers planning mass marches in the West Bank today. The eight deportees, who were detained last August, included representatives of the mainstream Fatah movement and the leftwing Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. All had lost their appeals to the High Court. They were taken by helicopter to the Zumaria crossing point at the northern edge of Israel’s ‘security zone’ in southern Lebanon and ordered to cross into Syrian-controlled territory. The latest expulsions came as the authorities are seeking to streamline the process of deportation and increase the maximum single period of detention without trial from six months to a year. . . . The Shin Bet security service, meanwhile, was congratulating itself over Wednesday’s killing in Gaza of Muhammad Abu Nasser. . . . [He] was shot down m a taxi m what appeared to have been a pre-planned ambush. . . . (Guardian 6/30/1989)

In perhaps the most ominous development, the home in Jerusalem of a left-wing Knesset member, Dedi Zucker, was attacked. Mr Zucker, of the Citizens’ Rights Movement, and an outspoken critic of Israeli army excesses in the occupied territories, said youths involved in the attack shouted “Death to Arabs, death to Zucker” . . . . The attack on Mr Zucker’s house together with the jostling of the Labour Party leader, Shimon Peres, at the funeral of one of the victims on Friday, has had the leader writers raining against what Maavr calls “the terrible deterioration of Israeli society”. For The Jerusalem Post “Jews, the victims of racism themselves and are meting out collective punishment. The spectre of hatred is raging throughout the land, while passive bystanders allow the outrages to take place.” The fears of Maavr’s editorial writer that “the civil war is almost here” may seem hopelessly exaggerated. But passions are high, and Meir Kahane, the leader of the overtly racist Kahal movement, has little difficulty in tapping an underlying current of extremist feeling. (The Independent 7/10/1989)

“The [peace] initiative does not rule out the suppression of the intifada. We extend one hand for peace, and have the other hand free to strike at the rioters”, Mr Shamir said. Any hopes that he might show more flexibility on what the initiative terms the permanent settlement of Judea, Samaria (the West Bank) and Gaza were equally dashed. He ruled out the main Palestinian demands: an Israeli withdrawal and the establishment of a Palestinian state. “A Palestinian state will not arise and will not be.” Invoking an Old Testament oath, he declared: “Whoever says it—may his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth”. Later to the Knesset itself, he spelled out his adamantine opposition to trading any land for peace, thereby ensuring the near impossibility of any Arab side even discussing the proposal: “We will not give the Arabs a single centime. We will not give them anything. That is it.” (The Independent 5/18/1989)

The defence establishment has already started implementing what Shmuel Goren, Co-ordinator for Activities for the occupied territories, called a fundamental change in policy, to give the Palestinians a foretaste of the repressive measures they can expect if they reject Israeli election proposals. Tens of thousands of Gazans have been ordered to pack up their jobs on construction sites and in restaurants in Israeli proper. Mr Goren said permits for Gazans to work in Israel will only be given in future for legitimate reasons. And he said the next step would be formulating a comprehensive policy towards the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Last month one Likud minister proposed sealing the territories off from Israel as a punitive measure. This would deprive many families of their livelihoods, particularly in Gaza, where there is little work. However the proposal was rejected by . . . chief of general staff, Dan Shomron. “We should not bring the Arabs to the point where they have nothing to lose” he told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee. (The Independent 5/18/1989)

In the Gaza strip, men and women with computer terminals and Polaroid cameras began the lengthy process of issuing yet another identity card to Palestinian residents to increase the scrutiny and supervision of those hoping to work in Israel proper. Gaza itself was at a standstill, brought to a halt by two competing agents of control: the underground leadership of the intifada had called for days of strikes to mark the anniversary of the 1967 defeat, and the Israeli army had placed the 650000 people of Gaza under indefinite 24-hour curfew. The flash new cards bore magnetic strips, like credit cards. The information stored on these, a military spokesman explained, would help control employment in Israel proper. Despite the intifada . . . neither Israeli employers nor Palestinian workers have managed to disengage themselves economically. Tens of thousands of Gazans continue to work in Israel, doing the jobs that no self-respecting Jew will do, washing dishes, humping cement, or clearing garbage. Those with prison records or who have served in administrative detention (internment) will not get the new cards. (The Independent 6/3/1989)

Four young soldiers were acquitted yesterday by a military court of the manslaughter of a 42-year old Palestinian beaten to death after trying to protect his son from arrest. They were convicted of the lesser charge of brutality. The judges advocate agreed with the accused that the victim died not from the beating at his house but from wounds suffered later when he was held at an army outpost. They concluded that the culprits would never be found among the 20 or so other soldiers who participated in the beating. This was the first trial of soldiers accused of beating to death a Palestinian in their charge since the beginning of the uprising . . . . During the trial earlier this year, soldier after soldier testified about systematic brutality in an atmosphere of fear and racial loathing . . . . Dedi Zucker. Knesset member for the left-wing Citizens’ Rights Movement, called the verdict the most important since the beginning of the Intifada. He said it was the first time a court had questioned the army’s policy. Prosecutions and disciplinary actions have been rare; the army protects its own. Two weeks ago, an Israeli colonel escaped with dismissal for ordering soldiers to break the arms and legs of Palestinians already arrested. Since the uprising began in 12/1987, two soldiers have been convicted of manslaughter. Nearly 500 Palestinians have been shot dead or beaten to death in this period. (The Independent 5/26/1989).[=]
Although he would have won his seat by default. On August 28, Shaykh for in the Christian areas of much of Mount Lebanon, Beirut, and the elections, while reports suggest that Mr. Lahoud, who represents one 15%. Even according to Mr. Khatib’s figures, at best no more than one in controversial. Mr. Bakhos’s car was blown up as a warning to stay out of and in each of the two districts of Batroun and Koura it was no more than substantial progress on the return of the displaced by Christmas of this in Tripoli, 75% in Denniyeh in the Akkar, 20% in Batroun, 26% in Zgharta, displaced to what has become an almost exclusively Druze region. Mr. Mount Lebanon, and the South. Despite statements from Minister of the large part, motivated by the Kata’ib decision to withdraw its candidates significant message which came out of the elections in the North was the publically admitted that “if voter turnout in the elections does not exceed 50%, the next parliament may not be legitimate, although it will remain legal.” According to official figures, the turnout in the predominantly Christian regions boycotting the elections was as follows: 6.5% in Jubayl (where only 0.55% of the Christian electorate voted); 12% in Ba’abda; and 13% in the Metn. In predominantly Druze areas, where many Christian displaced are registered, the turnout was somewhat higher, but still low 27% in the Shouf and 20% in Aley. Observers noted that a vast majority of the displaced did not vote in the latter two regions, while the almost certain victories of the pro-Jubayl lists may have kept away Druze voters aware that their votes would not count for much in a Christian boycott of elections not only affected voter turnout, but candidacies as well. In the week before the first round of elections, a committee of five Maronite deputies sought to arrive at a compromise with the government to reschedule elections “until more favorable circumstances existed in which they could be held.” This included Foreign Minister Faris Buwayz, Mr. Nassib Lahoud, Mr. Pierre Helou, Mr. Auguste Bakhos, and Mr. Fuad al-Saad. Of the five, only Mr. Buwayz refused to present his candidacy for the elections when the government decided to go ahead with the vote on schedule. He also resigned from the cabinet on August 26, as did Mr. George Sa’adah. Observers noted that Mr. Buwayz’s decision was, in large part, motivated by the Kata’ib’s decision to withdraw its candidates from the elections. Mr. Helou and Mr. Sa’ad were in a peculiar situation, however: as Maronite candidates from Aley, both men argued that they could not boycott elections as this may hamper the return of the Christian displaced to what has become an almost exclusively Druze region. Mr. Helou vowed that he would resign from parliament if there was no substantial progress on the return of the displaced by Christmas of this year. The argument was not lost on Patriarch Nasrallah Sfeir, who stated that he “understood” the decision of the two deputies. The decision of Mr. Bakhos and Mr. Lahoud to participate in elections, however, was controversial. Mr. Bakhos’s car was blown up as a warning to stay out of the elections, while reports suggest that Mr. Lahoud, who represents one of the influential families in the Metn, was under pressure at least to remain off the Murr list. Mr. Buwayz’s decision not to participate in elections brought in its wake a wave of withdrawals from the electoral race in the Kisirwan. Shaykh Elias al-Khazen pulled out on August 27, although he would have won his seat by default. On August 28, Shaykh Rshaid al-Khazen, another Maronite from the Kisirwan, announced that he would not stand for elections. By August 29, only two candidates were left for five seats in the Kisirwan, and by election day only one. Elections were postponed until a later date, with Mr. Sami Khwayer, an ally of Mr. Elie Hobeika, as the sole candidate left. In Ba’abda, the significant event was the victory of another Hizballah candidate, Mr. Ali Ammar. With the victory of Muhammad Birjawi in Beirut, the election of Mr. Ammar brought Hizballah representation in parliament to six, counting those elected in the Shia list. Thisfigureis expected to rise after the third round of voting in South Lebanon. Observers suggested, however, that Mr. Ammar benefited greatly from the Christian boycott, since there was no possibility that a more moderate opponent could be voted in by Christian voters. Perhaps most embarrassing for the government were the elections in the qada’ of Jubayl. Not only was voter participation there exceptionally low, but in a number of villages, local inhabitants refused to allow buildings to be used as polling stations by state employees. In some cases, officials were forced to pitch tents or open polling stations in the trunks of their cars. In a record of sorts, Mrs. Maha Khoury As’ad won her Jubayl seat with only forty-one votes, from a total electorate of some 60000. [-] 30016. ————. “The Rejections By Region: The North: Islamists Break Through Official Karameh-Franjieh List”, in Lebanon Report, September 1992. Elections in the North took place on August 23, and were conducted on the basis of the muhafazah. In the city of Tripoli, the winners were, for the Sunni seats, Mr. Omar Karami (72358 votes), Mr. Amin al-Haif (56376), Mr. Muhammad Kabbaba (54354), Mr. Omar Mikawi (46988), and Shaykh Fathy Yakan (46393); for the Alawi seat, Mr. Ali Eid (60078); for the Maronite seat, Mr. Jean Ubayd (56385); and for the Greek Orthodox seat, Mr. Salim Habib (40020). In Tripoli district, the winners were for the three Sunni seats, Mr. Salih Khayr (49623), Mr. Mahmoud Tibbo (43055), and Mr. As ad Harmouch (3208). In the Akkar district, the winners were, for the Sunni seats, Mr. Waji Bani’ni (68934), Mr. Talal Miri’bi (62062), and Mr. Hassan Izzidin (41844); for the Greek Orthodox seats, Mr. Abdallah al-Rasi (47872) and Mr. Riyad Sarraf (42369); for the Maronite seat, Mr. Mikhail Daher (63701); and for the Alawi seat, Mr. Abd al-Rahman Abd al-Rahman (61700). In the Zgharta district, the three Maronite seats were won by Mrs. Nayla Mu’awad (90595), Mr. Sulayman Tony Franjieh (57038), and Mr. Estephan Naddaf (68470). In the Koura district, the three Greek Orthodox seats were won by Mr. Salim Sa’adah (51179), Mr. Farid Makari (50800), and Mr. Fayiz Ghosn (48188). In the Bsharreh district, the two Maronite seats were won by Mr. Qabalan Isa al-Khouri (51781) and Mr. Habib Kayrouz (51324). In the Batroun district, the two Maronite seats were won by Mr. Sayid Aqi (49950) and Mr. Manuel Younes (48682). While the results of the elections showed an overwhelming victory for Mr. Karami in the “List of National coalition” (25 of 28 seats), the final tally indicated that Mr. Karami had won 72358 votes, placing him only third on his list in terms of the total number of votes accumulated. Mrs. Nayla Mu’awad finished first on Mr. Karami’s list with over 90000 votes, while Mr. Sulayman Tony Franjieh, also on the list, won over 75000 votes. Perhaps the most significant message which came out of the elections in the North was the relatively low voter turnout. The North was generally assumed to be the region most enthusiastic towards elections, and both the government and opposition saw it as a test case for future voter participation in Beirut, Mount Lebanon, and the South. Despite statements from Minister of the Interior Sami al-Khatib that the turnout in the North varied between 65% in Tripoli, 75% in Denniyeh in the Akkar, 20% in Batroun, 26% in Zgharta, and 15% in Bsharreh, figures released by verification committees charged with counting the votes showed a different picture: in Bsharreh for example, the turnout was only 7.5%, while in Tripoli it was about 40%, and in each of the two districts of Batroun and Koura it was no more than 15%. Even according to Mr. Khatib’s figures, at best no more than one in four voters participated in elections in the predominantly Christian regions of the North.

This was significant given the fact that the Christian North had not publicly associated itself with the movement to boycott elections called for in the Christian areas of much of Mount Lebanon, Beirut, and the South. It is generally assumed that Mr. Karami’s list had official approval, and included a number of political figures acceptable to Syria. Yet on August 9, Mr. Karami publicly complained that candidates were being imposed on him in the formation of his list, and that he did not have a sufficient margin of maneuver. It was reported that Mr. Karami intended to pull out of the elections, although he later denied it. Analysts noted that the episode probably signaled that Mr. Franjiyyeh, the major Christian candidate on the Karami list, was putting pressure on Mr. Karami to accept an alliance with the Syrians. On the eve of the elections, Stycked on the priority list of the Syrians leaned towards Mr. Franjiyyeh, and that Mr. Karami reacted in the way he Karami after his limited victory did to reestablish the "margin of maneuver" he complained had been taken away from him. Indicating a trend that was repeated elsewhere, two members of the Sunni fundamentalist group al-Jamahir al-Islamiyyah succeeded in breaking the virtual monopoly of the officially-sanctioned list. Shaykh Fathi Yakan won a seat in Tripoli, although there were few overtly religious themes in his campaign: he appeared in his posters wearing layman's clothes, and introduced his name with the title "Doctor" rather than "Shaykh." In Tripoli district, a second Jamah candidate, As'ad Harmoush, also won a seat. Meanwhile, only one candidate was elected from a list headed by Mr. Karami's cousin, Mr. Ahmad Karami, namely Mr. Riyad Sarraf, for the Akkar. In Batroun, the significant event was the withdrawal of Mr. Boutros Harb and Mr. George Sa'adeh from the electoral race. Mr. Harb, who had been minister of education in the previous Karami government, denounced the holding of elections under current conditions, noting that the government "had at no time been able to give a valid and convincing explanation for its stubbornness in holding elections at the present time." Mr. Sa'adeh, who is also the head of the Kata'ib party, and four other Kata'ib candidates had registered their candidacies for elections in the North, but under increasing pressure from within the Christian community, they withdrew on August 14. The Kata'ib decision was an important turning point in bringing about the withdrawal of other candidates elsewhere, especially since the party had been trying in recent months to remodel its image and appear as a national party, rather than as a parochial Christian one. Meanwhile, Mr. Sayid Aql, who won one of the Batroun seats, was expelled from the National Bloc headed by Mr. Raymond Eddeh for having decided to participate in elections. The National Bloc and Mr. Eddeh have repeatedly denounced what they refer to as elections "held in the shadow of occupation by foreign armed forces." According to observers, the voting in the North was characterized by tension between partisans of the various candidates, which led to fights, exchanges of insults, and worse. For example, on election day, a group of journalists from the newspaper al-Diyar were apprehended and beaten by armed men. The journalists accused men loyal to Mr. Omar Karami of having carried out the attack because al-Diyar's owner, Mr. Charles Ayyoub, was a candidate on the rival list of Mr. Ahmad Karami. On August 28, eight unsuccessful candidates called for the formation of a commission of inquiry to look into accusations of electoral fraud. The request came at a time when the debate within political circles centered around the long-awaited formation of a Constitutional Council to "arbitrate conflicts that arise from parliamentary and presidential elections," as stipulated in article 19 of the new Lebanese constitution. The draft law for the establishment of the Council was passed by the government, but has yet to be acted on by parliament. In the interim, arbitration of electoral disputes is to be carried out by a parliamentary commission comprised of members of the new parliament. Critics charge that it is absurd to believe that the new parliamentarians will arbitrate objectively in disputes which may have a bearing on their own political future in the legislature. [-]

All is not well with the Lebanese family. This is seen not only in the falling birth rate—which may not be a bad thing in overpopulated Lebanon—but also in the decline of marriages and a rise in divorce. Accurate statistics are hard to come by, but indications are that the marriage rate has fallen by about a quarter from pre-civil war levels while divorces have risen by about 30%.

Fewer weddings are taking place for many reasons, most of them related to the country's dismal economy. The cost of living is high, jobs are few and wages are low, while housing is expensive and difficult to find. In addition, many young men pursuing their education elsewhere may in the country where they are studying.

A lawyer on the staff of Beirut's Sunni Moslem religious court, which regulates questions of marriage and divorce among the Sunnite community, suggested that marriages registered by his court had fallen by as much as 60% since 1982. A source at the Christian Greek Orthodox religious court in Beirut said that marriages went down by about 25% in the 1980s from levels of the preceding decade.

Between 30 and 40% of Christian marriages are estimated to have ended in divorce, compared with about 10% in 1975, when the civil war began. Records of the Moslem Shite religious court in 1990 showed that there were 3056 marriages and 869 divorces—a divorce rate of 26%. Factors contributing to this increase are poverty and displacement, with many Lebanese forced to live away from home and to practice a profession or trade not of their own.

Many of the divorces amounted to a retreat from marriage when couples found themselves unable to cope with formidable economic pressures. The average family income, according to statistics published by the General Labour Confederation, is about US$110—hardly enough to cover the basic food, shelter and clothing needs of a family of four or five.

The dearth of affordable housing is always a burden for a young couple just starting out. A flat of two or three rooms and two bathrooms is normally rented out at $200-300. Furthermore, many landlords refuse to issue contracts, enabling them to raise rents and evict tenants at will. An option is to buy an apartment—which can cost as much as $150000 to $250000 for three rooms and two bathrooms without hot water, central heating or telephone.

School fees and health care are other burdens. In Beirut, the annual tuition for the elementary grades in well-known private schools is about $2000. Medicines must be imported and therefore are expensive. About 16% of the population is of working age, and there are few and wages are low, while housing is expensive and difficult to find. In addition, many young men pursuing their education elsewhere may in the country where they are studying.

A lawyer on the staff of Beirut's Sunni Moslem religious court, which regulates questions of marriage and divorce among the Sunnite community, suggested that marriages registered by his court had fallen by as much as 60% since 1982. A source at the Christian Greek Orthodox religious court in Beirut said that marriages went down by about 25% in the 1980s from levels of the preceding decade.

Between 30 and 40% of Christian marriages are estimated to have ended in divorce, compared with about 10% in 1975, when the civil war began. Records of the Moslem Shite religious court in 1990 showed that there were 3056 marriages and 869 divorces—a divorce rate of 26%. Factors contributing to this increase are poverty and displacement, with many Lebanese forced to live away from home and to practice a profession or trade not of their own.

Many of the divorces amounted to a retreat from marriage when couples found themselves unable to cope with formidable economic pressures. The average family income, according to statistics published by the General Labour Confederation, is about US$110—hardly enough to cover the basic food, shelter and clothing needs of a family of four or five.

The dearth of affordable housing is always a burden for a young couple just starting out. A flat of two or three rooms and two bathrooms is normally rented out at $200-300. Furthermore, many landlords refuse to issue contracts, enabling them to raise rents and evict tenants at will. An option is to buy an apartment—which can cost as much as $150000 to $250000 for three rooms and two bathrooms without hot water, central heating or telephone.

School fees and health care are other burdens. In Beirut, the annual tuition for the elementary grades in well-known private schools is about $2000. Medicines must be imported and therefore are expensive. Doctor's fees range between $50 to $100 per visit, and a stay in the hospital for any length of time can bankrupt a family. In the past, Lebanese who found the going at home too tough might think of emigrating, as tens of thousands have done since the start of the civil war. Emigration to Canada, Australia, the United States, France and Africa was once common but now the cost of an airline ticket is virtually out of reach of most Lebanese.

"We can no longer leave this country, nor can we stay and lead an acceptable life," is a common complaint. Sixteen years of civil war have left the Lebanese family in a bind from which there seems to be no foreseeable deliverance.

[Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Services, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]
Concerned at the situation in the Occupied Gaza Strip. London: Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 17, 1993. p. 11, 30022. Amnesty International; International Secretariat. Press Release: condemnation of the PLO as a consequence of the deportations, again led the Gaza Strip on 16 May. Fatah -- the main faction of the Palestinian nationalist movement -- made a series of major concessions before the start of talks: hence, for Palestinians alleged to have collaborated with the Israeli authorities, the Madrid process required the Palestinians to begin with increased number of killings of Israeli civilians, as well as of a number of other refugees and rescue workers tried to save them. Still without an official death toll, many bodies were vaporized by the repeated Israeli attacks on the refugees in the UNIFIL camp. Most of the deaths came as Israeli 155mm shells slammed repeatedly into a large mess hall. Many surviving children had multiple amputations.

30021. Alin, Erika G. "West Bank and Gaza Palestinians and the Peace Process", in Journal of Critical Studies of Iran & the Middle East, Fall 1993. pp. 13-34. In 10/1991 direct Arab-Israeli peace talks started for the first time in 40 years, following the years of the Intifadah which brought greater attention onto the Gaza Strip and West Bank. The talks were based on the Palestinian willingness, as the weakest party, to compromise on being represented by the PLO. However, Palestinian opposition to the peace process has been considerable: many Palestinian question whether the present peace process is capable of resulting in a meaningful fulfillment of their nationalist aspirations. Palestinian nationalism has emerged as a consequence of the inability of Arab states to successfully confront Israeli military power. By 1974, the Palestine National Council endorsed the principle that a Palestinian state could exist only within the Occupied Territories. Similarly, in the mid-1970s, in the Occupied Territories, the emergence of a large migratory Palestinian work force undermined the traditional rural sociopolitical order, and led to a radicalized urban nationalism among Palestinians. By the end of the 1970s, this led to the spontaneous emergence of a broad spectrum of local community organizations in the Occupied Territories, including student, youth, professional, volunteer, labor and women's committees. These provided the training ground for independent Palestinian institutional development. By the early 1980s, Palestinians were coming to recognize that the only basis for an independent Palestine would be political compromise with Israel: much of this was rooted in the belief (documented by Abdul Sattar Kassem in 1982) that for much of the Arab world the issue of the Palestinians was unimportant. The Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the emergence of the Intifadah solidified the Gaza and West Bank Palestinians focus on a political settlement with Israel: just as the invasion limited the ability of the PLO of affect events in the Occupied Territories, the intifadah deepened the growth of independent institutional development. The 1980s saw a sustained effort by West Bank and Gaza intellectuals to both shift the public perception of the PLO towards that of a diplomatic organization, and to shift the willingness of Palestinians to accept a political compromise. While Palestinians were divided as to whether of not the Madrid conference was desirable, in general factions among Palestinians on this question reflected the underlying factions within the Palestinian nationalist movement: in general, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza were skeptical about the peace process being able to fulfill their national aspirations. In addition, Palestinian suspicions were reinforced by Israeli unwillingness to slow the pace of new illegal settlements and by Israeli insistence on a very limited form of Palestinian autonomy. The US also gave Israel $10 billion in loan guarantees without requiring Israel to end settlement expansion. The Madrid process required the Palestinians to begin with a whole series of major concessions before the start of talks: hence, for many Palestinians the major effect of the Madrid talks was to call into question the legitimacy and the judgement of the PLO. Further, the mass expulsion of 400 Palestinians during the peace talks, and the Hamas condernation of the PLO as a consequence of the deportations, again led to questioning of the role of the PLO in the talks. Even if the peace process leads to elections, it is clear that the PLO will probably lose in free elections.

30022. Amnesty International; International Secretariat. Press Release: Israel And The Occupied Territories: Amnesty International Extremely Concerned At The Situation In The Occupied Gaza Strip. London: Amnesty International; International Secretariat [1 Easton Street, London WC1X 8DJ, UK], May 27, 1993. Amnesty International is extremely concerned at the deteriorating human rights situation in the Gaza Strip, occupied by Israel since 1967. It is particularly concerned about the upsurge in killings of Palestinian civilians by Israeli forces since the deportation to south Lebanon of more than 400 alleged supporters of the Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas) and Islamic Jihad in 12/1992. Since then, more than 100 Palestinians have been shot and killed by Israeli forces, at least 70 in the Gaza Strip. More than 30 were 16-years-old or younger. The month of May has already registered the highest monthly death toll since the end of 1992, with up to 24 people killed by Israeli forces, up to 19 of these in the Gaza Strip. Amnesty International believes that many of these killings are absolutely unjustifiable, and that some may amount to extra-judicial executions. It calls on the Israeli authorities to take urgent measures to redress this situation and to prevent the death toll at the hands of its forces from rising still further. Amnesty International is also concerned that the use of massive firepower by Israeli forces against dwellings in which Palestinians suspected of having committed serious crimes, such as participation in the killings of Israelis or other Palestinians, are alleged to be hiding in any amount to collective punishment. In May an Amnesty International delegation comprised of a staff member from the International Secretariat and Major Allan Hugstad, an officer in the Danish Army, visited Israel and the Gaza Strip to investigate recent cases of killings by Israeli forces and cases of house destruction. They also discussed the guidelines for the use of firearms and on house destruction operations with Israeli Defence Force (IDF) officials. The delegates also requested information on a number of individual cases. Cases of particular concern are those of people who were shot dead while apparently not engaging in any violent activity. They include: Rana Abu Tuyur, aged 11, killed on 12/19/1992 during clashes in Khan Yunis while on her way to buy milk; Rizq al-Fara, aged 19, shot dead on the same day while standing on his balcony after having gone to help carry Rana Abu Tuyur to a car; Maher al-Maja'idad, aged 8, shot dead in the street in Khan Yunis on 20 March 1993; Re'edah al-Garra, aged 13, shot by a soldier on 4/8/1993 while she was standing by the corner of her house; Najah Abu Dalal, a 34-year-old mother of six who died on 4/26/1993 after being shot in the head on 21 April by a soldier stationed on a tall building nearby while she was standing in a private courtyard; Fu'ad Timraz, aged 20, killed on 5/12/1993 in Deir al-Balah Refugee Camp by a single shot to the head also from a tall building nearby; and Fares al-Kurdi, aged 18 months, shot dead on 5/16/1993 during clashes in Jabalia Refugee Camp while he was sheltering in a shop doorway. The IDF has undertaken to provide Amnesty International with information on these cases. The Amnesty International delegation also visited scenes of houses destroyed by the IDF during operations said to be aimed at capturing Palestinians wanted for arrest. The buildings were massively destroyed and had been rendered uninhabitable. Amnesty International fears that the large number of houses damaged in each operation and the extent of the damage indicates that one of the aims, if not the main aim, of these operations is to impose a form of collective punishment on the inhabitants. This is reinforced by evidence that at least some of the dwellings may have been blown up from the inside after soldiers had completed their search and arrest operations. Amnesty International is awaiting clarification of such evidence from the IDF. Armed Palestinians have been responsible for an increased number of killings of Israeli civilians, as well as a number of Palestinians alleged to have collaborated with the Israeli authorities, since December. Responsibility for some of these attacks has been claimed by armed Palestinian groups, like the killing of two Israeli civilians and two Palestinians while engaged in a business transaction in the Gaza Strip on 16 May. Fatah -- the main faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) -- and Hamas acknowledged joint responsibility for their deaths. Amnesty International condemns such deliberate and arbitrary killings, and appeals to the PLO and Hamas to stop them. [ ] cultural values, others consider it purely a failure of gender responsibility; i.e., women alone are responsible for this perceived lack of progress.

Literature is art, an expression of natural talent, and has little to do with whether one is a man or woman.

The concept of "feminism," for example, is now part of our global dictionary, its meaning and interpretation both applauded and decried. In modern literary criticism, another relatively new concept has appeared: "so-called" women's or feminist literature. With many definitions and appearances in numerous critical reviews, this issue continues to attract controversy.

I use the term "so-called" women's literature because there has never been any clear-cut definition of Arab women's literature. Most Arab critics, men, define it with vague, non-descriptive terms. Yet they all seem to agree that it is written by women, or deals with women's issues including emancipation, oppression, and denial of basic rights. However, some of these critics' pronouncements should be weighted with care since they seem strangely unaware of the extent to which their male prejudices taint their appreciation of the writings of women.

The view that male dominance in highly traditional Arab culture is primarily responsible for the slow growth of women's literature holds great sway at first glance. To a large extent, such potent obstacles to self-expression among women did influence women's writing and imposed considerable restrictions on women's freedom within the framework of the extended family.

The wider Arab society holds its own views on such issues. Living under the inhibiting restrictions of an earlier age, women did not have an adequate opportunity to share in the benefits accrued from the inevitable socio-economic changes that have occurred in different parts of the Arab world.

Such a lifestyle may well have harbored the spirit of change, but at the same time, it undoubtedly goaded women into raising their voices against the rigidity of the social structure and fueled their demands for greater social freedom. Numerous Arab women writers have criticized the position of women in the Arab world. The position of woman, they claimed, has become unbearable, particularly in regard to such matters as education; virginity and marriage; the concept of honor and dignity; and individual freedom, all of which are weighed on unbalanced scales. They called for a rethinking of men's relationships with every form of male authority - husbands, fathers, brothers and sons - and for the creation of a new understanding between men and women in our society.

The voice of women was first heard in the latter part of the 19th century with the appearance of essays, stories, poetry and articles on "women's issues" in various magazines and newspapers in certain parts of the Arab world. Writers of note during this period were: Wardah al-Yazji (1850-1914), Azynab Fawwaz (1850-1914), Labibah Hashim (1882-1952), Saima Sayegh (1889-1953), and Hana Kaslani Kurani (1870-1898). These women paved the way for the next generation of women writers, allowing their successors to take part in the development of the women's literary movement.

It should be noted that journalism played an important role in popularizing these women. Since the early part of this century, other women writers have emerged, displaying even greater resolve and courage in raising and discussing women's issues. Among these authors were Bahithat al-Badiyah (1886-1918) and Mayy Ziyadah (1886-1941).

The articles of al-Badiyah began to appear in Al-Jaridah newspaper in Cairo as early as 1907. In 1911, she published her most widely known book, entitled "Nisa'iyat" (Feminist Essays), a collection of several articles about prominent women in the Middle East. Her work is regarded by many as a landmark in Arab literature.

Ziyadah in particular admired the book, and as a result, wrote a critical study of the life and works of al-Badiyah. In her personal letters to al-Badiyah, Ziyadah gave encouragement and support to al-Badiyah's defense of women's rights. In one of her letters she writes:

"The days pass and we [women] are still in an unspeakable state of confusion. Man struggles in an economic war, he busies himself with many undertakings. When he wants to write literature, he does not reach the level of women's sentiments, for he writes from the viewpoint of his egotistic thinking and hardheartedness, whereas the woman enlivens her mind, emotions and passions."

She then calls upon al-Badiyah to combine her efforts with those of others in attempting to rescue this generation from "perplexity and hesitation," and asks her to help liberate women by making them aware of their social responsibilities.

The writings of Ziyadah, herself, during this period are considered to be an important contribution to women's literature because of their ringing endorsement of the emancipation of women.

Born in Nazareth of a Lebanese father and Palestinian mother in 1866, she lived for some time in Cairo. Then in 1914, at the age of 28, her home became a literary salon. Some of the most prominent writers of the time, including Taha Hussein, Lutfi al-Sayyid, Mustafa Abd al-Raziq, Mansur Fahmi, Khalil Mutran and others, were frequent visitors to her salon.

Ziyadah had great influence on the literary life of the times due to her charm and intelligence and her charismatic personality. Her articles were in such demand by the readers of the Egyptian Al-Ahram daily newspaper that they dominated its front pages.

She is the author of a number of books that include "Equality," in which she calls for a society based on equality and justice with the full participation of women.

Ziyadah personified the cause of the Arab woman, analyzing the various significant factors in their lives, such as rights and obligations. Her major emphasis is given to the biological and social problems related to the nature of women. In a letter to the renowned Lebanese writer Khalil Gibran, she wrote:

"I basically share with you some opinions about women's liberation. Like many, a woman should have her own choice of spouse from among young people, according to her own desire and taste and without coercion from any quarter."

Her understanding of the role of women appears more clearly in a letter to the writer Lutfi al-Sayyid concerning the memorial ceremony on the 40th day after the death of Fathi Zaghul Pasha. In this letter she blames him for not extending invitations to women:

"It is strange that you did not invite women to such an important meeting, which might have a great impact on their way of life, open their minds to the importance of education, and teach them about the greatness of their fatherland and its noble personalities, whereas you do allow them to frequent the opera house."

The women writers of this era wrote in a number of literary forms: articles, essays, anthologies of poetry, and short stories. The output of short stories and novels was not abundant. It appears that most women writers of that day thought it best to deal with specific non-fictional subjects, concentrating mainly on educational and moral issues and confining themselves to traditional social commentary, for which fiction is not the best medium.

Up to the end of WWII, most works by Arab women were dominated by the sad and melancholy characteristics which reflected women's feelings within the context of their subjugation to the prevailing traditional, civic and religious codes. But paradoxically enough, female writers at the time displayed a genuine respect for tradition, coupled with a respect for emancipation.

Such issues are reflected in the work of Widad Sakakini, "Peoples Mirrors," written in Cairo in 1947. Sakakini was a writer who, through her stories, analyzed social events essentially from a feminist standpoint. She may be regarded as a defender of women's rights, but not a strenuous one. The majority of women writers focused mainly on the emotional aspects of women's problems. They did not discuss in depth any other matters related to an individual woman's political, social, or intellectual aspirations, nor did they advocate any real fundamental changes in her life.

Above all, writers such as Ziyadah, Bahithat, al-Badiyah, and Fawwaz seemed to be very much aware of the obstacles they had to overcome and the struggle they had been forced to wage in their attempts to assert the needs and rights of women. These obstacles include social and religious pressures, as well as women's economic and political powerlessness. All these matters were further complicated by the long and hated domination of the Ottoman empire and later by the unsettling effect of Western imperialism. Imperialism oppressed many parts of the Arab world and its removal demanded continued struggle. It directly dominated the men, and as Qasim Amin states in his 1980 book, "Women's Liberation: In the East, we find the woman is in man's bondage and the man is in the government's bondage."

"When the women enjoy their personal freedom, the men enjoy their political freedom. The two cases are well-interwoven."

At the same time, Amin stresses that men has monopolized all rights, leaving nothing for the woman but what the master throws to his animal. The woman has been separated from the means of production and left without any economic independence. Amin goes further and draws a parallel between the woman's condition of lagging behind and the dominance of despotic and military regimes.

The spread and influence of imperialism throughout the Arab world preoccupied the people of the Middle East, both in their resistance to its influence and in their struggle for respective freedoms. It led the way to national revolutions in Egypt, Algeria and Palestine. In turn, these countries witnessed national independence heralding dramatic changes of a political, social and economic nature.

The women's literary movement drew momentum from this radicalization of their environment, and drew space under the impact of Western culture and the development of certain social and educational institutions. It thereby became possible for women to wield greater influence in many parts of the Arab world.

Certain Arab countries succeeded in gaining their sovereignty while others experienced a new form of occupation. Lebanon nurtured a new intellectual openness, while the Revolution of 1952 in Egypt generated radical social change, whose influence was felt not only in Egypt but also in the surrounding Arab countries. The principles and events of these two national movements, among others, affected the hearts and minds of the inhabitants, especially women.

Palestine, with its particularly rich literary past, was to know foreign invasion and military occupation. The calamity of Israel's establishment in 1948 carried great impact upon all aspects of national and cultural life, sweeping up in its wake the struggle of women and giving fresh material to a new generation of writers.

During the late '40s and into the '50s, many women writers appeared in the Arab world. One of them was the Lebanese writer Layla Ba'albaki, author of "I Live" and "A spaceship of Tenderness to the degradation experienced by the Muslim poor. As the Phalangists seized apartment blocks of the Lebanon's wealthy, lies the poverty and degradation experienced by the Muslim poor. As the Phalangists seized Karantina, more than two hundred civilians were massacred. Among those who witnessed the cold-blooded murder of the Muslims, were Martin Meredith and Donald McCullin of The Sunday Times. Donald McCullin recalls: "The first killing I saw I took for a random event. I was running through the alleys with the Phalange forward line. Two men came out of a house with their women and children. The women and kids were driven away. I ran after them to photograph and as I came back I saw the two men falling. They had been shot at point-blank range. "Then in the centre of the ghetto, I saw a man shot in front of a wrecked bus. He was middle-aged, obviously a civilian. I shot the man lying face-down beside the dead, middle-aged man. I took them to be husband and wife—they were close together, and had a few possessions scattered around them. Someone had set the woman's clothes on fire. I began to assume this was part of a pattern." The following day McCullin returned to Karantina, and his eye-witness account resumes: "As soon as we got into the area, we saw bodies everywhere. Not only men had been massacred, but women as well—though no children as far as I saw. There were bodies hanging half-out of windows, or in the middle of the street. There was a man lying beside his dog, who had been shot with him. "In the eleven years I have been covering wars I have never seen so much human carnage. I suppose Martin and I must have seen seventy bodies. And we did not look into houses, or everywhere they could have been."
of Arabic language and literature at Duke university, and author of War's Other Voices: Lebanese Civil War 1975-82. Cambridge: Cambridge university Press (forthcoming) She has written various articles and hooks on modern Arabic literature and feminist literary criticism, and is currently working with Margot sadran on an anthology of Arab womens writings Of the 19th and 20th centuries.] The War is one of the most important things in my life. It can't really be called writing. I found myself looking through a small, very filled with a stream of the omnipresent, extra-ordinary events. I was wrenched out of the mouth of a kalashnikov provided at once the subject and the endless flow of danger. There was no space could provide shelter against the ubiquity of danger. There was no longer any difference between the experiences of the home and the street. Private and public merged; more, they were wrenched into each other. This war has been variously described as economic, religious, political, civil and international. Economic because of the rapidly growing poverty belt of refugees from the Israeli-threatened South which was tightening its hold on the bourgeois centre of power. Religious because of widespread dissatisfaction amongst the various religious communities that proportional representation along confessionals lines was no longer equitable. Political because it represented a power struggle amongst communities or groups defined not as religious but as political units, e.g., Nasserist, Nationalist Socialist, Ba'hist. Civil because it was a crisis of tensions that generally embroiled the citizenry of the whole of Lebanon. International because it pitted Lebanese against Palestinians, and also engaged in perpetual conflict dozens of local militias who were supported by religious, political, or economic powers. This war has been variously described as economic, religious, political, civil and international. Economic because of the rapidly growing poverty belt of refugees from the Israeli-threatened South which was tightening its hold on the bourgeois centre of power. Religious because of widespread dissatisfaction amongst the various religious communities that proportional representation along confessionals lines was no longer equitable. Political because it represented a power struggle amongst communities or groups defined not as religious but as political units, e.g., Nasserist, Nationalist Socialist, Ba'hist. Civil because it was a crisis of tensions that generally embroiled the citizenry of the whole of Lebanon. International because it pitted Lebanese against Palestinians, and also engaged in perpetual conflict dozens of local militias who were supported by religious, political, or economic powers. The Beirut Decentrists described a 'situation' for which all were answerable, yet most—and particularly the men—resolutely rejected responsibility. In the literature of the Beirut Decentrists, the women stay in Lebanon and wait without a clear sense of why. The men fly to Paris, London and the Gulf states rattling off fine sounding excuses, or they stay to fight themselves irrationally into a war of gangfights. The issue of responsibility did not become central until the end of the 1970s when a protracted period of relative peace allowed the writers to venture assessments of behaviour. The Beirut Decentrists criticised those who left Lebanon in its time of need. Many also hinted at a radical transformation in identity. They described those who had left as having forfeited their right to belong. In all pre-1975 writings that deal with the question of emigration, it is axiomatic that whereas the men were expected to leave for a while, make good and then return to brighten the twilight years of aged parents and to conjure up images of dolce vita in the dreams of potential village brides, the women, especially rural women, were expected to wait. They were condemned to live in the shadow of tradition, excluded from the world of change that was Beirut, identified in the minds of many with the mahjar or lands of emigration. Should they decide to defy convention and follow the men, even if only to Beirut, they became outcasts. With the advance of the twentieth century, writers began to investigate the gulf between Beirut and the village, between modern and traditional life, between expected behaviour for men and for women. Were such dichotomies still possible? Or was it an evolving beyond the war that would make the unchanging reification of an idealised past? If change was to be introduced, how much could be accommodated? How? How quickly? Did any modification of the status quo threaten the villagers' identity? With the war, writers could no longer indulge in the luxury of idle reflection. The war, and all the change that it necessarily connoted, forced itself into the villagers' consciousness. Emily Nasrallah, a Decentrist whose entire oeuvre from 1982 until today, focuses on this dichotomy between modern and traditional, between Beirut and the Lebanese village, between men and women, has dramatised the incursion of the war onto village life. Radwan, the protagonist of her 1981 novel Flight Against Time, describes the latest air raid: '... the Israeli planes used burning bombs they called "napalm" and then "cluster" bombs.' [Flight Against Time (Ali-Qua aks al-zaman), Beirut, Muassasat Naufal 1981, p. 43. Hereafter, all page references will be included in the essay.] Later, he sees three planes swoop down on a village protected by four other planes that 'formed an air shield (that was a term he had heard on the radio: air shield). That was how they had bombarded Naha-al-Hasban (p. 56). The experiences in the village and those in Beirut became war experiences and survival became the key. The illiterate villager was sharing the fate of the sophisticated Beirut. As these two poles began to approach each other, attitudes to emigration began to change. Writers were no longer concerned with the female villagers' move to Beirut, but with the Lebanese citizens' move to the mahjar. The writings of the Decentrists epitomise the changing attitude of those who stayed in Lebanon vis-a-vis those who left. At first, when the violence was intense and peace was still being discussed as a not too distant prospect, there was little opprobrium attached to those who left for Europe or the Gulf. Those who stayed—mostly women and children (In the section on Lebanese womenmen, Rose Ghurayib writes that by 1980, 35% of Lebanese households were headed by women; this is especially striking in an Arab country, Robin Morgan (ed.) Sisterhood Is Global, New York: Anchor Books, 1984, p. 418—stayed out of necessity or out of some dimly perceived notion of responsibility to others or to the country. However, as the violence persisted beyond all predictions of its ending and not all who stayed were killed or even injured, a new assessment emerged; those who left before and during the war no longer had a right to belong. All Lebanese had to stay in Lebanon to assure the survival of the country and of individual identity. Whereas most of the Beirut Decentrists’ literature published before 1979 merely hints at women’s steadfastness and men’s cowardly vacillation, by 1982 male protagonists had become explicit targets of the Beirut Decentrists’ bitterness. There is anger in this writing, but also a strange exaltation. Men who had always been the dominant class, to whom obedience had been an unquestioned duty, had proven themselves weak and unworthy. When the protagonist of Umayya Hamdan’s The Blue That Comes With The Wind (1980), challenges all who threaten her freedom of action, her male interlocutor complains: “You’re a woman and I’m an oriental man…. Deep in you are voices whose escape I fear.” [Umayya Hamdan, The Blue That Comes With The Wind (Al-azraq al-adim maa al-rih), Beirut 1980, p. 156.] As the patriarchal structure was falling apart, as the country was collapsing, women were finding a voice. The Beirut Decentrists recall the women writers on the First World War about whom Sandra Gilbert has written: “even though they mourned the devastation of the war . . . [they] felt that not only their society, but also their art had been subtly strengthened, or at least strangely inspired, by the deaths and defeats of male contemporaries.” [Sandra Gilbert, ‘Soldiers heart: literary, literary women, and the Great War’, in Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, VIII(3), Spring 1983, p. 446; see also p. 426.] Only in the Lebanese case, the men had not died nor had they been defeated. Decentrists like Nuha Samara describe men who had left the war zone for international capitals. From safe new homes, the men sent back tender letters, exhorting their wives to pray for peace so that they might return. [Nuha Samara, ’Two Faces One Woman’, in The Tables Lived Longer than Amin, Beirut: Manshurah Zuhair Balabak 1981, p. 112.] How could such an attitude foster gold star mother jingoism? [=]

30026. Cooke, Miriam. Women Write War: The Centering of the Beirut Decentrists: Part 2. Papers on Lebanon 6, Oxford, UK: Center for Lebanese Studies, July 1987. Then came the Israeli invasion. Within the space of a summer, dreams of renewal, models of patriotism were challenged. The war persisted but international intervention was no longer disguised. As Lebanon teetered on the edge of collapse, opportunism became rampant assuming an increasingly confessional aspect. Shi’as encouraged by Shi’i triumphs elsewhere mobilised. The relatively small though influential Druze community emphasised the construction of a new entity defined by the civil war context. The nature of Lebanese society was changing. This axiomatic mosaic was Lebanese females stayed, awaiting the return of their menfolk. From Schweifat she went on to earn her B.A. from the American University of Beirut. Throughout her university career she worked, writing articles and short stories for papers and journals to earn her keep. Her life was to be a model, an affirmation of a life for women beyond the narrow confines of traditional village life. In the meantime, however, she suffered the loneliness of the village girl in the big city and writing became her solace for absence. Writing became a passion. Her early writings, which include September Birds (1962) and The Oleander Tree (1968), reflect the concerns of Arab women writers of the 1950s and 1960s. Like Layla Ba’albaki and Colette Khuri, who wrote of the prison-house of domesticity and the stifling of women’s individuality within patriarchy. What was unique in the writings of Emily Nasrallah was her preoccupation with emigration. In 1962, Nasrallah published her first novel, September Birds, which won her acclaim at home and in the Arab world at large. This autobiographical novel recounts the story of Muna the village girl who witnesses the fates of her companions of the boys who leave, of the girls who stay, and of the boy who stays in the village and grows up to new situation impose a new role on the writer? A new function for writing? Before 1982, the Beirut Decentrists had consciously fragmented and subverted language so as to start anew. The fragmentation was for the construction of a new entity defined by the civil war context. The language available for the post-1982 writer was, therefore, either the language of the creatively fragmented wartime experience, or the language of the unfragmented remembrance of a pre-1973 Lebanon that had been consumed by the war. Writing, as in other novels, had to borrow from one of these two languages, for as Barthes writes in Language Degree Zero ‘Revolution must of necessity borrow from what it wants to destroy, the very image of what it wants to possess.’ [Roland Barthes, Writing Degree Zero, tr. Annette Lavers and Colin Smith, NY: Hill 8: Wang 1978, p. 87. Hereafter, all page references will be included in the essay.] Writing, therefore, was resisted. Writing was also resisted because as a discursive project it was not so much a communication as the expression of history and the stand we take in it” (Barthes, p. i). How could the writer express a stand in a totally incomprehensible history? Events were so fluid that the role of witness gave way to that of ‘incarnation of tragic awareness.’ (Barthes, p. 3). Writers had to communicate awareness not facts. But how could the writer communicate when writing resisted communication? The instrumentality of communication had to be questioned. The Beirut Decentrists chronicled the Lebanese war from its inception and in some cases, such as Ghada al-Sammun’s Beirut 75 (Dar al-Afaq al-Jadida, 1975) and Etel Adnan’s ‘In the Heart of the Heart of Another Country’ (1973), they anticipated it. Their marginality to society and to literary canon gave them the perspective of the other. Exclusion gave them a holistic, if peripheral, vision that the exclusors had lost when they set themselves up as the all-important self, or centre. The writings of the Decentrists trace a thread of normality that links the usual accounts of violence and explosions. Writing allowed these women to perceive a routine that did not deny the war but rather pinpointed a new logic, the logic of the bullets. This logic undermined previously unquestioned modes of behaviour and allowed for the emergence of a new Weltanschauung, a new social order and civic structure. [=] have the sensibilities of a girl [September Birds (Tuyur Ailul), Beirut: Mu'assasat Naufal 1980, pp. 180-189. Hereafter all page references will be included in the essay.]—and who rejects her traditionally sanctioned role. The tone is not angry but sad: like the migrating birds of September, she had left, but, unlike these birds, response to this instinct made her an anomaly in a society that excised the anomalous. During the thirteen years that intervened between the appearance of this first work and the outbreak of the Lebanese Civil War in 1975, Nasrallah wrote two novels, The Oleander Tree (1968) and The Pawn (1974), two collections of short stories, Island of Illusion (1973) and The Source (1978). Two children's books, Bahira (1977) and Little Shadi (1977), were published after the beginning of the civil war. In each work Nasrallah struggles with the conflicting values of her society that was at once modern (male) and traditional, even feudal (female). In Nasrallah's works the women were responding to the perceived mandate to be passive and the challenge to change. Some protested quietly, like the heroine of The Oleander Tree who ran away with the man she was supposed to marry but did not love and who then committed suicide. Some protested dramatically, like Muna in September Birds who left the village for Beirut. The latter were described as 'escaping' even if their departure was against their will. They were escaping the physical location but also their numbed condition of passivity. The violence they thus committed on village mores exacted a toll—ostracism.

A woman who chose a man's path might as well have died, and her return, if she dared risk it, would be greeted if not with hostility then at least with coldness. Return was impossible, rejection complete: 'the village had rejected me the minute I left it to sink my feet into another soil' (p. 244). Such was Nasrallah's portrayal of Lebanese society on the eve of the war. It was a two-tiered entity neatly divided geographically and demographically [On the eve of the civil war 50% of the population was in Beirut;] between modern Beirut and traditional, rural Lebanon. The gap between the two was being perceived. A first step: but the bridging was not yet conceivable. Then on 4/13/1975 tensions that had been simmering because—like the emigres—they preferred the cold north to the fire of Beirut.

The gap from the emigres. It changed expectations, but not reality. Demographically [On the eve of the civil war 50% of the population was in Beirut; was no longer even an option. The only options day, Farid challenges Lison to jump off a very high rock. No one thinks leaving for ever. However, after 1975 Nasrallah no longer describes the staying as passive, but as having been transformed by survival to wonderful moment he feels himself fly, only to crash into the reality of his physical limits. His friends are amazed, but they do nothing to help him: 'Lison recovered from his crash and looked around. No one. Neither the friends nor their leader. Gone.... He got up and continued rising not on his own imaginary wings but on the hands of a giant will that had taken on the wager, challenged death and been victorious.’ (p. 114) - He gives no thought to the fact that his survival was clearly a miracle, and that another time he may not be so lucky.

In They Are Deceiving the Birds, Nasrallah again satirises the Lebanese who, like birds in large cages, think they are free. The female protagonist exposes the charade: for her the delusion of freedom is worse than the certainty of restriction. She sees through all such foolhardiness concern that the story correspond to their needs and expectations. In their own imaginary wings but on the hands of a giant will that had taken on the wager, challenged death and been victorious. The narrator recognises the futility of convincing her children of the importance of the communication for its own sake. She sets off in search of a better, i.e. more passive, audience. She chooses a neighbour. But this neighbour also has demands: “Who’s the story about?”, “Who told it to you?” (p. 175). When she learns that it is a ‘true’ story—a personal witness—she is not convinced that such a story is really a story. In their eyes the new occupiers of the story remind them of the story in which their needs and desires are undressed and urban love and support of homeland. ‘Life Twice’, ‘In Search of Randa’, ‘The Last Chapter’ are all stories that describe women’s steadfastness. The protagonist of ‘The Last Chapter’ is only Lebanese by marriage, yet she insists on staying even after her Lebanese husband had left. Another woman protagonist says: ‘We had revived from the debris. This “we” means the residue of the city who remained, those who did not emigrate despite all the real and imaginary reasons . . . those whose houses, offices and shops were destroyed and returned to repair or rebuild.’ Nasrallah, The Lost Mill (Al-la-huna al-da’a), Beirut: Mu’assasat Naufal 1985, p. 256. Future page references will be in the essay.] These women protagonists stay but they also advocate action. In The Wolf’s Throat, Nasrallah writes of a wolf that continually attacks a village. After one attack, the villagers gather to discuss what is to be done. The women remonstrate: ‘You’re wasting time talking. Tell us what to do.’ As in Dawn the women know that the storm seems more violent when we stand on the look-out tower. But when we confront it, it dissipates’ (p. 131). Although the recommended action is tied to superstition—the exhibition of a pair of old wolf-jaws—it is action. Theory becomes practice when Faris sets out at dawn with the jaws over one shoulder and a rifle slung over the other, and the ‘screams of the weak oppressed, the victims of the wolves’ aggression generation after generation roaring in his ears’ (p. 135). There is action, but there is alienation also. In A House That Doesn’t Belong To Her, the protagonist has lost her house to a bomb and is living in a friend’s furnished apartment. The symbol of her alienation is the key. Every time she tries to open the door her fingers automatically pick the wrong key, the one to her old house. Every time she is reassured by its familiar shape. She slips it into the keyhole, but then cannot move it. Every time she experiences the shock of separation as that which she had deluded herself to be hers is discovered to be another's. Although she lives alone, the house is peopled with objects that acquire life the moment she crosses the threshold. Photographs, whose innocent smiles have turned into ‘angry sharqafe’, glare at her accusingly, constantly repeating what she already knows: she does not belong. Apologetically, she retreats from the accusing stares. [Compare with Ghada al-Samman’s novel on the war Beirut Nightmares (Kawabls Bairut), Beirut: Manshurat Mu’assasat Naufal 1985, p. 256. Future page references will be in the policeman asks her if the story is true, to which she replies: ‘I don’t know the truth. ‘Which truth? The first or the second? The girl told me that the truth was different . . .’ ‘But the girl wasn’t with you when you were in the street: “Right. “So there was no witness.” ‘To what?” ‘To the truth. So you must be cross-examined under oath.’ ‘Officer, you’ve got to hear the story. I’ve added absolutely nothing to it: “Tomorrow in the courthouse you’ll tell it right from the beginning.” (p. 180) The only kind of story she can tell is one that others demand: the story of the witness in the dock. But what is this story that she so wants to tell? Is it true? Is it fictive? Is it literal? Is it oral? Is its purpose to communicate certain facts? Or does it have another function? To speak the hikaya of the war, the narrator must take others into consideration and engage the expectations of collective remembrance so as to be heard. She wants to speak her story, because the fictional reader as audience cannot satisfy her need for aggregation. Yet, when she has corralled a potential audience she refuses to release the reins of authorial control. She wants orality on her own terms. She rejects the conditions that others make because she needs to impose herself as only the written text can. Her story is to be what Ong calls ‘autonomous’ discourse that is context-free and not subject to question. She wants to tell her story, separated from its ‘living moment’. She refuses to be answerable for any of it. [Walter J. Ong, Orality and Literacy: the Technologizing of the Word, London & NY: Methuen 1982, pp. 35, 78 and 82.] She is forced to writing. In A Simple Equation, the narrator tries to delude herself that writing and speech are interchangeable so that writing may be regarded as the execution of the intention to speak. The narrator wants to tell a widow the true story of her husband’s murder. When her courage fails, she writes the story down. Yes, she knows that writing is not the second element of an equation whose first part is speech. Writing is an independent form of discourse that hardens language and assumes a role for the writer. What of the writer who has not defined her role? She must speak so as to maintain the momentum of disorder.

She must speak, and to preclude rejoinders, she must write. Yet she can do neither. Her’s an oral text that happens to be written. Rejecting normal modes of communication, she searches for a language that will play on the edge of silence. In The Window, Rana, who is as old as the war, has lost her faculty of speech. One morning, the family awakens in the shelter and finds a window. A miracle. They are no longer holed up underground. However, they soon realise that Rana has painted it. She has tried to turn that subterranean cell into a balcony on the communication is suspended in favour of speculations about its nature. She must speak, and to preclude rejoinders, she must write. Yet she can do neither. Her’s an oral text that happens to be written. Rejecting normal modes of communication, she searches for a language that will play on the edge of silence. In The Window, Rana, who is as old as the war, has lost her faculty of speech. One morning, the family awakens in the shelter and finds a window. A miracle. They are no longer holed up underground. However, they soon realise that Rana has painted it. She has tried to turn that subterranean cell into a balcony on the edge of silence. In The Window, Rana, who is as old as the war, has lost her faculty of speech. One morning, the family awakens in the shelter and finds a window. A miracle. They are no longer holed up underground. However, they soon realise that Rana has painted it. She has tried to turn that subterranean cell into a balcony on

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

558

30028. Cooke, Miriam. Women Write War: The Centering of the Beirut Decentrist: Part 4. Papers on Lebanon 6. Oxford, UK: Center for Lebanese Studies, July 1987. These women protagonists constantly affirm the need to belong as also the need for and the difficulty of communication. The narrator of A True Story is searching for an audience for a story she wishes to tell. Although there are many words in Arabic for story, the one that Nasrallah uses is hikaya, or narration as a spoken event. The narrator takes her story to her son and then to her daughter. But before they agree to listen, they ask: “Is it a true story”, “What do you consider the truth to be?” (pp. 173 and 174).
The action is in front of her, the only member of the audience. She assumes that the actors are acting for her since there is no one else present. Yet the masked players, who do not speak but only shout, ‘seem oblivious’ of her presence. Her role as audience/interlocutor is being ignored. Like the potential interlocutors in A True Story, she loses interest and wishes to leave. But it is not so simple. The ‘theatre’ has no exit; she has to stay, compelled to passive observation. She is trapped! Then, one of the players raises his mask. How long has she been there? ‘Since the curtain went up.’ Briefly, the line between stage and audience, between fiction and fact is sketched. So, she is in a real theatre. ‘What did you see?’ he asks. ‘What I see now.’ ‘What did you understand?’ She is relieved: maybe the anonymous masked players were just shouting and there was nothing more to understand? However, her relief is short-lived since she had understood nothing, why had she stayed? There were no exits. He pulls down his mask, plunging her back into her confusion and frustration. Her illusions of communication and understanding—that the shouts were shouts—are quickly shattered (pp. 197-198). Next, a woman separates herself from the human mass. How, she asks herself, did she know that it was a woman? From the voice. Yes, it was a wounding voice erupting out of the depths of creation and fluttering off into space spreading fear and pain. ‘She’s weeping for her son.’ A voice from nowhere reaches me. (p. 198) The woman’s voice is distinctive. Even if it does not utter words, it imparts meaning by creating spontaneous empathy. The father, (inexplicably recognised as such) joins the mother and they scream together. At this point, when the parents melt into a single scream, the narrator feels the foggy barriers surrounding her understanding, dissipate. She begins to weep, to share the feelings of those people with whom she could not otherwise communicate. To communicate is not necessarily to speak, nor is it to write, but to feel and thus to belong. However, at that moment of identification with a grief, the same disembodied voice tells her that she is not like the rest of the players, his mother. The protagonist insists: ‘But I am his mother!’ (p. 199). The voice answers: ‘Your tears are outside the theatre. Remember, you’re the audience.’ ‘But I’m the participating audience.’ I was delighted with my courage. The voice was silent, or maybe it had let me to watch the scenes. Then I saw the mother’s shape separate for the second, third, and fourth time. Then that recurrent mother began to form a wide circle, and the others became a dot to that circle. All of them are his mother (p. 200). The symbiosis of dot and circles, of mother and mothers, is assured through the maintenance of the Scream. The story ends when one of the mothers approaches the narrator with arms like ‘ropes of unearthly light’ outstretched, beckoning her on to the stage. The narrator is about to react, when the mother turns into a huge tree. The voice explains that the mother has ‘taken root in the soil’ (p. 203). It is as mother that she unites with the soil. When the voice leaves, the narrator realises that she is in the ‘theatre’ become forest. All of the mothers have become trees whose roots strive to reach down to the ‘living principle’ (p. 204).

This ending, the transformation of a mother into a tree, recalls the feminisation of society evoked in Those Memories and Flight Against Time. All Of Them Are His Mother confirms and extends the feminisation of Lebanon’s future. All who wish to consider themselves Lebanese must stay in Lebanon and become organically part of its regenerative soil. But who can plant such roots? Mothers. It is no longer enough to be a woman, or to act as one, to be a citizen of post-invasion Lebanon. With the invasion, writers acquired a new task. They had to learn to communicate outside the usual, now obsolete channels. Words as signifiers had lost their force in a society that refused to listen. A new language had to be found so that ear, eye, intellect and heart might be simultaneously engaged: ‘According to Steiner, language ‘shares, it mediates between, the crucial antinomies of inner and outer, subject and object, past and future, private and public. Language is far more than communication between speakers. It is the dynamic mediation between those poles of cognition which give human experience its underlying dual and dialectical form.’ George Steiner, After Babel: Aspects of Language and Trans/ation, Oxford: OUP 1975, p. 83.’ In her seminal essay, ‘Maternal thinking’, Ruddick suggests a new language derived from what she calls maternal thinking. ‘... Maternal thought identifies priorities, attitudes, and virtues it conceives of achievement. Many women and some men express maternal thinking in various kinds of working and caring with others.’ [Sara Ruddick, ‘Maternal thinking’, in Joyce Trabant (ed.), lothering. Essay.s in Feminist Theory, Totowa: Roman and Allenan 1984, pp. 214 and 225.] Ruddick has identified three elements that characterise maternal thinking: the concern for the child’s preservation, growth and acceptability. In transposing these concerns to the Lebanese context, a revision of categories becomes possible. With the benefit of hindsight, it will become evident that Nasrallah, as well as others of the Beirut Decentrists, early in the war were already beginning to demonstrate a maternal attachment to Lebanon which they came to consider a child, sick and in need. As the fabric of society came unravelled, and particularly in the aftermath of the invasion, what Ruddick calls ‘preservative love’, which is not a feeling but rather ‘an activity of caring or treasuring creatures whose well-being is at risk’ [Ruddick, ‘Preservative love and military destruction: some reflections on mothering and peace’, in Trabant, Mothering, p. 240.] became dominant. It is in connection with the Beirut Decentrists’ dramatisation of the sniper that the last of the three characteristics of maternal thinking may be identified. With the eye of a mother, women protagonists describe snipers that are children and not anonymous personifications of impersonal war machines. [e.g. Daisy al- Amir, In the Vortex of Love and Hate (Fadwooinat al-kubb wa 1karahlya), Beirut: Dar al-Auda n.d. (1979), pp. 69-74. Hanan al-Shleich, Hikaiyat Zahra, Beirut: Dar al-Nahar li ’I-Nashr 1988, p. 144 (English transl., The Story of Zahra, London: Quartet Books 1986). Lina Makdidi Tabbaraba, Survival in Beirut, London: Onyx 1978, p. 37. See Miriam Cooke, War’s Other Voices. Women Writers on the Lebanese Civil War (forthcoming).] The recognition by the women protagonists of the child in the sniper gives a measure of parental power and authority over a usually abstracted element of the war. By extension from this synecdoche, women protagonists who have arrogated to themselves the role of mother to the child sniper can thus be said to have a measure of power and authority over the war itself, and over Lebanon, the sick child. The voice that Nasrallah’s and the Beirut Decentrists’ female protagonists had acquired by the eve of the Israeli invasion is not listed in the political chaos of the 1980s. In The Lost Mill it is extended and allows for a revision of behaviour in the 1975-82 period in radical feminist terms. The war has generated new values that transform what had previously been female passive into Lebanese active. In the feminisation of a collapsing society, maternal thinking, which puts the survival of the whole the child/Lebanon— before the survival of the self, becomes an answer to the chaos of language and communication. [–]

Arab Women’s Council

Activities: Registrant arranged a media tour, which included several interviews and appearances by members of the foreign principal, to communicate information to the American public that the principal is seeking peace and the cessation of bloodshed in Lebanon.

Finances: $332309 for the five month period ending 11/10/1982.
The current situation differed from what it was a year ago. She said she more than 400 Palestinians to Lebanon in 12/1993. There was real progress at the negotiating table and there was hope that with Security Council resolution 799 (1992) regarding the expulsion of misery and an increase in the suffering on the round. On the other hand, with the national and human rights of the Palestinian people as it had done frustrated over the lack of results in the peace talks, compounded by States had manoeuvred to sidestep the international resolutions that dealt Chazan, member of the Israeli Knesset, said there was a growing Israel an edge over all Arab States combined. Moreover, the United Center, Vienna, 8/23-24/1993. DPR, August 24, 1993. (24) Mrs. Naomi goals and had offered it great support in arms and equipment, giving Palestine: The Current Situation: Mrs. Naomi Chazan. Held in Austria 85. The United States had employed great efforts to fulfill Israel's interests and that of Israel. 30033. DPR. Tenth United Nations International NGO Meeting On The Threatening of holy shrines had continued unabated. by key government sectors, non-governmental organizations, other uprooting of trees, arrest and torture of thousands, expulsions and strengthening country programming process, entailing more participation no avail. Instead land confiscation, plundering and usurpation of homes, put children first. The regional office had encouraged an adaptive but to all States, the United Nations and human rights institutions, all was to opportunity for regional development and for a renewed commitment to all methods of struggle and had appealed through statements and protests (27) She went on to say that Israelis had realized that if Israel truly wanted to achieve peace, it had to talk to the PLO and that its best negotiator partner was the PLO. They had also come to realize that the closure of the territories had institutionalized the green line and had contributed to the lack of security of many Israelis. However, Israelis continued to be very fearful because they lived with a daily fear of violence. That threat and the frustration about the negotiations created a climate for the activities of extremists. (28) The past year had demonstrated for the Israelis that they could adjust well to changes which they had feared in the past. The challenge for the Government was to combat extremism while carrying public opinion along. The most critical factor was that the current Israeli Government had come into office with a totally different concept of peace between Israel and the Palestinians. The current Government would pursue peace based on the end of the occupation of the Palestinian territories. (29) The two outstanding issues were the status of Jerusalem during the interim phase and the composition of the Palestinian delegation. At this juncture, it was possible to move ahead quickly. It was possible for Israel and the Palestinians to negotiate directly, possibly leaving the United States behind. Three processes could occur simultaneously: an amelioration of conditions on the round, a formal negotiating process and a final peace agreement. People on all sides were probably going to have to give up more than they thought possible. There was no alternative to a negotiated settlement between Israelis and Palestinians and without such a settlement it would be impossible to end the Arab-Israeli conflict which was the "last residue of the cold war". [=] 30031. DPR. "UNICEF Executive Board Approves Programme Expenditures For Middle East and North Africa Region, Including Funding For Palestinian Women and Children", in Division for Palestinian Rights, April 1994. On 4/27/1994, the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) approved $40 million from general resources and $102 million in supplementary funding, as it reviewed country programme recommendations for five countries of the Middle East and North Africa region, as well as those for Palestinian women and children in Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic and the West Bank and Gaza. The recommendations are contained in document E/ICEF/1994/P.23. In introducing the country programmes, Mr. Sarojini Vijjadi, UNICEF Regional Director for the Middle East and North Africa, stated that the prospect of peace offered a unique opportunity for regional development and for a renewed commitment to put children first. The regional office had encouraged an adaptive but strengthened country programming process, entailing more participation by key government sectors, non-governmental organizations, other United Nations agencies, and donor country missions (see ICEF/1794). [=] 30032. DPR. Seventh United Nations European NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 06: B. Panel Discussions: Panel 4: "NGO Forum: Who is doing what?". Held on 8/25-27/1993, at Austria Center, Vienna, Austria. 83. Ms. Samia Khalil (Palestinian), President, Society of In'Asl El-Urs, said that, although the Palestinian people had utilized all methods of struggle and had appealed through statements and protests to all States, the United Nations and human rights institutions, all was to no avail. Instead land confiscation, plundering and usurpation of homes, uprooting of trees, arrest and torture of thousands, expulsions and desecration of holy shrines had continued unabated. 84. Bilateral and multilateral talks had not advanced the cause of peace. In the final analysis it had become evident to the Palestinian people that the United States had worked only for the sake of its own interest and that of Israel. 85. The United States had employed great efforts to fulfill Israel's goals and had offered it great support in arms and equipment, giving Israel an edge over all Arab States combined. Moreover, the United States had manoeuvred to sidestep the international resolutions that dealt with the national and human rights of the Palestinian people as it had done with Security Council resolution 799 (1992) regarding the expulsion of more than 400 Palestinians to Lebanon in 12/1993. 86. In the absence of a national authority, Palestinian women had established societies and institutions to assist children, prisoners, the disabled and those whose houses had been dynamited and whose trees had been uprooted. They had established schools, institutions and universities, hospitals, clinics, day-care centers and kindergartens.

87. She deplored that after nearly two years of bilateral and multilateral talks, the Palestinian cause had not yet advanced and was restricted to procedural arguments. She called upon NGOs to exert pressure on the United Nations to implement its resolutions by condemning the acquisition of land by force and calling for the implementation of international conventions.

88. Mr. Fritz Froehlich (Austria), Network of European NGOs in the Occupied Territories (NENGOOT), said that international and European NGO involvement in the occupied Palestinian territories was considerable but inconsistent. Over one third of international and European NGOs were church-related or affiliated. The various assistance programmes were not always properly structured, evaluated nor monitored. Often, cooperation between donors and recipients were based on personal relationships and lacked professionalism.

89. Obstacles to the development and delivery of assistance programmes included the denial of permits to and restrictions on the movement of NGOs in the occupied Palestinian territories, inequitable distribution of funds and the financial dependency of the NGOs on governmental foreign aid.

90. Several organizations had been formed to coordinate the work of the international NGOs, including AIVA, Association of International Volunteer Agencies (Jerusalem); CCINGO, Coordinating Committee of International NGOs in the Occupied Territories (Jerusalem) and NENGOOT, ECCP, European Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (Brussels) and CCP, International Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (Geneva). The first three organizations AIVA, CCINGO AND NENGOOT addressed matters more related to relief, rehabilitation and development programmes in the occupied Palestinian territory. The ECCP and the ICCP working in cooperation with the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People had emphasized mobilization of support for the achievement of a comprehensive, just and peaceful solution to the question of Palestine.

91. In conclusion, he recommended the adoption of an NGO Development Code of Practice (DCOP), as originally proposed by the ECP-P NENGOOT, that could include development strategies, methods, monitoring, evaluation and communications.

92. Ms. Ruth Cohen (Israel), Member, Association of Women for Peace, said that the Israeli peace movement had been inactive and despondent. Although not in agreement with the negotiating positions in the peace process of the current Israeli coalition Government, the Peace Now movement was obliged to support the Government.

93. She referred to a new group “Gush Hashalom” (the Peace Block) within the Israeli peace movement, which believed in the creation of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel, direct negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization, withdrawal from all territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including East Jerusalem, withdrawal from South Lebanon and total equality between Jews and Arabs within Israel.

94. She concluded that in her view the Peace Now movement ought to oppose the policies of the Rabin Government as if there were no peace negotiations and also oppose to the Israeli position in the peace negotiations as if there was no Rabin Government.

95. Mr. James Graff (Canada), President, Near East Cultural and Educational Foundation of Canada, said that in 1989, almost every country in the world had voted for a United Nations-sponsored international peace conference on the Middle East. Momentum had grown throughout Europe and among United States allies to free Palestine from 22 years of Israeli colonization and oppression.

96. Since then, the momentum for Palestinian statehood had sustained several shocks, among them, the Gulf crisis and war with its disastrous consequences for Palestinians and for the Palestine Liberation Organization; the initiation of a United States orchestrated peace process biased towards United States and Israeli objectives in the Middle East, and which ignored the United Nations and relevant United Nations resolutions and principles, while also excluding Europe from any significant role; and the election of a new United States Administration which in Mr. Graff’s view was more sympathetic to Israel than the preceding ones.

97. He observed that the international NGO movement was threatened with dissolution because of the financial crisis that had forced the ICCP office in Geneva to cease functioning.

98. He urged the international community to continue to press for an independent, secular, democratic Palestinian state in the occupied territories with Jerusalem as its capital unless the Palestinian community through its leadership determined otherwise.

99. Furthermore, he did not believe that it was for the NGO movement to decide whether the Palestinians should participate or not in the current peace process. A major focus on promoting government involvement in the development of economic infrastructures in the occupied territories was needed. In addition, special assistance was also required with the educational, social and psychological needs of the Palestinians in the occupied territories. Throughout this process the expertise of the various Palestinian technical committees should be fully utilized. [=]

30034. DS. "Lebanon: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution states that the people have the right to change their government in periodic free and fair elections. However, the 1992 parliamentary election was not prepared or carried out impartially. There were widespread reports of irregularities an vote rigging, and non-Lebanese military forces exerted considerable influence over the preparation of lists of candidates, who were consequently assured of victory. The majority of Christians and many Muslims boycotted the election as candidates and voters to protest holding the election before Syrian military forces had been redeployed. Consequently, the election results did not reflect the full spectrum of the body politic and cast doubt on the people’s ability to change their government democratically. According to the Constitution, elections for the Parliament must be held every 4 years. The parliament elects the President who serves one 6-year term. The President and Parliament choose the Cabinet. According to the unwritten “National Pact” of 1943, the President is a Maronite Christian the Prime Minister a Sunni Muslim and the Speaker of Parliament a Shia Muslim. Until 1990, seats in Parliament were divided on a six-to-five ratio of Christians to Muslims. Under the national reconciliation agreement reached in Taif in October 1989 members of Parliament agreed to alter the National Pact to create a 5:60 balance between Christian and Muslim members of Parliament. The Taif Accord also increased the number of seats in parliament and transferred some powers from the President to the Prime Minister and Cabinet. Women have the right to vote, and there are no legal barriers to participation by women in politics. Three women were elected to Parliament in 1992. Other women hold policy-level positions in the Government. Palestinian refugee have no political right. An estimated 17 Palestinian factions operate in Lebanon, generally organized around prominent individuals. Most Palestinians live in refugee camps controlled by one or more factions. The leaders of the refugees are not elected, nor are there any democratically organized institutions in the camps. [=]

30035. DS. “Lebanon: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon

GPO. February 1995. The Constitution calls for social justice and equality of duties and rights among all citizens without prejudice or favoritism.” In practice, aspects of the law and traditional mores discriminate against women. Only men may confer citizenship on their spouses and children. In some cases, this means that children born to Lebanese mothers and stateless fathers are themselves stateless. The law stipulates that a woman must obtain her husband’s approval to open a business or engage in trade. The Parliament has not yet acted on an amendment introduced to change this law. Women may own property but often cede effective control over it due to cultural reasons. The law also accords preferential treatment to males accused of crimes of honor (see Section 1.e.). Religious groups have their own family and personal status laws administered by religious courts. Each group differs in its treatment of marriage, family property rights, and inheritance. Many of these laws discriminate against women. For example, Sunni inheritance law gives a son twice the share of a daughter. Although Muslim men may divorce easily, Muslim women may do so only with the concurrence of 11 of their husbands. Women have employment opportunities in government, medicine, law, academia, the arts, and, to a lesser degree, in business. Social pressure against women pursuing a career is strong in some parts of society. Males sometimes exercise considerable control over female relatives, restricting their activities outside the home or contact with friends and relatives. Violence against women occurs, the press frequently reports cases of rape. However, there are no authoritative statistics on the extent of spousal violence. Doctors and social workers believe most abused women do not seek medical help. The society’s emphasis on personal privacy and honor makes it difficult for women to seek legal redress. The Government has not expressed an interest in the problem of violence against women nor has it made an effort to combat it.

30036. DS. “Lebanon: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (c) Prohibition of Force or Compulsory Labor”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Although forced labor is not prohibited by law, the Government does not condone it. However, employers sometimes force some categories of foreign workers, especially those working as domestic servants, to remain in situations amounting to coerced labor.

30037. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 06: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, IncludingFreedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Each confessional group has its own court for family and personal status cases. There is a separate military court system. In refugee camps, Palestinian elements operate an autonomous and arbitrary system of justice; rival Palestinian factions often try their opponents without due process. Although Lebanese law provides the right to a fair public trial and the judiciary is considered independent and relatively impartial, influential politicians continued to intervene successfully to protect supporters from detention and prosecution. Government interference in the judicial process and low judicial salaries led to the resignation of several prominent judges and to corruption and bribery of others. The Government took steps to adjust salaries in September. Appointments of judges like other government appointments, is allocated on the basis of religious affiliation. The resignations, aggravating an already severe shortage of judges, dealt a blow to efforts to speed adjudication and erase a backlog of cases that had developed during the civil war. An inability to conduct investigations in areas outside effective government control also caused trial delays. The legal system is discriminatory in its handling of so-called crimes of honor. Men, for example, are typically acquitted of murder charges in cases involving the murder of adulterous wives. By law, in some instances a female’s testimony before a notary public carries half the weight of that of a male. There are no known political prisoners, although political opponents of the Syrian and Lebanese regimes are often detained without charges for short periods of time. [=] on broadcasting. Exploiting the absence of a leal framework, the Government moved to close one of its critics, the Independent Communications Network (ICN). The station, owned by the publisher of Nida’ Al-Watan, was accused of inciting sectarian discord. In late December, the Civil Court permitted ICN to resume broadcasting and scheduled for February a hearing of the Government’s case against the broadcaster. The Public Prosecutor has asked for prison sentences of 3 years for ICN management. Lebanon’s partially state-owned television station, Tele-Liban, had long enjoyed virtual autonomy with respect to its news and public affairs programming. The Cabinet, however, reasserted in August the Information Minister’s legal right to monitor and effectively control Tele-Liban’s activities. In 1993 the Government revived police control over all nonperiodical publications, books, foreign magazines, plays, and films, which must be submitted to the Public Security Directorate for approval before distribution. A prize-winning film on national reconciliation was banned for several months and released only after the producer made some changes. The police briefly closed a play, The Rabbit and the Saints, acting on a request from the Maronite church. Censors later reversed the decision. Police confiscated a novel, “Garden of the Senses,” by a well-known local author, saying it had pornographic passages. Lebanon has a strong tradition of academic freedom and a nourishing private educational system, born from the inadequacy of public schools and an attachment to sectarian affiliations. Students exercise the right to form campus associations, and the Government does not usually interfere with student groups. The Government’s arrests of students sympathetic to the exiled General Michel ‘Awn and to the Lebanese Forces in 1992 chilled student activism among those students in 1993. [3]

30039. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (c) Freedom of Religion”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government has estimated their number at 361000, but this figure only includes families of refugees who arrived in 1948. Some estimates of the actual number of Palestinians in Lebanon now range from 450000-500000. Although the Government in 1991 ended its practice of denying work permits to Palestinians, a strong bias against them continues to compel often highly trained Palestinian refugees to take menial work. Palestinians and other aliens may own land only of a limited size and only after obtaining the approval of five district offices. The law applies to all aliens, but for political, cultural, and economic reasons it is applied in a manner disadvantageous to the Palestinians and, to a lesser extent, Kurds. Under Lebanese citizenship law, only Lebanese males may transmit citizenship to their spouses and children. Lebanon refused to admit 419 Palestinians deport by Israel on December 17, 1992. The deportees remained in an effective no man’s land between Israeli and Lebanese controlled territory inside southern Lebanon. The Government turned a blind eye to the supply of relief material to the deportees, despite a ban on such activity. By the end of 1993, all of the deportees had returned to the Israeli-occupied territories except for about 15 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. [4]

30040. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 12: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Lebanese traditionally have enjoyed freedom of travel, domestic and foreign. The spread of government authority has removed barriers that blocked domestic travel during the civil war, but obstacles remain. Lebanese armed forces and Syrian troops maintained checkpoints in areas under their control. In the south, the SLA and IDF maintained tight restrictions on the movement of people and goods into and out of the security zone. There are some restrictions on foreign travel by Lebanese citizens. Husbands may block foreign travel by their wives and minor children. The introduction in 1993 of compulsory military service for many males aged between 18-21 meant that youths subject to the draft are required to register at a recruitment office and obtain a travel authorization document before leaving the country. Travel to Israel is illegal for all Lebanese citizens, but many do so through Israeli-controlled territory in southern Lebanon. There are no legal restrictions on the right of all citizens to return. Many emigres are reluctant to return for a variety of political, economic, and social reasons. Palestinian refugees with valid exit visas may leave the country. The Government began the process of encouraging the return to their home of over 600000 Lebanese displaced during the civil war. The process was slowed by financial constraints as well as lingering insecurity felt by the displaced. Hundreds of families, however, received keys to their homes and began to repair them. The Government concentrated its efforts on returning Christians to areas of the Shuf and ‘Alayh from which they had fled in the wake of Christian-Druze fighting in the mid-1980s. Lebanon has historically both generated and received refugees. There are approximately 180000 stateless undocumented persons in Lebanon. Although the families of some of them have lived in Lebanon for generations, they suffer broad discrimination since they are not accorded the legal rights enjoyed by the rest of the population. They include the inhabitants of border areas in dispute between Lebanon and Syria and Lebanon and Israel, Kurds, Syriac Orthodox, and members of other sects. These people do not benefit from such government services as the national social security fund, and cannot be employed by the Government. Concern about preserving sectarian balance was one obstacle to the naturalization of these people in the past. In 1993 political support grew for a plan to naturalize a confessionally balanced group of non-Palestinian stateless persons who have continuously resided in Lebanon for the past 15 years. The Government is reviewing applications. Most non-Lebanese refugees in Lebanon are Palestinians. The Government has estimated their number at 361000, but this figure only includes families of refugees who arrived in 1948. Some estimates of the actual number of Palestinians in Lebanon now range from 450000-500000. Although the Government in 1991 ended its practice of denying work permits to Palestinians, a strong bias against them continues to compel often highly trained Palestinian refugees to take menial work. Palestinians and other aliens may own land only of a limited size and only after obtaining the approval of five district offices. The law applies to all aliens, but for political, cultural, and economic reasons it is applied in a manner disadvantageous to the Palestinians and, to a lesser extent, Kurds. Under Lebanese citizenship law, only Lebanese males may transmit citizenship to their spouses and children. Lebanon refused to admit 419 Palestinians deport by Israel on December 17, 1992. The deportees remained in an effective no man’s land between Israeli and Lebanese controlled territory inside southern Lebanon. The Government turned a blind eye to the supply of relief material to the deportees, despite a ban on such activity. By the end of 1993, all of the deportees had returned to the Israeli-occupied territories except for about 15 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. [4]
The unwritten 1943 National Pact allocated power on a confessional system based on the 1932 census. The Pact stipulated that the President would be a Maronite Christian, the Prime Minister a Sunni Muslim, and the Speaker of Parliament a Shi'a Muslim. Until 1990, seats in Parliament were divided on a 6-to-5 ratio of Christians to Muslims. Positions in the government were allocated on a similar basis between Christians and Muslims. Efforts to alter or abolish the confessional system were at the time not considered feasible. There were indications of Lebanon’s political and sociopolitical change, however, law in 1990. They included the adoption of the number of seats in Parliament and the division of seats equally between Muslims and Christians and the transfer of some powers from the President to the Prime Minister and Cabinet. Parliamentary elections were held in 1992. The elections were not prepared and not carried out in a manner to ensure the broadest national consensus. Because the results do not reflect the full spectrum of the body politic in Lebanon, they cast doubt on the ability of the Lebanese people to change their government through truly democratic means. Palestinians in Lebanon, with the exception of the few who have gained Lebanese nationality, have no political rights. An estimated 17 Palestinian factions operate in Lebanon, ranging from several characterized as “Islamic” to numerous pro- and anti-Arafat organizations, many built around prominent individual leaders. Most Palestinians live in refugee camps, under the control of one or more political factions. Leaders are not elected, and there are no representative institutions that would permit popular participation in running camps. Fundamental protections and freedoms expected of governments exist in some but not all Palestinian areas. There are no legal barriers to participation by women in politics, but the culture discourages it. Three women were elected to Parliament in 1992. Two were related to deceased politicians, and the third is the sister of the Prime Minister. Very few women hold policy-level positions in the Government. [ ]

30042. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government has not placed priority on children's rights and welfare. There is no evidence of government spending to protect children, although Lebanon has ratified the Children's Rights Charter. The area of children's rights is one of many demands made on a state that is just emerging from years of social and financial chaos. The plight of children is a growing concern in Lebanon. A huge number of children are neglected, abused, exploited and even sold to disreputable adoption agents at a rate of $5000 for an infant, according to children's rights monitors. Hundreds of abandoned children are found in the streets, begging and cleaning car windows; others are hired illegally at low wages. Juvenile delinquency is rising. There are 428 cases before the Juvenile Court in north Lebanon alone, and many delinquents wait in ordinary prisons for trial and remain there after sentencing. Limited financial resources have hindered efforts to build adequate facilities to rehabilitate delinquents. [ ]

30043. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. While not prohibited by law forced labor is not practiced or condoned by the Government. However, children, domestics, or other foreign workers are sometimes forced to remain in situations amounting to coerced or bonded labor. [ ]

30046. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 05: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (d) Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5028(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. As of the end of 1993, a total of 9573 Palestinians were incarcerated in IDF (5308) and prison service facilities. Of those, roughly 68% had been tried and were serving sentences. 29.6% were awaiting charges or trial, and 2.3% were detained administratively, i.e., sentenced to a specific period of detention without formal charge or trial. In October Israeli authorities only arrested the detention of a suspect without a warrant. As of the end of the year, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were discussing the timing and numbers of additional releases. Since the beginning of the intifada in late 1987, Israel has routinely transferred Palestinian prisoners from the occupied territories to detention facilities within Israel especially to the Ketziot camp in the Negev desert and Megiddo prison near Afuia This practice, which continued in 1993, contravenes Article 76 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. Estimates of the number of Palestinian residents of the occupied territories incarcerated within Israel range up to 7000. In 1993, there were indications that Palestinian prisoners were being transferred from detention centers in Gaza to facilities in Israel prior to the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza scheduled to begin on December 13, 1994. The use of administrative detention for alleged security reasons without formal charges or a full opportunity for detainees to defend themselves continued in 1993. As of October, 277 Palestinians were held in administrative detention, compared to 620 held at the end of 1992. Detention periods are for a maximum of 6 months and are renewable. Evidence used at hearings frequently is declared secret and unavailable to either the detainee or his attorney. Israeli officials state that administrative detention is used only when IDF legal advisors have determined that there is sufficient evidence to detain a person and that the evidence has been corroborated by two sources. They assert, however, that the evidence cannot be presented in open court because to do so would Compromise the method of acquiring the evidence, which is often provided by informers whose lives would be jeopardized if their identities were known. Human rights monitors contend that administrative detention is often used when evidence against a suspect would not stand up in court. District military commanders may order administrative detention without formal Charges. Detainees may appeal detention orders or renewal of detention before a military judge. Attorneys may question security service witnesses concerning the general nature of the evidence. The Supreme Court may review rulings by military Judges and may examine secret evidence. Any soldier may arrest without a warrant a person who has committed, or is suspected of having committed, a criminal or security offense. Persons over age 12 are treated as adults by the court system. Persons arrested for common crimes are usually provided the opportunity for bail, access to an attorney, and a statement of charges (although these opportunities are sometimes delayed). Bail is rarely available to those arrested for security offenses. Special summonses are reportedly issued to Palestinians wanted by authorities for security reasons.

Israeli Military Order 1369 allows authorities to sentence to 7 years’ imprisonment any person who does not respond to a special summons that is delivered to him or a family member or is posted in the Civil Administration office nearest his home address. Persons may be held in custody without a warrant for 96 hours and then must be released unless a warrant is issued. A warrant may be issued by a police officer for two periods of 7 days each. For extensions beyond 18 days from the date of arrest, the detainee has to be brought before a military judge, at which point he is entitled to defense counsel. In 1992 Israeli authorities shortened this period to 8 days for minors and those accused of less serious offenses (such as stone throwing). A military judge may extend the detention for a period of no longer than 6 months from the date of arrest. If there is no indictment during this period, the detainee must be released. If there is an indictment, a judge may order indefinite detention until the end of the trial, though the detainee may be appealed. In the case of a detainee has the right to see a lawyer as soon as possible. In the cases of security detainees, however, officers routinely issue a written order to delay access to counsel for up to 16 days for reasons of security or to conduct the investigation.

Higher ranking officials or judges may extend this period by up to 76 more days for the same reasons. In June the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that the fundamental right to consult a lawyer required the Government not only to inform a detainee of his right but also to advise the detainee of any orders preventing him from seeing a lawyer. Israeli regulations also allow prisoners to be held in isolation from family and from other detainees during interrogation. Israeli authorities claim that isolation is needed to protect detainees from post notification, and others assert that families and lawyers are normally notified much later and generally locate the detainee through their own efforts. Notification to the US Embassy or Consulate General of detained Palestinian-American citizens has almost always been through the family. The ICRC attempts to help by passing on to families (by telephone) the information it receives from Israeli prison officials. A senior officer may extend for up to 12 days denial of notification of arrest to immediate family members, attorneys, and consular officials. A military commander may appeal to a judge to extend this period in security cases for an unlimited time. The Israeli authorities acted in a number of areas to improve prison conditions in the occupied territories after Palestinian prisoners staged an 18-day hunger strike in September and 10/1992 to protest prison conditions. Implementation of the specific measures, however, was not uniform throughout all detention facilities. In 8/1993, prisoners at Hebron prison staged a hunger strike to protest lack of water for toilet and bathing facilities. The Israeli Supreme Court agreed to consider a petition presented by the prisoners but, as of October, the case had not been resolved. In the meantime, Israeli authorities reportedly agreed to truck in water supplies to meet prisoner needs. In September the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court to close the Ketziot Military Detention Camp in Israel because of inferior conditions of imprisonment.” The petition argued that the conditions at the camp, which reportedly houses 4900 Palestinian security detainees, violated the Geneva Convention. overcrowding (26 inmates to a tent), inferior diet, lack of adequate medical care, and lack of arrangements for religious worship were cited as key problems. At the end of the year, Ketziot camp was still in use. According to the IDF Judge Advocate General, the IDF has been granted a postponement to study the report of an advisory panel. Consideration of the case by the Supreme Court has been postponed until 3/1994. In 12/1992, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 799 which called for the immediate return of 416 Palestinians who had been deported to South Lebanon earlier that month because of their alleged association with Hamas—the Islamic Resistance Movement and the largest Islamist organization in the occupied territories—and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. Israel agreed in March to a two-phase plan to return the deportees. In 9/1992 deportees returned from the edge of the Israeli-declared security zone in South Lebanon where they had been camped since 12/1992. Upon their return, the deportees were investigated by the Israeli authorities and some were freed while others were placed in administrative detention. In mid-December, the remaining deportees returned except for about 16 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. Like those who had returned in September, the 137 who returned in December were subject to interrogation and investigation. As of the end of the year, approximately 60 remained in detention In addition to the deportees in southern Lebanon, Israel allowed 30 pre-intifada deportees to return to the occupied territories in May as a confidence building measure. Among those who returned was one former West Bank mayor elected in 1976 and later deported to Jordan. [6]

Opinions freely in speech and in writing. However, the Government restricts this right significantly. It permits no spoken or printed criticism of the President or the legitimacy of the regime and strictly controls the dissemination of information. Persons violating these restrictions are subject to arrest. The Government has imprisoned several journalists for years for failing to observe press restrictions. The Ministry of Information and the Ministry of Culture & National Guidance censor the domestic and foreign press, prevent publication or distribution of any material regarded as threatening or embarrassing to the Government. Commonly censored subjects include the Government's human rights record, allegations of official involvement in the Lebanese drug trade, and aspects of the Government's political and security role in Lebanon. Censors remove from imported publications articles critical of the Government's role in Lebanon. The Ministry of Culture & National Guidance censors fiction and nonfiction works, including films. Censorship is stricter for materials in Arabic. Censors remove material critical of the Government, offensive to any of Syria's religious groups, too graphic in its description of sex, unfavorable to the Arab cause in the Middle East conflict, or partial to sectarianism. Censorship also affects films available at foreign cultural centers. The Government, or the State Television owns and operates the radio and television companies and the newspaper publishing houses. There are no privately owned newspapers. The Ministry of Information censors the televised news programs to ensure they follow the government line. The Government does interfere with radio or television broadcasts from neighboring countries. The law prohibits citizens from owning satellite receiving dishes. In early 1994, security forces began to confiscate satellite-dish components but later halted the practice. Although ownership remains illegal, citizens resumed installing satellite dishes without any apparent government action. However, in November the Government announced that it would fully implement the ban on private dishes and create a monopoly to distribute satellite programs to selected consumers. Nonetheless, there was greater openness in 1994 in the media's coverage of regional developments, including the peace process. The Government aired extensive coverage of the peace agreement reached between Arab parties and Israel, e.g., the signing of the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan. The Government also permitted more media criticism of government performance. Several newspaper articles highlighted government malfeasance and low-level, but not high-level, corruption. Public school teachers are not permitted to express ideas contrary to government policy, although authorities allow somewhat greater freedom of expression at the university level. [ ]

[Submitted to Connexions by Yvonne Deutsch, Israel, 5/1991 ]

[The first version of this paper was presented at the 4th International Interdisciplinary Congress on Women, Hunter College, City University of New York, 6/1990.]

This article is dedicated to the memory of Lil Moed who worked with us in creating feminist peace activity.

It is a natural reaction to hate those who have made us suffer. It is also a natural reaction to inflict pain because one has suffered pain, and to justify it ideologically. In this small land both our peoples are stuck in a fateful embrace. I believe that our finding each other here is potentially for of protest and solidarity activity and it was no longer the sole patrimony of Zionist and the establishment of Israel as a Jewish state is regarded by many Jews as the political solution to the Jewish problem of suffering from persecutions. It became especially urgent after the Holocaust when Palestine, later Israel, became the homeland of many Jewish refugees. The ideal was to create a new Jew which would be the antithesis of the weak and helpless Jew of the Diaspora. In the process of shaping a common national sentiment and identity the Jewish people did not succeed at merging into the region nor becoming an integral part of it. The Jewish historical lack of existential security, combined with the history of the establishment of the state and the Arab reaction to it, made the Israeli Jews develop, again, a ghetto mentality. We did not succeed in freeing ourselves from the Jewish-outside-fearful mentality and no matter how strong we are in terms of military strength, we still hold an internal self-image of weakness. Today we are occupiers and aggressors but we feel as though we are occupied. This state of mind and psychology of the people, which is very well used by the politicians, makes it difficult to undertake protest activity against Israeli military actions against the oppression of the Palestinian people, and to hold solidarity actions with them.

With the Intifada, one could see a sizable awakening in the scope of protest and solidarity activity and it was no longer the sole patrimony of marginal avant-garde groups. The majority of the activity was carried out by women, be it in the "mixed" groups where they had an important organizational role, or in the women's groups which were set up in the first two years of the Intifada. There are precedents for this political phenomenonof women's groups involved in peace activity--beyond simply the women's issues. For example during the War in Lebanon in 1982, a group of feminist women organized protests against the war. [Women Against the Invasion of Lebanon. ] This development is part and parcel of a worldwide development of women's activities in favour of peace.

We can clearly see the influence of feminist consciousness which creates a new and critical definition of militarism. This influence was possible in Israel partly because of an increasing lack of confidence in the army that started after the 1973 war [In 1973 Israel was taken by surprise by the Egyptian and Syrian attack; confidence in the army's capacity to defend the State was questioned, the myth of the all capable army was shattered and this created a crisis in Israeli society.] and came to a peak in the war in Lebanon, which was regarded as a war of choice. [In zionist history, Israel goes to war only when it has no choice because of the Arab states' inability to destroy Israel].

"Clearly, they did something against the security of the State, otherwise killing in concrete daily life. In the need to create a feminist political culture with which we can identify, and in the transformation of the role of the same woman who was recounting the story of her deported husband. about the occupation while connecting it to the meaning of violence and nationalisation. These questions of beliefs, values and identities were open to women, in varying degrees, according to personal security and self-identity, and according to our age and social class.

Political activity at the time of crisis of identity and values combined with active emotional dealing with those issues represents the oneness of the political and personal. We raised in the public consciousness subjects of emotional and political significance, and this is in line with our belief in the destructive effect of the split between the personal and the political, a split which enables the existence of the evil within us. Aside from raising the subjects of women's role in peace making and the influence of occupation on women's lives, we also raised subjects like racism, prejudice and fear as obstacles to peace. [For that reason and as women, we also must discuss our attitudes towards the army both on a personal and public level. This is one of the most difficult subjects to deal with and we had--so far--not dared to discuss it publicly.]

Within this maze and confusion there are among us those who have a vision of creating a political culture of women--and we have to commit ourselves to a culture of peace.

Culture, or political culture, cannot be created out of a vacuum. It must have links with those aspects of the women's culture--that exist in the private sphere and the backyard of history--which are relevant for creating a peace culture. We have the role of exploring that culture of women and adjusting it to our political and cultural needs, while creating changes according to feminist criticism.

For example, in the ancient Jewish literature, written towards the end of the fifth century [Lamentations Rabba, which is a text of lamenting the army that started after the 1973 war [In 1973 Israel was taken by surprise is a painful process because we all were brought up on the myth of the defending and moral army. Women can say that they would have liked to be pacifists and at the same time recount with pride that their son is serving in one of the elite units of the army. To belong to the army means to belong to the people and State. And for many of us, being ex-refugees, or immigrants, it is difficult to undergo the process of cutting the umbilical cord with the Israeli society. It is difficult to discover that the feeling of belonging within us is no longer as significant as it was, and that perhaps for the building of a different and peaceful future we must also seek other sources to root our feeling of belonging.

"The process of political and feminist consciousness raising and change of attitudes is linked to a painful process of questioning existential problems of self-determination, belonging, alienation, womanhood, manhood, the attitude toward the army, war, peace, justice, violence, and nationalism. These questions of beliefs, values and identities were open to women, in varying degrees, according to personal security and self-identity, and according to our age and social class.

Political activity at the time of crisis of identity and values combined with active emotional dealing with those issues represents the oneness of the political and personal. We raised in the public consciousness subjects of emotional and political significance, and this is in line with our belief in the destructive effect of the split between the personal and the political, a split which enables the existence of the evil within us. Aside from raising the subjects of women's role in peace making and the influence of occupation on women's lives, we also raised subjects like racism, prejudice and fear as obstacles to peace. [For that reason and as women, we also must discuss our attitudes towards the army both on a personal and public level. This is one of the most difficult subjects to deal with and we had--so far--not dared to discuss it publicly.]

Within this maze and confusion there are among us those who have a vision of creating a political culture of women--and we have to commit ourselves to a culture of peace.
the lamenting women to the Israeli culture at the end of the 20th century, we do not satisfy ourselves with the role of lamenting and containing the pain but instead seek ways to influence the grass-roots level and the political system as a whole. We do not settle for the social role of lamenting and of accepting the madness of killing. We do not accept the existence of a women’s culture in the backyard of history, and are struggling for a change in which our world vision will be of political significance and of decision making. [According to anthropological research, in hunting and gathering societies there existed separate social organisations for men and women, but the men would not envisage going to war without first receiving the women’s explicit agreement.]

In the different women’s organizations, in the meetings and dialogues that have developed among women there can be potential for the building of solidarity and sisterhood among women. Some of us see the occupation and the national conflict as delaying the advancement of the women’s struggle in their society. However, a peaceful political solution is not only seen as a stage along the road toward cooperation between Israeli, Palestinian and Arab women, it is also one way of dealing with the role of women in our societies. The hope is that the joint experience between Israeli and Palestinian women will develop trust among the women of the area and will eventually lead to the development of a sense of common gender identity that will have a significant influence for social change in the region. We also hope that we, the women, will find the way to deal with the challenge of creating a peaceful life in the area. Today the national identification of both sides does not let us challenge publicly every issue that should—like the essence of war and armed struggle—be discussed for the purpose of creating a Women’s Peace Culture. It does not let us work together on women’s issues. A political solution to the national conflict is only a step that will free us from the restrictions of this reality. Hopefully, it will enable Palestinian, Israeli and Arab women to commit ourselves to non-violence, which is crucial in creating peace culture.

Following the crisis in the Gulf and the disappointment of many Israelis in the Palestinian reaction of supporting Saddam Hussein, the Israeli peace movement lived through a crisis, and the level of activity was lowered. At the same time, and also in view of the general feeling of helplessness regarding the political developments in Israel in particular and in the Middle East in general, the number of women in black vigils grew smaller. The political developments in the area also played a significant role in the development of the relationship between Israeli and Palestinian women. After long months of common political work, we not only failed in organizing a common political event for 12/1990, but our relationships also almost reached a dead end. A year after “1990—Time for Peace”, the world leaders started a war. We found ourselves prisoners of a war that is not ours. The culture of war—or militarism—had its victory over the culture of peace.

In days of war, because of the direct threat on Israel, most of the women found it difficult to continue standing in the open expressing opposition to the occupation. In Jerusalem and Tel Aviv some of the women returned to the vigil only after three weeks had passed. During the war, more than ever, we had to go to the streets with a clear message, not only against this specific war but against all war, against the principle of war and destruction. During this time of war many of us had to spend more time with our small children. We tried to keep our sanity in the microcosms of our families and protect our children and ourselves from the terrible fear. We lived under the fear of destruction and were exposed day and night, through the media, to the terrible war which was used as a legitimate means to achieve political and economic goals. We had to take out to the public sphere the alienation, the disgust, the fear, the anguish and the effort to develop a culture of peace within our homes.

Since the war, the Palestinian people are going through new measures of oppression under the Israeli occupation. In effect the Israeli government has created two large ghettos for the Palestinians, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Exit from the territories is by special permit only; on the whole only those Palestinian workers who are essential to the functioning of the Israeli economy are issued such permits. And the territories have no adequate economic infrastructure to cope with the influx of labour, this being due to a deliberate colonialist occupation policy over the past 24 years.

The Israeli peace movement (including the women’s movement) still has not recovered from its crisis and there is a clear regression in the scope of the activities. Today (5/1991), only 11 vigils continue to stand every week and many women feel burnt out and helpless. During the last three years we have dedicated our political activity in Israeli society to changing attitudes among Israeli women. Now apart from continuing this trend, some of us think that political change will occur only under international economic and cultural pressure.

We are also looking for ways to continue our political relationships with the Palestinian women. In the middle of the month, an Israeli, Palestinian and International women’s peace conference was held in Geneva. [This conference was postponed from 12/1990 to 5/1991.] But there is a strong feeling that in many respects we are in regression compared with the near past.

For the creation of peace culture inside the Israeli society we must deal both emotionally and politically, with painful basic issues, which the Israeli-Jewish society tends to repress, and which are connected with the establishment of the Jewish state. The exposure of the truth, as well as learning to deal with it, has to be a main issue in creating a culture which is supposed to be in touch with the needs of the peoples of the whole region.

The Israeli society should be aware of the price Palestinians paid, and are still paying, for the self-determination of the Jews. In the process of consciousness-raising concerning the meaning of the establishment of the Jewish state for the Palestinians, and their view of it as the catastrophe of ‘48, we must become aware of the fact that on the basis of this historical development, we have the duty to create a culture of peace in the area. It is not the right of “bleeding heart liberals,” but the duty of a people whose self-determination brought destruction and pain upon others.

As mentioned above, the creation of the Israeli identity, as a contrast to the Jewish diaspora identity which was seen as humiliated and helpless, did not succeed in freeing us from our self image as weak and persecuted. The continuation of having an inner image of being persecuted and humiliated, while at the same time developing a militaristic culture, creating a feeling of belonging to the society on the basis of army service, and viewing the army as a “holy” institution, is a danger to our society’s mental and social health. The army is not perceived by Jewish Israelis as a necessary evil in a reality of danger or war, but as an institution with political, social and economic power, which defines social values and priorities and forms the main origin of status and belonging in Israeli society. The present political situation, in which even western societies argue for the need of values of peace but have not yet chosen to stop the reliance upon weapons, it is difficult to put forward a unilateral demand of destruction of all weapons and the investment of military resources in social development, although in the utopian political view this should be the attitude. It should very clearly be the ideological-cultural demand of the women working for peace, social justice and freedom. But it should be emphasized that women from the so-called developed countries should have the main responsibility for it.

In the 40 years of its existence, Israel has not succeeded in integrating itself in the region, and has contributed to the creation of alienation and hate between itself and the Arab peoples. It entrenched itself to the development needs of the Arab peoples and the third world, and allied with the western world, which relies on economic exploitation of the “third” world. In creating an alternative culture of women, we must ally ourselves with the need of the peoples, in particular with the women’s needs in the area in which we live. We must break the alienation and ignorance and get in touch with Arab feminist women and women’s culture which is often hidden behind the veil.

It is a grave mistake of Israeli feminism to rely only on western feminism, which suits our personal self-determination needs. We, the women with feminist consciousness, must get in touch with Arab feminism and strive to create a feminism which will grow out of the region and which will develop itself from the women’s culture existing here, and which will be suitable to the needs of women in the Middle East. We must stop turning our backs on the region in which we are living and we must break the wall of estrangement which helps the hate towards us grow. Our loyalty should be to the eastern region in which we are living, and we, the women, must be the bridge between west and east or between north and south.

I wish to express my thanks to Sherna Berger Gluck for her useful remarks and to Andre Rosenthal for the translation of the article into English. [This article is from Walking the Red Line, Israelis in Search of Justice for Palestine, edited by Deena Hurwitz, forthcoming from New Society Publishers (Philadelphia, PA and Santa Cruz, CA).] [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$22 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

30049. Efrat, Roni Ben. “Rehumanizing the Expellees: 45 Days in a Tent: Part 4”, in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 8. Every evening the tent became an open forum. Serious questions were asked while sweet tea was passed around in disposable plastic cups. Should there be an appeal to the High Court of Justice? Should the Palestinians make their return to the peace talks conditional on the expulsion issue? People expressed their disappointment with the Rabin government and debated whether the Arab parties ought to withdraw their support. These evenings were attended by a broad spectrum of personalities, including Arab members of the Knesset, heads of Arab municipal councils, representatives of the Palestinian delegation to the peace talks, laborers who arrived from their villages after a day’s work, rabbis, Jewish peace activists, and students.

A small generator-powered black and white television was turned on for the news programs and political features. The camp was granted media coverage during its activities.

In addition to demolishing stereotypes and suspicions on both sides, the tent became an address for all citizens who wanted to express their protest against the expulsions. A continuous stream of peace organizations and residents of Arab villages have arrived at the tent, bearing fruit, cakes, and food. Each evening a volunteer from “Women in Black” has arrived with a steaming pot of soup. The tent visitors’ book was quickly filled with meditations, comments, and words of gratitude from the visitors. Many activists from Meretz have visited the tent and registered their opposition to the position of their representatives. One of them wrote: “As a member of the Citizen’s Rights Movement (Ratz), I am dismayed to be in the midst of such dark times for which my party is partly to blame. Be brave and strong and know that most of the members of the Citizen’s Rights Movement support your struggle.”

30050. Efrat, Roni Ben. “Rehumanizing the Expellees: 45 Days in a Tent: Part 5”, in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 9. The camp’s around-the-clock activities (practically on Rabin’s doorstep) and icy conditions on both sides, the tent became an address for all citizens who wanted to express their protest against the expulsions. A continuous stream of peace organizations and residents of Arab villages have arrived at the tent, bearing fruit, cakes, and food. Each evening a volunteer from “Women in Black” has arrived with a steaming pot of soup. The tent visitors’ book was quickly filled with meditations, comments, and words of gratitude from the visitors. Many activists from Meretz have visited the tent and registered their opposition to the position of their representatives. One of them wrote: “As a member of the Citizen’s Rights Movement (Ratz), I am dismayed to be in the midst of such dark times for which my party is partly to blame. Be brave and strong and know that most of the members of the Citizen’s Rights Movement support your struggle.”

30051. Efrat, Roni Ben. “Rehumanizing the Expellees: 45 Days in a Tent: Part 5”, in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 9. The camp’s around-the-clock activities (practically on Rabin’s doorstep) and icy conditions on both sides, the tent became an address for all citizens who wanted to express their protest against the expulsions. A continuous stream of peace organizations and residents of Arab villages have arrived at the tent, bearing fruit, cakes, and food. Each evening a volunteer from “Women in Black” has arrived with a steaming pot of soup. The tent visitors’ book was quickly filled with meditations, comments, and words of gratitude from the visitors. Many activists from Meretz have visited the tent and registered their opposition to the position of their representatives. One of them wrote: “As a member of the Citizen’s Rights Movement (Ratz), I am dismayed to be in the midst of such dark times for which my party is partly to blame. Be brave and strong and know that most of the members of the Citizen’s Rights Movement support your struggle.”
political organization, "Mahber Fekri Hagei"—the organization which agitated for national independence since 1941. Working women in textile factories and service industries also played a progressive role in the underground working class movement which began in the early 1940's and formally organized into the Eritrean Trade Union in 1952. When the sham federation between Eritrea and Ethiopia was imposed on the Eritrean people by the then US dominated UN, political and mass movements were to be suppressed. The workers were subjected to brutal and inhuman methods of repression and torture. The underground until 1958. In 3/1958, a four-day general strike paralyzed the country. Women workers joined the strike and militantly fought for the economic and national rights of the Eritrean people. The union and the workers movement was brutally crushed by the fascist Ethiopian government and in an attempt to further weaken and liquidate the workers movement by economically weakening the country, Ethiopian rulers moved many factories and industries to Ethiopia—thus causing the migration of thousands of workers to neighboring countries. Since then thousands of women have been forced to leave the country, many as contract workers to the Middle East, and Europe. Presently thousands of women workers are found in the Sudan, Italy and Ethiopia ruthlessly being exploited as cheap labor. In 1961, the armed struggle began under the leadership of the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) and with great patriotic sentiments, women from different parts of Eritrea joined the national liberation struggle. However, the revolutionary potential of women was not fully understood by the reactionary leadership of ELF and it never took active mobilization and organizing of women as its task.

Furthermore because of its backward and feudal chauvinistic ideas, it oppressed and exploited working women, causing their disenchantment and migration to the Sudan. Nevertheless, Eritrean women continued to resist Ethiopian colonialism and its masters US imperialism and Israeli Zionism. Thousands of working women in the Sudan continued to support the armed struggle financially and sheltered the fighters in time of need. Eritrean women workers in the Middle Eastern countries, although they were not politically organized, gave active support to the struggle even under the great hardships they experienced. With the formation of the EPLF, the Eritrean national liberation movement vigorously developed correct political line, mobilizing and uniting the masses under a revolutionary political program against their number one enemy. Thus the participation of women increased and their role in the struggle clearly identified. In 1977, they are now able to contribute wholly on an equal basis to the Eritrean revolution, and gain their liberation in the process. Under the leadership of the EPLF, women fighters are given political as well as military training. They participate in combat units, medical services, educational and agitational propaganda units. The EPLF believes that the mobilizing and organizing of women is a primary and necessary task for the success of the revolution, and is carrying out this program seriously and conscientiously. In 1974, the armed struggle intensified and under the leadership of EPLF, both fronts coordinated their attacks on the increasing aggression of the Ethiopian troops and scored brilliant victories. During this period, thousands of women from urban and rural areas joined the revolution contributing to the successful development of the Eritrean people's war. In the February war peasant women fought against the aggression troops with knives and swords, throwing spices and pepper to burn and blind the eyes of the enemy. Not only do mothers contribute fine sons and daughters to the revolution, but also in the liberated areas women are being organized to build the basis of the new society. Lenin pointed out, "in the experience of all liberation movements, the success of a revolution depends on the extent to which women take part in it." And today, in the Eritrean revolution we see the participation of women further developing and contributing to the victories of the people's war. Since a significant percentage of Eritrean women are today found in foreign countries, their participation and organization is very important. Eritrean working women in Italy, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia etc. are a great potential force who are now beginning to get organized into political organizations such as the Eritrean for Liberation in Europe, EFLNA, etc. The Eritrean women's struggle as part of the Eritrean people's national liberation movement is vigorously developing and is also reflecting the worldwide victories of the women's movement of which it is an integral part.

30052. Farhat, Albert [compiler]; Saleh, Hanna [compiler]. Sun Rises from the South: The Israeli Aggression Against South Lebanon, Facts and Testimony: Facts and Figures About the Aggression. Beirut, 1978. p. 26. The following pages give an account of the atrocities committed by the Zionist invaders and the size of the huge destruction and losses, as well as the great material damages they inflicted on the South, its people, its land and the signs of life in it. These are the facts and figures about the aggression, but they are only preliminary figures, since they do not include the damages and losses in the regions which Israel handed over after its so-called withdrawal to fascist gangs, those regions where UN troops have not entered until now. Hence, these figures cannot be considered as compromising a comprehensive census that encompasses all the results left over by the war which Israel launched against people, houses, schools, places of worship, villages, towns, fields and plantations. In spite of that, they gave a clear picture of the Zionist terrorism which was exercised in the South. What do these facts say? The invaders manifested their racist, fascist hatred against peaceful civilians. It can be said they killed in their air raids, in the shelling of their tanks and in their collective massacres civilians only. They left behind more than one thousand bodies [Reuter News Agency quoted the International Red Cross, giving the figure of 1000 killed, but a UN report on 3/1978, four days after the war started, gave the figure 700 killed until then.], most of which were bodies of old people, children and women. A large number of these victims were not killed by air raids or shelling, but directly by invading soldiers. In the town of Al-Khiyam alone, they killed more than 50 persons including old men and women in one massacre. In the massacre of Adloun, perpetrated by a seaborne Israeli commando unit in an area not reached by the military invasion, 17 southern refugees, mostly women and girls, were killed, in addition to children whose ages ranged between a year and a half and 13 years. In Rashaya el-Fokhar, they entered a church and perpetrated inside it a massacre against the inhabitants who took refuge there away from the barbarism of the invaders.... In the village of Abbasiya alone, they destroyed the houses over their inhabitants, killing 140 persons.

If these "samples" of atrocities give a picture of Zionist fascism, they indicate on the other hand the failure of the aggressors to meet face to face the fighters who resisted their invasion with courage. So they resorted instead to the killing of innocent people. These "samples" also reveal Israel's aims in forcing the largest number of the inhabitants of the South to emigrate, and in uprooting them from their land and villages. In the course of organized killing and terrorism, Israel committed a very large number of premeditated crimes, not only during the military operations, but after the ceasefire, and even after the UN troops took up position in the occupied areas. Most of the acts of torture and kidnappings to which the inhabitants in the occupied villages were subjected had taken place after the lapse of a few days on the occupation of those villages. Testimony to this is what happened in the villages of Ain Be'al, Bazourieh, Barashit, Nakoura, Bint Jbeil, Kuleia, Jabrin and others - where kidnappings took place, ending mostly in assassinations and barbaric torture inside Israeli jails. Most of the operations, in which houses were blown up and plantations burned, took place at intervals that followed the aggression. In Bazourieh, for instance, scores of houses were blown up after the lapse of eight days of the entry of Israeli troops to the village. The same case applies to Abbasiya, where 150 houses were blown up. After more than one month of their invasion, the Israelis were burning fields and plantations in Rashaya el-Fokhar and Kharoby with their phosphorous bombs. The same things happened in lbi el-Saká.

The thefts and acts of looting directly committed by the Israelis are but evidence of Zionist "civilization." Those acts took such wide proportions that even the Israeli news media could not keep silent on them. And in their attempt to minimize these scandals, "Haartz" newspaper published in Tel Aviv says, "The Israeli soldiers looted moderately...they only stole whatever their pockets and sacks could take, such as transistor radios, small valuables and old relics.... As to big thefts," Haarts says, "they were committed by unruly and undisciplined elements from the rear units." So the front units were for killing and...
The losses which the Israeli invasion caused to the agricultural wealth of the South exceeds, according to preliminary estimates and figures, one billion Lebanese pounds. For in addition to damaging tens of thousands of dunums of cultivated land and to damaging and destroying more than 150000 olive, almond, fig, orange and banana trees, the invading troops bulldozed and destroyed large areas of cultivable land in a way that made the land quite unusable. These results which the Israeli invasion made a point of achieving, including the emigration and dispersal of more than 270000 refugees, reveal Israel's final objectives in turning the South into an uninhabited region, making it lose its national identity in order to facilitate Israeli expansionist ambitions. In the following pages, there are statements and figures about the losses and damages based on an investigation made by a mission from the Lebanese "An Nidaa" newspaper that visited the South, on a report by the Higher Relief Committee (set up by the Lebanese government in order to relieve and help the victims of the Lebanese civil war), on a report by the UN Office for Refugee Affairs, and also on certain statements and figures released by the International Red Cross Committee in Lebanon. [=]

Farhat, Albert [compiler]; Saleh, Hanna [compiler]. Sun Rises from the South: The Israeli Aggression in South Lebanon. Facts and Testimony. Beirut, 1978, p. 16-17, 22-23. Munira Saleh, a refugee from Hanin: "A woman, in her seventh month of pregnancy, was killed with a bayonet piercing her stomach. And an old man was burned after he was wrapped in blankets." ("An Nidaa" newspaper, 3/22/1978) Hassan, a 12-year old boy from Bint Jebeil: "I saw our house on fire and my comrades in school dying in front of me. I ran away without taking anything with me. I left behind my books and my toys, my bed and my desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interview made by Desiree Akiki, 4/12/1978) David Hirst, correspondent of the "Guardian" newspaper, writes, "...Israeli soldiers were talking to me and to my colleague of the United Press and the 'Voice of America' softly and gently. Then they became criminal and vicious when they saw one villagers shaking. It seems that to the Israelis everyone is a disguised terrorist. The officer in charge of the soldiers asked us, 'Were there any civilians killed during the shelling?' So we pointed our fingers towards a house under whose debris an old woman was lying. We answered him that only civilians had been killed; all who had been killed were civilians." Captain Ouzi Dayan, relative of the Israeli Foreign Minister, replied when he heard our story, "I don't like to tell you this, but I was the one who gave the order to shell the school," and he pointed to a Centurion tank and said, "This is the tank which shelled from a distance of 1200 meters." (David Hirst in a report from the village of Hedatha to the "Guardian") Khalil Abu Zeid, a refugee from Zawtar: "The planes were shelling Taybeh and after that we could only see thick clouds of smoke covering the sky of the region. My son was looking after our three cows, and the enemy rained on him with 500 mm automatic fire. He was saved as if by miracle. The enemy also directed its fire against children running in the village's square. I saw with my own eyes 5 civilian cars running on the Alman road northwards. Israeli planes chased them and fired their shells at them, killing all their 40 passengers." ("As Safi" newspaper, 3/25/1978) Yousef Saadeh, Mukhtar (headman) of Ibl el-Saki, says, "What can I say? As you can see they have left nothing. They broke down the school and destroyed the church. They bulldozed the olives (about 10 dunums) and dug trenches around the village (also about 10 dunums). In any case, whatever they do we still support the joint forces and are proud of them.... But why did they destroy the school...this is the teacher standing here. Ask him how the school was." The school teacher said, "The school was one of the best government schools in the region, and had 325 students enrolled. Its large library was looted and not a single book left in it.... This is a shame." The Mukhtara then began speaking again: "We lost about 20000 olive trees...what a loss! The age of every tree was not less than 50 years and some of the trees were 400 years old. The more the olive tree gets older the more fruit it bears." ("An Nidaa" newspaper, 5/21/1978) Aziz Hawil from Sarifa (15 years) said, "The Israelis were throwing down 'reservoirs' that would explode. They threw down pens and exploding toys. When Kamal el-Din, who is of my age, picked up a toy, shining like gold, it exploded in his hand, and he was wounded in his leg and eyes. Hussein Awad was also hit and had a broken leg. So was Ali Eid (10 years) and his condition is grave." (Testimony received by Zahra Mir'i of "An Nidaa" newspaper, 3/20/1978) The correspondent of "An Nahar" newspaper Sa'id Meallawi: "Rashaya el-Fokhar was subjected to a total assination attempt. Neither the people, nor the church or houses or trees were saved. What the airforce's shells forgot, the Israeli bulldozers remembered, and wiped out the towns landmarks. "There is no road to Rashaya and anyone going there should infiltrate. Mountainous paths are not easy to cross. Anyone entering Rashaya would have to pass along the cemetery path where the dead bodies' smell spreads, and where some bodies appear wrapped in blankets. They are thought to belong to the victims of the church shelling two days before the occupation. After that, you see a destroyed jeep left over by the Israelis near the fountain at the entrance of the town. You see on the roadblocks.... The asphalted road is filled with debris, while commercial stores and even complete streets have disappeared. Even churches were looted and shelled and electricity poles stretched on the street far away from their positions." ("An Nahar" newspaper, 4/17/1978) Suleiman Sheddad says, "In Ibl el-Saki there are 300 houses, 90 of which have become uninhabitable. Most of them have brick foundations, and houses were either mined or blown up, and the rest destroyed. Ibl el-Saki used to yield a yearly crop of 100 oil Kantars. The olives and the oil are gone, and 3 artesian wells are out of use." ("An Nidaa" newspaper, 5/21/1978) Wafika Hammoud told us, "They were not satisfied with destroying, but they bulldozed the ruins. They want to hide the traces of their crimes. We lost four killed. Three of my nephews were taken away to Israel, and we know nothing about them." ("An Nidaa" newspaper team, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halikoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the Israeli soldiers asking us, 'Were there any civilians killed during from A to Z. Mahmoud Sabri from El-Kantara said, "We met him at the desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interview made by Desiree Akiki, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halikoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the Israeli soldiers asking us, 'Were there any civilians killed during from A to Z. Mahmoud Sabri from El-Kantara said, "We met him at the desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interview made by Desiree Akiki, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halikoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the Israeli soldiers asking us, 'Were there any civilians killed during from A to Z. Mahmoud Sabri from El-Kantara said, "We met him at the desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interview made by Desiree Akiki, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halikoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the Israeli soldiers asking us, 'Were there any civilians killed during from A to Z. Mahmoud Sabri from El-Kantara said, "We met him at the desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interview made by Desiree Akiki, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halikoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the Israeli soldiers asking us, 'Were there any civilians killed during from A to Z. Mahmoud Sabri from El-Kantara said, "We met him at the..."
Lebanon

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

children and his pregnant wife. The planes hit them and turned them into bones. Darwish's mother buried him and his family in the lot of land near their house. She made her cupboard a coffin for the bones. Poor mother of Darwish, she buried Darwish who was torn up in pieces." (Interview made by Alawi Sobh, "An Nida" newspaper, 3/29/1978)

"Engineers say that mines are not always the worst problem. They are usually of the type directed against groups, and they are planted in areas that become occupied and in places where they may be seen. But the problem lies in finding the time to discover all those mines before they explode. Israeli troops planted around 5000 or 6000 mines of the 'mice-trap' type, and 2000 of them were rendered ineffective. The real problem is the presence of a number of rockets, shells and cluster bombs spread at random in the different parts of the region. French engineers have already exploded 2889 cluster bombs, 856 rockets and shells, and defused 2172 mines. Engineers say there are still unexploded mines and shells that would make a whole unit busy for several years." ("An Nahar" newspaper, 7/6/1978, from the "weekly report of the UN troops command in Lebanon about the work of the French engineering unit specialized in finding and defusing mines and planted bombs in the regions of Juwaya, Ghandoor, Arzoun, and Derdeghia.") Haji Abdel Hassan Waafa, Mukhtar of Bazouria, said, "Israel came with her missiles and planes, and the shelling of the town went on for three and one-third hours.... When they occupied the southern part of the town, large numbers of tanks and armored vehicles entered. We had never seen such a thing before. The Israelis began searching the houses, putting everything in disorder.... Eight days after their entry into the town, they blew up 10 houses, looted commercial stores and stole 40 chairs from the Husseiniya." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/21/1978) The fire which Israeli occupation forces caused by firing phosphorus bombs at the forests and plantations of Rashaya el-Fokhar was extended to the plantations of Ibl el-Saki, Khiyam and the Hasbani river course. This took place in the presence of the UN troops. (Report from Jamila Hussein in Hasbaya to "An Nida," 5/27/1978)

Massoud Jarada (75 years, Rashaya al-Fokhar, said, "On the morning of 3/15/1978, the Israeli attack began. I went out with my wife and the town's inhabitants to take refuge in the church, hoping Israel would not shell places of worship. What happened was that the shelling was concentrated on the church - where the people took refuge. The shelling was fierce, and the people started running out of the church. Only persons who stayed in there were the aged people.... After the shelling ceased, the search for the lost persons began. I could not find my wife. On that sad day many people died, and we found their bodies inside the church and outside it. My wife's body was found burned inside the church." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/17/1978, interview made by Diab Kursaifi) The priest Marouni, in the Maronite bishopric in Tyre, said, "The attack was very fierce. There are still persons of the Mufid family under the debris after their house fell on them. The Israeli shelling from gunboats was also directed against the nuns' schools of St. Joseph and the Bishara Church....." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/23/1978, interview made by Ahmed Manfashi) Zeinab Kansou (11 years) said, "Israel drove us away from our houses after she destroyed half of them with her planes. I don't like her at all. When the bomb was falling I would open my mouth in order not to die from the pressure. Until now, the buzz of planes is still in my ears." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/22/1978) A woman refugee from the town of Bint Jbeil said,"I was surprised. I didn't know it was the war until the parachutists landed in the streets of the village. They killed my husband and my brother without my knowing how. I didn't see them. The tanks in the streets ordered the inhabitants to come out of their houses with their hands up. They did. But Khodr did not heed the order and ran towards his house. A tank followed him and ordered him to come out with his hands up. Khodr came out with his hands behind his back. The tank fired its gun at him and Khodr fell at the doorstep of his house. Later, masked men came to search the men and their bodies for signs showing they had participated in fighting against the Zionists. Afterwards, bullets started raining, I do not know who among the men died." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/28/1978) [7]

The campaign had begun 7/11/93 and was to last through 8/19/93.

"Now the main problem in terms of human rights is related to the situation in Lebanon. We also feel that right now that is what all the Israeli public and international media is concerned about," said campaign leader Eitan Felher.

In condemnation of the disregard for open-fire regulations and the unprecedented number of Palestinian children killed from 12/9/92 to 6/8/93, B'Tselem had organized several actions, most important of which was a discussion in the Knesset 7/22/93 among members of Meretz, Labor, Hadash, the Arab Democratic Party and the Likud.

No agreement was reached by the groups.

Felher told Al-Fajr, "It is not enough that people discuss. In the end, there must be some concrete steps."

"The main purpose of the campaign - changing the policy so that the killing will be stopped - has not been achieved yet," he noted.

He explained that the activities will resume when the situation in Lebanon calms down. [7]

30055. Greenberger, Robert S. "Rock and Roll Seems Here To Stay In Assad's Syria; Small Potatoes and Derivative, It Has State's sanction If It Steers Clear of Politic", in Wall Street Journal, January 21, 1994, p. A1. "Rock is widely played in Syria in both live performances and in recorded form as long as it is as apolitical as it is in the West. Using the media for dissident speedily ends the careers of performers, in Syria as elsewhere. Many rock performers supplement their music income by having other jobs (one prominent rocker, Ammar Alani, is a dentist). Elvis is king, but local black-fingermailed rocker Sally al-Shreiki gave a dramatic performance at the Russian Cultural Center. Her group, More Guts, plays songs by Nirvana, Ozzy Osborne and Metallica. Her goal is an all girl group. The grandfather of Syrian Rock is Rockestra, which pioneered the use of lights, smoke machines and large speakers. In the 1960s, the major bands were Dynamite and Bluebats. In 1968, Johnny Komives, a Hungarian-Syrian drummer, started a rock band named Tigers; he had learned the styles of the Beatles, Presley and Bill Haley and the Comets in Beirut. Syrian markets are filled with bootleg audio CDs, ranging from Bob Dylan to Meatloaf. The Syrian rock scene is drug free, but beer flows freely; most of the musicians are dedicated amateurs (many loaning each other the very expensive musical equipment). Some musicians are mild peace activists, hoping for a peace with Israel. At the same time, a quarter of music requests to Damascus TV show 'Letters & Songs' are for rockers such as Elton John, Iron Maiden and Guns'n Roses. Local photographers Hallah al-Faysal has shocked people with nude self-portraits, and Damascus talk radio features people denouncing higher prices."

30056. Ibrahim, Mohammed. "Letter to Hillary from a Lebanese Child", in Crecent Ibrahim, International, September 1-15, 1996, p. 6. Dear First Lady: I am lying in hospital with multiple wounds and dying. I am too young to have committed any crime and therefore do not deserve the punishment that has been meted out to me. I write to you because you are a mother and you have a child. Perhaps you can understand a little of what my mother is going through now. She is sitting next to my bed crying. She tries to smile at me through her tears. When I used to fall or get hurt, my Mama would kiss my hurt and the pain would feel so much better. But now even though she smothers me with her love and kisses, the pain I have is too much for my small body to bear. There are all sorts of tubes going in and out of me. On 4/18/96, I was rushed into surgery when I was a discussion in the Knesset 7/22/93 among members of Meretz, Labor, Hadash, the Arab Democratic Party and the Likud. No agreement was reached by the groups.

"The main purpose of the campaign - changing the policy so that the killing will be stopped - has not been achieved yet," he noted. He explained that the activities will resume when the situation in Lebanon calms down. [7]
20059. Lebrecht, Hans. "Israeli Communists Protest Attacks in Lebanon", in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), May 4, 1996, p. 14. The Israeli Communist Party condemned the Israeli attack on Lebanon in a statement that read, in part: "The Labor-Metzger government loaded celebrations for the 48th Independence Day with the heavy burden of a dreadful war in Lebanon [which killed] hundreds... Contrary to what the government alleges, this war is endangering the lives of the residents of Galilee. Therefore, the CPI calls upon all Jewish and Arab Peace forces to act with all their might to stop the war in Lebanon, to [remove] the Israeli army [from Lebanon], and struggle for peace without occupation to be negotiated with Syria and Lebanon. The CPI, together with her front-partners of Democratic Hadash, in common with [those] concerned about the future of the peoples [of the Middle East] will tirelessly act for rescinding the closure that starves the Palestinian population in the 'territories', for Israeli-Palestinian peace, the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, the capital of which will be eastern Jerusalem, side by side with the state of Israel. The CPI will continue to head the struggle for a democratic, just and equal society, fight against the privatization as well as against curtailting the rights of the working masses and women, and struggle for full equal rights of the Arab population in Israel." The statement as condemned the Israeli government for 'driving out 500000 Lebanese from their homes as well as for the horrible massacre of refugees at the Kana-Kaf [Qana] UNIFIL camp. [TEXT]

20060. Lebrecht, Hans. "Protest Against Israeli Bombing Spreads", in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), April 27, 1996, p. 4. There has been more protests in Israel after the massacre of Lebanese refugees at the Qana refugee at the UNIFIL camp. The dissent is mainly among the 18% of the Israelis who are Arabs. The refugees had fled their village by earlier Israeli artillery attacks. During the first eleven days of this attack on Lebanon, some 500000 refugees have been forced from their homes by more than 18000 artillery shells and airraids. Lebanese authorities estimate that 330 civilians have been killed so far. The economic infrastructure of southern Lebanon has been almost completely destroyed. The Clinton Administration has supported this new Israeli attack on Lebanon. A general strike was organized by the Monitor Committee of the Arabs in Israel. Demonstrations and mourning ceremonies have been conducted in major Arab villages and towns in Israel. The largest Arab demonstration was in Nazareth, which even included a few Jews from Nazareth-Elit and Haifa. Nazareth Mayor Ramon Jereissi, a member of Hadash, representatives of the Democratic Womens Movement, and Hadash chairman Hashem Mahameed called on Peres to return to peace talks, end the closure of the Occupied Territories, and to withdraw from all Occupied Territories. The massive demonstration in Nazareth was attacked on three sides by Israeli police and border guards, who tear gassed people and beat many. Many demonstrators were severely injured. In Kafr-Kana, near Nazareth, Mahameed, Hadash member of Knesset Tamar Gozansky, Communist Party of Israel General Secretary Muhammad Nafa'a, and former CPI General Secretary Meir Vilner conducted addressed protesters, denouncing Israeli atrocities and recalling that Hadash and the Communist Party were the first political parties to criticize the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982. [TEXT]
We were interrupted by a female employee who told us smoking was forbidden in the restaurant. "Oh, is it?" I replied, feigning innocence. "Sorry about that. I promise I won't smoke any more after I've finished this cigarette." Since, from her accent, she was obviously not Swedish, I went on: "Where are you from?" "Beirut, Lebanon," and, curiously and curiously, "Burj al-Barajneh"—the same refugee camp in which Rawia had lived.

I took a back seat while Rawia and she jabbered away in a flood of Arabic, until I noticed her look at me and ask Rawia a question which made her burst into laughter. I asked Rawia the cause for her mirth. "She wants to know whether you are also a Palestinian from Beirut." I joined in the laughter, and thoroughly enjoyed the woman's consternation when I replied that I was not only not a Palestinian, but a South African, Jewish, and presently living in ISRAEL!

Rawia spoke about her life with her family in a P.L.O. refugee camp in Lebanon. Rawia's parents formerly lived in a village in the Galilee, like their parents and grandparents, for many generations. During Israel's War of Independence in 1948, Rawia's parents, sister and two brothers moved to Lebanon, like thousands of other Palestinians, and were housed by the P.L.O. and UNWRA. Rawia was born in the village of Tel ez-Zatar, where her mother worked in a textile factory, and her father opened a bakery. Life was comparatively comfortable and Peaceful until 1976, when Lebanese Phalangists (Para-militia squads of ruling Maronits in Lebanon) attacked the village. Rawia's family moved to Burj el Barajneh and again took up the threads of a relatively normal life.

When she was ten years old, Shi'ites bombed Burj al-Barajneh, relentlessly and ceaselessly, day after day after day, until the place was a shambles of havoc and destruction. A mass of dead bodies lay in the streets, a mass of wounded, people bleeding, people with shattered limbs, people crying for help, for water. But there was no help, no food, no water, no medical supplies. There were just skeletons of what had been homes and shops, and broken water pipes, with the precious liquid gushing out into the gutters. Those who were able to do so, walked or crawled and helped those who could not, to get out of the inferno in which men, women and children were being callously and wantonly murdered.

Rawia's mother, who had sustained "only" a shattered forearm, was one of the ambulatoires who went in search of water, in search of anything to relieve the horrible suffering and anguish. All the men were taken away, including Rawia's father, and were never seen or heard of again. Her old and ailing grandfather was the only male survivor of her family.

30063. Lentan, Esther. "The story of a Palestinian woman in exile: Neither Kings nor Princes nor Politicians: Part 3", in Challenge, January-February, 1992, p. 35. Rawia is very much afraid that the Palestinians will be sold down the river by those who agree to a peace conference which excludes the P.L.O. "We are being used by the princes and kings and politicians for their own political ends. We do not want, nor do we need, others to speak for us. We can speak for ourselves. We want to control our own destiny and not have our destiny decided by those who would use us for their own devious political purposes and betray us or jettison us when our usefulness has been exhausted." [Esther Levitan is a member of the African National Congress] [\red] 30064. Misailides, Bobbis. "Coalition Government Collapses In Turkey", in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), July 1, 1996, p. 3. The three-month-old coalition government of the Motherland and the True Path parties collapsed in Turkey June 6 after Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz resigned. Yilmaz stepped down in the face of a no-confidence motion put forward by Necmettin Erbakan's Refah (Welfare) party, which is described in the big-business media as the party of "Islamic fundamentalism." The minority capitalist-coalition government was put together in March to keep Refah (RP) from power after the party came in first in December's general election, capturing 158 of the total 550 seats in parliament. Both the Motherland Party (ANAP) and Tansu Ciller's True Path Party (DYP) are posing as the defenders of secular Turkey. The fall of the bourgeois government in Turkey registered the crisis the rulers face in their capacity to form a regime stable enough to impose further austerity measures on workers and farmers, and to continue their bloody war against Turkey's Kurdish population. The insecurity felt by capitalist interests was registered by a sharp drop in Istanbul's stock exchange. "The only news is bad news," said Atlıla Yesilada of Global Securities. "But if we haven't reached the bottom we are probably very close to it." The Turkish lira fell to 78340 against the dollar while average annual inflation is running at nearly 60%. Since taking office, Yilmaz promised Turkey's capitalist families, the International Monetary Fund and imperialist banks which are pushing to collect Turkey's nearly $74 billion foreign debt, that his government will squeeze working people further. He announced a package of austerity measures that included steep tax increases, cuts in health care, and the raising of the retirement age to 65 years for men and 60 for women. He vowed to continue the privatization of state owned industries such as the Turpas oil refinery, the pharmaceutical company Pefkim, and Turkish Airlines. Half of Turkey's manufacturing industry and 60% of its financial sector are owned by the state. Since modern Turkey emerged from the ruins of the Ottoman empire in the 1920's, tobacco, oil, shipbuilding, and...

Austerity measures similar to those Yilmaz tried to push through, were attempted by previous governments, including the one of Ciller. These attacks faced widespread resentment among working people and provoked strike mobilizations that eventually led to the downfall of her government last October. On May Day, tens of thousands of working people gathered at Kadikoy square in Istanbul to celebrate this international day of struggle and to protest Yilmaz's austerity attacks. The protest, which was declared illegal by the government, was organized by the General Workers Federation Turk Is, the illegal Federation of Public Workers, the Revolutionary Workers Union Federation DISK, and the labor federation Hak Is, which politically looks to Refah. The Kurdish Workers Party (PKK), which is banned, also participated with its own banners. The police attacked the protest brutally, killing three people and wounding 45. The cops arrested some 220 unionists.

Turkey's capitalist rulers have also failed to stop the resistance of Kurds for their national rights, which is centered in the southeastern part of the country. This region is being ruled under "state of emergency" measures. Estimates of the Kurdish population range between 10-20 million among the country's 63 million people (no official census identifying Kurds is allowed). Poverty and the war by Turkey's army have forced millions of Kurds from the countryside into the shantytowns around the big cities. Istanbul's population, for example, is growing by an estimated 400,000 people per year, many of them Kurds. A report from the UN "Habitat Summit" held in Istanbul on June 6, said that "the migration has fostered a discontented and explosive population that is growing by the day in Turkey's major cities." This growing discontent among Turkey's workers and peasants was registered in the growth of Erbakan's Welfare party. In scattered local elections held on June 3, the Refah gained 33.5% of the vote in 41 local polls across Turkey. It increased its vote by 3.5% over what it received in the same districts in the December general elections at the expense of the ruling bourgeois coalition. The ANAP came in second with 21%, while the DYP trailed third with 12%. Refah has presented itself as the voice of the poor in the ghettos of the cities and the impoverished peasants in the countryside. Leaders of the party oppose imperialist intervention in Arab countries. They denounced the recent massive bombing of Lebanon by the Zionist regime in Israel. The party's vice-president Abdullah Gul said on June 9 that an RP government would cancel the recent five-year military cooperation agreement between Israel and Turkey, which was backed by Washington. The government crisis was precipitated by charges of corruption brought against Ciller by Refah deputies. Motherland decided to support the corruption probes against its coalition partner. Ciller is accused of making millions for her personal coffers from sales of state-owned industries during the privatization campaign by her government. After the resignation of Yilmaz, Erbakan proclaimed victory. "By the end of June," he said, "the RP will form a government that will receive a vote of confidence." Erbakan called both ANAP and DYP to participate in his new government.

30065. Montell, Jessie. "The Fertility Imperative: Part 3", in Challenge, September-October, 1992, p. 25. There are certain ideological checks upon Israel's "cult of fertility." A regulation instituted in 1989 states that artificial insemination (a highly accessible technology which can be performed without medical assistance) can only be conducted in recognized clinics. The regulation further stipulates that all unmarried women seeking artificial insemination will need to obtain the approval of a psychiatrist and a social worker. Professor Shenkar, director of the artificial insemination clinic at Hadassah Hospital, Ein Karen stated in an interview that lesbians "will not fulfill the hospital's criteria."

Israel, it appears, is only interested in Jewish babies produced within the heterosexual nuclear family. While an unmarried heterosexual or lesbian woman who has children may be fulfilling her "duty to reproduce, she is not fulfilling her duty to become part of a family unit in the patriarchal definition of the word and thus she constitutes a threat to the ideology of Jewish national reproduction.

The priority Israel gives to reproduction and fertility does result in some legislation beneficial to women. Regarding employment, for example, the Women's Employment Act of 1954 protects a woman from being fired during pregnancy and grants a 12-week paid maternity leave, as well as paid absences for postnatal care and nursing of the infant. None of these absences can damage a woman's seniority or her promotion rights. A woman who does not work outside the home is defined as a "housewife" under the National Insurance Law of 1968 and is entitled to such benefits as accident insurance and a retirement pension just like any other worker. In certain instances, women organizing politically have also benefited from the familialistic orientation of Israeli society. Although the feminist campaign to raise the issue of domestic violence initially provoked ridicule and disbelief, it eventually succeeded in garnering the support of a broad spectrum of government agencies and women's organizations - as soon as domestic violence came to be understood as a threat to the primacy of motherhood and the stability of the family.

Women's anti-war activism also successfully capitalized on the cultural symbolism of motherhood. "Parents Against Silence," one of two major anti-war movements demanding withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon in 1983-4, came to be known as "Mothers Against Silence," because the majority of the members and leaders were women. The name evokes the powerful symbolic foundation: women protesting against war becomes an extension of their culturally assigned role of life-givers. And in fact these women claim that they were protesting out of concern for the safety of their sons; they were protesting not as activists, not as feminists, but as mothers.

While feminism made some inroads into these priorities, a woman without children in Israeli society - even a well educated woman - is a source of pity. The demographic race is no more a solution to the Palestinian/Israeli conflict than is the military race. Women's voices against both these races must be clearly heard.[=] ton countries in South-East Asia. In both periods, this exploited labour force did not lead to the creation of a permanent under-class of migrants in the way that US capital created a black under-class. This was because the exploitation of migrants was not based primarily on physical differences, but rather on their lack of English. While Vietnamese refugees can be found in sweatshops and on factory floors along with migrants from eastern Europe, non-English speaking migrants tend to be concentrated in menial, low-paid jobs. English-speaking migrants are more commonly located in the higher paying professions. The cultural and linguistic barriers that provide the basis for the super-exploitation of migrants are overcome through the generations.

Institutional barriers do not prevent second and third generation migrants, who have acquired language skills, from entering professions. The children of migrants, in other words, are native-born Australians. Aborigines, despite their tens of thousands of years in Australia, were not even legally citizens until the 1967 referendum. Racial prejudice against migrants of colour does not of course always provide a direct and immediate material benefit to someone. On arrival in Australia, many Indians and Japanese do not join the super-exploited layers of the work force, yet they may still face some discrimination. Some interpret this prejudice as the product of another individual’s ignorance. But such “personal” prejudice is a by-product of the institutionalised racism that serves material interests. If we are serious about fighting racism, we have to be willing to challenge the ruling class which uses it to divide people who have common interests. Similarly, in tackling sexism, we have to challenge the same system, which creates and perpetuates the structured inequality between men and women. The historical exclusion of women from education, the lack of publicly funded child-care facilities, which forces women to stay at home, and the systematic underpayment of women are examples of how discrimination against women is structured into the system. By defining woman’s primary role as housewife and mother, capitalism profits enormously from women’s unpaid social labour. Thus sexism, like racism, has a material base in the drive of capital to make super-profits. We need independent women’s and anti-racist movements to challenge and change this situation. When women have organised themselves independently of the major political parties, they have been very successful in winning changes. Pressure from the second wave of the women’s movement in the 1970s forced governments to introduce a range of legal reforms relating to women’s wages, access to education and better employment opportunities. The Jobs For Women campaign which recently won its 14-year anti-discrimination battle against BHP shows that women organising in defence of their interests is essential for change. People of colour also have to organise together in anti-racist movements to bring about change. The mass black liberation movement in the US played a major role in raising consciousness about, and opposition to, racism. In Australia, Aboriginal people have been able to win reforms through their organisation in land rights and other movements. Focusing on personal prejudice within small groups, such as feminist collectives, does nothing to alter the power relations of society. Mass movements which challenge the structures and institutions of racism are the most effective way of breaking down the root cause of personal prejudice.

It is only in this context that consciousness raising can occur on a large scale: people change their attitudes through action, not through being told how racist they are. Today, in the absence of anti-racist and women’s movements, academic postmodernist theories have influenced much thinking about sexism and racism, persuading many people that mass action is irrelevant to political strategy. Postmodernists argue that the whole concept of a unified mass movement is “phallic” and “problematic”. They say that solidarity and sisterhood are just another way of using “discourse” to “mask power relations”, and that because women come from such different class and racial backgrounds there can be no solidarity. We need to reject romanticised ideas that seek to present all women as equally oppressed. However, we will not be able to defeat sexism and racism unless we do unite in a mass way to fight back. Sisterhood, as an expression of political solidarity, is something we can unite around. While the strength of the women’s movement comes from its autonomy, this does not mean that it can fight sexism in isolation from other progressive movements. The strength of each movement for human liberation comes from other movements which also challenge the common enemy. This is the important connection between the women’s, the anti-racist and the workers’ movements. [=]

576

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
party line are expressed through the American Jewish media, or through membership in communal organizations, censorship and an attempted imposition of orthodoxy will simply not work. The changes taking place are positive ones, for the most part, as they express the desire of most American Jews to live—and think, and express themselves—as Americans first. Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir urges Jewish journalists to “exercise caution” when reporting on Israel. [ ]

30068. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Forum 85, Nairobi, Kenya: The Women's Decade: Filmforum: Skirting the Issue: Government Confiscation of the Motion Picture 'Leila and the Wolves", in Connexions. An International Women's Quarterly, numbers 17-18, October 1, 1985. pp. 20-21. Leila and the Wolves by Lebanese director Heiny Srour had passed the censors and was scheduled to be screened the second to the last day of the Forum. A good-sized crowd had turned out to see this provocative film on the history of Lebanese and Palestinian women only to discover that it had been confiscated by the Censorship Board.

This unfortunate incident symbolized the merging of two battles that had permeated the conference for ten days: the exercising of censorship by the Kenyan government and the conflict in the Middle East. The comprehensive film schedule, which revealed excessive preparation, had been made worthless by the Kenyan Censorship Board. Daily there was talk of some film being censored or detained. Concurrently, heated exchanges were taking place over the situation in the Middle East. Not only could no middle ground be reached, but most mention of Palestine or Israel deteriorated into argument, accusation or denial. The Kenyan government appeared to panic over the ongoing battle between Palestinians and Zionists.

It was in this atmosphere that Leila and the Wolves was withdrawn. Regarding the issue of censorship, it became the straw that broke the camel's back. During the entire conference participants and organizers had been frustrated by never knowing from day to day which films would be screened. Furthermore, the NGO Organizing Committee would not take a stand against censorship. Instead, the attitude that "these are the rules and we must not object because we are guests" was put forth by the Committee as well as the Forum newspaper. The act of censorship was not questioned and, indeed, even discussing the issue became taboo.

The following is a transcript of a spontaneous demonstration which took place after everyone heard that the film had been confiscated. While at the movie theater, a petition was immediately drafted. The audience then debated what plan of action should be taken. Some wanted to march to the Censorship Board, others wanted to return to the Forum site to collect more people. The fact that demonstrations are illegal put a damper on the first suggestion. So everyone returned to the Forum, where the shouting attracted Dame Nita Barrow, the NGO convener. The article begins with the director addressing the crowd outside in the main organizers of the Filmforum, Mrs. Hannah Fisher, gave a priority list to Lebanon. And I would like to say that a similar film on the history of Israeli women called Anou Banou was screened without any problem. Now please listen to Dame Nita Barrow who has been doing everything she can since this morning to release the film. And she’s on our side.

Dame Nita Barrow: May I ask that women of this Forum please return with me to the Peace Tent where I can speak with you over a microphone there. The Peace Tent has been put here as a place to resolve differences. There have been many problems in relation to the films. We are more aware of them than any of you could be.

[After assembling in the Peace Tent] Please take every man I see out of here. I say out of here and I mean out of here. Please get the man out of the back of this tent. You women are marching about the wrong things. You should be marching for the privilege to be able to resolve your differences yourselves. Get the men out of the tent. If there are any men in any sight of the tent, this meeting cannot go on. If those men do not move, find security immediately and say that the problem I have is not with the women of the Forum, it is with the men who refuse to do what we ask.

Members of the Crowd: You’re diluting the issue. Let’s get to the background of this.

Dame Nita Barrow: I’m fully prepared to have the background, but first I would just like to ask what purpose you expect to achieve when you go out of the grounds of this University. Because in this country, which I’ve made clear and I repeated this morning several times, you have no right to march unless you obtain official permission. As long as you are on the grounds of the University, you are under a certain amount of protection.

If you have a question to discuss, as I have been discussing all day about this particular film, then we find alternatives. If there are no alternatives, we find what steps we can take. I hear hotheads saying it is the government, it is the films, we want the films. Do you really believe that by marching out of here downtown you’re going to get the films?

Members of the Crowd: Do you really think we'll get it by talking here?

Dame Nita Barrow: You may not get it by talking here, but you have far more chance of getting it talking as we are doing. You are not going to get it shown, I can assure you. You might not even get it back; and I know and respect this producer. In fact I was delighted when she came. She stated to me early this morning that her film had first passed and then they had come and taken it away and removed the passing.

I hope she told you that it was because some women had violated something that we worked very hard to obtain, that the films would be passed by documentation to expedite them. The documentation was taken at face-value. And as I have found out, some of her own countrywomen showed a film which violated that. Now I hope she told you that. As a consequence, she has suffered with a film that is very good. But let me say now, that it is not going to increase any chances if you proceed to march. It puts you in personal jeopardy. I only wish that those who wish to march so after I’ve explained the case. But as you leave you leave by one entrance and you give up your Forum badge because you are not marching in the name of the Forum.

Now I want to be clear. I have no protective rights over you. The choice is yours. Alternatively we can get a caucus on what is to be done. We still have 24 more hours. The floor is over to you.

[Hubbub from the crowd] I'm not having a cacophony of sound. One person at a time can speak. After that those who wish to march can proceed to do so. We'll have your badges collected.

Heiny Srour: Sisters, I'm going to explain the case. Now the organizers of the Filmforum, Mrs. Hannah Fisher, gave a priority list to the Kenyan government three days ago. It included my film so they would have enough time to screen it. Two days ago we had a piece of paper stating it had cleared the Kenyan Censorship Board. And then 24 hours later, they came to the premises of the Kenyan National Theater, right here at the University, and took the copy by force. And that you have to know is illegal. They have no right whatsoever to take back a copy which does not belong to them.

Dame Nita Barrow: Just a moment. Just a moment.

Heiny Srour: With respect, Dame Nita, really, honestly. Thank you very much for everything you are doing. I know you have been working on this case since the morning, but I think it is also, with respect to everything you've said, a fact that the Kenyan government is doing something illegal by taking the film forcibly after having given their permission to show it.

Now I heard, and I don't know the facts, so maybe you will be able to document this. I heard that in fact they are withdrawing this film because some Lebanese women showed a film about the issue of the Lebanese war and the Israeli invasion. I don't know what happened. But I know certainly something, which is that I am part of the Filmforum. I am part of nothing else. I am a filmmaker; I am an artist. Now why on earth...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

is it that a film showing the contribution of Arab women in history is not shown?

I think that the whole issue of censorship first should be opposed, whether for me or for the rest of my colleagues in the Filmforum who have been censored, especially the video filmmakers. First of all the issue of censorship is wrong because I happen to believe that we are old enough to make up our minds and we shouldn't be treated like little girls. I think it is extremely insulting. Number two, on this particular film, I think the Kenyan government ought to respect themselves enough that once they have given the agreement on paper to show it two days ago, they should stick by that. I don't know whether it is true that other Lebanese women violated the laws or didn't violate the laws. I know one thing. I am part of the Filmforum and I should not be punished as a Lebanese for mistakes other Lebanese have or have not made. I just cannot accept this logic. I will also not accept that an Israeli woman makes a mistake and that other Israeli women get punished. That's wrong.

My issue is not just over my film being censored and being withheld illegally. I am sick, me and all the women filmmakers, and I would like them all to speak. All the women filmmakers who came from all over the world to show their videos and films are sick and tired of the disruption of the Filmforum because the Kenyan government has been treating us like little children who are not adult enough to make up our own minds. It is sad that on an occasion like this, when women are coming from all over the world, and it's a very exceptional occasion, we are going to be censored and treated like little children. On which occasion on earth are women not going to be censored? This is the whole issue quite frankly. Censorship touches all women, so I would now like to debate this important issue here.

Dame Nita Barrow: I'm sorry, the Peace Tent is closed to that debate because for us the issue of censorship has been an ongoing battle. And what is more, the people who brought things here knew there was censorship. We have tried to short-circuit it.

30069. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Introduction: Women and Militarism: We're in the Army Now," in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 11, December 1, 1984, pp. 2-3. The US invasion of Grenada has faded from the front pages to be replaced by the latest casualty reports in Lebanon. As the year draws to a close, the cruise missiles have arrived at Ghelmom, the Common, the Soviets have walked out of the Geneva arms talks, and the largest peace demonstrations since WWII have taken place in Europe. The screaming headlines have ignored or successfully de-emphasized are the multitude of wars that have been continuing for days, months, years--in which the major involvement of the US and other industrial nations has been that of supplier of arms.

In this issue we present examples of how militarism affects women's lives, how we as women suffer from the act of war and how we perpetuate it. While putting together this issue our discussions revolved around the complexity of militarism, the nature of its power and its relationship to women.

Militarism is a deeply embedded, ongoing set of processes which operate long before and long after actual battles are fought. Women's role is often portrayed as secondary to the serious business of soldiering. However, without participation, the institution of militarism would come to a grinding halt. Once we recognize the active roles that women play, we can begin to see the many possible ways that militarism can be challenged.

Militarism is directly supported by the ever-expanding arms industry, which encompasses a vast number of jobs both directly and indirectly connected to actual arms production. Such diverse fields as computer science, medicine, communications, nuclear technology and the food industry are part of this huge network which also includes arms trading, storage and transport industries. The weapons industry is dependent upon the civilian sector for labor, and women are there--in offices, labs, warehouses, hospitals and on factory floors.

In 1982, the US, the world's leading arms exporter, supplied one and a half times more weapons to other countries than did the USSR. Weapon manufacturers and supplies worldwide sell to any nation or group wanting to buy, regardless of where they sit on the political spectrum. Like any other item produced in our consumer society, markets for the endless surplus of weapons must be found. The drive for political and economic control, national security, or liberation struggles provide these markets, and when they falter, the suppliers encourage them.

Militarism is also linked to the consumer practices of our society. A standard of living that makes extravagant use of resources encourages industrial nations to look constantly for newer and cheaper sources of raw materials and goods. We continually see the pattern repeated: multinationalis appropriate arable land that was once used to grow basic foodstuffs. The power of multinationalis is stronger than the pressure of a country of people, which is why they can exert to oppose this trend. To fully assure the Peoples continence acquiescence to the needs of multinationals, military force or the threat of force is often required, for it takes guns as well as money to make people act against their own interests.

Beyond the economic factors which militarize society, an ideological support system is needed to mobilize Peoples hearts and minds to the diverse needs of militarism. Every nation on earth uses propaganda to direct its citizens to “direct” behavior. For nations whose streets are free of battle, propaganda is used to make militarism attractive. In other countries, where war is not an event seen only on television, the luxury of not being involved is no longer there.

Propaganda formulates several categories for women in order to provide incentives and support to soldiers. They are cast as wives, mothers, sweethearts, prostitutes, and nurses--or as the enemy, justifying rape, mutilation and murder, any of which is likely to earn a soldier respect and medals. The roles propaganda assigns to women, and that women play voluntarily or involuntarily, not only help to justify but also motivate soldiers to play theirs.

Besides its mobilizing function, propaganda in its less direct forms provides an even more subtle yet equally vital service for the military, and thus militarism. Suffused throughout the society at large, propaganda at this level is designed to construct a social reality in which the presence of the military is seen as a normal, essential and familiar point of reference in daily life. Absorbed throughout the society, militarism as a "mindset" appears in language, fashion, games, etc.

If the militarization of a society, economically, psychologically and ideologically, is a concrete reality of militarism, it is also then a state of war. Indeed actual combat is but one facet of war. Seen this way, there are very few countries that are not in some way at war. For example, in 1982, the US, the world's leading arms exporter, supplied one and a half times more weapons to other countries than did the USSR.

And is the war really over when the gunfire has stopped? Can the war be said to have ended when the government announces a cease-fire? Does the war end when the soldiers are withdrawn from the battlefield? Or when the armistice is signed? Is the war really over when the politician declares the war to be over? Is the war really over when the trade embargo is lifted? Is the war really over when the withdrawal of military forces and the release of prisoners is announced? Is the war really over when the victims demand peace?Can the war be said to have ended when the government announces a cease-fire? Does the war end when the soldier is withdrawn from the battlefield? Or when the armistice is signed? Is the war really over when the politician declares the war to be over? Is the war really over when the trade embargo is lifted? Is the war really over when the withdrawal of military forces and the release of prisoners is announced? Is the war really over when the victims demand peace?
Q: How effective is the women's organisation?
A: From 1982-87 the splits in the PLO affected our struggle and the masses, especially women. Women play an active role in all the uprisings of our people, but when there are political and military defeats the women go back to their homes. We are pioneers, wanting to mobilise women again, to return their confidence in the revolution and the hopes which began with the revolution. Many women lost their hopes with the splits in the PLO and the besieging of the camps in Lebanon. In Lebanon our women are sharing and defending the camps which are besieged, defending our national identity and not just providing material support.

In Syria and other parts of the Arab World we are far from the hot spots, but we have had good results. After the restoration of the PLO more women were participating, but since the beginning of the present uprising in the Occupied Territories a big change has happened among our masses in general. Among women it is very clear, they are passionately with the Uprising. The important thing now is how to mobilise that passion.

Q: What effect is the Uprising having on women living outside Palestine?
A: People in the Occupied Territories are very well organised; everyone has a role. Do you know that from the beginning of the Uprising until June 4, 728 women have had miscarriages because of tear gas or beatings? This and other news really affected our women, really mobilised them. They want to do something. What we as an organisation have to do is give them an answer in an organised way. Many women are sharing in strikes outside the Red Cross and United Nations offices, and they are celebrating important days such as International Women's Day. On June 1, International Child Day, we organised a camp for children. The children went to UNICEF with a declaration and flowers to take to the children in Palestine via UNICEF officials. The children were only able to participate with the support of their mothers. The number of children killed in the Uprising is 52, ranging from children a few days old to fifteen years old. Two days ago (June 11) in the Gaza Strip people discovered a three-year-old child thrown in a well.

Q: What support can women here give?
A: Spread the word about what is going on, but not just what we say, try to go in groups and visit the area. We are in need of doctors and medicine for the thousands who have been injured. Milk is also needed and support for universities, kindergartens, nurseries.

Further Reading: "Water, Bread, and Mortar Shells," Connexions n. 26, 1988 [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.1=[-]

30071. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Woman, Mother, Organizer, Hijacker: Palestine", in Connexions. An International Women's Quarterly, number 16, Spring 1985, pp. 22-23. [The following interview with Heiny Sour, a Lebanese filmmaker and director of the film Leila and the Wolves, was conducted by Manny and excerpted from Spare Rib, a British feminist monthly, no. 132, 3/1985.]

Q: How did you become a filmmaker?
A: As a child I was not allowed to dance, play the piano or even to draw. I was sent to a French school, which punished me if I spoke Arabic, but I didn't want to express myself in the coloniser's language. Lebanon is a merchant society, a sectarian society. I was born in a Jewish community, Jews in Lebanon, being a minority without parliamentary representation, are obsessed with respectability. Being an artist wasn't respectable. The model was Einstein. But my parents themselves unconsciously were good artists. My mother's drawings are great and my father is one of the best singers in the Jewish community. And despite themselves, they helped me. Without that cultural background, I would not have been able to create those marriage scenes, songs and dances in the film.

Q: How did the sectarian society hinder you as an artist?
A: I almost conformed and nearly became a chemist, but my teacher told me, "Be a good artist, and not a bad chemist." At the age of

---

Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] =-

Leila Khaled is a member of the Central Committee of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), an executive member of the General Union of Palestinian Women (GUPW) from 1974-1980, and now, living in Syria, she heads the PFLP's women's organisation, established in 1986. Her political activities are varied, but she is most famous in the West for her role as a hijacker in 1969 and 1970. In an interview with Leila in Benghaz, Libya, on 6/13/1989 (while I was attending an International Conference in Support of the Palestinian Uprising in the Occupied Territories), she spoke about the hijackings and how they were an important part of her political work and that of the Palestinian national liberation movement.

A: I hijacked two planes, the first in 1969 for which I was imprisoned in Syria for 45 days. The second, in 1970, was an El Al plane from Amsterdam. My comrade, Patrick, a Sandinista from Nicaragua, was killed. They didn't shoot me. The plane landed in Britain and I spent 28 days in British custody. My release came after the PFLP hijacked a BOAC plane to demand the release of all our comrades imprisoned following the hijacking of four planes.

Q: Why did you take part in the hijackings?
A: In 1967 our masses and our revolution became besieged inside the Occupied Territories. We had to do something to speak for the revolution. Our orders were clear; we were not to kill or injure anyone on the planes. We followed those orders. I had two hand grenades, which I opened, and of course you cannot close them again. I held them tight so they would not explode, even when we were captured.

After 1970 we (the PFLP) decided to stop this kind of activity because it no longer had a political use. In the beginning our cause was not known—the world saw us as refugees, only in need of clothes and food. We were obliged to do something to form the question "Who are they?" and to answer this question during the course of our revolution. It was not possible to have the question and answer at the same time.

Q: How did you become so politically active?
A: I was twenty-four at the time of the hijackings, but my political career began when I was fifteen years old because of the effect of the mother I had on me. All the time when I was a child my mother would say we had everything in Palestine and nothing outside, not even our dignity. I learned that if only I return to Palestine I will be able to obtain it. Even our oranges were in Palestine!

My eldest brother also affected us through his political activity. I am the sixth child out of twelve. We are all organised.

Myself now have two sons, aged five and two-and-a-half. I was afraid to become a mother because my life is so dangerous. They are already beginning to understand our situation, but they are still young. The other day my eldest son came from school saying that another child had told him, "Your mother has stolen planes." He demanded to know where the plane was so he could go and play with it! He knows that King Hussein, Reagan, and Israel are against the Palestinians, but he can also know--the world saw us as refugees, only in need of clothes and food. The world saw us as refugees, only in need of clothes and food.

Q: How has your political work continued?
A: Since the hijackings I have been assigned to internal organisation and mass work for the PFLP. From 1974-1980 I was an Executive Committee of the GUPW until the PFLP formed its own organisation in 1986. It is not parallel to the GUPW; our members are either comrades or supporters of the political line of the PFLP. Our main role is to teach women how to organise and work either in the women's union or in general. Because we are outside our land we face many economic and social problems, and they affect the women most. Therefore it is important to organise women because we do not believe in work that is not organised.

---

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
18 in 1962, two films that were turning points for me were Fellini's 8 1/2 and Cleo de Cinq a Sept by a French woman, Agnes Varda. I told myself then that painting is not a big loss, dancing is not a loss, writing is not a loss; it is filmmaking that I must do. I felt cinema was the language that I wanted to express myself with. When I saw the Fellini film, I thought, "I am a woman, I can never be a filmmaker." But when I saw the film by Agnes, first I thought, "I can make it." Then I saw that she was a European woman, and I thought, "Why not me?" This was the turning point for Palestinians. As for the Lebanese case, I chose the Civil War. This enabled me to select examples, samples of history which show women in the spontaneous uprising of a town in Palestine in the '20s; women in armed struggle in the countryside in Palestine in '36-'39; women in a massacre in Deir Yassin; women in the Civil War in Lebanon. The patterns of women's lives in all the above situations are nearly the same. And in all these situations, if women don't bargain for themselves from the beginning, they will be the ultimate losers, like in the French, the Russian, the Iranian Revolutions.

I want women to invade men's empires, their political, economic bases, not like Indira Gandhi or Golda Meir, but to change men's laws, change the game of politics, and to say the hell with your rules, games. We want to set different rules, and play different games. I want my films to express this intervention.

Q: How has your film been received in the Jewish community?
A: I am a freak in the Jewish community. I think all Jewish thinkers and artists become so when they make a decision to leave the Jewish community, because the community is warm and supportive but stifling and self-destroying. There is a tradition of Jewish radicals being expelled from the community which I benefited from. But most of all I benefited from the cosmopolitan life in Beirut which, before the Civil War, was culturally very fertile and exciting. Being Jewish was a hindrance because your family didn't want you to mix with gentiles in case you married them.

Q: Can you tell us specifically how Jewish women are oppressed in Arab countries?
A: I don't like the trend of thought among Zionists that your Jewishness is your first identity. I feel I am first a woman, then an Arab, and through Lebanese women, because part of the film is on Lebanon. Because I was born in Lebanon, where you have half a million Palestinians out of a population of about three million. During very crucial years of my life the Palestinian presence on Lebanese soil was a very big issue. Even in the Arab world, the Palestinian woman, the image of Palestinian women, were made a cause celebre. These token women are used by political parties institutions and states to hide the daily lives of the majority of women. These women are made to be symbols to compensate the reality. I respect them. They are brave, but I'm saying that these women are being used. My film is precisely about the silent, unglamorous sacrifices of the women in Lebanon. During the Civil War, each militia had its token woman. Incidentally, the Phalangists had more token women than the rest of them. If sectarianism is guiding the gun, women had better not use the gun. In the Palestinian part, it is a just war. Women should participate, but at this moment we are not getting anything out of it. In the Lebanese part of the film, I am saying that it is an absurd war. It is a power struggle between the Christian Maronites and Muslims, and women make enormous sacrifices. The Western-made image of Lebanon under the Christian rule was that it is the only democratic country in the Middle East. Let me tell you about this democratic land; the same Islamic rules that have governed Saudi Arabia have governed Lebanon. The "honour" killing of women (for allegedly bringing dishonor upon the family) continues; two women are killed by the male relations in a week in a country of only one and half million women, and the killers go free. But there is a law if a man kills his neighbor's dog, he will be imprisoned for three months.

Q: When did you think of making the film? And how long did it take?
A: Ideas came to me very early on. Since I was a kid, I heard my mother say, I am the only servant who is not paid and doesn't have holidays, and she was from the upper class and had two servants to serve her. Such things were brewing in my head. It took me six years of my life, from script writing, fundraising, shooting, and completing and doing nothing else. It was finished in the summer and then shown at the Edinburgh Festival.

Q: Why did you include different historical periods?
A: Why shouldn't women be ambitious? Because men only want women to deal exclusively with women's issues like home, family and so on, they want to ghettoize us. I resent this. We should deal with the public affairs and political issues too. I brought in the history of Palestine since the Balfour Declaration in 1917 up to the massacre at Deir Yassin in 1948, which was the turning point for Palestinians. As for the Lebanese case, I chose the Civil War. This enabled me to select examples, samples of history which show women in the spontaneous uprising of a town in Palestine in the '20s; women in armed struggle in the countryside in Palestine in '36-'39; women in a massacre in Deir Yassin; women in the Civil War in Lebanon. The patterns of women's lives in all the above situations are nearly the same. And in all these situations, if women don't bargain for themselves from the beginning, they will be the ultimate losers, like in the French, the Russian, the Iranian Revolutions.

I want women to invade men's empires, their political, economic bases, not like Indira Gandhi or Golda Meir, but to change men's laws, change the game of politics, and to say the hell with your rules, games. We want to set different rules, and play different games. I want my films to express this intervention.

Q: How has your film been received in the Jewish community?
A: I am a freak in the Jewish community. I think all Jewish thinkers and artists become so when they make a decision to leave the Jewish community, because the community is warm and supportive but stifling and self-destroying. There is a tradition of Jewish radicals being expelled from the community which I benefited from. But most of all I benefited from the cosmopolitan life in Beirut which, before the Civil War, was culturally very fertile and exciting. Being Jewish was a hindrance because your family didn't want you to mix with gentiles in case you married them.

Q: Can you tell us specifically how Jewish women are oppressed in Arab countries?
A: I don't like the trend of thought among Zionists that your Jewishness is your first identity. I feel I am first a woman, then an Arab, and through Lebanese women, because part of the film is on Lebanon. Because I was born in Lebanon, where you have half a million Palestinians out of a population of about three million. During very crucial years of my life the Palestinian presence on Lebanese soil was a very big issue. Even in the Arab world, the Palestinian woman, the image of Palestinian women, were made a cause celebre. These token women are used by political parties institutions and states to hide the daily lives of the majority of women. These women are made to be symbols to compensate the reality. I respect them. They are brave, but I'm saying that these women are being used. My film is precisely about the silent, unglamorous sacrifices of the women in Lebanon. During the Civil War, each militia had its token woman. Incidentally, the Phalangists had more token women than the rest of them. If sectarianism is guiding the gun, women had better not use the gun. In the Palestinian part, it is a just war. Women should participate, but at this moment we are not getting anything out of it. In the Lebanese part of the film, I am saying that it is an absurd war. It is a power struggle between the Christian Maronites and Muslims, and women make enormous sacrifices. The Western-made image of Lebanon under the Christian rule was that it is the only democratic country in the Middle East. Let me tell you about this democratic land; the same Islamic rules that have governed Saudi Arabia have governed Lebanon. The "honour" killing of women (for allegedly bringing dishonor upon the family) continues; two women are killed by the male relations in a week in a country of only one and half million women, and the killers go free. But there is a law if a man kills his neighbor's dog, he will be imprisoned for three months.

Q: When did you think of making the film? And how long did it take?
A: Ideas came to me very early on. Since I was a kid, I heard my mother say, I am the only servant who is not paid and doesn't have holidays, and she was from the upper class and had two servants to serve her. Such things were brewing in my head. It took me six years of my life, from script writing, fundraising, shooting, and completing and doing nothing else. It was finished in the summer and then shown at the Edinburgh Festival.
movement emerged protesting the war. When reports of the massacres at Sabra and Shatilla leaked out, PM Begin tried to silence reports by terming them 'blood libel', continuing to say: 'goyim kill goyim and they want to kill the Jews'. Begin used the Holocaust to silence those who questioned the mass murder of Palestinians; Begin resorted to the standard tactic of labeling the present enemy of Israel, here Arafat, as a 'new Hitler'. Sen. Alan Cranston, a deeply committed Zionist, stated that reports of the massacre at Sabra and Shatilla were typical of the false historical reports of the blood libel: of course, Cranston was merely trying and succeeding in a disinformation effort to cloud the issue of the real mass murder of Palestinians by US-financed Jewish soldiers.

However, many Israelis compared the prevalent Israeli racism against Palestinians to the racism they suffered from under Nazi rule; dissidents saw the similarity of pogroms against Jews in Russia in 1905 with the daily pogromist killings of Palestinian children by Jewish soldiers. The brutality of Jewish soldiers in Lebanon discredited the war on Lenin, which the author ascerts was justified and proper. The Anti-Defamation League jumped to defense of the slaughter of Palestinians, classifying all anti-Israel statements and graffiti in the US and Europe as anti-semitism. The author states, without citations and in clear exaggeration, there were pogroms against Jews in Rome and Paris in Europe after the massacres in Beirut. Begin responded by stating that Jews were free to do anything they pleased because the world hates Jews; in a brilliant public relations campaign, Begin effectively used the Holocaust to prevent any open criticism of massacres of Palestinians by Jewish soldiers in Lebanon. The author wonders how the 'Zionist dream' [i.e., Zionism is the ideology of Jewish racial supremacy in Palestine, based on a worldwide mobilization of the Diaspora Jews behind Israel.] of the 'traditionally helpless Jew' had come to be seen as a racial supremacist movement that sought to exterminate the Palestinians 'by the efficacy of its war machine' (a perception Rubinstein sees as anti-semitism). [Amnon Rubinstein, former dean of Tel Aviv University School of Law, is now Minister of Communications and a member of the Knesset.][TXT]

Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon are subjected to attacks not only by Israeli troops who claim that they are riddling the camps of PLO guerrillas, but also by factions of Lebanese militias who are sometimes armed by the Israelis. The Phalangist Party, supported by Israel, is particularly hostile to the refugees. Other Lebanese non-Shi'ite factions such as Amal, led by Syrian-backed Nabih Berri, systematically laid siege to the camps in 1985 in an attempt to rid the country of targets for Israeli invasion. They have used both direct military force and starvation techniques. Lebanese Shi'ites claim that they are sympathetic to the Palestinians, but that they are unable to help the refugees openly for fear that Lebanese hostile to the refugees will find out.

[From an article written by Rosemary Sayigh, Race and Class, XXIX, 1, 1987.]

The most recent round of the sieges of the Palestinian refugee camps by Amal militia in Lebanon began with Rashidiyyeh on 9/30/1986. The siege of Bourj Barajneh [Lebanon] began on 11/4/1986 and that of Shatila on 11/25/1986. Although the siege of the camps is, at the time of this writing, officially lifted, its re-imposition remains an ever-present threat. The testimony that follows is from R.Z., a social assistant with Najdeh Association, who lives and works in Bourj Barajneh. [Editor's note: Najdeh is a Lebanese cooperative, involving both Palestinians and Lebanese, which works to provide vocational training and social welfare programs that help individuals achieve self-sufficiency.] Married, with four children under nine years of age, R.Z. stayed through the siege until 2/22/1987, when she left to seek medical care for her children. She was interviewed on 3/5/1987.

In the morning of the first day of the battle [11/4/1986], I was on the street and saw Amal militia gathering. Two or three days before, they had begun throwing explosives on the camp, and it looked as if something was about to start. So I returned to the camp and asked a friend to keep an eye on my children while I did some case work. While I was filling out a questionnaire, a shot rang out. News came that a young man from the camp had been sniped at and killed. I ran home, and while I was running the shelling started. I found my children at home, and put them in the safest part of the house. Of course, the first thing I did was to go and buy provisions, that would last a month at most. But the fighting became more violent each day and, with deaths mounting on both sides, there was little hope for a solution.

We stayed in our home for a long time, but then it got hit by a rocket. The children were very frightened so we went down into the shelter. We stayed there a week.

The first two months were bearable. There was food, there was water. People could take it. Of course, many were killed. But we had got used to the shelling, we had got used to death. My cousin was killed, and was buried without his family even seeing him.

At the beginning people ate well three times a day as usual. When the first month ended, we began to eat only twice a day. If we had known how long the siege would last we would have eaten only one meal a day from the beginning, so as not to be completely cut off later. The last month of the siege was the period of hunger. Of course, some of the organisations helped civilians, but later most of the food was given to the fighters.

Food began to be extremely scarce in the third month; we were hardly having one meal a day at that stage. We made tea with sugar and water, and joked with the children, "Come and have supper." My little daughter of ten months kept saying "Bidi ibsi, bidi ibsi" (ibsi = khubz, bread). I felt like crying. From where can I get her bread?

Once when we had been two days without a meal, my children were crying, they wanted to eat. I had no food left; my father-in-law's house had no food left. So I decided to go to my mother--she has only my father to feed, and you know how old people store bags of food. Her home is far and I was afraid of the shelling, but I was obliged to go because my children were crying. So I went and brought a dish of shishbarak from her. How happy and pleased the children were! Then a child came and stood there and said, "Auntie, will you give me something to eat?" I told him that I'd got just enough to feed my own children. He stood there by the wall, crying. So I told him, "Come, you are like my children," and I put some food on his plate. My children cried out that they hadn't hadenough, but I told them, "The important thing is that you've got something in your stomachs."

People were obliged to knock on doors in search of food for the hospitalized: "My son is wounded. If you have anything..."

There are families that didn't have a father; they depend on monthly allowances that hardly cover the cost of bread. People all felt for each other, they wanted to help others, but when there was nothing left. Once a young man said to me, "You, as a member of Najdeh, should help me." He wanted sugar. I told him, "By God, I haven't got sugar for my own children. But wait here [his leg was amputated] and I'll bring you some sugar." I went to my mother and told her that I wanted sugar for my children. Of course, she gave me some. I brought it and gave it to him.

In the last period, people picked grass from the cemetery, boiled it, put salt on it and ate it. And many women were sniped at while picking grass. There is no shelter there at all.

Water and fuel shortages also caused serious problems. Water went on coming to us for about 2.5 months there was still diesel oil to work the pumps. When maize gave out, they siphoned off a few hundred litres from a petrol station near the camp. They gave most of it to the hospital, and some was used for pumping water, but it only lasted two days. There was no water for washing. We used to wait for rain to be able to wash our clothes.

If we wanted water badly, we had to get it from the bases at the front line. There was a woman with five children--they have no father--she went to get water and was sniped at and killed there. Her children were left homeless. Many people were killed at the water place.

The shelters are burdened with many more than they can serve. Probably this is what made sicknensses spread--no space, people on top of each other, no water.... Some quarters are deprived of shelters. For example, Tarshia only has one shelter and it is constantly under sniper fire. There are nearly 20000 people in Bourj, but there are only seventeen shelters, the largest of which can hold 300 people.

They would declare a cease-fire and then suddenly shell the camp, so as to cause the greatest possible number of losses. One missile fell on seventeen children, killing five immediately and wounding the rest. It was right at the beginning. There was a cease-fire and people were leaving and entering the camp. It was the day of the funeral of the young man who was killed on the first day of the siege. So the women all left their children to go to the funeral. They finally felt secure because there was a cease-fire and there was no shelling. The children were clustered together under a water-tank. A woman was baking ma'aleesh and feeding them when the first missile came down. Every young man carried two children, and brought them under the shelter to hospital. My house was in front of the hospital, all the wounded came past it.

Another incident that greatly affected the people of Bourj was an attempt by four young Palestinians to get a lorry load of food into the camp, one day in 2/19/87. They got through all the checkpoints and reached the entry of the camp, in front of the Amal building. But Amal discovered them and hit the lorry with a shell, burning it and killing the young people. People all wept when they knew that four young men had died for their sake. Amal propaganda said that the lorry was full of whisky and hashish. How could anyone believe that? How could they kill people trying to bring in food?

In the last period, people began to get desperate, to despair. There was talk about what to do. The majority decided that we were ready to sacrifice fighters but not to surrender. Because we knew what would happen: rapes, killings, insults and lootings.

In spite of harsh siege conditions, social institutional work continued, and played a role in helping people to resist. Soon after the beginning of the siege, we in Najdeh invited the Social Committee to meet. We divided up the work--for example, some helped the wounded, some helped people in the shelter. We had about 560 tins of milk powder, not enough for the whole camp, so we didn't distribute them. Instead, we stored them, and later they solved the crisis for nursing mothers and infants under six months. Without food or vitamins to make milk, mothers' breasts dried up and most could not suckle their babies, even those born during the siege. So our milk powder solved a very serious problem.

We also distributed clothes--especially to families whose homes were on the front line. When the siege began, it was still almost summer. When the winter weather came, many people were without winter clothes. We bought clothes from the shops [inside the camp] and distributed them to children and needy people. We also organised daily visits for the wounded, to take them gifts and raise their morale. Members in community development convinced them that a broader, global perspective was essential. Much of this book emerged from UN conference marking the UN Decade for the Advance of Women. The Bangalore founding group also organized a series of seminars for the UN sponsored NGO Forum in Kairobi, Kenya, in 7/1985. The DAWN founders met again in Brazil in 1986 to set up a permanent organization to broaden the group activities, the DAWN Secretariat, the Institute of Social Studies Trust (ISST) based in New Delhi, initiated DAWN, until it moved to the Instituto Universitario de Pesquisas do Rio de Janeiro.

Institutions that provided funding for DAWN in its first phase include the Ford Foundation, Norwegian Agency for International Development (NORAD), Swedish Agency for Research Cooperation With Developing Countries (SAREC), Finnish International Development Agency (FINIDA), the Population Council, and the NGO Forum Secretariat. Institutions that provided support in the first phase include: Women & Development Unit of the University of the West Indies (WAND), Association of African Women for R&D (AAWORD (Senegal)), Christian Michelsen Institute (CMI), Asian & Pacific Development Center (APDC), Pacific & Asian Women's Forum (PAWF), Asian Women's Research & Action Network (AWRAN), El Colegio de Mexico; UN Institute for Training & Research for the Advancement of Women (Santo Domingo), Indian Council of Social Science Research, International Council for Anthropological & Ethnological Sciences, Indian Association of Women's Studies, Economists Interested in Women's Issues Group (India), Centre for Women's Development Studies (New Delhi), International Women's Tribune Center (New York), ISIS International (Rome and Santiago), Internation Center for Research on Women (Washington DC), Mediterranean Women's Studies Institute (Athens), Carlos Chagas Foundation (Sao Paolo), Centro de la Mujer Peruana Floria Tristan (Lima), Federeacion de la Mujer Cubana (Havana), Brazilian Rights Council (Sai Paolo), Arab Women's Studies Association (Beirut), Women & Development Consultancy Services Ltd. (Kenya), Institute for Social Studies (Hague), and Kali for Women (New Delhi). [TEXT]

30076. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 97: Israeli Policies in Lebanon: Part 1 of 2. Jerusalem, March 8, 1992. Two points need to be stated firmly at the opening of this report. First, the assassination of Sheikh Musawi, together with his family and others who happened to be in his company, was no more than an episode in a new, more aggressive and more far ranging Israeli policy in Lebanon, which also implies an adoption of a tougher stance towards Syria. This is why the assassination cannot be perceived as in any way connected with the preceding successful Palestinian guerilla attack on an Israeli army camp. Coincidence of the two events in time has no deeper meaning. According to all the better informed Israeli military correspondents, the timing of the Mussawi's assassination depended on his known regular attendance of a yearly memorial meeting held at the tomb of Sheikh Bader (also assassinated by the Israeli forces, in 1984) in the village Jibshit, located very close behind the borders of the "Security Zone" (henceforth referred to as "Zone"). Due to the regularity of his attendance of that event, he became a convenient target for murder at that particular time of the year. The knowledge of the Israeli Intelligence about the Hizbollah is in fact quite poor. The assassination conveyed the opposite impression, thereby confirming the Intelligence's boasts.

The new Israeli policy in Lebanon was designed by the army. Alex Fishman ("Pity that we did not think about it beforehand", Hadashot, February 21, 1992) reports that "it took the army much time to persuade the political authorities that their negotiations with Hizbollah were a waste of time", and that "a policy change could have already been detected in January", on the basis of unprecedented Israeli activities outside the Zone, like threatening to shoot at anyone on sight, and thereby forcing the villagers to flee the area en masse. Avi Benayahu ("The circle of the Lebanese mud", Al Hamishmar, February 21, 1992) likewise says that "the [Israeli] decision to hit Mussawi was reached by a senior army echelon, faithful to the doctrine of high frequency strikes at the interests of terrorist organizations, wherever and whenever available intelligence data allow them". (The peculiarities of a language in which the murder of a child, P. 5 is referred to as a "strike at the interests of terrorist organizations" will be discussed in a separate section of this report).

What reasons dictated the adoption of the new policy? The avowed Israeli rationale, faithfully reiterated by most Western media, was the failure of negotiations for the release of an Israeli navigator, Ron Arad. It does not deserve to be treated seriously. Even according to the official Israeli announcements, Arad is in Iranian hands, not Hizbollah's. Apparently no other Israeli captive remains in enemy's hands. Several other names regularly mentioned in this context refer to soldiers missing ranks. So do some Lebanese Druzes, some of them recruited from Sunni. From other sources it is known that many Shi'ites serve in its ranks. So do some Lebanese Druzes, some of them recruited from villages located outside the Zone. The contrast between the denominational composition of the SLA and of its security system is an example of the Israeli "divide and rule" methods, which in the not too remote future may well be applied to dominate bigger Arab territories, by the way of exploiting rivasries within the population of Lebanon. (To all appearances, the Zone and the adjacent areas of Lebanon already serve as a testing ground for future Israeli conquests.) Edelist describes the methods of the SLA as ferocious in the extreme, comparing them to massacres in the style of Sabra and Shatila. He recounts how an Israeli colonel G. commanding some Israeli forces stationed there, once attended "a briefing" with SLA officers. His reaction was that "we just cannot keep up with such standards". Yet the security system of SLA commanded by Akel Hashem is according to Edelist prepared to commit even worse atrocities than the army, not just in interrogatory torture, but

583

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Lebanon

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

* * *

For this, however, radio broadcasts obviously could not suffice. From mid-November the Israeli press kept reporting the massive desertions from the ranks of the Israel-controlled "South Lebanese Army" (SLA), in spite of pay rises. According to these reports, it was not easy to find replacements for the deserters, even through "usual Israeli methods", like telling the extended families to deliver a specified amount of recruits, with collective punishments befalling families for their non-compliance, and distribution of permits to work in Israel as a reward for their compliance. Furthermore, the Israeli authorities considered the former commander of that army, general Antoine Lahad, no longer fit to carry out the new tough policy, and therefore, as Edelist reports, decided to grant Lahad an Israeli army pension (but for colonels, not generals!) to enable him to quietly retire in Paris, supposedly in order to guarantee a better education for his 13 years old son. "Lahad will probably be replaced by one Akel Hashem, about 40, a picturesque personality, who for an extended period of time headed the SLA security system". Since that "system" is notorious for brutally torturing thousands of people, and for atrocities in its concentration camps, the consequences of this appointment - which, as it seems, has already taken place without being formally announced - can be predicted. Edelist's account of Akel Hashem's pursuits and of the security system under his command deserves a closer scrutiny.

The security system of the SLA is, according to Edelist, "manned mostly by the Sunnis", who are a rather small minority in the Zone, inhabited preponderantly by the Shi'ites and Maronite Christians. The latter are not admitted to the security system. Akel Hashem himself is a Palestinian, and therefore a stranger to the whole security system under his command. By contrast, the SLA itself has 40% Christians and 20% Shi'ites. In such a composition of the SLA and of its security system is an example of the Israeli "divide and rule" methods, which in the not too remote future may well be applied to dominate bigger Arab territories, by the way of exploiting rivasries within the population of Lebanon. (To all appearances, the Zone and the adjacent areas of Lebanon already serve as a testing ground for future Israeli conquests.) Edelist describes the methods of the SLA as ferocious in the extreme, comparing them to massacres in the style of Sabra and Shatila. He recounts how an Israeli colonel G. commanding some Israeli forces stationed there, once attended "a briefing" with SLA officers. His reaction was that "we just cannot keep up with such standards". Yet the security system of SLA commanded by Akel Hashem is according to Edelist prepared to commit even worse atrocities than the army, not just in interrogatory torture, but... also in military operations aimed at "softening the population". In one case recounted by Edelist, "Akel's group carried out several operations" earning a distinction of being named by local residents as "savage animals of a heretofore unknown species". But, comments Edelist, "in the Israeli army nobody knows nor wants to know", about such exploits.

In addition to dealing with all varieties of Israeli stooges, Edelist describes the role performed in Lebanon by the Israeli army. According to Edelist, it seems that the Israeli military, between the apportionment of security and the黛尔已 rectangle information available in the Hebrew press, Israeli soldiers are stationed in Lebanon in quite impressive numbers, both in the Zone and beyond its boundaries. Israeli forces present in Lebanon are of two kinds: the counter-insurgency units doing their patrolling on foot and shooting on sight anyone they suspect of being a saboteur, and Apache helicopter units either attacking specified targets or transporting the former units to far-away spots for the sake of raiding villages or other targets, or shooting roadblocks on the highways in order to search the passing cars. Such operations extend to areas well beyond the Zone, which thus find themselves under an actual, even if somewhat indirect Israeli occupation. From the Israeli army's viewpoint, this mode of domination is more cost-effective than direct occupation as it existed in 1982-85, at least in the sense that relatively small but highly mobile Israeli troops, comprised exclusively of volunteers, suffice for the task. Unlike during the 1982-85 occupation, the masses of non-combatant soldiers or "ordinary" ground forces need no longer be deployed, with the burden to the Israeli army and society reduced accordingly. The only "lesson" which the Israeli army learned from its erstwhile Lebanese experience was purely tactical: that its mistake lay in its cumbersome method of direct rule, not in the occupation itself. Contrary to dogmatic assertions of some foreigners, the Israeli army still seems to believe that it can occupy large Arab-inhabited areas, provided it relies on "right" occupation methods, now tested in South Lebanon, with results considered positive. The assault helicopters, especially the Apaches, perform a crucial role in terror operations conceived of as an essential ingredient of this new occupation tactic. In this context it needs to be recalled that, as described in report 89, the Israeli army in 1991 acquired huge quantities of Apache helicopters from the U.S., considerably exceeding in the process the entire amount of the U.S. annual military aid. It needs to be recalled as well that the American reaction to the murder of Mussawi was perfidious enough to be interpreted as its approval. Can it be presumed that the American military establishment has a stake of its own in learning about this new tactic of indirect domination of densely inhabited territories? An affirmative answer to this question cannot be precluded in advance.

Edelist's facts convey an impression that not only the Lebanese Army in the north is indirectly controlled by Israel, but also the Lebanese government in Beirut always comply with Israeli instructions, either right away or after being suitably threatened. This impression is reinforced by many facts on the ground, and by hints of other Israeli correspondents. The Lebanese appeals for American protection, conveyed either directly or via Syria, have totally failed. An apparent Israeli reason for this might have been conceived of as an essential ingredient of this new occupation tactic. In one apparently had some successes. The above mentioned Israeli colonel G. "has only praise for the operational capabilities of Hizbollah. Unlike the fecklessly performing PLO guerrillas, Hizbollah men know what they do. They have a superb Intelligence and are good in planning. They don't knock their head up the wall. They don't attack right where the Israeli or SouthLebanesetroops are stationed in force, but study the area and prepare their actions carefully. They operate in cells, they know what they are doing, and act between the lines of Israeli and Hizbollah territories. Their attackers are local inhabitants. One cannot attack Hizbollah bases, because none exist". Under those circumstances, the Israeli army began to rely on two strategies. The first was the random terror aiming at the entire population of the area. It has been reported in the media, whether under the name of "softening" activities, or otherwise. The second strategy, first adopted in response to the rather successful Hizbollah's katyusha strikes at the Israeli territory after Mussawi's murder, was to prod Syria to extend its control over Hizbollah by mounting the threats of unspecified but devastating Israeli "hits", which were conveyed to Damascus via the Americans. This fact has been reported by several Israeli military and political commentators, of whom some, e.g. Alex Fishman ("It just happened to them", Hadashot, February 28) noted with relief that "we were lucky that the Americans indeed intervened with Syria and obtained the cease fire, since we had lost control of the situation". The Israeli public appreciated this cease fire, regarding it as the Israeli army's success, after the week of uninterrupted katyusha attacks had brought a reversal of the mood: from earlier exultation (led by official propaganda seconded by many press commentators) to despondency. As for the army and the minister of Defense Arens, they confined themselves to expressing their satisfaction with the results of the new Israeli policy in Lebanon, the Mussawi assassination included. It can be safely predicted that this policy will be pursued in Lebanon also in the future, probably on an increasing scale, and in all likelihood also elsewhere. [-]

30077. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 97: Israeli Policies in Lebanon: Part 2 of 2. Israel, March 8, 1992. Reactions of the Israeli public to the events of the week, which began with the murder of Mussawi and ended with the cease fire deserve a further comment. There were three fundamental kinds of reactions: of those who can be regarded as informed, those in the name of the Israeli Security System, of the better informed military or political correspondents who, after sharing the initial euphoria, later had some wary misgivings about the military establishment's wisdom on strictly pragmatic grounds, and finally of a handful of principled critics of Mussawi murder who were allowed to express themselves in print. In a sense, the reactions of the first listed kind are the most important, because they are quite unknown outside Israel, and because they can be assumed to faithfully reflect the viewpoints of the commanders of the Israeli army, concretely of its Chief of Staff, general Ehud Barak, and his Deputy, Amnon Shahak (no kin of mine!). In all probability, the two were responsible for designing the new Israeli policies in Lebanon and for the Mussawi murder, which began to be implemented after being cleared by the minister of Defense Arens and by the Prime Minister Shamir. Some elements of the reasoning behind the new policies were provided - or rather hinted - in TV talks of the generals in active service. Also, the military correspondents were allowed to describe "the euphoria", or "the contentment" of the generals, especially during the first days after the murder. But more thorough explanations of the subject were reserved for ex-generals and ex-intelligence insiders.

One of them was general (reserves) Yossi Peled, the Commander of the Northern Command (and thereby in charge of the Lebanese affairs) for five years until he retired from active service early in 1991. General Peled ("To keep the initiative", Yedioth Ahronot, February 21) wants to continue such feats of arms as "hitting Mussawi" in the name of the Israeli Security System, of the better informed military or political correspondents who, after sharing the initial euphoria, later had some wary misgivings about the military establishment's wisdom on strictly pragmatic grounds, and finally of a handful of principled critics of Mussawi murder who were allowed to express themselves in print. In a sense, the reactions of the first listed kind are the most important, because they are quite unknown outside Israel, and because they can be assumed to faithfully reflect the viewpoints of the commanders of the Israeli army, concretely of its Chief of Staff, general Ehud Barak, and his Deputy, Amnon Shahak (no kin of mine!). In all probability, the two were responsible for designing the new Israeli policies in Lebanon and for the Mussawi murder, which began to be implemented after being cleared by the minister of Defense Arens and by the Prime Minister Shamir. Some elements of the reasoning behind the new policies were provided - or rather hinted - in TV talks of the generals in active service. Also, the military correspondents were allowed to describe "the euphoria", or "the contentment" of the generals, especially during the first days after the murder. But more thorough explanations of the subject were reserved for ex-generals and ex-intelligence insiders.
from the military point of view is filled with superlatives. "I believe that hitting Mussawi was an extraordinary achievement, for which the Israeli army can only be congratulated in exalted terms, because it proved truly extraordinary qualities of both the execution and its preparation by army Intelligence," Peled indicates that an operation on such a scale "must have been prepared for many months or even years ahead". The rather down-to-earth truth is that the "operation" involved no more than the use of a dozen attack helicopters and several tanks. Still, it happened as planned, Peled reports, according to Fishman (February 28) the Army Intelligence learned "from the Beirut papers of Thursday" that Mussawi had intended to visit Jisbsh on Sunday, and timed the assassination accordingly. Moreover, Fishman informs that the poor army officers "had their eyes red from sleep deprivation", because, far from "years ahead", they had only days to plan the raid.

General Peled reveals that "the war against terror requires an account settling which is a perfectly legitimate concept. The concept refers to the need to physically exterminate those who take decisions resulting in the loss of human life". But Peled has a dilemma here. For on one hand, "hitting only the heads of terror [organizations] will not produce the expected results", and on the other, "hitting only the executors of terrorism" will not suffice either. He sees the resolution of this dilemma in "an interlocked method of operation", that is in doing both. This alone will produce desirable effects. Of course, when Peled speaks of the "loss of human life", it does not even occur to him to include the loss of Arab lives into account, especially if caused by Sharon, Eltan and suchlike. It is also obvious that the concept of "account settling" implies the Israeli "right" to assassinate any heads of states or of political movements in the Middle East, a "right" which may well be soon exacted by facts on the ground. Peled reminds his readers that "Arab mentality" is very different from "our mentality", especially from the mentality of the Israeli General Staff. He claims that the methods he advocates are well-adapted to the Arab mentality.

The tenet of a different Arab "mentality" also figures prominently in an article by Benyamin Merhav ("To beat them or not to beat them", Yedioth Ahronot, February 20). Merhav, once a senior Intelligence official, responsible for Israel-China connections in the Foreign Service, had advanced to the post of Director General of the Foreign ministry from which he was recently dismissed by Foreign Minister David Levy, apparently because of his hawkishness, too extreme for Levy's tastes. Impressed by the strength of this change, Merhav lists four factors with which Israel has to contend in Lebanon: Iran, Syria, the Lebanese government and the Shi'ites. As for the first two, Peled advocates a mixed approach, alternating pressures with negotiations until they halt "the flow of money and other facilities" to Lebanon, with the effect of "speedily strangling the Shi'ite pressure". However, "the blow they thus received convinced them that they were left with no choice except to lick their wounds and acquiesce. The [Israeli] message can be assumed to have been absorbed by them, at least for a time, even though they are still likely to do a thing here or there. After what we did to them, we can proceed to building up good relations with the Shi'ites of South Lebanon, since, in conformity with the best existential traditions of the Lebanese communities, the Shi'ite community included, they now know that they have no other choice if they want to survive and to prosper". This is why Merhav wants Israel to keep behaving "as it has done". In saying all this Merhav undoubtedly represents the viewpoint of the Israeli "security system", which can be also presumed to be supported in this design by its American counterpart. Consequently, the policies Merhav advocates can be presumed to be pursued in the future on a larger scale than heretofore. The Israeli "security system" may be mistaken in its assessment of katyusha attacks into consideration. He says that "he does not feel like ..."
"after killing one important Arab, the katyusha attacks managed to disrupt life in the North for almost a week". But he gives vent to a sense of personal satisfaction. "One does not need to be a bloodthirsty chauvinist to feel mighty pleased by the sight of a Hizbollah leader blasted up into the air and falling down in pieces. One can assume that the image of a bearded fellow with black turban on his head being accurately hit by an Apache helicopter missile must for an average Israeli be quite thrilling, especially since it is all the contrast between their qualities and ours. O army, how gorgeously thou performest!" Denker is relatively dovish, so he can be relied upon for sensing what the feelings of "average Israelis" on such occasions are, at least during the first day of two after the event.

This style of analysis finds its best practitioner in the person of Uzi Benziman (A long-term account) Haaretz, February 28), a correspondent who can be presumed to reliably report the real thinking of the Israeli government. According to Benziman, during the katyusha attacks and the consequent massive deployment of the army forces in Lebanon, "the atmosphere [in Jerusalem] was traumatic". But after the cease fire the mood shifted into that of relief. "Right now, both in Jerusalem [the location of the Prime Minister's Office] and in Tel Aviv [the location of the ministry of Defense] those responsible for the killing of Abbas Mussawi and for the army's retaliations to the hail of katyushas perceive the whole affair as best evidence of Israel's profound political and strategic wisdom all the way through". The highest manifestation of this wisdom was the Israeli threat of "multi-directional strikes", duly transferred to Syria. The results of making this threat are perceived as unqualifiedly beneficial. "Those who made it are self-contended to the point of assuming that the entire sequence of events from Mussawi killing up to the return of the Israeli force to its bases is now going to directly influence the negotiations between the Israelis and the Syrians and Lebanese in Washington... By this logic, the wheel of violence is presumed to have succeeded in setting the wheels of the political [process] in motion after nothing else had worked. This success, claim the self-contended men in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, will from now on propel the progress toward an ultimate stabilization of the entire Middle East". Benziman remains skeptical. He notes that the negotiations in Washington have been hardly leading anywhere. He admits that the Lebanese border is now quiet, but attributes it, in my opinion rightly, primarily to inclement weather. It can be safely predicted that, when the weather improves, especially in the coming summer, "the self-contended men in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv" will rush to "propel the progress toward an ultimate stabilization of the entire Middle East", in the Israeli style.

Allowed to criticize the Israeli policies were in practice only the Hebrew press satirists, who traditionally enjoy in Israeli greater license than others at times of emergency. But this meant that although moral points were made with some fortitude, political and strategic criticism has been lacking, as not suitable in the satirical genre. Let me give two examples. The following appeared on the satirical page of Hotam (February 21): "Did you pay sufficient attention to the fact that the day after the terrorists committed a barbarous and inhuman murder in the [Israeli] recruit training camp, the Israeli Airforce raided the refugee camps of Rashidiya and El-Hilwa in Lebanon, killing a Palestinian terrorist mother and her three terrorist children in a civilized and humane retaliation?"

Even more to the point was Haaretz satirist B. Michael ("The child is absent", February 21). He asked: "Where could the little son of Mussawi disappear? Only one day after the operation he could not be found in the Israeli media. The casualties of that operation were described as 'Abbas Mussawi and co-passengers in his car'. In Beirut, a mass demonstration was held 'to commemorate Mussawi and the members of his organization'. The demonstration demanded to avenge 'the death of Mussawi and his men'. The child was not mentioned likewise. Neither was that little child mentioned on TV when the minister of Defense was interviewed in a notably sycophantic way... It did not occur to the minister that a body of a little child burned alive may perhaps need some clarification. The child was just absent: from that interview, from the press, from the reports, from all [published] photographs. Did he really ever exist?" B. Michael concludes by asking a question thus far never answered: "Where can we find an Israeli politician who would express some sorrow, even hypocritical or insincere, about burning alive the innocent little son of Mussawi?"

The assassination of Mussawi has had many consequences, one of the most deplorable being its evaluation by a majority of Israeli public as a great success. This evaluation may well tempt Israel to try to achieve similar "successes", only larger is scale. He who under such circumstances still believes in "peace process", lives in the world of delusions. [x]

30078. Shpiegel, Efraf. "Women in Black Will Not be Intimidated: Part 4: Persistence is power: A bereaved mother speaks.", In Challenge, July, 1990, p. 12. I began my own private peace campaign at the time of the Israeli-Lebanon war. Until then I was one of the silent majority, with the attitude that no matter what I thought or felt, there was nothing I could do to change anything apart from exercising my right to vote every four years. With the Lebanon war, my attitude changed. My son Yo'av participated in that war. I had many talks with him about the war, I became involved. I started to closely examine what I heard, saw and read in the media. I started to suspect that I and thousands like me were being brainwashed, were being manipulated. My son Yo'av was killed in that war. He and thousands young people like him on both sides were deprived of their lives. My son's death politicized and radicalized me... for he had died for nothing... his dying revealed to me war's tragic wastefulness and evil futility. I became an ardent protagonist of peace. The intifada would have never broken out if Israel's leaders had been sincere in their desire for peace; if they had been prepared to meet with the Palestinians, to talk with them; if they had recognized that rebellion is a natural response of a people under occupation.

As a devoted Zionist, I am convinced that in the final analysis both occupier and occuped can only suffer from occupation. I need peace in order to live in my country. I need cooperation with people in the neighboring states in order to live in prosperity.

This, in a nutshell, is what Women in Black want when they say "No to Occupation". True, for each one of us these simple words have various connotations, but in essence they express our longing for attitude that no matter what I thought or felt, there was nothing I could do to change anything apart from exercising my right to vote every four years. With the Lebanon war, my attitude changed. My son Yo'av participated in that war. I had many talks with him about the war, I became involved. I started to closely examine what I heard, saw and read in the media. I started to suspect that I and thousands like me were being brainwashed, were being manipulated. My son Yo'av was killed in that war. He and thousands young people like him on both sides were deprived of their lives. My son's death politicized and radicalized me... for he had died for nothing... his dying revealed to me war's tragic wastefulness and evil futility. I became an ardent protagonist of peace. The intifada would have never broken out if Israel's leaders had been sincere in their desire for peace; if they had been prepared to meet with the Palestinians, to talk with them; if they had recognized that rebellion is a natural response of a people under occupation. As a devoted Zionist, I am convinced that in the final analysis both occupier and occuped can only suffer from occupation. I need peace in order to live in my country. I need cooperation with people in the neighboring states in order to live in prosperity. This, in a nutshell, is what Women in Black want when they say "No to Occupation". True, for each one of us these simple words have various connotations, but in essence they express our longing for peace; they express our message that as women we succor life, not destroy it; that we are determined and committed to create a world free from war in which our children may flourish and thrive until old age. This basic instinct for preservation of life is identical for Palestinian women, Israeli women for ALL women everywhere. My friends often ask how I can bear the hostility, curses and spits from passers-by. True, I sometimes ask myself what the point of it is; there are so few of us; how long will it take before there are enough of us to actually change things.

Yet there is no way that I can or will stop my protest. Because I know that if I do, life will have no meaning for me. I also know that our very persistence is powerful and that knowledge is a source of encouragement for me.

Look at the women who stand together with me, Friday after Friday, in the cold of winter, in the heat of the summer, and I am proud that we find the strength to be true to our consciences and ourselves. If I am ever asked "Where were you in these dark days", I shall be able to reply: "In the streets, protesting".

The greatest achievement of Women in Black it seems to me is that our name and message have become an integral part of the Israeli scene and cannot be ignored. I believe that we influenced Peace Now to change. Previously it confined its demand to Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon, and did not mention the Occupied Territories. Today it can no longer ignore the issue and has to take a stand. There can be no discussion on women's rights and violence towards women in the family, without including the rights of Palestinian women in the Occupied Territories and a peace for Palestinian women... for he had died for nothing... his dying revealed to me war's tragic wastefulness and evil futility. I became an ardent protagonist of peace... for he had died for nothing... his dying revealed to me war's tragic wastefulness and evil futility. I became an ardent protagonist of peace.
After the murder of Palestinian workers in Rishon LeZion, it was very special for me to participate in the vigil, and I believe that many felt as I did. An unprecedented large number of women took part in the vigil that Friday, as though to make a public statement that we are here to stay. It is important for the world to know that all Israelis are not followers of Shamir, that there are others Israel's also.

The day after the massacre in Rishon, I went to the hospital to visit the Palestinian workers who had been wounded, to express my grief and anger. I am also involved in Women for Coexistence, a movement comprising Arab and Jewish women from Israel. We hold house meetings with Palestinian women from the Occupied Territories at our homes. The meetings are informal and are intended to accommodate women who find it difficult to go out into the streets to demonstrate.

I believe that if the protests for peace do not multiply and intensify, the present situation will seriously deteriorate. I have a feeling that the recently formed Israeli government is leading us towards a dreadful confrontation, to a war that will not stop at Israel's borders. I don't know how this affects others, but for me, it makes me want to shout louder, and louder still.

30079. Tucker, Cynthia. "Oklahoma City Bombing Makes Americans, Like Israelis, Victims of Terrorism", in NewHour, April 18, 1996. Tucker argues that the Oklahoma City bombing makes Americans the victims of terrorists. This draws Americans closer to [Jewish] Israelis, who have long been victims of terrorism. She notes she is encouraged by the increasing pressure in America to silence inappropriate dissent: she sees free speech as encouraging people on the fringe to be terrorists and welcomes the growing intolerance among Americans for those who do not share the 'mainstream' belief system. [Tucker is associated with the Atlanta Constitution. [This program comes on the day after the Cana massacre in southern Lebanon.] [TX]

30080. UNCHR. Human Rights and Refugees: Part 21: Violation of Human Rights and Refugees: Violations of the Rights To Life, Liberty and Security. Human Rights Fact Sheet No. 20. World Campaign for Human Rights. Geneva: UNCHR, June 1993. In some places refugees are regularly subjected to attacks and abuse. Many have died in military or armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements. Young males and minors are frequently recruited into armed or guerrilla bands and forced to fight in civil wars. Attacks on refugee camp have been condemned by the United Nations General Assembly in numerous resolutions. The Commission on Human Rights has also been concerned with specific cases, such as attacks on Palestinian refugees in Lebanese camps and attacks on the Thai-Cambodian border. Refugee women and children are a particularly vulnerable group. The Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) makes a specific provision for giving 'appropriate protection and humanitarian assistance' (art. 22) to the refugee child. Women make up a large proportion of the world's refugee population. They are very frequently subjected to physical and sexual abuse in countries of refuge.

30081. WAO: Women Against the Occupation; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Women Inside and Out: No Court, No Trial, No Jury: Israel/Palestine: Part 02", in Connexions. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 14, Fall 1984. pp. 24-25. [The following was written by Women Against the Occupation (WAO), an Israeli feminist group formed in 6/1982 as "Women Against the Invasion of Lebanon" in direct response to the Israeli invasion. WAO continues to oppose all forms of occupation perpetrated by Israel and to expose the links between militarism and the subjugation of women. Recently they have been demonstrating with Palestinian women regarding the treatment of women political prisoners in Israel. Also included is an update from Democratic Palestine, n. 3, a monthly of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, 5/1984.]

Neve Tirzeh prison was built by the British prior to 1948. In 1971 the Israeli authorities decided to convert it to a model prison. Located near Ramleh on the West Bank, it is a kind of women's annex to the huge men's prison there. It houses both prisoners indicted under common law, the majority being Israeli, and those detained under "security" provisions who have long sentences, the vast majority being Palestinian. It is overcrowded; six women often occupy a cell measuring 2 meters by 3 meters.

On 11/4/1983, 100 Palestinian and Jewish women held a sit-in at the International Red Cross office in East Jerusalem. Although thousands of Palestinians are imprisoned by the Israeli authorities, both in Southern Lebanon and in Israel, the sit-in was aimed specifically on the fate of 32 women in the Neve Tirzeh prison. Since then some have been released.

When the women refused to cook meals for their guards, seeing this as a humiliating and degrading demand [they didn't refuse to do other work], their already poor situation rapidly deteriorated. Since 5/1983 they have been locked in their cells 23 hours a day. All reading and writing materials have been denied and family visits, which used to be once every two weeks, have now been cut to once every two months. Even this restriction is arbitrary. One mother has not been allowed to see her daughter in four months and was told to come back in another two.

At the sit-in, one of the women's lawyers reported on a new, more horrifying development. On 10/31/1983, the women noticed that the guards were removing books from the library that their families had brought them. The prisoners started shouting and banging on their cell doors, demanding their books be put back. In response, a special unit of the prison authorities was called in and started spraying [what was believed to be] tear gas into the small, crowded cells. The women ran to the windows and broke the glass in order to breathe. The guards then started beating them with clubs and spraying even more gas. They fell to the ground choking, barely able to breathe, unable to help one another.

The cells were thick with gas. It clung to the walls and floor, to their clothes, to their bodies. When they washed their clothes to rinse out the gas, they weren't allowed to hang them outside their cells to dry. Guards who entered the cells for a search, threw the wet clothes on the floor, contaminating them once again.

Despite the fact that one doctor and three paramedics were present, the prisoners were denied any treatment for three days. Even then the care was minimal, consisting of Vaseline for their burns and Tylenol for pain.

On 3/6/1984, the women declared a hunger strike in anticipation of International Women's Day. The prison administration tried to get the women to send a delegation in hopes of getting them to end the strike. The women, however, had been boycotting any contact with the authorities since the gassing and thus refused. Instead, they demanded the return of their library. When this demand was fulfilled, the women ran to the windows and broke the glass in order to breathe. The guards then started beating them with clubs and spraying even more gas. They fell to the ground choking, barely able to breathe, unable to help one another.

The victory of the women political prisoners in Neve Tirzeh, who attained all their demands in this round, points to two elements which are the key to victories in prison strikes generally. First, the organization and determination of the prisoners themselves, and second, broad, active solidarity from outside the prison.

[Women Against the Occupation also sent us this article and interview which illustrate the broad definition of imprisonment as practiced by the Israeli authorities.]

Town Arrest Under Israeli Occupation: Although many people associate town and house arrest with "banning" as practiced by South Africa, they are unaware that the State of Israel has been using this tactic on hundreds of Palestinians since its inception in 1948.

A holdover from the British Mandate Emergency Regulations, town arrests are a means to limit political activity on a supralegal level. There is no court, no trial and no jury, hence the person has little recourse.

In the Occupied Territories, the military governor of the area decides when a person is"danger to the security of the state" and confines her/him to their town during the day and to their home from sundown to sunup. Within the Green Line (Israel's pre-1967 borders) the person is called before a judge, but any resemblance to justice stops there. The Shin Bet, Israel's FBI, passes on information to the judge while the person accused is not allowed to hear the charges on the grounds that it would violate security. Not knowing the charges, the person is obviously powerless to defend her/himself.

Town arrests are usually imposed for six months at a time with an ever present option for renewal at the end of the sentence. So far the maximum amount served has been seven years. It is often given to political prisoners upon completion of their prison term to inhibit any political challenge. When the whole concept of town arrest transcends the law, the fact that there is an Israeli law which forbids punishing a person more than once for the same crime is irrelevant.

Needless to say, daily life under town arrest is virtually unbearable. The person must report to the local police station between one to three times a day. In addition, the police often barge into the person's/house in the middle of the night to check up on them. The detainee is thus under constant surveillance. Work or study often becomes impossible especially if the person comes from a small village with limited resources. In 1/1984 there were over 70 people under town arrest.

Amal Labadi is a 26 year old Palestinian woman who was under town arrest in her village on the West Bank until 1/1984. She was freed with no explanation given by the military authorities. At the time of this interview, she had not yet been freed.

"In my case, town arrest prevents me from conducting my activities. I've been active all my life. Now I'm a member of the higher committee of the Women's Work Committee of the West Bank and Gaza. This committee works to build a Palestinian women's movement in the Occupied Territories and urges women to take part in all levels of society--socially, politically and economically.

"I must have daily contact with women in the refugee camps, cities and villages in order to persuade them to go out of their houses, to raise their consciousnesses. So, because of town arrest, I can't talk with women on simple social issues such as how to take care of their children and their own health. By my teaching women first aid, to read and write, I'm jeopardizing Israel's security.

"Besides these activities, I'm treasurer of the Union of Public Institution Workers which organizes workers from three villages, including mine. I must travel between these villages for my union work, meeting with workers, etc.

"On the personal level, I'm now seven months pregnant. My doctor is in Jerusalem and I need to see him every week, but I must ask permission to travel there from the military commander. This situation threatens my life and the life of my child. I was sick with a cold last week but was refused permission to see my doctor. I'm among the few who have a phone in the village so at least I could phone him. When the time comes for me to deliver my child, I must ask for permission from the army to go to the hospital. I won't have my baby at home with no doctor or nurse in the village. I'll go to the hospital, and if they want to arrest me and my baby afterward, let them!"

"Besides this, my husband is imprisoned in Gaza. I asked permission to visit him but this was turned down yesterday. He has ten more months to serve, and I probably won't be able to see him. I used to visit my mother in Ramleh five times a week since she is 65 years old and ill. I'm the only one who can visit her regularly, and her doctor said she is unable to take care of herself, but my request to be permitted to visit her was not even answered. Of course, my social life has also been disrupted. I can't visit friends or family or be present at family occasions.

"One of the reasons I believe I'm under town arrest was because of my relations with Women Against Occupation. Apparently when both peoples meet to discuss common issues this endangers security. But this will not stop us. If I can't travel to peace-seeking Israelis, they come to me."

In 6/82, the group Women Against Occupation [originally called Women Against the Invasion of Lebanon] was formed in Israel as a direct response to the war in Lebanon. With its massive destruction of a civilian population, this war quickly lifted the facade of Israel's higher moral status for those who still clung to that antiquated belief. Using the excuse that the PLO was storing arms in southern Lebanon, the Israeli Army bombed hospitals and schools there. Cluster bombs and phosphorous bombs, two particularly barbaric types of weapons supplied courtesy of the United States, rained upon southern Lebanon. Electricity was cut off and food supplies were not allowed to enter Beirut for days. The massacres in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, horrifying as they were, were but symbols of the greater destruction wrought upon Lebanon by the Israelis. As the days, months and now year drag on, it becomes increasingly clear that this is a war of terror designed to liquidate as many Palestinians as possible and to petrify into submission those who are left alive.

In addition to being highly critical of the invasion, many Israeli Jews have begun to reexamine their own society and to discuss the role of war in their lives. Beyond its dubious military aims, war serves as a smoke screen to cover up many of Israel's internal problems. How convenient to conduct a war financed by the USA, which at the same time deflects attention from Israel's continued occupation of Arab land from the 1967 war, from the 130% yearly inflation rate, from the increasing conflict between Sephardic and Ashkenazi Jews, and from the continuing oppression of women.

Women Against Occupation was organized both to protest the war and to expose the links between militarism and the subjugation of women. Although many anti-war groups sprang up following the invasion, we felt that it was important to organize specifically as women. When a heckler at one of our demonstrations told us that we "would be better off baking cakes for the soldiers," it was evident that the attitude is that it is a woman's duty to support the men at war, and if there was to be anything said or done, it should be by men.

Yet it was precisely the anticipation of this attitude which caused our group to raise the slogan "Silence means approval," which embodies our position that it is our right and duty to protest against the war for several reasons: women should be perceived as equal members of society and should take part in and responsibility for any decision made by the society they live in; we believe that since women do not (as a rule) initiate wars or take an active part in them, they have every right to protest against this situation which has been imposed on them; the fact that society traditionally demands women to reproduce, take care of the home and children, suffer violence, and support the men from behind the lines, provides the very grounds for women's right to object to war.

In a militaristic society one's worth comes from having served in the army, from having been on the front lines. Those who have not served are considered unworthy of speaking out and of participating fully in the nation. Such a claim is raised against Israeli Arabs, whose non-service in the army is often used to legitimize their oppression and to silence them. Although Jewish women do serve in the army, they do so in primarily supportive and servile roles (teaching, secretarial, etc.) and are thus excluded from full national participation. Issues which relate specifically to women such as battery, abortion, and reform of divorce laws are given short shrift. Even within the anti-war movement our views are not taken seriously, because we have not seen "action."

The repercussions of this action have been acutely felt by Palestinian and Lebanese women since the invasion. In this war, directed as it is at a civilian population, women and children suffer heavier casualties than men, who are mobile. To the women who are not killed or injured, the daily pressures of looking for food and water when there is little to be had, of taking care of the wounded, and searching for male friends and relatives who have been dragged off by Israeli soldiers into "detention camps."

The effects of war, however, extend much further than its direct physical consequences. They serve to reinforce the entire social structure, particularly the role delegated to women. First, women are used as alibis for war, "it is waged for our protection and for the security of our families."

Later, we are expected to be grateful and nurturing toward those who risked their lives on our behalf. Yet, the hypocrisy of the vanquishing army toward women is clear: to its own women it projects a sentimental glorification of the home and family, to enemy women there is overt hatred and an attempt to destroy these same institutions.

The recent debate in Israel over abortion and the new tax law, which will give more aid to large Jewish families, expose the reactionary way in which a militaristic society views women. Several months ago a $50 surcharge was imposed on all Israeli citizens leaving the country. The added revenue is to be allocated to all families with four or more children in which the father has either served in the army or has been exempt from military service due to religious reasons. More recently the government changed a law, which gave a sum of money to every mother at every birth enabling poor families to buy needed equipment, clothing, etc. for the child, to a law giving subsidies only to women bearing their fourth child, and again only to those belonging to families meeting the above-mentioned stipulations. In short, these laws apply to Jews only.

Hand in hand with increased aid to large families is a restrictive abortion law. IN 1979 a clause in the abortion law enabling women to abort on socio-economic grounds was repealed, making abortion legal (but not free of charge) only in cases of incest, rape, religious reason, severe physical damage to the mother or child, and other extreme cases. It is not a coincidence that the issue of abortion comes up in the midst of war. Dr. Haim Sadan, advisor to the Minister of Health, said in an interview that "abortion has resulted in the loss of 20 [army] divisionism and the anti-war movement and we participated in the Fifth National Feminist Conference in Haifa, where our workshops on the war and on Arab women were the most heavily attended.

At this point our group is predominantly Jewish, although Palestinian women have participated in our various activities. Recently, we have been making contact with Palestinian women outside of our group in Arab villages and on the West Bank. We have begun to visit Palestinian women who have been imprisoned for being politically active. We feel this is a first step toward closer communication with Palestinian women.

In the above statement, we have raised a few points which we believe can throw some light on the correlation between the permanent state of war which exists in our region and the oppression of Jewish and Palestinian women. We believe that ending this state of war by establishing an independent Palestinian state and guaranteeing all Palestinians human and democratic rights is a major issue in our struggle for women's emancipation.

Further reading: "Israeli Response to War: An Israeli Feminist Account", in American Friends Service Committee Women's Newsletter, Volume 4, Number 1, 1501 Cherry Street, Philadelphia, PH 19102. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

30083. Women Against Occupation; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Israel: Women Against the Occupation: Womens Wombs Are Mobilized to Produce More Soldiers and to Solve the Demographic Problems: Part 01", in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 11, December 1, 1984. p. 9. [In response to an inquiry to the Israeli group Women Against Occupation about their activities, Connexions received the following reply dated 10/10/83.]

Our group does not have a clear cut position about each issue that exists here, for example, the question of Zionism. There are women in our group who are anti-Zionist (myself included) and support the establishment of a democratic and secular state in all of Palestine. Others support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the occupied territories, either as a minimum program or as a permanent solution. Since all positions are decided on by consensus, we have not gone on record as supporting any defined political solution and do not exclude Zionist women from joining our group. Actually the only positions one has to agree upon when joining are women's liberation (broadly defined). Israel out of Lebanon and the occupied territories, and self-determination for the Palestinians. I see this as the broadest possible political basis on which women can organize as feminists, since I see the state of war between Israeli and our Arab neighbors and the oppression of Palestinian rights as the main issue blocking women's emancipation in Israel and that of Palestinian women.

I think it is really astounding that such a group emerged, since I've been politically active for some years and the feminist movement here has always been small, limited and crippled by elitism and has refused to take political positions.

Right now we are involved in several projects. The main ones are support for the strike of women Palestinian political prisoners, We held a second demonstration last week with the participation of the prisoners' families and members of women's groups in the West Bank. It looks as if this is going to be a long and bitter struggle since both sides are determined to win and we need all the international support we can get.

Another project is establishing ties and permanent relations with women's groups in the West Bank. We have already met with them and will continue in order to work together on all relevant issues. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]
Libya

32000. "ISA Delegates See Workers' Situation: Low Wages and Lack of Jobs", in Correspondence (KMU International (Philippines)), April–June 1994, p. 5-6. One of the most common observations of the ISA delegates was the employers' rampant violation of minimum wage laws. This was due to the unlimited pool of unemployed aching to be hired for even less pay. This was the most obvious in the Subic Bay Municipal Area (SBMA), site of the former US naval base which has been transformed as one of the country's leading industrial sites. To be eligible to even apply for a job at the SBMA, workers must present a certificate of voluntarism stating that they have provided their labor free of charge to the SBMA. Workers volunteer from one week to eight months doing such tasks as sweeping streets or waving flags for visitors. And yet, the only jobs available are five-month contractual positions. At the Angeles City branch of the Swagman Hotel, part of an Australian-owned chain notorious as a prostitution front, the ISA delegates found out that counter girls were paid P28 a day. Their main income came from selling their sexual labor to foreigners. They are paid P500 for a night; P200 goes to the Swagman as a commission. Customers also pay P400 a night for a room. The ISA delegates further discovered that children as young as 10 years old were being sold for sex. [*]

32001. "ISA Delegates See Workers' Situation: Repressed Workers' Rights", in Correspondence (KMU International (Philippines)), April–June 1994, p. 5. In Daraga, Albay, about 10-hours drive south of Manila, the ISA delegates met with workers at the Isarog Pulp and Paper Mill (IPPM) factory who, after 11 years, finally forged a collective bargaining agreement with the company management. Since starting operations in 1974, the management of IPPM has resisted all attempts by the workers to form a union to the extent of retrenching the union officers in 1977. The ISA delegates saw that the highest rate and most severe forms of repression were in industrial centers and export processing zones like those in the Southern Tagalog and Central Luzon regions. In such industrial enclaves, a "no union, no strike" policy is the norm. At the Union Plastic Co. located at the Laguna International Industrial Park, 60 kilometers south of Manila, the company’s Korean owners have been trying to shut down the factory to bust the union. The common practice is to reopen the company under a different name, hire new, mostly contractual workers, and make sure no union is formed again. This is what Seaplus, a company in Sorsogon did. It changed names three times to neutralize attempts to form a union. In the Japanese-owned Furusawa Rubber Co. in Laguna, workers went on strike when management dismissed 40 union members. Things were equally bad at the Bataan Export Processing Zone (BEPZ), approximately 100 kilometers north of Manila. The BEPZ was established by Marcos in 1972 and is still considered a showcase by the Ramos regime. Out of 59 factories operating in the zone, only 19 have unions. 67% of the workers are casual employees, many of them young women in temporary training schemes, earning a mere 75% of the minimum wage. 90% of the total work force receive less than the minimum wage. There was a time in 1987 that 95% of BEPZ workers were unionized. In 1988, however, the Aquino regime launched an anti-union offensive in the BEPZ. By 1991, 100 officials had been arrested, three murdered, two shot dead at a picket, and one woman organizer raped. [*]

32002. Barclays Bank. Libya: An Economic Survey; Part 29: Cost of Living. London: Barclays Bank, December 1968. The cost of living throughout the country has increased considerably during the past six years and is continuing to increase each month. This is due not only to the shortage of accommodation and the steady rise in wages, but also to the shortage of labour. With the influx of expatriate staff of oil companies, business and residential accommodation in Tripoli and Benghazi is at a premium. Private furnished accommodation is almost impossible to obtain. Unfurnished flats can be found from £L100-120 per month in the town and semi-detached villas in the suburbs cost £L120-L160, with rents over £L200 per month for first-class accommodation. Good office accommodation is difficult to find and it is impossible to give an accurate guide of the probable rent. Domestic help is difficult to obtain and with the drift to well paid employment with oil companies, those available command from £L50-70 per month. Vegetables, fruit and meat are the main local supplies available and most other foodstuffs are imported. Even local supplies vary with the season and climatic conditions. There is a State National Insurance scheme which provides free medical treatment to all employees. As from 1/1/1969, contributions are on a sliding scale according to income and will increase each year for four years. There are in addition in the main towns private clinics run by qualified doctors for private patients. [*]

32003. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Israel and the Occupied Territories: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (c) Freedom of Religion", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, February 1994. Israeli law provides strong guarantees of freedom for all faiths. Approximately 82% of Israeli citizens are Jewish, Muslims, Christians, and Druze, and members of other minority religions make up the remaining 18%. Each recognized religious community in Israel has legal authority over its members in matters of marriage and divorce. Secular courts have primacy over questions of inheritance, but parties, by mutual agreement, may bring the case to religious courts. Orthodox religious authorities have exclusive control over marriage, divorce, and burial in all sectors of the Jewish community, whether or not they are Orthodox. Missionaries are allowed to work in Israel. According to the Justice Ministry, the Government has not applied a 1977 antiproselytizing law, prohibiting the offering and receipt of material benefits as an inducement to conversion, against any individuals or organizations for several years. Travel to visit religious sites or perform religious obligations in and outside Israel is widely permitted. (See separate report on the occupied territories on denial of rights of Muslim and Christian Palestinians to worship at holy places.) In 1993 Israel approved the pilgrimage to Mecca (for both the hajj and the umra) of over 4000 Israeli Muslims. However, for security reasons, the Government forbids participation in the hajj by males under 30 years of age. The Government asserts that travel to Saudi Arabia, a country formally still in a state of war with Israel, is a privilege and not a right for Israeli Muslims. In 1993 the Government welcomed the visit of 192 Libyan pilgrims to Muslim holy sites in Jerusalem. [*]
Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government provides subsidized medical care and education, improving the welfare of children over the past 25 years. Declining revenues and general economic mismanagement, however, is leading to cutbacks, particularly in medical services. Female circumcision, which has been condemned by international health experts as damaging to physical and mental health, is reportedly still practiced among tribal groups in remote areas of the south. [=]

32007. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Libya: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government has subsidized education and medical care, improving the welfare of children in the past 25 years. However, declining revenues and general economic mismanagement have led to cutbacks, particularly in medical services. Some tribes located in remote areas still practice female genital mutilation which is usually performed on young girls. [=]

32008. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Libya: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Both law and traditional Islamic attitudes restrict women's rights. How ever, Mr. Qadhafi has led efforts to improve the status of women and expand their access to educational and employment opportunities. Women may serve in the military. No information is available on the extent to which violence against women is a problem in Libya. [=]

32010. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Sudan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (c) Prohibition of Force or Compulsory Labor", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. Although the law prohibits forced or compulsory labor, slavery persists. The taking of slaves, particularly in war zone, and their export to parts of central and northern Sudan continued in 1994. Captives were forced to do agricultural and domestic work, and some women were forced to serve as concubines. Although in some instances local authorities took action to stop instances of slavery, in other cases the authorities did nothing. There were also several unconfirmed reports that some captives were exported to Libya. In its 1993 World Labor Report, the ILO noted that traditional slavery survived and is increasing in modern-day Sudan in the context of the ongoing civil war (see Section 6). The SPLA and SSIM continued to force southern men to work as laborers or porters or forcibly conscripted them into their fighting forces. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Libya

==============================================================================

175.

Primary schools 68/69: 1069; 74/75: 1957; Classrooms 68/69: 8311; 74/75: 19168; Male pupils in 68/69: 183080; Female pupils in 68/69: 87537; Total pupils in 68/69: 270617; 74/75: Male pupils 296255; 74/75: Female pupils 242312; 74/75: Total pupils in 74/75: 538567; Teachers 68/69: 8161; Teachers 74/75: 22960.

General Preparatory schools 68/69: 144; 74/75: 421; Classrooms 68/69: 818; 74/75: 3006; Male pupils in 68/69: 25637; Female pupils in 68/69: 3544; Total pupils in 68/69: 29181; 74/75: Male pupils 70391; 74/75: Female pupils 25579; 74/75: Total pupils in 74/75: 95970; Teachers 68/69: 2076; Teachers 74/75: 5817.

General Secondary schools 68/69: 25; 74/75: 70; Classrooms 68/69: 250; 74/75: 551; Male pupils in 68/69: 6237; Female pupils in 68/69: 944; Total pupils in 68/69: 7181; 74/75: Male pupils 13024; 74/75: Female pupils 3170; 74/75: Total pupils in 74/75: 16203; Teachers 68/69: 608; Teachers 74/75: 1651.

(2) University education: Great attention has been paid to university education. Allocations earmarked for this stage in the Five Year Development Plan 1976/1980 amount to LD 554.216 million distributed as follows: LD 276.216 million for Tripoli University, and LD 278 million for Benghazi University. The newly built Benghazi University is large enough to receive 10000 students. Its design, equipment and construction were on the latest model.

(3) Eradication of illiteracy: A timetable for eradicating illiteracy was laid down in the Development Plan. This will take place within the framework of a comprehensive programme participated in by various organizations, the Arab Socialist Union and women’s revolutionary formations. The Programme sets 1980 as a date for stamping out the illiteracy of all citizens. The following table illustrates the number of classrooms and illiterates according to the programme of illiteracy eradication during the years 1973, 1974 and 1975.

NUMBERS OF ILLITERATES AND CLASSROOMS:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>1973 No. of Illiterates</th>
<th>1974 No. of Classrooms</th>
<th>1975 No. of Illiterates</th>
<th>1976 No. of Classrooms</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Tripoli</td>
<td>50000;</td>
<td>1250</td>
<td>50000;</td>
<td>1250</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benghazi</td>
<td>30000;</td>
<td>750</td>
<td>30000;</td>
<td>750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Misrata</td>
<td>9000;</td>
<td>319</td>
<td>9000;</td>
<td>319</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(4) Missions: The number of missions for higher studies which are not available in the Libyan Arab Republic has greatly increased. About 900 students were sent abroad within the Development Plan 1973/1975. Those students are to specialize in the fields of science, technology, industry and agriculture with the purpose of providing the Universities and the various sectors of development with their needs.

(5) Curricula and training: Great efforts have been exerted to develop curricula to present the latest scientific methods and the philosophy of education in the Libyan Arab Republic after the Revolution. The State spares no effort to train teachers in the latest methods of education. The following table shows what has been done in the field of training teachers:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Location</th>
<th>No. of Training Courses</th>
<th>No. of Training Centres</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Tripoli</td>
<td>41;</td>
<td>116;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benghazi</td>
<td>9;</td>
<td>116;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sebha</td>
<td>13;</td>
<td>116;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sabra</td>
<td>10;</td>
<td>116;</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

32013. Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Libya); Department of Information & Cultural Affairs (Libya). The Human March In The Libyan Arab Republic: Part 25: Youth and Social Welfare. Ministry of Foreign Affairs, January 1976. The First of September Revolution is distinguished by its youthful leadership. Therefore, it is only natural that due attention has been given to the Arab Libyan youth. Studies have been carried out to pinpoint the problems and needs of youth in the Arab Libyan society, and plans have been drawn to utilize the energies and potentialities of the young generation: (1) Scouting for boys and girls has been encouraged. (2) Two sports complexes have been established, one in Tripoli and the other in Benghazi. (3) Sports playgrounds and clubs have been established in various parts of the Republic. There are now 129 sports clubs in the Libyan Arab Republic open for all sports.

Sports for the people: Sports for all is a principle adopted by the...
Revolution. To realize the policy based on this principle and to enable as many people as possible to practice sports, twenty centres for youth were set up. They are distributed as follows: (1) Two centres, one in Tripoli and the other in Benghazi. (2) Three centres in each of Zawiya, Sebha and Misrourata. (3) A centre in each of Derna, Al Jabal Al Akhdar, Al Khalji, Khoms and Gheryan.

Each youth centre includes play grounds for different sports, halls for music, drama, lectures and other activities. Also 10 hostels have been built in Benghazi Tripoli, Al Jabal Al Akhdar, Misrourata, Zawiya. Derna, Al Khalji, Sebha, Al Khoms and Gheryan. Each youth hostel is divided into two parts, one for girls and the other for boys. Each has 200 beds and sitting, dining and reading rooms. (1) Five summer resorts for youth have been established. They are in Jolyana area (Benghazi), Sussex area (Al Jabal Al Akhdar), Tajura (Tripoli), Nileli area (Zawiya) and Misrourata area. Each summer resort is well equipped with bedrooms, dining rooms and big halls for different activities. (2) Five sports complexes have been established in Sebha, Majr, Zuwarra, Derna and Misrourata.

Youth welfare: Special care is given to youth to instil in them the spirit of the Revolution. They are trained and given the chance to play their role in the social change taking place in the Libyan Arab Republic. Such interest is translated into the following activities: (1) Camps for the popular revolution for voluntary work. (2) Sports and cultural competitions. (3) Organizing tours to neighbouring Arab countries. (4) Supporting the Libyan Youth Hostels Society. (5) Setting up a chess society.

World youth conferences: The Revolution has also extended facilities to youth and encouraged them to travel abroad where they can exchange thoughts and views with other youths. To prepare the Arab Libyan Youth for these activities, seminars and conferences were held under the supervision of experts and specialists in youth affairs. The seminar on new features of the youth movement, the first sports planning conference in the Libyan Arab Republic, and the central camp for training youth leaders are just a few examples. The Libyan Arab Republic participated in the youth sports, conferences, festivals and sports' training courses which were held on Arab and international levels. The Libyan Arab youth also took part in the following conferences and festivals: (1) The First Arab Youth Festival (Algiers 1972) (2) The Joint Festival for the Youth of the Libyan Arab Republic and Tunisia (3) Palestine Football Cup Round (Benghazi August 1973), (4) The First Arab Youth Festival on Aviation (Cairo - August 1974), (5) The Second Arab Youth Festival (Tripoli July 1975), (6) The Arab Schools Sports Round (Alexandria - August 1975). (7) The First African Youth Festival (Dakar December 1969) (8) The Second African Youth Festival (Tunisia July 1973). (9) The Fourth Conference for the African Youth Movement (Benghazi - March 1974), (10) The International Conference of the Political Movement of the Youth of the Arab Countries and Europe (Tripoli, May 1973 - Paris, December 1974).

Social Affairs: Pursuance of social welfare policy during the last six years has realised signal achievements. National objectives have been made clear in our social welfare work. This work included extending social services and encouraging the establishment of cooperatives and public societies to participate in the revolutionary development of the country. Following is a brief survey of some of these activities and achievements:

Social welfare centres: These centres instruct girls and mothers in matters related to the establishment of a happy and sound family life. Families with low income are trained in manual work, domestic industries, vocational and other work that can help in raising the family income. There are 26 of these centres in the various cities and villages of the Libyan Arab Republic.

Girls’ and boys’ care institutions: These institutions and orphanages look after orphans and poor families. There are six of them in Libya extending refuge to 643 girls and boys. Education is also provided for the orphans in these institutions up to the secondary stage. Priority is given to the orphans of these institutions to join vocational training centres. The Ministry of Labour provides suitable jobs for them following their graduation.

Old age homes: There are three of these homes in Libya. They shelter 273 old men and women. These homes, also, provide care to old men and women who lack necessary family care.

Blind and handicapped rehabilitation centres: In these centres, the blind and handicapped receive vocational training that enables them to be active and useful members of the society.

Juvenile delinquents centres: These centres were affiliated to the Ministry of Interior, but they have been turned over to the Ministry of Social Affairs in response to the new attitude of the Revolution and the society toward delinquents. Two centres are now being built in Tripoli and Benghazi on international standards.

Nurseries: In a society that accepts and encourages women to work, it has become necessary to provide care for the child and furnish facilities for working, women. There are now 19 nurseries which provide care for about 2894 children. Others are under construction.

Social security: On 10/10/1973, one of the most important laws was promulgated, providing for security and equality among the citizens namely the Social Security Law No. 72 of the year 1973. Beneficiaries of the Social Security law receive free medical care in addition to financial and material help. Expenditures to cover pensions and help for the beneficiaries of the Law amounted to LD 3,928,746 during 1974. [=]

32014. Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Libya); Department of Information & Cultural Affairs (Libya), Ministry of Labor (Libya). The Human March In the Libyan Arab Republic: Part 26: Labor. Ministry of Foreign Affairs, January 1976. The Arab Libyan is of the opinion that work guarantees freedom because work is essential to earn a living. It is a proved fact that bread is the way to freedom, which can never be enjoyed by the hungry or the unemployed. Various programmes, therefore, have been undertaken with the purpose of preparing a generation of skilled labourers, creating work opportunities not only for the Libyans, but also for brothers and friends, and to put an end to the habit of dependency by those who leave their farms in search of easy jobs.

Revolutionary labour legislations: (1) Minimum daily wage of the labourer has been increased to two dinars instead of one half dinar. (2) Labour agents have been outlawed. Labour offices are entrusted with the task of making contacts with employers to find the appropriate job for the unemployed. (3) Relations between the labourers and their employers were organized through defining worker's rights in leaves and working hours, prohibiting arbitrary lay-offs, protecting labourers against occupational dangers and regulating employment of women and children. (4) Reorganization of trade unions and syndicates, granting them more liberties. (5) Worker's representation on the Boards of Directors of their companies. (6) Raising the minimum compensation for sickness, retirement and pensions from 8-30 dinars per month. Special care is given to pregnant working-women. (7) Rehabilitation of the disabled and care for juvenile delinquents.

Training: To create skilled productive labourers, training programmes have been undertaken and man, vocational training centres were established. The training budget, amounted to LD 18 million in the Three-Year-Development Plan (1973-1975) Vocational raining centres established: date amount to 22 centres in comparison to 4 centres before the Revolution. In addition, the Ministry of Labour sends abroad trainees in various fields to meet the requirements of the economic and social development plan. There are now approximately 1035 trainees.

Labour education: The State has paid due attention to labour education to make workers aware of their rights and duties and to help them carry out their role in building the democratic socialist society effectively. Various labour education centres have been set up as Higher Institutes for Labour Education in Tripoli, Benghazi and Al Khalji. The following table shows allocation earmarked for the labour sector in 1975:

Vocational training 18643. Labour education 2.7 million. Social Security centres 3 million. [=] demand for the hats has emerged among Tunisian women. The origin of the chechia hat is believed to be Chechnya. Spreading from that region, Tunisian-produced chechias are worn from Sudan to Nigeria (Nigerian exports are made through Libya). As women became more active in public life, they wanted a more convenient headgear, and the chechia was modified to have a point in the front. After introduction, decorated chechias became popular at discos. In the bazaar, merchants are skeptical that a hat that had not changed in 500 years can remain a fad when its fashions change every day.

32016. O'Brien, Jay. "Sudan's Killing Fields", in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. pp. 32-35. While in 1988, Sudan had its best harvest in a decade, as many as half a million refugees in Southern Kordofan province died of starvation and hundreds of thousands of refugees fled to Ethiopia and other areas in Sudan. At the same time, vast squatter settlements in Khartoum have brought the city to 4 million. While there have been reports of the crisis in Sudan, describing the warfare between the Islamic north and Christian, Black south, the real engine for the crisis is a history of class struggle and rivalries among the Sudanese bourgeoisie. When Sudan became independent in 1956, it had two factions in its emergent ruling class: the agrarian elite, based in irrigated cotton-for-export (coalescing around the Ansar), and the commercial bourgeoisie (coalascing around the Khartiya, and the Democratic Unionist Party). As the world cotton market stagnated, the agrarian elite shifted to sorghum production for domestic food consumption; the 1968-1973 Sahelian drought proved a financial windfall for Sudan, which could export food from the Gezira scheme areas. However, the slowing of exports created a crisis in hard currency earnings, and led to a spiraling decline in exports as export crops were hit with higher taxes, and production and irrigation systems declined. In 1973, the fall in cotton prices led to a balance in payments crisis, leading Sudan, under intense pressure to adopt IMF-World Bank stabilization policies. This led to a rapid deterioration in Sudan's rural population. In 1983, the 1972 truce in Sudan collapsed as the Jonglei Canal through the Sudd swamp was being built, the southern oil was taken north for refining. Nimeiri failed to build a viable coalition based on the leftist Sudan Socialist Union, and brought the Muslim Brotherhood into the government; opposition forced it to fall around John Garang to form the SPLA, which seized much of the south. Droughts, beginning in 1980, had by 1984 pushed much of the northern rural population to famine; on 4/6/1985, Nimeiri was deposed by the army. In 4/1986 elections, the Umma Party came to power, as the National Islamic Front (backed by the Muslim Brotherhood and financed by the Saudi-owned Faisal Islamic Bank) took a fifth of the seats in the Parliament. Under the Libyan financed Umma, all factions worked to loot the assets of the Sudanese government; the economy became stricken by strikes, inflation, and crumbling of the physical infrastructure. The traditional balance of power has broken down under the impact of 'Islamic' banks such as Faisal Islamic Bank, which has emerged as the most powerful commercial institution in the country; FIB remains protected from taxation and oversight by its 'Islamic' status. The decline of the economy led to hoarding, shortages, and petty corruption; even postage stamps can only be bought now in the black markets. Neither faction has the power to displace the other, so all have resorted to looting and pocketing resources; private militias bristle with arms and munitions (Umma affiliated militias are the strongest), while police have to account for each bullet they are issued. In Southern Darfur, Southern Kordofan, and Blue Nile provinces, Umma armed militias are merely tribal groups, who have used their arms to raid neighboring Black tribes to seize their cattle, and women and children for enslavement. While there has been a move toward talks between the SPLA and government, it is hard to see how a society that has broken down so far can be pieced back together. But nothing can begin until the civil war ends. [TXT]

32017. Salt, Jacqueline: Solomon Frank. "As Christmas Approaches... It Is Beginning To Look A Lot Like Chip Berlet Works With The Cops, Part 1 of 3", in National Alliance, December 24, 1992. pp. 2-5. In the mid-1980s, as Bill Clinton was beginning to build his coalition through the [Zionist-financed] Democratic Leadership Council, the left started to rebuild by creating the Citizens Party, Consumer Party of Pennsylvania, California's Peace & Freedom Party, and the New Alliance Party. Fred Newman, founding the International Workers Party (IWP), after a brief alliance with Lyndon LaRouche's National Caucus of Labor Committees (NCLC) [now the National Democratic Policy Committee (NDPC)], then a former member of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) member and just before he turned right, disband ed the IWP in 1979; in 1982 he helped found the New Alliance Party (NAP), which emerged out of the Dump Koch movement. In 1977, Dennis King (with links to the Communist Party-USA) attacked NAP as a form of sick psychopolitics; about the same time, [John Foster] Chip Berlet (previously a reporter for CounterSpy) in 'Public Eye' falsely accused NAP of being a LaRouche front group based on brainwashing. Nevertheless, NAP, under the leadership of Dr. Leonora Fulani, grew in the late 1980s, often working with other progressive groups such as the Christian Institute.

In 1984, Berlet became the head of Public Eye, at then time closely linked to the Communist Party-USA, succeeding founder Harvey Kahn. At that time there were serious problems at Public Eye, such as the continuing role of graphic artists William Lemmer (who had been exposed as a government informer who had spied on the Vietnam Veterans Against the War) and the libelous accusations of Kahn (who alleged that NCLC, the National Labor Federation of Marxist Eugenio Finetti and the IMP were a 'distinct coalition... with cultic trappings') which faced a lawsuit by Newman. Despite the continuing reviverberations of Kahn's charges, the NAP grew: joining forces with South Bronx City Councilman Gilberto Gerena-Valentini, Marxist Ted Taylor and New Jersey community leader Mamie Moore to develop the National Federation of Independent Unions. Due to continuing controversy, berlet agreed in a 1984 telephone conversation that the accusations against NAP would be retraced: however, he never honored that commitment. [q.v. From Tapes of a Telephone Interview With new Alliance Movement Leader Dr. Fred Newman Conducted By Left Counterintelligence Researcher Chip Berlet and Public Eye Researcher Daniel Stern in 2/1984.]

Berlet's first issue as editor of Public Eye focused on an attack on the National Labor Federation, just days before an FBI raid on the Natted's Brooklyn headquarters. The FBI seized the groups files and databases in one of the most intense attacks on a leftist organization in history. Yet, Berlet made a pro forma protest, but continued to attack the National Labor Federation, providing justification for the FBI raid. In addition, a small editor's note in that issue reaffirmed the accusation that NAP was a cult. Apparently believing that he had been successful in irreparably damaging the National Labor Federation, Berlet worked for a while in Chicago at Midwest Research Associates (funded by heiress Jean Hardisty, a Democratic Party activist). In 1987, that organization and Berlet would relocate to Cambridge, Massachusetts, resurfacing as Political Research Associates (PRA).

In 1984, Ronald Reagan was re-elected. The Democratic Party would spend the following years in an intense internal struggle, with Jesse Jackson announcing a second run for the Democratic nomination, and Sen. Al Gore working through the Democratic Leadership Conference to position itself for eventual political takeover of the party, leaving Michael Dukakis to run a hopeless Liberal campaign against George Bush in 1988. Disarray in the Left led the Village Voice to embrace Jesse Jackson in 1988, after denouncing him as an anti-semite in 1984, and the disarray continued into 1992, when many socialists, feminists and Black revolutionaries backed Bill Clinton after being handed over by Jackson to his lobbyist ally Ron Brown. In this period, NAP continued to grow, although in 1985 Dennis Serrette, accused by some of being a CIA-plant, and who was Fulani’s former lover, left the party and resurrected Berlet's old charges that the party was a brainwashing cult. [TXT] Farrakhan, Vernon Bellecourt of the American Indian Movement, Dr. Mohammad T. Mehdí (Arab scholar), leaders of the Democratic Alliance in Colombia, the PRD in Mexico, Zairens Dr. Georges Nzongola-Ntalaja and Etienne Tshisekedi wa Mulumba. Fulani worked with the Congressional Black Caucus, the California Peace & Freedom Party and the Libertarian Party. In 1987, Fulani, Bellecourt and Farrakhan traveled to Libya at the Reagan air raids on Tripoli.

In 1987, Berlet received $75000 from Chicago speculator Richard Dennis, and Berlet reoriented his research to a fulltime attack on the Left, and especially on the NAP. This was coincident with an attack on the NAP by the FBI (once again the attacks of the Berlet and FBI happened at the same time). One FBI document, following an FBI warning that "Members of the New Alliance Party may be armed and dangerous" dated 2/23/1988, signed by US Army director of Counterintelligence and Security Countermeasures Co. James R. Linnen, and addressed to FBI Terrorism Section Steven L. Pommerantz, stated that: "At a recent meeting of law enforcement and intelligence officials held in Washington, DC area it was mentioned that the FBI may be investigating a black militant group known as the 'New Alliance'. This group allegedly advocates the violent overthrow of the US Government and is comprised of members of the Black Panther Party and the Weather Underground..." Significantly, the FBI would choose to base its analysis of the NAP on the Berlet article "Clouds Blur the Rainbow": both the FBI and Berlet would term the party a "political cult".

In 1992, Fulani’s presidential campaign was targeted in the Nation by Bruce Shapiro and in New York Newsday by George Jordan, each of whom argued that the FEC should deny the candidate matching funds. Jordan would republish that article in Emerge, adding the statement that the FBI started to target Fulani after her trip to Libya. In 19909, Berlet received a further contribution of $112000 from Richard Dennis, allowing Berlet to publish his Right Woos Left: Populist Party, LaRouchian, and "The truth is that the entire right-woos-left thesis is backwards. The impact of Berlet’s Right Woos Left—which he has been center/left coming together you would be doing just what Berlet is doing. The right and left, but top and bottom. Given that the Elite cannot reestablish Counterintelligence Researcher Chip Berlet and everybody else are well aware of this. They’re well aware that the coalition that could produce a genuinely competitive third-party presidential candidacy in 1996 will not be your traditional ultra-left/reformist left coalition. It will bring together the center-left-polulism and progressiveism—including many ordinary folks who subscribe to the kinds of theories and worldviews that Berlet and the FBI are trying to tarnish with the Right Woos Left brush and drive out of the progressive movement. It will be bottom—the massess—against the top—the two party ruling class bureaucracy.

"The truth is that the entire right-woos-left thesis is backwards. The right isn’t wooing the left. Why would it? Up to a month ago, the right had control of the White House. It still controls or influences major social, political and economic institutions. What could it possibly want with the left, which is weak and impotent? No, if anyone is doing any wooing, it is the left that’s wooing the right. The left has been chasing after the Democratic Party as the Democratic Party has transformed from a liberal political force into one way over on the center right. Meanwhile, NAP has become more and more obviously left, and, as well, is leading the move to work with populist-center forces. By contrast it is Berlet and the new York Times and the Village Voice and the Nation magazine and the FBI which spent last year demonizing the Perot ovment, NAP and anything else that falls outside of the traditional left-right paradigm. But if you hold onto that paradigm, the right wins. If you are willing to risk abandoning that paradigm to create a new political configuration, then you just might do something revolutionary! If you wanted to undermine that centerleft coming together you would be doing just what Berlet is doing. You would be publishing Rights Woos Left. You would be getting ready to publish an updated version of Clouds Blur the Rainbow which PRA is planning to release at the end of this month. I agree with Ace Hayes, You couldn’t find a better ‘psypsy’ plan to deal with the new potential for the left if you went down to J. Edgar Hoover to get one." [TEXT] 32019. Salt, Jacqueline; Solomon Frank. “As Christmas Approaches... It Is Beginning To Look A Lot Like Chip Berlet Works With the Cops, Part 3 of 3: From Tapes of a Telephone Interview With New Alliance Movement Leader Dr. Fred Newman Conducted By Left Counterintelligence Researcher Chip Berlet and Public Eye Researcher Daniel Stern in 2/1984”, in National Alliance, December 24, 1992. pp. 2-5. Chip Berlet: “I should point out that I’m the new kid on the block at Public Eye. I’m the new editor as opposed to the old editor, and if there was some way I could avoid having to write articles about this ongoing topic, I would. Our analysis of your group has changed over the past few years. Dramatically, the change seems to have come at the same time we had some problems with some of the theories and worldviews that Berlet and PRA are trying to tarnish with the Right Woos Left brush and drive out of the progressive movement. It will be bottom—the massess—against the top—the two party ruler class bureaucracy." and a relatively short article on IWP. The reason for including the three at the same time is that we have taken a lot of heat over the past few years for not clarifying things further in our first series of articles [1977 in Public Eye]. Of the three groups, we are going to identify two as being, in our opinion, cult-like, and they are Natlfed and NDPC. Now, you may disagree with that, but at least you know where we're coming from. At the same time, we've been getting a lot of heat from people saying we've got to some response to the IWP stuff, too..."

Fred Newman: Would it be inappropriate for me to ask, I don't know what you mean by a lot of heat? I mean, from which side, from whom?

Berlet: "Heat from leftists, communists, socialists and community organizers saying either put up or shut up. Is that clear enough? People saying the article may have been correct and interesting in 1976, but that is not where you leave these things lie. In fact we are going to retract the statement we made about Union Wage. [Public Eye falsely asserts Union Wage was a IMP front.] I think we should have retracted that years ago myself. In any case, the heat is mostly from groups, including funders and researchers, who say, you've made a lot of charges in this article and then you're silent on it, and that's wrong. I wish I could have let sleeping dogs lie. I tried to do that a couple of years ago in a little blurb on the National Labor Federation, but all that did was cause more chaos. So. this is, I hope, going to be our opus, our last look at thee matters as far as I'm concerned, except for LaRouche, and it is an attempt basically to state what we know, and hope that polemics take care of the rest. It is not, as far as I'm concerned, looking at IWP's offspring--that's the work for leftists and others who need to carry out principled discussions but not the focus of a magazine that keeps track of right-wing groups and government repression..."

["Chip Berlet will continue his work on NAP..." -- From a letter by Jean Hardisty, director of Political Research Associates, soliciting funds for PRA. Berlet is now employed by PRA.] [TXT]
Morocco

34000. ------. "Disillusion in Morocco", in Economist, March 25, 1995. p. 44. While King Hassan was recently received in Washington DC by Pres. Clinton, at home the economy remains stalled by the refusal of EU to open its markets to Morocco. In the US, King Hassan signed an agreement for a $200 million electricity project. However, unemployment is 17% (trade unions say the real rate is double that level), and 70% of the population is under 30. Islamic fundamentalists have gained a strong presence in universities, and female students are expected to go to where Islamic garb; 'unislamic' lecturers are boycotted.

34001. ------. Interview: "Valomet: Call Me Abu Khaled", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, April 14, 1995. p. 14. When Jean Claude Valomet first visited the Gaza Strip in 1986, he had no idea that he would find the kind of misery, abject poverty and harsh occupation that he did. He felt that he was living on a planet other than Earth. He visited several charitable institutions in the Gaza Strip. On one of his visits, he met with Yusra Barbari, the director of the Women's Union in Gaza, who proposed he adopt Palestinian children from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank in need of aid. He liked the idea, and when he went back to France, he proposed it to various friends and associations. The upshot was the establishment of the Loire Region Society, Gaza-Jerusalem. Q: Tell us more about the society. A: The society was founded in 1987 before the Intifada in the Loire Region in western France, 450 kilometers from Paris. It has no official branches outside of France, but it has a liaison bureau in Jerusalem. Q: What services does it offer? A: The services are meant purely for the Palestinian people. What we offer are not material contributions as such, but training and rehabilitation programs. We train Palestinians in sports, social services, and administration. We also offer lecturers and workshops in the arts, mainly in cinema, drawing, and photography. Q: Who benefits from these services? A: We focus on the young. We collect young people from many countries, for instance Palestinians and Israelis, French and Moroccan. The idea is for them to get familiar with the other's culture, religion. We also fight against racism and discrimination and for human rights. One of the most important jobs is to develop ties of friendship between peoples in the Middle East. Our aim is to encourage the Palestinian-Israeli peace process. We focus on culture. Within the framework of the peace process, we set up joint exhibitions between Palestinian and Israeli artists to bring the points of view of the two peoples closer. We also organize conferences on Palestine and Israel every two years in Paris. It includes a Palestinian-Israeli cultural exhibition in cooperation with L'Institut du Monde Arabe. Q: How do you choose the participants in your program? A: We have a representative in Jerusalem, Abdel Abu Rumeileh, a graduate of French universities, who now teaches French at the Ibrahimieh Community College. He is the one who chooses our candidates for use, each in his own field, based on the needs of the Palestinian people. He then submits the list to the French Consulate in Jerusalem. We then secure the workshops, bed, board and transport. Priority goes to those who speak French. Q: Once they have finished their courses, is there a follow-up program to verify if their experience is contributing to the institutions? A: Our ties with those individuals and institutions are continuous, either through our representative in Jerusalem, or through my recurrent visits to Palestine or through our correspondence. Q: Before the Palestinian National Authority came to power, you were working with private institutions. Is your link to the PNA now direct? A: Nothing has changed in the relationship. We do not aspire to create links with the PNA at the expense of other institutions. Our aim is to offer services to the people. Then again, many of those institutions are affiliated to the PNA. Q: What of the project of twinning Palestinian cities with French cities? A: As a society, we act as intermediaries for various municipalities. For instance, we created a twinning between the Municipality of Sain Herblain two years ago. Q: What did Saint Herblain offer its twin Bethlehem? A: There has been cooperation only on a very small scale since the agreement was signed two years ago. I am now in Bethlehem in the company of a group of tourists who are senior citizens. The group will take back with it an impression of life in Bethlehem and the needs of the city. They will recommend various projects that could reinforce the relationship. You might be surprised to hear that there are many people in France who do not know there are Palestinian Christians. Q: Where do you get your funds from? A: Our budget comes from the marketing of Palestinian goods in France, such as olive wood handicrafts, Palestinian embroidery, glasswork from Hebron and some antiquities. Another part comes from the fees paid by the 4000 members of the society. The rest comes from the French government. Q: How did you develop the idea of the society? What help did you have? A: After my visit to Gaza in 1986, I presented the idea to the Municipality of Saint Herblain, and also to the Palestine-French Medical Society. This society agreed to adopt several children. In cooperation with the French Consulate in Jerusalem, the municipality asked the citizens of the Loire Region to help make this idea a success. Q: Did you choose to adopt a Palestinian child yourself? A: Yes, and that was even before the society was established. I adopted a Palestinian child from Qalqiliya over 16 years ago. He is Khaled Al-Hajjar. He is my son. And I am Abu Khaled. This is the way people know me in Palestine. Q: How did you meet your son? A: I got to know Khaled through the In'ash Al-Urs Society in Ramallah, after I inquired about the possibility of adopting a Palestinian child. They brought us together. We have been in contact for over 16 years. He is now a married man with children. And I am now a grandfather. [=] export performance, USAID will initiate projects to increase the competitiveness of firms by increasing market share in selected European Community (EC) export markets from 3% to 5% by 1997; increasing new markets as a percentage of total exports from 28% in 1992 to 40% by 1997, and by reducing tariffs for industrial goods from 47.5% in 1993 to 37.5% in 1997 and for basic agricultural commodities from 70%-100% in 1993 to 50%-75% by 1997. Through US-Moroccan institutional linkages, scientific, technological and commercial interactions will be facilitated.

(3) Increased Availability of Affordable Housing and Services for Low-Income Urban Families. To improve the quality of life, as well as to increase the numbers of stakeholders in the economy, USAID will continue to work with Moroccan local governments and the National Housing Upgrading Agency to increase the quantity of affordable and decent housing for low-income families and to reduce the number of families living in shantytowns. To this end, USAID will reduce the number of households living in slum conditions in the total urban population from 6.3% in 1993 to 5.8% in 1994; increase the number of households newly served by infrastructure under the program from 14000 in 1993 to 27800 by 1997; and increase the number of serviced plots under the program from a total of 38280 in 1992 to 103500 in 1997.

(4) Stabilizing Population Growth Maternal and Child Health. Assistance by USAID, by far the principal donor supporting family planning activities in Morocco, has contributed to a 32% decline in the total fertility rate, from 5.9 in 1979 to 4.2 in 1992. Over the same time frame, the infant mortality rate has declined from an estimated 89 deaths per 1000 live births to 57, and contraceptive prevalence has increased from approximately 19% to 41.5%.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-managed ACTIVITIES: None.

OTHER DONORS: The United States is not a major financial contributor to Morocco. Significant resources are provided to Morocco by the World Bank, the IMF, France, Spain, several other European countries and a number of Arab countries. USAID maintains close working relationships with the multilateral donors and informal coordination with other bilateral donors, including private voluntary organizations (Helen Keller International, American Middle East Foundation, Catholic Relief Services) and Peace Corps.

FY 1995 SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT REQUEST: The Administration requests $22.139 million in Sustainable Development funds for: broad-based economic growth ($8.974 million); population ($10.425 million), environment ($840000); and democracy ($1.9 million). In addition, $1.3 million in Promoting Peace funds for regional activities are requested. [USAID/Rabat Mission Director: Martin Dagata.]

34004. Arney, Megan. "In Brief: Workers in Morocco Hold Sit-In", in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), June 24, 1996, p. 2. Since May 20 47.5% in 1993 to 37.5% in 1997 and for basic agricultural commodities private investment in housing and urban development, with a ratio of up to 10:1 private and public funds; provision of environmental infrastructure services to some 100000 people in unserviced neighborhoods in the city of Tetouan; and, due to the public health benefits of urban environmental upgrading, reduced incidence of hygiene-related diseases such as cholera, which have dropped dramatically in participating neighborhoods. More than 90000 people will also have the opportunity to legalize their insecure squatter status through a title buy-back scheme.

(3) Increased Availability of Affordable Housing and Services for Low-Income Urban Families: Housing programs have resulted in sales to low-income families of nearly 15000 new housing lots with legal title and basic infrastructure (water, sewer, and electricity); inducement of private investment in housing and urban development, with a ratio of up to 10:1 private and public funds; provision of environmental infrastructure services to some 100000 people in unserviced neighborhoods in the city of Tetouan; and, due to the public health benefits of urban environmental upgrading, reduced incidence of hygiene-related diseases such as cholera, which have dropped dramatically in participating neighborhoods. More than 90000 people will also have the opportunity to legalize their insecure squatter status through a title buy-back scheme.

(4) Stabilizing Population Growth Maternal and Child Health. Assistance by USAID, by far the principal donor supporting family planning activities in Morocco, has contributed to a 32% decline in the total fertility rate, from 5.9 in 1979 to 4.2 in 1992. Over the same time frame, the infant mortality rate has declined from an estimated 89 deaths per 1000 live births to 57, and contraceptive prevalence has increased from approximately 19% to 41.5%.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-managed ACTIVITIES: None.

OTHER DONORS: The United States is not a major financial contributor to Morocco. Significant resources are provided to Morocco by the World Bank, the IMF, France, Spain, several other European countries and a number of Arab countries. USAID maintains close working relationships with the multilateral donors and informal coordination with other bilateral donors, including private voluntary organizations (Helen Keller International, American Middle East Foundation, Catholic Relief Services) and Peace Corps.

FY 1995 SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT REQUEST: The Administration requests $22.139 million in Sustainable Development funds for: broad-based economic growth ($8.974 million); population ($10.425 million), environment ($840000); and democracy ($1.9 million). In addition, $1.3 million in Promoting Peace funds for regional activities are requested. [USAID/Rabat Mission Director: Martin Dagata.]

"Literally linking arms against indiscriminate deforestation by the lumber industry, these Himalayan villagers protectively hug the trees when lumberjacks approach to fell them! The Chipko movement's primary objective is to force the state government of Uttar Pradesh to change its antiquated forest policy. Most of the deforestation that takes place in this area is not because of wood collecting to meet basic energy needs but the result of the insatiable demand of the lumber industry.

"After a serious flood and landslide five years ago, people of this region came to realize that their lives were intricately interwoven with the surrounding forest, and that official policy since colonial times had been tearing that web apart. As the thick, broad-leaf forests on the mountain tops were slowly sold away, the humus sponge that held the monsoon water back disappeared. Perennial streams now dry up soon after the monsoon season, and the collection of firewood has become a major preoccupation of the hill women. This deforestation has increased soil erosion and decreased local agricultural productivity.

"The ecological usefulness of the government’s afforestation programs in the region can be disputed. Under these programs, most of the felled oaks, rhododendron, and other broad-leaf trees are replaced with pine, because they grow faster and their wood is wanted in the market. But pine forests do not produce any humus to absorb water or increase soil fertility. Without urgent, proper management of these forests, the agricultural economy of a vast region of plains as well as hills will be threatened.

"The Chipko leaders have organized large voluntary afforestation programs, planting broadleaf trees in mountain areas and along riverbanks to halt erosion and provide a source of fuelwood. Yet the fact that the villagers themselves practice such conservation techniques, and feel impelled to bodily prevent the razing of trees, illustrates the failure of the country’s development strategy. Instead of trying to link the life and economy of the local people, and thereby their development, with the rational exploitation of the only resource surrounding them (in this case, the forests) the government continues to support policies that regard these resources as things to be sold to the highest bidder.

"Much more than local awareness is called for; institutional awareness and concern is imperative. In recent years there have been some encouraging signs of institutional awareness, at least at the international level. These developments include the establishment of the UN Environmental Program and the development of the World Bank policy for environmental as well as industrial forestry. ["Forestry: A Sector Policy Paper," District of Columbia: World Bank, 2/1978.] The US Department of State and its Agency for International Development recently sponsored a strategy conference on tropical deforestation. [US Department of State and US Agency for International Development, Proceedings of the US Strategy Conference on Tropical Deforestation, District of Columbia, 10/1978.] The papers presented at the Seventh World Forestry Congress, held in Buenos Aires in 1972, are probably the most comprehensive set of papers on silviculture as it is practiced today around the world. [A summary of the Seventh World Forestry Congress and a list of the 142 papers is in "Commission I: The Silviculturists," Unasylva, Special Issue, no. 104, 1972, pp. 15-30; individual papers are available from the authors or on microfiche from the FAO, Rome. The proceedings of the Eightth Congress (Jakarta, 1978) should provide a comprehensive updated overview when available.] Numerous LDC governments (including Malaysia, the Philippines, Thailand, India, China, and South Korea) are now showing serious concern over deforestation, [Erik Eckholm, Planting for the Future: Forestry for Human Needs, District of Columbia: Worldwatch Institute, 2/1979.] and these institutional developments may foreshadow increased financial support for forest management in the LDCs. However forest conservation and reforestation projects will continue to face stiff competition for funds and institutional support. Industrial and agricultural projects that show a quick profit and give a more immediate response to the LDC’s urgent need for economic growth are likely to continue to receive higher priority. Forestry projects that do receive priority and funding will still face formidable ecological, bureaucratic, and (perhaps even more formidable) sociological obstacles.

"Several types of programs have been proposed to offset the adverse effects of deforestation in the LDCs. These proposals include:
- Better management of existing forest resources;
- Reforestation;
- Tree Plantations;
- Rangeland management with grazing controls and pasture improvement;

Restriction of new land clearing, based on soil capability studies;
- Development of agro-forestry techniques for people who now have no alternative to planting annual crops on steep slopes;
- Dissemination of more efficient wood cooking stoves;
- Development of biogas and solar stoves to replace wood and charcoal burners; and Intensification of agriculture and other employment-creating forms of rural development in order to reduce the agricultural pressures on the remaining forest lands."

Tropical deforestation is caused by a combination of (1) need for additional agricultural land, (2) need for additional fuelwood, and (3) a sustained world demand for tropical woods operating in the absence of effective and enforced programs for forest conservation and management. Synergisms are often involved. For example, although a growing population of subsistence farmers is clearing land to grow food, access to such land is possible in many cases only because commercial logging operations have opened the forests in response to growing domestic and foreign demand for wood products. [Willem Meijer, IndonesianForest and Land Use Planning, Lexington: University of Kentucky, Botany Department, 1975.] Access and transportation are also factors in the economics of clearing steep slopes. Even if the soil washed... away after only one or two crops, farmers can support themselves over several seasons of clearing by selling firewood or charcoal on the regional market if transportation is available. [Willem Meijer, Indonesian Forest and Land Use Planning, Lexington: University of Kentucky, Botany Department, 1975; T. E. Lovejoy, “The Transamazonica: Highway to Extinction,” Frontiers, Spring 1973.] One of the causes of the growing world demand for forest products is, of course, population growth, but increasing urbanization, a major factor, and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) is well aware of both. Edouard Saouma, FAO Director General, stated recently that, based on projections of past trends:

“Over the next 16 years it is expected that consumption of forestry products will rise by 75% to an annual roundwood equivalent of 4 billion cubic meters. If international development strategies were to increase the buying power of the masses of people in the developing world, even by a small fraction, projected consumption figures would be far higher.”

In addition, possibilities for earning foreign exchange, needed by many LDCs to reduce large foreign debts, will continue to be a motivating factor in establishing tropical forest policy [Larry Rohter, “Amazon Basin’s Forests Going Up in Smoke,” Washington Post, 1/5/1978, p. A14.] and will therefore also influence the possibilities for ameliorating the tropical deforestation trends.

While techniques and technologies are being developed that will assist in protecting and expanding forests, other technical developments may affect the future of tropical forests adversely. A variety of faster, less costly technologies are being developed to replace cutting and burning, the traditional methods of clearing. For example, Agent Orange, the chemical defoliant used widely by US armed forces in Vietnam, is reportedly available in farm supply stores in the Amazon basin, where it is used to clear land for cultivation. [Larry Rohter, “Amazon Basin’s Forests Going Up in Smoke,” Washington Post, 1/5/1978, p. A14.] The chemical 2,4,5-T, one of two herbicides contained in Agent Orange and invariably contaminated with the toxic compound dioxin, is now banned in the US [Clive Cookson, “Emergency Ban on 2,4,5-T Herbicide in US,” and Alistair Hay, “Dioxin: The 10-Year Battle That Began with Agent Orange,” Nature, 3/8/1979, pp. 108-09.] because it has been linked with birth defects and miscarriages. [The Comptroller General of the United States has recommended that the Department of Defense conduct a survey of any long-term medical effects on military personnel who were likely to have been exposed to herbicides in South Vietnam (Health Effects of Exposure to Herbicide Orange in Vietnam Should Be Resolved, District of Columbia: US General Accounting Office, 4/6/1979.) Another innovative technique for efficient clearing of tropical forests in Brazil is the correntao. [Larry Rohter, “Amazon Basin’s Forests Going Up in Smoke,” Washington Post, 1/5/1978, p. A14.] This involves the use of very large anchor chains, roughly 100 meters in length and weighing up to 10 tons. Enormous tractors attached to each end drag them through the forest, uprooting trees and everything else in the path. [This technique was used earlier (and may have been developed initially) in the US, where it was used in arid-zone range management. Undesirable woody vegetation was scraped from the land with heavy chains, after which preferred range grasses were sown. (John Valentine, Range Development and Improvement, Provo: Brigham Young University Press, 1974, p. 516.)]

Still another technological development likely to significantly affect at least the Brazilian tropical forests is the "floating papermill." In 1978, industrialist Daniel Ludwig’s floating papermill (longer than two football fields in size) was towed from its construction site in Japan through the Indian and Atlantic Oceans to its final destination along the Jari River, a tributary of the Amazon. Time magazine, reporting on the $250 million plant, commented that by 1981 the factory “will turn out 70 metric tons of bleached Kraft pulp a day, enough to make a single strand of toilet paper stretching more than 6.5 times around the world... To feed the mills’ appetite, Ludwig’s crews have cleared nearly 250,000 acres of jungle so far and planted 81 million fast-growing trees.” [Daniel Ludwig’s Floating Factory: A Giant Pulp Mill for the Amazon Wilderness,” Time, 6/19/1978, p. 75.] Eventually, Ludwig plans to “tame” an area of rain forest almost the size of Connecticut.

Sociological research on community cooperation and institutions will also be necessary if village-level woodlots to meet woodlot and environmental needs are to be widely established. [Erik Eckholm, Planting for the Future: Forestry for Human Needs, District of Columbia: Worldwatch Institute, 2/1979.]

34006. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1989. pp. 1143-1154. The Constitution of Morocco provides that the country shall be governed by constitutional monarchy with a representative Parliament and an independent Judiciary. However, the ultimate authority rests with the King, who retains the discretion to terminate the tenure of any minister and dissolve Parliament to rule by decree. The current Parliament was formed in 1993 by a two-stage process: the election of 222 deputies by direct universal suffrage and selection of the remaining 111 deputies by labor organizations and other constituency groups. International observers found the direct elections to be generally fair with some irregularities. However, the second stage was marred by credible reports of widespread manipulation and fraud. When three major political parties refused to participate in the government without a far-reaching shift in power in favor of the Socialists, the King appointed a government of technocrats who, with minor changes, remained in office in 1994. The security apparatus comprises several overlapping police and paramilitary organizations. The direction de la Surveillance du Territoire, Surete Nationale, and the judicial police are departments of the Ministry of Interior and Information. The Gendarmerie Royale reports directly to the royal palace. Security force abuses continued in 1994, especially in cases involving perceived threats to state security. Morocco’s mixed economy is based on agriculture, fishing, light industry, phosphate mining, tourism, and remittances from overseas workers with illegal cannabis production a significant factor. Since the early 1980s, the government has pursued an economic reform program that has contributed to a generally strong economic growth, low inflation, and low fiscal and external deficits. The Government has embarked on a program of privatizing state-owned enterprises. In 1994 the Government made substantial progress on several human rights fronts. The King granted amnesty to 424 political prisoners- the Government began paying stipends to former inmates who survived incarceration at the notorious Tazmamart Prison; a 1934 law allowing the imprisonment of political opponents was abrogated; incidents of press censorship decreased; and the Deputy Ministry for Human Rights expanded its operations and continued dialogs with local and international human rights groups. However, several basic human rights problems remained unaddressed. Credible reports indicate that security forces frequently abused detainees and prisoners and caused the deaths of three persons in custody; state agency responsible for past and present human rights abuses were not held accountable by the weak and maliable judiciary or even subject to public investigation; many persons remain in prison for advocating independence for the Western Sahara; many young girls remain subject to exploitative domestic servitude; and the Government failed to make significant reforms in the manipulation-proven electoral system and continued to suspend the right to due process and freedom of speech and association. The ubiquitous nature of the Ministry of Interior and Information means that virtually all allegations of governmental human right abuse involve in employees. The Ministry is responsible for authorizing associations and political parties, the conduct of elections, including cooperation with the United Nations in a referendum on the status of the Western Sahara—the oversight of the presidential pardon and expedition of the official pardon; the direction of most security forces, the appointment and training of many local officials; the allocation of local and regional budget; and the oversight of university campuses. Less formally, the Ministry exerts substantial pressure on the judicial system. In 2/1994 comments to Parliament, reiterated in 11/1994, the Minister of Interior made clear that Ministry employees will not be held to answer for allegations of abuse brought by Parliament, other ministries, or nongovernmental organizations (NGO’s). [=]

34007. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, February 1994. Moroccan women suffer various forms of discrimination, both legal and cultural. Under the Criminal Code, women are generally accorded the same treatment as men. Men are not accorded equal treatment under family and estate law, which is based on the Maliki school of Islamic law. In marriage, for example, a husband may repudiate his wife, but the wife may not repudiate her husband. The situations under which a woman may sue for divorce are far fewer than those permitted to men. Women inherit only half as much as their male siblings. Moreover, even where the law guarantees equal status, cultural norms often prevent a woman’s exercise of those rights. When a Moroccan woman inherits property from a father or husband, for example, male relatives may force her to sign over her interest. Many well-educated women succeed in breaking into the professional ranks, particularly in the areas of law, medicine, education, and government service. There are, however, few women in the top echelons of their professions. Women comprise approximately 24% of the work force, with the majority of them in the industrial, service, and teaching sectors. Women have the right to vote and to run for office. Some women have been elected to municipal councils and two women were elected to Parliament in 1993. There are no women on the CCCH, nor are there any women serving as government ministers. Women suffer most from inequality in the rural areas. Rural women perform most hard physical labor; the rate of literacy, particularly in the countryside, is noticeably lower for women than for men; and girls are much less likely to be sent to school than are boys. Women who earn their secondary school diploma, however, have equal access to university training. The law and social practices governing violence against women reflect Morocco’s Islamic culture and the importance placed on the honor of the family. The Criminal Code includes severe punishment for men who are convicted of raping or violating a woman or girl, and the defendant bears the burden of proving his innocence. However, sexual assaults often unreported because of the stigma attached to the loss of virginity. A rapist may be offered the opportunity to marry his victim in order to preserve the honor of the victim’s family. Although a woman who is the victim of rape is entitled to have her husband’s family pay for compensation according to the general law governing marriage, it is rare for this to be done. Women who become pregnant outside of marriage are often stigmatized, particularly if they are married. In 1993, a Royal decree was issued that provided for the criminal punishment of anyone who committed incitement to a stoppage of work; and the crime of violating a woman’s right to receive compensation for injury or death. The law criminalizes the practice of forced marriage, and women are not permitted to marry without the consent of their parents.

34008. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, February 1994. Morocco launched in November a campaign to vaccinate children against preventable diseases. However, the Government takes little action to promote child welfare in the areas of child labor and education. The announced illiteracy rate is 55%, and the actual rate is higher, especially in rural areas. At year’s end, the Moroccan daily L’Opinion summarized several cases involving the physical abuse of young maids by their employers. At least two 1993 cases were before Moroccan courts. In the first, a Casablanca police officer and his wife were arrested for severely beating a 6-year-old maid recruited from poor rural relatives. In the second, a military officer’s wife from Meknes was arrested for the murder of a 14-year-old maid who died after admission to a hospital exhibiting symptoms of torture and starvation. After citing scores of examples of the abuse of young girls employed as domestics, "L’Opinion concluded that documented cases were merely the tip of the iceberg and accused the Government of callous indifference to the problem. [=]

34009. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, February 1994. The Minimum Age of 14 covers the employment of children between the ages of 12-16. Those under the age of 16 may not work after school (between 11 a.m. and 5 p.m.) nor more than 10 hours a day. The normal workday is 8 hours, only in a few exceptional professions are any workers permitted to work more than 10 hours per day. In practice, children are often apprenticed before age 12, particularly in handicraft work. The argument is made that they need to acquire skills, such as weaving or rug making, before they reach the age of 12. Five years of primary education is compulsory, starting at age 7, but enforcement in the countryside and poorer urban areas is lax. Special regulations govern the employment of children between the ages of 12-16. Those under the age of 16 may not work nights (between 11 p.m. and 5 a.m.) nor more than 10 hours a day. The normal workday is 8 hours, only in a few exceptional professions are any workers permitted to work more than 10 hours per day. In practice, children are often apprenticed before age 12, particularly in handicraft work. The argument is made that they need to acquire skills, such as weaving or rug making, before they reach the age of 12. Five years of primary education is compulsory, starting at age 7, but enforcement in the countryside and poorer urban areas is lax. Safety and health conditions as well as salaries unenterprises employing children are often substandard. The use of minors is common in the rug-making and tanning trades, many of whose products are exported. Children are also employed informally as domestics and usually receive little or no wages. Poverty and a pervasive cultural acceptance of child labor keep abuse of the child labor laws prevalent nationwide. In 1993 a Casablanca policeman and his wife were arrested for severely beating a 6-year-old maid, recruited from labor, rural relatives. The Ministry of Labor, through its corps of labor inspectors, is responsible for enforcing child labor regulations. Child labor laws are generally well observed in the industrialized, unionized sector of the economy. However, the inspection mandate of labor inspectors does not include domestic employees. [=]
The most publicized police brutality case involved the death on May 16 of Mustapha Hamzaoui in the jail at Khenifra. Hamzaoui, a former law student and activist with the left-wing Moroccan Association of Unemployed Graduates, was arrested on May 16 on suspicion of verbally assaulting four young women. According to Khenifra authorities, he was interrogated twice while in custody and then committed suicide by hanging. Alleging that the body bore evidence of multiple cigarette burns and mutilated genitalia, Hamzaoui’s family refused to accept his remains without the performance of an autopsy. Although the Ministry of Justice sent a physician to examine the body, no autopsy report was made public. Khenifra authorities subsequently released a statement confirming the finding of suicide and impugning Hamzaoui’s character. Despite appeals and a legal motion filed by the OMDH, no further government investigation or response has been made. Hamzaoui’s family is reportedly under government pressure to drop the matter. In another case, Abdellah Bentawet died while in detention in a Tangier jail. He was arrested on June 1 after being involved in an altercation. Members of his family allege that, while they were visiting the detainee, a security agent began to beat him and demanded payment of approximately $16 for his release, which the family refused to make. On the following day, Bentawet’s family was informed that he had committed suicide. Bentawet’s family reported that the body bore a large facial cut and that the authorities refused to allow them to view the entire body. An autopsy ordered by local authorities found no indications of violence yet concluded that death was caused by hanging. The police involved in the Hamzaoui, Bentawet, and Azzag deaths were all employed by the Ministry of the Interior. No disciplinary actions have been instituted against them. [≡]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Morocco
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

34010. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (a) Political and Other Extra-Judicial Killings", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Credible reports document that at least three persons died in police custody in 1993 due to Moroccan security force brutality. The most publicized police brutality case involved the death on May 16 of Mustapha Hamzaoui in the jail at Khenifra. Hamzaoui, a former law student and activist with the left-wing Moroccan Association of Unemployed Graduates, was arrested on May 16 on suspicion of verbally assaulting four young women. According to Khenifra authorities, he was interrogated twice while in custody and then committed suicide by hanging. Alleging that the body bore evidence of multiple cigarette burns and mutilated genitalia, Hamzaoui’s family refused to accept his remains without the performance of an autopsy. Although the Ministry of Justice sent a physician to examine the body, no autopsy report was made public. Khenifra authorities subsequently released a statement confirming the finding of suicide and impugning Hamzaoui’s character. Despite appeals and a legal motion filed by the OMDH, no further government investigation or response has been made. Hamzaoui’s family is reportedly under government pressure to drop the matter. In another case, Abdellah Bentawet died while in detention in a Tangier jail. He was arrested on June 1 after being involved in an altercation. Members of his family allege that, while they were visiting the detainee, a security agent began to beat him and demanded payment of approximately $16 for his release, which the family refused to make. On the following day, Bentawet’s family was informed that he had committed suicide. Bentawet’s family reported that the body bore a large facial cut and that the authorities refused to allow them to view the entire body. An autopsy ordered by local authorities found no indications of violence yet concluded that death was caused by hanging. The police involved in the Hamzaoui, Bentawet, and Azzag deaths were all employed by the Ministry of the Interior. No disciplinary actions have been instituted against them. [≡]

34011. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Although the Government ratified the Convention Against Torture in June, 1987, the extent to which it has been implemented remains unknown. While no prisoner who was confined there, many of whom apparently died there. However, the Government refuses to comment on past or present activities at the Tazmamart detention facility, notorious for its harsh treatment of prisoners, have not been verified. After years of denial, King Hassan acknowledged for the first time in a May interview that the futility had existed. However, the Government refused to comment on past or present activities at the Tazmamart site or to provide an accounting of the prisoner who were confined there, many of whom apparently died there. The few surviving prisoners who were released from Tazmamart have indicated that their continued liberty is conditioned upon their silence regarding the circumstances of their imprisonment. There is no indication that the Government is investigating Tazmamart abuses for the purpose of bringing those responsible to justice. [≡]
extrajudicial pressures. Secular court judges are not well paid. Cash payments to unscrupulous judges are widely reported to be commonplace in routine criminal cases. Likewise, judges hearing cases involving challenges to royal authority or state policy are vulnerable to political pressure, especially from the Ministry of Interior. The accused in such cases do not enjoy the procedural safeguards needed to ensure a fair trial. Comments made by the prosecutor during the Tabit trial, for example, clearly indicated that the sitting judge was following instructions from the Ministry of the Interior and the Palace. Islamic court judges are paid by the parties for services in settling inheritance cases, with compensation often a percentage of the assets involved. Aside from external pressures, the secular court system is also subject to resource constraints. Consequently, criminal defendants charged with less serious offenses often receive only cursory hearings, with judges relying on police reports to render decisions. Although the Government provides an attorney at public expense for serious crimes (when the alleged offense carries a maximum sentence of over 5 years) appointed attorneys often provide inadequate representation. Proceedings in the cases of three labor leaders convicted of expressing antigovernment views were concluded in 1993. In May the Court of Appeal upheld the conviction of Nouib Amaoui who was sentenced in 1992 to 2 years in prison for defaming the Government after a trial widely criticized for being politically motivated and for procedural irregularities and restrictions on public and press access. In July Amaoui was granted a royal pardon and released. Driss Lagnhimi was convicted in 1993 for insulting the person of the King during a public discussion between members of different unions. He also received a royal pardon following denial of his appeal in April. The Court of Appeal also upheld the conviction of Ahmed Belaichi who was sentenced in 1992 to 3 years in prison for “affront to the military” after a trial in which several defense witnesses were not permitted to testify. He remains in prison. Moroccan human rights organizations periodically publish lists of prisoners of “opinion,” prisoners accused of armed conspiracy or violence for political reasons, and prisoners convicted following demonstrations or strikes. These groups estimate that Moroccan prisons now hold 500-600 prisoners in these categories, of whom approximately 100 are held for crimes of politically motivated violence, and approximately 300 were arrested in connection with strike or demonstration activities. Because the Government defines several categories of speech as criminal, it regards political prisoners as common criminals. [=]

34013. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (a) Freedom of Speech and Press", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Constitution provides for freedom of expression, but by Moroccan law and tradition negative commentary is forbidden on three topics: the monarchy, Morocco’s claim to the Western Sahara, and the sanctity of Islam. Statements on these subjects may be deemed crimes against state security. In addition, many Moroccans are careful not to criticize the foreign or domestic policies of the Government for fear of reprisal. Mustapha Dadao, a Marrakesh student arrested in 1992 for allegedly shouting offensive slogans at a May Day rally, was convicted in January of "insult to the King" and sentenced to 5 years. A year was added to his sentence when he commented that his trial had been "superficial. Fifteen Oujda students were convicted in January of illegal demonstrations and distribution of untruthful tracts susceptible of disturbing the public order" and received sentences ranging from 1 month to 1 year. In March two students received 2-month sentences for protesting against a new examinations schedule. In June five Kenitra youths received 3-month sentences for holding a demonstration protesting the death in detention of Mustapha Hamzaoui. Press freedom is significantly restricted, though the limits are not clearly defined. A 1958 decree Rives the Government the authority to register and license domestic newspapers and journals. In practice, authorities use the licensing process to prevent the publication of materials that they believe cross the threshold of tolerable dissent. Offending publications may be declared a danger to state security and may be seized, the publisher’s license may be suspended and equipment destroyed. Article 55 of the Press Code empowers the Government to censor newspapers directly by ordering them not to report on specific items or events. The Government tolerates satirical newspapers, but often stages editorials in the opposition parties’ dailies. The tone of those editorials became especially sharp during the 1993 election campaigns. The press also continued in 1993 to report allegations of torture and other harsh treatment, abuse of authority, and prisoners’ complaints of degrading conditions. In particular, the flagrant abuses perpetrated by Casablanca police officers revealed during the Tabit trial were widely reported. In November the opposition news daily L’Opinion ran a series of editorials critical of the state of democracy in Morocco. The paper’s editor was summoned to the office of the Minister of Interior. The paper thereafter ran an open letter to the Minister condemning his alleged threat to imprison the editor. Other opposition papers have subsequently editorialized in support of L’Opinion’s stance against the Minister. Government control of the media generally is exercised through directives and guidance” bulletins from the Ministry of Interior. The media regularly engages in self-censorship, prompted by a desire to avoid the Government’s attention and possible sanctions. The Government owns the official press agency, Maghreb Arab Press, and the Arabic daily Al Anbaa. The Government owns the only television station receivable nationwide without cable or satellite dish antennas. Dish antennas are available, though expensive, and permit free access to a wide variety of foreign broadcasts. Morocco’s sole private station can be seen in most urban areas with the rental of an inexpensive decoder. Northern residents can receive Spanish stations with standard antennas. The Government does not impede reception of foreign broadcasts. A great number of foreign news publications are available, particularly from Europe and the United States.

Although generally tolerating a broad spectrum of opinion in the foreign press distributed in Morocco, the Government continued in 1993 to ban those editions of foreign publications that contained articles about Morocco deemed particularly offensive. For example, distribution of the February 6 and March 29 editions of Le Monde were blocked apparently because they contained articles describing efforts of a major Moroccan company to acquire a foreign radio station, offering an unflattering appraisal of Moroccan-French relations, and questioning the fairness of the Moroccan elections. Moroccan authorities searched the hotel room of a British journalist, who was preparing a story on the Tabit trial, questioned her regarding her activities, and later confiscated her notes at the airport. Moroccan universities enjoy relative academic freedom in most areas, but the Government prohibits academic investigation of the Islamic roots of the monarchy. Limited research and publishing on Islam and Islamic fundamentalism is tolerated. Ministry of Interior approval is a prerequisite to tenure in all disciplines. Professors complain that the Ministry often confines tenure on political, rather than purely academic grounds. [=]
Government denied permission for the march. Authorities broke up a variety of peaceful demonstrations in 1993, often injuring and arresting the participants. In April a sit-in organized by the Moroccan National Association of Unemployed Graduates to call attention to the lack of employment available to recent graduates was forcibly dispersed by authorities. In June a sit-in organized by a group of blind students to publicize their inability to access public buildings was similarly disrupted by authorities. In November and December, members of a political group were injured or arrested when police forcibly broke up another demonstration in front of the Ministry of the Interior. The Government continued to impede the ability of human rights groups to hold public meetings, often by denying necessary permits. Another effective restraint on assembly rights is imposed by the Government’s practice of closing mosques to the public shortly after religious services, thereby removing any potential for the practice, common in other Muslim countries, of using mosque premises for political activity. The right to form organizations is limited. Under a 1958 decree, persons wishing to create an organization must obtain the approval of the Ministry of the Interior before holding meetings. In practice, the Ministry uses this requirement to prevent persons suspected of advocating causes opposed by the Government from forming legal organizations. Islamist and leftist groups have the greatest difficulty in obtaining official sanction. Twenty-nine Islamist groups have been active within Morocco. Membership in two of these groups, Justice and Charity and Jama’a Islamia, has been outlawed due to perceived anti-monarchy rhetoric. Political parties must also be approved by the Ministry of the Interior, which uses this power to control participation in the political process. [2]

34015. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993, Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Although freedom of movement within Morocco is provided for in the Constitution, in practice security forces set up roadblocks throughout the country and stop traffic at will. In some regions the roadblocks have been maintained in the same places for years, creating what some characterize as internal frontiers. In the Western Sahara, which is administered by Morocco, movement is restricted in areas regarded as militarily sensitive. The Interior Ministry restricts the freedom to travel outside Morocco in certain circumstances. For example, it has refused to issue passports to a number of Moroccans, including certain political activists, former political prisoners, and Baha’is. In February the OMDH published a list of 62 former political prisoners, human rights monitors, lawyers, and others who continued to be denied passports. In a series of spring meetings, CCDH members met with Ministry of the Interior officials and requested status reports on several passport applications. By years end the Ministry issued passports to 46 persons on the OMDH list. Some former political prisoners after being issued passPorts, were denied exit at border points on the basis that government computers had not been updated to reflect their eligibility to leave. There continued to be reports of instances in which police seized passports at border points or otherwise blocked the exit of Moroccans trying to leave the country, usually without explanation. Women must have permission from either their fathers or husbands to obtain a passport. A divorced woman must have her father’s permission to obtain a passport and, if she has custody of the children, she must have permission of the children’s father for passports to be issued to the children. Although the King has characterized the male consent requirement as contrary to Islam and the Constitution, no changes in these provisions were made in 1993. There are frequent allegations of corruption in the passport offices; applicants are reportedly forced to pay gratuities to obtain application forms and to make sure that the application is not lost in the bureaucratic labyrinth. All Moroccan civil servants must obtain written permission from their ministries to leave the country each time they wish to do so. Moroccans may not renounce Moroccan citizenship, but the King has the rarely used power to revoke it. Ten thousands of Moroccans hold more than one citizenship and travel on passports from two or more countries. While in Morocco they are regarded as Moroccan citizens. As a result, the Government has sometimes refused to recognize the right of foreign embassies to act on behalf of dual nationals or even to receive information concerning their arrest and imprisonment. Dual nationals also complain of harassment by Moroccan immigration inspectors. Moroccan law encourages voluntary repatriation of Moroccan Jews who have emigrated-Moroccan Jewish emigrants, including those with Israeli citizenship, freely visit Morocco. The law also encourages the return of Saharans who have opposed Morocco in the Western Sahara conflict. Returning former members of the Polisario, a group seeking independence for the Western Sahara, who are deemed to pose no threat to security are integrated into Moroccan life. [2]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Morocco

return of Saharans who departed Morocco due to the conflict in the Western Sahara--provided they recognize the Government's claim to the region. The Government does not permit Saharan nationalists who have been released from prison to live in the disputed territory. [=]

34017. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995, pp. 1143-1154. The Government has taken little action to end child labor (see Section 6.d.). Young girls in particular are exploited as domestic servants. Orphanages are often party to the practice of adoptive servitude, in which families adopt young girls who perform the duties of domestic servants in their new families. Credible reports of physical abuse are widespread. The practice is often justified as a better alternative to keeping the girls in orphanages. It is ingrained in society, attracts little criticism, even from human rights groups, and is unregulated by the Government. In 1994 the Government continued a campaign to vaccinate children against preventable diseases. [=]

34018. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995, pp. 1143-1154. Women suffer various forms of legal and cultural discrimination. Under the Criminal Code, women are generally accorded the same treatment as men, but are not accorded equal treatment under family and estate law, which is based on the Malikite school of Islamic law. Under this law, husbands may more easily divorce their wives than vice versa. Women inherit only half as much as male heirs. Moreover, even where the law guarantees equal status, cultural norms often override the law, as in cases where a husband asks for divorce without legal justification; and recognize a wife's priority of right to custody of young children after a divorce. Women's groups unsuccessfully requested that the Moudouwana, or Code of Personal Status, which is based in part on the Koran. With the active support of the King, limited reforms of the Moudouwana, consistent with the Koran, were effected in 1993. The amendments allow a wife to divorce a husband who announces an intent to take a second wife; grant a wife unspecified allowance rights, based on the husband's income, in cases where a husband asks for divorce without legal justification; and recognize a wife's priority of right to custody of young children after a divorce. Women's groups unsuccessfully requested that the Moudouwana changes include expanded rights to combat spousal violence, a problem human rights groups confirm is commonplace. Although a battered wife has the right to complain to the police, as a practical matter she would do BO only if prepared to file for divorce. Spousal abuse is grounds for divorce, but even if abuse is proven, divorced women do not have the right to financial support from their former spouses. Hence few victims report abuse to authorities. The law and social practice concerning violence against women reflects the importance society places on the honor of the family. The Criminal Code includes severe punishment for men convicted of rape or violating a woman or girl. The defendants in such cases bear the burden of proving their innocence. However, sexual assaults often go unreported because of the stigma attached to the loss of virginity. A rapist may be offered the opportunity to marry his victim in order to preserve the honor of the victim's family. The law excuses the murder or injury of a wife caught in the act of committing adultery, however, a woman would not be excused for killing her husband under the same circumstances. While many well-educated women pursue careers in law, medicine, education, and government service, few make it to the top echelons of their professions. Women comprise approximately 24% of the work force, with the majority of them in the industrial, service, and teaching sectors. Women suffer most from inequality in the rural areas. Rural women perform most hard physical labor, the rate of literacy, particularly in the countryside, is noticeably lower for women than for men. Girls are much less likely to be sent to school than are boys. Women who earn secondary school diplomas, however, have equal access to university training. [=]

34019. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Morocco: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995, pp. 1143-1154. Abuse of the child labor laws is common nationwide. The law prohibits the employment or apprenticeship of any child under 12 years of age. Education is compulsory for children between the ages of 7-13. Special regulations govern the employment of children between the ages of 12-16. In practice, children are often apprenticed before age 12, particularly in the handicraft Industry. The use of minors is common in the rug-making industry and also exists to some extent in the textile and leather goods industries. Children are also employed informally as domestics and usually receive little or no wages. Safety and health conditions as well as salaries in enterprises employing children are often substandard. Ministry of Labor inspectors are responsible for enforcing child labor regulations which are generally well observed in the industrialized, unionized sector of the economy. However, the inspectors are not authorized to monitor the conditions of domestic servants. [=]

34020. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Western Sahara", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995, pp. 1143-1154. The sovereignty of the Western Sahara remains the subject of a dispute between the Government of Morocco and the Polisario, an organization seeking independence for the region. The Moroccan Government assumed administration of the Western Sahara's northern three provinces after Spain withdrew from the area in 1976, and it extended its administration to the province of Oued ed Dahab in 1979 after Mauritania renounced its claim to it. After unifying the Western Sahara, the Moroccan Government undertook a massive economic development program that has resulted in substantial growth in the region's towns. Since 1973 the Polisario has challenged successfully the claim of Spain and Morocco to the territory. Moroccan and Polisario forces have fought intermittently since 1976, although there have been no significant clashes since a 1991 cease-fire and deployment to the area of a United Nations contingent, known by its French initials, MINURSO. In 1976 the International Court of Justice issued an advisory opinion on the status of the Western Sahara. The Court held that Morocco was not entitled to sovereignty over the territory. According to the Court, the people of the Western Sahara, the Saharawis, are entitled to self-determination. Reports by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to resolve the sovereignty question collapsed in 1984 when the OAU recognized the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic, the civilian arm of the Polisario. Morocco withdrew from the OAU in protest. In 1988 Morocco and the Polisario accepted the United Nations' plan for a referendum that would allow the Saharawis to decide between integration with Morocco or independence for the region. The referendum was scheduled for January 1992 but was postponed because the parties could not agree on the common list of eligible voters. The United Nations continues to seek a compromise on the voter issue. In 8/1994 MINURSO personnel began to hold oral hearings for voter applicants in Laayoune. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Morocco

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

and Tindouf, Algeria. At such hearings, applicants may present evidence of identification and residence, as well as oral testimony from tribal elders on the bona fides of the applicant’s claim to voter eligibility. Since 1977 the Saharan provinces of Laayoune, Smara, and Boujdour have participated in Moroccan elections. The southern province of Oued ed Dahab has participated in Moroccan elections since 1983. Sahrawis fill all 10 seats allotted to the Western Sahara in the Moroccan Parliament. The population of the Western Sahara in the 86% of the population in the Western Sahara. Sahrawi-administered administration is subject to Moroccan law. UN observers and foreign human rights groups report that Sahrawis have difficulty obtaining Moroccan passports, that the Government monitors the political views of Sahrawis more closely than those of Moroccan citizens, and that the police and paramilitary authorities react especially harshly against those suspected of supporting the Polisario. Sahrawis who returned to Morocco from refugee camps administered by the Polisario have presented strong circumstantial evidence that they were tortured by Polisario security officers in the camps. However, there were no reports that camp residents were tortured in 1994. After years of denying that Sahrawis were imprisoned in Morocco for Polisario-related military or political activity, the Government released 300 such prisoners in 1991. Entire families and Sahrawis who had “disappeared in the mid-1970’s were among those released. The Government has failed to conduct a public inquiry or to explain how and why those released were held for up to 16 years incommunicado detention without charge or trial. The Polisario claims that the Government continues to hold more than 800 Sahrawis as political prisoners. The Government formally denies that any Sahrawi noncombatants remain in detention. However, in announcing an amnesty for political prisoners in July, King Hassan declared that any prisoner who questions Morocco’s sovereignty over the Western Sahara would not be eligible for amnesty. Observers interpreted the King’s remarks as implying that the Government still holds some Sahrawi nationalists in prison. According to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), Morocco holds 69 Sahrawi combatants as prisoners of war (POW’s), and the Polisario holds between 600-3000 Moroccan POWs. In 1994 ICRC representatives visited both groups of prisoners but had not released any reports at year’s end. The Polisario has separated out 200 Moroccan soldiers and offered them for repatriation along with another group of 26 POW’s reportedly in need of medical attention. The Government of Morocco, believing that the offer is predicated on the Polisario greater legitimacy, has not officially responded to them. Freedom of movement within the Western Sahara is limited in militarily sensitive areas. Elsewhere, security forces subject travelers to arbitrary questioning, detention, and abuse. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees, using figures provided by the Government of Algeria, estimates that approximately 166000 refugees live in the camps near Tindouf, Algeria. However, the Moroccan Government maintains that no more than 80000 refugees inhabit the camps. The Government alleges that the residents are held in the camps against their will, an allegation denied by the Polisario. There is little organized labor activity in the Western Sahara. The same labor laws that apply in Morocco are applied in the Moroccan-controlled areas of the Western Sahara. Moroccan unions are present in the Moroccan-controlled Western Sahara but are relatively moribund. The 16% of the territory outside Moroccan control does not have any population centers or economic activity beyond nomadic herding. The Polisario-sponsored labor union, the Sario Federation of Labor (UGTSARIO), does not have any activities in the Western Sahara. There were no strikes, other job actions, or collective bargaining agreements in 1994. Most union members are employees of the Government or state-owned organizations. They are paid 85% more than their counterparts outside the Western Sahara. Workers in the Western Sahara are exempt from income and value-added taxes and receive subsidies on such commodities as flour, oil, sugar, fuels, and utilities. Moroccan law prohibits forced labor, which does not appear to exist in the Western Sahara. Regulations on the minimum age of employment are the same as in Morocco. Child labor appears to be less common in the Western Sahara than in Morocco, primarily because of the absence of industries most likely to employ children such as rug knotting and garment making.

A government work program for adults the Promotion Nationale, provides families with enough income so that children need not be hired out as domestic servants. Children in the few remaining nomadic groups presumably work as shepherds along with other group members. Adult unemployment in the Western Sahara is below 5%. The minimum wage and maximum hours for work are the same as in Morocco. In practice, however, employees in some fish-processing plants may work as much as 12 hours per day, 6 days per week, well beyond the 10-hour day, 48-hour week maximum allowed by Moroccan law. Occupational health and safety standards in Western Sahara are those enforced in Morocco. They are rudimentary, except for a prohibition on the employment of women in dangerous occupations. [ ]

34021. Davis, Hannah Penrose. Unmarried Women And Changing Conceptions Of The Self In Sidi Slimane, Morocco. New York University. Dissertation. 382pp. AAC 9306764. [Advisor: Abu-lughod, Lila] This dissertation is an ethnographic study of unmarried women in the Moroccan city of Sidi Slimane. The focus is on changes in conceptions of self, gender, and sexuality, in the context of the rising age in marriage, the growth in women’s activities outside of the domestic sphere, the increase in social contact between unmarried men and women, and the increasing importance of transnational culture. The study of the cultural transformation in conceptions of the self is problematized through a critique of models of ‘tradition’ and ‘modernity’, self and other. In order to address these potential problems, the object of study is defined not as ‘Moroccan women’ but as the ethnographic encounter itself; the goal is not to define a ‘Moroccan’ self, but to consider a range of possible selves. If various selves manifest themselves at various moments, the loci of these manifestations are significant. The first consideration is of the urban setting, a middle-sized city dating to the colonial era. What sites are open to unmarried women, to mixed groups? How do social relations take shape on the street, in cafes, in the bath house, in the beauty salon? Next, the social situation of marital strategizing is examined in detail. Particular attention is paid to the notion of modesty or shame (hsuma). Despite the importance of modesty in marking hierarchical relations between the sexes and the generations, there exists an array of immodest selves. As social power changes, new possibilities are present for the positive vectoring of immodest selves. The range of possible selves open to an unmarried woman depends on her economic resources, status, and access to local and transnational cultural reservoirs. The possibilities are also limited by violence, here considered in its quotidian, minor form. Examining these limits on conceptions of the self is a way of conceptualizing social power. In order to more fully explore and problematize the ethnographic encounter, the dissertation also includes fictionalized accounts based on the author’s field work. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [ ]

34022. Hull, Richard W. African Cities and Towns Before the European Conquest: Part 3: Physical Definitions of Cities and Towns. New York: W.W. Norton, 1976. pp. 33-49. African urban life characteristically took place within walls. Walls defined cities, provided for defense, and gave residents a sense of security and order. The design of the Marinid gateway at Rabat, Morocco, or the gates of the Moroccan city of Sidi Slimane. The focus is on changes in conceptions of self, gender, and sexuality, in the context of the rising age in marriage, the growth in women’s activities outside of the domestic sphere, the increase in social contact between unmarried men and women, and the increasing importance of transnational culture. The study of the cultural transformation in conceptions of the self is problematized through a critique of models of ‘tradition’ and ‘modernity’, self and other. In order to address these potential problems, the object of study is defined not as ‘Moroccan women’ but as the ethnographic encounter itself; the goal is not to define a ‘Moroccan’ self, but to consider a range of possible selves. If various selves manifest themselves at various moments, the loci of these manifestations are significant. The first consideration is of the urban setting, a middle-sized city dating to the colonial era. What sites are open to unmarried women, to mixed groups? How do social relations take shape on the street, in cafes, in the bath house, in the beauty salon? Next, the social situation of marital strategizing is examined in detail. Particular attention is paid to the notion of modesty or shame (hsuma). Despite the importance of modesty in marking hierarchical relations between the sexes and the generations, there exists an array of immodest selves. As social power changes, new possibilities are present for the positive vectoring of immodest selves. The range of possible selves open to an unmarried woman depends on her economic resources, status, and access to local and transnational cultural reservoirs. The possibilities are also limited by violence, here considered in its quotidian, minor form. Examining these limits on conceptions of the self is a way of conceptualizing social power. In order to more fully explore and problematize the ethnographic encounter, the dissertation also includes fictionalized accounts based on the author’s field work. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [ ]

606
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Morocco
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

hinterland, were often invested with spiritual qualities, the cities being seen as a microcosm of the cosmos. Dogon village form is modeled on a human body, with a blacksmith's force at the north symbolizing the head, community shrines at the south to the feet, and women's menstrual huts to the hands. The ibo of eastern Nigeria carried this form the farthest, with regions developed with a cluster plan that created a forestland-farmland matrix in which there were hundreds of villages, in a contiguous, parkland hinterland, with a size of height below the 50th centile of the NCHS standards. For the second survey 64 children in different households were selected. Thirty-one households were defined as PD with a child weight gain for age above the 50th centile and 33 as ND with a child below the 25th centile for weight gain for age of the NCHS standards. The hypotheses tested were: (1) PD children live in better housing than ND children; (2) PD children belong to families of smaller size, have more actively employed members, and consume more food than ND families; (3) Characteristics of fathers of PD children are different from those of ND ones; (4) Characteristics of mothers in PD are different from those of ND groups; (5) Certain desirable characteristics of the children are higher in PD than in ND children; (6) PD children eat more frequently, and consume a larger variety of foods; and (7) PD children have a higher birth weight than ND ones. The results of the study show that PD children belong to families of smaller size than do ND ones. PD fathers were significantly taller than ND ones. Mothers' literacy and better attitudes towards growth increased significantly the probability of having a PD child. The mother's use of either traditional or modern medicine, her attitude toward hand washing, and the time she spends on child care were significantly associated with this probability. Higher child birth weight was the strongest predictor of positive deviance. Anorexia decreased significantly the probability of having a PD child and PD children spend significantly more time eating than ND ones. This study suggests that small family size, greater mothers' literacy, better education of mothers with respect to hygiene and child nutrition, lower child anorexia, and higher birth weight are important determinants of positive deviance and should be considered in programs aimed at alleviating malnutrition in Morocco and perhaps in other poor countries. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.]

34023. Jacobsen, Sally. “World Bank Says It Pays To Teach Girls: Millions to Be Spent to Prove Its Point”, in Seattle Times, October 6, 1994. p. A2. The World Bank will promote the education of girls as the best strategy to lift families out of poverty worldwide and raise their standard of living. The bank now spends about $2 billion per year on education, with 41% earmarked for girls' education: in the 1980s less than 15% of such funding was earmarked for girls. US Treasury undersecretary Lawrence Summers notes that investment in girls education may be the best possible investment in the developing world. In three such programs, the emphasis on girls education is being increased: in Bangladesh parents receive a small stipend for each girl that attends school; in Pakistan all girls' schools are being established in poor neighborhoods; and in Morocco female teachers have been added to rural schools for all girl classes. [TXT]

34024. Kapchan, Deborah Anne. Women In The Marketplace: Transitional Economies And Feminine Discursive Domains In Morocco. University Of Pennsylvania. Dissertation. 328pp. AAC 9235160. [Advisor: Abrahams, Roger D.] This study examines marketplace discourse and performance in Beni Mellal, Morocco, focusing on their relation to both new constructions of gender and social transformation. The intersection of the marketplace with feminine performance is a cross-roads, where the past meets the future, where tradition is recreated and "the modern," al-est, is socially and personally incorporated. There is one theoretical trajectory that informs all the essays in this manuscript: it is the tripartite notion that (1) the marketplace—both in its local itinerant form and in its international guise—is a forum for transition; (2) that transition relies on an intensification of social license; and (3) that in granting permission for the opening of social boundaries and categories, license, in turn, provides the conditions for the hybridization of social and expressive forms. This hybridization is traced in various contexts; among them, women's marketplace oratory, the ritual life of the Moroccan bride, the words and behavior of female performers (shikhat), the discursive construction of the maid by middle-class women, and "talk" (al-hadra) about magic. In all of these contexts, the author pays close attention to how social change is effected by transgressive behavior and by what the author calls, "revoicing," that is, the appropriation of authoritative discourse and its transformation from within. Throughout the book, the phenomena of linguistic and cultural hybridization are examined as they emerge in the expressive economies of women. Linguistically, hybridization is witnessed in the mixing of formally non-compatible genres and registers; in the moral economy, it manifests in the collision of the values of honor and reciprocity with those of the (inter)national marketplace and commodity culture; whereas in the gender economy, hybridization is exemplified in the redefinition of gender space and new formulations of social authority. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.]

34025. Lemtoumi, Aicha. Determinants Of Positive Deviance In Nutrition In Morocco: A Case Study Of Hay Abiregreg (1987-1989). Cornell University. Dissertation. 184pp. AAC 9113258. The present study investigates the determinants of positive deviance in nutrition in Hay Abiregreg, a suburban area of Rabat, the capital city of Morocco. The study is based on a sample of 316 children six to 36 months of age where the weight and height were measured. One-hundred and forty-six households were selected for the first survey which used the children's weight for age and weight for height. Seventy-four children from different households were defined as positive deviants (PD) with a child weight for age and weight for height above the 50th centile of the National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS) standards. The other 77 children were defined as negative deviants (ND) with weight for age below the 25th centile and weight for height below the 50th centile of the NCHS standards. For the second survey 64 children in different households were selected. Thirty-one households were defined as PD with a child weight gain for age above the 50th centile and 33 as ND with a child below the 25th centile for weight gain for age of the NCHS standards. The hypotheses tested were: (1) PD children live in better housing than ND children; (2) PD children belong to families of smaller size, have more actively employed members, and consume more food than ND families; (3) Characteristics of fathers of PD children are different from those of ND ones; (4) Characteristics of mothers in PD are different from those of ND groups; (5) Certain desirable characteristics of the children are higher in PD than in ND children; (6) PD children eat more frequently, and consume a larger variety of foods; and (7) PD children have a higher birth weight than ND ones. The results of the study show that PD children belong to families of smaller size than do ND ones. PD fathers were significantly taller than ND ones. Mothers' literacy and better attitudes towards growth increased significantly the probability of having a PD child. The mother's use of either traditional or modern medicine, her attitude toward hand washing, and the time she spends on child care were significantly associated with this probability. Higher child birth weight was the strongest predictor of positive deviance. Anorexia decreased significantly the probability of having a PD child and PD children spend significantly more time eating than ND ones. This study suggests that small family size, greater mothers' literacy, better education of mothers with respect to hygiene and child nutrition, lower child anorexia, and higher birth weight are important determinants of positive deviance and should be considered in programs aimed at alleviating malnutrition in Morocco and perhaps in other poor countries. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.]

34026. Mannin, Ethel. Women and the Revolution: Part 28: Women and Past Revolutions: The Spanish Revolution (1936-?). New York: E.P. Dutton & Co Inc., 1939. In order to understand the issues at stake in Spain, it is important to realize that the civil war which began in 7/1936 did not arise, as it were, out of the blue. It was the crisis of five years of great struggle of the Spanish masses against the reactionary and oppressive forces of the Right—the landowners and capitalists, the Church, the Army, 1931 saw the Republicans and Socialists triumph in an overwhelming majority at the General Election; Alfonsa I died, and Spain was declared a Republic amid general rejoicing. Various minor reforms were passed, but Spain still remained a semi-feudal country, dominated by rich absentee landlords, the Army, the Church, the police. Dr. Conze points out that "all Spanish movements. whether bourgeois or working-class, must be anti-clerical if they want to get away from feudalism". He refers to a "politically-minded army" and a "belligerent clergy . . . the biggest reactionary political body in Spain". He points out that the Church is the biggest proprietor of land and buildings, and that "the bigger the cathedral the filthier the slums", that the clergy are chiefly responsible for the illiteracy in Spain—only 46 per cent of the population above the age of six are literate, the highest percentage in Europe—and that "only if they can manage to keep Spain as a semi-feudal country, do the priests have any chance of keeping their power". [In: Spain To-day (see subsequent footnote).] In alliance with this enemy of the people there is the army officered by "professional patriots of the Spanish aristocracy", and the landowners holding vast estates in which they take no interest, handing them over to the management of his Cacique, who is invariably heartedly hated by the peasants. When the workers and peasants realized that the Republic left them with the same old bad conditions of feudalism and oppression as before, they revolted; the workers went on strike; the peasants seized the land for themselves; thousands of revolutionary workers were imprisoned and shot by the Government troops—that Republican Government they had themselves elected and in which they had placed such faith: by 1933 the Right was again on top. But the Spanish proletariat was not beaten in spite of that; there was a series of strikes, and in 1934 the great agriculture strike. In September there was a general strike in Madrid, and when Gil Robles, the Roman Catholic Fascist leader, held a Fascist parade in the Asturias, there was a general strike there. The Government organized round-ups of revolutionary workers to be used as better houses for armed workers; for all militant workers, imprisoned and trained to the police and Fascist-like every day, suppressing the further seizure of the land, head of the control committee of workers. The Anarchists defended their continued to support the Government, which became more reactionary. Collectivization of October 24th, with a delegate of the Generalidad at the Exchange Building, which the Anarchists had seized from the Fascists shortly after the election in emphasis of its revolutionary position as opposed to the Democratic one; the Communists and Socialists had placed themselves at the service of the POUM which stood not merely for the defeat of Fascism but for the triumph of the Revolution. The Government troops were beaten back by workers armed with revolvers and dynamite! The Commune lasted a fortnight before it was finally overwhelmed by the sheer superiority of numbers of the Government's forces—which included troops from Morocco. The Asturians had plenty of rifles and machine-guns, but were short of ammunition. The Government sent over bombing aeroplanes; defeated Catalonia could send no help. Yet in the face of these tremendous odds the Asturians held against the Government troops and its Foreign Legion for eight epic days. Sixty badly equipped men held Llanes for six and a half hours against an attack of 5000 trained soldiers. The village of Cinadevilla was seized only over the dead bodies of every revolutionary holding it. Women fought side by side with the men. General Ochoa called an armistice with the Asturians; he promised that the bitterly hated riff-raff of the Foreign Legion should not enter the villages; the revolutionaries promised to disband their Red Army. They did so—and immediately the Moors were let loose upon the defenceless men, women and children of the Asturias. The “blood bath” which followed recalled the massacres which followed the defeat of the Paris Commune. 1500 people were massacred in this “armistice” and there was a tremendous round-up of Socialists, Anarchists and Communists throughout Spain. In all 35000 workers were imprisoned, including Largo Caballero, the Socialist leader. Yet still the Spanish workers were not defeated: their organizations had been declared illegal, yet they continued to organize, and strike followed strike. The Asturian workers had been defeated, but their action had given enormous impetus to the workers’ movement throughout Spain. The Church which had—through its priests—great influence on the women in the elections of 1933, had little power over them in the 1936 election, with the memory of the blood-bath of the Asturias still fresh in their minds. Even the Anarchists, normally opposed to any form of centralized government, voted in favour of the Popular Front of Socialists, Liberals, Republicans, Communists; it was a United Front against the Right, and it swept the country. Without waiting for the formal consent of the Government, the 35000 prisoners were freed, and in some districts the peasants seized the land. The Azana Government legalized the acts of the workers, and carried out various reforms concerned with hours and wages under the pressure of strikes. But when the first flush of excitement of victory over the Right had died down the workers found themselves once more saddled with a bourgeois, capitalist government, upholding private property and private profit; the Popular Front, they began to realize, contained too many bourgeois, Liberal elements for it ever to lead to Socialism; it could only, in the words of Dr. Conze, “tie the workers’ movement to the bourgeois state”. And the workers’ movement was not prepared to be so tied. Discontent spread; there were strikes everywhere, organized by the CNT (the Syndicalists) and the POUM (the Workers’ Party of Marxist Unity, brother party to the Independent Labour Party in England). The POUM broke away from the Popular Front shortly after the election in emphasis of its revolutionary position as opposed to the Democratic one; the Communists and Socialists continued to support the Government, which became more reactionary and Fascist-like every day, suppressing the further seizure of the land, shooting the revolutionary peasants, breaking the strikes, and imprisoning the leaders, censoring the Press. But it takes more than the reactionary tactics of a bourgeois government to smash the workers’ movement in Spain, and Dr. Conze, who was there in 5/1936 makes the following first-hand observations in his book: “Proletarian symbols are found everywhere, on houses, walls, churches and railway carriages. Everywhere the mysterious initials which sum up the aspirations of the working class. Everywhere U.H.P. (Union of Proletarian Brethren), U.P.C. (Union of Proletarian Communists), U.G.T. (Socialist Trade Union). Everywhere hammer and sickle, and inscriptions like Viva Caballero and Muerte a Gil Robles. Everywhere large posters call the workers to a meeting, or small posters call for a strike or for a boycott... The greeting of the clenched fist has become the common property of all militant workers. It is the best introduction to any working-class quarter... All over Spain it was the same—clenched fist was the usual greeting. Russian films are shown at the cinemas. In the evening many Spaniards take a stroll about 6-7 o’clock on one of the main streets. When I was in Spain ten years ago these streets were filled in the evening with well-dressed people. Now the workers dominate the scene. Few well-dressed people are ever seen.” In 7/1936, the Fascist military revolt started in Morocco.

An Englishman, Major Pollard, flew General Franco from the Canaries to lead the troops in Spain. Major Pollard now sits snug in Sussex. What does he feel when he reads in the Press of his friend Franco’s massacres of civilians? Is it a glow of satisfaction that he has done his bit in helping to save Spain from the Spaniards? . . . When the Barcelona garrison joined the Fascist revolt a day or two after the insurrection in Morocco, the workers poured out into the streets to face the machine-guns and the trained forces of Fascism armed with no more than sticks and stones. “Viva la Republica!” they cried, and “Viva la Fai”.

[The FAI—the Federation of Iberian Anarchists. In control of the Trade Union organization, the CNT to which the majority of Catalan workers belong and which has great influence throughout Spain.] Overwhelmed by this almost superhuman demonstration of workers’ solidarity the troops refused to obey their officers’ orders to fire and went over to the workers in masses. In one barracks a sergeant and his men arrested the officers, then placed himself at the service of the POUM which stood not merely for the defeat of Fascism but for the triumph of the Revolution. The Government reluctantly armed the workers, and a popular militia was formed. Fascism was crushed in Catalonia, and within a week, with control in the hands of the workers’ syndicates, lorry loads of men and munitions were being rushed to the different fronts—with the triumphant cry:—“Viva la Fai!” Immediately after the Fascist rising had been crushed in Catalonia, tremendous organized energy of the United Working Class was poured into the task of consolidating workers’ control of industry, transport, the land. Committees of the armed workers reorganized industry under workers’ control; factories, railway companies, steamship companies, hospitals, public services, etc. were handed over to the syndicates; luxury hotels were commandeered and used as canteens for feeding and where necessary housing the dependents of the milicianos, or as headquarters for the various workers’ committees. By 1937 the counter-revolution had got to work. In March, the Generalidad, the Catalanian Government, ordered the return of power to the police and the disbanding of Workers’ Patrols. This was followed by an order from the Valencia Government to all workers’ parties and trade unions to collect arms from their members and surrender them within forty-eight hours. On the Aragon Front arms were refused to Anarchist and POUM fighters. In April the disarming of the workers began to be carried out by the National Republican Guard throughout Catalonia.

This went on all through April. Matters came to a head in May when the workers were forbidden to hold their May Day demonstrations, and a joint Anarchist and POUM meeting in Valencia was suppressed. On May 3rd the Government provoked the Barcelona Rising, by sending Assault Guards, led by Communists, to take over the Telephone Exchange Building, which the Anarchists had seized from the Fascists the previous July and held ever since, according to the Decree of Collectivization of October 24th, with a delegate of the Generalidad at the head of the control committee of workers. The Anarchists defended their occupation of the building with a machine-gun trained on to the police.
from an upper-story window. POUM is constantly being accused, in Communist quarters, of having attacked the Government and started the rising; actually POUM was opposed to the rising which followed the assault on the Telegraph Building, but when the workers of the CNT were out on the streets it naturally joined them and gave them its armed support. From May 3rd to the 8th Barcelona was in a state of civil war. The CNT appealed to the police to come over to the side of the workers as well as to the workers of the POUM. On July 19th, and to the people of Barcelona they issued the following statement pointing out that they were not attacking, but merely defending themselves against the usurping of their rights, and then an appeal to them for their support, and to clean out the reactionary, counter-revolutionary government of the Generalitat. The full story—not to be found in the ordinary newspaper—is to be found in the supplement to the June 11th issue of Spain and the World, the Anarchist paper. [Obtainable from Whiteway Colony, Stroud, Glos.] In the July 2nd issue, Emma Goldman makes the following comment: "...the glorious achievements of the CNT-FAI between July 19th (1936) and the first days in May (1937) have received a terrible jolt. I fear very much that the CNT-FAI will not recover from it so soon. From the moment leaders of the CNT-FAI entered into ministries and submitted to the conditions imposed upon them by Soviet Russia in return for some arms, I foresaw the inevitable price our comrades will have to pay.... The concessions made by the CNT-FAI were the first wrong step taken in the rise of the Revolution. We foresaw, and we did not hesitate to call the attention of our Spanish comrades to it, that they were about to roll down a precipice.... The Anarchist participation in the Government and the concessions made to Russia have resulted in almost irreparable harm to the Revolution." The outcome of the struggle, deplored by Emma Goldman and severely criticized by the French Anarchists when the news reached them, was that the CNT compromised and came to terms with the U.G.T., with the object of forming "a new workers' democracy". In 10/1937, Emma Goldman wrote me from Spain, "The situation here is overwhelming.... Above everything looms an optimism and faith in the triumph of the struggle; one is filled with awe. Having come close to the insurmountable difficulties confronting the CNT-FAI I can understand better the concessions they have made and are making. I cannot reconcile myself to some of them, but I realize that when one is in a burning house one does not consider one's possessions; one tries to jump to safety.... To see what I have seen is to be carried away by the splendid courage of the CNT-FAI and of the workers in general." She refers also to the "miracle of the besieged city of Madrid", before "the epic grandeur" of which "all fault-finding seems so insignificant": Frightful atrocities were committed by the Communists against the Anarchists after the defeat of the Barcelona rising; imprisonments, executions, and persecutions of revolutionaries, were as numerous and as brutal as in the days of the workers' struggle before 7/1936, and for some time it looked as though the Revolution had been completely crushed, and nothing more could come out of the defeat of the workers. It was then that things went wrong, to the tune of "win the war first and make the revolution afterwards". If the Spanish Revolution is lost Stalin will have had a considerable hand in it, as was the case, as we have seen, with his "assistance" in the Chinese Revolution. Brea is of the opinion that whatever happens now in Spain there will be no democracy; "the country will be in far too dismembered a state, economically, to admit of anything but a dictatorship. Whether this dictatorship be Fascist, bourgeois or proletarian"—that is to say whether Franco wins, or the Spanish Government, or the workers—"only the outcome of this present struggle can decide, but a dictatorship of some sort it will be. It is idle to talk of democracy.... There will be little left of Spanish economy when the war is over, and what remains will need sticking together with something considerably stronger than the past of democracy—the only prospect offered by Stalinism in Spain is to win the war and to lose the Revolution. We believe that if the Revolution is lost, the war can only with difficulty be won, and after all, for what? The people at least will have nothing, with even the 'breath of democracy blown away.' Opposed to this gloomy forecast, of course, is the important fact of Spain's old and strong tradition of anarchism; the Anarchists made the Revolution and they have not lost it, despite their setbacks; if the Revolution wins there is no need to assume that it will necessarily be a proletarian dictatorship, such as Brea predicts, and every reason to assume that it would continue along the libertarian anarchist-syndicalist lines it was already so successfully developing, in Catalonia, particularly before the May Rising. [-]

34027. Memnissi, Fatima. Beyond the Veil: Male-Female Dynamics in Modern Muslim Society: Part 1: Introduction: Roots of the Modern Situation. Revised and Updated Edition. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1987. pp. 11-24. What is at issue in Morocco and the Middle East is not an ideology of female inferiority but rather a set of laws and customs that keep women subjugated. The central institutions of Islamic society are those that assure male control of the family. The 1957 Code du Statut Personnel is simply a transposition of seventh century religious law. However, the problems of modernization of Islamic society have lead inevitably to calls for reinforcing tradition. These contradictions in Islamic societies resolve into three major areas: the need for sexual equality as a basis for social modernization, Arab nationalism, and the need to be Muslim. Muslim society posits men and women as enemies. Even as Muslims societies try to modernize, Shari’a has become the focus of psychological resistance to the West and its military, political and economic intervention. Moroccan nationalism did succeed in driving out the foreigners, but failed to provide the basis for an ideology of modernization of Moroccan society.

34028. Mernissi, Fatima. Beyond the Veil: Male-Female Dynamics in Modern Muslim Society. Part 2: The Traditional Muslim View of Women and Their Place In the Social Order. Revised and Updated Edition. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1987. pp. 25-86. Classical Islam held that sexual energy could be channeled to be a positive force for society and to service the Muslim order. The regulation of sexual instincts was to be the basis of the new Muslim social order; by contrast, unregulated sexuality could lead to fitna (disorder). Mernissi compares the sexual psychologies of Imam Ghazali (Muslim, 1050-1110) and Freud (Viennese Jew, mid-twentieth century) [an odd choice that is perhaps a product of receiving her PhD in Sociology at Brandeis University]; both construct the social belief that women are destructive of the social order.

Sexuality remains only partially civilized in Islam: the institutions of polygamy and divorce by repudiation illustrate the failure to civilize male sexuality. Yet, this system institutionalizes female resentment, granted the female sexual insatiability that is posited in Islam. This Muslim style of nuclear family would be the basis for the new Islamic society, since it would be more tractable to the new Muslim social design that the tribes. The modification of marriage law effected a fundamental transformation of Arab society at the time of Muhammad; even as Muhammad had a strong need to reintegrate into society the women who lost their status with the breakdown of tribal society. Female self-determination conjures the image of the breakdown of the Muslim order for Muslim men, the return of the matriarchy and promiscuity of the Jahiliya, even in such simple acts of female self-assertion as pursuing a university degree or working for a wage.

In Morocco, male-female relations are undergoing a difficult period of transformation. Women are now entering “male... public spaces”, which has created a deep anomic in Moroccan society. In rural areas, where villages maintain tight control over the sexuality of the young, many engage in conduct believed by society to be deviant (a questionnaire found: 14% masturbate or practice sodomy; 20% practice homosexuality; 34% go to a brothel in a nearby town). Generally, sexual segregation in Morocco is breaking down, allowing what the Muslim order condemns as a deadly enemy of civilization: love between men and women in general, and between husband and wife in particular.

This breakdown in Muslim society is based on a rigid spatial segregation of male and female into public and private domains, respectively (the “Public Universe of the Umma” and the “Domestic Universe of Sexuality”). Any transgression of these iron segregations is a “danger to the social order.” This intense and perfect division of society creates two different codes of conduct: (1) for the Umma, equality, reciprocity, aggregation, unity, communion, brotherhood, love, trust; and (2) for the Family, inequality, lack of reciprocity, segregation, separation, division, subordination, authority and mistrust.

34030. Mernissi, Fatima. Beyond the Veil: Male-Female Dynamics in Modern Muslim Society: Part 4: Conclusion: Women's Liberation in Muslim Countries. Revised and Updated Edition. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1987. pp. 165-178. While women’s liberation is usually seen as a spiritual issue, in the twentieth century it is largely a question of women getting wage-paying jobs, and the social decision to allocate sufficient resources for women to be able to find jobs. Building daycare centers and canteens is major step towards women’s liberation in a modernizing society. However, at the same time, the United States' modern capitalism maintains an army of unpaid workers in the form of housewives, even as the US claims it unable to provide canteens and daycare. Arab society’s have no coherent policy on this issue. Yet change is shaking Muslim societies. "The Arab woman is a central element in any sovereign future..." and the ally of women’s liberation in the Arab world is the state.

34031. Messina, Maria Giovanna. Celebrations Of The Body: Female Spirituality And Corporeality In Islamic Morocco. State University Of New York At Stony Brook. Dissertation. 411pp. AAC 9128549. [Advisor: Hicks, David] This dissertation provides an anthropological analysis on a source of cultural reflection and meaning common to all societies—the human body. The assumption here is that the body is used as a means of communication and as a basis for thinking about other things. The concern for the body is analyzed in the context of contemporary, Islamic Morocco. Although Islamic notions of purity and pollution pertain to females and males alike, the ethnographic data in this dissertation focus almost exclusively on the symbolism and social organization of women in the madina of Fez, primarily in the hammam or public bath, at home during ordinary and special "occasions" such as henna parties, and on the significance of fasting, especially during the holy month of Ramadan. The discussion explores the various ways women enact their commitment to the faith, celebrate life, feminine beauty, as they decorate and protect their bodies with henna, care for their material and spiritual "selves" through these occasions. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [=]

34032. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Ex-Political Prisoners Barred From Leaving Morocco Despite Liberalization. New York: Middle East Watch, September 1991. A recent communique from the Moroccan Organization for Human Rights (OMDH) and an open letter to Morocco’s Interior Minister have called attention to that country’s denial of passports to many former political prisoners. This practice runs counter to pledges made by the government in 1990 to liberalize the procedure for obtaining passports. In the past, Moroccans faced various obstacles when applying for passports, including a requirement that they prove they were gainfully employed and possessed a certain amount of financial resources. The procedures were eased somewhat in 4/1990, when Minister of Interior and Information Driss Basri announced what he termed a revolutionary “decision to abolish these prerequisites and to approve all passport applications unless an applicant is determined by the Ministry of Interior to pose a risk to public order or public health or to national security. Basri also promised that all applications would be processed within one month, and that anyone who was turned down would receive a written explanation. In 11/1990, [The report, Morocco's second periodic submission on measures it had taken to give effect to the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as provided in Article 40 of the Covenant, was originally due in 1986. (Morocco ratified the ICCPR in 1979. The Human Rights Committee opened its examination of Morocco's report at its 11/1990 session in Geneva, and then, in an unusual step, adjourned examination of Morocco until 7/1991. Deliberations were delayed further after the Moroccan delegation refused to par i capita in July when it discovered French television cameras poised to film the Committee's hearing. The Committee ruled that since the sessions were public, the cameras should be permitted to stay. Morocco is currently scheduled for continued examination at the Committee's next session in 10/1991.) The Moroccan government claimed in its report to the UN Human Rights Committee that “for nationals, the freedom to leave Moroccan territory is subject only to the prior obtaining of a national passport. Nevertheless, according to the OMDH, acquiring a passport is, for many, more than a mere formality. While acknowledging that a significant number of new passports have been issued under the revised guidelines, the organization charged that there are also large numbers --the extent is not known -- of citizens who served out the prison terms to which they were sentenced or were released in a royal pardon, and even some who were found innocent in cases that had a political tinge, who have been denied the right to leave Moroccan soil." The US State Department's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1990 also reported that the streamlined procedures had not benefitted ex-political prisoners. Though delays are not uncommon, most Moroccans receive passports within one month of application," the report stated. "This is not true for certain political activists, former political prisoners, or for Moroccan Baha'is." [The right to travel is also subject to gender discrimination in Morocco. Regulations require a married woman to obtain permission from her husband before she can obtain a passport. This requirement has been protested by the Democratic Association of Moroccan Women, an independent women's group based in Rabat. See also Abderrazak Moulay Rachid, La Femme et la Loi en Maroc, Editions le Fennec, Casablanca, 1991.] The right to travel abroad is well-established in international law and in the domestic law of Morocco. Article 12 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Morocco is a signatory, provides: Everyone shall be free to leave any country, including their own. Article 9 of the 1972 Moroccan Constitution also guarantees to "all citizens the freedom to travel and to settle in all parts of the Kingdom. In at least two cases, Morocco's Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals in Tangier have each ruled that the right to travel enshrined in the Constitution applies to foreign as well as domestic travel, and have ordered the Ministry of Interior to issue passports to persons who have filed proper applications for them. In theory, the procedure for obtaining a passport is simple. Moroccans first submit their application to local authorities. If they do not receive their passport within one month, they then must re-apply to the Ministry of Interior, which is obliged to provide a written explanation if the passport is refused. If the applicant is rejected or does not receive a timely response, he or she may appeal to Morocco's Supreme Court. On 6/26/1991, the National Bureau of the OMDH issued a statement condemning violations of the right to travel and the withholding of passports. "In addition to new cases . . . concerning the refusal of passports to a number of citizens because of their political views or activities, there are a number of cases where passports have been taken away from their owners in an arbitrary fashion, or citizens have been prevented from leaving Morocco without legal justification, despite their possessing passports."[=] 34033. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Ex-Political Prisoners Barred From Leaving Morocco Despite Liberalization, Part 2. New York: Middle East Watch, September 1991. The OMDH has a dossier of some 20 complaints from persons who have applied unsuccessfully for passports, most of whom are former political prisoners suspected of affiliation with one of the outlawed opposition parties or movements, such as Ila al-Amam ("Forward") and the 21st Mars Movement, two Marxist groups that were active in the 1970s and early 1980s. Members of the recognized opposition parties who never have been imprisoned do not generally encounter passport difficulties. Refusal of passports often takes the form of the government's failure to respond to an application. In an open letter to Minister Basri dated 6/28/1991, the signatories-three well-known former political prisoners and one outspoken defense lawyer associated with the opposition, charged that their passport applications, submitted one year or more earlier, had gone unanswered. Abderrahim Berrada first applied for a passport in 1977, and applied a second time on 5/17/1990. He is a lawyer who has participated in some of the major political trials in Morocco. Although never arrested, he has been the object of threats and intimidation for his defense of persons accused of political crimes. Berrada also wrote for the magazine Kalima, noted for its independent coverage of controversial socio-cultural issues, such as the status of women. Kalima ceased publication in March 1989 after four issues of the monthly magazine had been banned over a one-year period. The three other signatories have each been detained and/or tried in the past for their political activities: Fouat Abdelmoumni was disapperad in 5/1977. Like hundreds of other Moroccan political activists who have "disappeared," Abdelmoumni's arrest was never confirmed by the authorities; he was held incommunicado, and during the three years of his detention was never brought before a magistrate or formally charged. He also underwent torture. Released in 5/1980, Abdelmoumni was "disappeared" again in 1/1983. He was held secretly and without charge in the notorious Derb Moulay Cherif detention center, near Casablanca, until his release in 12/1984. Abdelmoumni is a member of the Administrative Commission of the Moroccan Association for Human Rights, a nongovernmental organization. He applied for a passport on 7/11/1989. Abdellah Zaazaa was arrested in 1/1975 by men in plainclothes who forced him into an unmarked car. He was tortured during a year of secret detention at Derb Moulay Cherif, after which he was transferred to an official prison. In 1/1977, he was tried by the Criminal Court of Casablanca for his political activities with the Ila al-Amam group and sentenced to life in prison. He was not accused of any violent crime. Zaazaa was freed by a royal pardon in 5/1989. He applied for a passport on 10/3/1989 in order to visit his wife, a French citizen residing in France. After an international campaign on Zaazaa's behalf, a government official informed him during a private meeting that a decision had been made to prevent him from leaving the country. The official was not able to identify who had made the decision. Sion Assidon was secretly detained in 2/1972 and tortured. He was convicted by the Criminal Court of Casablanca in 1973 for his political activities, including membership in Ila al-Amam, and received a 15-year sentence. He was not accused of any violent crime. Assidon was freed by a royal pardon in 8/1984. He applied for a passport on 7/16/1990. [=] 34034. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Ex-Political Prisoners Barred From Leaving Morocco Despite Liberalization, Part 3. New York: Middle East Watch, September 1991. The OMDH noted that the many letters about travel restrictions it had sent to the Interior Ministry both before and after implementation of the streamlined procedures had gone unanswered. Similarly, Middle East Watch contacted the Embassy of Morocco in Washington, D.C., on July 15 requesting information about the issuance of passports and about the cases of the four signatories of the open letter, but seven weeks later has received no reply, despite several follow-up queries. In the view of Middle East Watch, failure to reply to a passport application effectively amounts to a denial. The discriminatory denial of a passport to a former political prisoner is particularly abhorrent because it constitutes an additional form of extrajudicial punishment of someone who has already served a criminal sentence. Singling out citizens for their political views is also a violation of their freedom of expression. Middle East Watch urges the Moroccan government to respect the right to travel abroad for all its citizens and to cease the arbitrary denial and seizure of passports. Middle East Watch endorses the OMDH's view that a passport is merely an administrative document to which every citizen is entitled without distinction; that preventing citizens from leaving Morocco is within the sole competence of the judiciary, and that only of course if there are legal reasons that would justify this measure, which can only be of a temporary nature." To urge Moroccan authorities to issue passports to Abderrahim Berrada, Fouad Abdelmoumni, Abdellah Zaazaa, and Sion Assidon and to allow all citizens, regardless of their past or present political views or activities, to exercise their right to travel abroad, write to: Driss Basri, Minister of Interior & Information, Quartier Administratif, Rabat, Morocco; Ambassador Mohammed Belkhayat, Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco, 1601 21st Street, NW, Washington, D.C. 20009 [=] 34035. Minority Rights Group. Sahrawis of Western Sahara: Part 12; The Sahrawis At the Start of 1979. Report 40. London: Minority Rights Group, February 1979. The SADR, brought into being on 2/28/1976, groups the 100,000 people in the camps, the 5000-strong army and, at the most, a further 20000 Sahrawis still in the occupied territory (eg 80% of the population of El Aaiun had already fled to the camps by 2/1976, according to the IFHR report). Supreme authority is in the hands of a revolutionary council, drawn from and controlling the government and the army. The prime minister since the beginning has been Mohamed Lamine, but the founder and first secretary-general of Polisario, Sayed el
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Morocco

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

612

Wali, was killed in mid-1976 and replaced by Mohamed Abdelazziz. The equally vital post of foreign minister is held by Ibrahim Hakim. The 1976 provisional constitution, aligned with those of Algeria and Libya, describes the new state, in its most decisive aspects, as Arab, Islamic, socialist, working for Arab unity. Radical social change is a central principle: tribal, racial, caste and sex discriminations have been outlawed. Already in 1/1976, a Sahrawi spokesman told the writer that 'it's no secret that a person's tribe', the divisiveness of tribe, once an invader had been neutralised, was always a major factor in breaking up the Sahrawi unification. Slavery, notably of blacks, was current throughout the Spanish administration; it is a regular claim by the Moroccan camp that Polisario sometimes kills its black prisoners. The privileged position of the hereditary patriarch (sheikh) is said to be ended - the leaders are in fact all young. It is our aim to make a reality of the political and social rights of men and to open up new vistas to them in national construction within the limits of our national resources and Islamic religion; women receive training in the use of weapons. There are unions of students, women and general workers. The mineral wealth is national property. Goytsilo has acknowledged that the Sahrawis 'present a series of social, cultural and economic characteristics different to those of their Maghreb brothers (Moroccan and Algerian)'. If the desert people put the outlined principles into practice, they will demonstrate in the most convincing manner a further major difference from the Moroccan regime.

It remains to describe the lives of the Sahrawis in the invaded desert and in the refugee camps. Those few thousands who remained behind in 11/1975 saw Spanish control replaced by a barbaric and yet more repressive occupation. The fate of those who demonstrated the least resistance (such as refusal to kiss Hassan's portrait or the Moroccan flag, each forcibly distributed in quantity) will have been gathered from the refugees' experiences. The Spanish passed their lists of Sahrawi dissidents to the invaders, these rounding up whole families, in particular in retribution for Polisario attacks; the women especially suffered. The Sahrawis were made to live in camps around the military posts, to act as human shields against Polisario raids. Nomadism, already greatly reduced by Spanish policy aided by the long drought (to 28% by 1975), was entirely halted; all domestic animals were appropriated or killed. A curfew was declared, movement was restricted. Petrol was rationed, Sahrawi-owned vehicles had to be painted red and white so that, if their owners fled, they would be easily recognised in the open desert. The invaders also took measures to avoid petrol and food reaching Polisario. As amongst the occupying forces, bribery rapidly became the key to survival: food, water, lodgings, permits, all reached extortionate values. The Sahrawis have claimed that their staple food and drink, roasted and ground barley and tea, have been deliberately kept in short supply to lower their morale. One further element in Hassan's strategy has been the steady implantation of Moroccan and Mauritanian civilians in the annexed desert. Designed to sway any future referendum in the invaders' favour, the immigration would greatly increase the task of holding a valid consultation. The manoeuvre, doubtless encouraged by the Israeli precedent, was at its peak late in 1978; with a cash inducement families from the Agadir and Marrakesh regions were being taken down to the Sahara in weekly military convoys. One report is that between a third and a half of the inhabitants of the Moroccan-occupied zone are now of non-Sahrawi origin. Moroccan propaganda attempts to conceal the truth behind an idyllic picture of life in the territory which, thanks to the Plan d'Urgence, will soon become the best of all possible deserts. In 1/1978 a Spanish journalist described the dominant sensation there: fear. There are civilian detention and torture camps near El Aaiun (El Jreida, El Bachicha) and Dakhla (Punta de la Sarga). Sahrawi civilians are similarly held in Morocco (Ouarazate, Sidi Ifni, Casablanca, Kenitra) and in Mauritania. Repression of Sahrawis resident in Morocco and Mauritania, particularly in the former's Sus region, has been the subject of detailed Polisario reports. The zone below Goulimine is forbidden to all except those who live there. Many are Sahrawis, a proportion of those having moved north from Spanish territory after conflict with the colonial authorities, in particular the 1957-8 war. Moroccan repression of these Sahrawis began after a well-known 1972 demonstration, at Tan-Tan, in favour of independence from Spain -- rather than absorption by Morocco. Subsequent peaks of police activity have come during the visit of the UN Mission, during the 'peace' march and, throughout the war, after Polisario attacks. In the Sus too the Sahrawis have been forced to move into the settlements. School, work, social events, all bring the enforced homage to Hassan and Morocco. The Sahrawi reports list dozens of men and women who have been arrested after being apprehended for the lack of a permit, and imprisoned without trial; many were taken at Tan-Tan, Tarfaya, Goulamine and Zak. Families have been transported entire, including that of Mohamed Lamine, the Republic's prime minister. To look, speak or dress like a Sahrawi is to be open to arrest; meetings, even festivities such as weddings, risk police intervention. The entire south being under military control, the forces of repression behave without restraint. In the more northerly cities where there are Sahrawi quarters, such as Agadir, the police operate an unofficial curfew, sometimes beating up Sahrawis out after dark Sahrawi students, all over Morocco, have been arrested just before the end of term, to stop them joining Polisario (this was at the beginning of the war). Nothing can be done, internally, to help these people; the people political left has ignored their plight. Amnesty International's general report on Morocco implies a dark future for its Sahrawi residents. Similar repression in Mauritania appears led by the Moroccan forces; in February 1978 they apparently opened fire, at Dakhla, on civilians demonstrating against their exactions. A month later, following a Polisario attack on Nouadhibou, both Moroccan and Mauritanian troops fired on Mauritanian civilians thought to be sympathetic to the Sahrawis; the war and the behaviour of the two armies stationed along the railway have combined with the drought to cause the people of the region to flee southwards. The railwaymen have struck rather than carry the troops; a derailment in 12/1977 was the work of Mauritanians, according to Polisario. The Algerian press claims that even members of Ould Daddah's own party had demonstrated at Udaychott against the annexation and the war, being then arrested and sent to a special camp set up by Morocco's notorious Col. Dili. In addition to the counter-accusations of Algerian abduction, imprisonment and killing of Sahrawis at Tindouf, listed earlier, Morocco has charged Algeria with the persecution of Sahrawis resident in Europe. It was claimed that all of them, some 700, took out Moroccan or Mauritanian identity documents and joined POLISARIO (the Moroccan-formed association for Sahrawis), then receiving threats through the Algerian amicales (similar associations for Algerians in Europe). Both Morocco and Algeria have alleged the expulsion of enormous numbers of their own citizens, with expropriation of their possessions, by the other country. Life if the Tindouf camps is preferable to that in the occupied settlements but the combination of burning sun, sand-storms and cold winter nights with the lack of adequate food, medicine and shelter again provides a harsh existence. By 10/1976 there were 22 camps, the largest of those visited by the IFHR having 7800 inhabitants in 660 tents. Eighty percent of the refugees were women and children. Only 10% of the tents were of Sahrawi manufacture (woven animal hair), the rest, rapidly wearing out, gave little protection; there was not a blanket per person. The region's natural resources are limited to a few wells: food, fuel and water have to come by truck from far away. In 5/1976 a team of Swiss doctors reported that a person had to live for a month on a few kilos of cereals, dried vegetables, sugar and powdered milk, a few dates and a ration of oil and tea; the diet was deficient in fats, protein and vitamins. The IFHR reported malnutrition, dehydration, rickets, with a list of the common diseases: hepatitis, bronchitis, TB, trachoma, conjunctivitis, chronic diarrhoea, with anaemia by 1977. The Swiss doctors said that one in four babies died in the first fifteen days. The Sahrawi Red Crescent looks after the refugees but has few skilled workers and a chronic shortage of medical supplies. Morocco has claimed that aid goes to finance 'Algeria's mercenary army' or simply into Algerian pockets but the IFHR found it important to underline that we were struck by the perfect organisation of the camps. The distribution of aid is rapid and very fair. Our delegation felt that here was one of the rare instances where international aid will be used to the full. In 1979, the many camps have been grouped into three wilayas.
The proliferation of the image in this traditionally iconoclastic setting began when the French brought movies, photographs and newspapers to Morocco along with the Protectorate. Mass images become central to the creation of power, knowledge and the creation self. Novel arrangements of visibility transformed relations of men to women, public to private, being to knowing. New disciplines of sight do not banish if I had to choose between my trade and marriage, I would definitely become central to the creation of power, knowledge and the creation self. The role of the image is an ambiguous one as the personal use of media technology among Arab culture, politics and warfare. All except the very aged, the sick and the smaller children take part in the camps' homeguard network. There are frequent festivities, in particular on important anniversaries, beginning with processions and communal discussions and ending with singing and the acting of Sahrawi plays and mimes. These occasions bring together the greater part of the Sahrawi people.

China: 90% of males, 3% of females.
Morocco: 90% of males, data not available on females.
Nepal: 87% of males, 72% of females.
Papua New Guinea: 85% of males, 80% of females.
Philippines: 78% of males, data not available on females.
Indonesia: 75% of males, 10% of females.
Bangladesh: 70% of males, 20% of females.
Thailand: 70% of males, 4% of females.
France: 70% of males, 50% of females.
Denmark: 68% of males, 49% of females.
República of Korea: 68% of males, 7% of females.
Spain: 66% of males, 10% of females.
India: 66% of males, 26% of females.
Poland: 63% of males, 29% of females.
Zambia: 63% of males, 56% of females.
Japan: 63% of males, 12% of females.
Uruguay: 60% of males, 32% of females.
Argentina: 55% of males, 18% of females.
Tunisia: 56% of males, 6% of females.
Yugoslavia: 57% of males, 10% of females.
Netherlands: 57% of males, 42% of females.
Malaysia: 56% of males, 2% of females.
Italy: 56% of males, 32% of females.
Sevidia: 54% of males, 37% of females. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. [1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411. Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTMON] and is reprinted by permission.]

34037. Ossman, Susan Marie. Moving Pictures: Mass Images And Society In Morocco. University Of California, Berkeley. Dissertation. 309pp. AAC 9203671. The proliferation of the image in this traditionally iconoclastic setting began when the French brought movies, photographs and newspapers to Morocco along with the Protectorate. Mass images become central to the creation of power, knowledge and the creation self. Novel arrangements of visibility transformed relations of men to women, public to private, being to knowing. New disciplines of sight do not banish if I had to choose between my trade and marriage, I would definitely become central to the creation of power, knowledge and the creation self. The role of the image is an ambiguous one as the personal use of media technology among Arab culture, politics and warfare. All except the very aged, the sick and the smaller children take part in the camps' homeguard network. There are frequent festivities, in particular on important anniversaries, beginning with processions and communal discussions and ending with singing and the acting of Sahrawi plays and mimes. These occasions bring together the greater part of the Sahrawi people.

Q: How did you become a butcher?
A: I started helping out in my father's shop when I was eight years old. I watched as he worked and sat behind the cash register. One day when my father fell ill, I saw my chance and started cutting the meat. I began filling in, and working on weekends and holidays. Then I finally gave up studying in order to supervise the whole operation.

Q: At what level did you abandon your university studies?
A: I gave up after my final exams for the B.A. When I failed them I decided to work full time in my father's shop. He could not do the work any longer, and my brothers had no desire to be butchers, whereas I found great pleasure in it.

Q: How do people look upon a woman butcher?
A: Many of my customers think that I am a boy, maybe because of my hair. The regulars know who I am and treat me the same way they treated my father. The same goes for the vendors in the government market; we all help each other here, and they are always there when I need them.

Q: What kind of difficulties have you encountered during your career?
A: I truly can do everything. I go to the karnat [wholesale market] and buy whatever is necessary for the store, and of course, I can cut the meat. For a whole year now, I have been working alone in order to meet my family's financial needs.

Q: Do you feel that by being a woman you attract more customers?
A: Of course. It plays an important role in attracting young men as well as women. But I treat them all alike--courteously and seriously. I command their respect, and they treat me like anyone. else. I am a colleague, and nothing else. Occasionally I have problems with some customers who try to get fresh, but I am capable of protecting myself.

Q: What do you think about Moroccan women and their possible pursuit of vocations like yours?

A: I strongly believe that it is up to them to learn whatever there is to learn, and to practice all possible trades. There should be no difference between men and women. There should be no prejudices or restricted vocations, and no one should be stereotyped. I don't accept that my place is in the home. I fully believe that I belong here. What strengthens my belief is that I enjoy my work. I feel as though I am in the limelight which makes me feel good--I know I am where I belong.

[Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

34039. Robey, Bryant; Rustein, Shea O.; Morris, Leo. "The Fertility Decline in Developing Countries; Family Size Is Decreasing in many Third World Countries; The Reasons Provide The Key to Slowing Population Growth", in Scientific American, December 1993, pp. 60-67. The Third World is undergoing a fertility revolution, with women of a hundred cultures, and social and economic status, starting to desire smaller family sizes. Birth rates have declined one-third since the 1960s, from women having an average of six children to an average of four children each. The forecast "demographic transition" of the Third World, seen as following the US-UK model of birth rate declines after economic growth brought relative prosperity, and taking decades, has been superceded by a decline in birth rate even without economic improvements. However, despite this transition, population growth will boost world population to 10 billion by 2050. The massive study of the CDC has found: a 50% reduction in fertility rates in Thailand in the last 12 years from 4.6 in 1973 to 2.3 children in 1987; in Colombia from 4.7 in 1976 to 2.8 in 1990; in Indonesia down 46% in 1971-1991; in Morocco down 31% in 1980-1992; and in Turkey down 21% in 1978-1988. Outside China, 38% of women in the Third World now practice birth control, or 51% with China (compared to 70% in the First World): 80% of the Third World women using birth control use modern methods, with sterilization the main method of birth control in 9 of the 16 countries studied. Traditional methods of birth control (such as abstinence) is practiced in only four African countries (Burundi, Cameroon, Ghana, Togo) and all have high fertility; by contract fertility since the 1970s fell by 26% in Botswana, 35% in Kenya, and 18% in Zimbabwe. Despite AIDS, only 4% of married couples use condoms. The main determinant of contraceptive use is contraceptive availability, especially when linked to mass media information on family planning: in Niger 16% of urban women compared to 3% of rural women use contraceptives; while in Nigeria contraceptives use rose from 6% in 1990 to 11% in 1992 alone. Some 120 million women in the Third World are not practicing family planning now; however, in every country outside Sub-Saharan Africa except for Haiti and Pakistan, the majority of married women are practicing birth control; in Africa, in three countries (Mali, Liberia, Uganda), only 20% of family planning needs are being met. If unmet demand for contraceptives was met, the use in the Third World could immediately surge from 51% to 60%, which would reduce average fertility from four children per women to three, reports Steven Sinding of the Rockefeller Foundation: this reduces forecast world population to 8.4 billion (dropping the Third World states population then from 6.5 billion to 5.1 billion). However, even if there is no increase in percentage of women practicing family planning, there will be another 100 million women needing contraceptives by 2000 simply due to population increase.

34041. United States House; House Committee on International Relations. Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Appendix: Prepared Statement by Terrence J. Brown, Deputy Asst. Administrator, Bureau for Asia and the Near East, US Agency for International Development: Morocco. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia: Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995. pp. 32-33. Morocco has played a significant role in the Middle East peace process in recent years. It is also a voice of moderation in the Arab world and a bulwark against radical Islamist influence. The US welcomes King Hassan's leadership in convening the Middle East/North Africa Economic Summit in Casablanca last 10/1994. With USAID assistance, Morocco has achieved significant progress in addressing many of the fundamental problems that hamper its economic and social development, although much remains to be done. Current projects include efforts to reduce rapid population growth; improve child and maternal health; limit urban pollution and sanitation; strengthen natural resource management, particularly in water use; and promote economic growth through support for privatization and small business and microenterprise development. [=]

Attacks carried out in broad daylight are fairly common these days. Of course, not against you gentlemen. That would be unacceptable. Only against unescorted young women, preferably pretty ones.

A casual glance at the newspapers reveals front page stories about women being attacked in major cities in Morocco. You can't just pass it off as something that happens to others. Every woman is a potential victim, and no one is safe.

In one widely publicized case, a young woman was waiting for a bus on her way to work at 7:30 in the morning. She was taken aback when a young man she'd never seen before addressed her. She told him he was mistaken, but he insisted he wasn't, calling her his "wife" and ordering her to come with him or else he would call the police. Embarrassed bystanders thought they were witnessing a family quarrel and uncomfortably looked away. Some gazed at the sky, others looked at their feet or consulted their watches. Naturally, no one interfered. After all, she was his wife and didn't that mean he could abuse her in front of a crowd of people without anyone lifting a finger? In this case, however, our early morning victim had internalized the message of women's liberation and equality. So she screamed at the top of her lungs. When bystanders pretended not to hear her, she resorted to a tried and true method and burst into tears.

Two officials who had been nearby were moved by this display of feminine weakness, and even though she was the man's "wife," they flagged down a passing police van. While the assembled crowd looked on, the police scrutinized the pair's identification papers and established that the man was an unsavory character who had planned to rape and rob his victim.

The remarkable thing about this story is the unmitigated gall of these rapipts who make use of this clever line "This is my wife," which, of course, lets them get away with anything. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=]
36000. AID. Congressional Presentation, FY 1995: Part 116: Asia and Near East: Regional Activities: Stabilizing Population Growth, District of Columbia: AID, February 28, 1994, Assistance for child spacing, business plans, training, education and communication as well as technical assistance for service delivery and data collection will be provided. Funding in the Near East region will be used for population research, the analysis of population trends, comparison of population program performance among countries and continued support for child-spacing activities in Oman. [=]

36001. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 01: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Sultanate of Oman is a monarchy without popularly elected representative institutions or political parties. Oman has been ruled by a sultan of the Al Bu Sa'id family since the middle of the 18th century. While maintaining the ruling family's long tradition of firm control over all important matters affecting the State, Sultan Qaboos Bin Sa'id Al Sa'id has brought leaders from the tribal system into his Government, and much decisionmaking is consensual in accordance with longstanding tradition. Since his accession in 1970, he has balanced tribal, regional, and ethnic interests in composing the national administration. The Cabinet of Ministers is appointed by and responsible to the Sultan. The State Consultative Council, an advisory body formed in 1980, was replaced in 1991 by the Majlis Ash-Shura or Consultative Council. This body represents the Sultan's measured effort to broaden participation in government. The Consultative Council's mandate is to review new laws pertaining to economic development and social services prior to their promulgation. It may summon Ministers to appear before the Majlis to discuss the Ministries' policies and plans. Oman is strategically located at the entrance to the Persian Gulf opposite Iran. Oman is concerned with internal stability and security, given the tensions in the region, the proximity of Iran and Iraq, and the potential threat of political Islam. The security apparatus is pervasive but professional and well trained, it is under the direct responsibility of the Ministry of Palace Office Affairs. The police are under the full control of the highest levels of government. Reports of human rights abuses by security personnel are rare. Almost totally undeveloped when Sultan Qaboos came to power in 1970, Oman has used its modest oil revenues to make impressive economic progress and improve public access to health care, education, and social services. Almost 80% of the Government's revenue comes from its oil production, but it is seeking to diversify Oman's free market economy and stimulate private sector activity. Individuals are free to associate with others in pursuing commercial interests, but only Omanis may own real property. In 1993 the Government lifted restrictions on foreign ownership of Omani stocks and bonds. There was no essential change in the human rights situation in 1993. A number of basic rights continued to be restricted or denied, particularly the freedoms of expression, peaceful assembly and association, the right of citizens to change their government, and worker rights. Additionally, various forms of discrimination against women remain, although women have made tangible progress in some areas of public life. Civil and political rights are not formally codified, but in the absence of any challenge to stability and order, the authorities generally respect the integrity of the person. Freedom of religion is generally respected. [=]

36002. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 04: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There were no reports of torture in 1993. There were a few unconfirmed reports that some prisoners had been beaten during pretrial detention. In particular, there were a few instances of police beating suspects accused of crimes against women and children. One defendant on trial in the Magistrate Court alleged he had been abused but retracted his accusation in court. [=]

36003. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 06: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, IncludingFreedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There were no reports of denial of a fair public trial. In addition to civilian courts, which treat misdemeanor and felony criminal cases, the court system includes Shari'a courts, which handle family law, an authority for the settlement of commercial disputes under the Ministry of Commerce & Industry, and a board to hear labor disputes under the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor. The Magistrate Court is a criminal court and adjudicates violations of the Criminal Code. A rarely used security court system handles internal security cases. Provincial governors arbitrate minor matters in rural areas but do not have the authority to detain persons. The various judicial systems are subordinate to the Sultan. In most cases they operate independently, but the Sultan may intercede in cases of particular interest, especially those concerning national security. Judicial practice in Oman conforms in most part to Islamic prescriptions for a fair trial before experienced and impartial judges. Oman's criminal judges, all Omani, and professionals who have trained at legal institutions in various Arab countries after completing their bachelor's degrees. A college Graduate may become a judge in the civilian courts at age 28 after 3 years of postgraduate study and 1 to 2 years' apprenticeship as a judge trainee. In the Islamic, or Shari'a, court system, a high school graduate may join the ranks of Shari'a court judges generally after a 23 after completed a 6-year course at one of Oman's four higher institutes for Islamic studies and an apprenticeship. There were no reports in 1993 that judges were transferred or missed for political reasons. Oman's Criminal Code, enacted in 1974, does not explicitly state the right of the accused during the criminal process but instead relies heavily on tradition and procedures instituted by the Magistrate Court. There are no written rules for admission of evidence during trials or codified procedures for entering cases into the criminal item. In a criminal trial, the accused is presumed to be innocent. He may be repented by an attorney, but this is not a legal requirement, and the Government will not pay for counsel. Defendants have the right and are expected to be present at trial, they may present evidence; and they may confront witnesses by asking questions put through the judge, who is generally the only one who may question witnesses The police have the responsibility to prosecute cases before the Magistrate Court. Trial is before a single judge for misdemeanors and minor felonies and before a panel of three judges for serious felonies. There are no jury trials, and, while there is no explicit right to a public trial, court proceedings are generally open to the public. The accused person, or his lawyer, may read the police charge sheet," which summarizes the case against him. There is no procedure by which the defense may seek the deletion of elements of the charge sheet prior to trial, but the inadequate may delete charges during the trial. The police or Public Prosecutor (a senior police officer) may add charges after inspection of the file by the defense and during the trial. During the trial, witnesses may be called by the judge, prosecution, or defense. The prosecution or the defense may cross-examine witnesses through (and with the approval of) the judge, but there is no procedural right to cross-examination. The prosecution and defense may challenge the reliability of statements or authenticity of documents in their closing statements to the judge. Judges frequently pronounce a
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Oman

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

verdict and sentence within 1 day after a trials end. Jail sentences of over 3 months and fines of over $1,300 are subject to appeal before a three judge panel. However, judgments in serious felony cases may not be appealed because they are heard in the first instance before the highest judicial panel; there is no other court of appeal. The Public Prosecutor's office may also appeal a sentence that it believes to be too light, although it may not appeal an innocent verdict. The President of the Magistrate Court chairs the Court of Appeals, which may opt not to consider an appeal it finds ill-grounded. The Shari'a Court generally allows attorneys representing both parties to appear before the judge. Judgments may be appealed within 30 days to an appeal court within the Shari'a court system, and the appeals are heard by a senior judge. Commercial matters brought before the authority for the settlement of commercial disputes are heard before a panel consisting of two judges and a member of the Chamber of Commerce. Once a case is filed, the authority may summon the parties to appear and often seeks opinions from auditors and other experts. Cases involving fines of over $20000 (10000 Omani rials) may be appealed to a five-member panel and receive a fresh hearing. There was no evidence that the legal system discriminated against minorities. However, in the case of discrimination against women, the Shari'a courts adhere to Islamic law equating the testimony of one man with that of two women. A capital sentence requires the Sultan's ratification. There were no reports of political prisoners in 1993. [\[...

36004. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 07: Respect For Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The police are not required to have a warrant in order to search a private residence, police, or vehicle. There is a widespread belief that the Government eavesdrops on both oral and written communications, and Omanis are guarded in both areas. A 1986 law banned marriage between Omanis and foreigners (defined as not including citizens from the Gulf Cooperation Council states). However, many prominent Omanis are married to foreigners, and some were married after 1986. Recently, a new marriage law was promulgated which set forth the conditions allowing marriages between Omanis and foreigners. Omanis may now obtain permission from the Ministry of Interior if they can justify their desire to marry a foreigner and can show the financial ability to support the foreign spouse. [\[...

36005. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 14: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There are many forms of discrimination against women in this traditional society, even though some women, primarily in the capital, have attained positions of authority in government, business, and the media. An estimated 14% of all civil servants are women. The occupational areas available to women are gradually expanding beyond the traditional held of teaching, as secretarial work, medicine, and communications have become acceptable professional areas for women over the last several years. However, some observers have noted a contraction of opportunities for women as the Government becomes more concerned about employment opportunities for men. In addition, some employers are concerned that female candidates for jobs might leave the work force to marry or have children, further diminishing women's opportunities for employment or for professional training. Schooling for girls is available to the same extent as for boys in urban areas and increasingly so in rural areas. In general, the level of education that girls attain remains below that of boys; however, the gap appears to be narrowing. Over 90% of Oman's children reach grade five of primary education. Women constitute roughly half of the 3000 students at Sultan Qaboos University. Women students constitute the majority in the colleges of arts, education, and Islamic sciences, and science and business. Over half of the first graduating class of the college of medicine in 1993 were women. The number of women students in the country's law schools has become severely restricted in a reflection of a reluctance both among employers to hire trained females for work in these fields outside the capital area and among trained females to accept work in them. The gains achieved by a small minority of women are largely irrelevant to the great majority, who live their lives within the confines of the home. Many females in the rural areas are illiterate. The lack of female education in some outlying areas of the country, where poverty is higher, combined with communal and tribal customs that dictate a subsidiary role for women, makes it difficult for most adult women to participate fully in the modern sector. By law, women are to receive equal pay and benefits for equal work. The Government, by far the largest employer of women in the country, enforces this regulation within its ministries, where women serve in professional and senior managerial positions. Women in the private sector earn salaries equal to those of their male counterparts. Women can sometimes have difficulty in obtaining land grants or subsidized government housing loans because the Government presumes that they will reside with a male relative, be it husband or brother. Legal provisions for female employees, including a provision for liberal maternity leave, are observed in both the public and private sectors. The Labor Law, in some ways very progressive, allows women with infants time off during the day to nurse. Oman society's interpretation of Islamic precepts on the status of women also results in de jure and de facto discrimination in a number of areas. Islamic inheritance laws are strictly interpreted. A woman may receive only one-eighth of her husband's property when he dies. Daughters receive less than sons. In urban, educated families, many women have property in their own names; less educated women do not usually have that protection. Because of the relative lack of education among older women, many are unaware of their rights. Others are reluctant to use the court system out of fear that they might forfeit family support by bringing a matter before the court. There is no evidence that there is a pattern of spouse abuse. Because of the closeness of Oman's extended families, battered women often seek family intervention to remove and protect them from violent domestic situations. [\[...

36006. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Oman: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government has made the health, education, and general welfare of children a priority in its budget. Medical care for Omani children is free, and a highly effective child immunization program has helped bring about dramatic improvements in child health. Communities in a few towns in the interior and in the Dhofar region still practice female genital mutilation (circumcision). The total number of cases nationwide is small and declining annually. [\[...

617
However, according to the Labor Law, employers of more than 50 workers are required to form a joint body of labor and management representatives as a forum for communication between the two groups. However, implementation of this provision of the Labor Law appears to be uneven, and it is unclear how often the committees that do exist meet. Generally these committees discuss such questions, for example, as living conditions in a company housing compound. Wages and hours are not a matter in the view of these committees; they are agreed upon by workers and employers in individual contracts within the guidelines delineated by the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor under the law. The committees are not formed across company lines, membership is confined to management and labor representatives from each individual company. The 1973 Labor Law (as amended) defines conditions of employment for both Omani and foreign workers. The Labor Law covers domestic workers and construction workers but does not cover temporary workers (those in Oman for less than three months). Foreign workers constitute at least 50% of the work force if one includes the traditional Omani occupations of fishing, subsistence farming and herding—and 80-90% of the work force in the modern sector. In August the Government promulgated a new regulation effective in 3/1994, aimed at reducing the number of expatriate shopkeepers. The regulation prohibits the hiring of additional workers after that date. The initial concerns of the Omani business sponsors and the foreign shopkeepers have eased because the Government is allowing unlimited hiring of expatriates before the deadline and may consider amendments to the final regulation. Citizens of India, Pakistan, the Philippines, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka continue to seek employment in Oman in large numbers, generally entering into employment contracts prior to their arrival. Work rules must be approved by the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor and posted conspicuously in the workplace by employers of 10 or more workers. Similarly, any employer with 50 or more workers must establish a grievance procedure. Regardless of the size of the company, any employee Omani or foreign, may file a grievance with the Labor Welfare Board, which comprises 6 inspectors who arbitrate disputes. Lower paid workers, such as clerks, mechanics, and salesmen, use the Board regularly. Both plaintiff and defendant may retain and be represented by counsel. Worker representatives may present collective grievances, but most cases are filed on behalf of individual workers. The Board has a docket of about 150 cases per month, about 80% of which involve foreign nationals. Sessions convene daily procedures are informal and summary in nature. The Board operates impartially and generally gives workers the benefit of the doubt in grievance hearings. Disputes that the Board cannot resolve are referred to the Minister of Social Affairs and Labor for decision. Complaints involving employer-employee relations should be brought before the magistrate court if there is an allegation of criminal wrongdoing. There are no export processing zones in Oman. [=]  36009. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There is no minimum wage in Qatar, although a 1962 law gives the Amir authority to set one. The 48-hour workweek with a 24-hour rest period is prescribed by law, although most government offices follow a schedule of 36 hours a week. Employees who work more than 48 hours a week, or 36 hours a week during the Muslim month of amadan, are entitled to overtime. This law is adhered to in government offices and major private sector companies. It is not observed in the case of domestic and personal employees. Domestic servants frequently work 7 days a week, more than 12 hours a day, with few or no holidays, and have no effective way to redress grievances against their employers. Qatar has enacted regulations concerning worker safety and health, but enforcement, which is the responsibility of the Ministry of Industry & Public Works, is lax. The Department of Public Safety oversees safety training and conditions, and the state-run petroleum company has its own set of safety standards and procedures. The Labor Law of 1964 as amended in 1984 lists partial and permanent disabilities for which compensation may be awarded some connected with handling chemicals and petroleum products or construction injuries. The law does not specifically set rates of payment and compensation. Foreign workers must be sponsored by a legally recognized organization or a Qatari citizen. Foreign workers need a sponsor to receive a visa to enter Qatar as well as the sponsor's permission to leave. Theoretically, any worker may seek legal relief from onerous work conditions. However, domestic workers, who experience the most difficulties, generally accept their situations in order to avoid repatriation. =]  36010. DS. "Oman: Introduction", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Sultanate of Oman is a monarchy which has been ruled by the Al Bu Sa'id family since the middle of the 18th century. It has no political parties or elected representative institutions. The current sultan is Qaboos Bin Said Al Sa'id who acceded in 1970. Although the Sultan retains firm control over all important policy issues, he has brought tribal leaders and other notables into the Government. Much decisionmaking is by consensus among these leaders according to longstanding tradition. In 1991 the Sultan established a 69-seat Consultative Council, or Majlis Ash-Shura, which replaced an older advisory body. Council members are selected from lists of nominees proposed by each of the 59 wilayats (regions). After the country's first national census in 1993, the Sultan expanded the membership of the new Council to 80 seats. The Council has no formal legislative powers, but may question government ministers and recommend changes to new laws on economic and social policy. The entire security apparatus falls under the authority of the Ministry of Palace Office Affairs which coordinates all intelligence and security policies. The internal security service investigates all matters related to internal security. The Royal Oman Police performs regular police duties, provides security at airports, acts as immigration officials, and maintains a small coast guard. There were no confirmed reports indicating that these agencies were involved in human rights abuses in 1994. Since 1970, Oman has used its modest oil revenue to make impressive economic progress and improved able access to health care, education and social services. The government seeks to diversify the economy and stimulate private investment. The Government continues to restrict or deny important human rights. In 1994 the Government detained 200 people in connection with an alleged plot to destabilize the country. The Government charged 131 of these suspects with sedition and tried them in secret before the State Security Court. The detentions and secret trials raised serious questions about freedom from arbitrary arrest and the right to due process. Other human rights restrictions included infringements on the freedoms of expression and association. The Government does not guarantee full rights for workers and women. As a practical matter, the people do not have the right to change their government, inasmuch as the Government took several steps in 1994 to address human rights concerns. It increased the number of seats on the Consultative Council and allowed women to take part in nominations for Council members. In 11/1994 the Government selected two women to serve on the Council. The Government also joined the International Labor Organization (ILO) and began to draft a new labor law that addresses worker rights. [ ]

36011. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5208(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The judicial system does not always ensure fair trials based on internationally accepted norms. The judiciary comprises the magistrate courts, which adjudicate misdemeanors and criminal matters- the Islamic, or Shari'a, courts, which adjudicate personal status cases such as divorce and inheritance; the Authority for the Settlement of Commercial Disputes (ASCD)--the Labor Welfare Board--and the Real Estate Committee, which hears tenant-landlord disputes. A State Security Court tries cases involving national security. Although it is administrative distinct from the other courts, magistrate court judges have presided over trials in the State Security Court. The various courts are subordinate to the Sultan and subject to his influence. The Sultan appoints all judges, acts as a court of final appeal, and intercedes in cases of particular interest, especially in national security cases. However, there have been no reported instances in which the Sultan has overturned a decision of the ASCD or the magistrate courts. The Criminal Code does not specify the rights of the accused. There are no written rules of evidence, or codified procedures for entering cases into the criminal system or any legal provision for a public trial. Criminal procedure have developed by tradition and precedent in the magistrate courts. In criminal cases, the police provide defendants with the written charges against them, defendants are presumed innocent, and have the right to present evidence and confront witnesses. The prosecution and the defense question witnesses through the judge, who is usually the person to question witnesses in court. There are no jury trials: a single judge tries misdemeanors; a panel of three judges tries felonies and security offenses. Magistrate court judges must be citizens. Public prosecutors are senior police officers. They may bring additional charges after defense attorneys have inspected the charge sheet or during trial. A detainee may hire an attorney but has no explicit right to be represented by counsel. The Government does not pay for the legal representation of indigents. Judges often pronounce the verdict and sentence within 1 day after the completion of a trial. Defendants may appeal jail sentences longer than 3 months and fines over the equivalent of $1300 to a three-judge panel. Defendants accused of national security offenses and serious felonies do not have the right of appeal. Death sentences, which are rare, require the Sultan's approval. The Government tried 131 persons for subversion in secret before the State Security Court, which issued verdicts on 11/12/1994 (see Section 1.d.). The Court sentenced two defendants to death and the others from 3 to 1 year in prison. The Sultan later commuted the death sentences to prison terms. The defendants did not have a fair trial by international norms. There are no known political prisoners. However, the secrecy of the subversion trials prevents any independent assessment of the Government's assertion that the defendants were actual subversives found guilty of plotting to destabilize the country. [ ]

36012. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (a) Freedom of Speech and Press", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5208(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There is no legal protection for free speech or press. The law prohibits any criticism of the Sultan in any form or medium. The authorities tolerate criticism of government officials and agencies, but such criticism rely receives media coverage. The 1984 Press and Publication Law authorizes the Government to censor all domestic and imported publications. Ministry of Information censors may act against any material regarded as politically, culturally, or sexually offensive. However, journalists and writers generally censor themselves to avoid government harassment. Editors reflect the Government's views, although the authorities tolerate some criticism on foreign issues. The Government discourages in-depth reporting on controversial domestic issues, and seeks to influence privately owned dailies and periodicals by subsidizing their operating costs. In late August, all four daily newspapers reported the arrest of the 200 alleged subversives only once—by publishing the dispatch of the government-owned Oman News Agency without further comment. On several occasions in 1994, the Government prohibited the entry onto the market of several foreign newspapers. The authorities prevented distribution of the August 6 edition of the London-based Arabic daily Al-Hayat, reportedly because it contained some statements regarded as critical of the Majlis Ash-Shura, and of the 11/7/1994 edition of the Financial Times reportedly because it contained an article critical of the Government's economic policy. Customs officials sometimes confiscate video cassette tapes and erase offensive material. The tapes may or may not be returned to their owners. The Government controls the local radio and television companies. They do not air any politically controversial material. The Government does not allow the establishment of privately owned radio and television companies. However, the availability of satellite dishes has made foreign broadcast information accessible to the public. The appropriate Government authority, such as the Sultan Qaboos University, the police, or the relevant ministry must approve cultural events, including plays, concerts, lectures, and seminars. Most organizations avoid controversial issues for fear the authorities may cancel their events. Academic freedom is restricted, particularly regarding controversial matters, including politics. Professors may be dismissed for going beyond acceptable boundaries. [ ]

36013. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5208(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government does not restrict travel within the country except to military areas. While a man may travel abroad freely, a woman must have authorization from her husband, father, or nearest male relative to obtain a passport. The Government does not have a policy on refugees or a tradition of harboring stateless or undocumented aliens. Tight control over the entry of foreigners into the country has effectively screened out would-be refugees. However, in 1994 the Government offered temporary refuge to several thousand Yemenis displaced by the civil war in Yemen. [ ]
United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives. By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government has made the health, education, and general welfare for children a budgetary priority. There is no pattern of familial or other child abuse. Communities in the interior and in the Dhofar region still practice female genital mutilation. Experts believe that the number of such cases is small and declining annually. [=]

36015. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Women face many forms of discrimination. Most women live their lives in the confines of the home. Widespread illiteracy hampers women's ability to own property, participate in the modern sector of the economy, or even inform themselves of their own rights. Government officials frequently deny women land grants housing loans, and prefer to conduct business with a woman's husband or other male relative. Many educated women face job discrimination because perspective buyers fear they might quit to marry or raise families. Government grants for study abroad are limited almost exclusively to males. Many aspects of Islamic tradition also discriminate against women. Islamic law favors male heirs in adjudicating inheritance claims. Many women are reluctant to take an inheritance dispute to court for fear of alienating the family. Some educated women have attained positions of authority in government, business, and the media. An estimated 14% of all civil servants are women. Two women also serve in the Consultative Council. In both the public and private sectors, women are entitled to liberal maternity leave and equal pay for equal work. The bureaucracy, the country's largest employer of women, observes such regulations, as do many private sector employers. Women constitute roughly half of the 3000 students at the Sultan Qaboos University and are a majority in the colleges arts, education, science, business, and Islamic studies. There is no evidence of a pattern of spousal abuse but information is scant and difficult to collect. Doctors do not have a legal responsibility to report either spouse child abuse cases to the courts. Battered women may file a complaint with the police, but more often seek family intervention to protect them from violent domestic situations. There have been reports that employers or male coworkers have sexually harassed foreign females employed in such positions as domestic servants and hospital nurses. Foreign women employed as domestic servants and garment workers have complained that their employers have withheld their salaries and that government officials have been unresponsive to their grievances. [=]

36016. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (b) The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The current law does not provide for the right to collective bargaining. It requires that employer of more than 50 workers form a joint labor-management committee as a communication forum between the two groups. The implementation of this provision is uneven, and the effectiveness of these committees is questionable. In general, the committees discuss such question as living conditions at company-provided housing. They are not authorized to discuss wages, hours, or conditions of employment. Such issues are specified in the work contracts signed individually by workers and employers and must be consistent with the guidelines of the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor. The current law defines conditions of employment for some Omani and foreign workers. It covers domestic servant and construction workers but not temporary workers or those with work contracts that expire within 3 months. Foreign workers constitute at least 50% of the work force and as much as 80% of the modern-sector work force. Work rules must be approved by the Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor and posted conspicuously in the workplace. Employers of 10 or more workers. Similarly, any employer with 50 or more workers must establish a grievance procedure. Regardless of the size of the company, any employee, including foreign workers, may file a grievance with the Labor Welfare Board. Sometimes worker representatives file collective grievances, but most grievances are filed by individual workers. Lower paid workers use the procedure regularly. Plaintiffs and defendants in such cases may be represented by legal counsel. There are no export processing zones. [=]

36017. DS. "Oman: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor issues minimum wage guidelines for various categories of workers. The minimum wage for nonprofessional workers was about $156 a month (60 rials). Minimum wage guidelines do not cover domestic servants, farmers, government employees, or workers in small businesses. Many foreigners work in fields exempt from the minimum wage statute. The Government is lax in enforcing minimum wage guidelines for foreign workers employed in menial jobs. However, foreign workers with high skills are frequently paid more than their Omani counterparts. The minimum wage is sufficient to provide a decent standard of living for a worker and family. The compensation for foreign manual laborers and clerks is sufficient to cover living expenses and to permit some savings to be sent home. The private sector workweek is 40-45 hours and includes a rest period from Thursday afternoon through Friday. Government officials have a 36-hour workweek. While the law does not designate the number of days in a workweek, it requires at least one 24-hour rest period per week and mandates overtime pay for hours in excess of 48 Per week. Government regulations on hours of employment are not always enforced. Employees who have worked extra hours without compensation may file a complaint before the Labor Welfare Board, but the Boards rulings are not binding. Every worker has the right to 12 days of annual leave during the first 3 year of employment and 30 days per year thereafter. Employers provide many foreign nationals, including maids, with annual or biannual round-trip tickets to their countries of origin. All employers are required by law to provide first aid facilities. Work sites with over 100 employees must have a nurse. Employees covered under the Labor Law may recover compensation for injury or illness sustained on the job through employer-provided medical insurance. The health and safety standard codes are enforced by inspectors from the Department of Heath and Safety of the Directorate of Labor. As required by law, they make frequent on-site inspections. The law states that employers must not to place their employees in situations involving dangerous work. However, the law does not specifically grant a worker the right to remove himself from dangerous work without jeopardy to his continued employment. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Oman

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

in Qatar, although a 1962 law gives the Amir authority to set one. The 48-hour work week with a 24-hour rest period is prescribed by law, although most government offices follow a schedule of 36 hours a week. Employees who work more than 48 hours a week, or 36 hours a week during the Muslim month of Ramadan, are entitled to overtime. This law is adhered to in government offices and major private sector companies. It is not observed in the case of domestic and personal employees. Domestic workers typically work 7 days a week, more than 12 hours a day, with few or no holidays, and have no effective way to redress grievances against their employers. Qatar has enacted regulations concerning worker safety and health, but enforcement, which is the responsibility of the Ministry of Energy & Industry, is lax. The Department of Public Safety oversees safety training and conditions, and the state-run petroleum company has its own set of safety standards and procedures. The Labor Law of 1964, as amended in 1984, lists partial and permanent disabilities for which compensation may be awarded, some connected with handling chemicals and petroleum products or construction injuries. The law does not specifically set rates of payment and compensation. Foreign workers must be sponsored by a citizen or legally recognized organization to obtain an entry visa, and must have their sponsor's permission to depart the country. Theoretically, any worker may seek legal relief from onerous work conditions, but domestic workers generally accept their situations in order to avoid repatriation. [=]

36019. Eickelman, Christine. Women and Community in Oman. New York: New York University, 1984. The author resided in Oman in 1979-1980 (her husband [Dale Eickelman] was studying ideas on leadership and political authority in inner Oman on NSF grant) in Hamra, an oasis on the western edge of the Jabal al-Akhdar, a village of 2500 and the tribal capital of the Abriyin. The village economy was based on falaqi (which are based on the dates, particularly during meals, which are the primary source of food) supplemented by herding of sheep and goats. The village women were self-confident but lived in a matrix of precisely determined status. Women never undertook market activities; most food was available as local products sold by small merchants, although a larger volume of trucked in foods (including canned and frozen) was now available. While the community is based on extended families, most families reside in nuclear family units. The major social distinction is between shaykhly and non-shaykhly families: while the household work of women in both types of families is similar, shaykhly families typically have servants. While many servants are former slaves, there is still much stigma associated with slave origins, and many have taken up activities such as shopkeeping, many younger descendants of slaves continue to have few opportunities other than being clients of shaykhly households. Women and men are separate for much of the day, and families guard their privacy (especially during meals, which are almost always private, with guests eating separately). Overlying this formal division of social space is a dense network of visiting relationships among women and the visits of women peddlars. Cumulatively, the formal and informal visiting relationships of men and women are termed hayyan (family cluster), within walking distance and of like status, that define the scope of normal social interaction. A high social value is assigned to the absence of public conflict; by extension, open conflict in Omani society can have very serious implications. Conflict is normally concealed, and is associated with low status families.

Hamra is undergoing a period of decline, having been an important regional center until the mid-twentieth century. In 1826, the Awdah Zahrani line of the Abriyin settled in Hamra, establishing it as the tribal capital. The major landowners in Hamra are descendants of the lineages. Until recently the majority of educated people in Hamra were of shaykhly descent. The integration of Oman into a broader international trade led to the decline of cotton as a cash crop and of the local production of textiles, in the face of imports from British India. Before the developing of trucking, Hamra had been a caravan entrepot: one example of this. Hence the Ministry is ready to assist families whose circumstances require that they should receive help in the form of immediate cash payments. Such circumstances arise when extreme climatic conditions in some areas of Zanzibar and the East African littoral. Sultan Qaboos, coming to power in 1970, brought a period of rapid modernization to Oman. Hamra became a minor administrative center for the national government even as regional traditional agriculture based on the falaj declines. In 1980, 43% of Hamra's men were employed outside the area, with most in the army, in the capital or in Abu Dhabi. In the early 1970s, many descendants of slaves were quick to join the army or police. In Hamra, the government has set up a system of modern employment patterns based on new construction using brick is replacing the older mud brick: non-shaykhly families have been especially interested in newer housing areas, and the shift in settlement has led to the decline of the old market.
the Sultanate result in natural disasters. There are also 'unnatural disasters' such as fires. Assistance payments in such distressing situations provide relief for the victims, as well as compensation for their material losses. As part of its plan to pool available resources and develop the local communities, the Ministry encourages citizens to become self-sufficient and self-reliant, and avoid over-dependence on others. The goal here is to improve families' living standards, incomes and overall conditions and transform them into productive units. The Ministry endeavours to achieve this through its livelihood projects, which consist mainly of small business ventures like kiosks, stalls and small shops. These projects enable people to generate their own incomes and reduce their dependence on state assistance. Sound social planning and the elimination of social ills can only be achieved through proper theoretical studies and practical experience in the field. The Ministry has carried out a number of studies of 'negative social phenomena' with the aim of discovering their causes and finding ways of overcoming them. Studies include a survey of public opinion on currently prevailing dowry levels, a study of social and environmental motivations and their effect on the Omani farmer and agricultural development, as well as the provision of pest control programmes and veterinary services. Other services included seed and fertiliser distribution, and a number of other useful activities. Omani women are already playing a vital role in the professions, government, and commerce, in addition to their traditional ones within the family. The main aim of the rural women's development part of the Programme is to liberate women in the rural areas from negative practices and customs that are damaging to health and social well-being. Another essential aim is to eliminate female illiteracy, encourage women to join adult education classes and teach women good housekeeping. In 1992, 84 rural women's development centres, and 454 women were engaged in making clothes.

Women and Children: Women and children form one of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour’s most important responsibilities and departments have instituted a wide range of social and educational activities and programmes to meet their needs and create a healthy new generation to carry the national process forward. Mothers and children took on a new importance when planners recognised that they form one of the basic elements of development, since the children of today are the men and women of tomorrow. Hence it was vital to identify the needs of the next two sectors (women and children) to enable them to make progress in their health, and social and cultural lives. Careful, well thought-out planning was required in order to achieve this. Several women’s and children's welfare social centres have been set up in different parts of the Sultanate to operate welfare programmes for Omani women, raise their social, economic and cultural levels, and, by teaching them the skills needed to improve their standard of living, involve them in the country's social development programmes. At present there are seven of these centres in al Khodh, al Amerat, Bidbid, Ja’alan Bani Bu Hasam, Ras al Hadd, Qurayat and Sohar. These centres train women in needlework, embroidery, and home economics, as well as in traditional local crafts to improve their skills and protect this particular heritage from extinction. Marketing facilities are provided for these products by the centre. The centres also organise lectures, courses and literary classes, and pay home visits to the families concerned. The priority given to child care through the Ministry's Children's Department reflects the fact that children are one of the most important sectors of the community. In furtherance of its objective of providing children with happy and fruitful lives, the Department organises visits to ensure compliance with the Ministerial Decision regulating day nurseries. There were 16 such nurseries in 1992. The Ministry has established Omani Women's Associations in various parts of the Sultanate to give voluntary work a more prominent role. The first Omani Women's Association was established in Muscat in 1971, and played a pioneering part in women's voluntary work in the region. In succeeding years Associations were established in Salalah, al Buraimi, Sohar, Sur, Taqah and Mirbat. More recently they have been established in al Khabourah, Ibra and Ibi, Saham, Nizwa and al Mudhaibi. In 1992 there were thirteen such associations in the Sultanate. On a lighter note, Omani women staged an international class fashion show, based on traditional dresses from all part of the Sultanate, in May this year. The show was attended by fashion experts and journalists from many parts of the world.

Labour Sector: The Labour Sector of the Ministry is responsible for the national work-force employed in private sector enterprises and companies as well as foreign imported labour. This is a very important part of the Ministry's work, particularly in view of the growing demand for manpower and the consequent need for increased efforts to protect that manpower and to maintain it in a healthy and socially acceptable condition. The Ministry has been handling these problems through a number of channels. The main ones are:- local recruitment, work permits, training subsidies, labour inspection, employee welfare, statistics, computers, occupational health and safety, and external labour relations. The Ministry's policy is to increase the recruitment of local labour for private sector companies and enterprises, because it is committed to the principle of replacing foreign manpower and supporting Omanisation. Omanisation is making steady progress, and all possible steps are being taken to ensure that rewarding job opportunities are available for every Omani who is willing and able to work. The Ministry's figures indicate a significant increase in the Omanisation of the private sector during 1992. Successes along the road to Omanisation are a result of constant government moral and material support for the achievement of this goal. By far the most important example of this was the announcement by the Supreme Committee for Vocational Training and Labour to the effect that private sector employers would receive substantial compensation for salaries and allowances paid to employees and those taken on from October 1991 for a period of up to three years. The great advances achieved by the country since the accession of His Majesty Sultan Qaboos created an urgent need for imported labour from Arab and other countries, in order to enable the goals of the Development Plans to be met, since the available national manpower was insufficient to cover all the country's needs. In this situation it became the Ministry's function to reconcile the manpower requirements of the Development Plans with locally available labour, and to supervise the importation of foreign workers needed to bridge the gap. In ensuring that both employers and employees comply with the provisions of the Oman Labour Law and Ministerial Decisions implementing it, the Ministry endeavours to ensure that the law serves the interests of both sides. According to 1992 figures, over 14000 establishments were inspected that year. To guarantee stable employer-employee labour relations under the provisions of the Omani Labour Law, the Ministry's Labour Welfare Services work to resolve problems that might disrupt production in private sector enterprises and companies. In doing so, these Services endeavour to achieve a balance between the two sides. In this connection 2,928 claims were filed in 1992. The most important of these involved appeals against dismissal, termination of service or cancellation of contract between employer and employee. Computerisation was introduced in 1991 in order to achieve maximum speed, accuracy and flexibility in dealing with the public's business. The Ministry computer organisation has a fundamental role in collecting and collating data about the movement of national and foreign labour in the private sector, to produce quarterly and half-yearly reports on the size of the workforce in that sector, and to produce statistics on a monthly basis for the Ministry of Finance and Economy's Research Department and the Development Council's Manpower statistics Department. The protection of the workforce from occupational hazards is one of the Ministry's main responsibilities. Through its occupational safety and health regulations the Ministry encourages employers to provide medical care and appropriate healthy housing with all modern conveniences, and to ensure that the work environment contains nothing that is likely to cause occupational diseases or accidents. The Ministry keeps abreast of all industrial and other developments taking place in the country, and through its frequent inspection campaigns, it ensures that the highest standards of occupational safety and health are maintained. [2]

36021. Ministry of Information (Oman). Oman 1993; Part 27: Youth, Sultanate of Oman, Ministry of Information, 1993. In his address to the nation on National Day in November 1992. His Majesty Sultan Qaboos announced that 1993 was to be the Year of Youth. It is exactly ten years since he announced the first Year of Youth, a clear indication of the importance that His Majesty attaches to the development of the youth of the nation, as representing the future of the Sultanate, and of the personal interest he has shown in the nation's young people and the role he plays in their advancement. The combination of a high birth rate with rapidly rising health standards, and a corresponding fall in the infant mortality rate, means that the youth of the country represent an increasing proportion of the total population of the Sultanate. Those who knew Oman before 1970 and visited the towns and villages of the Interior, will still clearly recollect the sight of youngsters blinded by trachoma, infected eyes, and infected dust, whilst the mortality rate amongst children from malaria and dysentery was grievously high. The contrast now could not be greater; apart from the recorded tremendous improvement in health standards, the evident fitness and alertness of the young is most noticeable. Physical fitness is now widely popular amongst young people, with their keenness on every form of sporting activity. In 1992, the responsibility for supervision of all youth affairs was entrusted to the Ministry of Education, and in 1986 its title was amended accordingly. In 1989, the Higher Council Youth approved an integrated nation-wide plan for expanding and improving youth facilities, including the construction of sports and youth centres, support for the expansion of existing clubs, and the organisation of national sporting and recreational activities, to which His Majesty personally donated half a million Rials. By a Royal Decree of 1991, Sports and Youth Activities were placed under a General Organisation for Sports and Youth Activities (GOSYA), supervised by the Council of Ministers, and the President of which is H.E. Ibrahim bin Hamoud Al Subhi. In outlining the programme for the Year of Youth, H.E. Ibrahim Al Subhi announced that it is likely to cause occupational diseases or accidents. The MinistryLabour Law, the Ministry's Labour Welfare Services work to resolve the problems that might disrupt production in private sector enterprises and companies. In doing so, these Services endeavour to achieve a balance between the two sides. In this connection 2,928 claims were filed in 1992. The most important of these involved appeals against dismissal, termination of service or cancellation of contract between employer and employee. Computerisation was introduced in 1991 in order to achieve maximum speed, accuracy and flexibility in dealing with the public's business. The Ministry computer organisation has a fundamental role in collecting and collating data about the movement of national and foreign labour in the private sector, to produce quarterly and half-yearly reports on the size of the workforce in that sector, and to produce statistics on a monthly basis for the Ministry of Finance and Economy's Research Department and the Development Council's Manpower statistics Department. The protection of the workforce from occupational hazards is one of the Ministry's main responsibilities. Through its occupational safety and health regulations the Ministry encourages employers to provide medical care and appropriate healthy housing with all modern conveniences, and to ensure that the work environment contains nothing that is likely to cause occupational diseases or accidents. The Ministry keeps abreast of all industrial and other developments taking place in the country, and through its frequent inspection campaigns, it ensures that the highest standards of occupational safety and health are maintained. [2]

36021. Ministry of Information (Oman). Oman 1993; Part 27: Youth, Sultanate of Oman, Ministry of Information, 1993. In his address to the nation on National Day in November 1992. His Majesty Sultan Qaboos announced that 1993 was to be the Year of Youth. It is exactly ten years since he announced the first Year of Youth, a clear indication of the importance that His Majesty attaches to the development of the youth of the nation, as representing the future of the Sultanate, and of the personal interest he has shown in the nation's young people and the role he plays in their advancement. The combination of a high birth rate with rapidly rising health standards, and a corresponding fall in the infant mortality rate, means that the youth of the country represent an increasing proportion of the total population of the Sultanate. Those who knew Oman before 1970 and visited the towns and villages of the Interior, will still clearly recollect the sight of youngsters blinded by trachoma, infected eyes, and infected dust, whilst the mortality rate amongst children from malaria and dysentery was grievously high. The contrast now could not be greater; apart from the recorded tremendous improvement in health standards, the evident fitness and alertness of the young is most noticeable. Physical fitness is now widely popular amongst young people, with their keenness on every form of sporting activity. In 1992, the responsibility for supervision of all youth affairs was entrusted to the Ministry of Education, and in 1986 its title was amended accordingly. In 1989, the Higher Council Youth approved an integrated nation-wide plan for expanding and improving youth facilities, including the construction of sports and youth centres, support for the expansion of existing clubs, and the organisation of national sporting and recreational activities, to which His Majesty personally donated half a million Rials. By a Royal Decree of 1991, Sports and Youth Activities were placed under a General Organisation for Sports and Youth Activities (GOSYA), supervised by the Council of Ministers, and the President of which is H.E. Ibrahim bin Hamoud Al Subhi. In outlining the programme for the Year of Youth, H.E. Ibrahim Al Subhi announced that it is likely to cause occupational diseases or accidents. The MinistryLabour Law, the Ministry's Labour Welfare Services work to resolve the problems that might disrupt production in private sector enterprises and companies. In doing so, these Services endeavour to achieve a balance between the two sides. In this connection 2,928 claims were filed in 1992. The most important of these involved appeals against dismissal, termination of service or cancellation of contract between employer and employee. Computerisation was introduced in 1991 in order to achieve maximum speed, accuracy and flexibility in dealing with the public's business. The Ministry computer organisation has a fundamental role in collecting and collating data about the movement of national and foreign labour in the private sector, to produce quarterly and half-yearly reports on the size of the workforce in that sector, and to produce statistics on a monthly basis for the Ministry of Finance and Economy's Research Department and the Development Council's Manpower statistics Department. The protection of the workforce from occupational hazards is one of the Ministry's main responsibilities. Through its occupational safety and health regulations the Ministry encourages employers to provide medical care and appropriate healthy housing with all modern conveniences, and to ensure that the work environment contains nothing that is likely to cause occupational diseases or accidents. The Ministry keeps abreast of all industrial and other developments taking place in the country, and through its frequent inspection campaigns, it ensures that the highest standards of occupational safety and health are maintained. [2] recognition of the keen interest that he has shown in the scouting movement in the Sultanate, His Majesty Sultan Qaboos was installed as Chief Scout during the National Celebrations. Scouts and Guides are encouraged to participate in projects which aid society, one of the most rewarding of which is the organisation of an annual course for the handicapped under the auspices of the Oman National Committee for the Care of the Handicapped, part of the State effort to enable the handicapped to undertake work which will give them a secure and dignified life and help them make a positive contribution to society. These courses have been so successful that handicapped people from other member States of the AGCC are now joining them. The National Organisation for Scouts and Guides is keen to increase membership and encourage the formation of Scout and Guide packs in schools at all educational stages. The Organisation provides uniforms, badges and other requirements, and supervises leadership training and development. Statistics show that numbers are growing in both sections of the movement, which now have over 10000 members. Oman participated in the 32nd World Scouts Conference in 1990, which was attended by over 1000 scouts from 132 countries, and won high praise at the 19th Arab Scouts' Conference in Cairo. In February 1995, the fourth Ship for World Youth, organised by the Japanese Government, called at Mina Qaboos with 185 youngsters, including 20 Omanis, on board. As part of their programme for seeing places of interest in the Sultanate, the youth groups visited the Sultan Qaboos University, where they joined in sports and cultural activities. The National Organisation for Scouts and Guides is establishing a camp at Al Madlah in the Wilayat of Musan'a. A committee has been assigned the task of planning and supervising the execution of the various phases of the camp, including utilities, services, activities centre, and a headquarters. Work has already started to prepare the camp for over 1000 scouts in the annual camps during the mid-year vacation. [=]

36022. Ministry of Information (Oman). Oman 1993; Part 33: Justice, Awqaf, and Islamic Affairs. Sultanate of Oman, Ministry of Information, 1993. Islam is the religion of the Sultanate of Oman, and under Islam, religion and law are interwoven. Thus Shari'a Law is the law of Oman. Awqaf are donations and bequests to religious foundations and charities. It was only natural, therefore, that following the accession of His Majesty Sultan Qaboos, the processes of religious affairs and of the law should be conducted by the same Ministry. Consequently, the Ministry of Justice, Awqaf and Islamic Affairs was established. In spite of the great distances and wide deserts which separate Oman from the Holy Cities of Mecca and Medina, Oman was one of the first countries to embrace Islam during the lifetime of the Prophet, by acceptance rather than conquest, a faith to which it has staunchly held over the ensuing centuries. The Ministry provides some of the most important social and religious services, and endeavours to ensure justice for every citizen who has suffered injury to his person or his property, or in any of the rights guaranteed to him under the Islamic Shari'a Law or Royal Decrees. As far as social work is concerned, the Ministry provides religious services, spiritual guidance in the form of preachers and counsellors in the mosques, and the training of and appointment of Imams. In addition, it takes care of the properties of orphans and bequests left to them, investing them so that they produce the best possible growth and returns. It also collects the zakat and distributes it to those entitled to it, teaches the Holy Koran, and looks after the Waqf (plural Awqaf) properties. Zakat is a religious tax, originally representing 5 or 10 per cent of earnings from the land. Today, revenue from zakat go the Ministry, which organises zakat revenues and expenditure. The Ministry is divided into two main sections, namely Justice and Awqaf, and Islamic Affairs. Each section is headed by an Under-Secretary, who is responsible to the Minister for the running of his section, which has its own prerogatives and functions. Under the Justice section are the Shari'a Courts, of which there are 45 in Muscat and other principal towns in the wilayats. Each court has at least one judge (qadi), an assistant judge and his deputy, with a team of clerks responsible for documents and court records. In the Shari'a courts, each judge is responsible for hearing civil and criminal cases filed by citizens against each other, reaching judgements on and solutions to disputes, and how to settle them. The Court of Appeal, in Muscat, considers judgements by the Shari'a courts when appeals are lodged against them. At the highest level is the Complaints Committee to which there is recourse by those who are not satisfied by the judgements given at the two lower levels. Rulings given by the Complaints Committee are final. Studies at the Institute of Shari'a Jurisprudence, Counsel and Guidance, consist of two stages: students who have qualified for the Islamic Studies Preparatory Certificate, or at an equivalent level, undertake a general Shari'a course of three years length. Those completing this stage may then continue to the specialisation stage. Alternatively, they may be appointed to appropriate posts in the Shari'a courts or the Ministry. Students are accepted for specialisation in Shari'a jurisprudence if they have attained a minimum of 60% in the examination at the previous stage. After graduation, they are appointed as deputy judges or to appropriate posts at the courts or the Ministry. Students who wish to specialise in Counsel and Guidance are accepted for this if they have been successful in the final examination of the Shari'a studies stage. After graduation they are appointed to Counsel and Guidance posts as Imams and Preachers.

The Awqaf and Islamic Affairs section of the Ministry is responsible for:

(1) Spreading the teachings of the True Islamic Religion within the Sultanate through counsel, guidance and the various media, and setting up Islamic libraries;
(2) Taking part in Islamic activities abroad, through organisations, conferences and seminars, and exchanging visits with members of the Islamic community and brotherly Arab states;
(3) Making preparations for the Haj (pilgrim) season in coordination with the Saudi authorities and relevant local organisations;
(4) Establishing, restoring, maintaining and administering mosques;
(5) Organising zakat revenues and expenditure;
(6) Overseeing and maintaining all types of awqaf, and endeavouring to increase their revenues, develop them, and regulate their affairs;
(7) Taking charge of Bait Al Mal (Public Treasury) properties, and setting rules and regulations for maintaining them and developing their resources;
(8) Looking after and maintaining the property of orphans and bequests for them, implementing Shari'a court decisions related to these bequests, and the regulations dealing with them. The Holy Koran schools are the basic source for those wishing to absorb the teachings of the Holy Koran and learn the elements of reading and writing, especially in the more remote areas. These schools, of which there are currently more than 500 in the Sultanate, played an important role in training many generations before secular modern schools became widespread. Today they still play a vital role and attract numbers of boys and girls each year. The Ministry also operates summer holiday centres throughout the Sultanate for teaching the Holy Koran and to ensure that students from regular schools have access to Koranic studies when the schools are in recess. The Grand Mufti of Oman, His Eminence Sheikh Ahmed bin Hamad Al Khalili, has revealed a plan to set up an Islamic university in the Sultanate. He has said that once the final decision has been taken, and the university has become a reality, all the existing Islamic institutes in the country could be incorporated into it. [=]

36023. Montgomery, Lori. "In UN Treaty on Child Rights, Some See a Threat To Parents". In Seattle Times, June 8, 1995. p. A3. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, not yet ratified by Somalia, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Brunei, and Oman, is being criticized by some US Christians as giving children the right to sue their parents, to read pornography, to have homosexual sex and refuse to go to church. Federal officials reject this interpretation of the treaty, but many Christian groups, including Phyllis Schafly of the Eagle Forum, and Concerned Women for America, have lobbied their members to disseminate this interpretation of the treaty. The Childrens Defense Fund responds by stating that the treaty has been endorsed by Margaret Thatcher and the Vatican. Howard Davidson of the American Bar Association Center on Children & Law
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Oman

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

sees the fears of these groups as ‘preposterous’. [TXT]

36024. Teves, Oliver. "UN Panel To Tackle Abuse of Women Working Abroad; More and More Women Throughout Asia Have Been Leaving Their Own Countries To Find Work—and The United Nations Says They Are Also Finding Themselves Exploited and In Danger", in Seattle Times, May 28, 1996, p. A7. Working 20-hour days as a housemaid, without days off, a Filipina maid in Oman described how she had to keep scissors under her pillow to protect herself from the sexual advances of her employer's son; she finally was allowed to leave Oman by fabricating a story about a sick child in the Philippines. A panel of 50 UN experts convened in Manila to survey such stories of abuse of women overseas workers; how 50% of Asian overseas workers are women, up from 15% two decades ago. A decade ago, the majority of Philippine overseas workers were men working in construction, now 55% of the 5 million Filipinos working overseas are women. In the first five months of 1996, some 94136 Filipino workers encountered serious problems, compared to 40971 in all of 1995, reports the Kanlungan Center Foundation. Some 80% of all Sri Lankan expatriate workers are women, nearly all working as housemaids in the Middle East; at any given time, hundreds of these Sri Lankan maids are being harbored in Sri Lankan embassies after fleeing abuse from their employers. [TXT]

36025. United States House; House Committee on International Relations. Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Appendix: Prepared Statement by Terrence J. Brown, Deputy Asst. Administrator, Bureau for Asia and the Near East, US Agency for International Development: Tunisia and Oman. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia: Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995. p. 33. In recognition of Tunisia’s growing ability to manage its own development challenges, USAID will close its Tunisia Mission by 9/30/1995. Over the last 35 years, USAID assistance was instrumental in helping Tunisia reduce its population growth rate, train young people for leadership roles in the government and the private sector, and strengthen its economy through infrastructure and agriculture projects. The USAID Mission in Oman will close by 9/30/1996. USAID assistance has resulted in better trained Omani professionals. USAID has helped to improve urban water supply systems in Oman’s two major cities, which include one third of the Sultanate’s total population. We have also improved family planning programs. [=]

36026. Wikan, Unni. Behind the Veil in Arabia: Women in Oman. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1982. With her husband Fredrik Barth, the author was in Sohar, Oman, a town on the Batinah coast for six months in 3-8/1974 and 12/1975-1/1976. Sohar had a population of 15000, and was capital of a governorate with 22000 people. The Batinah coast has a distinctive culture, and an ethnic mix of Arabs, Baluch, Ajam (Persians) and Zidgalis (they have a language similar to kutchi, appear to come from Sind, but consider themselves to be Arabs); lower status people include the Bedouin and outcaste Zatut (traditionally smiths and performers, peddlers, and performing polluting functions such as circumcision of boys and girls), as well as ex-slaves. Her study dealt only with Arabs, since she could speak that language.

Sohar remains a small scale town of merchants, but few ships dock in the primitive port. Sohar has become a backwater. Sohar was the site of the first modern hospital in the region. Its modest importance is based on being near the largest valley of the Batinah coast, Wadi Jizzi, albeit a hot and dry valley (there is no rain for eight months a year). Water supplies are produced by a network of falaj (pl., aflaj) or qanats. The coast as whole has 150000 people. Sohar is also halfway between Muscat and Abu Dhabi or Dubai, and Sohar is well connected to these other cities by well maintained roads. Physically, Sohar mainly is in a small belt half a kilometer wide between sea and palm groves, and extends 3-4 kilometers along the coast. There is a small CBD with post office, municipality building, customs house, cafes and two gas stations; few women enter this part of town.

Segregation of the sexes is a basis of Sohari social reality; women are conspicuous absent from public places. However, the degree of sexual segregation that survives on the Batinah coast is unusual in the region (perhaps surviving in Afghanistan and Saudi Arabia). Essentially all public space is the exclusive domain of men. The author derives her conception of the character of women and sexuality in Islamic society from Memissi’s Beyond the Veil (q.v.) and Nawal El-Saadawi’s Hidden Face of Eve (q.v.). The burqa, the face mask worn by women of the community, epitomizes female modesty and pride, and both conceals and enhances female beauty (unlike the more covering veils worn by Bedouin women).

The xaniths (“Transsexuals or Transvestities”) are conceptualized as a third gender, and are socially considered to be women (with gender assignment being a product not of anatomy but of behavior), although they are legally considered to be men. There are about 60 xaniths in Sohar who see themselves as women; many men were xaniths for a while and then became men again; xaniths appear in all ethnic groups and classes. Some xaniths are homosexuals; some are homosexual prostitutes (prostitution is seen as sinful but not unlawful), which is socially more acceptable than the possibility that a xanith can be bisexual; however, xaniths have easy social acceptability.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Qatar

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Qatar

38000. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 07: Respect For Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Traditional attitudes of respect for the sanctity of the home provide a great deal of protection against arbitrary intrusions for most citizens and residents of Qatar. A warrant must normally be obtained before police may search a residence or business, except in cases involving national security or emergencies. However, warrants are issued by police officials themselves, rather than by judicial authorities. There were no reports of unauthorized searches of homes in 1993. The police and security forces are believed to monitor the communications of suspected criminals, those considered to be security risks, and selected foreigner. With prior permission, which is usually granted, Qatari citizens may marry foreigners of any nationality and apply for residence permits for their spouses. [=]

38001. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There are no restrictions on internal travel, except among sensitive military and oil installations. Generally, women do not require permission from male guardians to travel. However, Qatari men may prevent female relatives from leaving the country by placing their names with immigration officers at ports of departure. Technically, Qatari women employed by the Government must obtain official permission to travel abroad when requesting leave, but it is not known to what extent this regulation is enforced. All Qatari citizens have the right to return. Foreigners are subject to immigration restrictions designed to control the size of the local labor pool. Foreigners who work in Qatar must have a sponsor (usually an employer) in order to enter the country. They must also obtain the sponsor’s permission to leave. The Government has no formal refugee policy. Those attempting to enter illegally including officials seeking to defect or to take refuge from nearby countries, are refused entry. Asylum seekers who can obtain local sponsorship or employment are allowed to enter and may remain as long as they keep their employment. Foreign women married to Qatari are granted resident permits and may apply for Qatari citizenship. However, they are expected to give up their foreign citizenship in exchange. [=]

38002. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 14: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The activities of Qatari women are closely restricted both by law and by traditional customs. For example, Qatari women are prohibited from applying for drivers’ licenses unless they have permission from a male guardian. This restriction does not apply to non-Qatari women. Qatar adheres to Sharia’a law in matters of inheritance and child custody. While Muslim wives have the right to inherit from their husbands, non-Muslim wives do not, unless a special legacy is arranged. In cases of divorce, it is rare for wives to obtain custody of children and impossible if the father is Muslim and the wife is not. Women may attend court proceedings but are generally represented by a male relative. Qatari women are largely relegated to the roles of mother and homemaker, but some women are now finding jobs in education, medicine, and the news media. However, the number of professional women is too small to indicate whether they are receiving equal pay for equal work. Increasingly, Qatari women are receiving government scholarships to pursue degrees at universities overseas. Although Qatari women are legally able to travel abroad alone, traditions and social pressures cause most to travel with male escorts. Violence against women, primarily foreign domestic workers, occurs in Qatar but is not believed to be widespread. However, some foreign domestics working in Qatar (especially those from South Asia and the Philippines) have suffered severe mistreatment. In keeping with Islamic law all forms of physical abuse are illegal, and the maximum penalty for rape is death. The police actively investigate reports of violence against women. In 1992 and 1993, the Government demonstrated an increased willingness to arrest and punish offenders, both Qatari and non-Qatari. However most domestic worker victims do not press charges for fear of losing their jobs and being deported. The law is applied unevenly, with Qatari facing lighter punishment than foreigners. [=]

38003. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Great importance is placed upon children in Qatari society. The Government provides most medical care for free to all residents, including children. Qatari children and the children of expatriates employed by the Government are allowed to enroll in public schools without charge. [=]

38004. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Qatar: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Minor children between the ages of 15-18 may be employed with the approval of their parents or guardians. However, younger non-Qatari children sometimes work in small family-owned businesses. Education is compulsory through age 15. While the laws governing the minimum age for employment of children are not strictly enforced, child labor, either Qatari or foreign, is rare. Very young children, usually of African or south Asian background, have been employed as riders in camel racing. While little information is available on wages and working conditions for these children, accidents involving serious injury or death have been known to occur. [=]

38005. DS. "Qatar: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Qatar, an Arab state on the Persian Gulf, is a monarchy without democratically elected institutions or political parties. It is ruled by an Amir from the Al Thani family. The 1970 Basic Law institutionalizes the customs and mores of the country’s conservative Islamic heritage. These include respect for the sanctity of private property, freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and punishment of transgressions against Islamic law. The Amir holds absolute power, the exercise of which influenced by consultation with leading citizens, rule by consensus, and the right of any citizen to appeal... because they fear the Government may cancel their residency permits.

Increasingly, women are receiving equal pay for equal work.

Censors renew the content of local newspapers, books, and other locally the roles of mother and homemaker, but some women are now finding to the privately owned press and the state-owned electronic media generally represented by a male relative. Women are largely relegated to sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. Joint Committee Print.

The activities of Qatari women are closely

The freedoms of both speech and press are significantly restricted.

The Government operates an efficient security apparatus. The civilian security apparatus, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is comprised of two sections: the police and the General Administration of Public Security and the Investigatory Police (Mubahhat) which is responsible for sections of residence cases. There have been reports of police officers in the Mubahhat physically abused suspects. There were no such reports in 1994. The armed forces have under their jurisdiction another enforcement organization, known as the Intelligence Service (Mukhabarat), which intercepts and arrests terrorists and monitors political dissidents. The State owns most basic industries and services, but the retail and construction industries are in private hands. Oil is the principal natural resource, but the counts extensive natural gas resources are expected to play an increasingly important role. The rapid development of the 1970s and early 1980s created an economy in which expatriate workers, mostly South Asian and Arab, outnumber Qatari by a ratio of 4 to 1. The Government tries to reduce this ratio by offering many government jobs only to citizens. There was no significant change in the human rights situation in 1994. Human rights remain closely restricted. He main problems continued to include the denial of the right of citizens to change their government, arbitrary detentions in security cases, and restrictions on worker rights and the freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and association. Women's rights are closely restricted, and non-Qatari workers face systematic discrimination.

Foreign cable television service was introduced in 1993, but censors review broadcasts for objectionable material. There is no legal provision for academic freedom. Most instructor at the University of Qatar exercise self-censorship.

DS. "Qatar: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print.

There are no restrictions on internal travel, except around sensitive military and oil installations. Generally, women do not require permission from male guardians to travel. However, men may prevent female relatives from leaving the country by placing their names with immigration officers at ports of departure. Technically, Qatari women employed by the Government must obtain official permission to travel abroad when requesting leave, but it is not known to what extent this regulation is enforced. Citizens critical of the Government may face restrictions in their right to travel abroad. All citizens have the right to return. Foreigners are subject to immigration restrictions designed to control the size of the labor pool. Foreign workers must have a sponsor, usually their employer, to enter or depart the country. The Government has no formal refugee policy. Those attempting to enter illegally, including persons seeking to defect from nearby countries, are refused entry. Asylum seekers who can obtain local sponsorship or employment are allowed to enter and may remain as long as they are employed. Foreign women married to Qatari citizens are granted residence permits and may apply for Qatari citizenship. However, they are expected to relinquish their foreign citizenship.

There is no pattern of societal abuse of children.

There were no reports of unauthorized searches of homes in 1994. The police and security forces are believed to monitor the communications of suspected criminals, those considered to be security risks, and suspected foreigners. With prior permission, which is usually granted, Qatari may marry foreigners of any nationality and apply for residence permits for their spouses.

The Government adheres to Shari’a law in matters of inheritance and child custody. While Muslim wives have the right to inherit from their husbands, non-Muslim wives do not, unless a special legacy is arranged. In cases of divorce, wives rarely obtain custody of children and never if the wife is not a Muslim. Women may attend court proceedings but are generally represented by a male relative. Women are largely relegated to the roles of mother and homemaker, but some women are now finding jobs in education, medicine, and the news media. However, the number of professional women is too small to determine whether they are receiving equal pay for equal work. Increasingly, women are receiving government scholarships to pursue degrees at universities overseas. Although women are legally able to travel abroad alone (see Section 2.d.), tradition and social pressures cause most to travel with male escorts. Violence against women, primarily foreign domestic workers, occurs but is not believed to be widespread. However, some foreign domestics, especially those from South Asia and the Philippines, have been severely mistreated by employers. In keeping with Islamic law, all forms of physical abuse are illegal. The maximum penalty for rape is death. The police actively investigate reports of violence against women. In the last few years, the Government has demonstrated an increased willingness to arrest and punish offenders, whether citizens or foreigners. Offenders who are citizens usually receive lighter punishments than foreigners. Abused domestic workers usually do not press charges for fear of losing their jobs. There is no independent women's rights organization, nor would the Government permit the establishment of one.

38011. DS. "Qatar: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Minors between the ages of 16-18 may be employed with the approval of their parents or guardians. However, younger non-Qatari children sometimes work in small family-owned businesses. Education is compulsory through age 16. While the laws governing the minimum age for employment of children are not strictly enforced, child labor, either Qatari or foreign, is rare. Very young children, usually of African or south Asian background, have been employed as riders in camel racing. While little information is available on wages and working conditions for these children, accidents involving serious injury or death have been known to occur. Minors may not work more than 6 hours a day or more than 36 hours a week. Employers must provide the Ministry of Labor with the names and occupations of their minor employees. The Ministry may prohibit the employment of minors in jobs which are judged as dangerous to the health, safety or morals of minors. Employers must also obtain permission from the Ministry of Education to hire a minor.
Saudi Arabia

40000. ------. "Enslaved in the Desert Kingdom", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), July 21, 1996, p. 7. A glaring indication of the parasitic nature of Saudi society is the fact that at least half of Saudi Arabia's total work force of about 8 million are "guest workers" from other countries. These contract workers come from Asia, Africa and other countries of the Middle East. They perform the most physically demanding and low-paying jobs, such as construction laborers and domestic workers. They are brutally exploited - and often treated by the Saudi employers as slaves. During and after the 1991 Gulf War, Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states kicked out hundreds of thousands of Palestinian, Yemeni and other workers who were accused of sympathizing with Iraq. Today it is estimated that more than 60% of the 7.6 million guest workers in the Gulf states are from Asia. According to one report, over one million Filipinos work as contract laborers in Saudi Arabia. These workers come from poor countries, and the recruitment agencies lure them with promises of high-paying jobs in oil-rich Saudi Arabia. But upon arrival in Saudi Arabia, many workers find that they are victims of "contract substitution." The Saudi employers present them with contracts that call for lower pay and worse working conditions than what was promised by the recruitment agency. The workers have little choice but to accept the new terms, since they have already paid fees to the recruitment agency, and they are not allowed to work for anyone else but the employer holding the contract. According to a report by Minnesota Lawyers International Human Rights Committee, "Many foreign laborers work extremely long hours. In particular, the domestic servants interviewed by the Minnesota Lawyers Committee all reported working seven days per week, sometimes 12-18 hours per day." Employers often delay payment of wages for weeks or months, and those who complain are quickly fired. Most women contract workers in Saudi Arabia work as maids. Because they work in the private confines of an employer's home, they are subject to the worst abuse - including beatings and rape. The Minnesota Lawyers Committee reports: "Domestic servants returning from Saudi Arabia routinely complain of being overworked, underpaid and undereat by their employers. They also complain of beatings and sexual harassment, adding that there is nowhere to turn to remedy their situation."

The Committee recounted the story of one worker: "One young woman worked as a domestic servant in Damman from 3/1990 until even performed Hajj! But the Saudi regime has repeatedly violated the sanctity of the Haramain and it cannot be put past them to have done so again in the case of Mrs. Tien as well. Megawati's other strong card is the fact that she is the daughter of the country's founding father, Sukarno. No hero himself but Sukarno's misdeeds have largely been forgotten over the 30-year period. Megawati rides on a wave of nostalgia, drawing upon people's sympathies. She would not be the first to do so. The region has several other examples where sympathy vote has gone to daughters/widows of slain or dead leaders. This trend started with Mrs. Bandranaike in Sri Lanka where she is now the president while her daughter rules the country as prime minister. In nearby Bangladesh, the widow of one slain leader has been replaced by the daughter of another. Even in the so-called largest democracy in the world - India - the Nehru name carried Mrs. Indira Gandhi and her son Rajiv to power for more than two decades. In neighboring Pakistan, Benazir Bhutto continues to enjoy the perks of office because of her family name. Megawati may be able to turn the tide in the huge archipelago. Suharto's sons are also there but they seem to be more interested in amassing fortunes. Indonesia may be entering a period of political turbulence now that Suharto's ill health has been confirmed by his trip to Germany. If Megawati's challenge becomes really serious and Suharto's health improves, the iron-fisted general may even knock her off. Nothing can be put past him. After all, he has the dubious distinction of killing a million people before. What is one more person, albeit a lady, added to this list?

40002. ------. "Saudi King Fahd's $5 Million Help Bosnian Children [Saudi aid to Bosnia in the last year is estimated at $150 million;
Women's Quarterly, n. 21, June 1, 1986. pp. 6-7. This article was written discouraged, more and more women's colleges have appeared within the “Education: Women Only!: Saudi Arabia”, in Connexions. Because travelling abroad for educational purposes is now foreigners must work within the ‘kafil’ or guarantor system, which almost things were happening too fast, eroding the traditional values of the press reports of crimes committed by foreigners are common; but husbands or brothers abroad to study. The conservative authorities felt many ways. Saudis both fear and victimize foreigners in their country; women and offering women matching scholarships if they followed their accept non-Saudi Arab women very easily, finding them threatening in ten years ago when the government was encouraging the emancipation of strong sense of superiority vis-a-vis other Arabs. Saudi women do no The total separation of the sexes is being felt much more now than time to develop sidelines in trade to supplement their income. Saudis have a level, however, there were still many openings for women professors.

new towns are remarkable; however, within blocks of skyscrapers there the field of education provides one of the major employment opportunities for non-Saudi  Arabs, Saudi urban development and women to find jobs in government schools--a critical problem because funds for family planning assistance. [\=} to convince the authorities that the profession is not against the principles of strategic importance to the United States. The United States has an interest in encouraging and supporting the growth, development, and stability of a democratic, Western-oriented Turkey.

USAID STRATEGIC PROGRAM OBJECTIVES:

(1) BROAD-BASED ECONOMIC GROWTH: The cash transfer provides balance-of-payments support as the Government of Turkey continues to implement a private-sector-oriented economic stabilization and reform program. The funds are used for the service of nonmilitary debt owed to the US Government or multilateral institutions. A small grant has been provided to the International Executive Service Corps to assist Turkish small businesses to establish joint ventures with US businesses.

(2) STABILIZING POPULATION GROWTH: Family planning assistance is provided to increase availability and effective use of modern methods of contraception, especially through access to more effective, long-lasting methods.

USAID PROGRAM RESULTS:

(1) BROAD-BASED ECONOMIC GROWTH: The cash transfer freed up Turkey's resources that would otherwise be programmed for US non-military and World Bank debt repayment.

(2) STABILIZING POPULATION GROWTH: In family planning, good progress has occurred in clinical service delivery systems, voluntary sterilization, training, and social marketing of contraceptives.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-MANAGED ACTIVITIES: None.

OTHER DONORS: In 1992, the top five major bilateral donors (Saudi Arabia, Germany, France, Italy, and Japan) provided a total of $391 million.

FY 1995 PROMOTING PEACE REQUEST: The Administration requests $100 million in Promoting Peace funds to continue the Turkish debt relief program, $5.5 million million in Sustainable Development funds for family planning assistance. =[

40003. -------. “US Executes The Weak, Says Amnesty International Leader” in the US death sentences are imposed disproportionately on the poor, minorities, the mentally ill, and those without adequate legal counsel with Haiti, Malaysia and Saudi Arabia, the US executed children, with 34 now on death row”, in Seattle Times, October 28, 1994. p. A15. [TXT]

Turkey is a close, valued ally in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Its location between Europe and the Middle East is of strategic importance to the United States. The United States has an interest in encouraging and supporting the growth, development, and stability of a democratic, Western-oriented Turkey.

Through the discovery of oil, American, British, and Dutch companies moved in and by the 1940s, Saudi Arabia was catapulted into the modern capitalist world. The royal family and Wahhabi religious revivalists tried to keep their country closed to decadent Western ways by limiting foreign penetration to the Eastern province, where the oil was located—an almost plausible concept since Saudi Arabia is a vast country with a population of barely a few million. But it has proved impossible for Saudi Arabia to jump from being the poorest country in the world to the richest without disrupting the old way of life.

Women in Saudi Arabia: I arrived in the Western Province of Saudi Arabia for the first time in 1975. I quickly found a Lebanese teacher of Arabic and began to carry out my research at the ARAMCO library. [ARAMCO is the Arab American Oil Company—the leading oil company in Saudi Arabia. With its great power and influence, it acts as a sort of state within a state.] I made friends with the local Saudi women, and thanks to them and their children, started to understand something about life in a small Saudi town where people were growing richer by the day—although their new wealth did not seem to change their social status.

Saudi women are allowed to work as they please provided they do not interact with men. In its attempt to emancipate women, Saudi Arabia does not wish to fall into the predicament of the West where women joining the workforce are placed in positions subservient to men and earn less salaries. In today’s Saudi Arabia, secretaries are all men, as is house help. Women are to be gradually integrated into the workforce as the society matures and becomes capable of digesting new values without forsaking the fundamental tenets of Islam.

Women are segregated from men in daily life. They are not allowed to sit in cafes or in some restaurants even when accompanied by their husbands. Dinner parties and weddings are segregated, and busses have a special section for women. In theory, women can set up any business they please if it is staffed by women and cater to women. They are financially independent and have their own banks. In selecting a job that may be considered non-traditional, women must be creative in order to convince the authorities that the profession is not against the principles of Islam.

Women Teaching Women: During my second stay in Saudi Arabia, which began in 1984 I found that it had become more difficult for women to find jobs in government schools—a critical problem because the field of education provides one of the major employment opportunities for women. Most of the positions were filled even though the requirements had become more stringent: a college education is now required where a high school diploma was once enough. At the college level, however, there were still many openings for women professors.

The total separation of the sexes is being felt much more now than ten years ago when the government was encouraging the emancipation of women and offering women matching scholarships if they followed their husbands or brothers abroad to study. The conservative authorities felt things were happening too fast, eroding the traditional values of the country. To counter this, the jurisdiction of women’s education was removed from the progressive Ministry of Education and placed under the Ministry of Religion.

Because travelling abroad for educational purposes is now discouraged, more and more women’s colleges have appeared within the country. Some of them are independent entities: others are part of the existing men's universities, where women's sections are wedged in as separate schools—usually a carefully guarded building which is for the most part self-contained. Due to a lack of female professors, men often lecture in women's classes, but a new law has made it impossible for non-Muslims to teach in women's colleges or in grade schools (although this law is occasionally waived, especially in the case of foreign language courses). Courses at educational colleges and in some of the liberal arts are taught in Arabic. However, the schools of medicine, architecture and some of the liberal arts carry out their instruction in English because there are few Arab professors and literature in these fields is more readily available in English. Many of the teachers are not native speakers of English and often speak it poorly. With the new restriction on hiring only Muslim women for the women's colleges, the problem is further compounded, detracting from the general level of education. All of this encourages those who have the means and who speak English to seek an opportunity to study abroad in defiance of government policy.

In spite of such difficulties on the higher levels, the education offered in girls' grade schools is of a higher quality than in the boys' schools, at least in the urban areas. According to the new more conservative laws about the separation of the sexes, boys, with the exception of preschoolers, have to be taught by male teachers. It is hard to find male teachers on the elementary level, Saudi or non-Saudi. Elementary school teachers with the proper credentials are usually women and tend to be the ones willing to open private schools and exercise their creativity. This is probably due to the fact that education is one of the few fields open to women, whereas men have more lucrative fields of employment open to them in engineering and industry.

The education of women is carried out according to clearly spelled-out regulations. Every school follows the government syllabus, teaching a given lesson on a given day. Secondary education in particular is based on religious texts. Private schools often supplement this government curriculum with additional information, all of which has to be approved by the authorities. Approval is usually granted, provided that the school is able to defend its philosophy in accordance with Muslim law.

Working at the Women's Institute: When I returned in 1984, I had a job in the city of Al-Khobar as the language program coordinator at the Women's Institute—an organization comparable in some ways to a community college. It was set up by the local wealthy families as a non-profit, charitable educational organization catering to women's needs.

Women's institutes have long existed as social as well as intellectual centers in Saudi Arabia. Often they were organized and financed by the tribal aristocracy or by the merchant class of a town. In the 1960s and 70s they gained a modern dimension, fostered by the more progressive elements in the government. Their immediate aim is adult education for women, not necessarily in a vocational sense, but rather as a means to find enough teachers to staff the language school, and the programs that were written were approved by the authorities. I left the Institute feeling I had accomplished most of my goals and hoping that they would continue to be carried through. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505.]

Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [s]

40007. Al-Hazzaa, Abdulaziz Mohammed. Scenario Projections For Women In Saudi Arabia: Their Changing Status, Educational And Employment Opportunities By The Year 2010. Two Volumes. (educational Opportunities, Women's Status), University Of Minnesota. Dissertation. 414pp. AAC 9324660. [Advisor: Hopkins, Charles R.] The aim of this study is to develop scenario projections about the future roles of Saudi Arabian women by the year 2010. First, the study attempts to anticipate future changes on the conservative cultural attitudes toward women. Second, the study tries to project their future educational programs. Third, the study projects possible future employment opportunities for women. Finally, the study investigates possible government policies and legislation which are needed to encourage greater participation of women in the labor force. Two methods were applied for this research. The first step was to conduct Ethnographic Futures Research (EFR) interviews with a panel of "experts." The aim of the interviews was to "elicit" three different scenarios regarding the future role of women: the "optimistic scenario," the "pessimistic scenario," and the "most probable scenario." The second step was the development of a questionnaire based on the information generated during the interview process. Summaries from the interviews were sorted out in the form of 107 future trends in the questionnaire. The questionnaire was administered to a panel of 172 experts and they were asked to indicate the desirability and probability of each trend. The findings were reported by creating three different scenarios: the "most probable scenario," the "even chance scenario," and the "least probable scenario." In terms of socioeconomic and cultural changes, the projections call for more changes than persistence. Employment projections call for greater participation of women, especially in the fields of education, health, social and cultural affairs. Although access to education and employment will increase the status of Saudi women outside the family, it will not offer much change in their status at the family level. Their position will be trapped with the struggle over preserving the authenticity of culture. In terms of educational future, even though women will become the majority in the Saudi schools and universities by the projection period, they will lack the educational opportunities in the fields of science and technology. Finally, the government is not expected to issue any radical legislation to improve the general position of women. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts]

40008. Altorki, Soraya; Altorki, Soraya [editor]; El-Sohi, Camilla Fawzi [editor]. Arab Women in the Field: Studying Your Own Society: Part 3: At Home in The Field. Modern Arab Studies. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 49-68. Although returning to her own society in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia made it possible to start work very quickly, there were other problems that required resolution. Being a woman of Saudi ethnic origin gave her immediate access to Saudi domestic life, an area of study quite remote for researchers of other origins. However, being an unmarried woman did impose constraints on the research she could undertake. Yet the very conduct of her research was troubling to her informants: why was she unmarried, why was she pursuing a career, and why was she living abroad?

In anthropology there is a curious correspondence between the Western folklore about the status of women in an Arab society and the findings in the fieldwork by foreign, non-Arab researchers: this is not the product of genuine research, but rather is a product of the isolation from and the separation from Arab society by their foreign observers. For many such observers, the purpose of their fieldwork is simply to reinforce their cultural prejudices and embroider their prejudices with colorful anecdotes about the Muslim natives. This inability to perceive the social realities in Arab culture results from the paradox that while women are denied access to much information in their societies, the central decision-making role women have in marriage selections (a role concealed by the form of women being an object in the marriage trade) is characterized by the very large informal role women play in Arab societies. There remains a role for both insiders and outsiders in the study of societies.

40009. Amnesty International. Press Release: Saudi Arabia: Women Detained For Driving Cars. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [1991] Forty-nine women who participated in a demonstration in protest at the country's traditional prohibition against women driving cars were detained in Riyadh on 11/6/1990. They were held for some hours, but were later released the same day. During the demonstration dozens of women drove cars in convoy along a main thoroughfare in Riyadh. Salih al-'Azzaz, a prominent writer and journalist, was also arrested on suspicion of being one of the organizers of the demonstration. He was reportedly taking photographs of the demonstration at the time of his arrest. In late December, he was reportedly still held incommunicado at the General Intelligence Headquarters in Riyadh, where he was believed to be at risk of torture. Amnesty International considers him a prisoner of conscience and has called for his immediate and unconditional release. A week after the demonstration the ban on female drivers was formally made law. The law states that anyone violating the prohibition for women to drive is liable to an unspecified deterrent punishment. [=]

40010. Banerjee, Chandra. "Desperately Poor, India Parents Send Children Off to Beg; Without Hope, Some Families Have Tried to Make a Living By Selling Their Children To Beggar Traffickers", in Seattle Times, January 22, 1997, p. A7. Impoverished Indians in West Bengal have been selling their children, in particular burned or deformed girls, to beggar traffickers. The beggars were then shipped to Saudi Arabia and other countries where they were worked for handouts. Disabled children are especially prized, since Muslims are very generous during pilgrimage and the children can collect substantial sums. This obscure practice has come to light with the deportation of 76 such Indian girls last week. One trafficker noted that a $3000 investment in children could be double in three months. Such investors included local government officials, schoolteachers and local politicians. [TEXT]

40011. Brooks, Geraldine. "Diplomat Status Shielded a Saudi Prince: Servants Alleged Abuse But a US Court Tossed Out Case", in Wall Street Journal, December 27, 1994. p. A12. [TEXT] Prince Saad, 76, living in Houston, is alleged to have paid slave wages to servants, even as he paid $500 a night for prostitutes. The female servants report being held as prisoners, being beaten, and being forced to eat table scraps. Finally, they succeeded in escaping, and after six months in hiding, finally brought suit against the Prince. Although not a diplomat, the Prince and his activities were deemed to have diplomatic immunity. Indeed, under an opinion supporting summary judgement, the court ruled that the enslavement of the domestic servants was appropriate to avoid visa problems. The Judge went on to argue that since the beatings of the servants took place in the Hotel Ritz, that there was no reason to override the presumed diplomatic immunity of the Prince.

Political Propaganda: None Reported. [-]

H.R.H. Prince Talal bin Abdul Aziz Al Saud
Activities: Registrant was responsible for public relations and media relations for the foreign principal in connection with his special mission on behalf of the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF), and his subsequent fundraising efforts as Special Envoy of UNICEF. Registrant's activities included arranging luncheons, dinners, tours of various children's hospitals and other events.

Finances: $270000 for the four month period ending 11/10/1982.
Political Propaganda: None Reported. [-]

UNICEF - special envoy Prince Talal bin Abdul Aziz al-Saud of Saudi Arabia (c/o Gray Co.)
Activities: Registrant distributed news articles prepared by the principal to US newspapers.

Finances: $5625 for the 12 month period ending 10/12/1982.
Political Propaganda: None Reported. [-]

40017. DPR. “General Assembly Resumes Consideration of the Question of Palestine”, in Division of Palestinian Rights, April 1989. On 4/19/1989, the General Assembly resumed consideration of the question of Palestine at the request of Saudi Arabia, acting on behalf of the Arab Group. The debate began with a statement by the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, the text of which reads as follows:

"Today the Assembly is meeting once again at the request of the members of the Group of Arab States to discuss the dangerous situation that prevails in the occupied Palestinian territories. That situation is deteriorating day by day because of the stepped-up repression being exercised by the Israeli forces against the Palestinians, who are resolutely pursuing their heroic resistance to the occupation, a resistance that is now entering into its sixteenth month. Notwithstanding the indignant protests voiced by the international community, Israel, the occupying Power, continues to ignore the resolutions with regard to the occupied Palestinian territories that the Security Council has adopted since the beginning of the intifadah, in particular resolutions 605 (1987), 607 (1988) and, 608 (1988) and the statement by the President of the Security Council of 8/26/1988. Moreover, Israel refuses to respect any of the resolutions adopted by the Security Council concerning Jerusalem, the unlawfulness of the Israeli settlements in the occupied territories and the deportation of Palestinian civilians, the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, the violation of human rights and the right to return of the people displaced in 1967. We note with regret that since the suspension of the forty-third session of the General Assembly - one that was characterized by many historic events, including, inter alia, the first anniversary of the intifadah, the proclamation of an independent Palestinian State, the peace initiative of His Excellency Chairman Yasser Arafat and the commitment by the vast majority of Member States to a peaceful and negotiated settlement - the repression in the occupied Palestinian territories has not lessened but has, on the contrary, become increasingly brutal, with a daily toll of dead and seriously wounded and massive destruction. I should like to submit to the Assembly a few details about the latest tragic events that have occurred in the occupied territories. These details have already been brought to the urgent attention of the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council in five letters addressed to them on behalf of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People since the beginning of 1989. On 1/5/1989 the Acting Chairman of the Committee indicated that 12/1988 was being referred to by members of the Israeli Parliament as "Black December. During the course of that month Israeli soldiers killed 31 Palestinians and wounded more than 400 others. In my letter of 25 1/1989 I pointed out that the Israeli Minister of Defence [Yitzhak Rabin] had announced "tough new measures" against Palestinians accused of throwing stones in the occupied territories. The measures included, inter alia, allowing a greater number of soldiers to fire on demonstrators and to seal or destroy homes. During the month of 1/1989 more than 30 Palestinians, mostly young people, were shot and killed. On 3 March I informed the Secretary-General that 22 Palestinians had been killed during the month of February, including 8 children under 15 years of age, and that more than 250 had been wounded. I also noted that unidentified explosive devices had killed or wounded a number of Palestinian children. On 3 April I pointed out that in the prior month repression by Israeli armed forces had caused the death of at least 23 Palestinians, including a four-year-old child, and that more than 350 Palestinians had been wounded. In my last letter, dated 14 April, I drew the attention of the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council to the escalation of violence by the Israeli military as well as Israeli settlers. In the course of a raid on 13 April against the village of Nahhalin, at least five Palestinians were killed and 25 others wounded by members of the Israeli border police, accompanied by settlers. That incident has aroused the serious concern of the international community and has led to statements of protest by the United Nation- Secretary-General, the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International. The New York Time of 4/18/1989 - yesterday - reported that six more Palestinian had been killed in a single day in the occupied territories. Those most recent victims bring to at least 560 the number of Palestinians killed by the Israeli army since the beginning of the intifadah. On behalf of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, I wish to voice a vigorous protest against the escalation of blind oppression that Israel, the occupying Power, is inflicting upon the Palestinian in the occupied territories and, in particular, against the increasingly frequent participation of armed Israeli settlers in such repression. The Committee believes that the international community has a duty to redouble its efforts to guarantee the protection of the Palestinians subject to the occupation and to bring about Israel’s withdrawal from occupied Palestinian territories in accordance With the provisions of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 8/12/1949 and the relevant resolutions of the United Nations. (A/45/PV.92). [-]

40018. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 01: Introduction”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, February 1984. Saudi Arabia is a monarchy without democratically elected institutions or political parties. It is ruled by descendants of its founder, Ring Abdulaziz Al Saud, known in the West as Ibn Saud, who unified the country in the early part of the 20th century. The concept of separation of religion and state is foreign to Saudi society and governance. The legitimacy of the royal regime depends on a large degree on its perceived adherence to the precepts of a puritanically conservative form of Islam. There is no written constitution. The legal system is based on Islamic religious law. Traditional practice calls for consensus in government, internal social cohesion respect for private property, and private economic enterprise. Since the death of King Abdulaziz, the King and Crown Prince have been chosen from among his sons who themselves have had preponderant influence in the choice. Legislative changes announced in 3/1992 however, granted the King the exclusive power to name the Crown Prince. They also called for establishment of an appointed Consultative Council (Majlis Ashhura) and for similar provincial assemblies. A 60-member Council has been formed and was formally inaugurated on December 29. Political parties are not permitted in Saudi Arabia. Political expression that is unfavorable to the regime is forbidden. There are no elected assemblies. Police and border forces under the Interior Ministry are responsible for internal security. Security personnel committed human rights abuses during the year. Massive oil revenues have transformed Saudi Arabia's centuries-old pastoral, agricultural, and commercial economy. Agriculture accounted for about 5% of the GDP. Domestic transformation has been marked by rapid urbanization, large-scale development of economic and social infrastructure, the emergence of a welfare state and technocratic middle class, and the importation of millions of foreign worker for skilled and menial labor. It has also been marked by widespread expenditure of public funds in ways that improved the quality of life for most Saudis but have also enriched members of the royal family and their associates. With some important exceptions, mainly the hydrocarbon sector which accounted for one-third of the GNP and three-fourths of the Government budget, the economy remains largely in private hands. Human rights continued to be pervasively abused. Principal human rights problems include torture and other abuse of prisoners and incommunicado detention; prohibitions on or severe restrictions on the freedoms of speech and press, peaceful assembly and association and religion; the denial of the right of citizens to change their government; and systematic discrimination against women and other religious minorities and suppression of workers' rights. The Mutawwa'in, Saudi Arabia’s official proctors of proper moral behavior, and other religious zealots acting as vigilantes continued to harass and abuse Saudis and foreigners of both sexes. [\textsuperscript{[\textvisiblespace]}]

40019. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 06: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The judicial system is based on Islamic jurisprudence (the Shari'a). Regular Shari'a courts exercise jurisdiction over common criminal cases and civil suits regarding marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance. In Saudi courts, the defendant appears before a judge who determines guilt or innocence in accordance with Shari'a standards and, if warranted, imposes sentence. Although Saudi law requires that trials be public, almost all trials are closed and are held without legal counsel present. The advice of lawyers is available before trial, and lawyers may act as court interpreters for those unfamiliar with Arabic. However, trials occur in which the defendant does not understand Arabic and does not have a translator. Sentencing is not uniform and may vary according to the nationality of the defendant. Iraqi refugees and third-country nationals regularly receive longer sentences for the same offense than do Saudi citizens. A sentence may be changed at any stage of review. Appeals against judges' decisions are automatically reviewed by the Justice Ministry or, in more serious cases, by the Court of Cassation and the Supreme Judicial Council to ensure that court procedures were correct and that judges applied appropriate legal principle and punishments. Cases involving capital punishment must also be reviewed by the King. The Shi'a community is permitted to adjudicate exclusively non-criminal intra-Shi'a disputes according to their own legal tradition. Although the independence of the judiciary is prescribed by law, jurists are nevertheless aware of, and reportedly have on occasion acceded to, the power and influence of royal family members and their associates. At the provincial level, governors have reportedly threatened, and even detained, judges with whom they disagreed. In one reported case, for example, a domestic servant from another country was raped repeatedly by her employer, who videotaped and photographed the act. Despite the graphic evidence, the employer, a prominent doctor, was not prosecuted because of his connections with government officials. The servant was charged with prostitution and deported. Members of the royal family and of other powerful families are not subject to the same legal constraints as other Saudis. Judges do not for example, have the power to issue a warrant summoning any member of the royal family. The Justice Ministry is responsible for the appointment, transfer, and promotion of judges. Judges may be disciplined or removed only by the Supreme Judicial Council, a Body of Senior Jurists, or by royal decree. The military justice system has jurisdiction over uniformed personnel and civilian government employees charged with violations of military law. Court-martial decisions are reviewed by the Ministry of Defense & Aviation and the King. Under Shari'a law as applied in Saudi Arabia, crimes directed against Muslims receive harsher penalties than those against non-Muslims. In the case of accidental death, the amount of indemnity or blood money paid to relatives varies with the religion and sex of the victim. The number of political prisoners being held at year's end was unknown owing to the Government's policy of not providing data or responding to inquiries about such persons, conducting closed trials, and detaining persons incommunicado for long periods while under investigation. [\textsuperscript{[\textvisiblespace]}]

40020. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 07: Respect For Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The sanctity of family life and the inviolability of the home are among the most fundamental of Islamic precepts and legislative changes announced in 3/1992 included provisions for the Government to maintain the sanctity of the home from unlawful intrusions. However, Saudi religious police (Mutawwa'in) continued to enter homes to search for evidence of un-Islamic behavior and to harass and abuse perceived transgressors. Saudi police must generally demonstrate reasonable cause and obtain permission from the provincial Governor before searching a private home, but warrants are not required. Saudi customs officials routinely open mail coming into the Kingdom to look for forbidden items, including material deemed pornographic and non-Muslim religious material. Informants are reliable reported to be regularly used for internal security matters. Most social and Islamic religious norms and strictures affecting personal life are matters of law and are enforced by the Government. Saudi women may not marry non-Saudis without government permission, which is rarely given. According to Islamic strictures, Saudi women are prohibited from marrying any non-Muslim, while Saudi men may marry Christians and Jews. Saudi men must obtain approval to marry women originally from countries other than the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC). During Ramadan, the Islamic month of fasting and abstinence, the prohibition against public eating, drinking, or smoking during daylight hours is enforced on Muslims and non-Muslims alike. Prohibitions against alcohol and pork products, and material deemed pornographic are strictly enforced and apply as well to foreign residents. Both Saudis and foreigners were targets of harassment by members of the Mutawwa'in or by religious zealots acting as vigilantes. The Mutawwa'in sought to enforce their power and influence of royal family members and their associates. At the provincial level, governors have reportedly threatened, and even detained, judges with whom they disagreed. In one reported case, for example, a domestic servant from another country was raped repeatedly by her employer, who videotaped and photographed the act. Despite the graphic evidence, the employer, a prominent doctor, was not prosecuted because of his connections with government officials. The servant was charged with prostitution and deported. Members of the royal family and of other powerful families are not subject to the same legal constraints as other Saudis. Judges do not for example, have the power to issue a warrant summoning any member of the royal family. The Justice Ministry is responsible for the appointment, transfer, and promotion of judges. Judges may be disciplined or removed only by the Supreme Judicial Council, a Body of Senior Jurists, or by royal decree. The military justice system has jurisdiction over uniformed personnel and civilian government employees charged with violations of military law. Court-martial decisions are reviewed by the Ministry of Defense & Aviation and the King. Under Shari'a law as applied in Saudi Arabia, crimes directed against Muslims receive harsher penalties than those against non-Muslims. In the case of accidental death, the amount of indemnity or blood money paid to relatives varies with the religion and sex of the victim. The number of political prisoners being held at year's end was unknown owing to the Government's policy of not providing data or responding to inquiries about such persons, conducting closed trials, and detaining persons incommunicado for long periods while under investigation. [\textsuperscript{[\textvisiblespace]}]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Saudi Arabia

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
sensitive subjects, such as crime or terrorism, is often published only members of the audience. US and British officials formally protested the Mutawwa'in action by claiming there was credible evidence of transgressions of Saudi law involving alcohol or drugs. Government reforms announced in July created a Ministry of Islamic Affairs; the Mutawwa'in have been incorporated into this Ministry and will be under its supervision. [=]

40021. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 08: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (a) Freedom of Speech and Press", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Freedom of speech and press is severely limited by law (Article 39 of the Basic Law) and in practice. Criticism of Islam, the ruling family, or the Government is not allowed. The potential presence of informers renders criticism of the regime rare. In May a group of six Saudis, including some signers of earlier petitions, announced the formation of the Committee for the Defense of Legitimate Rights (CDLR). Although the organizers described their group as a human rights organization, they also expressed concern that the Government was not adhering closely enough to Islamic precepts. When the CDLR criticized the Government in the international press, several of its members, including the son of one of the founding members, Mohamed Bin Abdullah Al-Masari, were detained. The Government dismissed all six of the CDLR founders from their government jobs. The CDLR was denounced by the Senior Council of Ulema for overstepping the bounds of legitimate Islamic behavior and expression. One of the six signers withdrew from the Committee. In August a group of 38 professors was detained for a period of several weeks because of their public efforts to obtain the release of Al-Masari. He was released from custody in November. Since 1991 criticism of media tapes and petitions signed by dozens of religious figures calling for closer government adherence to Islam have been circulated widely through informal channels. King Fahd, in a public speech in 12/1992 stressed the right of all Saudis to approach senior officials directly to offer advice but criticized the authors of the petitions for what he called their improper use of the pulpit. The press is privately owned. It is effectively controlled by a 1982 media policy statement and a 1965 national security law which expressly prohibits the dissemination of public criticism of the Government in any print or broadcast medium. The media policy statement enjoins the press to uphold Islam, oppose atheism, promote Arab interests, and preserve the cultural heritage of Saudi Arabia. Editors in chief are appointed with the explicit approval of the Ministry of Information, and the Government has the power to have them removed. Newspapers receive guidelines issued by the Information Ministry on governmentpositions on sensitive issues, and the government-owned Saudi Press Agency (SPA) expresses the official viewpoint on such issues. In 1993 a newspaper editor was fired and later reinstated for an editorial lauding the King's position on opposing Islamic extremism. The editorial was said to be too strident in its criticism of Islamic extremism. The editor in chief of another newspaper was transferred to another position, and one of his editors was deported because of a comic strip to which religious authorities objected. Domestic news concerning sensitive subjects, such as crime or terrorism, is often published only after the perpetrators have been arrested, convicted, and sentenced. Most foreign news that does not directly concern Saudi Arabia is presented objectively. Foreign press access to Saudi Arabia is tightly restricted. Saudi television and radio are state owned and operated. Foreign programs and songs are heavily censored, with references to politics, religions other than Islam pork or pigs, alcohol or sexual innuendo removed. In 1993 a television producer was fired for allowing a scene to be shown on Saudi television in which a man kissed a woman on the cheek.

Although foreign news is generally presented on television and radio in an objective manner, news about subjects affecting Saudi Arabia is tightly controlled, and conflicting viewpoints are usually not offered. There are an estimated 100000-200000 private satellite dishes operating in the Kingdom which receive foreign broadcast. Despite widespread installation of satellite dishes, the status of these devices remains ambiguous. Importation and sale of the dishes were resumed after their prohibition in the summer of 1992 at the behest of religious leaders who objected to television programming available on satellite channels. Mutawwa'in were reported to have damaged satellite dishes on private residencies with air rifles and sling shots to prevent their use. Foreign publications circulate but may be censored for materials deemed immoral or critical of Saudi policies and actions. Entire publications are sometimes withheld from distribution. In 1993 the issues of the International Herald Tribune containing articles from US newspapers critical of the Saudi Government's economic policies as well as issues of another newspaper that discussed the articles, were not distributed in Saudi Arabia. Academic freedom is also constrained; for example, the study of evolution, Freud, Marx, and Western philosophy is proscribed. Some professors believe that classroom comments that could be taken as antiregime will be reported to the authorities. There continues to be an injunction against the study of music in educational institutions through the university level. There are, however, some private organizations for the study of Western classical music. Artistic activities in schools and universities and in society in general continue to be luted and subjected to arbitrary closure. There are a few private art galleries, principally in Jeddah and Dhahran. Abstract and representational artists as well as photographers in general are allowed to work. However, in 1993 an exhibit of photographs prepared by a Saudi woman and sponsored by the French Embassy was closed hours before the opening, allegedly because the invitation card depicted the image of a woman, although she was completely veiled. Cinemas and public musical or theatrical performances, other than those that are strictly folklore, are prohibited. [=]

40022. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 09: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (b) Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. These rights are strictly limited. The Government prohibits public demonstrations as a means of political expression or presenting grievances. Tribal, familiar, and economic interest groups informally aggregate public opinion, which their leaders express to high officials. Political parties are prohibited, but nonpolitical clubs and professional groups may be organized with the permission of the authorities. The few existing professional groups are permitted to maintain contacts with their recognized international counterparts. Public meetings are segregated by sex. Foreign members of groups seeking to hold unsegregated meetings risk arrest, incarceration, and deportation unless these meetings are sponsored by diplomatic missions. A children's winter concert at the Yantai International School attended by 200 people was raided by four Mutawwa'in and two policemen. The intruders grabbed children performing in the concert and pulled them from the stage. The Mutawwa'in tried to confiscate cameras and video equipment from members of the audience. US and British officials formally protested the matter with senior Saudi officials, who reported that the incident was being Riven high-level attention and that an official investigation was being conducted. The officials gave assurances that the matter was taken very seriously by the Government and that such an incident would not recur. On December 30, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in a diplomatic note stated that the Government neither approves nor agrees with this behavior by members of the (Mutawwa’in) organization and that the necessary measures have been taken to ensure that what they have done will not be repeated in the future. [–]

40023. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 12: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Citizens cannot change their government peacefully. There are no formal democratic institutions, and only a few Saudi citizens have a voice in the choice of leaders or in changing the political system. The King rules the country in matters civil and religious, within limits established by religious law, tradition, and the need to maintain consensus among the ruling family and religious leaders. The King's legitimacy is based upon his adherence to the tenets of Islam, his descent, his selection by consensus of the royal family, his ability to govern, and his perceived concern for the welfare of the nation. The King is also the Prime Minister, and the Crown Prince serves as deputy Prime Minister. The King appoints all other ministers, who in turn appoint subordinate officials with Cabinet concurrence. Ministers may retire only with the King's permission. In August the King announced that Cabinet ministers would have 4-year terms, with the possibility of reappointment. In 1992 King Fahd announced the formation of a Consultative Council, or Majlis Ash-Shura, which is to be an advisory body to the King and the Council of Ministers. In August the King announced a constitution for the Majlis Ash-Shura and the names of the 60 Majlis Ash-Shura members. The Majlis was formally inaugurated on December 29. In September the King announced rules and regulations for the provincial assemblies and their memberships. There are no regularly elected officials in Saudi Arabia. Political parties are not permitted, but there are no publicly organized opposition groups. Traditionally, public opinion has been expressed through client-patron relationships and affinity groups such as tribes, families, and professional hierarchies. The open-door audience (majlis) remains the primary forum for expression of opinion or grievance. Any male citizen or male foreign national may attend these sessions held by the King princes, or important national and local officials. Occasionally, women without male relatives present petitions in some majlis sessions. Since the assassination of King Faisal in 1976, Saudi kings have reduced the frequency of their personal contacts with the public. Access to King Fahd, to whom decisions even on some apparently minor matters are referred, is considered by ordinary Saudis to be quite difficult, in part due to strict security measures. Typical topics raised in a majlis are complaints about bureaucratic delay or insensitivity, requests for redress or assistance, and criticism of particular acts of government affecting personal or family welfare. Broader “political concerns”—Saudi social, economic, or foreign policy—are raised only occasionally. As governmental functions have become increasingly complex, time consuming, and centralized in Riyadh direct public access to senior officials has become more difficult. Either the King or the Crown Prince meets with Sunni religious officials at least once a week. This institutionalized but indirect means of ascertaining public opinion through consultation falls short of internationally accepted democratic practice. Participation by women in the process is severely restricted, although there are reports that women may seek redress through female members of the royal family. [–] from the vast majority of occupations. Free, but segregated, education through the university level is available to Saudi women. Women constitute 55% of all university graduates but are excluded from studying certain subjects such as engineering, journalism, and architecture. Saudi men are able to study overseas; Saudi women generally can do so only if accompanied by a spouse or an immediate male relative. Despite the high percentage of university graduates, women make up only 5% of the workforce. Most employment opportunities are in the field of education, with some available in health care and a relative few in business, philanthropy, banking, retail sales, and the media. Women wishing to enter nontraditional fields are subject to arbitrary discrimination. In August the Ministry of Commerce announced that it had stopped issuing licenses to women and students who wished to undertake maintenance, contracting or janitorial services. When asked for clarification, a Ministry official said the ban would be temporary. [*=]

40025. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government provides all Saudi children with free education and medical care. Reports of societal abuse directed against children are rare except for the practice of female circumcision which is thought to persist among African nationals, especially in the southwestern Tihama region. [*=]

40026. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 21: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (c) Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Forced labor has been prohibited since 1962 by a royal decree that abolished slavery, and Saudi ratification of ILO Conventions 29 and 105 have the force of law. Nonetheless, Saudi Arabia continues to perpetuate the master-slave relationship remain; a great number of former slaves chose to remain in the princely households where many now enjoy a quasi-familial status as household supernumeraries. Additionally, since employers generally exercise control over the movements of foreign employees, situations that could be described as forced labor can occur, especially in remote areas where workers are unable to leave their place of employment. Diplomats desiring to visit work sites to check on the welfare and conditions of citizens of their countries were sometimes denied access. There also have been reports that female domestic workers sometimes have been prevented from leaving the homes of their employers and forced to work 12-16 hours a day, 7 days a week. Maids who run away from their employers are often returned to the employers by Saudi authorities against the maids wishes. In addition, there have been reports of workers whose employers refused to pay several months or even years of accumulated salary or other promised benefits. Domestic workers, i.e., maids and family drivers, are not covered under Saudi labor law. However, nondomestic workers have recourse to the labor courts. Foreign workers have reported, however, considerable difficulty in attempting to enforce their rights under Saudi law. [\=]

40027. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There is no minimum age for workers employed in family-operated businesses or in other situations that are construed as extensions of the household, e.g, farmers, herdsmen, and domestic servants, since they are not covered by Saudi Arabia's labor regulations. In other cases the labor regulations provide for a minimum age of 13, which may be waived by the Labor Ministry with the consent of the juvenile's guardian. Children aged 13-18 are prohibited from working more than 6 hours per day. Children under age 18 and women may not be employed in hazardous or harmful conditions. The Ministry of Labor has employed power-operated machinery. While there is no formal government entity charged with enforcing the minimum age for employment of children, the Justice Ministry has jurisdiction and has acted as plaintiff in the few cases that have arisen against alleged violators. [\=]
Government's legitimacy is based on its adherence to the Shari'a and upon the consent of the governed, who are obliged to obey the ruler as long as he continues to govern according to Islamic law. [40029. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (f) Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995.]

Saudi Arabia is a strictly religious state, with the government enforcing religious law and morality. Women are subjected to strict social segregation, with women-only areas and segregated events. While there are some health clubs for women in the United States, health clubs for Saudi women are closed to non-Muslims, and women's rights organizations have been closed recently.

The Mutawwa'in, a religious police force, has been involved in the closure of commercial establishments during the daily prayer measures. They have arrested and deported women for expressing opinions or gathering in segregated areas. The authorities monitor any large gatherings, and public access to senior officials has become more complex, time-consuming, and centralized.

The Government provides all children with free education and medical care. Children are subject to strict social segregation. Boys and girls are segregated in social situations at age 7. Boys are segregated by sex in schools starting at age 7. Girls are usually expressed through client-patron relationships and by affinity groups. Women seek redress through female members of the royal family. Governmental functions have become more complex, time-consuming, and centralized.

40031. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Citizens do not have the right to change their government. There are no formal democratic institutions, and only a few citizens have a voice in the choice of leaders or in changing the political system. The King rules in matters of civil and religious, within certain limitations established by religious law, tradition, and the need to maintain consensus among the ruling family and religious leaders.

The King is also the Prime Minister, and the Crown Prince serves as first deputy Prime Minister. The King appoints all other ministers, who in turn appoint subordinate officials with Cabinet concurrence. In 1993 the King appointed 60 members to a Consultative Council, or Majlis Ash-Shura.

Women's rights in Saudi Arabia are severely limited. Women are prohibited from marrying non-Muslims, and many women have been closed to non-Muslims. Women's rights organizations have been closed recently. The authorities monitor any large gatherings featuring a fashion show and dancing as not an appropriate activity for women. [40032. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995.]

Citizens may not marry non-Saudis without government permission. Although women are prohibited from marrying non-Muslims, and women have the right to marry Christians and Jews. Men must obtain approval from the Ministry of Interior to marry women from countries outside the six states of the Gulf Cooperation Council. Both citizens and foreigners were targets of harassment by members of the Mutawa'ain—and even by religious vigilantes acting independently of the Mutawa'ain.

The Government has not condemned the actions of religious vigilantes or sought to disband such groups. The Mutawa'ain continued to press for enforcement of their strict standards of social behavior, including the closure of commercial establishments during the daily prayer observances, appropriate dress in public, and avoidance of video tape rental shops. They harassed Saudi and foreign women for failure to observe strict dress codes, and for being in the company of males who are not their close relatives. They also harassed non-Muslims attempting to conduct religious services (see Section 2.c.). [40033. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995.]

Women in Saudi Arabia are subjected to strict social segregation, with women-only areas and segregated events. Women's rights organizations have been closed recently. The authorities monitor any large gatherings, and public access to senior officials has become more complex, time-consuming, and centralized.

Citizens may not marry non-Saudis without government permission. Although women are prohibited from marrying non-Muslims, and women have the right to marry Christians and Jews. Men must obtain approval from the Ministry of Interior to marry women from countries outside the six states of the Gulf Cooperation Council. Both citizens and foreigners were targets of harassment by members of the Mutawa'ain—and even by religious vigilantes acting independently of the Mutawa'ain.

The Government has not condemned the actions of religious vigilantes or sought to disband such groups. The Mutawa'ain continued to press for enforcement of their strict standards of social behavior, including the closure of commercial establishments during the daily prayer observances, appropriate dress in public, and avoidance of video tape rental shops. They harassed Saudi and foreign women for failure to observe strict dress codes, and for being in the company of males who are not their close relatives. They also harassed non-Muslims attempting to conduct religious services (see Section 2.c.).
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Saudi Arabia
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. By religious law and social custom, women have few political and social rights, and are not treated as equal members of society. Women, including foreigners, may not legally drive motor vehicles or ride bicycles and are restricted in their use of public facilities when men are present. Women must enter city buses by separate rear entrances and sit in specially designated sections. Women risk arrest by the Mutawwa’in for riding alone in a vehicle driven by a male who is not an employee or a close male relative. By law and custom, women may not undertake domestic or foreign travel alone (see Section 2.d.). In public women are required to wear the abaya, a black garment covering the entire body, including the head and face. The Mutawwa’in generally expect women from Arab countries, Asia, and Africa to comply more fully with Saudi customs of dress than Western women; nonetheless, in recent years they have increased pressure on Western women to wear the abaya and cover their hair. Women are also subject to discrimination in Islamic law which stipulates that daughter receive half the inheritance awarded to their brothers—reflecting the fact that men have financial obligations to their mothers and sisters. In a Shari’a court, the testimony of one man equals that of two women. Although Islamic law permits polygyny, it is becoming less common. Islamic law limits a husband to four wives, provided that he treats each wife equally. In practice such equality is left to the discretion of the husband. Women must demonstrate legally specified grounds for divorce, but men may divorce without giving cause. If divorced or widowed, a woman normally may keep her children until they attain the age of 7. Children over 7 are awarded to the divorced husband. Divorced women who are foreigners are often prevented by their former husbands from visiting their children after divorce.

Women have access to free, but segregated, education through the university level. They constitute 56% of all university graduates—but are excluded from studying such subjects as engineering, journalism, and architecture. Men are able to study overseas; women may do so if accompanied by a spouse or an immediate male relative. Women make up only 6% of the workforce. Most employment opportunities for women are in education and health care, with lesser opportunity in business philanthropy, banking, retail sales, and the media. Women wishing to enter nontraditional fields are subject to arbitrary discrimination. Women may not accept jobs in rural areas if they are required to live apart from their families. All workplaces where women are present are supposed to be screened by sex. Contact with male supervisors or clients is allowed only by telephone or facsimile machine. Hospital workers report that many women are admitted for treatment of injuries that apparently result from spousal violence. ‘Islamic advice’ columns in the press sometimes recommend the strict disciplining of women, an expression understood to encompass some degree of physical force as part of a proper marriage.

There were credible reports that some Western women married to Saudis, and their children, have suffered physical abuse from the spouse or father. Appropriate embassy officials must seek the assistance of government officials to intervene in such cases. The Government does not keep statistics on spousal or other forms of violence against women. Embassies receive many reports that employers abuse foreign women working as domestic servants. In general, the Government considers such cases as family matters and does not intervene unless charges of abuse are brought to its attention. It is almost impossible for foreign women to obtain redress in the courts due to the court’s strict evidentiary rules and the women’s own fears of reprisals. Few employers have been punished for such abuses. There are no private support groups or religious associations to which these women could turn for assistance. [=]

40034. DS. “Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (c) Prohibition of Force or Compulsory Labor”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Forced labor has been prohibited since 1962 by the royal decree that abolished slavery. Ratification of the International Labor Organization’s (ILO) Conventions 29 and 105, which prohibit forced labor, has the force of law. However, employers have significant control over the movements of foreign employees, giving rise to situations that might involve forced labor—especially in remote areas where workers are unable to leave their place of work. Sometimes sponsors prefer foreign workers from obtaining exit visas to pressure them to sign a new work contract. In another pressure tactic, sponsors may refuse to provide foreign workers with a “letter of no objection” which would allow them to be employed by another sponsor. The labor laws do not protect domestic servants. There were credible reports that female domestic servants were sometimes forced to work 12-16 hours a day, 7 days a week. There were numerous confirmed reports of runway maids. The authorities often returned runaway maids to their employers against the maids’ wish. There have been many reports of workers whose employers have refused to pay several months, or even years, of accumulated salary or other promised bene its. Nondomestic workers with such grievances have the right to complain before the labor courts, but few do so because of fear of deportation. The Government abets the exploitation of foreign workers because the system for enforcing work contracts is weak and generally favors Saudi employers. [=]

40035. DS. “Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The minimum age for employment is 13 years, which may be waived by the Ministry of Labor with the consent of the juvenile’s guardian. There is no minimum age for workers employed in family-operated businesses or in other situations that are construed as extensions of the household, e.g., farmers, herdsman, and domestic servants. Workers in such fields are not pected by labor regulations. There were reports that children aged 5-12 years are used a jockeys in camel racing. Children under age 18 and women may not be employed in hazardous or harmful industries, such as mines or industries employing power-operated machinery. While there is no formal government entity charged with enforcing the minimum age for employment of children, the Ministry of Justice has jurisdiction and has acted as plaintiff in the few cases that have arisen against alleged violators. [=]

40036. Dewaidi, Ali Mohammed Jameel. Selected Factors Influencing Saudi Arabian Student Teachers’ Attitude Toward Classroom Educational Media And Technology Utilization. Boston University. Dissertation. 306pp. AAC 9308137. [Advisor: Kelley, Gaylen B.] Problem. The purpose of this study was to investigate the interrelationship between selected demographic and attitudinal factors which may influence the utilization of educational media and technology (EM&T). The study focused on (1) gender difference in frequency of utilization, (2) gender difference in attitude, (3) relationship between student teachers attitude and the frequency of utilization, (4) correlation between student teachers attitude and the perception with regard to academic field of specialization, availability of media, ability to access a media specialist, administrative and peer support and classroom physical set up and arrangement. Procedure. A questionnaire was designed, tested and used to collect data from 282 student teachers. The study used the methodology of a descriptive survey approach. Findings. (1) There was no significant gender difference in frequency of EM&T utilization. (2) There was no significant gender difference in attitude toward EM&T. (3) Significant correlation was found between student teachers attitude toward the utilization of EM&T and the frequency of their utilization of EM&T. (4) No significant correlation was found between student teachers attitude toward the utilization of EM&T with respect to media availability, ability to access a media specialist, peer support and encouragement, and classroom physical set up and arrangement. (5) Significance correlation was found between student teachers attitude toward the utilization of EM&T and their perception with respect to their academic field of specialization and administration support and encouragement. Conclusion. The findings of this study suggest that there is an appreciation of EM&T benefits and advantages. Student teachers could not utilize EM&T due to obstacles. Steps should be taken to lead to greater EM&T use. (6) EM&T in schools, factories and service industries also played a progressive role in the society. It encouraged the mobilization of women workers movement to become another inspiration to the African and all who still suffer identified. They are now able to contribute wholly on an equal basis to the world’s struggle for freedom.

40037. Eritreans for Liberation in North America. “Eritrean Women in the Struggle for National Independence”, in Eritrea Liberation (Eritreans For Liberation in North America), March-April 1976. On the occasion of International Women’s Day we hail all the oppressed women struggling for liberation. In the spirit of the militant working women of the Paris Commune, the women who fought for the victory of the Great October Socialist Revolution and the Chinese Revolution, women all over the world have risen up to emancipate themselves from super exploitation and to contribute to the liberation of all the laboring masses. We hail the Vietnamese and Cambodian women who smashed the US imperialists and their lackeys under the leadership of NLF and the NUFC. The victory of the Mozambican, Guinea Bissau and Angolan women in liberating themselves and their nation from the yoke of Portuguese colonialism has become another inspiration to the African women and all who still suffer under imperialist-feudalist domination and exploitation. Women have always been an important force in revolutionary struggles of all oppressed people in the history of mankind, and today, more conscious of their role, women are getting organized and militantly joining the forces of national liberation and proletarian revolution. In Palestine, Oman, Zimbabwe, Latin America and other parts, women are taking an active and important role in the ranks of revolutionaries waging armed struggle against imperialism, colonialism, Zionism and their lackeys. All over the world women are organizing themselves as a section of the exploited and oppressed masses and waging struggles for their emancipation and the liberation of all mankind. As Lenin pointed out “working women, the most oppressed among the oppressed, never have a cold stand aside from the broad path of the liberation movement.” " and the Eritrean women are no exception to this worldwide truth. Eritrean women, oppressed and exploited as workers and peasants as well as women, by colonialism, feudalism, imperialism and Zionism for many decades have a long and rich history of resistance. To illustrate this there is a traditional saying in Eritrea “for the land the woman fights.” As early as the 1800’s when the Italian colonialists invaded Eritrea, peasant women fought side by side with the men, to defend their country. Women fought against Italian colonialism when they took away the fertile land from peasants and calling it “domaniale” and gave it to the Italians who immigrated to Eritrea to become settler farmers. During Italian colonialism, thousands of peasants including women were reduced to agriculture laborers and wage workers in the towns. After WWII, British imperialists occupied Eritrea and continued to plunder the country’s wealth and exploit the labor of the masses. At this stage, Eritrean people’s struggle took an organized form and many women actively participated in the struggles of the first political organization, “Marher Fekri Hager”--the organization which agitated for national independence since 1941. Working women in textile factories and service industries also played a progressive role in the underground working class movement which began in the early 1940’s and formally organized into the Eritrean Trade Union in 1952. When the sham federation between Eritrea and Ethiopia was imposed on the Eritrean people by the then US dominated UN, political and mass movements began to be suppressed and the labor union had to go underground until 1958. In 3/1958, a four-day general strike paralyzed the country. Women workers joined the strike and militantly fought for the economic and national rights of the Eritrean people. The union and the workers movement was brutally crushed by the fascist Ethiopian government and in an attempt to further weaken and liquidate the workers movement by economically weakening the country, Ethiopian rulers in collusion with the local feudal chauvinists and the upper strata of the ruling class of the then US dominated UN, political and mass movements began to be suppressed and the labor union had to go underground until 1958. In 3/1958, a four-day general strike paralyzed the country. Women workers joined the strike and militantly fought for the economic and national rights of the Eritrean people. The union and the workers movement was brutally crushed by the fascist Ethiopian government and in an attempt to further weaken and liquidate the workers movement by economically weakening the country, Ethiopian rulers in collusion with the local feudal chauvinists and the upper strata of the ruling class of the advice. Consulting women is done outside, through their institutes.” He noted: “In elections, candidates require publicity for their campaigns, and this could lead to negative campaigning which is not approved in Islam. Seeking public office was disapproved of by the Prophet Mohammed, and this would hinder a number of religious and educated people from becoming members.” He also observed that elections would raise tribal considerations and the possibility of vote buying, and that such a system would bring power with as high of qualifications as appointment by the monarch, meeting in UK with PM John Major, he observed: “We have [US] experts and trainers, especially in aviation... There is not in the kingdom an occupation army, and I would like to confirm that there are no complaints whatsoever about US training personnel.” [TXT]

Rep. Cass Ballenger (GOP - North Carolina) was elected to the seat vacated by James Broyhill in western North Carolina, 10th Congressional District. For the pro-Israel community, Ballenger is a welcome change from the negative record of Broyhill. He was a co-signer of the resolution of disapproval against the proposed sale of Maverick missiles to Saudi Arabia and voted in favor of the FY 88-89 Foreign Aid bill. Ballenger stands a very good chance of being reelected in this heavily Republican district. Chester Rothman is very close to Ballenger. In 1987 RPAC contributed $500 to his campaign.

Rep. Helen D. Bentley (GOP - Maryland) is a second term Congresswoman from Baltimore. She defeated “Doc” Long in 1984 after 2 losing tries. The pro-Israel community was a strong backer of Long who was Chairman of the Appropriations Foreign Operations Subcommittee and therefore the Arab Lobby was supportive of whoever opposed him. Since her election Bentley has voted in favor of foreign aid to Israel and against the Saudi Arms Sale. In 1986 RPAC contributed $1000 to Bentley's campaign.

Rep. Ben Campbell (Democrat - Colorado) defeated incumbent Mike Stang in 1986. At first we were not certain how he would be on our issues, but the staff around him is very sympathetic to Israel, and has been receptive to our members. He recently signed the letter Pres. Reagan expressing opposition to the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia and voted in favor of foreign aid. He faces a tough reelection bid in 1988.

Rep. Howard Coble (GOP - North Carolina) is a second-term Congressman from Greensboro. Coble is from the moderate wing of the Republican party in North Carolina. He has a solid relationship with the Jewish community there, who speak very highly of him. He has been with us all the way so far. In 1986 he won reelection by 79 votes and can anticipate in a highly contested race once again. In 1987 RPAC contributed $500 to his campaign. [=]

Rep. Bill Green (Republican - New York) - A Jewish Republican member on the Appropriations Committee who could face the most expensive House race ever.

Rep. Tony Hall (Democrat - Ohio) - A former member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and now on the Rules Committee.
Rep. Steny Hoyer (Democrat - Maryland) - After boosting a field of 31 candidates in a 1981 special election, Hoyer is one of the new members of the Appropriations Committee, and a potential Senate candidate in 1986 against Senator Mac Mathias.
Rep. Jack Kemp (Republican - New York) - A rising national figure, Kemp is the Ranking Republican on the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations whose outspoken support for Israel is exceptional.

Rep. Pete Kostmayer (Democrat - Pennsylvania) - After regaining his congressional seat last year, Kostmayer returned to the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He faces a difficult reelection.
Rep. Tom Lantos (Democrat - California) - A Jewish survivor of the holocaust, and very active member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee's Near East Subcommittee.
Rep. Mel Levine (Democrat - California) - Freshman Jewish member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee who is highly effective and politically savvy.
Rep. Elliot Levitas (Democrat - Georgia) - Southern Jewish member gaining in seniority and influence.
Rep. Bill Lehman (Democrat - Florida) - A veteran Jewish member of the important Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations.
Rep. Norm Lent (Republican - New York) - An outspoken supporter and co-author of the 1981 Long-Lent Resolution disapproving the sale of AWACs to Saudi Arabia. [=]

As an example of an innovator, I interviewed a trained nurse midwife, Sister Battool, in the provincial capital who was known even in rural areas throughout the region for her new type of female circumcision which leaves the clitoris intact, sewn beneath a small flap of tissue. She operates a private practice from her home, across the street from the provincial hospital. She was sought out by many, including the wealthiest families, to do circumcisions, attend childbirths, and perform small surgeries such as opening problematical infibulations after marriage and repairing poorly done infibulations and post-childbirth reinfibulations.

Being probably the most renowned circumciser in the province and beyond, Sister Battool is in a key position both to observe trends and to influence the type of circumcisions done. She has not totally refused to do pharaonic, but she has supported and popularized her less harmful form of circumcision. In her view, since it is quite harmful to remove all the tissue, she prefers to remove only a small part of the prepuce, leaving the erectile tissue intact. Thus her “Sunna” is far less severe than a clitordectomy, thereby reducing the chances of the commonest complications (hemorrhaging, shock, septicemia) and preserves sexual sensitivity. Although she attempts to persuade clients to opt for minimal tissue damage, she said she does the operations however they wish. Although she said that some people still insist she “take it all,” many more of her clients have now been willing to consider intermediate forms.

She also has noted a marked increase in the demand for Sunna, perhaps 70 percent of the circumcision requests in her practice in 1989.
Even so, she reported that people who are ready to give up pharaonic were asking for some degree of closure over the urethra, although calling it Sunna, in order to avoid the sound of urination, which is considered unfeminine. She contends that many village midwives also avoid clitoridectomy while still irrigulating, since when they go too deep in their cutting they hit major arteries and the bleeding is so profuse and hard to control that they soon learn to leave most of the clitoris in place beneath the infibulation.

Sister Battool has found that a major concern of parents considering pharaonic circumcision is the expectation that an eventual husband will not find sex with their daughter pleasurable unless she is tightly infibulated. Indeed, according to Sister Battool, the main reason for social resistance to abandoning circumcision is that the men want it to continue. Her tactic for countering this argument is to convince parents to leave it up to their daughter to decide when she is older: she can always be infibulated later.

One of the most salient issues relevant to female circumcision is the issue of marriage-ability. Parents who know the risks of the operation are still taking a risk if they change to Sunna or abandon circumcision altogether, since marriage is a key to social status and economic security. If a woman's only route to economic security is to get married--as it has been in the Rahad villages--then the cultural definitions of marriage-ability will be vital to her social survival and well-being. The definition of marriage-ability continues to include virginity (still largely socially constructed through infibulation). [The intensity of the cultural supports to female circumcision can be judged from the following case. A family brought Sister Battool a hemophiliac daughter they wanted to have circumcised, against their doctor's advice. She, too, tried to talk them out of it, and explained the grave risks. The family was adamant, however, saying that even if she died in the process they could not leave her uncircumcised. [Eventually she was circumcised; she survived, but it required the transfusion of 16 pints of blood.]) While virginity and infibulation may eventually be disassociated--and this has certainly been the case for some of the younger, educated men and those who have adopted religious values against the pharaonic tradition--until such change is well established, individual families will still have to face considerable risk in the decision not to circumcise.

If, however, women's opportunities increase for economic security and well-being outside the role of marriage--such as through education and employment--there may be a countervailing social support to taking that risk. At present, however, continuing government-sponsored religious fundamentalism appears to be limiting those options, and marriage continues to be vital.

A significant problem for marriage has been developing in the form of escalating costs of marriage, especially for middle-class families, in the urban and more developed rural areas. In the Gezira village and in the urban areas the problem of women in their twenties not being able to find husbands was considered very serious, to the extent that numerous villages have had community meetings to propose communal commitments to minimal bride-wage payments and restricted levels of festivities. Though some villages have made such pacts, others have too many migrant workers, returning from labor stints in the oil-rich countries, who prefer lavish weddings. For families whose daughters are not being married by the men who are delaying marriage because of the rising costs, there is great concern for their daughters' well-being in the long run. Thus, a reasonable hypothesis is that this situation will influence parents to be even less willing to take the risk of leaving a daughter uncircumcised if they perceive this still to be an important factor in her finding a mate.

Further research on the effects of this is needed. If age of first marriage increases, women's first pregnancies will be at significantly later ages, which, though an improvement over the extremely early marriages prevalent in the past, may increase risks slightly over the more favored late teens to early twenties period. Also, a late start in a strongly pro-natalist situation may result in decreasing birth intervals for women who marry late, which would have implications for the health of both mothers and infants.

The Islamic movement is perhaps the most important cultural debate at present. Although the people of the northern two-thirds of the country have been predominantly Muslim for centuries, Sudanese folk Islam has displayed wide variation and many pre-Islamic beliefs and practices have been syncretized. Muslims practiced pharaonic circumcision of females, venerated saints, and participated in zar spirit possession, despite occasional criticism of these practices by some religious leaders. The prohibition of alcohol seemed to be considered traditional, and many intellectuals were not too strict about fasting at Ramadan. Certainly the majority of the population--whether Muslim or not--was not pleased when the former president (Jaffar Nimeiri) attempted to Islamicize the political system, instituting hudud punishments like the amputation of the hands of thieves and prohibiting alcohol.

But by 1989, Islamism has become a much more influential ideology with concomitant divisive impacts. Some of its roots lie in the experience of the large numbers of Sudanese migrants who have worked in the Gulf, the import of Saudi and Kuwaiti television programs, the social influence afforded the external powers (especially Saudi Arabia) who held important economic control strings, and the strong Sudanese history of allegiance to religious leaders (perhaps inspired additionally by the theocratic movement's successes in Iran). Its effects include political repression, following the accession to power (in 1989) of the Omer Hassan Ahmed El Bashir government, including the firing of many intellectuals, including university professors and health officials.

In the Gezira village, a zar adept I observed in the 1970's had offered a source of treatment and group support for women's social and emotional ills with her twice weekly clinics. In trance, she offered magical treatments--along with coffee, moral support, and the companionship and advice of other clients. But in 1989 her clinics were not being held, and she and her possessing spirit were arguing about whether to resume them, an argument I interpreted as indicative of her increasing orthodoxy of Sudanese Islam and the decline of heretofore syncretized folk traditions.

Generally, the Islamic movement has not as yet had the effect of strict sex segregation in health services: every physician I asked believed that the respect for physicians as professionals--who could, whether male or female, treat patients of either sex without compromise to anyone's morality--was deeply established in Sudan. Even though there might be a few of the urban young women students allied with the Islamic movement who are unwilling to be seen by male physicians, none of the university or medical people I spoke with believed this to be a problem. Two doctors even claimed the opposite was becoming a problem--that young women deprived of male company were seeking out male physicians for contrived complaints--but I did not investigate this. In any case, even an extremely pious fundamentalist woman physician I interviewed saw no contradiction between her beliefs and either the physical examination by physicians of the other sex or her discussion of sexual matters (for her research) with both men and women--though she herself chose to specialize in maternal and child health.

One other relevant development was the founding by National Islamic Front organizations of private clinics where, I was told, patients could receive better care than that offered in government hospitals and clinics but at lower cost than the physicians' private clinics. [Most physicians still continue to be employed by the government, but a majority of them operate private clinics also, a long-standing practice.] Such alternative services seem to be for the purpose of binding the public closer to the movement. They are financed, as is the NiF, primarily by the Islamic banks.

Many of the individuals who have experienced religious revitalization have questioned and abandoned practiced considered by many religious leaders to be unislamic, such as spirit possession cults and pharaonic circumcision, in favor of more orthodox Islamic emphasis on the five pillars of Islam. Although zar has not been abandoned entirely in the villages I studied, the practice of it had definitely declined. One spirit-possessed woman in Abdal Galli who held twice-weekly healing clinics in he 1970s, now does not trance, though she says the spirit is pressuring her to go back to it and she intends to before long. Other women referred to zar as a somewhat silly old custom that they say is dying out as the young women have become better educated and more knowledgeable about religion.

Sunnī circumcision is mentioned frequently as the appropriate Islamic alternative to pharaonic among those who are reform minded. Certainly the individuals most affected by the Islamic movement seem to favor doing "Sunna only"—though there is no consensus on precisely what form of operation that entails—or going along with public health efforts to abandon all forms of female circumcision.

Yet I believe there is another possible impact which is the result of educatedwomen's interests turning to religious studies. The growing importance of Islam in cultural debates had at times contributed to greater involvement of women in the study and reinterpretation of Islamic texts. One example of how this has begun to influence health is the case of the fundamentalist woman doctor mentioned above, whose research and religious study on female circumcision have led to some innovative views.

Through religious study of early Islamic writings, she began to question the received interpretations of the Hadith concerning female circumcision. She has concluded that the form of surgery to which the Prophet Mohammed gave his approval was not clitoridectomy, but removal of the prepuce only. [She cited an early Islamic text by Ibn Al-Qawim Al-Joziyah entitled "Tuhfat al-Modud li Ahkam al-Moukul" (roughly, "Gems of the Prophet Regarding Regulations of Birth")] and further, that later interpretations which claimed the purpose was to reduce female sexual desire were wrong. Since the "proper Sunna" (as she was considering calling it) is similar to experimental surgeries to increase clitoral stimulation for anorgasmic women, which she had read about in American medical journals, she believes it is the enhancement of female sexuality, rather than its suppression, that was the original goal. Since all sex for Muslims should be within the bonds of marriage, there would logically be no reason to reduce either women's or men's pleasure. Therefore, in her view, not only pharaonic circumcision but also the clitoridectomies currently being called "Sunna" would be against Islam.

In her research in a rural area east of the Blue Nile, she has encountered strong resistance in most communities to the idea of modifying female circumcision at all. She believes the current Ministry of Health policy will therefore fall on deaf ears, and she feels it is realistic to consider an alternative approach. In her community health work she is considering asking that people do only this "proper Sunna," rather than the clitoridectomies, if they are willing to give up pharaonic. She intends to proceed carefully, since if people were to misunderstand and perform clitoridectomies, which would reduce the sexual desires of women for their husbands, this would be harmful. She feels strongly that she is enjoining both by Islam and by medical value to "do no harm," and therefore would discourage all circumcisions. [2]

40042. IORES. "Al-Nahda Women's Society Works to Perpetuate Traditional Designs", in Saudi Arabia-Newsletter of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia, May 1996. p. 5. The Al-Nahda Philanthropic Society for Women recently sponsored the first exhibit of the Artisans Workshop Center in Riyadh in an effort to keep alive artistic traditions of the past. The exhibit was organized as part of the society's campaign to foster a new awareness of the creative beauty of traditional designs in Saudi Arabia. The 4/3-4/1996 exhibit in Riyadh focused on traditional doors and their intricate designs, color schemes and woodwork. Often examples of intricate craftsmanship, the doors are striking items of traditional art and utility. Members of the society have worked together to study the traditional designs and are coming up with ways to translate them into useful and decorative everyday items. Artisans recreate the images from the doors onto objects such as blankets, shawls, wooden boxes, cups, vases and even t-shirts. As a result of the efforts of society members, techniques which were once used hundreds of years ago are again being utilized through the interpretations of the twentieth century artisans in modern materials. The exhibit in Riyadh featured traditional doors and the designs derived from them, as well as their applications in modern materials. "We keep alive the designs of old, as they appear on the old doors, by reproducing the designs on useful contemporary items of all kinds," according to one of the members of Al-Nahda Philanthropic Society for Women who commented on the exhibit. "Our goal is to create items which will not only reflect our rich heritage and culture, but which will perpetuate our visual traditions for generations to come," she said. Ultimately, the group has plans to market the items worldwide in order to bring international attention to the richness and variety of art in Saudi Arabia. All of the pieces created at the Artisans Workshop Center are to be sold with part of the proceeds being donated to charitable organizations in the community and the remainder being used for further expansion of the center. [3]

40043. IORES. "News Briefs: Saudi Arabia Receives Arab League Literacy Award", in Saudi Arabia-Newsletter of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia, May 1996. p. 7. The Arab League Educational Scientific & Cultural Organization (ALESCO) singled out Saudi Arabia's efforts to eradicate illiteracy for special recognition. ALESCO Director-General Dr. Muhammad Ibrahim presented a special award to Minister of Education Dr. Muhammad Bin Ahmad Al-Rasheed on 3/23/1996. Accepting the award, Dr. Al-Rasheed stated that the prize reflected the government's commitment to education, from combating illiteracy on the lowest levels of education to the highest spheres, including the medical sciences, engineering, technology, computers and space sciences. The latest statistics show that the illiteracy rate in Saudi Arabia has fallen to 14.87% among men and 35.5% among women. [2]

40044. IORESA. "News Briefs: Work Begins on New Disability Research Center in Riyadh", in Saudi Arabia-Monthly Newsletter of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia, February, 1994. p. 7. Prince Sultan Bin Salman Bin Abdul Aziz, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Saudi Benevolent Association for Handicapped Children, announced the start of construction work on a 40 million riyal ($10.66 million) Disability Research Center in Riyadh. The new center will focus on applied research and manage research programs and grants with the objective of improving facilities and services for the disabled. Prince Sultan explained that the new center will provide researchers and physicians with access to the latest information and facilities in this field. It will also fund basic and advanced research programs in cooperation with the King Abdul Aziz City for Science and Technology and various Saudi universities and hospitals. [2]

40045. IORES. "Press Headlines", in Saudi Arabia-Newsletter of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia, May 1996. p. 6. During 4/1996, Saudi Arabian newspapers reported on a variety of topics related to the Middle East and the world. Major headlines reported that: The Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques King Fahd Bin Abdul Aziz hosts 500 Bosnian priests who will perform Hajj as his guests. Deputy Prime Minister and Commander of the National Guard Crown Prince Abdullah Bin Abdul Aziz meets with visiting Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri. 536 million riyals ($142.9 million) have been allocated for new road projects in and around Makkah to facilitate the Hajj. Madinah Province Governor Prince Abdul Majeed Bin Abdul Aziz opens a new girls college in Yambu. Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) Secretary-General Jamil Al-Hujeilan presents proposals to a Riyadh meeting of the GGC Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry for the unification of GCC economic, labor and electricity policy. The Saudi-American consortium Yemenco signed a $500 million deal to establish a duty-free zone in Aden, Yemen. The King Fahd University of Petroleum and Minerals and Japan's Petroleum Energy Center begin a joint research project to recycle oil residues into useful products. [2]
Majed said the occasion reflects the humanitarian approach of the Saudi nation toward a segment of the society whose members have failed victim to physical disability. "These projects are an indication of this country's commitment towards its citizens and of the direct support such activities receive from the government," the Makkah Province Governor said. The Jeddah center will consist of two medical and educational buildings and an administration building, covering over 981,000 square feet. A week earlier, Makkah Province Deputy Governor Prince Saud Bin Abdul Mohsen laid the foundation stone for a 107,639 square foot handicapped children's center in Makkah. This center, expected to cost $2.6 million, will offer the latest technological equipment and will also include educational, rehabilitation, and medical departments. Prince Saud expressed hope that the new center would positively contribute to the services available for handicapped children in the Kingdom. He urged philanthropists to support charitable societies. At the ceremony, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Saudi Benevolent Society for Handicapped Children Prince Sultan Bin Salman Bin Abdul Aziz expressed appreciation for the support extended by the Custodian of the Two Holy Mosques King Fahd Bin Abdul Aziz and Crown Prince Abdullah Bin Abdul Aziz toward the benevolent society. He also praised the support and attention given by the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs and other government agencies. The society helps handicapped children to lead normal lives and is one of the most important such organizations in the world. The Riyadh-based organization provides education and physical rehabilitation to enable handicapped children to become independent and integrate into society. It accepts children ranging in age from three to thirteen years and provides accommodations for those who need it. The society’s center in Riyadh, which is in its eighth year of operation, has accommodated more than 1600 children. The society is currently building a disability research center, the Prince Salman Bin Abdul Aziz Center for Research on Disabled People. Located in Riyadh, the center will focus on applied research and manage research programs and grants with the objective of improving facilities and services for the Kingdom’s disabled. It will provide researchers and physicians access to the latest information and facilities in the field. [≡]

40047. IORESA. Photograph: "Saudi Nursing Students Graduate from GMU", in Saudi Arabia-Newsletter of the Royal Embassy of Saudi Arabia, June 1996, p. 6. One of the eleven Saudi Arabian students to graduate from the George Mason University College of Nursing and Health Sciences receives his diploma from Dean Dr. Rita Carter in Fairfax, Virginia, last month. This was the first group of students to graduate from American universities under the sponsorship of the Saudi-US University Project. Also present at the ceremony were Project Director Dr. Jerold Principato and King Faisal Specialist Hospital and Research Center Career Development Director Mohammad Al-Hogali. [≡]

40048. Jehl, Douglas. "Jidda Journal: Saudis Feast Freely From the TV Dishes; The Rooftops of Jidda Bristle With Global Television Satellite Dishes [the technology was almost unknown before the Gulf War; Government ignores the content of programming as long as its viewing is private; seller of dishes shrugs and notes: ‘That is bad for the children and it is bad for Islam’]", in New York Times, January 23, 1996, p. A4. [TXT]

40049. Joseph, Suad; Stork, Joe. "Interview: Gender and Civil Society: An Interview With Suad Joseph", in Middle East Report, July-August, 1993, pp. 22-26. The Western model of the nation-state, which has come to dominate the world, is based on the individual citizen, separated from communities. This model is explicitly based on the male property owner as the social actor: hence, society is seen as ‘an association of autonomous, individualized, contract-making persons. This gender basis of civil society is combined with patriarchy. In the Middle East, many argue that the extremely rigid gender hierarchies are the outgrowth of pre-existing patriarchy in a post-colonial context: creating a neo-Patriarchy. Modernism has promoted the separation of women in a domestic sphere, with Saudi Arabia being the extreme case in which the state has the resources to enforce such strict gender boundaries. [Joseph is an editor of Middle East Report, teaches anthropology at University of California-Davis, and is a founder of the Association for Middle East Women's Studies and the Middle East Research Group in Anthropology.] [≡]

40050. Lado, Augustine; Hinds, Betty. "In War Ravaged Sudan, The Appealing Trade In Human Chattle Still Shows No Sign of Diminishing", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, October 31, 1993, pp. 18-19. The State Department, British Anti-Slavery Society, ILO and Africa Watch have documented the survival of a slave trade in Sudan, especially victimizing the people of the Nuba Mountains. The sldave trade in Sudan is on a far larger scale that other reported survivals of slavery in Mauittania, Saudi Arabia, and Sierra Leone. In 1987 alone, at least 7000 Blacks are reported to have been enslaved. The most recent documented slave raid was in 3/1993, in Bahr-el-Gazal province: some 6000 government troops killed 1000 people and enslaved 300 women and children. This was similar to the raid in 1/1986 when soldiers raided Dinka villages killing 612 and enslaving7000. The present leader of Sudan, Gen. Omar Hassan el Bashir, is reported to have Nuer and Dinka slaves in his household, from the period in which he was the military commander in Mjuld. This issue should be brought before the UN by the US. [Augustine Lado is president of Pax Sudani, a human rights organization.] [TXT]

40051. Lazzerini, Edward J.; Gross, Jo-Ann [editor]. "Discourse as a Cultural Expression of Identity: Beyond Renewal: The Jaddid Response to Pressure For Change in the Modern Age", in Muslims In Central Asia. Expressions of Identity and Change. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992. pp. 151-166. Beginning in the second half of the nineteenth century, the Islamic communities of the Russian empire, led by the educated elites of Muslims in Crimea, Azerbaijan and the Volga region, developed a response to the Russian cultural and political environment that sought to reform Islam with an "all-embracing effort". Two major forms of traditional Islamic reform are the individual and ascetic path of Sufis and the conservative call of right-wing orthodoxy for ‘communal revitalization (epitomized by Ibn Taymiya (13th-14th century); and the Wahhabis (Arabia), Idrisiya (North Africa) and Faraizi (eastern Bengal) of the 18th-19th). Notably, in many areas, an Islamic revival movement was underway which combined both conservative and Sufi elements. Although there were traditional Islam scholars like Qursavi, born in Kazan province in 1783, has sometimes been seen in the West and by Soviet researchers as a precursor of the Jaddid movement; however, Qursavi's criticism of Islam in the Russian Empire of his day was based on its irrelevance to the concerns of Muslims, and proposed a conservative, rather than a revolutionary, return to the fundamentals of Islam: Qursavi was a renewal, not an innovator. However, by the late 17th to mid-18th century, a more revolutionary approach to the challenge of Russian colonialism was emerging, in mass movement frequently informed by Sufis (for example, calls for jihad by Imam Mansur (1785-1791), Shaykh Muhammad of Yaraglar (1825), and Imam Samii (1834-1859)). Although there were traditional Islamic methods of protest, the failure of these traditional patterns of renewal to challenge Russian colonialism (including the 'enlightened imperialism of Catherine II, the sustained economic growth in the Volga and Crimean Tartar regions, and in Azerbaijan with the growth of the oil industry around Baku, and the psychological challenge of the inexorable expansion of the Russians) led to the emergence of a modernized Muslim elite that participated actively in the Russian administration (such as Abbas Kuli Aga Bakhiranov (1794-1848), Mirza Fethali Ahundov (1812-1878), Cokan Valihanov(1835-1865), and Mirza Kazem-Bek (1802-1870)), some of whom even converted to Christianity (Kazem-Bek). However, their writing contributed the emergence of Jadidism, which was advanced most forcefully by Ismail Bey Gasprinski (1851-1914), a Crimean Tatar: the measure of Gasprinski's innovation was his awareness that the conditions of the Russian Empire were a new challenge to Islam without historical precedent. Without rejecting the wisdom and experience of his Islamic heritage, Gasprinski’s Jadidism argued that Muslims (1) must use the analytical tools of Western historiography, (2) that refocusing on Islam would have to focus on Islam as a cultural force, (3) that education must meet practical needs, (4) that women must be empowered and moved to a more central role in society. (5) material productivity must be increased to end Muslim economic stagnation, and to this end Muslims must embrace technological innovation and industrial mechanization.

40052. Mahmoud, Tahir. “Muslims in Hijra: The Influence of Malcolm X,” in Crescent International - Special Supplement, April 1996. p. 9. Muslims are a community of the hijra (migration). Since the entire earth belongs to God, he has enjoined his creatures to move about the earth and settle wherever they find comfort. In the Qur’an, Allah says that he created humankind from dust then spread them across the earth (30:20). In obedience to this command, Muslims have spread to all corners of the globe. At the advent of Islam, they travelled to spread the message as well as to trade. The companions of the Prophet even reached China. It was certainly known to the Muslims of the time because in a famous hadith, the Prophet, upon whom be peace, said, “acquire knowledge even if you have to go to China for it.” Sa’ad ibn Waqas, one of the Prophet’s companions, settled in China. Muslim history in North America is often dated to the early part of this century. This is a limited view. Maps prepared by Muslims in the eleventh century clearly show the complete shoreline of North and South America. These could only have been prepared if Muslims had arrived in these lands prior to that date. Thus the claim that Columbus was the first to arrive in America is a colossal fraud, perpetrated by the west, as in most other instances. Recent studies have shown that as early as a thousand years ago, Muslims had arrived in America. What happened to the early Muslims and where they went still needs to be investigated but writings on stones dating back to that period also show the kalima. After the Europeans arrived, African Muslims brought in their millions as slaves. The white slave masters forced them to change their names and abandon their religion. The immense interest in Islam among African-Americans is reflective of this reality. For them, Islam is the route to the rediscovery of their lost broadcasting, and VCR tapes) in satisfying both types of media needs was also examined. The third objective was to ascertain the role of private television production companies in local television production and their relationship with Saudi TV officials. To achieve the first two goals, the researchers sampled young Saudi viewers. Participants were selected from high school and college students living in Jiddah, Riyadh, and Dammam. A total of 349 self-administered questionnaires were collected and analyzed using various statistical procedures (t-test, ANOVA, factor analysis, regression, and chi-square) to test the study’s hypotheses. To accomplish the third goal, executives and/or owners of private television production companies in Saudi Arabia were interviewed. Using the maximum variation procedure, the researcher met with 11 representatives from small, medium, and large-scale companies that were actively involved in television production. Results showed that foreign television programs were very popular among young Saudi viewers. Egyptian entertainment-type programs were more popular than similar American shows. Regional television sources also were very popular among young viewers who preferred to watch them more than Saudi TV. This situation was more salient in media-rich regions than media poor ones. Egyptian and Western television programs, which are shown frequently on Saudi TV, were used to satisfy needs related to surveillance/understanding, interpersonal utility, and social conformity more than needs related to entertainment/diversion, parasocial interaction, and personal identity. The sociocultural effect of foreign television programs, as perceived by Saudis, was relatively strong, particularly among different regions and groups (high school and college students). [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [v]

40053. Merdad, Adel Siraj. Foreign Television Programs And Their Sources: An Empirical Analysis Of Media Usage And Perceptions Of Its Effects By Young Viewers In The Kingdom Of Saudi Arabia (Television). Wayne State University. Dissertation. 332pp. AAC 9321802. [Advisor: Spalding, John W.] The aims of this study were threefold. The first goal was to measure and compare to what extent Saudi youths in three cities (Jiddah, Riyadh, and Dammam) were exposed to television programs, particularly foreign ones. This also involved assessing respondents’ perceptions of the effects of such programs on Saudi culture and society. Comparison was achieved through hypotheses-testing format with various subgroups of the sample. The second goal was to assess cognitive and affective media needs that motivate young Saudis to watch television programs, especially Egyptian and Western ones. Further, the helpfulness of four media sources (Saudi TV, Egyptian TV, Gulf states broadcasting, and VCR tapes) in satisfying both types of media needs also was examined. The third objective was to ascertain the role of private production companies in local television production and their relationship with Saudi TV officials. To achieve the first two goals, the researchers sampled young Saudi viewers. Participants were selected from high school and college students living in Jiddah, Riyadh, and Dammam. A total of 349 self-administered questionnaires were collected and analyzed using various statistical procedures (t-test, ANOVA, factor analysis, regression, and chi-square) to test the study’s hypotheses. To accomplish the third goal, executives and/or owners of private television production companies in Saudi Arabia were interviewed. Using the maximum variation procedure, the researcher met with 11 representatives from small, medium, and large-scale companies that were actively involved in television production. Results showed that foreign television programs were very popular among young Saudi viewers. Egyptian entertainment-type programs were more popular than similar American shows. Regional television sources also were very popular among young viewers who preferred to watch them more than Saudi TV. This situation was more salient in media-rich regions than media poor ones. Egyptian and Western television programs, which are shown frequently on Saudi TV, were used to satisfy needs related to surveillance/understanding, interpersonal utility, and social conformity more than needs related to entertainment/ diversion, parasocial interaction, and personal identity. The sociocultural effect of foreign television programs, as perceived by Saudis, was relatively strong, particularly among different regions and groups (high school and college students). [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [v]
times. The reason for this is that Riyadh is located in the middle of the Arabian peninsula, adjacent to a number of wadis which collect rainwater and have enriched the city's underground water resources. This has meant that it has always had plentiful water for irrigation purposes.

The Center of Unification: Riyadh was the nucleus for the unification of the various regions of Saudi Arabia. It was here that King Abdul Aziz, the founder of modern Saudi Arabia, began his quest to establish a stable, unified state under the banner of monotheism.

Climate: Riyadh has a dry continental climate, with very hot summers and cold or moderate winters. It has fine weather for most of the year and the average maximum temperature is 35°C (95°F). There is relatively little wind during the winter, but the city is sometimes subject to dusty northerly winds during the summer. There is little rainfall in Riyadh. When it does fall, it often comes in heavy showers which can cause flash floods.

Area: The best indicator of Riyadh’s rapid growth is its area. Sixty years ago, it was only 8.5 square kilometres (3 square miles). By 1950, this had expanded to 85 square kilometres (30 square miles). In 1968, when the first master plan for the capital city was drawn up, an increase in its area of about 110 square kilometres (59 square miles) was expected. Today, it is 1,600 square kilometres (600 square miles) in area, including a number of open areas in its new suburbs.

Population: In 1918, the population of the capital was 19,000. By 1960 it reached 160,000. Seventeen years later it had grown to 690,000 inhabitants, and in 1982 it reached 1.2 million. The population passed the two million mark in 1986.

The Building Boom: To cope with this extremely rapid expansion in population, a great deal of building had to be done in Riyadh, financed by the economic boom the Kingdom has enjoyed. It has benefited from the government’s expansionist policies in the development of cities, towns and villages, and from building loans provided from central funds. These factors have made Riyadh a major centre of population and communications, not least because, being a desert city, it has unlimited room for expansion. The government has distributed plots of land to tens of thousands of citizens free of charge, and grants interest-free loans to anyone wishing to build a house. These loans are repayable over 20 years, and if the loan is settled on time a discount of approximately 25% behind the loan is given. Riyadh Municipality and its Branches: As a result of this growth, many new suburbs have appeared in Riyadh, such as, Urajia, Laban, Qadsisiyyah, Al-Quds, Al-Qairawan... and the city has been subdivided into 17 separately administered areas, known as branch Municipalities. These are: Dirah, Batna, Shumaisi. Manufa, Malaz, Murabba, Ithqah, Olayya, Maathar, Nasseem. Al-Shamal. Al-Janoub. Al-Rawdhah. Urajia, Ithqah, Hayat, and Dirah.

The City’s Accomplishments: As a result of the great attention given by the state to construction projects, the Municipality of Riyadh has achieved important improvements, which include: (1) Carrying out its routine organisation and planning responsibilities by beautifying the city and keeping it clean. The Municipality has achieved good results from its campaign under the slogan “Let’s Keep Riyadh Clean”, later “Riyadh, the Clean City” and in a third phase “Let’s Keep Riyadh Cleaner”; (2) The municipality has established a large number of public gardens, parks and green landscaped areas, with fountains, artificial waterfalls, streetlamps and other utilities. The municipality has also bought eight orchards in different parts of the city and transformed them into public gardens and parks; (3) The municipality has planted islands in the middle of the streets, and provided sources of water for the irrigation of parks and gardens; (4) More than 100 children’s playgrounds have been established in various parts of the city; (5) A number of gardens and parks have been established to outstanding technical specifications. The most important ones are the Suwady, Yamamah, Aziziah, Al-Zahr’ah, Jareer, First Rabwah and Mohammed Ibn Al-Qassim gardens; (6) Several commercial markets have been established in various parts of the capital, including the vegetable, meat and fish markets. These were designed to bring services closer to the inhabitant a’l’d reduce traffic jams in the city centre; (7) A number of multi-storey car parks have been built, and have made a major contribution to absorbing part of the dense traffic and improving its flow by reducing the number of cars parked on the streets.

Important Modern Landmarks: During the rapid development which has taken place in the city of Riyadh, many ministries and governmental organisations have set up major modern landmarks in the city which rival similar features in the world’s most advanced countries. The following are some examples: (1) King Khalid International Airport: Located at a distance of 35 km (22 miles) from the city centre, this airport is built on an area of 225 square km (87 square miles) to serve fifteen million passengers annually. It was designed and equipped to form part of the city’s overall modernisation process, its roads being linked with the rest of the Kingdom’s road network to make it the core of traffic passing through Riyadh in different directions. The modern Islamic style of architecture was adopted in the construction of the airport's buildings, and the nature of the city's weather was also a factor in its design. It was decorated with paintings by a large number of Saudi artists and furnished with arrival and departure lounges, entrances, exits, restaurants, car parks, escalators and tunnels to take passengers to their aircraft. The airport has its own mosque. A unique architectural achievement whose design matches that of the other airport buildings. It has finely designed doors and windows, the doors being decorated with verses from the Koran. The mosque can accommodate several hundred worshippers. (2) The Gulf Bridge Flyover: This flyover, built by the Communications Ministry, is an unprecedented engineering achievement. It took about two years to complete. The three-level bridge, connected with the city’s busiest traffic routes, is 2200 metres (2400 yards) long and 37.5 metres (41 yards) wide. This gigantic project, with its attached tunnels and crossings, is regarded as one of the major landmarks of the Saudi capital. (3) The Television Complex: The large television tower has become a unique landmark in the city of Riyadh. Rising 176 metres (577 feet) into the air, the tower can be seen from all parts of the city. At its summit, there is a diamond-shaped restaurant for high-ranking visitors which overlooks almost the whole city. The television complex was built on an area of 33000 square metres (355000 square feet), adjacent to the administrative and financial office complex of the Information Ministry and facing the Radio Riyadh complex. Just behind the Radio complex is the Information Centre building. These buildings form an integral information complex, particularly since the buildings of the Engineering Affairs Department, Internal Information and Stores are all located on Amr-Ibn-Al-Asa street. There are two television channels: one Arabic, and the other English and French. Arrangements have already been made to start transmitting on a third channel. (4) King Fahad International Stadium: The King Fahd International Stadium was established in Riyadh by the General Presidency of Youth Welfare in 1988. It is characterised by its tent-shaped design, and the unprecedented benefit of a translucent, highly durable and fireproof cover designed to provide maximum weather protection for spectators. The stadium was designed to accommodate 80,000 spectators. The old Youth Welfare Stadium in Malaz. Riyadh can accommodate 45000 spectators and is equipped with a wide range of sports facilities including swimming pools and indoor sports halls. (5) The Diplomatic Quarter: The city of Riyadh may be the only capital which has a single area comprising all the embassies and consulates of friendly states. This is the Diplomatic Quarter. Built on an area of seven million square metres (8.4 million square yards), 8 km (5 miles) from the city centre, it is situated on high ground overlooking the natural greenery and beauty of the Wadi Hanifa with avast desert backdrop. Designed to accommodate 120 diplomatic missions, the Quarter now contains about 80 missions of various sizes. It has five residential neighbourhoods, equipped with all the necessary facilities, which can accommodate 31,000 diplomats and their families. (6) The Foreign Ministry Complex: The Foreign Ministry complex is a unique example of Islamic architecture, combining tradition with the latest advances in the field of construction. It contains offices for the various departments and sections of the Ministry.

Itseye-catching, innovative design, with marble-clad walls and floors decorated with fine Arabic calligraphy and surrounded by green gardens and fountains, make it another landmark in the Saudi capital. (7) The Qasr-Al-Hukm Area Development Project: Qasr-Al-Hukm is the office of the Governor of the Riyadh region. It comprises offices, departments and divisions of the Governorate, and the Grand Reception Hall where the Governor receives citizens, listens to their complaints and acquaints himself with their problems. Normally he will discuss these problems directly with citizens and either take action himself or refer them to the appropriate departments for review. This is an ideal example of the open-door policy followed by the government of Saudi Arabia. Crown Prince, Second Deputy Prime Minister, regional governors and ministers: there are no closed doors between officials and ordinary people. Qasr-Al-Hukm is located in the centre of the capital city of Riyadh. As the governorship's responsibilities have steadily increased, both in carrying out the region's affairs and in modernisation and development projects, work has begun on the Qasr-Al-Hukm Development Project. This scheme aims to develop the area in which the Governor's palace is located, and at the same time preserve its original historical monuments such as the Al-Masmak Palace, from which the founding of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia was launched at the beginning of this century. The project includes the establishment of commercial and cultural centres, car-parking areas and all the other facilities which form part of the modernisation of the Saudi capital.

Transport and Telecommunications: The city of Riyadh is a major transport and telecommunications centre for the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, both by virtue of being the capital city and because it is located at the centre of the national road network linking it with the various provinces in the north, south, east and west of the country. A ring road has been built around the city to allow trucks and vehicles to transit the city without passing through the centre. This has led to a marked drop in traffic jams. Riyadh is linked with Dammam by a railway line starting at King Abdul Aziz Port in Dammam and ending at the Customs area in Riyadh. This has facilitated the handling of goods arriving in Riyadh via Dammam, as well as the transport of passengers. The Ministry of Post, Telegraphs and Telephones (P.T.T.) has completed a number of large-scale telecommunications projects using satellites and co-axial cables. There are 17 automatic telephone exchanges in Riyadh, with a total capacity of 253000 lines, in addition to 951 lines for coin-operated telephones. There are Post and Telegraph offices in all parts of the city, as well as a centre for computerised telephone information and another for the control of the telephone network. The main P.T.T. building in the capital city is famous for its elegant design and superb engineering, making it one of the city's most prominent buildings. There is also a collective bus transport network. Its regular services cover all quarters of the city using about 300 buses on twenty-one bus routes.

Water: The supply of water for everyday consumption has been one of the main problems facing the city of Riyadh. Wells used to be the main source of water, but this water started to recede until eventually it became very scarce and failed to meet the inhabitants' needs. A number of studies were carried out to solve this problem, and in 1956 the first deep Artesian well was drilled to a depth of 1400 metres (4600 feet). This was a successful, but also expensive means of obtaining water, and the excessive use of underground water may mean salt water being brought in from the Eastern Province. A Royal Decree has therefore been issued, banning the drilling of any new wells in order to conserve this precious water and regulate its consumption. Riyadh's water resources can be summarised as follows: (1) Dams: Five dams have been built near Riyadh with the aim of storing rain and storm water for human consumption on the one hand, and increasing the supply of underground water on the other. These dams are: (a) Wadi Hanifa Dam (b) Hair Dam (c) Laban Dam (d) Nammar Dam (e) Olab Dam. The storage capacity of these dams totals about 12 million cubic metres (15.7 million cubic yards). (2) Salboukh Water Project: This consists of 16 wells with a daily capacity of 60000 cubic metres (78000 cubic yards), together with a filtration plant, cooling towers, precipitation tanks, a desalination plant and an electricity plant with a capacity of 21 megawatts. (3) Wasei Water Project: This consists of 62 wells of varying depths, producing 200000 cubic metres (260000 cubic yards) daily. Located 110 km (70 miles) from Riyadh, it comprises integral pumping stations, pipelines, overhead and ground tanks, a filtration plant and an electricity plant. (4) Bowai Water Project: Located 65 km (40 miles) from Riyadh, this consists of 18 wells with a daily capacity of 80000 cubic metres (104000 cubic yards) of water. (5) Jubail Desalination Popeline Project: This is a pioneering project in the field of pumping sea water from the coasts to the cities lying inland. Two pipelines have been built from the desalination plant in the industrial city of Jubail to the city of Riyadh, 466 km (290 miles) long and with a total capacity of 210 million gallons a day. This project was commenced in 1983.

Educational Development: Education in Riyadh has progressed by leaps and bounds since the unification of Saudi Arabia. Before that, it was confined to religious schools and a number of mosques. According to statistics for the 1983/4 financial year, there were 218 primary schools with a total of 74081 pupils, 75 intermediate schools with 23095 pupils, 23 secondary schools with 11244 pupils, seven private schools numbering 1060 students and eight religious institutes and colleges numbering 1904 students. In addition, the kindergarten of Riyadh's Model Institute contained 939 children. A number of adult education centres and schools aimed at eradicating illiteracy have also been established by the Ministry of Defence and Aviation, the Interior Ministry, the National Guard and other organisations. In 1959 a Royal Decree was issued establishing a department to oversee the education of girls, with branches in various parts of the Kingdom. According to a census carried out in 1983/84, there were 179 primary schools for girls, with a total of 65674 pupils. There were also 62 intermediate schools numbering 22274 pupils, 32 secondary schools with 13000 students, and an intermediate educational college with 404 students. In addition, there were 75 colleges aimed at adult education and the spread of literacy, totalling 7182 students. A number of training centres for female primary school teachers were set up and later closed because the country had achieved self-sufficiency by training graduates from intermediate colleges. There is also a Girls Education College with 1990 students, the Faculty of Arts for Girls with 213 students, and the Higher Institute for Social Services, with 252 students. King Saud University was the first university to be set up in the Arabian peninsula, opened on 10th November 1957. This now numbers about 25,000 students, with a campus covering an area of 9 square kilometres (31/2 square miles) and including all the university's academic, administrative, residential and service facilities. The Imam Mohammed Ibn Saud Islamic University has also been founded in Riyadh. Its nucleus, the Religious Institute, was established in 1950, and the colleges for the teaching of the Sharia (Islamic Law) and Arabic Language were opened at a later stage. The colleges were incorporated to form the University by a Royal Decree on 9/10/1974. Work on the new university city is about to be completed.

Specialized Scientific and Educational Centers: Riyadh contains a number of specialised scientific and educational centres. These include: 1. King Abdul Aziz Cultural Centre (Darat) 2. King Abdul Aziz City for Science and Technology 3. King Fahd Security College (affiliated to the Interior Ministry) 4. King Abdul Aziz Military Academy (affiliated to the Defence and Aviation Ministry) 5. King Faisal Air Force College (affiliated to the Defence and Aviation Ministry). 6. King Khalid Military College (affiliated to the National Guard). These are in addition to a number of colleges and institutes for specialised studies affiliated to various ministries and governmental bodies.

Health Care: The city of Riyadh contains a number of internationally-recognised hospitals to which cases of serious diseases are referred from many different parts of the world. These hospitals have been set up and administered by a number of governmental bodies, including the Ministries of Health, Higher Education, Defence and Aviation, the Interior (Public Security) and the National Guard. There are also a number of private hospitals. The hospitals under the supervision of the Health Ministry include: 1. Riyadh Central Hospital 2. Prince Salman Hospital 3. The Obstetric and Paediatric Hospital 4. The Hospital for Infectious Diseases 5. The Hospital for Chest Diseases. The Ministry of Higher Education and King Saud University operate the King Abdul Aziz and King Khalid University Hospitals. The Ministry of Defence and Aviation also has two prominent hospitals: (1) The Armed Forces Hospital which is famous for having successfully performed a number of complicated operations using sophisticated equipment and highly-qualified medical staff. (2) The Flying Hospital. This is a unique project.
consisting of 17 aeroplanes of various types and sizes, equipped to provide medical care for patients, including major operations whilst the plane is en route to a hospital. The Fying Hospital's fleet includes a fully-equipped plane capable of flying long distances and reaching any place in the world. The King Fahd Hospital is administered by the National Guard and provides a comprehensive range of medical services. The Public Security Directorate has its own recently-expanded hospital providing health care to Public Security personnel and their families. Apart from these, there is the King Faisal Specialised Hospital, which covers 52 different medical specialisations and is regarded as one of the most sophisticated hospitals by world standards. This also has a medical research centre associated with it. The King Khalid Eye Hospital has added another highly-specialised medical institution to the country's health care resources. The King Fahd Medical City, a major medical project, is currently under construction. There is also the National Hospital belonging to the Social Security Organisation. In addition to these, there are clinics and primary health care centres in all areas of Riyadh. These are administered by the Ministry of Health and a number of governmental and private bodies.

Riyadh Zoo: Riyadh Zoo dates back to 1957, when it comprised animals presented to the late Kings Abdul Aziz, Saud and Faisal. Initially, it was very modest both in terms of its design and its facilities. Eventually it was closed in 1981 and a comprehensive renewal programme took place. The zoo was reopened in 1987, and now covers an area of 134000 square metres (160000 square yards) and was designed to allow the animals open spaces as well as places to sleep at night. The zoo also contains gardens, rest areas, children’s playgrounds, fountains, artificial lakes, and other services and administrative facilities. The zoo includes 40 species of animals including birds of prey, Australian animals, hyenas, gazelles. llamas, rhinoceroses, monkeys, reptiles, Asian wild animals, bears, elephants, giraffes, camels, leopards, lions and tigers of various types and origins. Riyadh Zoo has become one of the city’s most important places of leisure and recreation.

The Industrial Area: Within the framework of the comprehensive industrial development experienced in the Kingdom over the past decade, the capital city of Riyadh has undergone its fair share of progress. The number of licences issued for the creation of factories and industrial units has exceeded 1000. Most of these factories have actually started production, though some are still under construction. There is ample proof of the city’s successes in the industrial field than the fact that the Industrial City established in Riyadh already covers a total area of 451028 square metres (541000 sq yds), totally given over to industrial enterprises. Another city has subsequently been set up, covering a total area of 21 million square metres, including service and management facilities. Plants of land in this new industrial city have been distributed to industrial dressers from every First Lady. In 1987, the museum closed the "First Ladies: Gown and Coat" exhibit at the National Museum of American History was established in 1914, when Helen Taft donated a gown to the museum. Since then, the Smithsonian has received Inaugural gowns and other collections from every First Lady. In 1987, the museum closed the "First Ladies Gowns Collection" when it was discovered that a number of the gowns were deteriorating. The new exhibit, entitled "First Ladies: Political Role and Public Image," opened in 1992. The exhibit examines the public and private roles of First Ladies within the context of women's and presidential history, and documents the accomplishments of First Ladies as domestic and political partners, advocates of social change, hostesses, promoters of the arts and culture and as campaigners. The "First Ladies: Political Role and Public Image" exhibit is divided into three major sections: "Political Roles," "The First Ladies Gown Collection" and "Shaping the Public Image." Mrs. Clinton's gown will be displayed with those of First Ladies Barbara Bush, Nancy Davis Reagan, Rosalyn Carter, Elizabeth "Betty" Bloomer Ford, Patricia Ryan Nixon, Claudia "Lady Bird" Taylor Johnson and Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy. In addition to Mrs. Clinton's Inaugural gown, the Clints have donated several additional pieces of memorabilia—one of President Clinton's watches, Chelsea Clinton's ballet slippers and the State Gift presented to the Clintons by King Hussein. "The Smithsonian Institution has my great admiration for its continuing efforts to educate and enlighten the American public in all aspects of our national history and culture. The gowns in this exhibit don't just represent one day or one evening in the life of the First Ladies. They reflect the times in which they lived, and provide us with a sense of our nation's rich history." — First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton
This chapter follows the general pattern of the symposium, the aim of which is stated to be to familiarize the Soviet public with the ethnic composition, culture, and life of the peoples of South West Asia and also with their present position and struggle for independence conducted against oppressors both local and foreign. In a preliminary short historical outline Hijaz, Mecca, and Medina are said to have originated as old trading stations of the Sabaean kingdom and the monotheistic religion of Islam, which began at the juncture of the 6th and 7th centuries A.D., no mention being made of Muhammad. The chapter comprises five sections as follows:

Main occupations: A description of the economy of the nomads. The prevalence of nomads in Saudi Arabia is due to lack of water and to a change-over from settled and oppressive taxation. It has partly counteracted the tendency of nomads to settle. The economy of peasants and of townspeople is briefly described.

Social relations: They are mainly feudal with survivals of patriarchal-kinship life, the degree varying as between nomads and settled cultivators. Among nomads social relations are mainly patriarchal-feudal. There are many remains of a family group-tribal organization, but they are a cover for feudal relations which are developing due to the abuse of the tribal aristocracy of their position to exploit poor tribesmen. Among peasant cultivators feudal and semi-feudal relations predominate. The employees of ARAMCO are striving to improve their lot through strike action.

Family life: This is described in terms of paternal authority, the status of women, marriage and marriage customs, upbringing of children, and burial rites. Marriage between cousins is a survival from pre-class society when the woman was the property of the kinship group.

Material culture: A description of nomad dwellings, clothing and ornaments, food and transport.

Language and spiritual culture: The importance of the Koran as the basis of classical Arabic. The literary renaissance in the 19th century and its impact on a group of writers in the Hijaz in the 1920s. Popular music and dances described. The essence of Wahhabism and its continuing opposition to pervasions of Islam and pre-Islamic myths. In a final paragraph on the anti-imperialist movement, Saudi Arabia is said to be successfully defending her independence, in conjunction with other Arab states, against the West and especially the US. [From: “Part III: The Arabian Peninsula: 1955-1958”, in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. pp. 14-15.]

40058. Pomeroy, William. "Rising Anti-Imperialist Sentiment in Philippines", in Peoples Weekly World (New York), May 27, 1995. p. 15. The execution of a Filipina domestic worker. Flor Contemplacion, in Singapore has led to an upsurge of nationalism among Filipinos, with accusations that the Philippine government has ignored the travails of millions of Filipino expatriate workers. Almost a dozen Philippine government officials have been forced to resign due to protests. Nearly 3 million Filipinos work in other countries, remitting $8.09 billion per year to the country (4% of the GNP). Hundreds of thousands of Filipinas work as domestic workers in Saudi Arabia and Gulf countries, where they are forced to surrender their passports to their employers, and often endure ‘near slavery, abuse, and rape’. Filipinos in the Gulf who have joined outlawedunions have been imprisoned, lashed and even executed. Philippine governments from Marcos to Aquino to Ramos have been indifferent to the conditions endured by expatriates, mainly due to the 25% unemployment rate, and 60% poverty rate in Philippines. [TXT]

MAJORITY RECOMMENDATION: In view of the evidence gathered by this Commission with regard to the potential consequences of assigning women to combat positions, current DoD and Service policies with regard to Army, Air Force and Naval aircraft on combat missions should be retained and codified by means of the re-enactment of Section 8549 of Title 10, S.C. which was repealed by Public Law 102-190, Sec. 531 for the Air Force, and reenactment of the provisions of 10 USC, sec. 6015 prohibiting women from assignment to duty on aircraft engaged in combat missions, which was repealed by Public Law 102-190 for the Navy, and codification of Army policy. (Adopted: Y: 8; N: 7; A: 0).

Overview:
Concur with the Majority Recommendation as adopted. Some women who fly combat aircraft in non-combat missions testified before the Commission. Indications are that some women can fly them quite well under non-combat conditions. Flying combat aircraft, however, transcends the question of peacetime capability. Some of the issues associated with women in air combat include the increased probability of becoming a POW, readiness, cohesion, morale and effectiveness problems associated with pregnancy, and physiological/aeromedical problems that may reduce the flexibility of assignments of women in combat aircraft.

Discussion Points:
The Nature of Air Combat:
(1) Combat fighter pilots testified to the difference between flying and fighting an aircraft.

--Air Force Lt Gen Buster Glosson, who was responsible for much of the air campaign strategy and its daily execution in the Gulf War, told the Commission:

"There are those who say technology has removed the personal demands and the horrors of combat. That is just simply not true. To me, the air combat arena comes down, as I said, to stamina and cohesion.

One, stamina is fairly straightforward to deal with from an Air Force point of view. From a medical standpoint, it can either be accomplished or it can't. And so we don't think that there is very much room for subjective judgment in that arena, and we are not trying to instill any.

But the common perception of a combat air mission -- to plan the mission to the target, brief with a wingman, fly an hour or two, 15 minutes of intense being fired at and avoidance of the ordnance --avoidance of the threat, deliver your ordnance and return and have the rest of the day off -- is simply a misconception.

The physical demands encompassed in this area are tremendous. The high speeds of the modern aircraft, as a result of technology, the high rates of turn that require the high instantaneous G loads that literally makes your body shake or may put you in G lock, as we call it, when you lose consciousness, that we have to deal with all the time -- the current requirement for sustaining consciousness is strength and endurance, and to us that is overall stamina.

The jury is out on what the final verdict will be on that issue, but, like I said, it should not be a problem for either you or I; it should be black and white.

Let me share a personal example in the Gulf war. The 14th Air Division, which I was the commander, had about 800 fighters in it. The F-15Cs at Taif that I was asking -- at Tabuk, I'm sorry, that I was asking to fly missions over and around Baghdad, those young men were flying seven- to nine-hour missions, of which about 70% of the time was in hostile territory.

Now, let's think about that from the standpoint of something we all can relate to. Think about getting on an airplane at Dulles Airport, flying to Frankfurt, Germany, sleeping for eight hours, and coming back this way, sleeping for eight hours and going back again, every day, day after day after day."

--Air Force Col Richard F. Jones, Chief of Flight Medicine at the Air Force surgeon general's office told the Commission:

"[T]here are some differences in combat versus non-combat aviation... [C]ombat aviation differs predominantly in the one area, in my mind, and that is that the combat pilot has to fly, fight and win."

--Navy LT John Clagett, a Top Gun instructor, told the Commission at hearings in Los Angeles:

"[Y]es, we do have women flying F-18s today, and that is a fact.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Saudi Arabia

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

They are certainly not flying the F-18s that any of us have flown in the fleet or out in the combat missions. To compare the missions that they are doing today to what we are doing is like comparing driving on the L.A. Freeway to driving in the Indianapolis 500. It's just not the same.

We are out there max performing the greatest airplane in the world every day, or attempting to. The women are not asked to do that. That is not their job. They have not been trained in the missions that we have been trained in. They have not performed the missions we have been performing.

And I just really object to the news or whatever coming out and saying, 'Oh, they're already doing that job.' That's not true. Yes, they are flying F-18s. They're not flying combat mission F-18s, you know, and to put them in the same role is just ludicrous." --Fellow panel member, Capt Patrick Cooke, USMC; agreed.

"The second area that I would like to address is, due to the advancement in technology that we have witnessed throughout the years, a lot of people would like to refer to aerial combat as being a long-range game, where we have long-range missiles, and we are talking about mileage there, where you can probably kill your opponent, but in actuality it's a game of inches, and, again, the outcome of that game is life or death.

What I mean by inches is, as you pick up an opponent, dear at your six o'clock, doing 550-plus knots, or miles an hour, and you look over your shoulder, and he has launched a missile at you, the only thing that you can do to save your life is to break back, or turn back into that threat, to neutralize him as best you can.

Now, I know that somebody is going to try to do some studies where they put people in a centrifuge and just sit them there and say, 'Let's see how many Gs that you can pull,' but I doubt there is going to be any simulation to see whether somebody is going to be able to, A, look over their shoulder while they are doing that under the high G force, and also work the switchology of the aircraft.

And I said it was a game of inches; while doing that high G maneuver over your shoulder, still maintaining a tally-ho on the enemy, and potentially reversing the roles, you still have to have the physical capability under that high G situation to get the first weapon off on that opponent should there be a role reversal, and that's where the game of inches comes in. Not only do you have to be able to pull hard on the pole and make that maneuver, but you have to do it with visual acuity, while maintaining sight of your opponent and ensuring that your weapons system is on him before it's on you." [=]

40062. Presidential Commission on the Assignment of Women. Women in Combat: Report to the President: Part 219: Panel One Findings Approved By The Commission. District of Columbia: Presidential Commission on the Assignment of Women in the Armed Forces, 1993. (1.66) The Miller/Moskos survey reveals that of those surveyed, 22% of the women soldiers deployed to the Gulf believe they were "in combat roles". 71% of those surveyed did not believe they were; 9% were not sure. It should be noted that men did not participate in the survey. Source: (a) Panel 1 Report; 10/23/1992, p. 114. (b) Moskos, Dr. Charles C. and Mille Laura."1992 Survey on Gender in the Military [Army]." B/W 8/82 1992. [=] right in perceiving the delay in granting the guarantees as the most important cause of the present economic crisis in Israel. He writes: "mass immigration from the former USSR came to an end. That immigration was the central factor which after 1989 moved the wheels of Israel's economy. Was it possible to prevent the decline of immigration while maintaining economic growth? Yes, it could have been done. Without the Shamir administration's clash with Bush over the settlement policy, the US government would have received the guarantee that it had been "cleared" with the US, with the effect of improving the entire economic situation. Why was the guarantee postponed for as long as 18 months? In order to understand it, let us move two years back. On 4/12/1991, the chief political correspondent of "Haaretz", Uzi Benziman, reported that on his first visit to Israel, the then State Secretary Baker, "opened his conversation with David Levy [then Israeli Foreign minister], by saying that Sharon must be stopped" from building settlements at all conceivable West Bank locations. As Benziman made crystal clear, Baker didn't ask Israel to stop all settlements, or even to quantitatively reduce its extent. All he wanted was to stop provocations through establishing settlements in the most ostentatious manner for merely symbolic reasons. As a pro quo, he offered 8 concessions to Israeli demands made by Shamir's ultra-right government. The concessions, which Benziman rightly called "major achievements", included the following: "It is agreed upon that a Palestinian state is not to be a subject of negotiations [between Israel and the Palestinians]; it is agreed upon that the Palestinian delegation is to be selected rather than elected; it is agreed upon that [Security Council] Resolutions 242 and 338 are subject to two different interpretations, each as valid as the other", so on and so forth. The religious settlers, however, feeling strong as a result of being backed by Sharon and other right-wing politicians, were adamant in rejecting any concessions to the US, eventually forcing Sharon to renegotiate on his deal with the US and to let Sharon proceed with the settlement as before. Only when it turned out that, as Benziman put it ("Haaretz", June 28, 1991), "a tacit agreement linking together the [Israeli] government, the leadership of [Jewish] settlers and the American Administration proved unreachable", the US began threatening Israel that the guarantees may be withheld in retaliation to the settlers who just "could not resist a temptation to bring caravans to a new settlement", Benziman explained their point of view: "A kind of esprit de corps has evolved in the Jewish settlements in the Territories, sanctimonious, self-congratulatory, and megalomaniac. Their frame of mind is reminiscent of the bitterness of the French settlers in Algeria towards their mother country... Their mood was angry, but it went together with their conviction that they have been chosen by the grace of God. The leaders of the religious settlers firmly believe that they are in a better position than others to decode the inner intent of the Gentiles to be more rather than less "uppity to the Jews". The response of a host of other settlers in the same spirit can be safely omitted from this presentation. But an exception must be made for the already deceased leader and founder of Gush Emunim, Rabbi Yehuda Zvi Kook who still is essentially quoted. According to rabbi Kook, the autonomy's greatest evil is that the Jews willing to grant it consider themselves weak, instead of putting their trust in God and refusing to grant an autonomy in line with his commandments. Had they done so, God would be certain to reward them in these times of Redemption by endowing them with unrivalled strength. The religious settlers and their closest allies in the National Religious Party have remained true to those principles. But their supporters in the major right-wing parties, Likud and Tzomet, already speak a different language. They speak of Israeli security and they fail to recognize the Arabs as Gentiles. Thus, the Likud party admits Arabs as members. One of its MKs, As'ad As'ad, is a Druze, on close terms with Netanyahu. Tzomet also enjoys a significant Druze support. A group of Druze reserve officers remain on friendly terms with the party leader, Rafael Eitan. This is why the alliance of the religious settlers with their secular supporters, much as it may seem at the moment close, must be regarded as potentially fragile. Among the actual stipulations of the autonomy agreement discussed by the Hebrew press, by far the most important is the formation of a Palestinian police force empowered to enforce order in the Palestinian society without which the autonomy is said to be unfeasible. The nature of its authority was clarified by Ron Edelst ("Hadashot", May 2, 1993) and described in detail by Tzvi Gilat and Ronny Shaked ("Yedioth Ahronot", April 30). Edelst, whose "connections" with Shabak's Chief were discussed in report 120, describes the autonomy as stemming from "a major and rather all-purposive deal agreed upon between Israel and the PLO. Its most important stipulation is the transfer of some administrative functions to self-government authorities, on the condition of establishing in advance an operative dialogue between the Israeli security agencies [i.e. Shabak and the "Minority Department" of the Police which acts as Shabak's front] and their Palestinian counterparts still to be formed. The purpose of the dialogue is a joint prevention of any act of the ordinary acts, i.e. of terrorism". Apart from Edelst, no other Hebrew press commentator has explicitly mentioned the formation of "the Palestinian counterparts of Shabak". But implicit hints pointing in the same direction have abounded. The cooperation between the Israeli and the "autonomous" secret police forces aiming at "prevention of terrorism", must be regarded as the crucial stipulation of "the deal agreed upon between Israel and the PLO". Israel's consent to the scheme can in my view be attributed only to the abject and systematic failure of Shabak to perform its duties. This failure is well-known in Israel and has been discussed in several of my reports. After all, few Hamas guerrillas have been caught by Shabak, in spite of the seal-off which was supposed to enable them to capture. For example, a group which killed Naim Stoltdano in 12/1992, Shabak's success at capturing the guerrillas who nominally identify themselves as belonging to the Fatah has been far from impressive either. The only partial recent success which Shabak can claim, has been against the "Red Eagle" guerrillas affiliated with the PFLP, who are no more than a tiny force within the Palestinian resistance and who avoid attacking Israeli troops or police and specialize in killing the usually unarmed Jews. Shabak's ineptitude, which must by now dishearten its top ranks, has been fairly steady since the inception of the Intifada, due to the decimation of the ranks of its collaborators at the hands of the Intifada militants. The idea of the formation of "Palestinian counterparts" of Shabak, to jointly fight terrorism in the Israeli meaning of the term, can only stem from the recognition of Shabak's misperformance. The Palestinian police can be expected to act as a mere front for "the real work" to be performed by the secret police, in replication of the division of labor between the Shabak and the Palestinians who before the Intifada served in the Israeli police. The PLO can be expected to command both the secret police and overt police, and be rewarded in the process by being permitted to clamp down on its own enemies within Palestinian society. The scheme bears some resemblance to the "Village Leagues" of Sharon, but while the leaders of the latter were recruited from among the dregs of the society, the commanders of the two Palestinian police forces can be expected to come from the ranks of the PLO, primarily from the Fatah, which commands the loyalty of a large number of prestigious Palestinian leading families and prestigious Palestinian intellectuals. The arrangement also bears close resemblance to relations existing between American Intelligence agencies and local police forces in countries such as Panama. [=]

40065. Shahak, Israel. The Autonomy Agreement and the Domestic Conflict in Israel: Part 2 of 4. Shahak Report 121. Israel, May 5, 1993. Gilat and Shaked concentrate on these aspects of the autonomy which infuriate the religious settlers the most. Accordingly, they ignore the Palestinian secret police and deal only with the one which is going to be armed and uniformed, and thus strike the eyes of religious settlers as a constant reminder of the breach of their religious principles by the Jewish state. While noting that "officially, the plans for the Palestinian police remain classified", Gilat and Shaked reveal its organizational principles. The [Israeli] plans allow for the formation of a police force of several thousand, equipped with light weapons, which have been defined by [the Police minister] Shahal as nothing more than "revolvers and submachine guns". The powers of this police are defined as "enforcing the traffic regulations, securing the public order, combating the drug use and controlling crime. The [Israeli] Police ministry assures us that this Police will closely cooperate with the Israeli police". The Palestinian police seems to be already in the process of formation as a force totally subjugated to the Israeli authorities. According to a radio announcement (May 4) by the chairman of the Knesset Committee for Foreign and Defense Affairs, general (reserves) Onri Orr (Labor), Israeli authorities will have to approve the hiring of each single policeman. Gilat and Shaked quote the former ([Klikud] Police minister Ronny Milo, proving that he stood by ostensibly the same principle. This shows again how little things changed when Labor replaced Likud. The names of the two commanders of the Palestinian police force have been published by the Hebrew press some time ago. Both are former Jordanian police officers who right after the conquest of the West Bank in 1967 joined the Israeli police and served in it with distinction, until they resigned in the spring of 1988, forced to do so by the Intifada. Even thereafter, however, they managed to remain on good terms with the Israeli authorities. They are reported by the Hebrew press to have already begun training "a nucleus" of the Palestinian police in “Egypt and Jordan”.

Gilat and Shaked discuss the cooperation between that police and the "Shabak investigators, who may even train some police officers and share information with them". The Palestinian police will be not authorized to deal with "security matters" unless it acts in "cooperation" with Shabak, i.e. provides the latter with the still scarce information. This is why this cooperation will be so essential. Gilat and Shaked report that "the main barrier of the Palestinians has consented to a continuous, determined release of administrative detainees in Israel in exchange for freeing some others, regardless of how much the Israelis may be indignant at the latter's release. The future administrative detainees will also be transferred to Israel". Palestinians apprehended by the new police, though, will be held in prisons located in the "autonomous territory". Without it being said explicitly, it can only mean that Shabak will retain all its present powers in the Territories and will use them there as deemed fit.

What the Hebrew press now stresses, is the racist nature of the Palestinian police's statutes. The problem stems from the most vociferous objections of the religious settlers to the prospect of being detained or even having their identity checked by a Palestinian policeman, whenever they happen to find themselves in the "autonomous areas", which they will be always able to enter at will. (One has to understand that the roads linking their settlements with Israel or with each other will anyway remain outside the Palestinian police's jurisdiction.) In order to appease the settlers, the official pronouncements keep reiterating that, as Gilat and Shaked put it, "the Israeli plans envisage that whenever a Jewish driver may be involved in the Territories in a traffic accident, all a Palestinian policeman can do is to request him kindly to stay in place, pending the arrival of an Israeli policeman and disposal of the case by the latter". But the religious settlers still refuse to be appeased. Gilat and Shaked quote the reaction of one of the more vocal of their spokesmen, Uri Elitzur. "Think for yourself. Let us assume that a Palestinian policeman requesting your wife to stay in place happens to be an exceptionally nice person. Can you believe that he will confine himself to that request?" Other settler leaders made it clear that they will treat such a request by an armed Palestinian policeman as an unforgivable insult. As the already mentioned Pinhas Wallerstein explained to Gilat and Shaked, "we instructed our men to open fire to kill in such a case". No government spokesmen would be able to follow Wallerstein's words, even though under Israeli law (which applies to the settlers) they constitute a clear case of incitement to violence which is a punishable offense.

In other words, the Israeli government in advance envisages that the Palestinian police are going to be subject to racist humiliations while performing their duties. But racism is nothing new to those Palestinian policemen who served in the Israeli police between 1967-1988, and wore Israeli uniforms, not the "autonomous" Palestinian ones now planned for the new police. As the Hebrew press repeatedly noted throughout that period, and as anybody, including myself, could see, the Palestinians serving in the Israeli police in the Territories (but not in Israel) operated under severe constraints dictated by racist considerations. In contrast to the Arab press or the PLO propaganda which would never mention it, Palestinian policemen who in 1988 resigned under the pressure of Intifada, and were subsequently interviewed by the Hebrew press, would voice their resentment over racism they had been subjected to with extreme bitterness. A Palestinian policeman in the Territories, although often armed and always wearing an Israeli uniform, had no power to stop, let alone to arrest, any Israeli, even in cases of traffic accidents. All he could do, was to request him politely to stay put pending the arrival of an Israeli policeman. The dining rooms were segregated, the Palestinian policemen being forbidden to even enter the rooms the Israeli policemen were dining in. I still remember how surprised I was to watch such racist practices already in 1968. But now, the religious settlers advance such racist concepts far beyond anything practiced before 1988, without being effectively challenged in any way. In my view this only shows that Israeli Jewish society, also under Rabin, steadily evolves toward the right.

One unit of what really is the new Palestinian police already functions, still without uniforms, under the name of the "Orient House Guards". Their connections with Shabak were discussed in report 120.
The unit is indirectly commanded by Feisal Husseini, and directly by an ex-Israeli police officer. A bit of information about the range of their exploits has been provided by Khaled Abu-Tu’ama ("Yerushalaim", April 23). "Husseini’s men, popularly dubbed ‘Feisal’s thugs’ are often brutalizing the residents of Eastern Jerusalem. Last week, 5 of them serving in the subunit of Husseini’s personal guards, beat up an editor of a Palestinian weekly, who they said had deviated from PLO’s official line." Also known are other incidents of the same type, invariably targeted at individuals who dared say something in public this unit would dislike.

In my estimate, the incidence of such acts is on the increase.

More sinister still is the involvement of "Feisal’s thugs" in commercial disputes between members or proteges of the Hussein clan and persons affiliated with rival clans. Abu-Tu’ama recounts an already notorious case, which occurred about two weeks before the date of his article. It involved two clans, "both supporting the Fatah", he says. One, the Ja'afar clan, enjoys the feudal protection of the Hussein clan, "and is very close to Feisal Hussein", whereas the other, the Natshe clan, is in rivalry with it. First some respective clansmen quarrelled over some trivial point of honor. At that stage the Natshe clan scored a triumph by wounding one of their rivals. But then, the Ja'afar clan "appealed for help of several dozens of local Fatah militants, some employed as Feisal’s personal guards". At the same time, the Natshe clan brought a busload of reinforcements from among the clansmen from villages around Hebron. The ensuing battle was truly royal, even though it involved nothing more than sticks and fistfights. It was fought "in a market place" (Nuristan) in East Jerusalem, in front of thousands of astonished local residents, and in front of quite amused Israeli police and Border Guards who, although present didn't intervene. The Hussein-backed coalition won, and their adversaries (some requiring hospitalization) had no choice but to flee the scene. Whereupon the victors, still at daylight time, proceeded to vent their anger at the shoe shop of Adnan Natshe. "Feisal's thugs first assaulted me and my family and then ruined our shop", complained Adnan Natshe to Abu-Tu’ama. But that quote and a description of the whole incident appeared only in the Hebrew press. The Arab press refused to cover it, no doubt in order to avoid "deviating from PLO's official line" and suffering the consequences. While seeking to submit a complaint to the Israeli police of "the united Jerusalem", Adnan Natshe and members of his clan were, according to my sources, turned down with scoff and scorn. In despair, they turned to Dr. Sari Nusseir to intervene with Feisal Hussein in order to be granted "a cease fire", in the end graciously accorded them. The compensation for the losses, estimated at 20000 Shekel "will have to be discussed when Mr. Husseini, who is now preoccupied with his foreign travels, will be at leisure to look into the matter".

Such clan warfare is an increasingly common occurrence. Largely owing to it, the Israeli rule in the Territories was before the Intifada relatively secure. Of course, Palestinian customary silence about it mightily helped Israel in the process. The popular committees which mushroomed during the Intifada did all they could to substitute democratic authority for clan conflicts. They achievement was uniquely great, but unfortunately devoid of any durability. The greatest mistake of the PLO bureaucracy was to let it die down. But this was also a mistake of many foreign observers who failed to notice this aspect of the Intifada, because they preferred to indulge in Stalinist cliches rather than voice their genuine support for the just cause of Palestinian freedom. Anyway, the great achievement of the Intifada is already gone. We are back to square one, and it will show regardless of whether or not "Feisal's thugs" put on uniforms.

The just described story also accords with my opinion, seldom voiced even in the Hebrew press and never in the Arab one, that the Palestinians in the Territories tend to view both the delegation to the "peace talks" and the PLO bureaucracy with cynical indifference bordering on hostility. I am not referring here to the Hamas’ supporters whose attitudes and real influence need to be discussed separately. Nor am I referring to the PLO’s "refusal front organizations" e.g. the PFLP, whose futility and failure to achieve anything is by and large scorned by ordinary Palestinians. Such attitudes were expressed by the Dean of the Philosophy Department at the Bir-Zeit University, Dr. Mussa Budeiri, in an interview granted Nahum Barnea ("Yediot Ahronot", April 30). “Budeiri thinks that Feisal Hussein is one of the most ludicrous characters he has ever met. ‘You, the Israelis, view the Palestinian society with so much condescensionas if we were still in the 1920s. Because of that you consider Hussein important because of his family background’. Budeiri also makes another point, citing his Bir-Zeit students as an example. He says that Palestinians are usually ignorant of their own history. ‘All they know is a story of a myth of a dervish with a sword who in no books in Arabic dealing with history of the Palestinian people, and this may explain that ignorance.’ In Budeiri’s view the Palestinian youth at large is not overly impressed by the exploits of Feisal Hussein’s father as a commander of Palestinian forces in the vicinity of Jerusalem in 1948 and his death in battle, because they don’t know much about it. ‘Only you, the Israelis, think that Feisal’s father is still venerated by us as a hero and that Feisal is a great leader. But those who know Feisal intimately, know better. ‘The same can be said about Arafat. Israelis are convinced that the Palestinians do nothing the whole day apart from wishing Arafat. Today I was on business in the office of a Ramallah money-changer. People were talking there about the returning Palestinians. ‘Sure’, said the changer, ‘even Arafat is about to return. Didn’t we learn from an Israeli TV newscast that his wife had recently bought for herself a luxurious residence in Ramallah? Everybody was roaring with laughter.”

“ I asked: ‘But why the Palestinians hate Hanan Ashrawi?’ ‘Because Hanan Ashrawi and Bibi Netanyahu resemble each other at least in one respect. Both never believe in what comes out of their mouths. Both are staging a permanent show-off. True, I know Hanan better of the two. It was Ted Koppel who made her into what she now is. Once she appeared on his show, she already was a spokeswoman for the Palestinian cause’.” [s] 40066. Shahak, Israel. The Autonomy Agreement and the Domestic Conflict in Israel: Part 3 of 4. Shahak Report 121. Israel, May 5, 1993. In his somewhat earlier article, Yoram Binur ("Hadashot", April 16) explains why the delegation, and in particular Feisal Hussein, are so much targets of popular hatred. It is because of the contrast between the privileges bestowed on them by Israeli authorities and the destitution of the masses engineered by the very same authorities. And another factor contributing to their being hated is the unsavory reputation of some of them for financial matters. “Even Arafat must realize that the prestige of the Palestinian delegation has plummeted, in spite of Abd-el Shafi still being its head. During the first days of the seal-off we could see it clearly. Right upon imposing the seal-off, Israel announced that all members of the delegation [about 150 persons] were to obtain permits letting them and their cars pass all checkpoints. The members of the delegation at once rushed to Civil Administration offices nearest to their place of residence to pick up these permits. It now happens so often that a peasant woman from, say, the Ramallah district wants to sell some vegetables in Jerusalem, but is turned back by the army at a checkpoint, while watching how a delegation member from her area, driving in his new expensive car, is respectfully let by the soldiers through. This is what produced a wave of popular resentment. This week the delegation members were forced to announce that upon the expiry of their present permits they will not renew them. ‘Still, our reputations have already been damaged’, a member of the delegation admitted to me with a sigh. ‘We ourselves are responsible for our popular image of a bunch of careerists and pleasure-seekers, entertaining themselves in luxurious hotels abroad while our people here suffer unbearable hardships’. Let me supplement Binur's story by pointing out that the permits are valid for 6 months, so that at the time of their renewal no one may remember such promises any more. Not a single delegation member had enough courage to return his permit at once, or to refuse to take it in the first place. This is why their promises not to renew them in the future can hardly be expected to impress anybody. Binur discusses the financial reputation of the delegation members, pointing to the evident contrast between Abd-el Shafi and Feisal Hussein. Unlike Abd-el Shafi, “who has never sought to derive any personal benefits from his political opinions, and who while heading the delegation continues to work as a physician in the Red Crescent, without employing body guards to be seen at the gate. of his house... Husseini's lifestyle does not contribute to his popularity. In the eyes of the hundreds of thousands of refugee camp residents, Husseini is regarded as a rich man who hautishly keeps distance from ordinary people". Binur describes the repudient furniture of the "Orient House" and the haughty treatment accorded ordinary Palestinians who may happen to find themselves there, and he contrasts it with Abd-el ShafII's habitual courtesy. Then he says that "unlike Abd-el Shafi, Husseini has been the target of a truly inspired policy, attuned to the very expectations of the place, its institutions, its people, its needs. That policy is likely to generate power but not popularity: domestic politics and distribution of money. It was Husseini, for example, who forced the charismatic refugee camp-born former chairman of the Journalist Association in the Territories, Radwan Abu-Ayash, to withdraw from politics. In the days when the money still flowed to the Territories freely, Husseini was a major distributor of Fatah's money. People applying for money could always be seen lining up in front of his private office. Of course, some applicants felt they were treated unjustly, and now recall it, blaming Husseini". One can see why Budeiri, when asked by Barnea about "the possibility of establishing a democratic Palestinian state" under the present conditions answered: "No. A Palestinian state cannot be democratic, just as no Arab state is democratic".

I have concentrated in this presentation on the formation of the Palestinian secret and uniformed police and on the mood of Palestinian public opinion. I perceive these two factors as indirectly corroborating Edelist's version of a deal Israel made with the PLO. What I mean, is that Palestinian hostility toward any such deal could paralyze it from the start, unless the population of the Territories were forced to accept it by terror of the police as currently envisaged. Compared to the agreement about the police, other points of the Israel-PLO deal can be treated more cursorily, insofar as information about them becomes available. In my view, the PLO has already accepted the basic Israeli approach to be outlined below. In discussing the deal, however, I'll take the liberty to often skip exact source references.

All autonomous authority is to be derived from Israeli authorities, as represented by the military governors, who instead of having their headquarters in Palestinians towns, will have them elsewhere. Currently, the Palestinian delegation still opposes the Israeli proposals regarding the size and the character of the "autonomous" parliament or council, its electoral procedures, etc. But, as Gilat and Shaked inform, "the PLO leadership does not oppose the idea of the elections in principle, but in practice is against them. Arafat prefers to appoint the representatives himself, even when - and if - the elections to the autonomy council are held". It was therefore resolved within the framework of the deal in question that Israel will agree to let "the Chief of the PLO appoint the council members, at first temporarily, and thereafter permanently".

The Territories are going to be divided into three types of areas. Some are going to be placed under direct Israeli control, and the right of settling there will be recognized by the Palestinians. In the West Bank this area will include the "Greater Jerusalem", the Jordan valley and its extension toward the Dead Sea coast, which together with a belt parallel to the Green line, will surround the West Bank and partition it into two separate pieces. Numerous army camps and all Jewish settlements together with major highways connecting them, regardless of how close they may run to Arab towns, will be located in the areas of this category. Those army camps, settlements and highways will divide the "autonomous" area into smaller enclaves.] The second type will consist of what is defined as "areas actually inhabited by the Palestinians", to be put under the autonomy. New settling will be forbidden there, and the right to issue construction permits will be granted the "autonomous" Palestinian authorities. Yet the latter will operate under Israeli supervision extending upon different sectors of the administration. The third type areas, now officially referred to as "the state lands", will consist of the lands seized by the State of Israel from the Palestinians, but not yet settled by the Jews. Such areas will be put under a joint jurisdiction of the two sides, but with the status quo recognized by both, and the right to veto any change granted to both. If the Palestinians may use that right to veto any further settlement in those areas, Israel may be in the position to veto all Palestinian development, including even construction of houses. A similar classification of land will be applied in the Gaza Strip, except that the "state lands" can be assumed to account for a much smaller proportion there. No accurate information about the size of the West Bank lands belonging to the various categories is as yet available.

The demographic status quo is to continue. Only those Palestinians will have the right to reside in the Territories who were counted in the census taken by the Israel in 9/1967, or, if born thereafter, hold a proper birth certificate. The expellees forfeit this right forever, unless they are granted any act of favor. The Israeli-PLO deal therefore rests on the assumption that the Palestinians who do not have the thus defined residence rights can acquire them only through Israeli "gestures". The Hebrew press commentators interpret such form of population control as suiting the best interests of the Palestinian delegation. The well-informed Avinoam Bar-Yosel ("Maariv", April 30) says that "at the beginning of the negotiations [between Israel and the PLO] about readmitting expellees, the security branches [i.e. the Shabak] feared that some returnees may enjoy too much popularity. They were particularly afraid of Akram Haniye and some others. Realizing the extent of their popularity, they feared that upon returning, such individuals might undermine the power base of the present members of the Palestinian delegation, especially of Feisal Husseini, with the effect of complicating the negotiating process. Even though their names were personally proposed to Israel by Yasser Arafat, the authorities in Jerusalem refused to let them return because they presumed Arafat's intention was to neutralize Feisal Hussein's emergent personal power base". Bar-Yosef cynically remarks that "a review of the sequence of Israeli gestures in the aftermath of the mass expulsion may well lead to the conclusion that Israel could gain more by readmitting the 400 Hamas militants and confining them in an Israeli detention camp. This holds true even if the terror wave Israel has endured since the expulsion is not taken into account". Undoubtedly, Israel wants to keep the power of the delegation and of Feisal Hussein, unchecked by other Palestinians. The decisions to grant or deny readmissions to individual Palestinian expellees can be expected to be affected by this consideration. Israel reserves for itself the right to veto any changes in present taxation. At the same time, however, it reassures the Palestinian delegation that the autonomy authorities, if they so desire, can have full powers to allocate or distribute tax revenues as they may like, provided they assume the burden of enforcing the collection of taxes. This may turn out to be a "State lands" category, of which only the Palestinian police, most likely only its secret component, may be in the position to solve. The problem stems from the fact that many Palestinians have refused to pay any taxes already from the inception of the Intifada; or else they have paid only their minimum need to extract from the Civil Administration urgently needed permit or licence. In the Gaza Strip there are many who do not even pay their electricity bills, or who prefer to connect themselves to the electricity grid in places unknown to the Israeli authorities.

This is why the right to spend tax revenues as deemed fit may well pale in importance compared to another right Israel is willing to grant the autonomous authorities from the moment a preliminary agreement is signed: namely the right to freely distribute the donations which may arrive from abroad. According to Edelist (ibid.), they are likely to include a huge Saudi donation, effected on the prompting of the US. Without estimating the size of this donation (other commentators estimate it at $100 million), Edelist concludes "that the Saudis must therefore be a central factor in the big deal [between Israel and the PLO], even if they avoid exposure to limelight. In the aftermath of the Gulf War, and in view of all their conflicts with Iran, the Saudis have needed to enhance their prestige as the protectors of Islam, to the point of providing some support for Hamas. But Americans never tire of making them mend their ways and they succeed in it. A sign of the American success in this venture was last week's Saudi official announcement that Saudi Arabia was going to stop boycotting the American companies trading with Israel". According to Edelist, the Saudis will soon be duly rewarded for that decision.

"It is known that in the past Saudi Arabia kept flooding the successive Israeli governments with requests to be granted by Israel some kind of authority to administer Islamic holy sites in Jerusalem and mark them by the Saudi flag. So far, all such messages have been..."
rejected outright. But now, the Saudis may well be granted such rights as a reward for their role in bringing the peace process to its successful conclusion*. Edelist has so far been alone in disclosing the very existence of such Saudi requests in the past. But his information must be true. Israel is now indeed likely to grant the Saudis some supervisory functions. And the permission to fly their flag over the Al-Aqsa Mosque now appears to be in Israeli best interest, as it would preclude flying a Palestinian flag there for that matter a Jordanian one which resembles the Palestinian closely. (Both of them, along with the flags of some other Arab states, are made up by various combinations of white, black, red and green colors, each of them representing a major Arab dynasty, with the effect that the four colors together symbolize the Arab nation as a whole. The Saudi flag, however, is no more than an emblem of the country’s royal family, and carries no such connotations. Given this fact, the Israeli “experts on Arab mentality” can only regard the Saudi flag as apt to influence the Palestinians in ways deemed by those “experts” to be “positive”.) Certainly, most of those who voted for Labor or “Meretz” could not care less about whether Saudi flag could be seen in Jerusalem, whereas many in their ranks would fearously object to a Palestinian flag there. True, the religious settlers and their right-wing allies are sure to feel debase if any Gentile flag flies over Jerusalem, and to run amok with indignation. An agreement with the Saudis could therefore aggravate the domestic tensions in Israel. [=]

40067. Shahak, Israel. The Autonomy Agreement and the Domestic Conflict in Israel: Part 4 of 4. Shahak Report 121. Israel, May 5, 1993. The viability of the Israeli-PLO deal, however, depends not only on the US and Rabin, but also on the consent of the Knesset and in the last analysis on the mandate of the Israeli electorate. (The extent of the Palestinian opposition to the deal will not be discussed in this report.) Since the religious settlers oppose any kind of autonomy intransigently, and already succeeded in squashing the agreement Israel had reached earlier with the Bush Administration, the Hebrew press commentators remain apprehensive. Some of them even expect that the religious settlers may not shrink from launching a civil war over the deal. The columnists like Ron Edelist even declared they would volunteer to fight in such a war in order to fell the settlers down to their knees. On March 26 Edelist addressed the religious settlers in an open letter, which deserves to be quoted extensively. After reminding his readers that in 1948, in the inception of Israel, its army crushed a civil rebellion by shelving “the ‘Altalena’ ship and thus forestalling the development which could not but have been uncontrollable, irrational and contrary to the Jewish national interest”, he proceeds to telling the religious settlers that they may yet be treated likewise. He blames them for their brinkmanship, admitting his own share of responsibility for it. “It is you who have administered for 25 years a racist conquest regime, adorned with pageants of haughtiness and faked heroism. Let me also ignore your sanctimonious boasts of the ‘marvellous relations with your neighbors’ which you used to make early to those who, while seeing a tree, will understand that it is a tree and not something else. Only gradually I realized that I was dealing with almost pathological lunatics, dangerous to themselves and to their environment. I still don’t understand how could I let them and myself go on so far. "It is apparent that we are both moving toward a violent confrontation which may be Jewish-Arab, but may also be internecine Jewish. I want to know that in either case I will not be on your side. This time I am not going to be impressed by your sanctimonious habit of raising your eyes up to the heavens and invoking Jewish brotherhood. I will not let myself be dragged into a religious war or a racist gang warfare. From now on, there will be a complete separation between one belligerent - you - and another - me. Until one of us gets defeated”.

As mentioned in report 120, of all Hebrew press commentators Edelist is on the closest of terms with Shabak and its Chief. But whether the public at large know this, and his entourage share his opinions is an open question. Certainly, from the date Edelist wrote his article until the date of this report nothing has been done to restrain the religious settlers or their allies, who therefore felt free to escalate violence. By the end of the Hebrew press already recognized that, as the chief political commentator of Haaretz, Uzi Benzman put it (“Haaretz”, April 30), the government was afraid of the settlers rather than the other way round. “Among the government members there are some who do not believe that current Israeli positions can avoid resulting in a fratricidal shedding of Jewish blood. In eye to eye conversations, those ministers take the liberty to intimidate that for the first time since the formation of the State of Israel, political struggle will involve the use of firearms and the attempts to assassinate the politicians. It cannot be determined whether such fears are based on intelligence estimates or whether the ministers voicing them simply fear for their own life and limb as visible targets of possible assassination attempts. But the political-decision makers already clearly assume that the coming political contest in Israel will be stormy, violent and sordid in the extreme, to the point of necessitating a special organizational effort by the police and Shabak for the sake of protecting the lives of public figures.” The settlers are supported by the right-wing parties. “Meanwhile the general staff of the right-wing parties in the Knesset, coordinated by Netanyahu, is parallelly to the settlers seeking to bring the government down, primarily by exerting pressure on the Shass party. They assume that the Shass party remains the Achilles heel of the coalition, and that here lies a non-negligible chance of frustrating Rabin’s plans. The pressure on Shass is going to be maintained by staging a permanent protest vigil in front of the home of [its spiritual leader] rabbi Ovadia Yosef. The leaders of the right-wing parties anticipate that in the event of being denied Shass’ support, Rabin will dare concede nothing to the Arabs, even if assured of the support of 61 MKs in favor of... concessions. In any case, the Knesset right wing will try to deny legitimacy to 'a blocking majority' with 5 MKs from the Arab parties. They will argue that such a majority has no right to determine the fate of the Jewish state. Any withdrawal from the Territories, and any change in the present status of Arab residents of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza District will be presented as futile". The government coalition crisis which right now unfolds, was at least in part caused by such pressures upon the government by the settlers. The government responds to those pressures in several manners. On the one hand, it keeps reassuring the public that the agreement envisages no essential changes. As Benziman puts it "the government, at least for the time being, will keep reassuring everybody that no withdrawal from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza District is being contemplated, and therefore that all the claims of the settlers to the effect of the existence of risks to their security are baseless. As to the Golan Heights, a partial withdrawal from them is intended, but is certain to be scheduled to last very long, so as to subject the real intentions of Syria in regard to sticking to the terms of mutually negotiated peace to a continuous test". The ploy may work, because even "the leaders of the settlers recognize that the great majority of Israeli Jews are not overly concerned, and in case there will be no peace, the Prime Minister's 'honesty' will offer us no consolation". It is still too early to appraise this cynicism's worth in terms of political expediency.

On the other hand, the government is sure to appeal to the memory of Menahem Begin, in line with Rabin's great successes in presenting himself to the voters as Begin's true successor. "The leaders of the settlers know that the idea of autonomy in its Israeli understanding enjoys a modicum of popularity in the public mind by virtue of being associated with the memory of Menahem Begin, and they recognize that this factor could make it very difficult for them to sway the public against the autonomy". In pursuit of this tactics, Begin, his Likud associates and their policies are now extolled by major columnists in the Histadrut-owned "Davar", which is the Labor party's mouthpiece. Its political commentator, Khami Shalev, writes (April 30) that "Rabin conducts the negotiations about the future of the Territories in exact conformity with Likud's ideology. He has not relinquished the Golan Heights and he keeps the option of the formal annexation of the Territories by Israel open until the very end". Shalev acknowledges that Likud has been right in accusing Rabin of having deceived the voters, because apart from the seal-off of the Territories all his policies ran amiss of what he had promised before the elections. But Shalev appreciates it when voters are deceived. "Promising to stand firmly by a rigidly defined principle in order to subsequently renge on it is no deception but a mark of sophistication in policy-making. This was done by Moshe Dayan... . This was done by Menahem Begin... . It was Yitzhak Shamir who didn’t hesitate to openly avow that ‘for the sake of the Land of Israel lying is permitted’". Unfortunately, Shamir himself didn’t lie. Contrary to what he avowed, he prided himself in doing exactly as he said. He announced he was going to fill the Territories with Jews and he at once proceeded to do exactly that. He said he would concede nothing, and has never conceded anything. True, he did deceive the Americans. But to the Israelis he kept telling the truth and behaving accordingly. The inevitable consequence of this 'honesty' was the stalemating of the peace process, our involvement in some quite superfluous settlements and the Intifada”. Remarkable as this statement is, one should beware of interpreting it to mean that unlike Shamir, Rabin tells the truth to the Americans while deceiving the Israelis. It can be seen that he deceives everybody non-stop, his closest associates included. Along with other pro-Labor journalists, Shalev advises the government to lash out at Likud for being unable to deceive its own followers intelligently. In conclusion, Shalev says that "if Rabin succeeds in delivering peace, people will soon forget all his 'deceptions'; and in case there will be no peace, the Prime Minister's 'honesty' will offer us no consolation": It is still too early to appraise this cynicism's worth in terms of political expediency.

In the meantime the power of the right wing politicians to draw crowds to their rallies bears no comparison with the noise they are capable of making in the Knesset. The rally held in Jerusalem on April 28, addressed by Netanyahu and the leaders of all other right-wing parties, drew about 4000 demonstrators, most of them recognizable as religious settlers, their various allies, or apparatchiks of various parties.
Syria

42000. ------. "Genital Cleansing [Australian forces controlled brothels in Aleppo, Syria in 1942, where strict cleaning was required by prostitutes after each client; however, abrasion from such cleaning may be a source of infections]", in AIDS Newsletter, August 1993. p. 14. [TXT]

42001. ------. "Israel Blocks Beirut's Port; Helicopter Attack Kills Six Civilians", in Arizona Daily Star, April 14, 1996. p. A18. In a new, uncompromising escalation, Israel has cut all trade to Lebanon, and staged a helicopter gunship attack on an ambulance that killed six civilians. Israel denounced continuing Hezbollah attacks that have killed zero Jews today, and which have cumulatively killed zero Jews. Maj. Gen. Amiriam Levine justified the slaughter of non-Jewish civilians, including children, in the helicopter gunship attack on the ambulance since: "...they were operating from where Hezbollah fired Katyushkas and where we have warned residents to evacuate", noting that gunship attacks on ambulances are a standard Israeli practice. The head of The head of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Philippe Gaillard, was stunned by the Israeli proclamation that ambulances are legitimate military targets, stating that such attacks break all norms of international law and humanitarian law.

Israel demanded more mass refugee movements, stating anything that moves in a broad sweep of villages is by definition Hezbollah and hence a legitimate military target. Lebanon has protested Israeli 'aggression' [sic: quotes in the original article, expressing the newspaper's support for the Israeli attack on Lebanon] before the Security Council. There is fear of the war spreading, since Israeli forces have staged attacks on Syrian army positions in Lebanon. [TXT]

42002. ------. "Israeli Troops [conduct military maneuvers in the Golan Heights as Israeli officials warn with increasing urgency that a Syrian attack on Israel is imminent; in Hebron Jewish troops attack the funeral of a Palestinian boy beaten to death by a Jewish settler]", in Wall Street Journal, October 30, 1996. p. A1. [TXT]

42003. ------. "It's a Boy! Warren, You Did It!", in World Today (CNN), April 26, 1996. Toasting the new 'peace agreement' by proclaiming 'It's a Boy!' [sic: the traditional cause of Jewish celebration, in contradiction to 'It's a Girl' which is traditional cause of Jewish dismay.], Peres proclaimed the massive Israeli devastation of southern Lebanon (destruction of roads, power plants, water systems, setting Lebanon back a decade in reconstruction, noted Brent Sadler in Beirut). Peres praised Warren Christopher for enforcing Israeli demands on the ruins of southern Lebanon, by proclaiming over champagne, "Warren You Did It!!!". Kessel characterizes Christopher's success as a 'triumph'. Warren Christopher hovered at Peres' elbow. The agreement will end Katyusha attacks, as Christopher noted 'allowing civilians to leave the airraid shelters' [Christopher seems to be speaking only to Israeli concerns, ignoring the 500000 Lebanese refugees forced to flee their homes under threat of Israeli terrorist attacks]. Israel receives an absolute guarantee of security, and Christopher announced that Israel has an absolute guarantee of security in the 'security zone' inside Lebanon, but Israel reserves right of 'self-defense' which allows Israel to attack at will.

The 'boy' agreement is seen as a plus for the Peres re-election campaign. 'Unfortunately', in the words of Gerrold Kessel (Israel CNN newsreader) the stature of Assad was enhanced by the brutality of the Israeli attacks and the misery of hundreds of thousands of Lebanese and Palestinian refugees inflicted in the Israeli terror attacks. Kessel claimed that, 'Israel has been bloodied by Katyusha missiles' [sic: total dead in Israeli zero], while noting that much of southern Lebanon is devastated. New Israeli airraids were made across southern Lebanon. The mayor of Kiryat Shmona called for further attacks on southern Lebanon since the Arabs cannot be trusted.

Warren Christopher termed the agreement a big step forward, and noted that the only goal was the extricate Israel from the crisis by 'ending the fighting'. Christopher makes no mention of any justice for the people of devastated southern Lebanon, speaking only to the needs of Jewish settlers in northern Israel and Jewish soldiers occupying southern Lebanon. Christopher concluded the fighting in southern Lebanon 'had been a good week in the peace process ... don't underestimate the merits of the agreement' a sentiment Christopher noted, that was shared by Pres. Clinton, who was delighted by the results of the Israeli attack on southern Lebanon. Oddly, the agreement is characterized as an Israeli victory since the agreement calls for an end to the 'targeting of civilians', but every civilian death has been of a Lebanese or Palestinian at the hands of Israeli terror attacks.

Israeli critics argue the agreement is not adequate since Hezbollah may still be allowed to defend itself from Israeli raids deep inside Lebanon. Kessel, adopting a clear advocacy for Israeli aggrandizement, argued that any withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon must follow 'a very long period' of complete Israeli domination of southern Lebanon, measured by the end of all resistance to the Occupationby the people of south Lebanon. Pres. Clinton stated that 'since the agreement was in writing, it is more likely to be respected' and called for 'civilians on both sides of the border' to return to their homes [Israelis to their undamaged homes. 500000 Lebanese and Palestinians refugees to a devastated wasteland, in which all infrastructure has been devastated.][TXT]
(14) Farid Makari: Forty-five year old Greek Orthodox engineer from Enfeh in the Koura. Formerly a contractor in Saudi Arabia.
(16) Omar Miskawi: Sunni lawyer from Tripoli. Former member of the Superior Islamic Law Council, and former member of the Mufti's Consultative Council. Currently head of the Association of Islamic Noble Deeds in Tripoli.
(17) Nayla Mu'awad: Maronite originally from Bsharri. Appointed in June 1991 to the seat of her deceased husband former deputy and President of the Republic Rene Muawad. Won the most votes of any Northern candidate in recent elections.
(20) Riyad Sarraf: Greek Orthodox surgeon from Akkar, born in 1928. Brother of former deputy (from 1943-1972) Ya’coub Sarraf. Works at the Islamic Hospital in Tripoli, and is popular in the area. Only candidate from Ahmad Karami's list to be elected to Parliament.
(22) Shaykh Fathy Yakan: Sunni cleric and writer from Tripoli, born in 1933. Degrees in electronic engineering and Arab and Islamic studies. Secretary General of the Jama‘ah al-Islamiyyah in Tripoli. Known for his close ties to the PLO, he ran a secular campaign, presenting himself to candidates as "Doctor" rather than as "Shaykh".

42006. -----, "The Rejections By Region: The North: Islamists Break Through Official Karami-Franjiyyeh List", in Lebanon Report, September 1992. Elections in the North took place on August 23, and were conducted on the basis of the muhafazah. In the city of Tripoli, the winners were, for the Sunni seats, Mr. Omar Karami (72355 votes), Mr. Amin al-Halif (53678), Mr. Muhammad Kabaara (54354), Mr. Omar Miskawi (46988), and Shaykh Fathy Yakan (46393); for the Alawite seat, Mr. As Ad Ed (60078); for the Maronite seat, Mr. Jean Ubayd (56385); and for the Greek Orthodox seat, Mr. Salim Habib (40020). In Tripoli district, the winners were for the three Sunni seats, Mr. Salih Khayr (49623), Mr. Mahmoud Tibbo (43055), and Mr. As ad Harmoush (3,208). In the Akkar district, the winners were, for the Sunni seats, Mr. Wajih Ba'tini (68934), Mr. Talal Mir'ibi (62062), and Mr. Hasan Iziddin (41844); for the Greek Orthodox seats, Mr. Abdallah al-Rasi (47872) and Mr. Riyad Sarraf (42688); for the Maronite seat, Mr. Mikhail Daher (63701); and for the Alawite seat, Mr. Abd al-Rahman Abd al-Rahman (61700). In the Qgharta district, the three Maronite seats were won by Mrs. Nayla Mu'awad (90599), Mr. Sulayman Tony Franjiyyeh (75098), and Mr. Estephan Duwayhi (68470). In the Koura district, the three Greek Orthodox seats were won by Mr. Salim Sa'adah (51179), Mr. Farid Maki (50800), and Mr. Fayiz Ghosn (48188). In the Bsharreh district, the two Maronite seats were won by Mr. Qabalan Isa al-Khoyu (51781) and Mr. Habib Kayrouz (51324). In the Batroun district, the two Maronite seats were won by Mr. Sayid Aqi (49550) and Mr. Manuel Younes (48682). While the results of the voting showed an overwhelming victory for Mr. Omar Karami's "List of National coalition" (25 of 28 seats) the final tally indicated that Mr. Karami had won 72358 votes, placing him only third on his list in terms of the total number of votes accumulated. Mrs. Nayla Mu'awad finished first on Mr. Karami's list with over 90000 votes, while Mr. Sulayman Tony Franjiyyeh, also on the list, won over 75000 votes. Perhaps the most significant message which came out of the elections in the North was the relatively low voter turnout. The North was generally assumed to be the region most enthusiastic towards elections, and both the government and opposition saw it as a test case for future voter participation in Beirut, Mount Lebanon, and the South. Despite statements from Minister of the Interior Sami al-Khatib that the turnout in the North varied between 65% in Tripoli, 75% in Dinniyeh in the Akkar, 20% in Batroun, 26% in Zgharta, and 15% in Bsharre, figures released by verification committees charged with counting the votes showed a different picture: in Bsharre for example, the turnout was only 7.5%, while in Tripoli it was about 40%, and in each of the two districts of Batroun and Koura it was no more than 15%. Even according to Mr. Khatib's figures, at best no more than one in four voters participated in elections in the predominantly Christian regions of the North. This was significant given the fact that the Christian North had not publicly associated itself with the movement to boycott elections called for in the Christian areas of much of Mount Lebanon, Beirut, and the South. It is generally assumed that Mr. Karami's list had official approval, and included a number of political figures acceptable to Syria. Yet on August 9, Mr. Karami publicly complained that candidates were being imposed on him in the formation of his list, and that he did not have a sufficient margin of maneuver. It was reported that Mr. Karami intended to pull out of the elections, although he later denied it.

Analysts noted that the episode probably signaled that Mr. Franjiyyeh, the major Christian candidate on the Karami list, was putting pressure on Mr. Karami to accept certain Franjiyyeh allies on the list. It was even suggested that the Syrians leaned towards Mr. Franjiyyeh, and that Mr. Karami reacted in the way he Karami after his limited victory did to reestablish the "margin of maneuver" he complained had been taken away from him. Indicating a trend that was repeated elsewhere, two members of the Sunni fundamentalist group alJama'ah al-Islamiyyah succeeded in breaking the virtual monopoly of the officially-sanctioned list. Shaysk Fathi Yakon was a seat in Tripoli, although there were few overtly religious themes in his campaign: he appeared in his posters wearing isayman's clothes, and introduced his name with the title "Doctor" rather than "Shaykh." In Tripoli district, a second Jama'ah candidate, As'ad Harmouso, also won a seat. Meanwhile, only one candidate was elected from a list headed by Mr. Karami's cousin, Mr. Ahmad Karami, named Mr. Riad Sarraf, for the Akkar. In Batroun, the significant event was the withdrawal of Mr. Boutros Harb and Mr. George Sa'adeh from the electoral race. Mr. Harb, who had been minister of education in the previous Karami government, denounced the holding of elections under current conditions, noting that the government "had at no time been able to give a valid and convincing explanation for its stubbornness in holding elections at the present time." Mr. Sa'adeh, who is also the head of the Kata'ib party, and four other Kata'ib candidates had registered their candidacies for elections in the North, but under increasing pressure from within the Christian community, they withdrew them on August 14. The Kata'ib decision was an important turning point in bringing about the withdrawal of other candidates elsewhere, especially since the party had been trying in recent months to remodel its image and appear as a national party, rather than as a parochial Christian one. Meanwhile, Mr. Sayid Aql, who won one of the Batroun seats, was expelled from the National Bloc headed by Mr. Raymond Eddi for having decided to participate in elections. The National Bloc and Mr. Eddi have repeatedly denounced what they refer to as elections "held in the shadow of occupation by foreign armed forces." According to observers, the voting in the North was characterized by tension between partisans of the various candidates, which led to fights, exchanges of insults, and worse. For example, on election day, a group of three journalists from the newspaper al-Diyar were apprehended and beaten by armed men. The journalists accused men loyal to Mr. Omar Karami of having carried out the attack because al-Diyar's owner, Mr. Charles Ayyoub, was a candidate on the rival list of Mr. Ahmad Karami. On August 26, eight unsuccessful candidates called for the formation of a commission of inquiry to look into accusations of electoral fraud. The request came at a time when the debate within political circles centered around the long- awaited formation of a Constitutional Council to "arbitrate conflicts that arise from parliamentary and presidential elections," as stipulated in article 19 of the new Lebanese constitution. The draft law for the establishment of the Council was passed by the government, but has yet to be acted on by parliament. In the interim, arbitration of electoral disputes is to be carried out by a parliamentary commission comprised of members of the new parliament. Critics charge that it is absurd to believe that the new parliamentarians will arbitrate objectively in disputes which may have a bearing on their own political future in the legislature. [ =] 42007. ------. "UK Rally by Islamic Group Blocked Under Strong Pressure", in Creasional, International, September 16-30, 1996, p. 8. An unholy coalition of politicians, policemen, Jewish groups, gay activists, the media and Arab regimes - united by a shared hatred of Islam has blocked a conference legally convened by a London-based organization. The "Rally for Survival," organized by the al-Muhajiroun group, was called off two days before it was due to be held on 9/8/1996 at a venue in East London. The cancellation followed a strong warning by the Home office (interior ministry) that anyone advocating violence at the conference would be prosecuted, and homosexuals and a right-wing Jewish student group threatened to hold demonstrations at the venue. Shaikh Omar Bakri Muhamad, (the media invariably pointed out his Syrian nationality) leader of al-Muhajiroun insisted to the last moment that the meeting would go ahead despite the mounting pressure from the British and other governments, as well as from the media and Zionist lobbies. However, he had no option but to call it a day after the management of the London Arena, Docklands, where the rally was to be held, demanded extra payments to meet increased security costs. The management, which consulted the police, denied that they were under pressure from the police or politicians to cancel the rally. Alex McRendle, general manager of the London Arena, said it had become clear that the venue's usual security arrangements would be inadequate. "The organizers had an obligation to meet any additional costs, but unfortunately due to the amounts involved they decided this morning they could not," adding that they might look for an alternative, but to cancel the rally. The London Times admitted in an editorial on 9/9/1996 that it was the contents of the rally that really worried the British establishment! Anjem Choudary, a spokesman for the organizers, told an ITV news program that the additional costs were not the only problem. "Even if we could meet the additional cost, we do not think we could maintain the security because of bomb threats and a demonstration which was to be held outside," he said. The rally took on a very high profile following reports that, in addition to the presence of hundreds of overseas activists, the rally would hear taped messages from Shaik Omar Abdur-Rahman, who is serving a life sentence in New York, Sheikh Muhammad Husain Fadhlullah, the spiritual head of Hizbullah, and Shaikh Osama bin Laden, the Saudi millionaire mujahid. A chorus of protests from Arab countries, led by Egypt, as well as from British and Jewish politicians, demanded the cancellation of the meeting and sought to portray the Shaikhs as dangerous terrorists and fugitives. As if that were not enough, the media sought to denounce British Muslim activists, even though they were not due to attend the rally, if only because some of them, like Dr. Kamil Siddiqi, were actually dead. An editorial in the conservative Daily Telegraph on 9/7/1996 warned that it would be a mistake to tar all Muslims with the radical brush, asserting that non-Muslims can do business with moderates like Dr. Zaki Badari, whereas even many Muslims would have no truck with radicals like Dr. Kalim and Omar Bakri. "Of the 1.5 million Muslims who are believed to live in this country, many have no time for those whose radical opinions make the headlines - the late Kalim Siddiqi, founder of the Muslim Parliament, or Omar Bakri Muhammad," it said. "It is with the moderate tendency, of which Dr. Zaki Badawi, principal of the Muslim college in London, is a leading member, that non-Muslims can establish a dialogue." The British, who pride themselves on their "liberal" laws, which do not allow the banning of public meetings like the "Rally for Revival," are demonizing Muslims to have cause to amend the law. Meanwhile, they use terrorist and sharp practices to block meetings by radical Muslims. In a press statement, the Muslim Parliament of Great Britain said it is "concerned that Muslims should have to pay for security," when Salman Rushdie has had millions spent on him by the British taxpayers. It appears Muslims have no right to protection for their point of view. The press release went on to point out that terrorist outfits like the Mujahidin-e-Khalq Organization (MKO), which is responsible for the deaths of thousands of innocent people in Iran, is free to organize rallies and run a radio station but Muslim activists are barred. In the case of the Muhajiroun conference, intimidation and the raising of charges for the venue have worked. The London Arena management demanded an additional fee of 15000 pounds. If it is any consolation to the al-Mahajiroun organizers, Muslims in other kuf kuf countries have faced similar tactics. In some cases, far greater security surcharges were demanded. In Toronto, Canada, when Islamic workers tried to organize an anti-Rushdie rally in 3/1989 the Toronto City Hall demanded $2 million insurance! Never before or since have such outrageous demands been made. The Muslims, however, were determined to hold their rally and did so at another venue. [ =] 42008. ------. "World Political Parties Accuse US of Intensifying Tension on Korean Peninsula, Part 2," in Peoples Korea, April 9, 1995, p. 3. The party of the congress for the independence, the military party for the establishment of the Council was passed by the government, but has yet to be held on 9/8/1996 at a venue in East London. The cancellation followed a strong warning by the Home office (interior ministry) that anyone advocating violence at the conference would be prosecuted, and homosexuals and a right-wing Jewish student group threatened to hold demonstrations at the venue. Shaikh Omar Bakri Muhammad, (the media invariably pointed out his Syrian nationality) leader of al-Muhajiroun insisted to the last moment that the meeting would go ahead despite the mounting pressure from the British and other governments, as well as from the media and Zionists. However, he had no option but to call it a day after the management of the London Arena, Docklands, where the rally was to be held, demanded extra payments to meet increased security costs. The management, which consulted the police, denied that they were under pressure from the police or politicians to cancel the rally. Alex McRendle, general manager of the London Arena, said it had become clear that the venue's usual security arrangements would be inadequate. "The organizers had an obligation to meet any additional costs, but unfortunately due to the amounts involved they decided this morning they could not," adding that they might look for an alternative, but to cancel the rally. The London Times admitted in an editorial on 9/9/1996 that it was the contents of the rally that really worried the British establishment! Anjem Choudary, a spokesman for the organizers, told an ITV news program that the additional costs were not the only problem. "Even if we could meet the additional cost, we do not think we could maintain the security because of bomb threats and a demonstration which was to be held outside," he said. The rally took on a very high profile following reports that, in addition to the presence of hundreds of overseas activists, the rally would hear taped messages from Shaik Omar Abdur-Rahman, who is serving a life sentence in New York, Sheikh Muhammad Husain Fadhlullah, the spiritual head of Hizbullah, and Shaikh Osama bin Laden, the Saudi millionaire mujahid. A chorus of protests from Arab countries, led by Egypt, as well as from British and Jewish politicians, demanded the cancellation of the meeting and sought to portray the Shaikhs as dangerous terrorists and fugitives. As if that were not enough, the media sought to denounce British Muslim activists, even though they were not due to attend the rally, if only because some of them, like Dr. Kamil Siddiqi, were actually dead. An editorial in the conservative Daily Telegraph on 9/7/1996 warned that it would be a mistake to tar all Muslims with the radical brush, asserting that non-Muslims can do business with moderates like Dr. Zaki Badari, whereas even many Muslims would have no truck with radicals like Dr. Kalim and Omar Bakri. "Of the 1.5 million Muslims who are believed to live in this country, many have no time for those whose radical opinions make the headlines - the late Kalim Siddiqi, founder of the Muslim Parliament, or Omar Bakri Muhammad," it said. "It is with the moderate tendency, of which Dr. Zaki Badawi, principal of the Muslim college in London, is a leading member, that non-Muslims can establish a dialogue." The British, who pride themselves on their "liberal" laws, which do not allow the banning of public meetings like the "Rally for Revival," are demonizing Muslims to have cause to amend the law. Meanwhile, they use terrorist and sharp practices to block meetings by radical Muslims. In a press statement, the Muslim Parliament of Great Britain said it is "concerned that Muslims should have to pay for security," when Salman Rushdie has had millions spent on him by the British taxpayers. It appears Muslims have no right to protection for their point of view. The press release went on to point out that terrorist outfits like the Mujahidin-e-Khalq Organization (MKO), which is responsible for the deaths of thousands of innocent people in Iran, is free to organize rallies and run a radio station but Muslim activists are barred. In the case of the Muhajiroun conference, intimidation and the raising of charges for the venue have worked. The London Arena management demanded an additional fee of 15000 pounds. If it is any consolation to the al-Mahajiroun organizers, Muslims in other kuf kuf countries have faced similar tactics. In some cases, far greater security surcharges were demanded. In Toronto, Canada, when Islamic workers tried to organize an anti-Rushdie rally in 3/1989 the Toronto City Hall demanded $2 million insurance! Never before or since have such outrageous demands been made. The Muslims, however, were determined to hold their rally and did so at another venue. [ =]

42009. ———. Table: "Occupational Composition of Baath Party Membership, Number and Percentage, 1980", in Middle East Policy, March 1993. p. 9. Doctors, Pharmacists: 298, 0.08%. Engineers: 1104, 0.30%. Lawyers & Judges: 401, 0.11%. Nurses: 752, 0.20%. Teachers: 19668, 5.27%. Public officials: 31390, 8.41%. Workers: 51224, 13.70%. Artisans: 3547, 0.95%. Peasants: 65859, 17.63%. Students: 183355, 49.10%. Other: 15879, 4.25%. Total: 373477.

Source: Hizb al-Baath Al-Arabi Al-Isthiraki, Tadarir al-Mu’tamar al-qutri al-thamin wa muqarrathatihi (Reports and Resolution so the Eighth Regional Congress, Damascus, 1985, pp. 35-58.) [↩]

42010. ———. Table: "Occupational Composition of Baath Party Membership, Number and Percentage, 1984", in Middle East Policy, March 1993. p. 9. Doctors, Pharmacists: 1255, 0.23%. Engineers: 3793, 0.69%. Lawyers & Judges: 688, 0.13%. Nurses: 1853, 0.35%. Teachers: 40598, 7.55%. Public officials: 48103, 8.94%. Workers: 73965, 13.75%. Artisans: 4220, 0.78%. Peasants: 74665, 13.88%. Students: 267255, 49.70%. Other: 21523, 4.00%. Total: 537864.

Source: Hizb al-Baath Al-Arabi Al-Isthiraki, Tadarir al-Mu’tamar al-qutri al-thamin wa muqarrathatihi (Reports and Resolution so the Eighth Regional Congress, Damascus, 1985, pp. 35-58.) [↩]

42011. Clinton, Bill. United Nations: Confronting the Challenges of a Broader World. President Clinton Address to the UN General Assembly, New York City, September 27, 1993. Mr. Secretary General, distinguished delegates and guests: It is a great honor for me to address you and to stand in this great chamber which symbolizes so much of the 20th century—it's darkest crises and its brightest aspirations. I come before you as the first American President born after the founding of the United Nations. Like most of the people in the world today, I was not even alive during the convulsive World War that convinced humankind of the need for this organization, nor during the San Francisco Conference that led to its birth. Yet I have followed the work of the United Nations throughout my life, with admiration for its accomplishments, with sadness for its failures, and with conviction that through common effort our generation can take the bold steps needed to redeem the mission entrusted to the UN 48 years ago. I pledge to you that my nation remains committed to helping make the UN’s vision a reality. The start of this General Assembly offers us an opportunity to take stock of where we are and as common shareholders in the progress of humankind and in the preservation of our planet. It is clear that we live at a turning point in human history. Immense and promising changes seem to wash over us every day. The Cold War is over. The world is no longer divided into two armed and angry camps. Dozens of new democracies have been born. It is a moment of miracles. We see Nelson Mandela stand side by side with President de Klerk, proclaiming a date for South Africa's first nonracial election. We see Russia's first popularly elected President, Boris Yeltsin, leading his nation on its bold democratic journey. We have seen decades of deadlock shattered in the Middle East, as the Prime Minister of Israel and the Chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization reached past intransigence and suspicion to shake each other's hands and exhilarate the entire world with the hope of peace. We have begun to see the doomsday weapons of nuclear annihilation dismantled and destroyed. Thirty-two years ago, President Kennedy warned this chamber that humanity lived under a nuclear sword of Damocles that hung by the slenderest of threads. Now, the United States is working with Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, and others to take that sword down and to lock it away in a secure vault where we hope and pray it will remain forever. It is a new era in this hall as well. The superpower standoff that for so long stymied the United Nations’ work almost from its first day has now yielded to a new promise of practical cooperation. Yet today we must all admit that there are two powerful tendencies working from opposite directions to challenge the authority of nation states everywhere and to undermine the authority of nation states to work together. From beyond nations, economic and technological forces all over the globe are compelling the world toward integration. These forces are fueling a welcome explosion of entrepreneurship and political liberalization. But they also threaten to destroy the insulation and independence of national economies, quickening the pace of change and making many of our people feel more insecure. At the same time, from within nations, the resurgent aspirations of ethnic and religious groups challenge governments on terms that traditional nation states cannot easily accommodate. These twin forces lie at the heart of the challenges not only to our national governments but also to all our international institutions. They require all of us in this room to find new ways to work together more effectively in pursuit of our national interests and to think anew about whether our institutions of international cooperation are adequate to this moment. Thus, as we marvel at this era’s promise of new peace, we must also recognize that serious threats remain. Bloody ethnic, religious, and civil wars rage from Angola to the Caucasus to Kashmir. As weapons of mass destruction fall into more hands, even small conflicts can threaten to take on murderous proportions. Hunger and disease continue to take a tragic toll, especially among the world’s children. The malignant neglect of our global environment threatens our children’s health and their very security. The repression of conscience continues in too many nations. And terrorism, which has taken so many innocent lives, assumed a horrifying immediacy for us here when militant fanatics bombed the World Trade Center and planned to attack even this very hall of peace. Let me assure you: Whether the fathers of those crimes or the mass murderers who bombed Pan Am Flight 103, my government is determined to see that such terrorists are brought to justice. At this moment of panoramic change, of vast opportunities and troubling threats, we must all ask ourselves what we can do and what we should do as a community of nations. We must once again dare to dream of what might be, for our dreams may be within our reach. For that to happen, we must all be willing to honestly confront the challenges of the broader world. That has never been easy. When this organization was founded 48 years ago, the world’s nations stood devastated by war or exhausted by its expense. There was little appetite for cooperative efforts among nations. Most people simply wanted to get on with their lives. But a farsighted generation of leaders from the United States and elsewhere rallied the world. Their efforts built the institutions of postwar security and prosperity. We are at a similar moment today. The momentum of the Cold War no longer propels us in our daily actions. And with daunting economic and political pressures upon almost every nation represented in this room, many of us are turning to focus greater attention and energy on our domestic needs and problems. And we must. But putting each of our economic houses in order cannot mean that we shut our windows to the world. The pursuit of self-renewal in many of the world’s largest and most powerful economies—in Europe, in Japan, in North America—is an essential precondition for the world’s larger ambitions.
absolutely crucial, because unless the great industrial nations can recapture their robust economic growth, the global economy will languish. Yet the industrial nations also need growth elsewhere in order to lift their own. Indeed, prosperity in each of our nations and regions also depends upon active and responsible engagement in a host of shared concerns. For example, a thriving and democratic Russia not only makes the world safer, it also can help to expand the world’s economy. A strong Russian economy will create millions of jobs worldwide. Peace in the Middle East, buttressed, as it should be, by the repeal of outdated UN resolutions, can help to unleash that region’s great economic potential and calm a perpetual source of tension in global affairs. And the growing economic power of China, coupled with greater political openness, could bring enormous benefits to all of Asia and to the rest of the world. We must help our publics to understand this distinction: Domestic renewal is an overdue tonic. But isolationism and protectionism are still poison. We must inspire our people to look beyond their immediate fears toward a broader horizon. Let me start by being clear about where the United States stands. The United States occupies a unique position in world affairs today. We recognize that, and we welcome it. Yet with the Cold War over, I know many people ask whether the United States plans to retreat or remain active in the world and, if active, to what end. Many people are asking that in our own country as well. Let me answer that question as clearly and plainly as I can. The United States intends to remain engaged and to lead. We cannot solve every problem, but we must and will serve as a fulcrum for change and a pivot point for peace. In a new era of peril and opportunity, our overriding purpose must be to expand and strengthen the world’s community of market-based democracies. During the Cold War, we sought to contain a threat to survival of free institutions. Now we seek to enlarge the circle of nations that live under those free institutions, for our dream is of a day when the opinions and energies of every person in the world will be given full expression in a world of thriving democracies that cooperate with each other and live in peace. With this statement, I do not mean to announce some crusade to force our way of life and doing things on others or to repudiate our institutions, but we now know clearly that throughout the world, from Poland to Eritrea, from Guatemala to South Korea, there is an enormous yearning among people who wish to be the masters of their own economic and political lives. Where it matters most and where we can make the greatest difference, we will patiently and firmly align ourselves with that yearning.

Today, there are still those who claim that democracy is simply not applicable to many cultures and that its recent expansion is an aberration—an accident—in history that will soon fade away. But I agree with President Roosevelt, who once said, “The democratic aspiration is no more a recent phase of human history. It is human history.” We will work to strengthen the free market democracies by revitalizing our economy here at home; by opening world trade through the GATT, the North American Free Trade Agreement, and other accords; and by updating our shared institutions, asking with you and answering the hard questions about whether they are adequate to the present challenges. We will support the consolidation of market democracy where it is taking new root, as in the states of the former Soviet Union and all over Latin America. And we seek to foster the practices of good government that distribute the benefits of democracy and economic growth fairly to all people. We will work to reduce the threat from regimes that are hostile to democracies and to support liberalization of nondemocratic states when they are willing to live in peace with the rest of us.

As a country that has over 10 different racial, ethnic, and religious groups within our borders, our policy is and must be rooted in a profound respect for all the world’s religions and cultures. But we must oppose everywhere extremism that produces terrorism and hate. And we must pursue our humanitarian goal of reducing suffering, fostering sustainable development, and improving health and living conditions, particularly for our world’s children. On efforts from export control to trade agreements to peace-keeping, we will often work in partnership with others and through multilateral institutions such as the United Nations. It is in our national interest to do so. But we must not hesitate to act unilaterally when there is a threat to our core interests or to those of our allies. The United States believes that an expanded community of market democracies not only serves our own security interests, it also advances the goals enshrined in this body’s charter and its Universal Declaration of Human rights. For broadly based prosperity is clearly the strongest form of preventive diplomacy, and the habits of democracy are the habits of peace. Democracy is rooted in compromise, not conquest. It rewards tolerance, not hatred. Democracies rarely wage war on one another. Growth in trade can be more reliable routes to prosperity than trade in arms. And the stewardship of our global environment. And democracies, with the rule of law and respect for political, religious, and cultural minorities, are more responsive to their own people and to the protection of human rights. But as we work toward this vision, we must confront the storm clouds that may overwhelm our work and darken the march toward freedom. If we do not stem the proliferation of the world’s deadliest weapons, no democracy can feel secure. If we do not strengthen the capacity to resolve conflict among and within nations, those conflicts will smother the birth of free institutions, threaten the development of entire regions, and continue to take innocent lives. If we do not nurture our people and our planet through sustainable development, we will deepen conflict and waste the very efforts that make our efforts worth doing. Let me talk more about what I believe we must do in each of these three categories: non-proliferation, conflict resolution, and sustainable development. One of our most urgent priorities must be attacking the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction—whether they are nuclear, chemical, or biological—and the ballistic missiles that can rain them down on populations hundreds of miles away. We know this is not an idle problem. All of us are still haunted by the pictures of Kurdish women and children cut down by poison gas. We saw Scud missiles dropped during the Gulf war that would have been far graver in their consequences if they had carried nuclear weapons. And we know that many nations still believe it is in their interest to develop weapons of mass destruction or to sell them or the necessary technologies to others for financial gain. More than a score of nations likely possess such weapons, and their number threatens to grow. These weapons destabilize entire regions. They could turn a local conflict into a global human and environmental catastrophe.

We simply have got to find ways to control these weapons and to reduce the number of states that possess them by supporting and strengthening the IAEA and by taking other necessary measures. I have raised non-proliferation one of our nation’s highest priorities. We intend to work to make it more deeply into the fabric of all of our relationships with the world’s nations and institutions. We seek to build a world of increasing pressures for non-proliferation but increasingly open trade and technology for those states that live by accepted international rules.

Today, let me describe several new policies that our government will pursue to stem proliferation. We will pursue new steps to control the materials for nuclear weapons. Growing global stockpiles of plutonium and highly enriched uranium are raising the danger of nuclear terrorism for all nations. We will press for an international agreement that would ban production of these materials for weapons forever. As we reduce our nuclear stockpiles, the United States has also begun negotiations toward a comprehensive ban on nuclear testing. This summer, I declared that to reduce the number of states that possess them by supporting and strengthening the IAEA and by taking other necessary measures. I have raised non-proliferation one of our nation’s highest priorities. We intend to work to make it more deeply into the fabric of all of our relationships with the world’s nations and institutions. We seek to build a world of increasing pressures for non-proliferation but increasingly open trade and technology for those states that live by accepted international rules.

Today, let me describe several new policies that our government will pursue to stem proliferation. We will pursue new steps to control the materials for nuclear weapons. Growing global stockpiles of plutonium and highly enriched uranium are raising the danger of nuclear terrorism for all nations. We will press for an international agreement that would ban production of these materials for weapons forever. As we reduce our nuclear stockpiles, the United States has also begun negotiations toward a comprehensive ban on nuclear testing. This summer, I declared that to reduce the number of states that possess them by supporting and strengthening the IAEA and by taking other necessary measures. I have raised non-proliferation one of our nation’s highest priorities. We intend to work to make it more deeply into the fabric of all of our relationships with the world’s nations and institutions.
controls in the United States to reflect the realities of the post-Cold War world, where we seek to enlist the support of our former adversaries in the battle against proliferation. At the same time that we stop deadly technologies from falling into the wrong hands, we will work with our partners to remove outdated controls that unfairly burden legitimate commerce and unduly restrain growth and opportunity all over the world. As we work to keep the world's most destructive weapons out of conflict, we must also strengthen the international community's ability to address those conflicts themselves. For as we all now know so painfully, the end of the Cold War did not bring us to the millennium of peace. Indeed, it simply removed the lid from many cauldrons of ethnic, religious, and territorial animosity. The philosopher Isaiah Berlin has said that a wounded nationalism is like a bent twig forced down so severely that when released it lashes back with fury. The world today is thick with bent and recoiling twigs of wounded communal identities. This scourge of bitter conflict has placed high demands on United Nations peace-keeping forces. Frequently the blue helmets have worked wonders.

In Namibia, El Salvador, the Golan Heights, and elsewhere, UN peace-keepers have helped to stop the fighting, restore civil authority, and enable free elections. In Bosnia, UN peace-keepers, against the danger and frustration of that continuing tragedy, have maintained a valiant humanitarian effort. And if the parties of that conflict take the hard steps needed to make a real peace, the international community, including the United States, must be ready to help in its effective implementation. In Somalia, the United States and the United Nations have worked together to achieve a stunning humanitarian rescue, saving literally hundreds of thousands of lives and restoring the conditions of security for almost the entire country. UN peace-keepers from over two dozen nations remain in Somalia today. And some, including brave Americans, have lost their lives to ensure that we complete our mission and to ensure that anarchy and starvation do not return just as quickly as they were abolished. Many still criticize UN peacekeeping, but those who do should talk to the people of Cambodia, where the UN's operations have helped to turn the killing fields into fertile soil through reconciliation. Last May's elections in Cambodia marked a proud accomplishment for that war-weary nation and for the United Nations. And I am pleased to announce that the United States has recognized Cambodia's new government. UN peace-keeping holds the promise to resolve many of this era's conflicts. The reason we have supported such missions is not, as some critics in the United States have charged, to subcontract American foreign policy but to strengthen our security, to protect our interests, and to share among nations the costs and effort of pursuing peace. Peace-keeping cannot be a substitute for our own national defense efforts, but it can strongly supplement them. Today, there is wide recognition that the UN peace-keeping ability has not kept pace with the rising responsibilities and challenges. Just 6 years ago,about 10,000 UN peace-keepers were stationed around the world. Today, the UN has some 80,000 deployed in 17 operations on 4 continents. Yet until recently, if a peace-keeping commander called in from across the globe when it was nighttime here in New York, there was no one in the peace-keeping of fice even to answer the call. When lives are on the line, you cannot let the reach of the UN exceed its grasp. As the Secretary General and others have argued, if UN peace-keeping is to be a sound security investment for our nation and for other UN members, it must adapt to new times.

Together we must prepare UN peace-keeping for the 21st century. We need to begin by bringing the rigors of military and political analysis to every UN peace mission. In recent weeks in the Security Council, our nation has begun asking harder questions about proposals for new peace-keeping missions: Is there a real threat to international peace? Does the proposed mission have clear objectives? Can an end point be identified for those who will be asked to participate? How much will the mission cost? From now on, the United Nations should address these and other hard questions for every proposed mission before we vote and before the mission begins. The United Nations simply cannot become engaged in every one of the world's conflicts. If the American people are to say yes to UN peacekeeping, the United Nations must know when to say no. The United Nations must also have the technical means to run a modern, world-class peace-keeping operation. We support the creation of a genuine UN peacekeeping headquarters with a planning staff, with access to timely intelligence, with a logistics unit that can be deployed on a moment's notice, and with a modern operations center with global communications. And the UN's operations must not only be adequately funded but also fairly funded. Within the next few weeks, the United States will be current in our peace-keeping bills. I have worked hard with the Congress to get this done. I believe the United States should lead the way, and I will work to continue to see that we pay our bills in full. But I am also committed to work with the United Nations to reduce our nation's assessment for these missions. The assessment system has not been changed since 1973. And everyone in our country knows that our percentage of the world's economic pie is not as great as it was then. Therefore, I believe our rates should be reduced to reflect the rise of other nations that can now bear more of the financial burden. That will make it easier for me as President to make sure we pay in a timely and full fashion.

Changes in the UN's peace-keeping operations must be part of an even broader program of United Nations reform. I say that, again, not to criticize the United Nations but to help us improve it. As our ambassador, Madeleine Albright, has suggested, the United States has always played a twin role to the UN—first friend and first critic. Today, corporations all around the world are finding ways to move from the Industrial Age to the Information Age, improving service, reducing bureaucracy, and cutting costs. Here in the United States, Vice President Al Gore and I have launched an effort to literally reinvent how our government operates. We see this going on in other governments around the world. Now the time has come to reinvent the way the United Nations operates as well. I applaud the initial steps the Secretary General has taken to reduce and to reform the United Nations bureaucracy. Now we must all do even more to root out waste. Before this General Assembly is over, let us establish a strong mandate for an Office of Inspector General so that it can attain a reputation for toughness, for integrity, for effectiveness. Let us build new confidence among our people that the United Nations is changing with the needs of our times. Ultimately, the key for reforming the United Nations, as in reforming our own government, is to remember why we are here and whom we serve. It is wise to recall that the first words of the UN Charter are not "We, the government," but "We, the people of the United Nations." That means in every country the teachers, the workers, the farmers, the professionals, the fathers, the mothers, the children—from the most remote village in the world to the largest metropolis—they are why we gather in this great hall. It is their futures that are at risk when we act or fail to act. It is they who ultimately pay our bills. As we dream new dreams in this age when miracles now seem possible, let us focus on the lives of those people—and especially on the children who will inherit this world. Let us work with a new urgency and imagine what kind of world we could create for them in the coming generations. Let us work with new energy to protect the world's people from torture and repression. As Secretary of State Christopher stressed at the recent Vienna Conference, human rights are not something conditional, founded by culture, but rather something universal granted by God. This General Assembly should create, at long last, a High Commissioner for Human Rights. I hope you will do so soon and with vigor and energy and conviction. Let us also work far more ambitiously to fulfill our obligations as custodians of this planet, not only to improve the quality of life for our citizens and the quality of our air and water and the earth itself but also because the roots of conflict are so often entangled with the roots of environmental neglect and the calamity of famine and disease. During the course of our campaign in the United States last year, Vice President Gore and I promised the American people major changes in our nation's policy toward the global environment. Those were promises to keep, and today the United States is doing so. Today we are working with other nations to build on the promising work of the UN's Commission on Sustainable Development.

We are working to make sure that all nations meet their commitments under the Global Climate Convention. We are seeking to complete negotiations on an accord to prevent the world's deserts from further expansion. And we seek to strengthen the World Health Organization's efforts to combat the plague of AIDS, which is not only killing millions but also exhausting the resources of nations that can least... afford it. Let us make a new commitment to the world’s children. It is tragic enough that 1.6 million children died as a result of wars over the past decade. But it is far more unforgivable that, in that same period, 40 million children died from diseases completely preventable with simple vaccines or medicine. Every day—this day, as we meet here—over 30000 of the world’s children will die of malnutrition and disease.

Our UNICEF Director, Jim Grant, has reminded me that each of those children has a name and a nationality, a family, a personality, and a potential. We are compelled to do better by the world’s children. Just as our own nation has launched new reforms to ensure that every child has adequate health care, we must do more to get basic vaccines and other treatment for curable diseases to children all over the world. It’s the best investment we’ll ever make. We can find new ways to ensure that every child grows up with clean, drinkable water, that most precious commodity of life itself. And the UN can work even harder to ensure that each child has at least a full primary education—and I mean that opportunity for girls as well as boys. And to ensure a healthier and more abundant world, we simply must slow the world’s explosive growth in population. We cannot afford to see the human race doubled by the middle of the next century. Our nation has, at last, renewed its commitment to work with the United Nations to expand the availability of the world’s family planning education and services. We must ensure that there is a place at the table for every one of our world’s children. And we can do it. At the birth of this organization 48 years ago, another time of both victory and danger, a generation of gifted leaders from many nations stepped forward to organize the world’s efforts on behalf of security and prosperity. One American leader during that period said this: “It is time we steered by the stars rather than by the light of each passing ship.” His generation picked peace, human dignity, and freedom. Those are good stars; they should remain the highest in our own firmament. Now history has granted to us a moment of even greater opportunity, when old dangers and old walls are crumbling. Future generations will judge us, every one of us, above all by what we make of this magic moment. Let us resolve that we will dream larger—that we will work harder so that they can conclude that we did not merely turn walls to rubble but, instead, laid the foundation for great things to come. Let us ensure that the tide of freedom and democracy is not pushed back by the fierce winds of ethnic hatred. Let us ensure that the world’s most dangerous weapons are safely reduced and denied to dangerous hands. Let us ensure that the world we pass to our children is healthier, safer, and more abundant than the one we inhabit today. I believe—I know—that together we can extend this moment of miracles into an age of great work and new wonders. [=

Finances: None Reported.

Political Propaganda: None Reported. [=

Mindful of the principles and humanitarian provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 8/12/1949 for the protection of war victims, of the principles and provisions of international law and of the obligations arising therefrom, to condemn the practices of the Israeli authorities in the Occupied Territories and to insist with the organs of international law the continuous refusal of Israel to respect the Geneva Conventions of 8/12/1949, all States parties to the Conventions have undertaken to respect and to ensure respect for the Conventions in all circumstances,

Recalling also all the resolutions of the General Assembly and Commission on Human Rights condemning the practices of the Israeli authorities in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel, which affirm the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, to these territories, in particular resolution 1992/2 of 2/14/1992 of the Commission on Human Rights,

Taking note of the reports of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories submitted to the General Assembly and the relevant reports of the ILO, the UNESCO and the WHO,

Recalling with great concern the press releases issued by the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva on 1/13/1988, on 8/18/1988 and on 5/21/1992 with respect to repeated violations by Israel of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and the continuous refusal of Israel to apply the provisions of the Convention in the occupied territories,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions in this respect,

Deeply alarmed at the persistent refusal of Israel to respect the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and the refusal of Israel to apply the provisions of the Convention in the occupied territories,

1. Reaffirms that the Israeli occupation of Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem, itself constitutes a gross and systematic violation of human rights and an aggression under international law;

2. Also reaffirms that the continued perpetration by the Israeli occupation authorities of deliberate killings of Palestinians, including children, breaking limbs of young men and causing grave harm to their physical integrity, subjecting cities, villages and camps to living conditions designed to strangulate and destroy them by imposing curfews, as happened in the Gaza Strip on 5/25/1992, and preventing their provision with food and medical supplies, firing gas bombs into houses, mosques, churches and hospitals, thus causing the death of many people by asphyxia, severely beating pregnant women and throwing gas bombs inside their homes, thereby causing them to miscarry, torturing Palestinian detainees, imposing collective punishment and administrative detention upon thousands of Palestinians, expelling and deporting Palestinians from their homeland, confiscating land and establishing Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories, bringing Jewish immigrants from several parts of the world and settling them on these territories, thus modifying their demographic character, closing schools and universities and desecrating holy places and demolishing houses, all constitute grave violations of the principles of international law and the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights:

3. Further reaffirms that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, is applicable to the Palestinians and to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel, and that the continued disregard and rejection of the provisions of the Convention by Israel constitute gross violations of the principles of international law, and that it is therefore the responsibility of the international community to provide protection for the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions and the provisions of the Convention, until the end of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian and other Arab territories;

4. Calls upon the States parties to the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, to apply article 1 of the Convention, to ensure respect by Israel for the Convention and to secure protection for the Palestinian people under occupation, until the end of this occupation;

5. Reaffirms once again the right of the Palestinian people to resist the Israeli occupation by all means, in accordance with United Nations resolutions, and affirms that the intifadah of the Palestinian people, which began on 12/8/1987, is one such means confirming their determination to liberate their land from Israeli occupation and to exercise their inalienable national rights on their national soil, above all their right to self-determination;

6. Also reaffirms the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to return to their homeland in accordance with General Assembly resolution 194 (III) of 12/12/1948, to self-determination without foreign interference and to establish their independent sovereign State on their national soil, in accordance with the principles and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Commission on Human Rights, and the right to self-determination of all peoples;

7. Condemns the policy of Israel for: (a) Its gross violations of the rules of international law and of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and calls upon Israel to desist immediately from those practices and to withdraw from the Palestinian territories and other occupied Arab territories, in accordance with the principles of international law and the relevant United Nations resolutions; (b) Establishing Israeli settlements in the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories and calls for them to be dismantled, and confirms that all measures taken by Israel with the purpose of annexing these territories or altering the political, cultural, religious or other character of Jerusalem and the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967 are illegal, null and void: (c) Its continued occupation of the Syrian Golan and its defiance of the relevant United Nations resolutions, in particular Security Council resolutions 47 (1981) of 12/17/1981, and reaffirms that the decision by Israel in 1981 to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Golan is null and void; (d) The inhuman treatment and terrorist practices in violation of human rights which the Israeli occupation authorities continue to exercise against Syrian Arab Citizens in the occupied Syrian Golan for their refusal to carry Israeli identity cards and in order to force them to carry such cards, practices which constitute a flagrant violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and requests all States and competent international organizations not to recognize any Israeli laws, jurisdiction or administration in respect of the occupied Syrian territory;

8. Reiterates its support for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations, in which all parties to the conflict, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, would participate on an equal footing, and with the participation of the permanent members of the Security Council on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 11/22/1967, and 338 (1973) of 10/22/1973, as well as of all relevant General Assembly resolutions, in particular those that define and confirm the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, particularly their right to self-determination, and calls for the withdrawal of the Israeli occupation forces from all occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem;

9. Confirms that any attempt to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict outside the framework of the above mentioned international conference or that is not based on the international legitimacy constituted by the principles of international law that govern armed conflicts among countries, as well as the relevant United Nations resolutions on Palestine and the Middle East, will not contribute to solving the real problem, and will maintain the current conflict that threatens the area with continuous wars;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Subcommission, at its forty-fifth session, with an updated list of reports, studies, statistics and other documents relating to the question of Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, with the texts of the most recent relevant United Nations decisions and resolutions and the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and other Arabs of the Occupied Territories, and with all other information relevant to the implementation of the present resolution.
International Committee of the Red Cross on 5/23/1993, concerning the continuing violation by Israel of the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 9/12/1949, including the deportation of Palestinian citizens from their territory, the killing of civilians, including children, and the application of the policy of collective punishment against the Palestinian people. Reaffirming its previous resolutions in this respect, the most recent being resolution 44/10 of 8/26/1999.

Deeply alarmed at the persistent refusal of Israel to respect the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and to apply it to the Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territories, and at the systematic and established violations of human rights by Israel over the past 26 years and its persistence in killing, wounding and arresting Palestinian people and in deporting and expelling Palestinian citizens.

Taking into account the ongoing process of negotiation between the parties concerned since the Peace Conference on the Middle East convened at Madrid, and encouraging this process to reach speedily a just and lasting peace settlement on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 11/22/1967 and 338 (1973) of 10/22/1973 and all other relevant United Nations resolutions.

1. Reaffirms that the Israeli occupation of Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem, itself constitutes a gross and systematic violation of human right and an aggression underinternational law;

2. Also reaffirms that the continued perpetration by the Israeli occupation authorities of deliberate killings of Palestinians, including children, breaking limbs of young men and causing grave harm to their physical integrity, subjecting cities, villages and camps to living conditions designed to strangle and destroy them by imposing curfews, as happened in the Gaza Strip on 5/25/1992, and preventing their provision with food and medical supplies, firing gas bombs into houses, mosque, churches and hospitals, thus causing the death of many people by asphyxia, everely beating pregnant women and throwing gas bombs inside their homes, thereby causing them to miscarry, torturing Palestinian detainees, imposing collective punishment and administrative detention upon thousands of Palestinians, expelling and deporting Palestinians from their homeland, confiscating land and establishing Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories, bringing Jewish immigrants from several parts of the world and setting them on these territories, thus modifying their demographic character, closing schools anduniversities, desecrating holy places and demolishing houses, all constitute grave violations of the principles of international law and the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 9/12/1949, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;

3. Further reaffirms that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, is applicable to the Palestinians and to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel, and that the continued disregard and rejection of the provisions of the Convention by Israel constitute gross violations of the principles of international law, and that it is therefore the responsibility of the international community to provide protection for the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions and the provisions of the Convention, until the end of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian and other Arab territories;

4. Calls upon the States parties to the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 8/12/1949, to apply article 1 of the Convention, to ensure respect by Israel for the Convention and to secure protection for the Palestinian people under occupation, until the end of this occupation;

5. Reaffirms once again the right of the Palestinian people to resist the Israeli occupation by all means, in accordance with United Nations resolutions, and affirms that the intifadah of the Palestinian people, which began on 12/8/1987, is one such means confirming their determination to liberate their land from Israeli occupation and to exercise their inalienable national rights on their national oil, above all their right to self-determination;

6. Also reaffirms the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to return to their homeland in accordance with General Assembly resolution 194 (III) of 12/12/1948, to self-determination without foreign interference and to establish their independent sovereign Staton their national soil, in accordance with the principles and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, and resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Commission on Human Rights;

7. Condemns the policy of Israel for: (a) Its gross violations of the rules of international law and of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and call upon Israel to desist immediately from those practices and to withdraw from the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories, in accordance with the principles of international law and the relevant United Nations resolutions; (b) Continuing the policy of deporting Palestinian citizens and for expelling them from their homeland, as happened to more than 400 Palestinian citizens on 12/17/1992, and calls upon Israel to comply with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, the most recent being resolution 799 (1992) of 12/18/1992, as well as with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights, and to refrain from such a policy, which violate the principles of international law; (c) Establishing Israeli settlements in the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories and calls for them to be dismantled, and confirm that all measures taken by Israel with the purposes of annexing these territories or altering the political, cultural, religious or other character of Jerusalem and the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967 are illegal, null and void; (d) Its continued occupation of the Syrian Golan and its defiance of the relevant United Nations resolutions, in particular Security Council resolution 497 (1981) of 12/17/1981, and reaffirms that the decision by Israel in 1981 to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Golan is null and void; (e) The inhuman treatment and terrorist practices in violation of human rights which the Israeli occupation authorities continue to exercise against Syrian Arab citizens in the occupied Syrian Golan for their refusal to carry Israeli identity cards and in order to force them to carry such cards, practices which constitute a flagrant violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, and requests all States and competent international organizations not to recognize any Israeli laws, jurisdiction or administration in respect of the occupied Syrian territory;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the SubCommission, at its forty-sixth session, with an updated list of reports, studies, statistics and other documents relating to the question of Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, with the texts of the most recent relevant United Nations decisions and resolutions and the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories, and with all other information relevant to the implementation of the present resolution." [=]

42015. DPR. "SubCommission On prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities Adopts Resolution on Situation In The Palestinian and Other Arab Occupied Territories By Israel", in DPR, August 1991. At its 27th meeting, on 8/23/1991, the Subcommission of the Commission on Human Rights adopted the following resolution concerning the situation in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel (E/CN.4/1992/2).

The Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Guided by the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the two International Covenants on Human Rights, in particular the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples,

Mindful of the principles and humanitarian provisions of the four Geneva Conventions of 1949, of the principles and provisions of international law and of the obligations arising from the Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, annexed to the Hague Convention No. IV of 1907.

Noting that, in accordance with article 1 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, all States parties to the Conventions have undertaken to respect and to ensure respect for the Conventions under all circumstances,

Recalling all the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights condemning the practices of the Israeli occupation authorities in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel, which affirm the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 8/12/1949 to these territories,

Taking note of the reports of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories submitted to the General Assembly and the relevant reports of the International Labour Organisation, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization,

Recalling with concern the press releases issued by the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva on 1/13/1988 and on 8/18-19/1988 with respect to repeated violations by Israel of the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949 and its continuous refusal to apply the provisions of the Convention in the occupied territories,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions in this respect,

Deeply alarmed at the persistent refusal of Israel to respect the Fourth Geneva Convention and to apply it to the Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territories, and at the systematic and established violations of human rights by Israel over the past twenty-four years and its persistence in perpetrating acts of killing, wounding and arresting against the Palestinian people and in the deportation and expulsion of Palestinian citizens,

1. Reaffirms that the Israeli occupation of Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem, itself constitutes a gross and systematic violation of human rights and further constitutes aggression under international law;

2. Also reaffirms that the continued perpetration by the Israeli occupation authorities of deliberate killing of Palestinians, including children, breaking the limbs of young men and causing grave harm to their physical integrity, subjecting cities, villages and camps to living conditions designed to strangulate and destroy them by imposing curfews and preventing their provision with food and medical supplies, firing gas bombs into houses, mosques, churches and hospitals, thus causing the death of many people by asphyxia, severely beating pregnant women and throwing gas bombs inside their homes, thereby causing them to miscarry, torturing Palestinian detainees, imposing collective punishment and administrative detention upon thousands of Palestinians, expelling and deporting Palestinians from their homeland, confiscating land and establishing Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories, bringing Jewish immigrants from several parts of the world and settling them on these territories, thus modifying their demographic character, closing schools and universities, desecrating holy places and demolishing houses, all constitute grave violations of international law and the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949;

3. Further reaffirms that the Fourth Geneva Convention is applicable to the Palestinians and to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel, and that the continued disregard and rejection of the provisions of the Convention by Israel constitute gross violations of the principles of international law, and that it is therefore the responsibility of the international community provide protection for the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation, in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions and the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention, until the end of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian and other Arab territories;

4. Calls upon the States parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention to apply article 1 of the Convention, to ensure respect by Israel for the Convention and to secure protection for the Palestinian people under occupation in accordance with articles 9-12 of the Convention;

5. Reaffirms once again the right of the Palestinian people to resist the Israeli occupation by all means, in accordance with United Nations resolutions, and affirms that the act of resistance by the Palestinian people which began on 8 December 1987, is one such means of confirming their determination to liberate their land from the Israeli occupation and to exercise their national rights on their national soil;

6. Also reaffirms the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to return to their homeland, to self-determination without foreign interference and to establish their independent sovereign State on their national soil, in accordance with resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Commission on Human Rights, and the principle of the right to self-determination of all peoples;

7. Condemns Israel for: (a) Its gross violations of the rules of international law and of the Fourth Geneva Convention, of 12 August 1949 through the systematic practices mentioned in the present resolution, and calls upon Israel to desist immediately from those practices and to withdraw from the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by force, in accordance with the principles of international law and the relevant United Nations resolutions; (b) Establishing Israeli settlements in the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories and calls for them to be dismantled and confirms that all measures taken by Israel with the purpose of annexing these territories or altering the political, cultural, religious or other character of Jerusalem and the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967 are illegal, null and void; (c) Its continued occupation of the Syrian Golan and its defiance of the relevant United Nations resolutions, in particular Security Council resolution 497 (1981) of 12/17/1981, and reaffirms that the decision by Israel in 1981 to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Golan is null and void; (d) The inhuman treatment and terrorist practices in violation of human rights which the Israeli occupation authorities continue to exercise against Syrian Arab citizens in the occupied Syrian Golan for their refusal to carry Israeli identity cards and in order to force them to carry such cards, practices which constitute a flagrant violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 8/12/1949, and requests all States and competent international organizations not to recognize any Israeli laws, jurisdiction or administration in respect of the occupied Syrian territory;

8. Reiterates its support for the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations, in which all parties to the conflict, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, would participate on an equal footing, and with the participation of the permanent members of the Security Council on the basis of Security Council resolution 242 (1967) of 11/22/1967, as well as of all relevant General Assembly resolutions, in particular those that define and confirm the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, particularly their right to self-determination, and calls for the withdrawal of the Israeli occupation forces from all occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories, including Jerusalem;

9. Confirms that any attempt to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict outside the framework of the above-mentioned international conference or that is not based on the international legitimacy constituted by the principles of international law that govern armed conflicts among countries, as well as the relevant United Nations resolutions on Palestine and the Middle East, will not contribute to solving the real problem, and will maintain the current conflict that threatens the area with continuous wars;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the SubCommission, at its forty-fourth session, with an updated list of reports, studies, statistics and other documents relating to the question of Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, with the texts of the most recent relevant United Nations decisions and resolutions and the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and other Arabs of the Occupied
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Syria

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

====================================================================================================

Territories, and with all other information relevant to the implementation of the present resolution. [27th meeting 8/23/1991.] [=]

42016. DPR. "UNICEF Executive Board Approves Programme Expenditures For Middle East and North Africa Region, Including Funding For Palestinian Women and Children", in Division for Palestinians Rights, April 1994. On 4/27/1994, the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) approved $40 million from general resources and $102 million in supplementary funding, as it reviewed country programme recommendations for five countries of the Middle East and North Africa region, as well as those for Palestinian women and children in Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic and the West Bank and Gaza. (The recommendations are contained in document E/ICEF/1994/P/L.23.) In introducing the country programmes, Mr. Sarojini Vittachi, UNICEF Regional Director for the Middle East and North Africa, stated that the prospect of peace offered a unique opportunity for regional development and for a renewed commitment to put children first. The regional office had encouraged an adaptive but strengthened country programming process, entailing more participation by key government sectors, non-governmental organizations, other United Nations agencies, and donor in-country missions (see ICEF/1794). [=]

42017. DPR. "World Health Assembly Adopts Resolution Concerning Health Conditions of the Arab Population In The Occupied Territories, Including Palestine", in DPR, in DPR, May 1992. The World Health Assembly, at its forty-fifth session, adopted the following resolution at Geneva on 5/14/1992 (see WHA 45.26):

The Forty-fifth World Health Assembly,

Mindful of the basic principle established in the WHO Constitution, which affirms that the health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security,

Seriously concerned by violations of human rights in the occupied Arab territories, Recalling the need for the occupying power to observe strictly its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention (1949), to which it has notably not conformed in such basic areas as health,

Aware of its responsibility for ensuring proper health conditions for all people who are victims of exceptional situations, including settlements that are contrary to the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949,

Recognizing the need for increased support and assistance for the Palestinian people, as well as the Syrian Arab people in the Golan under Israeli occupation, and for stronger cooperation with them,

Expressing its deep concern at the negative effects of the practices of the occupying power against the Palestinian people in the field of health during the Intifadah, at a time when social and economic conditions in the territory were deteriorating,

Expressing deep satisfaction at the commencement of peace talks among the parties concerned in the Middle East, starting with the Madrid Conference and continuing in the peace negotiations between the said parties,

Expressing the hope that these talks will lead to a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, based on the principles of international legitimacy and, in particular, on relevant United Nations resolutions,

Regretting the refusal of the Israeli authorities to allow the Special Committee of Experts to visit the occupied Arab territories,

Having considered the report of the Director-General on the Health conditions of the Arab population in the occupied Arab territories, including Palestine, [WHO document A/45/31.]

1. Asserts WHO's responsibility to promote for the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health as one of the fundamental rights of every human being,

2. Expresses the hope that the peace talks will lead quickly to a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, so that the Palestinian people can develop their health plans and projects to participate with the peoples of the world in the achievement of WHO's objective of 'Health for All by the Year 2000.

3. Expresses concern at the deterioration in the health conditions of the Arab population in the occupied Arab territories affirming that it is the role of the World Health Organization to assist in the provision of health care to the Palestinian people and the other Arab populations in the occupied Arab territories;

4. Stresses that the policies of the Israeli authorities in the occupied Arab territories are not consistent with the development of a healthy and free people in the needs of the population of the occupied Arab territories, and that it is the role of the international community in its contribution to the peace process to assist the Palestinian people in their efforts to enjoy this basic human right and the privilege of being responsible for their own health system;

5. Deplores the continuing deterioration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories, which seriously affects the living conditions of the people, compromises in a lasting fashion the future of the Palestinian society, and prevents the economic and social development of those territories;

6. Expresses its deep concern at the Israeli refusal to permit the Special Committee of Experts to visit the occupied Arab territories, requesting that Israel allow the Committee to fulfill its mission of investigating the health conditions of the populations in those territories;

7. Thanks the Chairman of the Special Committee of Experts for his note and requests the Special Committee of Experts to continue its mission and report on the health conditions of the Arab population in the occupied Arab territories to the Fortysixth World Health Assembly;

8. Recalls resolutions WHA42.14, WHA43.26 and WHA44.31 and commends the Organization’s efforts to prepare and implement the special technical assistance to improve the health conditions of the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories;

9. Thanks the Director-General for his efforts, requesting him, in the light of relevant Health Assembly resolutions; (1) to continue the efforts to implement the special assistance programme, emphasizing the primary health care approach, in coordination with all Member States, observers referred to in Health Assembly resolutions related to this item, and all other organizations involved in health and humanitarian activities; (2) to further coordinate health activities, in particular in priority areas such as maternal and child health, an expanded programme of immunization, water supply, sanitation and prevention of pollution; (3) to monitor and evaluate the health conditions of the Arab population in the occupied Arab territories, in particular the proposals contained in the reports of the Special Committee of Experts, and given the deterioration of the health conditions of the inhabitants of those territories, to adopt all available measures in this regard, and to assist the Palestinian people in developing health manpower capable of shouliding the responsibility of their health; (4) to pursue the implementation of special technical assistance to improve the health conditions of the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories, in cooperation with all WHO Members and observers referred to in Health Assembly resolutions related to this item, taking into consideration a comprehensive health plan for the Palestinian people; (5) to provide the systematic support required to the WHO collaborating health centres in the occupied Arab territories, and strongly encourage the management of those theses by Palestinian experts; (6) to continue his efforts to seek funds from extrabudgetary sources in support of the special technical assistance programme; (7) to report on the above to the Forty-sixth World Health Assembly;

10. Calls on all Member States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute to the special assistance programme to improve the health conditions of the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories." [13th plenary meeting 5/14/1992.] [=]

42018. DS. "Lebanon: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
regimes are often detained without charges for short periods of time. The broadcaster. The Public Prosecutor has asked for prison sentences of 3 murder charges in cases involving the murder of adulterous wives. By Communications Network (ICN). The station, owned by the publisher of so-called crimes of honor. Men, for example, are typically acquitted of Government moved to close one of its critics, the Independent conduct investigations in areas outside effective government control also standards or promote Israel. The honor code has no discernible impact a backlog of cases that had developed during the civil war. An inability to enmity, slander Lebanese leaders or friendly nations, violate moral shortage of judges, dealt a blow to efforts to speed adjudication and erase programming which would disturb public order, stir ethnic or sectarian religious affiliation. The resignation, aggravating an already severe and major stations signed an honor code in February banning of judges like other government appointments, is allocated on the basis of Parliament. Pending passage of new regulations, the Information Minister organization of the broadcast media- this proposal is controversial, including Freedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Taif Accord also increased the number of seats in parliament and transferred some powers from the President to the Prime Minister and Cabinet. Women have the right to vote, and there are no legal barriers to participation by women in politics. Three women were elected to Parliament in 1992. Other women hold policy-level positions in the Government. Palestinian refugee have no political right. An estimated 17 Palestinian fragment operate in Lebanon, generally organized around prominent individuals. Most Palestinians live in refugee camps controlled by one or more factions. The leaders of the refugees are not elected, nor are there any democratically organized institutions in the camps. [=] 42019. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon; Part 06: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Each confessional group has its own court for family and personal status cases. There is a separate military court system. In refugee camps, Palestinian element operate an autonomous and arbitrary system of justice; rival Palestinian factions often try their opponents without due process. Although Lebanese law provides the right to a fair public trial and the judiciary is considered independent and relatively impartial, influential politicians continued to intervene successfully to protect supporters from detention and prosecution. Government interference in the judicial process and low judicial salaries led to the resignation of several prominent judges and to corruption and bribery of others. The Government took steps to adjust salaries in September. The appointment of judges like other government appointments, is allocated on the basis of religious affiliation. The resignations, aggravating an already severe shortage of judges, dealt a blow to efforts to speed adjudication and erase a backlog of cases that had developed during the civil war. An inability to conduct investigations in areas outside effective government control also caused trial delays. The legal system is discriminatory in its handling of so-called crimes of honor. Men, for example, are typically acquitted of murder charges in cases involving the murder of adulterous wives. By law, in some instances a female's testimony before a notary public carries half the weight of that of a male. There are no known political prisoners, although political opponents of the Syrian and Lebanese regimes are often detained without charges for short periods of time. [=] 42020. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon; Part 09: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (a) Freedom of Speech and Press", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Lebanon has a long heritage of freedom of opinion, speech, and press, although many Lebanese journalists have been killed and kidnapped in the past two decades by Lebanese and foreign factions. Although there were repeated attempts to muzzle the media, Lebanon has continued to be a free country. The Government's policies and leaders continued. Dozens of newspapers and magazines are published throughout Lebanon, financed by various Lebanese and foreign groups. While the press is nominally independent, press content often reflects the opinions of these financial backers. In addition, a legal framework exists to impose restrictions on the media. Some restrictive press regulations were imposed during the civil war but remain in place, such as Decree 104 of 1977. Laws prohibit attacks on the dignity of the head of state or of foreign leaders, authorize the prosecutor general to shut newspapers for up to 1 week without reference to the courts if articles appear that, in the view of the authorities, threaten Lebanese foreign relations or incite sectarian conflict, and prohibit the publication of state secrets. A special publication court exists to try cases involving these matters. The 1991 Lebanese-Syrian security agreement contains a provision effectively banning informational activity that could endanger the security of either state. In April and May the Government temporarily shut down three newspapers. Nida’ Al-Watan, owned by a vocal Maronite critic of Prime Minister Harray, was accused of inciting sectarian discord and suspended for 38 days. It had alleged that Hariri was buying Christian church property in a bid to Islamize Lebanon. Al-Safir, one of Lebanon’s most popular dailies, was closed for publishing alleged state secrets. It had printed the text of an Israeli proposal submitted to the Lebanese delegation to the Middle East peace talks. During the paper’s 1-week suspension, it appeared using a valid permit for the moribund Beirut Al-Masa’ newspaper. Trials in both cases are under way. Al-Shara was closed for 1 week after printing a cartoon that was deemed insulting to the President’s family. In October the Public Prosecutor charged two newspapers Al-Liwa and Ad-Diyar, with slandering government officials. The Government also made a new charge against Nida’ Al-Watan in October for publishing a story alleging that Japanese Red Army members were present in Lebanon. The authorities denied the story and said it harmed Lebanon’s reputation. A pro-Awn publication was closed in October for distributing pornography. Direct press criticism of Syria and its role in Lebanon virtually vanished in 1993. One leading journalist was subjected to anonymous threats after writing columns critical of aspects of Syrian policy in Lebanon. Other reporters described a widespread practice of self-censorship on matters related to Syria. Diverse political groups, particularly former militias, operated a wide variety of unregulated radio and television stations. As these groups accepted the spread of state authority and began to manage their broadcasts on a commercial basis, heavily slanted propaganda diminished. The Taif accord calls for the regulation and organization of the broadcast media- this proposal is controversial, however, and the Government has not submitted a draft law to Parliament. Pending passage of new regulations, the Information Minister and major stations signed an honor code in February banning programming which would disturb public order, stir ethnic or sectarian enmity, slander Lebanese leaders or friendly nations, violate moral standards or promote Israel. The honor code has no discernible impact on broadcasting. Exploiting the absence of a legal framework, the Government moved to close one of its critics, the Independent Communications Network (ICN). The station, owned by the publisher of Nida’ Al-Watan, was accused of inciting sectarian discord. In late December, the Civil Court permitted ICN to resume broadcasting and scheduled for February a hearing of the Government’s case against the broadcaster. The Public Prosecutor has asked for prison sentences of 3 years for ICN management. Lebanon’s partially state-owned television station, Tele-Liban, had long enjoyed virtual autonomy with respect to its news and public affairs programming. The Cabinet, however, reasserted in August the Information Minister’s legal right to monitor and effectively control Tele-Liban’s activities. In 1993 the Government revived police control over all nonperiodical publications, books, foreign magazines, plays, and films, which must be submitted to the Public Security Directorate for approval before distribution. A prize-winning film on national reconciliation was banned for several months and released only after the producer made some changes. The police briefly closed a play, The Rabbit and the Saints, acting on a request from the Maronite church. Censors later reversed the decision. Police confiscated a novel, "Garden of the Senses," by a well-known foreign author. It had been published in several other countries. Lebanon has a strong tradition of academic freedom and a nourishing private educational system, born from the inadequacy of public schools and an attachment to sectarian affiliations. Students exercise the right to form campus associations, and the Government does not usually interfere with student groups. The Government's arrests of students sympathetic to the exiled General Michel 'Awn and to the Lebanese Forces in 1992 chilled student activism among those students in 1993. [s]

42021. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (a) Political and Other Extra-Judicial "Killings", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Credible sources report that undercover units disguised as Palestinians killed 27 Palestinians as of late November. This number represents a significant decrease from the 45 Palestinians reported killed by undercover units in 1992. As in 1992, the task of the undercover units appeared to have been to arrest activists wanted by the authorities for serious crimes. The undercover units also focused on stone-throwers or graffiti-writers. Human rights organizations continued to charge that the undercover units targeted certain activists, in some cases killing suspects under circumstances in which it may have been possible to apprehend the without killing. Israeli authorities acknowledge the operation of special undercover units whose members circulate among Palestinian activists and claim that such units observe standard rules of engagement applicable to other IDF units and that all killings and allegations of misbehavior are investigated. Investigations of abuses by IDF troops are conducted by IDF investigators. These investigations rarely result in imposition of serious punishment. According to the Israeli Government, the investigation into the killing of a child by an undercover unit did result in an undercover unit lieutenant's conviction on charges of negligence. The officer was sentenced to 6 months' imprisonment and was demoted to the rank of sergeant. According to some human rights groups, the General Security Service (GSS) was responsible for at least one extrajudicial killing—the death of Omar Khamis Yusef Al-Ghula who, according to eyewitnesses, was handcuffed and offering no resistance when he was shot by a security officer on January 27. The Israeli Government states that members of an army patrol shot and killed Al-Ghula, while he was in their custody, when he attempted to draw a handgun. The military prosecutor for Gaza investigated this case. He concluded that the soldiers acted in accordance with the rules of engagement and that the file be closed. Palestinian attacks against Israeli soldiers and civilians in 1993 resulted in the deaths of 49 Israelis in the occupied territories, compared to 23 such deaths in 1992. Most deaths were by knife or gunfire. After a series of killings and stabbings of Israeli soldiers and civilians in Israel and the occupied territories in the first 3 months of the year, the Government sealed off the West Bank and Gaza from Jerusalem and Israel on March 29 for an indefinite period as a means of reducing the number of Palestinian attacks on Israelis. As of mid-December, 79 Palestinians had been killed by other Palestinians, most often because of alleged collaboration with Israeli security services but also because of disputes between political factions or street gangs or because of personal feuds. These killings included Palestinian women accused of collaboration with Israeli authorities, infidelity, or prostitution. (The Government of Israel claims that 139 Palestinians were killed by other Palestinians in 1993.) Sixty-six of these killings took place in Gaza, a dramatic decrease from 149 killings in 1992; in the West Bank, the phenomenon continued a downward trend begun in 1992. During the October to December period, there were credible reports of IDF inaction during several Settler attacks, which occurred usually in retaliation for the killing of a settler, on Palestinians and their homes and property. In late December the IDF appeared to investigate Settler incidents more vigorously two separate incidents in which Palestinians were killed, reportedly by settlers, and it appeared that by the end of the year the IDF had begun taking stronger measures to protect Palestinians from settler attacks. These measures included the provision by the IDF's Judge Advocate General to IDF officers of a 14-page handbook on how to deal with disturbances involving Israeli citizens in the occupied territories. According to that guidance, soldiers were authorized to arrest Israelis if they were breaking the law. Israeli authorities prosecute Palestinians accused of killing other Palestinians as well as those accused of killing Israelis, and, although there is no capital punishment, sentences are severe. Palestinians suspected of killing Israelis and alleged collaborators have been a principal target of undercover unit operations. The Government also prosecutes Israelis accused of killing Palestinians, though sentences given to Israelis are generally much lighter than sentences handed down to Palestinians convicted of killing either Israelis or Palestinians. [s]

42022. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 05: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (d) Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. As of the end of 1993, a total of 9573 Palestinians were incarcerated in IDF (5308) and prison service facilities. Of those, roughly 68% had been tried and were serving sentences, 29.6% were awaiting charges or trial, and 2.3% were detained administratively, i.e., sentenced to a specific period of detention without formal charge or trial. In October Israel released 617 Palestinian prisoners as a goodwill gesture following the signing of the Declaration of Principles. At the end of the year, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were discussing the timing and numbers of additional releases. Since the beginning of the intifada in late 1987, Israel has routinely transferred Palestinian prisoners from the occupied territories to detention facilities within Israel especially to the Ketziot camp in the Negev desert and Megiddo prison near Afuia. This practice, which continued in 1993, contravenes Article 76 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. Estimates of the number of Palestinian residents of the occupied territories incarcerated within Israel range up to 7000. In late 1993, there were indications that Palestinian prisoners were being transferred from detention centers in Gaza to facilities in Israel prior to the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza scheduled to begin on December 13. The use of administrative detention for alleged security reasons without formal charges or a full opportunity for detainees to defend themselves continued in 1993. As of October, 277 Palestinians were held in administrative detention, compared to 620 held at the end of 1992. Detention periods are for a maximum of 6 months and are renewable. Evidence used at hearings frequently is declared secret and unavailable either to the detainee or his attorney. Israeli officials state that administrative detention is used only when IDF legal advisors have determined that there is sufficient evidence to detain a person and that the evidence has been corroborated by two sources. They assert, however, that the evidence cannot be presented in open court because to do so would Compromise the method of acquiring the evidence, which is often provided by informers whose lives would be jeopardized if their identities were known. Human rights monitors contend that administrative detention is often used when evidence against a suspect would not stand up in court. District military commanders may order administrative detention without formal Charges. Detainees may appeal detention orders or renewal of detention before a military judge.
Attorneys may question security service witnesses concerning the general nature of that evidence. The Supreme Court may review rulings by military Judges and may examine secret evidence. Any soldier may arrest without warrant a person who has committed, or is suspected of having committed, a criminal or security offense. Persons over age 12 are treated as adults by the court system. Persons arrested for common crimes are usually provided the opportunity for bail, access to an attorney, and a preliminary hearing. In the Occupied Territories, these opportunities are sometimes delayed. Bail is rarely available to those arrested for security offenses. Special summonses are reportedly issued to Palestinians wanted by authorities for security reasons. Israeli Military Order 1369 allows authorities to sentence to 7 years' imprisonment any person who does not respond to a special summons that is delivered to him or a family member or is posted in the Civil Administration office nearest his home address. Persons may be held in custody without a warrant for 96 hours and then must be released unless a warrant is issued. A warrant may be issued by a police officer for two periods of 7 days each. For extensions beyond 18 days from the date of arrest, the detainee has to be brought before a military judge, at which point he is entitled to defense counsel. In 1992 Israeli authorities shortened this period to 8 days for minors and those accused of less serious offenses (such as stone throwing). A military judge may extend the detention for a period of no longer than 6 months from the date of arrest. If there is no indictment during this period, the detainee must be released. If there is an indictment, a judge may order indefinite detention until the end of the trial, though the detention may be appealed. In theory a detainee has the right to see a lawyer as soon as possible. In the cases of security detainees, however, officers routinely issue a written order to delay access to counsel for up to 16 days for reasons of security or to conduct the investigation. Higher ranking officials or judges may extend this period by up to 76 more days for the same reasons. In June the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that the fundamental right to consult a lawyer required the Government not only to inform a detainee of his right but also to advise the detainee of any orders preventing him from seeing a lawyer. Israeli regulations also permit prisoners to be held in isolation from family and from other detainees during interrogation. Israeli authorities claim that they attempt to post notification of arrest within 48 hours. Palestinians assert that families and lawyers are normally notified much later and generally locate the detainee through their own efforts. Notification to the US Embassy or Consulate General of detained Palestinian-American citizens has almost always been through the family. The ICRC attempts to help by passing on to families (by telephone) the information it receives from Israeli prison officials. A senior officer may extend for up to 12 days denial of notification of arrest to immediate family members, attorneys, and consular officials. A military commander may appeal to a judge to extend this period in security cases for an unlimited time. The Israeli authorities acted in a number of areas to improve prison conditions in the occupied territories after Palestinian prisoners staged an 18-day hunger strike in September and October 1992 to protest prison conditions. Implementation of the specific measures, however, was not uniform throughout all detention facilities. In 8/1993, prisoners at Hebron prison staged a hunger strike to protest lack of water for toilet and bathing facilities. The Israeli Supreme Court agreed to consider a petition presented by the prisoners but, as of October, the case had not been resolved. In the meantime, Israeli authorities reportedly agreed to truck in water supplies to meet prisoner needs. In September the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court to close the Ketziot Military Detention Camp in Israel because of inferior conditions of imprisonment." The petition argued that the conditions at the camp, which reportedly houses 4900 Palestinian security detainees, violated the Geneva Convention. Overcrowding (26 inmates to a tent), inferior diet, lack of adequate medical care, and lack of arrangements for religious worship were cited as key problems. At the end of the year, Ketziot camp was still in use.

According to the IDF Judge Advocate General, the IDF has been granted a postponement to study the report of an advisory panel. Consideration of the case by the Supreme Court has been postponed until 3/1994. In 12/1992, the United Nations Security Council adopted Resolution 799 which called for the immediate return of 416 Palestinians who had been deported to South Lebanon earlier that month because of their alleged association with Hamas—the Islamic Resistance Movement and the largest Islamist organization in the occupied territories—and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. Israel agreed in March to a two-phase plan to return the deportees. In 9/1992 deportees returned from the edge of the Israeli-declared security zone in South Lebanon where they were interned and then returned to their homes in the Occupied Territories. Upon their return, the deportees were investigated by the Israeli authorities and some were freed while others were placed in administrative detention. In mid-December, the remaining deportees returned except for about 16 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. Like those who had returned in September, the 197 who returned in December were subject to interrogation and investigation. As of the end of the year, approximately 60 remained in detention In addition to the deportees in southern Lebanon, Israel allowed 30 pre-intifada deportees to return to the occupied territories in May as a confidence building measure. Among those who returned was one former West Bank mayor elected in 1976 and later deported to Jordan. [2]

Estimates vary on the number of casualties caused by use of excessive force in the occupied territories. Figures compiled from press, Palestinian, international organizations, and Israeli government sources indicate that a total of 184 Palestinians were killed by security forces in 1993, compared to 158 in 1992. Estimates of the numbers of Palestinians wounded vary, the number could be as high as 4120. IDF figures report approximately 890 Palestinians were injured as of September 1 by the security services. Forty-nine Israeli soldiers and civilians were killed by Palestinians in 1993 in the occupied territories, and estimates of Israelis killed were about 386. Extremists associated with Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad were responsible for many of the lethal attacks on Israelis. After May it appeared that both the security forces and Palestinian activists pursued less confrontational policies in order to reduce violent clashes. The killing of an Israeli settler near Ramallah in October began a cycle of killings and reprisals which had not ended as of late December. Many of the IDF observation posts erected in camps and cities throughout Gaza, which had provoked violence, were removed in August. Of the total number of Palestinians killed, the Israeli human rights group B’tselem estimates that 37 were children aged 16 or under, 33 of whom were killed between January and June. Many of these children were involved in demonstrations or were near the sites of confrontations or incidents at the time they were shot. In July, however, a soldier reportedly shot 10-year-old Ezrak Shalviar while the boy was flying a kite in an open field. In a June report on IDF killings of Palestinian children under age 16, B’tselem charged that the IDF pursued a deliberate policy of opening fire in situations in which soldiers were not in mortal danger. Citing the IDF’s rules of engagement for dispersing demonstrations and pursuing suspects which allow, in the last resort, use of live fire, B’tselem declared that “the many instances in which Palestinians in the territories have been killed by soldiers . . . are unequivocal Proof of the danger inherent in such orders and of the need to change them.” B’tselem acknowledged that the IDF had no deliberate policy to kill children but contended that “in hundreds of instances security forces had the option of refraining from shooting, at the risk of having suspects the vast majority are demonstrators or stone-throwers) escape, in order to ensure that innocent people would not be hurt.” In its response to the B’tselem report, the IDF stated that soldiers were under orders to act with the greatest care in dealing with “riots” in which women and children participated and noted that opening-fire regulations prohibited shooting at children. Children were injured, the IDF said, because they were near or among rioters or armed terrorists who endangered the lives of IDF soldiers. The IDF statement attributed the increase in deaths to the escalation of violence in the first half of 1993. Until April, IDF regulations permitted the use of live ammunition only when soldiers’ lives were in immediate danger, to halt fleeing suspects, or to disperse a violent demonstration. In April the IDF issued an amended version. The regulations permitting the use of live ammunition were based on intelligence received that certain suspects were in the houses. In practice, IDF soldiers used live fire in situations other than those described above and often shot suspects in the upper body and head. Uniformed soldiers police, and undercover units used live fire in several instances, including deaths and shootings of head and body. Uniformed soldiers police, and undercover units also shot inflamed bystanders (including children) by live fire, rubber bullets, or beatings while pursuing suspects. During 1993 the IDF continued the practice of using various heavy weapons, including rockets to destroy houses in which soldiers believed suspects to be hiding. These demolitions took place almost exclusively in Gaza. Although the IDF stated that no figures were available on the number of houses damaged in these operations, human rights groups count up to 220 houses in which suspects were either destroyed or partially damaged by the IDF. By the course of military operations in pursuit of suspects. Israel defended this practice as a necessary military operation and a measure to save the lives of Israeli soldiers. The Israelis assert that the operations were based on intelligence received that certain suspects were in the occupied territories. In practice, IDF units regularly evacuated houses in which they believed suspects to be hiding and then fired rockets into the buildings. In several instances, no suspects were found in the houses. Since late 1952, 177 Palestinian claims have been filed for damages to homes by the security forces. Sixty claims have already been settled to the sum of approximately $500000 (1.5 million NIS). On a number of occasions, security forces forcibly removed Palestinian suspects undergoing medical treatment from hospitals or prohibited Palestinians in need of medical care from crossing roadblocks or going out during curfews. The Israeli Government asserts that a patient is removed only after a doctor certifies a patient is fit for transfer, the transfer must be made with a doctor present. [=] 42024. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 12: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, (Including Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended, February 1994. The escalation in violence both in the occupied territories and inside Israel during the first 3 months of 1993 led the Government to seal off indefinitely the West Bank and Gaza from Jerusalem and Israel on March 29. By inhibiting the free movement of goods and people, the closure caused deterioration in economic conditions in the occupied territories and disrupted patterns of religious, educational, cultural, and family life as well as access to medical care. The March 29 closure constitutes the longest period during which the Israeli security forces have employed this measure, which was first used in 1991. Closure severely constricted Palestinians’ freedom of movement between the West Bank and East Jerusalem, between the northern and southern sections of the West Bank, and between Gaza and the rest of the occupied territories. As during previous periods of closure, any Palestinian wishing to enter Jerusalem or Israel must obtain a special permit issued by the Civil Administration. Any Palestinian found in Jerusalem without such a permit is subject to a fine (usually the equivalent of about $160) or arrest. Because most main roads pass through Jerusalem closure effectively divides the West Bank into two parts, with the result that Palestinians from the north may not travel to the south without special permission, and vice versa. In addition, Gazans may only travel to Jerusalem and the West Bank if they are able to obtain permits. The closure had a serious effect on the economy of the occupied territories. Of the 120000 Palestinians who prior to March 29 worked in Jerusalem or Israel only about half had received permits to work in Jerusalem or Israel prior to March 29. Palestinians in the occupied territories, having lost their markets in Jerusalem and Israel, were unable to pay their workers. Unemployment rates in the West Bank were estimated at 25% before closure and are now estimated at 40%. Palestinian businesses and institutions in Jerusalem suffered because their West Bank clients were unable to enter the city. The IDF states that the number of Palestinian women who have been issued permits since closure (about 52000), added to the number of Palestinians exempt from the permit requirement who work in Jerusalem (15000), is roughly equal to the number of Palestinians (70000) who had been legally permitted to work in Israel and Jerusalem before March 29. The IDF maintains that only Palestinians who had been working illegally in Israel and Jerusalem lost their employment. After closure, however, the Israeli Government significantly reduced the number of permits issued to unskilled Palestinian day laborers allowed to work in Israel or Jerusalem. Permits to enter Jerusalem and Israel were valid for periods varying from a few hours to 3 months. Permits were denied for a variety of reasons, including security concerns and non-payment of taxes. As of October, the CIVAD had issued 268,309 temporary permits of varying duration for various purposes to Palestinians from the occupied territories who were not employed in Israel or Jerusalem. In April Palestinian and Israeli human rights groups issued a joint statement in which they condemned the closure. The statement described closure as an illegal collective punishment of the population of the occupied territories and as "disproportionate to any legitimate security concern." Many Muslim and Christian Palestinians were denied the right to worship at holy places associated with their faith because of closure. The closure also affected the movement of health care personnel and prevented or slowed the provision of health care services to some emergency and critically ill patients in the West Bank and Gaza strip. In October Israel eased certain restrictions on access to Jerusalem as a goodwill gesture." At the end of March 1994, Palestinian and Israeli camps than in previous years. Curfews were still used extensively in Gaza in 1994, including the continued imposition of a night-time curfew in effect since 1987. Human rights groups criticized the prolonged curfews, which do not apply to Israeli settlers, as a form of collective punishment. AU Palestinians need permits, which require several clearances, in order to travel outside the occupied territories, and Israeli authorities have imposed travel restrictions on certain political activists. However, thousands of Palestinians in the occupied territories travel abroad each year. In 1991 Israeli authorities announced that bridge-crossing permits to Jordan could be obtained at post offices without a screening process. In July Israel announced that the requirements for Palestinian males relaxing the bridge into Jordan to remain out of the occupied territories for 9 months no longer applied to men above the age of 25. The requirement remained in effect, however, for Palestinian males between the ages of 16-26. In late 1993, Jordan tightened restrictions on entry, with the result that Palestinians granted permission to travel by Israeli authors were sometimes denied permission to enter Jordan. Obstacles to emigration include the inability to obtain a travel permit and the fear of losing residency. Restrictions on residence, tourist visas, reunions, and family reunification have applied only to Palestinians resident in the occupied territories. Israel sometimes refuses to renew laissez-passer of Palestinians from the occupied territories who live or work abroad, on the grounds that they have abandoned their residence; even though they may not have acquired foreign citizenship. Palestinians who obtain foreign citizenship ordinarily are not allowed to resume residence in the occupied territories, those who acquire the right to residence elsewhere or who remain outside the occupied territories for over 3 years are often not permitted to resume residence. They are permitted to return only as tourists and sometimes are denied entry entirely. These restrictions do not apply to Israeli settlers resident in the occupied territories. Israeli authorities have limited family reunification for demographic political, and economic reasons. Most Palestinians who were abroad during the 1967 war (estimated to be one-fourth of the Palestinian population at that time) or who have lost their residence permits for other reasons are not permitted to return to reside permanently with their families. Permanent residency permission or family reunification has usually been denied to foreign-born spouses and children born in the occupied territories to nonresident mothers, although they were generally allowed to reside as temporary residents with renewable permits. In August the Israeli Government announced a change in its policy on family reunifications. Following the presentation by human rights groups of a series of petitions to the Israeli Supreme Court, Israel decided to expand its policy on family reunification for residents of the West Bank and Gaza by offering to consider the cases of 6000 immediate family members who had arrived and applied for visitors’ visas between 6/1990 and 11/1992. As of the end of August, the Israeli authorities had considered 3249 applications from residents of the West Bank and Gaza for family reunification, of which they had approved 723 and denied 861. Still pending were 781 applications, including 116 held over from previous years. Israel also announced it would consider 2000 new cases annually, allowing the return of up to 5000 persons. However, immediate family members of Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem were excluded from the new policy. [=]

42025. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Palestinian women living under military occupation face similar human rights problems as do men in their contact with Israeli authorities. In addition, many Palestinian women face poverty, lack of education, and social repression. Palestinian society is only now coming to recognize the problem of violence against women. A major difficulty in dealing with this hostile sensitive issue is lack of resources: women's organizations are working to raise consciousness and provide help and intervention when needed but funds are not available for shelters or centers. The CIVAD has made no significant attempt to relieve the situation, and Palestinian social institutions have so far failed to focus on the issue. Palestinians are governed by a mixture of Jordanian and Egyptian law, British mandate law, and Israeli military regulations. There are no laws guaranteeing women's rights in the workplace. Palestinian women often work outside the home and are prominent in many professions, including medicine, law, and teaching. Personal status law for Palestinians is based on religious law. For Muslim Palestinians, personal status law is derived from Shari'a (Islamic) law. Women have certain rights regarding marriage and divorce, inheritance, property ownership, and children. Many women's rights activists believe, however, that many women are not aware of their rights and often fail to demand what is guaranteed to them by law. Women's rights groups are active throughout the occupied territories, dealing traditionally with social issues (children, health, education) but have more recently begun to venture out into practical training, women's rights education, advocacy work, and political activism. The major concern of women's groups is that women who have contributed significantly to Palestinian political efforts will be relegated to traditional roles in the interim period. [=]

42026. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Occupied Territories: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There is no pattern of societal abuse of children. Palestinian children have, however, probably suffered disproportionately from the effects of military occupation and the intifada. Since the uprising began in 1987, schools, which are often overcrowded and underfunded, have been subject to frequent closings by both the Israeli authorities and by Palestinian activists enforcing strikes. Political tensions and lack of funding have closed most of the few sports and recreation facilities that existed for children. Encouraged by political rhetoric and the example of older sibling children have been drawn into street violence and have frequently provoked it by throwing stones. During 1993, credible sources report that 37 children (aged 16 and under) were killed by Israeli security forces. While some had been involved in demonstrations or rock-throwing incidents, others had been merely in the vicinity of clashes when killed. [=]
Government has not responded to requests by the US Government and human rights organizations for a list of names of those amnestied or otherwise released. Members of Ba'thist organizations and the banned Party for Communist Action (PCA) were reportedly among those released in recent years. The Government released at least eight political prisoners in 6/1993. In addition, of the six women taken into custody in late 1992 and early-to-mid 1993, three were released in late 1993. According to the Government, the eight persons released had not been exacted for human rights content that these three still remain in detention. Releases in 1993 included alleged members of the Kurdish Workers Party as well as members of the Party for Communist Action. One alleged PCA member had been detained previously for 5 years, released, and rearrested in June. There were also unconfirmed reports that the Government released in November at least 20 members of the banned Muslim Brotherhood after long periods of detention. It is possible that some of those released had been tried and found guilty by the State Security Court and then released because they had already served the periods of incarceration imposed in their sentences. The majority of detainees still held are reputed member of the Muslim Brotherhood. Other detainees are connected with factions of the Ba'th Party, the Islamic Unification Movement claimed that 120 of its members were being detained. The Government has used the possession of material from banned political organizations as a frequent pretext for detention. The Government is known to have detained the relatives of suspects in both criminal and security cases as a means of compelling individuals being sought by authorities to surrender. Although the Government has exiled persons in the past, there have been no reported instances of exile for several years. [-]

42029. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Syria: Part 06: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (e) Denial of Fair Public Trial", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993, Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate. By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The court system comprises separate civil courts, penal and criminal courts, whose jurisdiction includes economic crimes- and religious, military, security, and constitutional courts. There are major differences between the types of Syrian courts in terms of respect for human rights. Persons charged with security or political offenses fall under the jurisdiction of the military-controlled State Security Court, established in 1968. Defendants in this court have few safeguards of their rights; court sessions are generally closed (although an international observer was allowed to attend the sentencing portion of a prominent trial in 1992, and Amnesty International representatives attended sessions of some trials in 5/1993); defendants have no say in the selection of a lawyer, who is chosen by the court; defense attorneys are unable to consult with their clients outside the courtroom or to call witnesses to refute prosecution charges- and the Government does not allow for independent medical examinations of the defendantsto determine whether physical abuse has occurred during pretrial detention. The Government does not generally release information on the trial or sentencing but relatives with influence in the Government sometimes succeed in obtaining information and even effecting the release of the accused. The sentences are not subject to appeal, but the President may nullify, alter, or confirm State Security Court sentences. A special military Field Court, created during the period of the Muslim Brotherhood rebellion in the early 1980s, reportedly still exists to deal with serious security offenses. As part of the Government's general crackdown on smuggling, the Field Court reportedly tried cases involving arms trafficking in 1993. The accused is not permitted legal representation at Field Court proceedings, which are held in secret. Regular civil and criminal courts are under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Justice. The accused in a criminal case is detained provisionally upon the accusation of the public prosecutor, then remanded to a judge for arraignment. The judge may either dismiss the charges on the basis of insufficient evidence or refer the case to a criminal court. Defendants in civil and criminal courts are entitled to legal representation of their choice. If they cannot afford a lawyer, one will be appointed by the court. These courts impose no restrictions on lawyers representing their clients. Defendants are either released, convicted, or sentenced, but the Government does not allow for independent medical examinations of the accused. Defendants in criminal cases are allowed to present evidence and confront their accusers. Trials are public, except for cases involving juveniles or for crimes such as rape. Cases are tried before a judge; there is no jury system. The slow and cumbersome legal system can leave suspects languishing in prison for months. Following the fire in Hassakeh prison in May, the alleged perpetrators were rapidly executed, raising questions as to whether they had been afforded due process. According to the Constitution, the High Constitutional Court investigates and rules on petitions submitted by the President or at least one-fourth of the members of the People's Assembly challenging the constitutionality of laws or legislative decrees. It has no appellate jurisdiction over cases from the civil or criminal courts. Human rights groups estimated that in 1993 some 330-600 cases of political detainees were brought before the State Security Court. Many of those tried in 1993 reportedly had been imprisoned for 10 or more years before trial. One human rights group estimated that the State Security Court handed down about 60 sentences between 7/1992-5/1993. The defendants in many of these trials were reportedly accused of membership or participation in the activities of banned political organizations whose activities the Government claims include the forcing of political change through violence. Some of the alleged activities do not include violence but rather opposition to the objectives of the Ba'th Party or the dissemination of false information which could weaken the people's confidence in the objectives of the Ba'th revolution. At least 34 defendants were found guilty of disseminating false information, receiving money from abroad, or withholding information from the authorities. Those tried in 1993 included members of a Syrian human rights group, the Committee for the Defense of Democratic Freedoms and Human Rights in Syria (CDF), and those accused of membership in the banned Party for Communist Action. While the defendants in the 5 CDF cases tried in 1993 had not yet been sentenced at year's end, the 10 CDF members found guilty in 1992 received sentences ranging from 5-10 years. Some sentences specified the "deprivation of civil liberties" after prison sentences are completed; such deprivations reportedly include prohibitions on foreign travel and holding government positions. Twenty-four members of the PCA were also found guilty and sentenced to between 10-16 years in prison, some with forced labor. The Government charged that the PCA sought to change the Government by violence and opposed the objectives of the Ba'thist Revolution. One CDF defendant, the writer Nizar Nayyuf, was convicted for his alleged activities in the CDF and for having circulated a leaflet reportedly questioning the legitimacy of the 1991 presidential referendum. The court found him guilty of disseminating false information that would undermine public confidence in the Ba'th revolution. Nayyuf was awarded one of the Pen Freedom to Write awards in 5/1993. Another trial involved an engineer, Sayih Khayr Bek who had been detained since 1980 when the regime cracked down on professional associations that had organized a national strike to protest the state of emergency. The Government does not release information on the number of persons detained or imprisoned for political or security offenses, but credible estimates run from 3800-9000 (including persons held in Syrian detention facilities in Lebanon). The Government continues to contend that persons are detained not because of their political beliefs but because of criminal acts or actions that violate the state of emergency. It is clear, however, that many persons have been jailed without charge or as a result of unfair trials for nonviolent opposition to the regime. In June and July the Government released at least eight political prisoners, several of them prominent figures. These included four former ministers and at least three Jordanian members of the Ba'th Party—February 23 Movement (supporters of former Syrian Leader Salah Jadid who was imprisoned after the coup that brought Hafiz Al-Asad to power in 1970). The Jordanians, Majli Nasrawin, Hakim Al-Fayez and Yusuf Al-Buri, had spent 23 years in prison. One human rights group says that seven Ba'th Party political prisoners remain in a special wing of Mezze prison. All reportedly continue to be allowed monthly family visits under guard in government rest houses in Damascus. Other female political prisoners taken into custody in late 1992-1993 three were reportedly released in late 1993. Although human rights organizations contend that the other three were still being held in Duma women's prison at the end of 1993, the Syrian Government claims that these three were released earlier. The Government does not permit access to prisoners by international humanitarian organizations. [4]

42030. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Syria: Part 12: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Syrians do not have the ability to change their government legally and peacefully. President Asad and his senior advisers effectively control all aspects of political and economic life. The ruling Ba'th Party, which emphasizes socialism and secular Arabism, is dominated by the military. In recent years, the Party has served principally to legitimize President Asad's rule. Although the Government seeks to build national rather than ethnic identity, ethnic, religious, and regional allegiances remain important. Members of President Asad's own sect, the Alawis, hold most of the important military and security positions. President Asad's fourth 7-year term will expire in 3/1999. Women play a significant but not a leading role in government. Two of the 29 ministers in the present Cabinet are women, 21 of 260 parliamentarians are women. Women are also active in Ba'th party "popular organizations." [4]

42031. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Syria: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Syrian law stipulates that the State is to provide equal opportunity to women and is to remove impediments that hinder the development of women and their full participation in society. Government policies include equal pay for similar work and encourage the enrollment of women at all levels of education. Nonetheless, traditional concepts of male guardianship of women continue to prevail in many segments of the society. These concepts often limit a woman's rights in matters of marriage, divorce, child custody, inheritance, and personal decisions. Moreover, the Government accords religious authorities or courts the right to rule on the majority of matters involving social and interpersonal relations. Under Islamic laws of inheritance, the male offspring receive a disproportionate share of the inheritance. Wife beating and other physical abuse of women are known to occur, but conservative social mores in Syrian society discourage public discussion of the issue, making it difficult to estimate the extent of the problem. There are no official or unofficial statistics on domestic abuse. Under the legal system, women have access through the courts to redress any grievance caused by violent acts against them. There has been an indeterminate, although almost certainly small, number of court actions involving spousal abuse. The vast majority of incidents involving abuse probably go unreported because of the social stigma attached to such proceedings in such cases. Incidents are usually handled within the family where a husband's physical abuse of his wife is criticized and viewed with shame. Outside the family and the courts, the Syrian Women's Federation also offers a mechanism to help solve individual family problems. [4]

42032. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Syria: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Syrian law stresses the need to protect children and ensure conditions favorable to the development of their faculties. The Government mandates education through the sixth grade and provides optional but tuition-free education at higher levels. Although the quality of health care varies among regions and facilities, children are provided treatment free or at relatively nominal charge. The Government attempts to enforce legislation restricting child labor and to protect the institution of the family, although violations of these laws still occur. Violence against children warrants tough legal penalties as well as social stigma. [4]

42033. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Syria: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The minimum age in the public sector is 14, though it is higher in certain industries. The minimum age varies more widely in the private sector. The absolute minimum is 12 with parental permission required for children under age 16 to work. Children are forbidden to work at night. The Ministry of Social Affairs & Labor is responsible for enforcing minimum age requirements but lacks an adequate number of labor investigators. In February, a Syrian newspaper reported frankly on the widespread use of child labor in several factories in one of Syria's largest cities. The report noted that Syrian law prohibited such practices and called for Ministry of Social Affairs officials to investigate. Work hours of young employees are limited, compared to those of the regular work force. [4] conflict, or partial to sectarianism. Censorship also affects films available at foreign cultural centers. The Government or the Ba'th Party owns and operates the radio and television companies and the newspaper publishing houses. There are no privately owned newspapers. The Ministry of Information censors the televised news programs to ensure they follow the government line. The Government does interfere with radio or television broadcasts from neighboring countries. The Government prohibits citizens from owning satellites receiving dishes. In early 1994, security forces began to confiscate satellite-dish components but later halted the practice. Although ownership remains illegal, citizens resumed installing satellite dishes without any apparent government action. However, in November the Government announced that it would fully implement the ban on private dishes and create a monopoly to distribute satellite programs to selected consumers. Nonetheless, there was greater openness in 1994 in the media's coverage of regional developments, including the peace process. The Government aired extensive coverage of the peace agreement reached between Arab parties and Israel, e.g., the signing of the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan. The Government also permitted more media criticism of government performance. Several newspaper articles highlighted government malfeasance and low-level, but not high-level, corruption. Public school teachers are not permitted to express ideas contrary to government policy, although authorities allow somewhat greater freedom of expression at the university level. [=] 42035. Coached. Hans. "Israelis Protests In Assa's Syria: Small Potatoes and Derivative. The documentary, which is sanctioned by the Government, is intended to align its laws more closely with international conventions on inheritance than male heirs. Spousal abuse against women occurs, but conservative social mores discourage any public discussion of the issue. There is no evidence that spousal abuse is widespread, but there are no official statistics. Battered women have the legal right to seek redress in court, but few do so because of the social stigma attached to such an action. The Syrian Women's Federation offers services to battered wives to remedy individual family problems. [=] 42037. Donnelly, John. "Conference No-Shows May Suffer: Anti-Terrorism Parley Expected To Boost Ties", in Seattle Times, March 12, 1996. p. A3. [TXT] [Photograph shows Bassam Shawahneh, father of a 1-month old Palestinian baby [terrorist baby?] that died in an ambulance that was led by Israeli soldiers while the baby died of pneumonia, as part of a crackdown on the 465 Palestinian enclaves that, among other retributions, bars medical treatment to the Palestinians.] When the world's leaders climb up on a stage tomorrow in an Egyptian resort town on the Red Sea, the most noteworthy fact won't be who is denouncing terrorism. It is who isn't-Lebanon, Iran, Iraq, Libya, Sudan and Syria. [note: actually, less than 10% of the nations in the world will be represented at the summit, which is widely viewed as more linked with the Clinton and Peres re-election campaigns that 'terrorism'] The article concludes by observing that: 'Israel is furious at Syria', but that is scarcely news. [TXT] 42038. Greenberger, Robert S. "Rock and Roll Seems Here To Stay In Assad's Syria; Small Potatoes and Derivative. It Has State's sanction If It Steers Clear of Politics", in Wall Street Journal, January 21, 1994, p. A1. [TXT] Rock is widely played in Syria in both live performances and in recorded form as long as it is as apolitical as it is in the West. Using the media for dissent speedily ends the careers of performers, in Syria as elsewhere. Many rock performers supplement their music income by having other jobs (one prominent rocker, Ammar Alani, is a dentist). Elvis is king, but local black-fingernailed rocker Sally al-Shreikh gave a dramatic performance at the Russian Cultural Center. Her group, More Guts, plays songs by NIRVANA, Ozzy Osborne and Metallica. Her goal is an all girl group. The grandfather of Syrian Rock is Rockestra, which pioneered the use of lights, smoke machines and large speakers. In the 1960s, the major bands were Dynamite and Bluebats. In 1968, Johnny Komives, a Hungarian-Syrian drummer, started a rock band named Tigers; he had learned the styles of the Beatles, Presley and Bill Haley and the Comets in Beirut. Syrian markets are filled with bootleg audio CDs, ranging from Bob Dylan to Meatloaf. The Syrian rock scene is drug free, but beer flows freely; most of the musicians are dedicated amateurs (many loaning each other the very expensive musical equipment). Some musicians are mild peace activists, hoping for a peace with Israel. At the same time, a quarter of music requests to Damascus TV show 'Letters & Songs' are for rockers such as Elton John, Iron Maiden and Guns'n'Roses, local photographers Hallah al-Faysal has shocked people with nude self-portraits, and Damascus talk radio features people denouncing higher prices. 42039. Katz, Lee Michael. "On Way To Top, Albright Made Her Own Way: Nation's First Female Nominee For Secretary of State Boasts a Unique Style and a Powerful Personal History", in USA Today, December 6, 1996. p. A6. With her appointment hailed by Patricia Ireland of the National Organization of Women as a 'historic moment for women', Albright has been named to be the first woman Secretary of State. Claiming to be a refugee from Hitler and Stalin [sic: actually she spent WWII in London and the United States], she is seen as being filled with hatred toward Syria, unlike Warren Christopher. Katz describes Albright as "a powerful communicator", citing her contemptuous sneers at the United Nations that Castro has no balls ("a "line that shocked some colleagues but was a hit with Clinton"), and unquoted insults at Saddam Hussein: "Albright slings one-liners about Saddam Hussein's brutality and policy topics with such zeal that he whole body reverberates like a baseball pitcher delivering an unhittable fastball". 42040. Lebrecht, Hans. "Israeli Communists Protest Attacks in Lebanon", in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), May 4, 1996, p. 14. The Israeli Communist Party concerned the Israeli attack on Lebanon in a statement that read, in part: "The Labor-Meterz government loaded celebrations for the 48th Independence Day with the heavy burden of a dreadful war in Lebanon [which killed] hundreds... Contrary to what the government alleges, this war is endangering the lives of the residents of Galilee. Therefore, the CPI calls upon all Jewish and Arab Peace forces to act with all their might to stop the war in Lebanon, to [remove] the Israeli army from Lebanon, and struggle for peace without occupation to be negotiated with Syria and Lebanon. The CPI, together with her front-partners of Democratic Hadash, in common with [those] concerned about the future of the peoples [of the Middle East] will tirelessly act for rescinding the closure that starves the Palestinian population in the 'territories', for Israeli-Palestinian peace, the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, the capital of which will be eastern Jerusalem, side by side with the state of Israel. The CPI will continue to head the struggle for a democratic, just and equal society, fight against the privatization as well as against curtailing the rights of the working masses and women, and struggle for full equal rights of the Arab population in Israel." The statement as condemned the Israeli government for "driving out 500000 Lebanese from their homes as well as for the horrible massacre of refugees at the Kana-Kaf [Qana] UNIFIL camp." [TEXT] 42041. Monastersky, Richard. "The Case of Global Jitters; Even in Seemingly Stable Times, Climate Can Take An Abrupt Turn", in Science News, March 2, 1996, p. 138. Around 2200 BC, northern Mesopotamia suffered from a severe drought, agricultural communities along the Euphrates River died, refugees from the drought zone flooded into major southern cities, and the Akkadian civilization crashed. This scenario was mapped by Yale University archeologist Harvey Weiss in 1993 based on studies done at northeastern Syrian sites. While this regional, and perhaps global climatic fluctuation seems very clear, it conflicts with the long held belief that climate has been stable in the 11000 years since the end of the last Ice Age, the period termed Holocene.

Ice cores from Greenland have provided a 100000 year record of climate: the initial attention given to the dramatic climate changes that accompanied the beginnings and end of the Ice Ages were studied; now more attention is being paid to climate instability in the Holocene. Suzanne O'Brien of University of New Hampshire has found the concentration of sea salts and land dust indicate four dramatic climatic coolings in the last 10000 years. The most recent cooling was the Little Ice Age of the 15th-19th century; the Little Ice Age was preceeded by rapid climatic changes in 1400-1420. Previously coolings were recorded in 6100-500 years ago, 3100-2400 years ago, and 8800-7800 years ago. This pattern reveals a 2600-year cycle of coolings. Oceanic sediment studies between Iceland and Greenland have roughly corroborated this time series. However, it is impossible so far to determine the scale of the climatic coolings: there is no indication of the Mesoptamian cooling in the Greenland ice cores. [TEXT]

42042. Radhakrishnan, M. G. "On a Collision Course", in India Today, March 15, 1995, p. 93. Kerala's Syrian Christian Church is about to face off with its women members over a 1986 Supreme Court judgement that gave women equal inheritance rights and made them retroactive to 1951. The state and church are trying to pass legislation removing the retroactivity clause. In response many women's groups are planning a massive rally led by the Forum of Christian Women for Women's Rights and joined by the All India Women's Conference, All India Democratic Women's Association, YWCA of India, and Kerala Christian Women's Forum.

42043. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 97: Israeli Policies in Lebanon: Part 1 of 2. Israel, March 8, 1992. "Two points need to be stated firmly at the opening of this report: First, the assassination of Sheikh Mussawi, together with his family and others who happened to be in his company, was no more than an episode in a new, more aggressive and more far ranging Israeli policy in Lebanon, which also implies an adoption of a tougher stance towards Syria. This is why the assassination cannot be perceived as in any way connected with the preceding successful Palestinian guerrilla attack on an Israeli army camp. Coincidence of the two events in time has no deeper meaning. According to all the better informed Israeli military correspondents, the timing of the Mussawi's assassination depended on his known regular attendance of a yearly memorial meeting held at the tomb of Sheikh Bader (also assassinated by the Israeli secret forces, to [remove] the Israeli army from Lebanon, and struggle for peace without occupation to be negotiated with Syria and Lebanon. The CPI, together with her front-partners of Democratic Hadash, in common with [those] concerned about the future of the peoples [of the Middle East] will tirelessly act for rescinding the closure that starves the Palestinian population in the 'territories', for Israeli-Palestinian peace, the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, the capital of which will be eastern Jerusalem, side by side with the state of Israel. The CPI will continue to head the struggle for a democratic, just and equal society, fight against the privatization as well as against curtailing the rights of the working masses and women, and struggle for full equal rights of the Arab population in Israel." The statement as condemned the Israeli government for "driving out 500000 Lebanese from their homes as well as for the horrible massacre of refugees at the Kana-Kaf [Qana] UNIFIL camp." [TEXT]

The new Israeli policy in Lebanon was designed by the army. Alex Fishman ("Pity that we did not think about it beforehand", Hadashot, February 21, 1992) reports that "it took the army much time to persuade the political authorities that their negotiations with Hizbollah were a waste of time", and that "a policy change could have already been detected in January", on the basis of unprecedented Israeli activities outside the Zone, like threatening to shoot at anyone on sight, and thereby forcing the villagers to flee the area en masse. Avi Benayahu ("The circle of the Lebanese mud", Al Hamishmar, February 21, 1992) likewise says that "the [Israeli] decision to hit Mussawi was reached by a senior army echelon, faithful to the doctrine of high frequency strikes at the interests of terrorist organizations, whenever and wherever available intelligence data allow them". (The peculiarities of a language in which the murder of a child of 5 is referred to as a "strike at the interests of terrorist organizations" will be discussed in a separate section of this report).

What reasons dictated the adoption of the new policy? The avowed Israeli rationale, faithfully reiterated by most Western media, was the failure of negotiations for the release of an Israeli navigator, Ron Arad. It does not deserve to be treated seriously. Even according to the official Israeli announcements, Arad is in Iranian hands, not Hizbollah's. Apparently no other Israeli captive remains in enemy's hands. Several other names regularly mentioned in this context refer to soldiers missing since 1982, whose families, on the basis of very slender evidence, persist in believing that they are still in "somebody's" captivity. In any event, after it was stung by massive critique of the 1985 "Jibril deal" by which over a thousand Palestinians had been freed in exchange for a handful of Israelis, the Israeli government decided to never again go to such lengths in order to secure freedom for its POWs. This is why the new Israeli policy can be assumed to stem from deeper strategic considerations concerning the Zone, the Lebanese hinterland behind, and especially the Israeli aims in Lebanon and Syria.

Some light on these strategic considerations has been shed by Ran Edelist ("The Israeli northern front includes southern Lebanon as well", Yerushalaim, January 17). Although a relative dove, Edelist has good access to all branches of the Israeli Intelligence: perhaps better than any other Israeli correspondent. During and after the war in Lebanon, he successively served as a mouthpiece for one Mossad clique in rivalry with another which disingenuously advised Sharon to trust the Falangas, of Aman (the Military Intelligence) in rivalry with the entire Mossad, and of both agencies in rivalry with Shabak over its exporting its interrogators to Lebanon in order to torture the captured Lebanese. Unlike all other Israeli journalists barred from visiting the Zone since June 1985 on the spurious excuse that Lebanon is a sovereign state, Edelist did tour not only the Zone but also the areas beyond it in the company of Uri Lubrani, who as the Israeli "Coordinator of Activities" in Lebanon, acts under the authority of the Prime Minister, not of the army. According to Edelist, one of the reasons behind the new Israeli policy was the wish to offset the adverse effects of the Madrid Conference, such as the Lebanese euphoria over its putative achievements. According to Edelist, during the period of that euphoria, Lubrani "made a vague hint which could be interpreted as raising the possibility of some sort of [Israeli] withdrawal from Lebanon. Plenty of people in Southern Lebanon heard rumors to this effect, and the earth began to quake under the feet of whoever had collaborated with Israel". Even though the Fundamentalist broadcasting station "The Voice... of the South" which actually serves Israel. "was working overtime" to explain Lubrani's statement away, the damage was done. Its effects needed to be contained, and it was thought that only a new and tougher Israeli policy could reassure the collaborators and convince other Lebanese that Israeli meant to occupy the Zone and control adjacent areas indefinitely.

For this, however, radio broadcasts obviously could not suffice. From mid-November the Israeli press kept reporting the massive desertions from the ranks of the Israeli-controlled "South Lebanese Army" (SLA), in spite of pay rises. According to these reports, it was not easy to find replacements for the deserters, even through "usual Israeli methods", like telling the extended families to deliver a specified amount of recruits, with collective punishments befailing families for their non-compliance, and distribution of permits to work in Israel as a reward for their compliance. Furthermore, the Israeli authorities considered the former commander of that army, general Antoine Lahad, no longer fit to carry out the new tough policy, and therefore, as Edelist reports, decided to grant Lahad an Israeli army pension (but for colonels, not generals!) to enable him to quietly retire in Paris, supposedly in order to guarantee a better education for his 13 years old son. "Lahad will probably be replaced by one Akel Hashem, about 40, a picturesque personality, who for an extended period of time headed the SLA security system*. Since that "system" is notorious for brutally torturing thousands of people, and for atrocities in its concentration camps, the consequences of this appointment - which, as it seems, has already taken place without being formally announced - can be predicted. Edelist's account of Akel Hashem's pursuits and of the security system under his command deserve a closer scrutiny.

The security system of the SLA is, according to Edelist, "manned mostly by the Sunnis", who are a rather small minority in the Zone, inhabited preponderantly by the Shi'ites and Maronite Christians. The latter are not admitted to the security system. Akel Hashem himself is a Palestinian, and therefore a stranger to the whole security system under his command. By contrast, the SLA itself has 40% Christians and 20% Sunnis. From other sources it is known that many Shi'ites serve in its ranks. So do some Lebanese Druzes, some of them recruited from villages located outside the Zone. The contrast between the denominational composition of the SLA and of its security system is an example of the Israeli "divide and rule" methods, which in the not too remote a future may well be applied to dominate bigger Arab territories, by the way of exploiting rivalries within the population of Lebanon. (To all appearances, the Zone and the adjacent areas of Lebanon already serve as a testing ground for future Israeli conquests.) Edelist describes the methods of the SLA as ferocious in the extreme, comparing them to massacres in the style of Sabra and Shatilla. He recounts how an Israeli colonel G. commanding some Israeli forces stationed there, once attended "a briefing" with SLA officers. His reaction was that "we just cannot keep up with such standards". Yet the security system of SLA commanded by Akel Hashem is according to Edelist prepared to commit even worse atrocities than the army, not just in interrogatory torture, but also in military operations aimed at "softening the population". In one case recounted by Edelist, "Akel's group carried out several operations" earning a distinction of being named by local residents as "savage animals of a heretofore unknown species". But, comments Edelist, "in the Israeli army nobody knows nor wants to know", about such exploits.

In addition to dealing with all varieties of Israeli stooges, Edelist describes the role performed in Lebanon by the Israeli army. According to what he seems to be saying between the lines, and according to other information available in the Hebrew press. Israeli soldiers are stationed in Lebanon in quite impressive numbers, both in the Zone and beyond its boundaries. Israeli forces present in Lebanon are of two kinds: the circumstances, the Israeli army began to rely on two strategies. The first one in Lebanon in quite impressive numbers, both in the Zone and beyond its attack Hizbollah bases, because none exist". Under those circumstances, the Israeli army still seems to believe that it can occupy large Arab-inhabited areas, provided it relies on "right" occupation methods, now tested in South Lebanon, with results considered positive. The assault helicopters, especially the Apaches, perform a crucial role in terror operations conceived of as an essential ingredient of this new occupation tactic. In this context it needs to be recalled that, as described in report 89, the Israeli army in 1991 acquired huge quantities of Apache helicopters from the U.S., considerably exceeding in the process the entire amount of the U.S. annual military aid. It needs to be recalled as well that the American reaction to the murder of Mussawi was perfidious enough to be interpreted as its approval. Can it be presumed that the American military establishment has a stake of its own in learning about this new tactic of indirect domination of densely inhabited territories? An affirmative answer to this question cannot be precluded in advance.

Edelist's facts convey an impression that not only the Lebanese Army in the area indirectly controlled by Israel, but also the Lebanese government in Beirut always comply with Israeli instructions, either right away or after being suitably threatened. This impression is reinforced by many facts on the ground, and by hints of other Israeli correspondents. The Lebanese appeals for American protection, conveyed either directly or via Syria, have totally failed. An apparent Israeli reason to admit at once the responsibility for the murder of Mussawi was to demonstrate to the Lebanese how firmly the U.S. supports everything Israel does. And the supportive attitude of the U.S. seems to entrench the Israeli army in its belief that it has indeed found a tactical solution to the problem of occupying large densely inhabited areas in a maximally cost-effective way.

While casting doubt on the official "anti-terror campaign" excuses, Edelist's facts seem to point to two other Israeli reasons for the attack on the Hizbollah. The first reason was that Hizbollah had been the only force in Lebanon earnestly opposing the indirect Israeli occupation of large chunks of Lebanon. The second reason was the high respect of the Israelis for Hizbollah's military capabilities.

According to Edelist, Hizbollah leaders began by protesting to the Lebanese government against the incidents marking the Israeli reoccupation of Southern Lebanon. Only when the Lebanese government had ordered its army to stay aloof, the Hizbollah proceeded to attacking the Israeli and Israeli-commanded forces, both outside and inside the Zone, but without crossing the borders of the Lebanese state. In this, they apparently had some successes. The above mentioned Israeli colonel G. "has only praise for the operational capabilities of Hizbollah. Unlike the fecklessly performing PLO guerillas, Hizbollah men know what they do. They have a superb Intelligence and are good in planning. They don't knock their head up the wall. They don't attack right where the Israeli or SouthLebanesetroops are stationed in force, but study the area and prepare their actions carefully. They operate in cells, they know what field and communication security mean and their sabotage charges are nasty and murderous. Their fighters are local inhabitants. One cannot attack Hizbollah bases, because none exist*. Under those circumstances, the Israeli army began to rely on two strategies. The first was the random terror aiming at the entire population of the area. It has been been reported in the media, whether under the name of "softening" activities, or otherwise. The second strategy, first adopted in response to the rather successful Hizbollah's katyusha strikes at the Israeli territory after Mussawi's murder, was to prod Syria to extend its control over Hizbollah by mounting the threats of unspecified but devastating Israeli "hits", which were conveyed to Damascus via the Americans. This fact has been reported by several Israeli military and political correspondents, of whom some, e.g. Alex Fishman (“If just happened to them”, Hadashot, February 28) noted with relief that “we were lucky that the Americans indeed intervened with Syria and obtained the cease fire, since we had lost control of the situation”. The Israeli public appreciated this cease fire, regarding it as the Israeli army's success, after the week of uninterrupted katyusha attacks had brought a reversal of the mood: from martial exultation (fed by official propaganda seconded by many press commentators) to despondency. As for the army and the minister of Defense Arens, they confined themselves to expressing their satisfaction with the results of the new Israeli policy in Lebanon, the Missawi assassination included. It can be safely predicted that this policy will be pursued in Lebanon also in the future, probably on an increasing scale, and in all likelihood also elsewhere. [c]

42044. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 97: Israeli Policies in Lebanon: Part 2 of 2. Israel, March 8, 1992. Reactions of the Israeli public to the events of the week, which began with the murder of Missawi and ended with the cease fire deserve a further comment. There were three fundamental kinds of reactions: of those who can be regarded as expressing in the name of the Israeli Security System, of the better informed military or political correspondents who, after sharing the initial euphoria, later had some wary misgivings about the military establishment’s wisdom on strictly pragmatic grounds, and finally a handful of principled critics of Missawi murder who were allowed to express themselves in print. In a sense, the reactions of the first listed kind are the most important, because they are quite unknown outside Israel, and because they can be assumed to faithfully reflect the viewpoints of the commanders of the Israeli army, concretely of its Chief of Staff, general Ehud Barak, and his Deputy, Amnon Shahak (no kin of mine!). In all probability, the two were responsible for designing the new Israeli policies in Lebanon and for the Missawi murder, which began to be implemented after being cleared by the minister of Defense Arens and by the Prime Minister Shamir. Some elements of the reasoning behind the new policies were provided - or rather hinted - in TV talks of the generals in active service. Also, the military correspondents were allowed to describe “the euphoria”, or “the contentment” of the generals, especially during the first days after the murder. But more thorough explorations of the subject were reserved for ex-generals and ex-intelligence insiders.

One of them was general (reserves) Yossi Peled, the Commander of the Northern Command (and thereby in charge of the Lebanese affairs) for five years until he retired from active service early in 1991. General Peled (“To keep the initiative”, Yedioth Ahronot, February 21) wants to continue such feats of arms as “hitting Missawi” or kidnapping Sheikh Obeid. He thinks the Israeli public should not be overly concerned about hardships of the residents of northern areas exposed to the Hizbollah’s katyushas, because “as those residents told me when it was my duty to tour the area... that they have learned to cope with their hardships splendidly”. His assessment of the Missawi murder from the military point of view is filled with superlatives. “I believe that hitting Missawi was an extraordinary achievement, for which the Israeli army can only be congratulated in exalted terms, because it proved truly extraordinary qualities of both the execution and its preparation by army Intelligence”. Peled indicates that an operation on such a scale “must have been prepared for many months or even years ahead”. The rather down-to-earth truth is that the “operation” involved no more than the use of a most modern assault helicopter against an ordinary car, and that according to Fishman (February 28) the Army Intelligence learned “from the Beirut papers of Thursday” that Missawi had intended to visit Jibshit explanations are needed”. It is enough to assume that “one terrorist less from the military point of view is filled with superlatives. “I believe that of unqualified successes, culminating in the halting of the katyusha attacks, which, in his view was possible only because the measures taken by the Israeli army “had proved our resolve to escalate them further to ensure that shooting stops”. He refused to provide any details of the procedures by which he was recently dismissed by Foreign Minister David Levy, apparently because of his hawksishness, too extreme for Levy’s tastes. Merhav lists four factors with which Israel has to contend in Lebanon: Iran, Syria, the Lebanese government and the Shi’ites. As for the first two, he advocates a mixed approach, alternating pressures with negotiations until they halt “the flow of money and other facilities” to Lebanon, with the effect of “speedily strangling the Shi’ites”. Unless it follows Israeli dictates, the Lebanese government faces the threat of losing “the little that remains of its sovereignty” in the South. In regard to the Shi’ites Merhav is highly optimistic. In his opinion Missawi was murdered principally because “the Zone has recently found itself under continuous Shi’ite pressure”. However, “the blow they thus received convinced them that they were left with no choice except to lick their wounds and acquiesce. The [Israeli] message can be assumed to have been absorbed by them, at least for a time, even though they are still likely to do a thing here or there. After what we did to them, we can proceed to building up good relations with the Shi’ites of South Lebanon, since, in conformity with the best existential traditions of the Lebanese communities, the Shi’ite community included, they now know that they have no other choice if they want to survive and to prosper”. This is why Merhav wants Israel to keep behaving “as it has done”. In saying all this Merhav undoubtedly represents the viewpoint of the Israeli “security system”, which can be also presumed to be supported in this design by its American counterpart. Consequently, the policies Merhav advocates can be presumed to be pursued in the future on a larger scale than heretofore. The Israeli “security system” may be mistaken in its assessment of suitability and efficacy of such methods, but there can be little doubt that this is what it genuinely believes in.

Such conclusion finds its confirmation in an authoritative interview provided by Moshe Arens to Ron Ben-Yishay (Yedioth Ahronot, February 28). Arens evaluates the Israeli activities in Lebanon as a chain of unqualified successes, culminating in the halting of the katyusha attacks, which, in his view was possible only because the measures taken by the Israeli army “had proved our resolve to escalate them further to ensure that shooting stops”. He refused to provide any details about those “measures”, but he admitted that American pressure on Syria, and indirectly on Iran, had played a role in producing the cease-fire, after Israel had “asked the Americans to approach Damascus and Beirut” with an explanation what may happen in its absence. According to Arens “in the struggle against terror no arguments, excuses or intricate explanations are needed”. It is enough to assume that “one terrorist less means a little less of terrorism, because it means that other terrorists will run for cover in fear, with their lines of command thus disrupted”. Like all the official and semi-official Israeli spokesmen, Arens mentioned neither the son of Missawi, nor his wife, nor other civilians killed in Lebanon. Presumably the expression “one terrorist less” encompasses them as well.

Thus far I have been reporting the writings which can be presumed to be authoritative reflections of the views of the Israeli Security System. But it needs to be pointed out that the press and especially the electronic media have been filled by gems of wisdom quite similar to the just quoted. In my opinion, their impact on the Jewish public was considerable. At the same time, that public was being influenced by really crass accounts of Divine miracles neutralizing the destructive effects of the katyushas. Professor Yermiyahu Yuvali ("The concept of luck is outdated, long live the miracle!" Yeddoth Ahronot, March 21) observed that "listening to radio broadcasts from Syria. The media have made the katyusha attacks into a sort of script in a way hardly indicating any deep faith of theirs in the acts of Divine Providence, we can only get an impression that such a downpour of certified miracles as occurring right now has not blessed Israel since the Exodus from Egypt... It is no longer permissible to say that any Israeli could have just been lucky". The miracles are supposed to occur whenever anybody avoids being hit by a katyusha. But when a Jewish girl of 5 was killed by a katyusha, the Hizbollah were blamed rather than God. With irony, Yuvali says that "this cooccurrence of so many miracles must itself be a miracle", and he reports a miracle "which God performed just for me", namely "to make me still prefer the word 'luck' and be lucky enough to have this preference shared by some other Israelis". For all its crassness, the miracle talk did have an impeding effect on criticism of the army's policies, even of the most pragmatically-minded and half-hearted sort. It began only after the effect of katyusha attacks could no longer be disguised, even though the attacks in themselves were a phenomenon without precedents since 1982.

All in all, the army criticism thus far voiced has not amounted to much. Consequently, there is no need to devote much space to reporting it. Yoel Marcus and Ze'ev Shift, two most prominent Israeli commentators, writing in the same paper on the same day (Haaretz, February 21) can be seen as prototypes of the kind. Shift praises the Israeli army for "lurking in wait the Hizbollah leader, identifying his car and settling the account with him". He attributes the success of the operation "to the intellectual prowess of the high command of the Israeli army", and to "its great success in intelligence gathering", and so on. Still, Shift's adulation has it limits, because the failures of other army units, e.g. the roughly concurrent attack on an army camp in which three soldiers were killed, are also mentioned by him on this occasion. Marcus goes a little farther. After praising "the liquidation of Mussawi as an exemplary handbook in coordinating a military operation with intelligence", he asks whether between the design and the implementation of the operation was there enough time to consider all its possible consequences. The reason for his concern lies in the fact (confirmed by other commentators writing on the same day), that "the ultimate decision was reached over the phone between Shamir and Arens", who apparently "failed to take the possibility of [retaliatory] katyusha attacks into consideration". He says that "he does not feel it's exciting because "our real problems remain unsolved. One Abbas [Mussawi] is gone, another Abbas is going to replace him, while the Hizbollah, which in itself is a product of the War in Lebanon, will continue to annoy us". Amnon Denkner (Hadashot, February 21), shares this point of view but expresses it more vulgarly. He criticizes the army, because "after killing one important Arab, the katyusha attacks managed to disrupt life in the North for almost a week". But he gives vent to a sense of personal satisfaction. "One does not need to be a bloodthirsty chauvinist to feel mightily pleased by the sight of a Hizbollah leader blasted up into the air and falling down in pieces. One can assume that the image of a bearded fellow with black turban on his head being accurately hit by an Apache helicopter missile must for an average Israeli be quite thrilling, especially in view of all the contrast thus demonstrated between their qualities and ours. O army, how gorgeously thou performest!" Denkner is relativly dovish, so he can be relied upon for sensing what the feelings of "average Israelis" on such occasions are, at least during the first day of two after the event.

This style of analysis finds its best practitioner in the person of Uzi Benzman ("A long-term account", Haaretz, February 28). He is a correspondent who can be presumed to reliably report the real thinking of the Israeli government. According to Benzman, during the katyusha attacks and the consequent massive deployment of the army forces in Lebanon, "the atmosphere [in Jerusalem] was traumatic". But after the cease fire the mood shifted into that of relief. "Right now, both in Jerusalem [the location of the Prime Minister's Office] and in Tel Aviv [the location of the ministry of Defense] those responsible for the killing of Abbas Mussawi and for the army's retaliations to the hail of katyushas perceive the whole affair as best evidence of Israel's profound political and strategic wisdom all the way through". The highest manifestation of this wisdom was the Israeli threat "of multi-directional strikes", duly reported by the media. Making this threat are perceived as unequivocally beneficial. "Those who made it are self-contended to the point of assuming that the entire sequence of events from Mussawi killing up to the return of the Israeli force to its bases is now going to directly influence the negotiations between the Israelis and the Syrians and Lebanese in Washington... By this logic, the wheel of violence is presumed to have succeeded in setting the wheels of the political [process] in motion after nothing else had worked. This success, claim the self-contended men in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, will from now on propel the progress toward an ultimate stabilization of the entire Middle East". Benzman remains skeptical. He notes that the negotiations in Washington have been hardly leading anywhere. He admits that the Lebanon border is now, "thick, but attributes it, in my opinion rightly, primarily to inclement weather. It can be safely predicted that, when the weather improves, especially in the coming summer, "the self-contended men in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv" will rush to "propel the progress toward an ultimate stabilization of the entire Middle East", in the Israeli style.

All in all, the army criticism thus far voiced has not amounted to much. Consequently, there is no need to devote much space to reporting it. Yoel Marcus and Ze'ev Shift, two most prominent Israeli commentators, writing in the same paper on the same day (Haaretz, February 21) can be seen as prototypes of the kind. Shift praises the Israeli army for "lurking in wait the Hizbollah leader, identifying his car and settling the account with him". He attributes the success of the operation "to the intellectual prowess of the high command of the Israeli army", and to "its great success in intelligence gathering", and so on. Still, Shift's adulation has its limits, because the failures of other army units, e.g. the roughly concurrent attack on an army camp in which three soldiers were killed, are also mentioned by him on this occasion. Marcus goes a little farther. After praising "the liquidation of Mussawi as an exemplary handbook in coordinating a military operation with intelligence", he asks whether between the design and the implementation of the operation was there enough time to consider all its possible consequences. The reason for his concern lies in the fact (confirmed by other commentators writing on the same day), that "the ultimate decision was reached over the phone between Shamir and Arens", who apparently "failed to take the possibility of [retaliatory] katyusha attacks into consideration". He says that "he does not feel it's exciting because "our real problems remain unsolved. One Abbas [Mussawi] is gone, another Abbas is going to replace him, while the Hizbollah, which in itself is a product of the War in Lebanon, will continue to annoy us". Amnon Denkner (Hadashot, February 21), shares this point of view but expresses it more vulgarly. He criticizes the army, because "after killing one important Arab, the katyusha attacks managed to disrupt life in the North for almost a week". But he gives vent to a sense of personal satisfaction. "One does not need to be a bloodthirsty chauvinist to feel mightily pleased by the sight of a Hizbollah leader blasted up into the air and falling down in pieces. One can assume that the image of a bearded fellow with black turban on his head being accurately hit by an Apache helicopter missile must for an average Israeli be quite thrilling, especially in view of all the contrast thus demonstrated between their qualities and ours. O army, how gorgeously thou performest!" Denkner is relativly dovish, so he can be relied upon for sensing what the feelings of "average Israelis" on such occasions are, at least during the first day of two after the event.

This style of analysis finds its best practitioner in the person of Uzi Benzman ("A long-term account", Haaretz, February 28). He is a correspondent who can be presumed to reliably report the real thinking of the Israeli government. According to Benzman, during the katyusha attacks and the consequent massive deployment of the army forces in Lebanon, "the atmosphere [in Jerusalem] was traumatic". But after the Vietnamese to restore the country after so many years of war. They have contributed more than two million roubles for the construction of a medical centre in Hanoi. The Committee supplies Vietnamese child-care establishments with literature on pre-school education published in the Soviet Union in the Vietnamese language, and with beautifully illustrated children's books. Women's organizations in Asia, Africa and Latin America receive from Soviet women parcels with medicines and children's clothes, textiles, foodstuffs, study aids, sewing machines, and toys. The Committee also sends equipment for women's centres and child-care establishments and organizes lectures and exhibitions on the status of women in the USSR. The Committee is taking an active part in the campaign of solidarity with the Arab peoples. It has issued statements for the radio and press condemning Israel's aggression and policy of annexation and provocation. The General Secretary of the All-Arab Women's Federation sent the Committee the following telegram: "We realize that this battle will be prolonged and bitter, but we and our brothers-fighters throughout the world will ultimately win out and attain peace, freedom and justice. We highly appreciate your assistance and we are confident that you regard our struggle as a common struggle for a common goal." The Committee sends Palestinian women and children food, textiles, study aids, typewriters and sewing machines, and all-purpose medical kits. Delegations of Syrian women have been to the Soviet Union several times at the Committee's invitation. A protocol on cooperation between the Syrian and Soviet women's organizations has been signed.

The Committee vigorously supports all measures taken in solidarity with the democrats of Chile. Soviet women have made statements in the press, on the radio and television protesting against the atrocities and lawlessness of the fascist junta. A Committee of Solidarity with Chilean Democrats has been set up. It has a women's commission whose members — public and political figures, scientists, journalists and women workers — expose the junta's crimes in the press, over radio and at meetings and demand defence of the rights of the Chilean democrats, women and children. On behalf of millions of Soviet women the Soviet Women's Committee has sent a message to UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim demanding that the United Nations should intervene to stop the atrocities being perpetrated by the junta. Where does the Committee draw the money to hold the solidarity campaigns and give material aid to women's organizations in other countries? The bulk of the money is specially set aside for it by a public organization, the Soviet Peace Fund. It has individual and also collective members — personnel of plants and factories, mines, transport depots, state and collective farms, educational and research institutions. They are eager to contribute their money for the advancement of the cause of peace, social progress and a better future. The Soviet Women's Committee was one of the founders of the Peace Fund; over half of the Fund's activists are women. To raise the money for the Peace Fund industrial workers put in extra working hours, singers and musicians give special concerts, artists arrange exhibitions and sales of their works, and writers contribute their royalties. At many plants and factories the workers include the names of heroes who gave their lives for the country's freedom in the list of their team members, fulfill the extra quotas themselves and send the money to the Peace Fund.

[In 1970 a Soviet delegation visited Syria and Jordan to express solidarity.]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Tunisia

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

=================================================================================================

Tunisia

44000. AID. “Appendix A: Samples of AID Projects that Integrate Women By Sector: Water: Tunisia”, in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger. United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 69-86. The Rural Potable Water Institutions Project addresses an institutional approach to the operation and maintenance of rural potable water systems. The project's training plan provides for third country and USA training in addition to extensive LOP in-country training programs which are aimed equally at men and women. Approximately 35 individuals, mostly GGT officials at the regional level, will be trained in the USA and third countries. USAID has established a biweekly joint project review committee (counterpart) meeting approach to monitor progress in meeting project objectives. These joint reviews have already determined that 20% of the US and third country participants will be women. Moreover, these review meetings will enable USAID to monitor the selection and training of participants.

In addition, construction of new water points under this project will further benefit women. It will decrease the distance women who must haul water thus freeing time for other (possibly income generating) tasks. Increased amounts of potable water will aid women in household responsibilities of cooking, cleaning and hygiene care of children.

The project's title is Rural Potable Water Institutions Project and the Mission estimates that approximately $500000 is directed at WID, including training activities. The project is funded with ESF funds. [=]

44001. Amnesty International. Press Release: Tunisia: Executions Resume. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [1991] Five men were executed on Oct. 9 in Tunisia, despite President Ben Ali's repeatedly stated personal opposition to the death penalty. Three of those executed, all suspected sympathizers of the illegal Tunisian Islamic movement Hizb al-Nahda, had originally been sentenced in May to prison terms ranging from 20 years to life imprisonment for murder and arson; these sentences were raised to the death penalty by the Court of Appeal in June. The others were convicted of rape and murder. In 11/1990, a man convicted of multiple rape and murder became the first person in Tunisia to be executed since the government came to power in 1987. At the time the government stated that this execution was an exception, carried out because of the particularly heinous nature of the crime. Amnesty International has written to President Ben Ali expressing its regret at this resumption of executions, and urging him to commute all outstanding death sentences as a first step towards the abolition of the death penalty. [=]

44002. Burns, Khephra; Miles, William. Black Stars in Orbit: NASA's African American Astronauts; Part 1: Taking Flight. San Diego, Calif.: Guiller Books, 1995. pp. 2-35. The first African American to enter space was Col. Guion S. Bluford, Jr., on 8/30/1983 on space shuttle Challenger on mission STS-8. Bluford earned a BS Aerospace Engineering, and in the mid-1970's joined NASA to train as a mission specialist. On STS-8 he conducted medical experiments in microgravity and deployed an Indian telecommunications satellites. On 9/12/1992 the first African American woman, Dr. Mae C. Jemison made her first flight into space on STS-47, which carried Spacelab-J. On STS-47 she conducted 43 major experiments; when she returned to Earth and to her hometown of Chicago she was greeted by 8000 schoolchildren.

Aviation caught the imagination of African-Americans in the early twentieth century as it did of all peoples of that period. African-Americans had aviation pioneers, such as Dale White and Chauncey Spencer, who proved Black people could fly. When WWII started, many Blacks tried to join to fly, but the Army (this was before the formation of the Air Force) tried to discourage Blacks from flying. During the war, African-Americans were racially segregated and forced to cook, dig ditches and work to clean up behind Whites, but were not allowed to fly. The NAACP challenged this policy in court, and eventually the Army created a program to teach Black recruits to fly at Tuskegee Army Airfield in Alabama. The Army organized the Black pilots into the 99th Pursuit Squadron, 332d Fighter Group and 477th Bombardment Group. Despite exemplary service in North Africa and Italy, they faced continuing discrimination.

African American Astronauts" was Col. Guion S. Bluford, Jr. on 8/30/1983 on space shuttle Challenger on mission STS-8. Bluford earned a BS Aerospace Engineering, and in 1967, Air Force Major Robert H. Lawrence was named the first astronaut designatee. He came under intense attention of the media, which sought to determine whether he was a "black militant". Lawrence faced continuing discrimination and died in a F-104 crash on 12/8/1967. [TXT]

Although it would be ten more years before another Black astronaut would be named, Col. Vance Marchbanks was designated by NASA as chief flight surgeon for John Glenn in 1962, and was director of medical and safety tests on the moon spacesuits worn by Apollo astronauts. Dr. Robert Shurney became a designer for microgravity tools and techniques, as well as of the aluminum laces for the lunar rover for Apollo 15. Georgeff Carruthers designed the camera optics for the cameras carried by the astronauts.

44003. Crotense, Barbara. "A Third-World Effort on Family Planning", in New York Times, September 7, 1994. p. A6. Cairo, 9/6/1994: 10 third world countries (Bangladesh, Colombia, Egypt, Indonesia, Kenya, Mexico, Morocco, Thailand, Tunisia, Zimbabwe) have developed a family plan program called "Partners in Population and Development: A South-South Initiative". The program is being used as a model in the UN International Conference on Population and Development, for population control in the third world. In Indonesia, health clinics have been designed without walls, to allow the community and local religious leaders to participate in providing health services. There is a shortage of doctors, and in the last 10 years, the health staff has been increasingly supplemented by midwives. 10000 to 11000 midwives will be trained in 1995. Birth rates in Indonesia have been falling since 1971, when there were 5.6 births per woman to 3.0 births by 1991. Infant mortality has also decreased. Indonesia, which is primarily a Muslim country, claims that the success with family planning is due to President Suharto's strong emphasis and diplomacy concerning birth control. Colombia has also had success with family planning and claims this is due to the many options offered, excluding abortion, which was a compromise with the dominant Catholic Church. Birth rates in Colombia have dropped from 7.1 births per woman in in 1964, to 2.9 today; population growth rate has gone from 3.4% to 1.9%. However, in northern India, population programs have failed as family planning polices are devoid of choice, and poor women are often sterilized by force. Thailand's statistics of dropping birth rates from 6.5 to 2.1 per woman in the last 25 years, is also due to government-supported family planning. Meecchai Veeravaidhayafaund a program which offers free vasectomies on the King's birthday, and has also opened a restaurant called "Cabbages and Condoms" to raise funds. [TXT] and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. The Republic of Tunisia is dominated by President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali and the Constitutional Democratic Rally (RCD). Ben Ali was elected to a second 5-year term in March. He was unopposed. The President appoints the Prime Minister, Cabinet, and the 23 regional governors. In the March election, the RCD won 144 out of the 163 seats in Parliament. Four nominal opposition parties hold the remaining 19 seats. In 1992 the Government banned the Islamist party, An-Nahda, after a court sentenced 265 of its members to prison for allegedly plotting to assassinate the President and overthrow the Government. The internal security forces include a paramilitary national guard-organized within the Ministry of Interior. The security services continued to be responsible for human abuses, including torture, though the number of known cases appears to have declined significantly in 1994. They were allegedly responsible for the deaths of three persons in their custody. The major sectors of the economy include agriculture, tourism, petroleum, textiles, clothing and other manufactured exports, and remittances from workers abroad. Despite a severe drought, the economy continued its noninflationary growth in 1994, led by a 17.7% jump in tourism. Complaints of police abuse, including torture, declined significantly in 1994, due in part to government efforts to educate its police force and prosecute offending officers. The security forces also made fewer security related arrests compared to 1993. However, significant human rights abuses continued. The Government imprisoned two self-proclaimed presidential candidates, as well as an opposition candidate for Parliament who complained to a foreign journalist about the results of the national elections. The Government also stifled freedom of speech and the press. The authorities dismissed a journalist from his government job for providing an interview with one of the unofficial presidential candidate to a foreign publication; banned two French newspapers indefinitely for criticizing the Government; declined to renew the residency of a foreign correspondent, requiring him to depart the country; denied an entry visa to another foreign journalist to cover the elections; and interrupted telephone service to one foreign press service for 1 week and instructed its resident correspondent to depart the country. The police harassed several of the 117 women who signed a petition asking the Government to move more quickly on human rights reforms. Additionally, the Government continued to seek out and arrest suspected members of An-Nahda and the banned Communist Worker's Party (POCT) and to harass their relatives and friends, including repeated interrogations and home searches without warrants. Other significant human rights problems include: incommunicado detention, the Government's refusal to publish detailed and specific information on the death of three persons in their custody, and remittances from workers abroad. Despite amendments to the Press Code, press freedom also remained restricted. Other significant problems include: incommunicado detention, police abuse of detainees, the ability of citizens to change their government. Amendments to the Personal Status Code including an amendment granting women the right to transmit Tunisian nationality even when married to a foreigner and living abroad, further enhanced women's rights in 1993. A new electoral code will ensure limited opposition representation in the Chamber of Deputies to be selected in 1994 elections. The legal length of pretrial detention was reduced, forced prison labor was abolished, and some prisoners detained for membership in an illegal organization were pardoned.[=]

44006. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Part 12: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Tunisia is a republic in which the Constitution provides for a parliamentary democracy with separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial powers. In practice, the President and his party dominate decision making at all levels. The President appoints the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the 23 regional governors. His Constitutional Democratic Rally Party (RCD) holds all 141 seats in the Chamber of Deputies. The banned Islamist party, An-Nahda, was dealt a severe blow in 1992 when 266 of its senior members were sentenced to prison terms for plotting to assassinate the President and overthrow the Government. Arrests of Islamists and some extreme leftists continued in 1994. Tunisia’s internal security is maintained by civilian services which include a paramilitary national guard services continued to be responsible for widespread human rights abuses, including torture, although not on the scale of previous years. Police presence while not as oppressive as in 1991-1992, remained heavy in urban areas as on university campuses. Tunisia has a mixed economy dependent principally on revenues from agricultural products, tourism, petroleum, textile clothing and other manufactured exports, and remittances from workers abroad. It is now in the 7th year of a structural adjustment program destined to make the economy more market oriented, reduce staple food subsidies, increase the role of the private sector. Average annual real growth over the past five years has been 4.1%, but unemployment has been high and now stands at about 13%. In 1993 Tunisia enacted a number of legal reforms to enhance the protection of human rights. Nevertheless, man of the reforms have not yet been translated into real improvement, and many basic rights continued to be restricted. The Government continued to seek out and arrest suspected members of the banned Islamist party, An-Nahda, and the banned Communist Workers’ Party (POCT) and to harass their relatives and persons suspected of involvement with their organizations. The prosecution of leading members of organizations critical of the Government, as well as the Government's harsh reaction to the circulation of a petition protesting human rights abuses, had a chilling effect on freedom of speech. Despite amendments to the Press Code, press freedom also remained restricted. Other significant problems include: incommunicado detention, police abuse of detainees, the Government's refusal to publish detailed and specific information on the punishment of abusers, interference with the right to privacy, and the inability of citizens to change their government. Amendments to the Personal Status Code including an amendment granting women the right to transmit Tunisian nationality even when married to a foreigner and living abroad, further enhanced women's rights in 1993. A new electoral code will ensure limited opposition representation in the Chamber of Deputies to be selected in 3/1994 elections. The legal length of pretrial detention was reduced, forced prison labor was abolished, and some prisoners detained for membership in an illegal organization were pardoned.[=] amended to ensure representation of opposition parties. The winner-take-all system remains in place, but some 19 additional "national" seats were added to the chamber which will be reserved proportionally for parties that do not otherwise win representation in the chamber. Opposition parties that participate in the 3/20/1994, elections are assured of at least token representation in the chamber. Elections for the Presidency and the Chamber of Deputies are held every 5 years. Voting is by universal adult suffrage. All legal parties are free to present candidates. However, to run for president a candidate must gather the signatures of at least 30 members of the Chamber of Deputies or Presidents of municipalities. In 1993 there was only one person among the authorized opposition parties who was not a member of the resident's RCD. By the end of 1993, all the legal opposition parties and many professional organizations and associations had endorsed President Ben Ali for reelection. While there are no legal impediments to women's participation in government and politics, they are underrepresented and hold very few senior leadership positions. In 1993 the President promoted one woman to ministerial rank and one to the 13-member ruling party CD Politburo There are 6 female members in the 141-seat Chamber of Deputies, and a woman is the second Vice President of the Chamber. In municipal councils, 11% of the members are women. 10% of the members of the Economic & Social Council are women There is a small Berber minority, constituting about 3% of the population, which is able to participate freely in the political process. [a] 44007. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Part 13: Respect For Human Rights: Section 4: Governmental Attitude Regarding International NGO Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Several human rights organizations are active in Tunisia and are recognized by the Government, but they are subject to a variety of restrictions. The Tunisian Human Rights League was forced to suspend its operations in 1992 following amendments to the Associations Law, but was permitted to resume its activities in March pending a judicial interpretation of the law. Despite the League's resumption it has yet to recover fully from its period of suspension. The League is scheduled to hold its first congress since 1989 in early 1994. The Arab Institute of Human Rights, founded in 1989, is a collaborative effort of the Tunisian Human Rights League, the Arab Organization for Human Rights, and the Union of Arab Lawyers. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) operates a regional office in Tunis. The Maghreb Human Rights League is headquartered in Tunis. In 1993 the Higher Committee for Human Rights & Basic Freedoms, formed by President Ben Ali in 1991, released a report Human Rights in Tunisia: 1991-1993. The report does not address specific problems or cases but merely lists the accomplishment claimed by the Government. Human rights monitors are skeptical of the dependence and effectiveness of offices created in 1992 to coordinate human rights concerns in the Interior, Justice, Social Affairs, and Foreign Ministries. In 1993 Al officials, including its secretary general, met with the Foreign Minister and other Tunisian officials. Another Al representative visited Tunisia and issued a report alleging that security forces were responsible for torture, widespread harassment, and sexual abuse against women relatives of incarcerated Islamists. The Government strenuously disputed the report's findings, as did several of the opposition parties and prominent women activists. [a] 44009. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based On Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Laws protecting the rights of children are included in statutes governing education, health, inheritance, adoption, and child custody. The Personal Status Code, in particular, provides important guarantees for children in cases of adoption and the right to custody of minor children in the case of death or incapacitation of the father. Education is mandatory to age 16. The Government has an ambitious plan to reduce mortality rates by reducing malnutrition, reducing the incidence of low-weight births, and reducing mortality rates and vitamin deficiencies in women. [a] 44008. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Part 14: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based On Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. In 1993 the Chamber of Deputies adopted major changes to the 1956 Personal Status Code, which established equal rights for men and women in most fields. The Chamber also amended the Penal, Labor, and Nationality Codes to further enhance and protect women's rights. These changes increased the legal rights and protection enjoyed by women and children, including allowing women to transmit Tunisian nationality even though married to a foreigner and living abroad. Criminal penalties for reducing malnutrition, reducing the incidence of low-weight births, and 1992 to coordinate human rights concerns in the Interior, Justice, Social Affairs, and Foreign Ministries. In Kentucky, laws were amended to further reduce job discrimination based on sex; and a fund was established to pay child support until delinquent fathers can be found and made to pay. Inheritance laws are still governed by Islamic law, which favors male descendant. The husband is still recognized as the head of the household, even though maintenance of the family is a joint effort and the wife's wishes are to be respected. According to the 1989 census, 48.1% of females over the age of 10 were illiterate, compared with 26.3% of males. There is a significant trend, however, toward greater educational and professional opportunities for women, and the number of women in the medical, legal, and other professions continued to grow steadily. 25% of Tunisian magistrates are women. In 1992 women comprised an estimated 20% of the workforce, a figure that probably understates their presence as many women were employed in the informal sector and seasonally in agriculture. According to figures released in 1992, 21% of civil service employees were women, who were predominantly found in the fields of education, health and social affairs at the lower or middle levels. Violence against women does occur, but there are no official statistics or studies on the subject. In 1993 the Government initiated a survey on violence against women. The media has begun to break its silence on this issue, which had seldom been raised publicly given the importance attached to family privacy in this traditional society. A woman deputy called on the Religious Affairs Minister to instruct religious leaders to address the problem in mosques to emphasize that Islam does not condone violence against women. The Tunisian Association of Democratic Women (ATFD) operates a small office which provides counseling services to battered and abused women 6 days a week. An attorney and psychologist are on duty 1-2 days a week. However, very few women have used the organization's services. No other support groups or shelters are known to exist. A battered woman was still most likely to seek shelter with her extended family. There are several active women's rights groups in Tunisia, the most influential being the RCD-affiliated National Union of Tunisian Women (UNFT), the Tunisian Association of Democratic Women (ATFD), and the Tunisian section of the Worldwide Movement of Mothers (MMM). [a] manufacturing, the minimum age for employment is 15 years, in agriculture it is 13. Tunisian children are required to attend school until age 16. Inspectors from the Social Affairs Ministry check the record of employees to verify that the employer complies with the minimum age law. Despite this law, young children often perform agricultural work in rural areas and sell food and other items in urban areas. Smaller enterprises in the informal sector (which employs approximately 20% of the workforce) reportedly violate the minimum age law frequently. The UGTT has expressed concern that child labor—frequently disguised as apprenticeship—still exists, principally in the traditional craft sectors such as ceramics and stone carving. Young girls from rural areas are sometimes placed as domestics in urban homes by their fathers, who collect the child’s wages. Workers between the ages of 14 and 18 are prohibited from working from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. Children over 14 may work a maximum of 4.5 hours a day. The combination of school and work may not exceed 7 hours. [≡]

44011. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. The ability of citizens to change their government through democratic means has yet to be demonstrated. The ruling Constitutional Democratic Rally (RCD) and its direct predecessor parties, have controlled the political arena since independence. The RCD controls the Cabinet, the Chamber of Deputies, regional and governments, and the security apparatus. The President appoints the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the 23 Governors. The President and the RCD dominate politics at the national, regional and local levels. The Government and the RCD are closely integrated: the President of the Republic is also the president of the RCD, and the RCD's Secretary-General holds the rank of Minister of State. The largest opposition party, the proscribed Islamist an-Nadha Party, received 12% of the vote in the 1988 legislative elections, when the Government permitted its candidates to run as independents. However, the party is in disarray following the conviction in 1992 of nearly all of its leaders for plotting to overthrow the Government. In 1992 a court sentenced in absentia Raïchd Ghannouchi, the nominal head of the party, to life in prison. Ghannouchi was granted political asylum in Britain in 1993. The Chamber of Deputies has 163 seats. It has yet to establish itself as an effective counterweight to executive authority. The electoral code provides for a winner-take-all formula in legislative elections, but the Government amended the law in 1993 to add 19 additional seats to the Chamber of Deputies for parties that do not win seats. Four opposition parties that participated in the March legislative election were apportioned those seats. Elections for the Presidency and the Chamber of Deputies are held every five years. Voting is by secret ballot. All legal parties are free to present candidates. Presidential candidates must obtain the signatures of at least 30 members of the Chamber of Deputies of presidents of municipalities—all but one of whom were members of the ruling RCD party in 1994. Two persons who were not affiliated with any political party tried to announce their candidates for the presidency even though they were unable to obtain the requisite signatures. The authorities detained both of them for several months (see section 2.a.). None of the six legal opposition parties offered a candidate for president and all endorsed President Ben Ali for re-election. Women may participate in politics. Eleven women won seats in the March legislative election. Nevertheless, women remain underrepresented in government and hold few senior government posts. One woman holds ministerial rank, and a woman is the second vice president of the Chamber of Deputies. In municipal elections, 15% of the members are women. 25% of Tunisian magistrates are women. [≡]

44012. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. Laws protecting the rights of children are included in the penal code and the public health, inheritance, opposition, and child custody. The Government is committed to upholding these laws. The personal status code provides protection for children in adoption or custody cases, or in cases of the death or incapacitation of the children. There is no pattern of societal abuse against children. Criminal penalties for persons convicted of child abuse or neglect are severe. Education is mandatory until age 16, though approximately 10% of students leave school before that time. [≡]

44013. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. Although women still face discrimination in certain legal and social matters, the Government has made serious efforts to advance women's rights. In 1993 the Chamber of Deputies expanded women's rights by amending the 1966 Personal Status Code. The Government has also ensured equal employment rights for women by instituting changes in the Labor Code and signing various international treaties and conventions. In 1994 the Government enacted a law to subsidize the child-care costs for mothers employed outside the home. There is a significant trend toward greater educational and professional opportunities for women. In 1994 the National Union of Tunisian Women (UNFT) was awarded UNESCO's top prize worldwide for its work in the fight against female illiteracy in Tunisia. The number of women in the medical, legal, and other professions continued to grow steadily. Women comprise an estimated 20% of the workforce, a figure which probably underestimates their presence as many women are employed in the traditional sector as well as seasonally in agriculture. According to government figures, women comprise 26% of the civil service, employed mainly in the fields of education, health, and social affairs at the middle or lower levels. Violence against women is known to occur, but there are no statistics on its extent. In recent years, the media have reported on this subject, stressing that violence against women is a serious social problem. The Tunisian Association of Democratic Women operates a walk-in counseling service in Tunis for battered women, assisting about 20 women a month. Battered women generally first seek assistance from family members. Human rights monitors have said that police intervention is often ineffective because officers tend to regard incidents as family problems to be solved and by family members. Few cases of spousal violence are brought to trial. In 1993 the Chamber of Deputies strengthened criminal penalties for wife beating, requiring Judges to use more severe sentences. [≡]

44014. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Tunisia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. The minimum age for employment in manufacturing is 15 years, in agriculture 13 years. The Government requires children to attend school until age 16. Workers between the ages of 14-18 are prohibited from working from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. Children over the age of 14 may work a maximum of 4-5 hours a day. The combination of school and work may not exceed 7 hours.
Inspectors of the Ministry of Social Affairs examine the records of employees to verify that employers comply with the minimum age law. Nonetheless, young children often perform agricultural work in rural areas and work as vendors in urban areas. The UGTT has expressed concern that child labor—frequently disguised as an apprenticeship still exists, principally in the handicraft industry. In other instances, young rural girls are sometimes placed as domesticics in urban homes by their fathers who collect the child's wages. [2]

44015. House Select Committee on Hunger. “Hearing: Expert Witnesses:Questions: Part 7”, in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger, United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 1-33. Chairman Leland: I appreciate the gentleman's recollection. Let me ask you, in the Third World today, there are a lot of different kinds of pressures and impositions that are being made, particularly by the Soviet Union and the US but even other countries in eastern Europe and the West. Africa and the Third World as a whole are viewed by the administration in an East-West context. To what extent does that exacerbate the problems of women in development?

There is another problem which was raised by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Emerson: the problem of Islam and particularly the culture of Islam that imposes not even secondary but tertiary citizenship for women. These two problems that really threaten women's human rights everywhere. can you comment on this?

Ms. Smith: It sounds like you are really talking about some of the major forces that can be obstacles for women's advancement worldwide. You know, you can look at it from a pessimistic view, I suppose, but I never do. You mentioned, first of all, the whole East-West issue and how that has an impact on women in development. Out of the Nairobi conference we pounded out an agenda that really required us to come together, East-West, North-South, and that agenda went forward. Second, we have some changes going on right now between East and West, right? Those have major significance. People talking about Afghanistan are talking about humanitarian assistance supported by Russia and the US. I can imagine PVO's being part of that, and I can imagine their sensitivity in working with women would be an important ingredient.

In the area of Islamic fundamentalism, we get letters at OEF from Tunisian women's groups who are worried, now that President Borigba is no longer the head of state--and he was a man who did advance women's rights in that country--about the growing fundamentalist movement--Tunisian women want some skills so they can be reorganized to maintain the rights that they have traditionally had. It is these movements everywhere, where you have to try to support in different ways the women who feel they are being affected negatively by fundamentalism. How can you help strengthen what they are doing? That is the first thing.

The larger movement of Islam is a bigger issue, and I don't think any of us have all the answers on that, but I do feel that we have some opportunities now because there is so much change occurring in different ways in the world. We must take advantage of all those targets of opportunity. That is what strategies are all about, and what we try to do in our global network. Jodi, you may have some other thought than mine. [2]

Uganda: Year 1983: 17 AIDS-cases; Year 1987: 1138 AIDS-cases; Year 1987: 6% of prostitutes are HIV-positive.

Rwanda: Year 1981: 10 AIDS-cases; Year 1987: 705 AIDS-cases, (246 are children).

Zaire: Year 1987: 6-8% of pregnant women are HIV-positive; Year 1987: 11% of prostitutes are HIV-Positive.

Congo: Year 1987: 583 AIDS-cases.

Kenya: Year 1985: 61% of prostitutes are HIV-positive.

Tanzania: Year 1987:1130 AIDS-cases.

Cameroon: Year 1987: 1.5% of pregnant women are HIV-positive.

Ghana: Year 1987: 96 AIDS-cases.

Senegal: Year 1987: 14% of prostitutes are HIV-2-positive.

Guinea-Bissau: Year 1987: 60% of prostitutes are HIV-2-positive.

Tunisia: Year 1987: 11 AIDS-cases.

Contact: Ministry of Health, PO Box 30016, Nairobi, Kenya.

Further Reading: Report on AIDS, by the Panos Institute, 8 Alfred Place, London, WCIE 7EB, UK.

[-]

(6) HAZARDOUS WASTES: UNCED must call for a ban on the export of hazardous wastes and dirty industries worldwide, thus fortifying existing regional waste trade bans. It must also pressure the North to solve its own toxic and nuclear waste problems. Proposals to this effect have either been rejected at UNCED or watered down to insignificance by the OECD countries.

(7) FORESTS: UNCED must address the real causes of forest destruction (tropical, temperate, boreal) globally, and promote equitable international principles. In addition, UNCED must recognize and support land and cultural rights of indigenous peoples and traditional forest dwellers. Planting new trees, as UNCED proposes, cannot be a substitute for saving existing natural forests and the cultures that live in them.

(8) NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND POWER: UNCED must call for an end to all nuclear weapons testing, and the rapid phase-out of all nuclear power plants. In the midst of nuclear disasters, weapons tests and near-accidents, these issues have been inexplicably excluded from the Earth Summit agenda.

(9) BIOTECHNOLOGY: UNCED must take urgent and binding safety measures (including, at the very least, an international code of conduct on safety in biotechnology) to control the health and environmental risks of biotechnology research and application.

(10) TRADE: UNCED must not endorse free trade as the key to achieving "sustainable development." It must reconcile trade practices with environmental protection. Social, political and environmental concerns must form the framework within which trade takes place, not vice versa.

These and other actions are fundamental if we are to address the huge environment and development problems the world faces. Positive change requires a major turn around by the US government, as well as other industrialized nations, and an intensive effort by all parties. As Non-Governmental Organizations we have been constantly pushing for UNCED to take these issues on; if all government delegates and the Secretariat were to act upon these essential points, our faith in the process would be renewed. However, it appears that the Earth Summit is failing to meet its challenge and instead moving in the opposite direction from the path it must forge to save the planet from destruction. Moreover, the gravity of the situation deepens as UNCED entrusts care for environment and development with the very institutions that are causing many of the problems in the first place. Regrettably, barring a dramatic change in course, UNCED is heading toward a failure of historic proportions that the earth and its people cannot afford.

Sponsored by Greenpeace International: The Forum of Brazilian NGOs (representing 1200 groups); Friends of the Earth International; Third World Network;

Organizational and Coalition Endorsements: Action Aid, United Kingdom; Action for Solidarity, Equality, Environment and Development (an international grass roots youth network); American Baptist Church, Ecology & Racial Justice, USA; American Indian Law Alliance, USA; Arc Peace International Alliance of Northern Peoples for; Environment and Development (ANPED); Associacion Ecologica Coyoacan, A.C.BUND, Germany; Campaign for Peace and Cooperation, Sweden; Campagna Nord-Sud, Italy; Canadian Council on International Cooperation; Center for Development of International Law, USA; Center for Science & Environment, India; Conference of United Churches of Christ Environment Committee, USA; Coordinadora de Organizaciones de Defensa Ambiental, Spain; Earth Community Center & Center of Concern, USA; ENDA Inter-Arab, Tunisia; Environment and Development in the Third World, Senegal; Eurostep; Filipino Rural Reconstruction Movement, Philippines; Foro Mexicano de la Sociedad Civil Para El Medio Ambiente y: Desarrollo, Mexico; Friends of the Earth, Germany; Friends of the Earth, USA; Fundepublico, Colombia; Global Coral Reef Alliance, USA; Highlander Center, USA; International Coordinating Committee for Religion and the Earth; International Environmental Law Center, Australia; Japan Tropical Forest Action Network, Japan; MLUC; Mobilization for Survival, USA; Native American Council of New York City, USA; Native Kids Action, USA; National Toxics Campaign, USA; Nature and Youth, Norway; Naturevakt, Norway; Network for Environmental and Economic Responsibility of United Church of Christ; Netherlands Organisation for Development Cooperation--NOVIB; New Zealand UNCED Earth Summit Committee, New Zealand; NGO Forum, Japan; NOFF, Norway; Pacific-Asia Resource Center, USA; Paraguayan Island Association of NGOs (PLANOG); Paraguayan Movement; Pacific-Asia Resource Center (PARC), Tokyo, Japan; Pacto Latinoamericano de Accion Ecologica, Latin America; People to People Aid Movement, Yokohama, Japan; Presbyterian Church Environmental Ethics Committee; Pro Regenwald, Germany; Red de Oranizaciones Ambientalistas de Paraguay, Paraguay; Riverside Church, New York, USA; SANE-Freeze International; Sierra Club, USA; Sobrevivencia, Paraguay; Third World Institute, Uruguay; United Church Board for Homeland Ministries, USA; United Church Board for World Ministries, USA; United Church of Christ, USA; United Church of Christ, Office of Church in Society, USA; United Methodist Church Ecocide Project Network, USA; Women's Caucus at PrepComm 4;

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Tunisia

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

44018. Pickart, George A. Battle Looms: Islam and Politics in the Middle East: (II) Tunis: Government Position. A Report to the Committee on Foreign Relations. United States Senate, 104th Congress, Second Session. February 25, 1993. pp. 9-10. Tunisian officials are sensitive to criticism of human rights practices and acknowledge that room for improvement exists. The officials argue, however, that human rights critics do not give Tunisia sufficient credit for taking responsibility for and correcting excesses. The Foreign Minister, for instance, pointed out that all police stations in Tunisia prominently display specific human rights regulations, and that individual police officers must certify that they have seen the regulations before assuming duties. An official in the Ministry of Justice noted that Tunisia had researched, documented, and released a report on human rights problems associated with the Islamist trials.

Moreover, the Government of Tunisia argues that Annadha is coordinated and funded by foreign powers, and as such is a threat to Tunisia's stability. It is not, one Foreign Ministry official argued, that Tunisia opposes individual Islamists who are seeking incorporation into Tunisia's political system. Rather, the line of reasoning continues, Tunisia is opposed to Islamist agents of a "Fundamentalist International," which has its ideological headquarters in Iran, and operational centers in Sudan and Afghanistan. According to the Foreign Minister, this is a movement of "religious extremism" bent on taking power through violent means; it threatens not only Tunisia, but all of the emerging democracies in North Africa and the Middle East. High-ranking officials in the Foreign and Justice Ministries claim to have hard evidence—as yet unreleased—to support the existence of the "Tehran-Khartoum-Tunis axis."

The best answer to Tunisia's difficulties, according to Tunisian officials, is to carry out President Ben Ali's "New Project for Society," which promises to bring a new system to the country. The President, noted several government and party leaders, reaffirmed his commitment to democracy in a 11/7/1992 speech, in which he commended the Tunisian people for reaching a "level of maturity" that made their participation possible. The Tunisian people have made significant progress toward a democratic future irreversible. Such progress was demonstrated, according one official, in a gradual but unmistakable series of political and economic reforms, including: opening the Chamber of Deputies to opposition parties; improving the electoral and press codes; securing additional rights for women and children; and taking responsibility for excesses or improprieties in the administration of justice. [6]

44019. Pickart, George A. Battle Looms: Islam and Politics in the Middle East: (II) Tunis: Government Position. A Report to the Committee on Foreign Relations. United States Senate, 104th Congress, Second Session. February 25, 1993. pp. 9-10. Tunisian officials are sensitive to criticism of human rights practices and acknowledge that room for improvement exists. The officials argue, however, that human rights critics do not give Tunisia sufficient credit for taking responsibility for and correcting excesses. The Foreign Minister, for instance, pointed out that all police stations in Tunisia prominently display specific human rights regulations, and that individual police officers must certify that they have seen the regulations before assuming duties. An official in the Ministry of Justice noted that Tunisia had researched, documented, and released a report on human rights problems associated with the Islamist trials.

Moreover, the Government of Tunisia argues that Annadha is coordinated and funded by foreign powers, and as such is a threat to Tunisia's stability. It is not, one Foreign Ministry official argued, that Tunisia opposes individual Islamists who are seeking incorporation into Tunisia's political system. Rather, the line of reasoning continues, Tunisia is opposed to Islamist agents of a "Fundamentalist International," which has its ideological headquarters in Iran, and operational centers in Sudan and Afghanistan. According to the Foreign Minister, this is a movement of "religious extremism" bent on taking power through violent means; it threatens not only Tunisia, but all of the emerging democracies in North Africa and the Middle East. High-ranking officials in the Foreign and Justice Ministries claim to have hard evidence—as yet unreleased—to support the existence of the "Tehran-Khartoum-Tunis axis."

The best answer to Tunisia's difficulties, according to Tunisian officials, is to carry out President Ben Ali's "New Project for Society," which promises to bring a new system to the country. The President, noted several government and party leaders, reaffirmed his commitment to democracy in a 11/7/1992 speech, in which he commended the Tunisian people for reaching a "level of maturity" that made their participation possible. The Tunisian people have made significant progress toward a democratic future irreversible. Such progress was demonstrated, according one official, in a gradual but unmistakable series of political and economic reforms, including: opening the Chamber of Deputies to opposition parties; improving the electoral and press codes; securing additional rights for women and children; and taking responsibility for excesses or improprieties in the administration of justice. [6]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Tunisia

==============================================================================

East: (II) Tunis: Outlook. A Report to the Committee on Foreign Relations. United States Senate, 104th Congress, Second Session. February 25, 1993. pp. 11-12. The Tunisian Government makes a convincing argument that the country is entering a new era. Tunisia’s economic achievements, its efforts to support women’s rights, and its steps to strengthen the educational system help the government make its case. These attempts at internal liberalization are complemented by new efforts in the international arena, such as Tunisia’s recent offer to host a session of the multilateral Arab-Israel peace talks.

At the same time, there is a wide disparity of opinion between the government and its critics. The government claims to be engaged in a battle against terrorism, while its critics claim the government is using the specter of terrorism to obliterate its political opponents. Under these conditions, it is difficult to see how a process of liberalization could expand much further, and it is possible to conclude that a stiffening of opposition might lie ahead.

The government, for its part, claims it will continue to implement step-by-step changes in its electoral, press, and social codes to ensure the development of a democratic process and culture. The government is painfully aware that the present lack of opposition parties in the parliament contrasts sharply with its democratic rhetoric; as one ruling party leader phrased it, “we know it is a problem.” The government thus is willing to take corrective steps, even if this means government funding of opposition parties and giving seats in the parliament to the opposition without contest. But many Tunisians question whether these steps will result in real changes. In one revealing exchange, a high-ranking Foreign Ministry official said offhandedly (and in an informal setting), “don't expect us to do anything we can't control.” [=]
Turkey

The Kurds have no representation in the present parliament although they received the highest votes in the north eastern provinces. The arcane election system requires that any party that does not poll more than ten percent of the national votes is not represented. Two important parties failed this test: the Kurdish nationalist Hadap (4.17 percent) and the rightwing National Action Party of veteran nationalist politician Alparslan Turkes (8.18 percent). Any party wishing to form a government must find a coalition partner or partners to reach the two hundred and seventy-six seats necessary for vote of confidence in parliament. Ciller's True Path Party and Yilmaz's Motherland Party are natural bedfellows since there is very little difference between their policies. But the two cannot work with each other despite strong pressures from the army, businessmen and the west to form a coalition to deny Refah the chance to form a government. In any case, they need a third party to reach the magic number of seats. Both Ecevit and Yilmaz strongly condemned Ciller's ill-conceived ambition to be the new prime minister, and said that they would not join a coalition under her leadership. But they are both committed to block Refah's path to power, and are afraid that their 'liberal' supporters might melt away if they join an Islamic party in a coalition government. The powerful Turkish armed forces, the self-proclaimed guardians of Mustafa Kemal's secular republic that threw Erbakan in jail for eight months during the 1980-83 military take-over on charges of trying to set up an Islamic regime, joined the fray with repeated statements that it would never allow 'fanaticism' and 'reaction' into politics. Whoever is eventually asked by president Suleiman Demirel to form a government must do so within forty-five days. By 'Crescent International' press time, Demirel had asked Erbakan to form the new government. This offer was made on 1/9/96. Erbakan has started to sound more 'moderate' than when he began his election campaign, saying he is ready for compromise, and would not take Turkey out of Nato if he became prime minister, although he would renegotiate the customs union with the European Union and would not allow his country to join the European Union. In these circumstances, there is already talk of new elections. And even if new elections are held, it is doubtful whether a strong government can emerge from it—a government that can resolve the potentially bloody ethnic confrontation between the Turks and Kurds. As the historian David McDowall suggests, in a study to be published this month (A Modern History of the Kurds, 1 B Taurus 24.50), the two peoples' best hope of avoiding such catastrophic prospect lies in a redefinition of both national identities, giving due weight to their Islamic heritage. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

security. Other sources of danger to Germany include Islamic extremist groups and, increasingly, groups representing the antagonistic nationalities of the former Yugoslavia. Schmidbauer's report contends that 13 Islamic groups active in Germany are believed to resort to violence on occasion, but, it adds, only about 1.5% of the 2.1 million Muslims living in Germany belong to or support extremist groups. The sizeable number of Serbs, Croats, Bosnian Muslims, Kosovo Albanians and Macedonians now living in Germany, the report speculates, might come to rely on violence with greater frequency in settling their differences.

Schmidbauer's warnings were echoed in large part by Federal Prosecutor General Kay Nehm. Speaking with reporters in Karlsruhe (Baden-Wurttemberg) on 2/14/1996, Nehm said he expects the PKK to unleash a new wave of terrorist attacks in Germany. PKK General Secretary Abdullah Ocalan called off its "cease fire" in Germany late last month, according to Nehm. He also reported that a 25-year-old Kurd suspected of being a high-ranking PKK activist was arrested on 2/11/1996 in Stuttgart (Baden-Wurttemberg). She joins 20 other Kurds who are now in custody pending indictment and 54 facing criminal charges in Germany. Prosecutors are also pursuing charges against 46 individuals, Nehm said, suspected of having participated in genocidal acts in the former Yugoslavia. [ ]

46009. -------. "News in Brief: Turkey", in Crescent International, December 16-31, 1995. p. 2. The European Union gave approval on 12/7 for a formal customs union with Turkey which will be given formal approval a week later. This had been requested by Tansu Ciller, the beleaguered Turkish prime minister, who faces a strong challenge from the Refah Party in the forthcoming elections on 12/27. [ ]

46011. -------. "Number of Abortions Rising Quickly In East, Central Europe, Says Expert", in Seattle Times, September 13, 1995. p. A12. WHO specialist Assia Brandrup-Lukanov reported at the UNConference on Women that economic depression and a lack of contraceptives has led to a rapid increase in abortion. She notes that 'most women cannot afford to have children', and that Russian women have up to 8 abortions. In Rumania, there are 300 abortions for every live birth. She noted that poverty has driven many Albanian women to work as prostitutes in Italy, and Russian women to work as prostitutes in Turkey. [TXT]

46014. -------. "Turkey Passes Law Barring Smoking in Public Places [law also forbids sale of cigarettes to minors; law will take effect in days]", in Seattle Times, November 25, 1996. p. A7. [TXT]

“see what happens.”; such attitudes, may indeed scare the people, but they will not give the state an agreeable image; on the contrary it damages its reputation.” “Never forget that you represent the state.”

The book of military etiquette required the commanders to assist the poor, sick and destitute in their areas of responsibility by organizing provision of water and food, the repair of their houses and the harvest of their crops. “If you see people walking on the road, give them a ride if you have a place in your vehicle,” the book advised.

“When you have to address the people, do not assemble the people at the houses of the headman, sheikh or the wealthy, but pick open spaces as the village square, village coffeehouse, the mosque courtyard or the school garden. Politely persuade the important personages that this was meant as no offence to them.

The villagers will make you offerings to ensure that you act tolerantly. Accept the people’s offerings but sparingly. Pay back with cigarettes, tea, sugar or canned rations.

Make use of every opportunity to convince that you are sharing their joy and grief. Help them bury their dead, attend funerals, pay condolence visits. For, according to local traditions, those who visit the house of dead for condolences cannot be an enemy. Attend the mass prayers at religious occasions. Give tips to children, attend the weddings and join in the folk dances.

Have prayers recited for your fallen soldiers and invite the locals to the ceremony. In Ramadan, respond to invitation from the villagers to break the fast together. Organize fast breaking meals yourselves and make sure the village poor are invited beside the wealthy.

If you have to procure supplies locally, never haggle over prices. On the contrary, pay more than the normal price. Buy from different shops instead of taking only from one. Thus, you will not only show that you do not discriminate between the people, but at the same time you will win gratitude of the less well-to-do retailers.

“Never forget that you represent the state in the places you serve. The trust and respect you evoke in people will increase their trust, respect and loyalty to the state,” the booklet said. [=

46020. -------. “Turkish Girl Kills Herself To Emulate Kurt Cobain’s Death [a teenage fan of Nirvana’s Kurt Cobain commuted suicide in emulation of Kobain; sixteen year old Didem Ucan shot herself while playing Nirvana music in her home in Mersin; she had been depressed since Cobain’s suicide in Seattle, 4/5/1994]”, in Seattle Times, April 19, 1994. p. A11. [TXT]

46021. -------. “Turkish Government Denounced For Virginity Exams”, in Daily World (Aberdeen), JJune 5, 1994. p. A12. Human Rights Watch has denounced Turkey for allowing virginity exams on women in police custody, and sometimes on hospital patients, students and applicants for government jobs. In addition, women in police custody have been raped, stripped and otherwise sexual abused. The government denies the issue is a problem, and PM Tansu Ciller, a woman, has declined comment. [TXT]

46023. -------. “Turkish Prime Minister Tansu Ciller Resigns [ends wobbly coalition of True Path Party (DYN) with social democrats under Deniz Baykal; resignation is seen weakening Turkish reforms, and lessening chance that EU will admit Turkey]”, in Seattle Times, September 21, 1995. p. A10. [TXT]

46024. -------. “Turkish Workers Rally in Capital”, in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), January 11, 1997. p. 14. Almost 100000 workers marched in Ankara on 1/5/1997 to call for anti-corruption measures after a traffic accident in which a car carrying a national legislator, a hit man, a police chief and a beauty queen drew attention to the collusion of government and organized crime. The gunman was fugitive Abdullah Catti, who is linked to Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turk who shot Pope John Paul II in 1981. Several national government and police officials have been dismissed in the scandal. [TXT]

46025. -------. “Wave of Kurdish Violence Draws Denunciations from German Politicians, Pledges to Tighten Laws”, in Seattle Times, March 22, 1996. p. 1. Kurdish activists in Germany could face expulsion from the country following two weekends’ worth of unruly demonstrations. On consecutive Saturdays, 3/16/1996 and 3/17/1996, Kurs and German police came to blows as peaceful demonstrations for Kurdish rights gave way to street battles and outbreaks of violence. With the approach of the Kurdish new year on 3/21/1996, leaders of both Chancellor Helmut Kohl’s Christian Democratic Union and the opposition Social Democrats called for decisive action against those responsible, agreeing that the guilty parties should be expelled from Germany. Authorities had granted permission for a demonstration to mark “International Women’ and Lesbians’ Day of Struggle” to be held in Bonn on 3/9/1996. Approximately 1000 Kurs from all over Germany turned up for the scheduled march, which police tried to stop after numerous banners for the separatist Workers’ Party of Kurdistan (PKK), which German authorities banned in late 1993 after a series of attacks upon Turkish establishments in Germany, were unfurled (cf. TWIG 12/3/1993, p. 2). The police reportedly offered to allow the march to continue if the banners were set aside, but were pelted with cans and vegetables. The demonstrations thereupon degenerated into a street battle between police and demonstrators. After the disturbances on 3/9/1996, permission for a Kurdish-sponsored demonstration scheduled to be held in Dortmund (North Rhine-Westphalia) on the following Saturday (3/16/1996) was revoked by a state administrative court. Police attempted to close the borders of North Rhine-Westphalia by setting up highway roadblocks, and border patrols were similarly instructed to turn back Kurs attempting to enter Germany from neighboring countries. Nonetheless, over 2000 Kurs gathered in the center of the city, where they clashed with police trying to forestall the demonstration. Police made 232 arrests, took another 585 demonstrators into temporary custody, and issued 1796 orders to individuals to leave the scene. That same day, Kurds and police clashed in several other German cities, including Berlin, Hamburg and Hanover (Lower Saxony).

The outbreaks of violence drew sharp responses from leaders of Germany’s two largest parties. Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Wolfgang Schausie, the CDU’s parliamentary leader, called for the immediate expulsion of those guilty of violating Germany’s laws and disrupting the peace. Kohl announced that his government would change the laws on foreigners to allow expulsion of any foreigner convicted of a major instance of disturbing the peace. A bill has already been prepared and will be presented to the cabinet before the end of the month, the chancellor said. Federal President Roman Herzog declared after a visit to injured police that “foreigners who spread terror and violence in Germany have lost their right to our hospitality. Organizers, instigators and those who commit violence must leave our country.” Calling on the half-million Kurds residing in Germany to disavow the PKK, the governing board of the opposition Social Democratic Party likewise said that Kurds who transgress German law should no longer be allowed to remain in the country. Federal law enforcement officials warned that they anticipated further trouble in connection with celebration of the Kurdish new year on 3/21/1996 and said that police were on special alert. Large gatherings and demonstrations were prohibited and the police took dozens of punitive PKK activists into custody. Representatives of the National Liberation Front for Kurdistan, which is believed to have close ties with the PKK, criticized these preparations, calling them an “anti-democratic provocation.” [a demonstration in Giessen (Hessen) that took place the evening of 3/20/1996 despite the prohibition turned violent, resulting in 120 arrests and about a dozen injured police. German officials believe that there may be as many as 3000 PKK members active in Germany at present, about three times as many as when it was banned. The PKK has been fighting a guerrilla war with Turkey for independence since 1984; some 250000 lives have been lost to date. [=

46026. -------. “Weekly Review, Part 5”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem

April 22: AUTHORITIES ALLOW TOURIST SITE ON MUSLIM CEMETERY

Israeli authorities are getting ready to knock down a historic Muslim cemetery near the seashore in Jaffa to make way for a tourist site and a parking lot.

The head of the Islamic Charitable Society said he has turned many times to the Jaffa Municipality asking them to help restore the crumbling cemetery, but to no avail.

The cemetery, which contains over 10000 tombs, is still in use.

CLOSURE FORCES BUS COMPANY OWNERS TO RELEASE EMPLOYEES

Bus company owners in the West Bank issued a statement to protest Israel's closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

They said that the closure has brought over 175 buses to a halt. The buses serve over half a million people, in addition to the transport service which ferries day laborers to and from areas beyond the "green line".

The statement said that the closure was affecting the companies financially. Over 1000 workers have had to be laid off. Soon, the companies will no longer be in a position to honor their debts.

The companies are asking the authorities either to allow them to resume their work, or be compensated.

ARMENIANS REMEMBER MASSACRE

The Armenian community this weekend remembers a million and a half of its people massacred 78 years ago in the final days of the Ottoman Empire.

A memorial will be held April 24 in the presence of Patriarch Turkum Manugian at the St. Jacob Cathedral in the Armenian Quarter of Jerusalem.

The mourners will then proceed to the Armenian cemetery outside the Old city walls to commemorate the tragic event at the specially erected memorial.

A statement published by the United Armenian Committee says Armenians the world over continue to ask Turkey to admit to committing the massacres. The committee called upon all peace-loving peoples to support the Armenian people in their legitimate claim.

ENVIRONMENT AWARENESS CAMPAIGN BEGINS

The Land Society for Environmental Awareness met on April 22, Earth Day, to inaugurate its latest campaign in the occupied territories. The campaign is aimed at sharpening perceptions of nature among Palestinians.

Last year, the society encouraged farmers to plant over 6926 trees throughout the territories. This was followed by workshops for children, and efforts at introducing into the environment flora and fauna.

The motto of the campaign reads: "Let's work together on behalf of the environment." [*]

46028. -------. Press Release: Demit Demir's Speech. Lambda Istanbul (P.K 103, Gotepe, Istanbul TURKEY), 1996. [Demit Demir, who won the IGLHRC award this year, is the leading personality among the In 1991 I was arrested. The reason was that they claimed I violated in my country.

It was not enough for me and I became a member of Human Rights Organisation. At first I was found odd because I was a transvestite. They were all leftists and so was I. But they were not used to homosexuals yet. I also struggled here to make people accept me. I worked to establish sexual minorities commission in HRO. HRO dealed with every kind of pressure applied on homosexuals and we gave press declarations at HRO. They also provided the lawyers for cases about homosexuals and they looked for the ones who were arrested. Because in Turkey many people get lost after they are arrested by the police. In HRO I also became the first transvestite delegate.

In 1991 I was arrested. The reason was that they claimed I insulted Ataturk. But it was not true. I was tortured by the police and they did not want me to tell it to anyone. With the order of Suleyman Ulusoy I was put into prison for two months. Human Rights Organisation took care of me. They found me a lawyer and visited me very often. Then I was released and acquitted at the court.

My relations with my socialist friends got better and their pre-80s moral views seemed to change. Radical Democratic Green Party spokesman Ibrahim Eren and I had different views and there were some separations from the movement. We have also been working for two years with Human Resources Development Foundation on ways of avoiding sexual diseases for transvestites and transsexuals.

In Ulker Sokak, where I live, police pressure has been going on for Yes, it was hard to survive in a Moslem country and patriarchal, feudal society. I thought a lot about what I was guilty for but could not find an answer. It was impossible to match my life with religion because Islam rejects all gays, lesbians and transgendersed people. Islam, with all institutions is one of the most important factors that darkens life for homosexuals.

I asked myself how I could overcome all these difficulties. I had to be a well-cultured person and next step would be to put pressure on people to learn about sexual culture. Because in Turkey the problem is not only with homosexuality, the problem is the whole sexuality! First I had to deal with my family. They knew I was a girl and did not say anything when they saw me playing with girls all the time. But they could not accept that I was a homosexual. And even when I was still male I was sexually harassed by so-called "heterosexual" men around who wanted to sleep with me. It was my sexuality which was always emphasized about me. So I had to change many jobs.

During school years I was politically active. Again my sexual and political identities clashed. Turkish socialists before 80's could not accept homosexuality. I was arrested on 5/1/1980 at the demonstration for Labour Day. Then came the coup d'etat on the 9/12/1980. All non-heterosexual people were put on pressure. They banned all the gays and transgendered people who worked as singers. There was also big punishment for prostitution. There was no right to live.

Homosexuals who were caught by the army forces were sent to smaller towns in buses. Many of us were kept and tortured at police stations and we were sent to sexual disease hospitals. We were kept prisoners for more than 10 days.

My penalty was determined and I was put into prison in 1982. I stayed in prison for eight months. In prison I was excluded by my leftist friends because I was a faggot and I had no right to live. When I got out of prison it was a new beginning in my life. It was 1984 and I had always been a prisoner because I always had to hide myself to let other people be happy. I could not stand it anymore and at last I made my sexual revolution. First I came out to my family and started to act more feminine. It was not important for me if the society thought I was strange. I had to live for myself, not for others. I had many missions to do and I had enough political background and culture.

Homosexual movement started in 1987 in Turkey. The movement was started by transvestites and transsexuals. Homosexual group of Radical Democratic Green Party went on hunger strike and the next action was sitting at Taksim Park. Then I was not involved in the movement yet. I had some contacts in 1988 and devoted myself to the struggle for sexual rights.

In the Radical Democratic Green Party I learned about feminism, environmentalism, militarism, homosexual rights, animal rights and raised my consciousness. Every minority group rights were violated in my country.

It was not enough for me and I became a member of Human Rights Organisation. At first I was found odd because I was a transvestite. They were all leftists and so was I. But they were not used to homosexuals yet. I also struggled here to make people accept me. I worked to establish sexual minorities commission in HRO. HRO dealt with every kind of pressure applied on homosexuals and we gave press declarations at HRO. They also provided the lawyers for cases about homosexuals and they looked for the ones who were arrested. Because in Turkey many people get lost after they are arrested by the police. In HRO I also became the first transvestite delegate.
a year. There were 70 of us on our street last year but now we are only 7. Our doors were broken, one of our friends' house was burnt down by the police. These were caused by a lady called Gunogor Gider. She used to get along very well with us and most of us were living in her houses and paying her rent. But she demanded much more money than the houses cost and we objected. Since then in cooperation with the police, she provoked all the inhabitants of the street. Most of our friends had to leave their houses.

The only way the transgender can earn their living in Turkey is prostitution. And they are trying every way to prevent us from prostitution. But how are we going to survive? There is no right to live if you are different!

But we are not daunted by all these things and we are still actively working in many different areas. The only political party which talks about the rights of homosexuals in Turkey is Freedom and Solidarity Party. I work with this party and the party has made a declaration on Ulker Street with other organisations like HRO and Lambda Istanbul.

We have an art group in which there are transgendered and the students of art. We have opened an workshop and we are producing artistic pieces. We have a magazine called "Gaci" which means "woman" in transvestite slang. It is prepared by sex workers, transvestites and transsexuals. I write articles and poems for this magazine. We are trying to create our own business because this is the only chance. If not, we are condemned to prostitution.

I am also working with the queer group Lambda Istanbul which has nominated me for this award. Lambda Istanbul was founded in 1993 and it is the most actively working group in Turkey. It has around 60 members. Lambda Istanbul has a bi-monthly photocopy magazine and the only regular gay-lesbian radio show of Turkey. Although they have a severe financial problem, they keep on working.

In Turkey, so far many homosexuals were killed and police could not find their murderers. Police does not care to look for the murderers because they think homosexuals are not worth it. We have a lot of problems in Turkey and we want to live the way the heterosexuals do. I will keep on struggling for every right. Yesterday I started as a child and I am going on as a mother today. And tomorrow I will go on as a grandmother. I do not care if they kill me or put me in prison again. [=]

46032. Abadan-Unat, Nermin; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 10: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 177-194. The reforms of Ataturk for women were based on law and education and served a predominantly urban female elite; the majority of Turkish women still endorse traditional values and mores. On 2/3/1923, Kemal Ataturk proclaimed: "Turkish women shall be free, enjoy education and occupy a position equal to that of men, as they are entitled to it." As part of Ataturk's sweeping program of secularization, he sought to emancipate women in order to build a more egalitarian and modern family life. However, Ataturk's reforms were those articulated by a very small elite; while a Turkish Womens League would call for women's political rights in 1928, it would be a decree of Ataturk that would grant women political rights on12/5/1934. The success of Ataturk's reforms are due to: (1) the absence of colonial rule; (2) the long past of modernization in the Ottoman Empire; (3) the issue of women in public discourse; (4) women's contribution to the debate (in journalism and as participants in forming urban public opinion); (5) the collapse of the empire discredited the sultan-caliph model of governance; and (6) Ataturk's personality (his charisma as military leader was reinforced by his enlightened leadership of the people toward modernization).

However, the program of women's rights has not been fully achieved in Turkey. Women are still disadvantaged, especially in rural areas. In 1984, the literacy rate was 86.5% for men and 62.5% for women. The rural-urban gradient in educational achievement among women has also created a two tier labor market among women: 92% of uneducated women work in agriculture, compared to 5% of women with secondary or more education. However, in professions, women have time, women have more opportunities that women from comparable Western countries (partly a product of the brain-drain), a pattern seen not only in Turkey but in other developing countries including Mexico, Argentina, Costa Rica and India. In recent years, the most militant women’s organizations have been Islamic: female students who have organized sit-ins, hunger strikes and boycotts of examinations have been Islamic conservatives. The National Salvation Party (now dissolved) and the Welfare Party have create a new Islamic female elite in their attempt to legitimize traditional sex roles.

46033. Abadan-Unat, Nermin; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 10a: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women: Table 1: Percentage of Women Students in Turkish Universities, 1927-1983. New Haven,

46034. Abadan-Unat, Nermin; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 10b: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women: Table 2: Percentage of Female Turkish Civil Servants, 1938-1982. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University

Figure 46033. Percentage of Women Students in Turkish Universities, 1927-1983.

1927-1928: 11.2%.
1937-1938: 16.6%.
1947-1948: 18.4%.
1957-1958: 15.8%.

Figure 46034. Percentage of Female Turkish Civil servants, 1938-1982.
Abadan-Unat, Nermin; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 10c: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women: Table 3: Percentage of Turkish Female Faculty Staff, 1932-1982. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. p. 186.

46035. Abadan-Unat, Nermin; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 10c: Modern Turkey and Iran: The Impact of Legal and Educational Reforms on Turkish Women: Table 3: Percentage of Turkish Female Faculty Staff, 1932-1982. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. p. 186.

46036. Abboud, Mounir B.; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "What Price Virginity?: Turkey". in Connexions. Sexuality in Mind and Body. As a signatory to the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, Turkey grants women reproductive rights. Women can obtain divorce on the same grounds as men in this secular state, where Islam is the religion of 98% of the population.

However, this big "but" emerges when it comes to sexual freedom.

For Turkish men, virginity in a woman is still at a premium, and an intact hymen "the most valuable piece of a girl's trousseau."

Although some urban families send the young couple away on a honeymoon after the wedding, most brides find themselves on their wedding night with others, in-laws and other relatives, waiting to inspect the bloodied bedsheets as proof of virginity.

A new book by Haydat Dumen, a psychiatrist, looks at sexual life in Turkish society. Currently the most extensive study on the subject, the book, which is entitled Our Sexual Problems, includes interviews by Dr. Dumen with 3600 of his own patients. He recounts cases in which indignant kin drag the bride to a doctor's office the morning after the wedding, because there was no bleeding to support the girl's tearful claim that she is "pure." What the doctors have often found is that the hymen is too elastic or too far up in the vagina to get broken.

For the groom, says Dr. Dumen, the wedding night is the supreme test of his virility. Most husbands refuse surgical intervention, get more nervous with each failure, and some end up rendering themselves impotent.

He cites one case of how one couple, acutely aware of people on the watch nearby, failed to consummate the marriage for all of three months.

A good number of Dr. Dumen's patients were "seduced and abandoned" young women contemplating suicide. There are those who ask if constipation, falling off bicycles or vigorous sports activity will deflower them.

For those who are believed to have breached the cardinal rule of purity as evidenced by the unbroken hymen, the penalty can be "inhuman," according to Dr. Dumen. In a majority of cases, the bride is sent back to her parents' home, where she will "carry her shame to her grave," getting rough treatment by her unforgiving family. If her secret gets out, she will find it impossible to marry again.

Dr. Dumen says the rule is observed to such extremes that prospective brides who have any doubts at all about their hymen being intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn.

For the groom, says Dr. Dumen, the wedding night is the supreme test of his virility. Most husbands refuse surgical intervention, get more nervous with each failure, and some end up rendering themselves impotent.

He cites one case of how one couple, acutely aware of people on the watch nearby, failed to consummate the marriage for all of three months.

A good number of Dr. Dumen's patients were "seduced and abandoned" young women contemplating suicide. There are those who ask if constipation, falling off bicycles or vigorous sports activity will deflower them.

For those who are believed to have breached the cardinal rule of purity as evidenced by the unbroken hymen, the penalty can be "inhuman," according to Dr. Dumen. In a majority of cases, the bride is sent back to her parents' home, where she will "carry her shame to her grave," getting rough treatment by her unforgiving family. If her secret gets out, she will find it impossible to marry again.

Dr. Dumen says the rule is observed to such extremes that prospective brides who have any doubts at all about their hymen being intact are willing to resort to deceit. They try to have the hymen sewn in the back, plan their wedding night to fall on the menstruation date, or try such ruses as placing a blood-soaked sponge in the vagina. Despite the severity of the punishment to which "incontinent" women are subjected—often no less than their virtual ruin—the men who seduced them out of wedlock are usually unconcerned and shrug off any responsibility for the act.

In fact, Turkish society even makes fun of that for which it should be ashamed. Insensitive jokes abound, exemplified by the following story as related by Dr. Dumen.

The tale goes: Fatima is not a virgin. Soon to be married, she goes to a wise old woman for help. She is advised to procure a bottle of red ink and to insist on having no lights when she is left alone with her husband. The ink is to pass for blood.

All goes well on the wedding night except that Fatima's younger sister has mistakenly substituted a bottle of green ink for the red, which she had taken to school. When the groom sees the unexpected colour, he puzzles for a moment while she holds her breath.

Then he proudly says: "Such virility! Not only did I rupture her hymen but her gall bladder as well."

Doctors complain that the attitude toward the hymen sometimes makes medical treatment of young girls impossible.

Dr. Cafer Yildiran, a urologist in an Istanbul hospital, tells of a peasant girl who came in complaining of severe cramps. Her hymen was discovered to be completely blocked, stopping her menstrual flow.

The doctors wanted to operate on the girl to open her slightly. But... the father refused. "Let her die a virgin if she must die," he said.

The importance of a man's honour as represented by his having exclusive claim to his wife's favours is seen in the fact that at least 12% of all murders in Turkey's cities are caused by sexual jealousy. A "cuckolded" husband is also called upon to kill for his honour. One police officer killed his brother and wife when he found them in bed together. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

46037. Alemdar, Zeynep. "Turk Voters Face a Choice of Paths; Secular Europe of Islamic Principles? Aggressive Social Welfare Programs Run By Islamic Fundamentalists Have Given Them an Edge in This Weekend's Elections in Turkey," in Seattle Times, December 29, 1995, p. A17. True Path Party's Tansu Ciller seeks a Turkey tied to Europe, with the current 90% inflation dropped to single digits within four years, and a lowering of the 20% unemployment level. The most powerful opposition party, the Welfare Party, led by Necmettin Erbakan, advocates Islamic economic principles, including the abolition of interest. The Welfare Party is supplementing its message with aggressive programs to give basic food commodities to the poor, as well as coal for home heating. The Welfare Party now controls local governments in 400 municipalities, including Istanbul and Ankara. Estimates of the election results give Welfare 21-26% of the vote, True Path 14-19.5%, Motherland Party 19.5-22%. The recent split between True Path and Motherland has left many pro-secular voters unsure who to vote for to vote against Welfare. [TXT]

46038. American-Jewish Committee; Anglo-Jewish Association; Landslut, S. Jewish Communities in the Muslim Countries of the Middle East: Chapter 9: Turkey: Jewish Influence at the Sultan's Court. A Survey Prepared for the American-Jewish Committee and Anglo-Jewish Association. London: Jewish Chronicle Ltd., April 1950, pp. 79-80. Such was the influence of prominent Jews, both at court and in the Sultan's administration, that foreign ambassadors and diplomats took special care to establish the best of personal relations with them. Jewish influence in the Empire reached its peak in the 16th century under the Sultans Suleyman (1520-1566) and Selim II (1566-1574).

The nephew of the widow of a wealthy Portuguese banker, Mendes, a certain Juan Miguez (who later became better known under the name of Joseph Nasi), was able, for instance, to induce the Sultan Suleyman to make a successful protest to the Venetians against their refusal to let the widow take her fortune with her from Venice to Constantinople. It is interesting to recall that it was the same Joseph Nasi who later became Governor of the Tiberias area in the Holy Land and was given the privilege of settling Jews there. Unfortunately, plans for large scale settlements had to be abandoned because of the hostile attitude of the local Arabs. In compensation, Sultan Selim gave Nasi the island of Naxos and all the Cyclades as his possessions, together with the title of Duke, Dux Aegei Pelagi.

In the court intrigues of the Seraglio the Jews played their part in full. But if they intrigued, it was by no means in each others' favor. For example, the friendship of Sultan Selim for Joseph Nasi evoked the emanation from the Greek minority in Smyrna, Rhodes, and other places with the current 90% inflation dropped to single digits within four years, and a lowering of the 20% unemployment level. The most powerful opposition party, the Welfare Party, led by Necmettin Erbakan, advocates Islamic economic principles, including the abolition of interest. The Welfare Party is supplementing its message with aggressive programs to give basic food commodities to the poor, as well as coal for home heating. The Welfare Party now controls local governments in 400 municipalities, including Istanbul and Ankara. Estimates of the election results give Welfare 21-26% of the vote, True Path 14-19.5%, Motherland Party 19.5-22%. The recent split between True Path and Motherland has left many pro-secular voters unsure who to vote for to vote against Welfare. [TXT]

46039. American-Jewish Committee; Anglo-Jewish Association; Landslut, S. Jewish Communities in the Muslim Countries of the Middle East: Chapter 9: Turkey: Provocative Display: Part 01. A Survey Prepared for the American-Jewish Committee and Anglo-Jewish Association. London: Jewish Chronicle Ltd., April 1950, pp. 80-83. All in all, the behavior of some of these wealthy Jews was provocative. Their splendid palaces, their retainers, and particularly the richness of dress and jewelry of their women folk in public, aroused ill feeling among the Muslim population. All too easily were the latter reminded of the fact that these Jews were, after all, still nonbelievers whom tradition allowed to live among the true believers, but humbly and under certain conditions. When Sultan Murad's personal attention was called to these facts, he abruptly decided on draconic measures of retribution against the Jews. The project was only abandoned after Solomon Ashkenazi, with the help of the Grand Vizier, had exercised all his arts of persuasion and had liberally bribed both the Sultan's mother and the head of the Janissaries. Thereupon, the rabbis hastened to issue an order forbidding Jewish women to wear jewelry or costly clothes in public places. It is no wonder that the privileged social position of the Jews, which was so closely bound up with the whole political system of corruption and favoritism, could not last. Since the political influence of the Jews depended on the ebb and flow of personal intrigue, it quickly suffered from a change of fortune at court. In due course, it declined. But although the Jews lost their conspicuous social and political power, they still flourished in commerce, and, apart from the burden of specialtaxation which they shared with the other non-believers, they continued to live and work, on the whole, unmolested.

The episode of the false Messiah, Shabbatai Zevi, is characteristic of the broadmindedness of the Turkish authorities in general and of Sultan Muhammad 4 in particular; and it is also typical of their mature political shrewdness. Although Shabbatai Zevi had openly proclaimed that he would dethrone the Sultan and reconquer the Holy Land for the Jews, and although the uparo among the Jewish masses had already reached disturbing proportions, he was left unmolested.

When he came to Constantinople at the head of a large crowd of adherents, he was merely confined to a fortress opposite Gallipoli where he was allowed to receive visitors. And even when eventually he was denounced to the Sultan as a dangerous usurper and impostor, the Sultan, in order to render him harmless, tried the simple ruse of getting him converted to Islam, and it succeeded (1666).

Like the Greeks and the Armenians, the Jews have constituted particularly in Constantinople (Istanbul), a most lively and active element in the court intrigues has always seemed to have a special attraction for women; and the Sultan's Harim was no exception. Jewesses in the Harim, enjoying greater freedom of movement than Muslim women, were particularly useful as go-betweens.

They earned for themselves something of a reputation, sometimes of a rather doubtful character. The most famous of these Jewesses was a widow, Esther Kiera, who was on terms of great intimacy with the favorite wife of Sultan Murad 3 (1574-1595). Turkish officials, as well as foreign emissaries, offered her enormous sums of money in order to win her support. However, she was destined to share the usual fate of so many who were caught in the spider's web of the Seraglio. For when she used her influence to support one of the candidates for the office of Commander of the Cavalry, a rival candidate instigated the Sultan's bodyguard to assassinate her and, at the same time, to avoid any risk of vendetta, her three sons. [=]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Turkey
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
==================================================================
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

through by the revolution of 1908. In the National Assembly there were a number of Jews (as deputies of the Jewish communities of Smyrna, Constantinople, and Salonika).

But when the Turkish nationalists went so far as to adopt the Western idea of nation in its entirety, and to consider the Turkish element as the real representatives of the nation, they alienated the small number of Arabs who had formed the Arab-Ottoman Brotherhood in Constantinople and with the aim of letting the Arab provinces benefit by the enactment of a liberal constitution.

When the Young Turk movement prepared for the overthrow of the Abd al-Hamid regime in Salonika, it found active support among the Jews and Donme (converted Jews). After WWI, the question of special guarantees for the protection of the non-Muslim minorities was raised by the Allies in the course of the negotiations adding up to the signature of the Treaty of Lausanne between them and the Government of Mustafa Pasha Kemal. The Jewish community, however, in a letter addressed to the Turkish Government, gave up all claim to special treatment.

The new Turkish Constitution abolished the Millet system of partial communal autonomy. Matters of personal status, such as marriage, now came under the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil authorities. At the same time, the community lost its former right to levy its own taxes and, consequently, its various communal institutions became dependent entirely on voluntary contributions.

It should be stressed that these measures were not directed against the Jewish minority, but were part of the general secularization of the Turkish State. They affected all minorities and, likewise, the religious situations of the Muslims themselves.

The tendency towards a breaking up of any sense of unity among the component parts of the Ottoman Empire became sharper during WWI. It received a death blow when, not long after the end of the war, Mustafa Pasha Kemal decreed the disestablishment of Islam in the New Turkey.

Once this had happened the effects of political fragmentation were made even stronger. Each of the new Arab States sought its own level in the post-war world, while Turkey evolved a policy based on the national interests of a secular State. How far this was to take her from the Arab States is shown by the absence of any feeling of solidarity with them during the most critical period of tension over Palestine, and the fact that in due course the Turkish Government went so far as to recognize Israel.

Recently, a movement in favor of the revival of Islam has gathered some strength in Turkey. But since the days of Ataturk, the Government’s greater European orientation, its policy of abandoning any claim to the territories of the old Ottoman Empire, its abolition of the Caliphate, and the secularization of the State through the disestablishment of Islam, have all contributed to a great weakening of former cultural and political links with the Arab countries.

When the evidence is examined, it is clear that, contrary to reports published in various newspapers (including some in Israel), the Turkish Government did not take any discriminatory measures against its Jewish minority during the invasion of Israel by the Arab States; and it cannot be fairly said that the obstacles which the Turkish Government put in the way of young Jews of military age wishing to join the Israel forces constituted discrimination against the community.

Apart from this temporary restriction, the Turkish Government has certainly put no obstacles in the way of those wishing to emigrate to Israel. Such emigration, in fact, has assumed proportions so great as to reduce the number of Jews in Turkey by between 25% and 30%. Although there had already been a certain amount of Jewish emigration during the last 20 years, mostly to South America and the US, its scale was not considerable. Since the proclamation of the Jewish State, on the other hand, the stream of emigrants to Israel has grown to a flood, the fighting brought about, was encouraged to hope that this new development was the first step on a path which would finally halt torture, killings and other abuses. However, at the very time that the government was expected to enact a number of confidence building measures, including lifting the state of emergency currently in force in southeast Turkey, this optimism was thrown into doubt by the killing of 33 prisoners by the PKK in Bingöl on 24 May - an act condemned by Amnesty International. Subsequent intense military activity resulted in the PKK's announcement on 8 June that their unilateral ceasefire was at an end. Although Amnestys International believes that the PKK and the Turkish government are reluctant to accept the return to persistent and widespread human rights abuses which renewal of the conflict would inevitably bring, we fear that both sides are being drawn unwillingly by the course of events back into a human rights crisis. These tragic consequences can only be avoided if both sides pull back from the brink and take steps to ensure the protection of human rights and basic humanitarian standards. It is for this reason that Amnesty International is appealing today to the Turkish Government, and to the leadership of the PKK, asking that every effort be made now to prevent further pain, injury and loss of life which will certainly be paid by civilians as the price of such a conflict. In making this appeal we ask that both sides remember the hundreds of women, children, civilians and prisoners who have already died at the hands of both sides in the conflict since 1984. [s]

46041. Amnesty International. Press Release: Turkey: Human Rights Situation Deteriorates. London: Amnesty International, N.D. [1993] The Turkish government has completely failed to live up to its widely-publicized commitment to improve Turkeys human rights record. In fact, the human rights situation in the country appears to be deteriorating rapidly, with continued widespread reports of torture and an unprecedented volume of allegations of extrajudicial executions. In an election speech in 10/1991, Suleyman Demirel, now Prime Minister, confirmed that torture in police custody was a serious problem and promised that under his administration "the walls of all police stations will be made of glass." But by 9/1992 his government had taken no steps to safeguard detainees in police custody. An unsatisfactory package of draft legislation, which still failed to meet international standards, was announced in 4/1992 as a solution to the problem of torture, but on Aug. 26 this was withdrawn. Meanwhile, almost anyone arrested continues to be at risk of torture or ill-treatment. There were at least nine deaths in custody during the first eight months of 1992. Moreover, reports of extrajudicial executions have increased dramatically. In 1991 more than 50 people, mainly villagers, were taken from their homes and shot, apparently by members of the regular security forces. Since 11/1991 the killings have continued but the methods have changed. More than a hundred Kurdish men, among them journalists and local politicians, have been shot to death in Southeast Turkey by unknown gunmen. Many of the victims had previously been detained, tortured or threatened by the police, and there is growing evidence to suggest that the security forces are protecting or inciting the assassins. In spite of AI's repeated appeals for the establishment of commissions of inquiry, as laid down in the United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, the government has failed to establish such commissions or any form of public inquiry. Amnesty International also repeatedly expressed concern to the Turkish government about a succession of incidents in southeast Turkey in which civilians, including women, young children and elderly people, have been killed, apparently by security forces firing indiscriminately during demonstrations, or in retaliation for attacks by the Kurdish Workers' Party (PKK). More than 120 civilians have died during such incidents, most recently in Sirnak, where at least 15 civilians, including five children, were killed in August, allegedly by security forces who fired on civilian districts with tanks and small arms after a PKK attack in which at least one of the security forces was killed. Amnesty International has recommended that the incident be the subject of an independent inquiry and that the findings be made public. [s]

46042. Bohlen, Celestine. "Islamic Party in Turkey Warns Rivals Not To Bar It", in New York Times, June 9, 1996. p. A6. Erbakan, head of the Welfare Party, warned the Turkish political establishment that any "artificial" coalition set up simply to bar him from power would be doomed to failure. He noted that such fruitless efforts were making it more clear that the Welfare Party should form the new government. The continuing feud between PM Mesut Yilmaz and his former coalition partner Tansu Ciller strengthens Erbakan's argument.

46043. Bohlen, Celestine. "Rebound By Premier In Turkey: At Stake For Tansu Ciller is a Link to Europe", in New York Times, October 19, 1995. p. A5. Three days after Ciller failed to win approval for her minority government, she is now charged with forming a new coalition government. This startling turnaround could propitiate her strongly for the parliamentary elections to be held before next summer. Her tenure in office was clouded by poor economic conditions and a series of crippling strikes. Most serious for Ciller has been the erosion of support for her within her own party, even losing the support of Suleyman Demerli, her one-time mentor.

46044. Bowcott, Owen. "Kurdish Separatists' Bomb Victim Dies", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 3, 1994. p. 10. Joanna Griffiths, one of eight Britons wounded in a Kurdish attack on tourists in Turkey, died in Manchester without regaining consciousness. She had undergone brain surgery in a Turkish hospital. More than 200000 British tourists are expected to travel to Turkey this year: tour operators are giving clients to option to switch to other destinations.

46045. Cernaigh, Ciaran O. "Big Paris Festival Hears Sinn Fein", in An Phoblacht/Republican News. October 19, 1995. THE TORRENTS OF RAIN and slushy mud that one wouldn't normally associate with Paris in early autumn, didn't deter the hundreds of thousands of visitors who attended this year's Fete de l'Humanite, the annual French Communist Party festival in the French capital. And among that throng of humanity during the weekend of 9/15-17/1995 was a three-person delegation from Sinn Fein.

The party's renewed participation in the Fete, after an absence of a number of years, was an occasion to inform the visiting public, the French left and international delegates about the threat posed to the peace process by the British government.

Officials from the Spanish People's Communist party (PCPE), Herri Batasuna, Turkish Worker's Party and German Communist party (PDF) met the Sinn Fein representatives, while discussions with PLO delegates found them understandably preoccupied with their own domestic political situation and their expressions of confidence in that process were less than categorical.

Sinn Fein's presence also received attention in the French daily newspaper, Liberation, while the delegation members gave interviews to Humanite, the mainstream newspaper of the French Communist party, and to the Australian weekly, Green Left.

Sinn Fein's political profile was, ironically, thrown into relief by the attendance of Democratic Left. Given that party's cameo role in the Dublin government it might have been reasonable to expect them to display political literature at such a political event. Not so! Indeed from the dearth of literature available you could be forgiven for not knowing of the impending divorce referendum in the 26 Counties, let alone the Irish peace process. However, there was an element of politics which one could not fail to notice: amidst the wallpapering of Irish Ferry travel posters and Shamrock pub signs the absence, even, of the Irish national flag was paralleled by the presence of the notice "Learn the best English in Ireland".

Repeatedly, visitors to Sinn Fein's stall remarked that it was the "most political stand" in the International section.

KEBABS & RUM: Of course for many visitors politics came second to the muddy scramble for Cuba Libre, Martinique rum or Lebanese kebabs. However, the overall feeling of the 60 hour extravaganza was the expression of left wing ideas and the exchange of experiences between delegations. Every credit is due to the lively and well-organized Solidarite Irlande committee in France for enabling Sinn Fein and the socialist republican struggle in Ireland to be highlighted in such an important international arena.

The atmosphere at the Fete was lively, positive and progressive and can only have pleased the party good. However, for this it corresponded the one blemish on the weekend was the intervention of the Communist Party of Spain which prevented the Herri Batasuna representatives from having an official stand.

As they returned to Ireland through Heathrow airport, the three members of the Sinn Fein delegation were detained by British Special Branch officers. The trio was held for around an hour during which time they were questioned about the prisoners' campaign group Saoirse and the state of the Irish peace process.

Maskey trip to Italy a major success: "IN MY OPINION this was the most successful trip to Italy yet by a Sinn Fein representative, it was spectacular," enthused Alex Maskey as he spoke to AP/RN about his recent 12-day trip to Rome.

In a series of high-powered political meetings from 9/15-27/1995 the Belfast councillor met with Signore Amari the vice-General Director for Political Affairs of the Italian government and head of the Italian Desk. According to Maskey the meeting with the Foreign Ministry representative was friendly and positive; "Amari reaffirmed a standing invitation for Martin McGuinness to visit Italy".

Maskey also had meetings with influential members of the PDS opposition party and leading trade unionists and he gave numerous radio and newspaper interviews.

"The session with Gianni Mattioli (a Green Party MP) and Carmelo Incorvaia, senior figures in the Foreign Affairs Parliamentary Committee, was very productive."

"On Tuesday 9/26/1995, I met Piero Fassino MP the PDS International Secretary who was very positive and suggested that PDS, the biggest party in Italy, and Sinn Fein build links."

Maskey told AP/RN that until recently PDS was "lukewarm on the Irish situation and their interest now is a sign of a real breakthrough for our party". Fassino also expressed the wish for a PDS delegation to visit Ireland this year.

Mattioli and Incorvaia suggested activity within the Italian parliament and mooted the idea of a motion to parliament to debate the Irish peace process.

After his meeting with the trade unionists' delegation Maskey was the guest of honour at a concert in the Social Centre Villagio Globale where he gave a short speech to an audience of 8000. [Text]

46047. Couturier, Kelly. "Turkey Protests Drug-Deal Allegations", in Seattle Times, January 23, 1997. p. A9. The Turkish government has protested the accusation of two German judges that high Turkish officials, including Deputy PM Tansu Ciller protected heroin traffickers. A judge in Frankfurt convicted three Kurdish drug smugglers and concluded that there was evidence of Turkish government collusion. In addition to Kurdish organized crime, the Kurdish Workers Party (PKK) is reported by the Turkish government to be involved in the drug trade. Western officials note that Turkey has stepped up its struggle against the drug trade, but suggest that such efforts have led to some officials being corrupted by the drug syndicates. [Text]

46048. Cowell, Alan. "Istanbul Journal: Career Women Finding Elbowroom in Turkey", in New York Times, March 2, 1994. p. A7. Istanbul, Turkey: Supposedly Turkish women have had equal rights since 1923 under the new republic founded by Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, and in June 1993 Tanso Ciller became Turkey's first woman prime minister. During the 1980s Turkey experienced an economic boom as a result of privatization, and tens of thousands migrated from rural areas to the big cities. Since then Turkish women have undergone a form of economic liberation as more and more urban women have careers and are represented within the media as breaking out of the shell of traditional roles. An Americanized magazine, the Turkish Cosmopolitan, regularly reports on women as having sexual exploits and being promiscuous. Leyla Alton, a public relations businesswoman, says that Turkish urbanized women are becoming as sophisticated as other European women.

Professor of Womens Affairs at Istanbul University, Necia-Arat, says that women's changing roles are happening for only a small elite group, while women in rural areas are still lacking education and suffer pressure from Islamic traditionalists from pursuing equal rights. She says that this elite group only represents 1 out of every 100000 women in Turkey, but considers these women as pioneers for the liberation of all Turkish women.

Ankara journalist Nur Batur agrees that there is a giant gap between rural and urbanized women, and that Islamic beliefs brought into the country by the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran, have kept women from emancipation. At this date, a campaign against women's rights is underway by traditional Turkish men and Islamic fundamentalists.

Many Turks do not believe that economic liberation of women represents sexual liberation. Though women have an increasingly higher profile in public relations, computers and magazine publishing, they are hardly represented in technological and engineering fields.

Women's liberation in Turkey appears to be defined by the rising number of urbanized women with careers, and the increasing numbers of divorce, whereas sexual emancipation is still slow to come. According to Arat, the issue of sexual harassment is ignored, feminism is looked upon badly, and the majority of women must still be virgins before they marry. [Text]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Women are improving their situation in Turkish society, including the professions, business, and civil service. Although primary education reached all children in 1993, but far fewer girls than boys continued their education after primary school. In 1999 Parliament passed a law increasing universal mandatory education from 5 to 8 years. The law will be implemented gradually throughout the country. For the 1994 school year, it was put into effect in several pilot regions. A delegation of women representing the Women's Studies Center of Istanbul University and numerous other private organizations presented a petition to Parliament on February 17 calling for legislation to abolish the special position of husbands as head of family. There are some seldom enforced laws that discriminate against women. Spousal abuse is still considered an extremely private matter, although it is a widespread problem, interest in which is growing. Few women go to the police, who in any case are reluctant to intervene in domestic disputes. Turks of either sex may file civil or criminal charges but rarely do. Turkish law and courts make no discrimination between the sexes in laws concerning violence or abuse. In 7/1992, the Purple Roof Foundation (for battered women) opened a "hello shelter" telephone line- it attracted 3300 callers in its first 3 months, even under Transportation Ministry regulations restricting its operating hours to weekdays. The Purple Roof Foundation has since expanded its service to two lines, one of which focuses on helping battered women, and the other of which deals with a variety of other subjects. The Government also has opened shelters in major cities for abused women and their children who have left their homes. Independent women's and women's rights associations exist, but the concept of lobbying for women's rights has not gained reat currency. [-]

46050. DS. "Europe and Canada: Turkey: Part 17: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination: Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government is committed to furthering children's welfare and is working to expand opportunities in education and health, including further reduction of the infant mortality rate. Turkey's children have suffered greatly from the cycle of violence in southeastern Anatolia. School closings and the decision by many families to move westward, be it for economic reasons or to escape the violence, have uprooted children to cities which are hard pressed to find the resources to extend basic, mandatory services, such as schooling. The Government is exploring the possibility of establishing regional boarding schools to help combat this problem. Although primary schooling is mandatory, many young children, ages 3-12, can be seen on the streets hawking goods or shining shoes. [-]

46051. DS. "Europe and Canada: Turkey: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Turkey's accession to the ILO's international program on the elimination of child labor (IPEC). In 1992, with technical assistance from the ILO, the Government established a child labor unit within the Ministry of Labor tasked with training labor inspectors for better enforcement of child labor laws. According to the Constitution's ban on torture, Turkey's accession to the UN and European Conventions Against Torture, and public pledges of successive governments to end torture, the practice continued. Human rights attorneys and physicians who treat victims of torture state that most persons charged with, or suspected of, political crimes usually suffer some torture during periods of incommunicado detention in police station and Jandarma headquarters before they are brought before a court. The HRF and private attorneys reported that there was no indication of either the amelioration of treatment of those charged under the Anti-Terror Law or an overall decrease in the incidence of torture in 1994. In 1994 women again charged sexual abuses while under official detention by security officials. Although the implementation of the CMUK on 12/1/1992, facilitated more immediate attorney access to those arrested for common crimes, its provisions of immediate attorney access do not apply to those detained in the state of emergency region nor to those detained under the Anti-Terror Law. Some attorneys in the southeast reported that some common criminals are booked on political charges thereby depriving them of access to or by an attorney. The CMUK’s allowable, maximum prearraignment detention periods still exceed Council of Europe maximums. Human rights observers report that the system whereby the arresting police officer is also responsible for interrogating the suspect is conducive to torture because the officer seeks to obtain a confession that would justify the arrest. According to those familiar with Turkish police operations, in petty criminal cases, the arresting officer is responsible for following up on the case, whereas in major cases such as murder and political or terrorism-related crimes, "desks" responsible for the area in question are responsible for the interrogation. Commonly employed methods of torture reported by the Human Rights Foundation's Torture Treatment Centers include: high-pressure cold water hoses, electric shocks, beating on the soles of the feet, beating of the genitalia, hanging by the arms, blindfolding, sleep deprivation, deprivation of clothing, systematic beatings and vaginal and anal rape with truncheon and, in some instances, gun barrels.

In southern Turkey, a security official boasted of having deprived a suspect of sleep for 6 days to obtain a confession. In a case in Istanbul in July, Yelda Ozcan, a former representative of the HRF stated to several human rights organizations that a chief commissioner at the security directorate had stripped and beaten her. She obtained a medical report and lodged an official complaint against the commissioner. In another case, in April a 17-year-old female student stated she had been beaten, hosed with pressurized water, and raped with a truncheon by police at Istanbul’s Bahcelievler station then released without charges having been filed. Although the Government asserted that medical examinations occur once during detention and a second time before either arraignment or release, former detainees asserted that some medical examinations took place too long after the event to reveal any definitive findings. According to the HRF, practice varies widely. In some cases medical examinations are conducted; in others, doctors sign papers handed to them; some examinations are cursory, some are done in the presence of police officials, and some doctors are at times under pressure to submit false or misleading medical certificates denying evidence of torture. Credible sources in the human rights and legal communities estimate that judicial authorities investigate only about one-half of the formal complaints involving torture and prosecute only a small fraction of those. Under the Anti-Terror Law, officials accused of torture or other mistreatment may continue to work while under investigation and, if convicted, may only be suspended. Special provincial administrative boards, rather than regular courts, decide whether to prosecute in such cases and suspects’ legal fees are paid by their employing agencies. Under the state of emergency, any lawsuit directed at government authorities must be approved by the regional governor. Because approval is rare this blocks legal pursuit of torture allegations. Under the Administrative Adjudication Law, an administrative investigation into alleged torture cases is conducted under the civil service adjudication law to determine if there is enough evidence to bring a law enforcement officer to trial. Under the CMUK, while prosecutors are empowered to initiate investigations of police officers or Jandarma suspected of torturing or maltreating suspects, in cases where township security directors or Jandarma commander are accused of torture, the prosecutor must obtain permission to initiate an investigation from the Ministry of Justice because these officials are deemed to have a status equal to that of judges. According to the Government, in the first 9 months of 1994 prosecutors considered 963 complaints of torture or maltreatment. Of those, 314 cases were opened, 365 were in preparation, 187 were dropped. In 25 cases the court decided it did not have the authority to pursue the case, and in 47 cases the court referred the case to another court. There were 11 convictions, 22 acquittals; in one case the complaint was withdrawn. Most of these cases were in Istanbul and Ankara; few were in the southeast. In the few instances in which law enforcement officers are convicted of torture, sentences tend to be light. In July Ekrem Guner, a noncommissioned officer, was convicted of torturing two persons in Ordu in 1989, sentenced to 2 years in prison, suspended from duty for 6 months and 16 days, and fined TL375000 (roughly $12). In July the Ankara administrative court ordered the Interior Ministry to pay Medhiya Curbaz TL10 million (roughly $300) in compensation for torture she sustained in 8/1991 by the Adana police. The Adana Provincial administrative commission had refused to try the case. The Police officers involved on charges of rape and torture, despite a medical report which confirmed the charge of rape. The trial of six security officers accused of torturing Baki Erdogan (who died in custody) in Soke district of Aydin province in 8/1993 began in May and was continuing at night, unless the delay will be damaging or the search will result in the prohibition of a house arrest or other mistreatment may continue to work while under investigation or other mistreatment may continue to work while under investigation. In the few instances in which law enforcement officers are convicted of torture, sentences tend to be light. In July Ekrem Guner, a noncommissioned officer, was convicted of torturing two persons in Ordu in 1989, sentenced to 2 years in prison, suspended from duty for 6 months and 16 days, and fined TL375000 (roughly $12). In July the Ankara administrative court ordered the Interior Ministry to pay Medhiya Curbaz TL10 million (roughly $300) in compensation for torture she sustained in 8/1991 by the Adana police. The Adana Provincial administrative commission had refused to try the case. The Police officers involved on charges of rape and torture, despite a medical report which confirmed the charge of rape. The trial of six security officers accused of torturing Baki Erdogan (who died in custody) in Soke district of Aydin province in 8/1993 began in May and was continuing at night, unless the delay will be damaging or the search will result in the prohibition of a house arrest or other mistreatment may continue to work while under investigation.

As Turkey recognizes the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights and the European Commission of Human Rights, Turkish citizens may file applications alleging violations of the European Convention on Human Rights with the Commission. Some 250 cases are currently before the Commission. In February the Government promised the Commission to pay compensation to the villagers of Yesilyurt in Cizre province whom Jandarma troops forced to eat human excrement in 1990. A total of 300000 French francs in compensation is to be paid. In January authorities sent a Prime Ministerial circular to the Ministries of Justice, Interior, and Foreign Affairs, directing that police prepare monthly reports on the incidence of ill-treatment and torture and ensure that medical examinations are carried out carefully to provide accurate forensic evidence. While statistics generally have been submitted as required, there is no evidence that the reporting requirement has had any effect on the incidence of torture. As of September, 4149 applications claiming torture, maltreatment, or arbitrary detention had been filed with the parliamentary Human Rights Commission, since its 9/1991 inception. In each case, the Commission had written to the offices of the public prosecutor, the governor’s office, and the security directorate general, and there is no indication that these communications have had any effect or that the Commission has followed up on these cases. The HRF’s torture rehabilitation centers in Ankara, Izmir, and Istanbul reported that, within the first 6 months of 1994, they had received a total of 196 applications for treatment. Police continue to force women in custody and others to undergo virginity testing even though the state minister in charge women’s affairs condemned the practice in 1992. The tests are imposed particularly on women who file a criminal complaint alleging a sexual crime. Although legally only a court or a prosecutor may order them, police continue to impose the tests on female detainees. Though women may refuse the exams, they are rarely informed of that right. Prison conditions remained another problem area in 1994. As recently as early November, the Justice Ministry announced plans to build new prisons and upgrade old ones to deal with the increase in the number of inmates convicted of terrorist crimes. The refurbished Eskişehir Prison and four others were to reopen by the end of the year. As in 1993, groups of inmates carried out hunger strikes to protest poor conditions and their treatment by prison guards, and one inmate was killed and several injured in an October riot at Diyarbakir Security Prison. The Government promised prison reform in 1993, but at the end of 1994 Parliament had not enacted it. Torture in prisons has decreased in the last few years, but continues to occur. [ ]

46053. DS. “Turkey: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Repet for the Integrity of the Person” by Including Freedom of Religion” and “Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5202(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print, District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution provides for the inviolability of a person’s domicile and the privacy of correspondence and communication. Government officials may enter a private residence or intercept or monitor private correspondence only upon issuance of a judicial warrant. These provisions are generally respected in practice outside the state of emergency region. A judge must decide whether to issue a search warrant for a residence. If delay may cause harm, prosecutors and municipal officers authorized to carry out prosecutors’ instructions may conduct a search. Searches of private premises may not be carried out at night, unless the delay will be damaging or the search will result in the capture of a prisoner at large. Exceptions include persons under special observation by the Security Directorate General, places where the one can enter at night, places where criminals gather, places where materials obtained through the, the omission of Crimes are kept, gambling establishments, and brothels. In the 10 provinces under emergency rule, the Regional Governor can and does empower security authorities to search without a warrant residences or the premises of political parties, businesses, associations, or other organizations. According to the HRF, the practice of security authorities in these provinces to search, hold, or seize without warrant persons, letters, telegrams, and documents is unconstitutional. Roadblocks are commonplace in the southeast, and security officials regularly search vehicles and travelers. Security forces have compelled the evacuation of villages in the southeast to prevent villagers from giving aid and support to the PKK. Security operations have produced great fear of violence in southeastern Turkey, and village and hamlet evictions but claims they occur as the consequence of pressures by and fear of the PKK and because security operations against the PKK in the region make continued occupancy unsafe. [=]

700

46054. DS. "Turkey: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. According to the Constitution, citizens have the right and ability to change their government peacefully. Turkey has a multiparty parliamentary system, in which elections are held at least every 6 years based on the generalized universal suffrage for all citizens aged 21 and over. As of October, at least 25 political parties were operating in Turkey, of which 7 were represented in Parliament. The Grand National Assembly (parliament) elects the President as Head of State every 7 years, or when the President becomes incapacitated or dies. There are no restrictions in law against women or minorities voting or participating in politics, but the Government has made repeated efforts to frustrate political activities of those who emphasize their Kurdish ethnicity. As noted in Section 2.b., the Constitutional Court closed the pro-Kurdish DEP in 1994. It immediately reformed as HADEP. Additionally, the Constitution forbids students, university faculty members, and trade unionists from active participation in party politics. In February the Interior Ministry discharged three democratically elected mayors in the southeast, all from the DEP: Kozluk (Batman province) mayor Abdurrah Kaya; Kurtulan (Siirt province) mayor Cemil Akgul, and Liver (Diyarbakir province) mayor Nazmi Balkas. In September the Istanbul police sentenced Kava and Balkas to 20 months in prison each and fined them TL 210 million ($700 dollars) each for allegedly separatist statements they had given to the newspaper Ozgur Gundem. In the runup to nationwide local elections held on 3/27, there were serious threats to the safety of candidates in the southeast. A number of DEP candidates were threatened and a few killed, and party offices of several political parties were bombed. As of the end of the year, none of the perpetrators had been apprehended. On 2/24, the DEP withdrew from the elections, claiming it was not safe for its candidates. On 3/1, the PKK demanded that people boycott the elections, and threatened to kill both candidates and voters who went to the polls. The elections went forward peacefully throughout the country. Apart from banning the DEP, the Constitutional Court formally closed the small Greens party on the grounds that its executives had not submitted their financial accounts and other necessary documents for the year 1988; and it also closed the Turkish Socialist Labor Party because its platform allegedly aimed at destroying the unity of the country and its people. The Constitution calls for equal political rights for men and women; however, only eight women representing three parties were elected to the Parliament in 1991. In addition to Prime Minister Ciller, there is one female Cabinet Minister. Political parties now recruit female delegates for their party conferences and electoral lists. Women’s committees are active within political party organizations, although formal youth and women’s wings are not permitted under the Constitution. [=]

46056. DS. "Turkey: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State. In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government is committed to furthering children’s welfare and is working to expand opportunities in education and health, including further reduction of infant mortality rate. Children aid and development work have resulted greatly from the country’s attempt to reduce violence in southeastern Turkey. School closings and the migration of many families, forced or voluntary, have uprooted children to cities which are hard pressed to find resources to extend basic, mandatory services, such as schooling. The Government is establishing regional boarding schools in the southeast to help combat this problem but not enough to meet the need. The HRD claims that 78 children were subjected to torture between 1/1989-7/1994.
large percentage of women employed in agriculture and in the trade, restaurant, and hotel sectors work as unpaid family help. The arbitrary barrier to women becoming governors and subgovernors (government-appointed positions) has been breached, and women may now take the examination required to become a subgovernor. Several have been appointed subgovernors, and one governor is a woman. Independent women’s and women’s rights associations exist, but the concept of lobbying for women’s rights has not gained currency.

District of Columbia: Department of State, June 30, 1992. (1) Voluntary Agency Processing: The Department of State contracts with private voluntary agencies -- sometimes referred to as Joint Voluntary Agencies or "JVAe" -- to assist in the processing of refugees for admission to the United States. These agencies pre-screen applicants to determine if they fall within the applicable processing priorities and otherwise appear eligible to be scheduled for an INS refugee interview. In some cases, individuals who appear to qualify for immigration to the US are also advised of those procedures. In addition, prior to interview, they assist the applicant in completing the documentary requirements of the program. If approved, voluntary agency staff guide the refugee through post-adjudication steps such as obtaining a medical clearance and sponsorship assurance. Voluntary agencies are currently under contract to the Department of State at processing locations in Thailand, the Philippines, Malaysia, Hong Kong, Singapore, Pakistan, Turkey, Austria, Germany, Italy, Greece, the Sudan, Sierra Leone, and Kenya.

(2) Overseas Language Training and Cultural Orientation: The Department of State strives to ensure that refugees who are accepted for admission to the United States are as well prepared as possible for the significant changes they will experience during resettlement. In support of this principle, the Bureau for Refugee Programs operates pre-departure training and orientation programs for eligible refugees at selected sites around the world. In East Asia, the Bureau funds English-as-a-Second-Language and Cultural Orientation (ESL/CO) programs in Thailand and the Philippines. At these sites adult Indochinese refugees participate in a 20-week program consisting of ESL/CO, and Work Orientation. A special program for 11 to 16 year olds, Preparation for American Secondary Schools (PASS), includes instruction in English, American Studies, basic math, and school orientation. In the Philippines, a program for 6 to 11 year olds, Preparing Refugees for Elementary Programs (PREP), also provides instruction in English, basic math, and school skills. In FY 1992 over 30000 Indo-Chinese refugees, including Amerasians departing Vietnam under the Orderly Departure Program, are expected to complete this training. In Africa, the Bureau conducts a short orientation program in Kenya which provides services primarily to Ethiopian refugees enroute to the United States. The Bureau also supports a small cultural orientation program in Botswana for US-bound refugees who come primarily from Angola, Namibia and South Africa.

(3) Health Services: The Office of Refugee Health (ORH), in the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Health, Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), is the focal point for all activities of the US Public Health Service in refugee health. The ORH develops health and mental health policy and identifies problem areas and solutions. Public Health Service agencies active in refugee matters include the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration, the Centers for Disease Control, and the Health Resources and Services Administration. Close and regular consultative relations are maintained with the Department of State (DOS), Department of Justice, HHS's Office for Refugee Resettlement, State and local health departments, and with international organizations such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Organization for Migration (IOM).

Routine US Public Health Service refugee operations include: (a) Monitoring the quality of medical examinations provided to refugees in Southeast Asia and worldwide, through on-site visits and training conferences; (b) Inspection of each refugee at the US port of entry; (c) Notification of local health departments of each refugee’s arrival, with expedited notification of cases requiring special follow-up; and (d) Administration of a domestic preventive health program which provides for regularly scheduled health assessments locally following resettlement.

Special initiatives undertaken or completed recently have included: (a) Organizing and conducting an international medical conference on the health and mental health needs of refugees from the former Soviet Union and publication of meeting proceedings, which is a unique resource; (b) Conducting mental health training seminars for medical providers and resettlement workers for special refugee groups, including Vietnamese former reeducation camp detainees and Amerasians; (c) Evaluating reeducation camp detainee health and mental health services; (d) Directing the PHS response to Haitian migrants at Guantanarno Bay Naval Station and providing medical screening for Haitians admitted directly to the US; (e) Consulting with DOS, INS, and UNHCR on individual refugee cases presenting unique health problems; (f) Planning for an international conference on migration medicine jointly with the World Health Organization (WHO) and IOM; and (g) Participating in the development of regulations to implement the medical exclusion provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1990.

(4) Initial Reception and Placement and the Refugee Data Center: Under Reception and Placement (R&P) program cooperative agreements administered by the Bureau for Refugee Programs, eleven private voluntary agencies are responsible for providing initial resettlement services to refugees during their first 90 days in the United States and oversight of "free case" refugees (those without relatives in the United States) for six months. Voluntary agencies receive per capita funding ($586 in FY 1992), which is to be used along with cash and in-kind contributions from private and other sources. Refugee reception and placement services include: (a) Sponsorship; (b) Pre-arrival resettlement planning; (c) Reception; (d) Basic needs support for 30 days; (e) Counseling and orientation; and (f) Health, employment, and other necessary referral services.

In FY 1992 the Bureau's on-site monitoring of the Reception and Placement program included in-depth reviews of refugee resettlement in twelve states. As a result of the monitoring, strengths and weaknesses of voluntary agency programs have been identified, and where needed, corrective action has been recommended. In FY 1992 the domestic resettlement program will have witnessed large-scale arrivals of Soviets, and Amerasians and reeducation ex-detainees exiting Vietnam through the Orderly Departure Program. Most arriving refugees join family already resident in the United States.

(5) Transportation The Department of State funds the transportation of refugees resettled in the United States through a program administered by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) which includes funding for international and domestic airfares, IOM processing, medical screening, communications, documentation, and transit accommodations where required. The cost of the airfares (over 80% of this total) is provided for refugees in the form of a loan; loan beneficiaries are responsible for repaying a designated sum over time after resettlement. Funds provided for transportation loans and related services cover most refugees resettled in the United States. Amerasian immigrants receive services provided to refugees. Other immigrants enter the United States on prepaid tickets.

(6) Ongoing Domestic Resettlement Programs For FY 1993, the Administration has proposed $227 million for Refugee and Entrant Assistance, a 45% reduction from last year's budget. The Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) in the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) has proposed a new, streamlined program, entitled the "Private Resettlement Program (PRP)," that ensures newly-arrived refugees who are not eligible for Federal categorical public assistance will be able to receive transitional support while also receiving intensive case management through more efficient use of resources. The proposal assumes a funded admissions level of 122000 refugees For FY 1993.
The PRP would terminate the States-administered Refugee Cash Assistance (RCA) and Refugee Medical Assistance (RMA) programs and would provide transitional support, through voluntary agencies, to newly-arrived refugees who are ineligible for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) or Supplemental Security Income (SSI). States would continue to be responsible for administering Federal Targeted Assistance and Social Services funds. ORR would also provide funds to voluntary agencies to help refugees attain self-sufficiency as quickly as possible. The implementation of the PRP continues to be discussed among the Office of the Coordinator, ORR, the States, voluntary agencies, mutual assistance associations and the Congress. The Private Resettlement Program will provide a longer period of assistance to refugees and will help refugees obtain employment sooner than would be possible under the States-administered RCA and RMA Programs.

(7) Domestic Initiatives The Wilson/Fish Amendment to the Immigration and Nationality Act, contained in the FY 1985 Continuing Resolution on Appropriations, enables ORR to develop alternative projects which promote early employment of refugees. It provides to States voluntary resettlement agencies, and others the opportunity to develop innovative approaches for the provision of cash and medical assistance, social services, and case management. In the summer of 1985, ORR awarded grants to California and Oregon for demonstration projects designed to decrease refugee reliance on welfare and to promote earlier economic self-sufficiency. The California project was phased out by the State in 1990. In FY 1990, ORR approved a grant to the United States Catholic Conference for a demonstration project, operated by Catholic Community Services of San Diego, which began 9/1/1990. The Oregon Refugee Early Employment Project (REEP): The Oregon project, the Refugee Early Employment Project (REEP), began its seventh year of activity in FY 1992. REEP integrates the delivery of cash assistance with case management, social services, and employment services within the private non-profit sector in an effort to increase refugee employment and reduce reliance on cash assistance. REEP encompasses a tri-county area surrounding Portland, where 85% of all refugees in Oregon initially settle. The project serves needy refugees who do not meet the AFDC or SSI categorical requirements (i.e., members of two-parent families, couples without children, and single individuals) during their initial eight months in the United States. Refugees who normally are eligible for assistance under AFDC continue to be eligible for that program and do not participate in REEP. During the past year, 835 REEP participants, of whom 96% were receiving cash assistance, entered employment. During the first nine months of the fiscal year, REEP reported a 75% job retention rate for these individuals. The employment costs were $937 per job placement and $417 per REEP participant.

United States Catholic Conference - San Diego Project: In FY 1990, USCC was awarded a grant for a demonstration project to be operated by its affiliate, Catholic Community Services of San Diego. It is the third Wilson/Fish project to be funded, and the first grant awarded directly to a private sector agency. The project serves USCC-sponsored new arrivals and provides a range of in-house services aimed at increasing the rate of refugee self-sufficiency and decreasing the average length of time on assistance. The project provides cash assistance to project participants at a level comparable to cash assistance from State-administered programs. The 125 employable refugees who were enrolled during the first four months of the project utilized cash assistance an average of 6.7 months during their first eight months in the US. 90 (72%) became self-sufficient before the end of the first 12 months in the US.

Cuban Exodus Relief Fund (CERF): In September 1991, the Cuban Exodus Relief Fund (CERF) was awarded a grant of $1.7 million for a demonstration project to resettle 1000 Cuban refugees admitted under the funded program. CERF provides medical assistance and services to newly-arrived refugees, who are excluded from accessing any public assistance for a minimum of 12 months. In agreement with the US Coordinator for Refugee Affairs and ORR, CERF is also permitted to use the grant funds to provide medical assistance for up to 1000 additional refugees admitted under the Private Sector Initiative (PSI).}

Alaska Refugee Outreach (ARO): In 1/1992, ORR awarded $140000 to Alaska Refugee Outreach (ARO), a local affiliate of the Episcopal Migration Ministries, for a demonstration project to be operated in four communities in the State of Alaska. The demonstration project will provide language and employment services to approximately 100 refugees during FY 1992. This project is the third awarded to a non-profit organization and the first established in Alaska, the one State that has not participated in refugee assistance and services through a State-administered refugee program.

Discretionary Social Service Initiatives: ORR discretionary funds support initiatives aimed at aiding refugees to achieve self-sufficiency. The principal programs funded are listed below.

Key States Initiative. In FY 1987, ORR established the Key States Initiative (KSI) to provide special funds to projects to reduce cash assistance utilization by refugee families in States with high welfare utilization. Implementation of KSI has involved changes in the State systems for refugee services, as well as within the system of service providers and the refugee communities. Over $2.6 million was awarded in FY 1991 to five States pursuing innovative welfare reduction strategies under KSI. Savings from welfare reductions and terminations are now substantially exceeding the KSI grant amounts.

Job Links. The purpose of Job Links is to provide supplementary social service funding to qualifying States in which resettlement of refugees is encouraged based on the experience of refugees already in those communities, or where a special initiative is proposed to significantly improve the potential for self-sufficiency. The program seeks to link employable refugees with jobs in communities which have good economic opportunities. All States except those with KSI cooperative agreements or targeted assistance grants are eligible to apply. General program objectives include: (a) Increased employment and self-sufficiency; (b) Active job development with employers offering job opportunities at self-sufficiency-supporting wages; (c) Retention of refugees in communities with good job opportunities; (d) Initial resettlement of refugees in communities with histories of effective early employment and self-sufficiency; and (e) Promotion of secondary migration of refugees to these communities from areas of high refugee impact and high welfare utilization.

Planned Secondary Resettlement (PSR) Program: The Planned Secondary Resettlement (PSR) program provides an opportunity for unemployed refugees and their families to relocate from areas of high welfare dependency to communities in the US that offer favorable employment prospects. Secondary resettlement assistance and services are provided to refugees who participate in a planned relocation. Eligibility is limited to refugees who have lived in the US for 18 months or more and who have experienced continuing unemployment. Eligible grantees include States and public and private non-profit organizations which have had demonstrable experience in the provision of services to refugees, such as refugee mutual assistance associations (MAAs) and national and local voluntary agencies. As of the end of FY 1991, there were seven PSR grantees, with the Lao, Cambodian, and Hmong communities the most active in recruiting refugees for relocation. The average cost of resettling families through PSR is less than $8000 per family while average welfare cost savings to the government are estimated at $987 per month per family. At this rate, PSR families, on average, repay the cost to the government in just eight months.

Amerasians. A high priority of ORR is to assist in the successful resettlement of Amerasians and family members expected to arrive in the US 15000 Amerasians and accompanying family members are expected in FY 1992. ORR will extend its participation in a national planning effort for clustering free cases in selected locations. This planning effort involves coordination with the Department of State, national voluntary agencies, State refugee coordinators, refugee leaders, and various other organizations. ORR will again make funding available in localities with significant Amerasian populations. The purpose of the funding is to encourage community coordination and to provide counseling and case management services to deal with family disruption and social adjustment problems that may occur in the Amerasian community. Former Reeducation Camp Detainees. About 21000 former Vietnamese reeducation detainees and family members are expected to arrive during FY 1992, with more expected in future years. This population is expected to have a variety of special problems, creating a need for special social services beyond the initial resettlement period. In a special initiative, ORR made one million dollars in discretionary grants available to support local community efforts to enhance services provided to former reeducation detainees from Vietnam and their families. The grants, to 16 States and counties expecting to receive large numbers of former detainees, are designed to provide enhanced orientation, peer support, peer counseling, referral, employment services and vocational English, short-term vocational training, and mental health services. Although the grants are awarded to States and counties, they are required to contract with refugee mutual assistance associations where possible for the actual delivery of services. [↩]

46058. Dingil, Fahrettin. Economic Analysis Of Child Mortality Rates By Provinces Of Turkey, 1963-1982 (socioeconomic Factors). Wayne State University, Dissertation. 1992pp. AAC 9321766. [Advisor: Leo U. Way] This study examines the socioeconomic determinants of the child mortality rates, the life table probabilities of dying before reaching age two, three, and five, in the provinces of Turkey between 1962 and 1982. The study explores relationship between the dependent variables, and the independent variables representing (1) the level of economic development, as measured by per capita real domestic product and the proportion of the population in urban areas, (2) the degree of the satisfaction of basic needs of the poor, measured by the literate proportion of population and the proportion of the literate population, and (3) the level of the status of females, measured by the literate proportion of the female population and the proportion of the female population living urban areas. The values are estimated by the Brass-Trussell method, and the East model of the Coale-Demeny regional model life tables is used. The data are collected from the Turkish population censuses for 1970, 1975, 1980, and 1985 and the statistical yearbook of Turkey, 1963-1985. The spatial and temporal variations in the q(x) at each province level are associated with the differentials in the independent variables. The provinces are divided into four groups according to level of income as follows: (a) richest, (b) rich, (c) poor, and (d) poorest. I propose three general hypotheses that can be expressed into one as follows: there is a negative relationship between and explanatory variables representing the level of economic development, the degree of the satisfaction of the basic needs of the poor, and the status of the females. Bivariate and multivariate analysis is done with pooling time series and cross section data. I find that the independent variables significantly affect among the provinces of Turkey, and the variable, the literate proportion of the female population, representing the status of females has the greatest impact on the variations. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [↩]

46059. Elliott, Robert S. “Business Opportunities Abound in Former Soviet Republics”, in Inside Tucson Business, October 28, 1996. pp. 1, 20. Tucsonan Ursula McLoughlin was a manager at Hotel Dostyk when the coup when on in Moscow against Gorbachev. She worked there for six years rehabilitating the hotel through her Corona Hospitality Inc. Her husband, Emmett McLoughlin ships 40 tons of yeast to Georgia per month from Turkey through his Tucson-based Fair Winds Trading Co. Emmett McLoughlin had two previous trading ventures that failed: a fax service and a trade in Persian lamb skins. The McLoughlins have also represented other hotels in Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. There are many business opportunities in the former USSR, especially such resource based industries as timber, oil and ore in the Russian Far East. Wild changes in taxes, enormous greed, and changing rules and laws impair business development in the former Soviet Union. [↩]

46060. Frank. Andre Gunder. “Part 08: Central Asia In World History: Some Questions: Gender Relations”, in The Centrality of Central Asia. Comparative Asian Studies 8. VU Center for Asian Studies-Amsterdam. Amsterdam: VU University Press, 1992. pp. 18-21. Feminist revisionism, in particular that of Marija Gimbutas and Riane Eisler, tend to attribute the rise of patriarchy to the continuing incursions of warriors from Central Asia. They argue that the ‘Aryans in India, Hitittites and Mitanni in the Fertile Cresent, Luwians in Anatolia, Kurgans in eastern Europe, Acheans and later Dorians in Greece...[as well as]...the Hebrews’ were nomadic invaders who all brought with them the social organization structures of patriarchy that enabled the to conquer these areas. Some researchers argue that women had stronger roles in nomadic societies that in sedentarized socities, but the question of gender relations in Central Asia remains little studied. [↩]

46061. Gamm, Niki. "World Cancer Week Begins", in Turkish Daily News. Turkish Embassy in the USA: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, April 2, 1996. 40% of people with cancer today can be saved but early diagnosis is critical.

ISTANBUL: Turkey began to observe World Cancer Week yesterday with meetings and a message from President Suleyman Demirel which stressed that the country was on the same level with other countries when it came to the fight against cancer.

Demirel pointed out that there were now hospitals and other health organizations and on-going research throughout Turkey and the most up-to-date equipment and techniques were readily available. Noting that it was one of the major problems affecting the whole world, he also expressed his hope that recent developments would lead to a cure. Moreover as soon as such a cure were discovered, Turkish medicine would make it available to sick people here immediately.

Turkish Cancer Society Chairman, Professor Ergun Goney, has said that the way to be saved from cancer in Turkey is through early diagnosis and treatment because the country has yet to set up centers which can deal with advanced cancer, unlike in the West.

According to data supplied by the World Health Organization (WHO), the total number of people who have cancer worldwide today is around 14 million. Of these 67% of men die and 60% of women, in other words, only some 40% of all victims are expected to survive. Cancer relateddeathsaround the world total some 5 million annually. When compared with total number of deaths around the world, 8% of these are from cancer; however in Europe, cancer accounts for 22% of deaths. The same source reports that there are 5 million more people with cancer around the world every year.

The WHO’s goal within its “Health for Everyone” program is to have reduced the number of deaths from cancer in people under 65 by 15% in the year 2005. Emphasis is to be given to early breast, cervical and skin cancer diagnosis and treatment.

The organization plans to encourage the establishment of centers which would be integrated with government hospitals. Goney emphasized in a press conference yesterday that in Turkey 200000 people are estimated to have developed cancer each year. According to Ministry of Health figures, victims living in the Marmara region of Turkey, or 53% of the country’s total population, have a better chance of advanced treatment in comparison with the rest of the country. However, again according to the figures, those living on or near the Marmara also have a far higher propensity for developing cancer.

Of the total number of people suffering from cancer, 50000 will die annually. The total is seven to eight times greater in comparison with the numbers of deaths caused by traffic accidents in Turkey. The number of people who are at risk of developing cancer is estimated at more than 2 million.

Stressing that the principal cause of cancer is cigarette smoking, Goney said that he would like to see their sale forbidden. However, failing that some of the precautions taken in western countries would help. These would include no smoking in enclosed areas and prohibitions on public transport vehicles.

[80-90% cases of lung cancer are attributable to cigarette smoking, not to mention that it also adversely effects the pancreas, bladder, kidney and uterus.]

Remedies and treatments: Finding out that one has cancer is no longer the ‘end of the line’ as it once was thought to be and encouraging treatments and gene discoveries suggest that the long years of research...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

may eventually pay off. Research in the West has emphasized the possibility of finding a vaccine which could be used either in cancer treatment or in preventing its onset.

The earlier a cancer is caught the more likely the chances of survival are. As more than one doctor has put it, if you wait until you are in pain, it's already too late. But treatment is still long, costly and usually uncomfortable to put it mildly. Some doctors and health authorities suggest regular examinations for the more common kinds of cancer and prompt medical attention to any unusual symptoms such as intestinal bleeding, wounds which don't heal and irregular, out-of-cycle bleeding in women.

For the most likely type of cancers are lung, large intestine and prostate while in women the cancer most frequently met is breast cancer.

Research has shown that in the big cities air pollution has had a major effect on cancers of the respiratory system while others are caused or seriously effected by working in unhealthy atmospheres. This includes being exposed to asbestos fibers (now outlawed in most countries) and coal dust particles. Imbibing of excessive alcohol has been shown to have a carcinogenic effect on the drinker's liver, esophagus and stomach. The groundwork for demonstrating that the effects of poor living conditions, low income and traffic problems on speeding up the cancers is also being prepared.

The Turkish Cancer Society: The Turkish Cancer Society was established in 1964 and gradually broadened the types of services which it could offer. Both chemotherapy and radiotherapy are available. Since its founding, the Society has provided early diagnosis for 350000 people. The organization is governed by university faculty members and a voluntary social committee.

For World Cancer Week, the Society is offering free diagnoses at its center in Sishane to people who are concerned that they might have cancer. It is also planning to set up cancer diagnosis centres in a pilot program in the Kırklareli region and in cooperation with the Zeytinburnu municipality in Istanbul. [=] 46062. Gowland, Rob. "United States Aids Turkey's Violation of Human Rights", in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), July 13, 1996, p. 16. The US continues to arm the Turkish military despite continuing concerns about repression. VP Al Gore justified this with a 'splendidly Orwellian piece of double talk': "It is not fair for us to urge Turkey to not only be a democratic country but to recognize human rights and them not help the government of Turkey deal with terrorism within its own borders". Pres. Clinton noted in 1994 when he welcomed PM Tansu Ciller to Washington: "Turkey is a shining example to the world of the virtues of cultural diversity". The US has provided $5 billion in military aid to Turkey in the last decade, including since 1992: 28 AH-1 Cobra helicopter gunships, two squadrons of F-16s, 1500 tanks, 500 armored personnel carriers, 29 F-4E fighters, 14 SH-2F LAMPS antisubmarine helicopters, 5 AH-1W Super Cobra attack helicopters, 51 Blackhawk transport helicopters, machine guns, howitzers and cluster bombs. The Peace Onyx Program is a Lockheed coproduction deal worth $7.6 billion to produce 250 F-16s. Many extrajudicial killings are believed to be the work of organized fascists associated with the MHP or Grey Wolves.

46063. Halle, Fanina. Women in the Soviet East: Part 04: Introduction: Cultural History: The Caucasus. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1938. We will facilitate our survey by dividing the immense area of the Soviet East into three fundamentally separate parts: the Caucasus, Central Asia, and Northern Asia. In certain respects the Caucasus, the first of these three parts, is likewise the most remarkable. Itself a small continent, it belongs in equal degree to Europe and Asia, for its northern half is reckoned to the former its southern to the latter, and the dividing line between the two parts is also counted as the frontier between the two continents. That is the Caucasus mountain range" the skeleton of the Caucasian landscape, the nerve of its inhabitants' flesh and blood: "This little continent between the Black Sea and the Caspian, with its many legends, is unique alike in its landscape, its history, and its ethnology, and richly repays the interest that has always been shown in it. The prime object of interest is a pre-history handed down in the form of myths, although the heroic resistance of the Caucasians to the Russian conquerors in the last century has also found its way into the consciousness of Europe, thanks to Russian romantic literature. And the overwhelming magnificence of the scenery in "Prince of the Earth," as Lermontov called the Caucasus, where he was three times exiled, carried with a sort of a thrill an echo in the hearts of expressed Europeans. But all this is of secondary importance compared with the generally admitted significance of the Caucasus in the pre-history of the human race. The strongest and most deeply rooted associations of present-day educated people with the Caucasus have not so much to do with the names of the heroes of freedom sung by Pushkin and Tolstoi as with the legendary primordial epoch of a much more distant past. Now they cling to the rugged precipices of Elbruz, where Prometheus in chains suffered the penalty of his revolt against the gods, now to the Armenian peak Ararat, which alone, according to the Biblical legend stood out above the all-destroying Flood and served as a refuge for Noah's ark, with all its human and animals' lives, saved for the sake of a distant future. The Amazons, too, who roused the interest of antiquity, are generally supposed to have had their home in the Caucasus. The scientific exploration of the Caucasus, dating only from recent decades and now pursued with great energy, especially the study of its hitherto little known languages and peoples, has led to the most remarkable discoveries. Not only has the Caucasus been found to be the home of the Hellenic and Semitic legends which doubtless date back to the earliest times, including those which have found a place in the Bible in a form familiar to us, but these legends correspond exactly to very ancient traditions which we can trace on into a late post-Christian period in the Caucasus. Moreover, the languages of the Caucasus, which were wholly unknown until recently, and have, for the most part, no written characters, throw startling light upon the origin of these legends. The Caucasian languages which, with the exception of Georgian, had never been studied until our own day, were regarded by European linguists as a separate group, but nothing much could be made out of them. The philologists' positive fear of tackling this awkward subject matter is quite understandable. For the Caucasus, with its countless small tribes living isolated in the mountain valleys, is an ethnographical chaos almost too complex for survey. The three Caucasian Federal Republics, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia, together with the Northern Caucasus and the autonomous Regions contained in it, only designate with their names a small fraction of the peoples inhabiting them, and these are not all genuinely Caucasian, but Turkish, Semitic, and Indo-Germanic as well. All doctors and health authorities suggest regular examinations for with a mere handful of houses. A real Babel, therefore; for obvious reasons its scientific exploration awaited the coming of a scholar of Caucasian origin, N. Marr of Leningrad, who died recently. Marr called the genuine Caucasian languages Japhetic and so claimed for them the name of Noah's third son, since the names of the two other brothers, Shem and Ham, already designated two closely cognate linguistic groups, the Semitic and the Hamic. At first Marr assumed not only the lingual, but also the ethnographical, unity of the Caucasian peoples, and spoke accordingly of a Japhetic Caucasus inhabited by Japhetic peoples. Further scientific investigation of the Japhetic languages led to results which, on the one hand, give us fuller information about the question which mainly concerns us here, that of the significance of the Caucasus to Mediterranean culture, in other words, to human culture as a whole, but on the other hand conflict so sharply with deeply rooted beliefs and prejudices of Western European scholarship that we cannot be surprised to find that they are still almost unknown outside the borders of the Soviet Union, except to a few specialists. I will only observe in passing that there are said to be over-hasty conclusions among Marr's observations, conclusions to which he was misled by the novelty of his subject matter; but we are concerned here only with his testimony regarding the significance of the peoples and languages of the Caucasus to Afro-Eurasian culture.

One result of Marr's investigations is, at any rate, firmly established. In the extreme west of Europe, in the Pyrenean peninsula, jammed in between Spain and France lives a little mountain people with a very ancient tradition, and, especially, with its own language and Japhetic literature, who speak these languages was discovered in the idiom of the Abkhazians, living along the east of the Black Sea, whom the Greeks called Abarks. Later an eastern branch of the Japhetic languages was discovered, and it was doubtless no accident that this, too, was a mound-building fragment of the race: the Vershiks on the Pamir Plateau in Central Asia. Thus a kinship of the Caucasian peoples, dating back to the earliest times, at least in the matter of language has been established with a western mountainine race, the Basques, and a Central Asian, the Vershiks. From thence Japhetic research extends to an ever wider horizon, and opens our eyes to chains of association startling in their novelty, and overstepping the limits of philology into the wider field of general history. Long before Marr, historians regarded it as an established fact that there was a civilization in the Mediterranean area before it was colonized by Indo-Europeans and Hamo-Semites. Even in the middle of the last century the question was raised of a race neither Indo-Germanic nor Hamo-Semitic, a mysterious "third ethnical element," of whose existence throughout Afro-Eurasia evidence was repeatedly found in new archeological discoveries. These discoveries, and many more cultural and ethnical facts, offered unanimous testimony of a pre-Hellenic and pre-Roman civilization which, as the basic stratum, continued its creative contribution to the formation of the Mediterranean civilization at a time when the Afro-Eurasian area had long been colonized by Indo-Europeans and Hamo-Semites. The area covered by this homogeneous, prehistoric culture turned out to include not only the Mediterranean lands, with all the islands and peninsulas of southern Europe, especially Cyprus and Crete, but also the whole of Hither Asia and Asia Minor.

Its representatives were peoples who have handed principally their names to us in the inscriptions and monuments which are still in part undeciphered. In Asia Minor they were called the Phrygians, Lycians, and Kasites, in Palestine the Philistines, in Spain the Iberians, and in Italy and Greece the Etruscans and Pelasgians. The next deduction followed automatically. From the point of view of present-day Japhetic scholarship the Japhetic languages are not the speech of a particular type of mankind but rather the Japhetic tongue denotes a definite genetic kinship with the idioms of the modern, ancient, and archaic Caucasus, where they are spoken to this day by mountainine peoples who have remained isolated for thousands of years. In other words: there must have been a pre-historic period when there lived everywhere peoples with Japhetic languages, peoples whose territory became more and more restricted in the historic period, and was finally confined to the Caucasus, the Basque Pyrenees, and the Pamir. The Japhetic peoples who spoke these languages were not, as I have said, a particular race or type of mankind but rather the Japhetic tongues denote a definite, prehistoric stage in the development of language. Thus the extraordinary significance of the Japhetic languages of the Caucasus to present-day philology rests in the fact that in them primitive forms of speech structure long outgrown in our day, have survived. "The Japhetites have not broken away from the prehistoric basis in their speech structure," says Marr. That is to say: the pre-history of the human race survives in the Japhetic languages of that "linguistic microcosm, the Caucasus." At the beginning of the period of a few thousand years in which our written history is comprised, three ethnical elements lived in the Afro-Eurasian area: in addition to Indo-Europeans and Hamo-Semites the Japhetites, whose territory once embraced the whole civilized world, but now, at the opening of the historic era, had shrunk to the Caucasus and one or two mountain districts.

Thus the worldwide historic struggle of the West against the East represents not only, as Bachofen realized, the fight between patriarchy and matriarchy of the West, but also the fight of the West against an age that had overlaid with patriarchal peoples, Greeks and Romans, against the East, where matriarchy and the Japhetic remote antiquity were able to assert themselves much longer. In this sense, pre-history or the Japhetic phase of evolution and the matriarchal order must be interchangeable terms. In the pre-historic Japhetic West, too, inhabited by Iberians, Etruscans, and Pelasgians, matriarchy had prevailed. That is a fact placed beyond question by archaeological discoveries. It is most completely proved by the monuments of Cretan Mycenean culture, familiar to all students of the history of art. In the kingdom of Minos, in the area of Aegean culture, of which it has long been established that it was inhabited by that mysterious "primeval people, neither Semitic nor Indo-Germanic," women occupied a privileged position. Without regarding the results of research into the institution of matriarchy, H. Th. Bossert sums up the relations of the sexes as follows, basing his account solely upon archaeological discoveries (Alt-Kreta): Women played such a predominant part in the life of those times as never again, perhaps, in the whole course of the thousands of years that we can trace historically. One is really disposed to rate the part played by women in public and private life in those days so high that it even found expression in artistic style.... All images of the gods, in so far as they represented human beings, are female figures. Women dedicate themselves to the cult of the god. Everywhere women meet men on an equal footing. Not only in their own special sphere. They share joy and danger with men. They go hunting alone and fight wild beasts. And if external enemies were not reserved for men, the picture presented would lack nothing of that found in the legend of the Amazons. What is here stated about ancient Crete is true of the whole area of Japhetic civilization, or, as we should rather say, of the whole Japhetic historical period, the pre-historic era in which Mediterranean civilization took its rise; and so, likewise, of the Caucasus where, as we shall see, relics of matriarchy still survive to the present day. The heroic resistance of the Caucasian mountain tribes to Tsarist colonization, sung by Russian poets, lends immortality to the unique character of Caucasian history, where the highlands have from the earliest times provided a natural defence for the mountain tribes against alien invaders. For the coastal strip along the seashore near Derbent has always been the gate through which Asia has invaded Europe, and even Alexander the Great is said to have reached Derbent. A new element entered into the resistance to the Russian advance in that it was no longer the struggle of separate tribes, but a real war of freedom. But the love of freedom of the small mountain tribes, the Abaks and Cherkesses, was not sufficient for such an undertaking. It called for a vigour not to be found among the fragmentary Japhetic tribes, such as only an Islamized Caucasian could raise. Only so can we explain how it came about that the subjection of the Caucasus was not completed till 1864 although its partial conquest began in the early years of the previous century, and even before that; or that the two principal Islamic sects, the Shiites and Sunnites, united, and that the rising, led from the outset by the Imams, or priests, found a leader in the person of the Caucasian national hero, Shamil. He was a man whose personal courage, and whose ability as agitator, politician, and tactician, were beyond question. Nevertheless, it is difficult to join without reserve in the fervent hero-worship with which the Caucasus still regards the fierce and towering grandeur of his person. His coming, and the after all hopeless struggle that he carried on, contributed much to complete the process by which the basic stratum in the Caucasus was buried beneath the later Islamic strata. After his defeat the Cherkesses, Abaks, and other mountain peoples began to emigrate in hundreds of thousands to European Turkey and Asia, and this process, encouraged and sometimes forced by the Russian conquerors, resulted in the downfall of whole peoples. A chain of burial mounds stretches to the shores of the Black Sea, beneath which slumber Cherkesses who died on their way to Turkey, especially women. The colonization which began in the sixties was rather calculated to disfigure the noble aspect of the "Prince of the Earth," to uproot a living fragment of pre-history. What remained, and how that remnant influenced the position of women until the coming of the Soviets, will be discussed in another chapter. [-] 46064. Helsinki Watch; Human Rights Watch. "Turkish Violations of the Human Rights of the Greek Community", in Denying Human Rights & Ethnic Identity. The Greeks of Turkey. New York: Human Rights Watch, Helsinki Watch, March 1992. pp. 11-26. Greeks in Turkey continue to suffer human rights abuses. Human rights abuses include: degrading treatment and harassment by police, which is characterized by Greeks as 'systematic treatment'; limits to free expression, including censorship of the two Greek language newspapers in Istanbul, and the banning of imports of Greek language newspapers and books; denial of equality and right to control Greek schools (Greek school population has declined quickly; in 1923 there were 15000 pupils in Greek schools; in 1964, some 5000; in 1978 some 1147; in 1980 some 816; in 1992-1992 some 410), including efforts to prevent Greek children from learning Greek; limitations on religious freedom; restrictions on the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate; clontunion closed of the Halki School of Theology (the major Greek Orthodox Church institution for training priests); religious discrimination (including prevention of Greek priests from entering Greek schools); limiting the rights of charitable institutions (such as preventing elections to boards of the councils of Greek institutions and schools); and systematic denial of ethnic identity.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

46065. Helsinki Watch; Human Rights Watch. "Recommendations", in Denying Human Rights & Ethnic Identity. The Greeks of Turkey. New York: Human Rights Watch, Helsinki Watch, March 1992. pp. 41-42. Helsinki Watch recommends that: Greeks be granted all civil and political rights enjoyed by other Turks; Greeks have freedom of expression and access to media from Greece; Turkey end degrading treatment of Greeks; accord the Greek minority educational freedom; grant freedom of religion to Greeks (reform from interevening in the Patriarchateandreopent the Halki School of Theology); and grant the Greeks rights to operate charitable institutions. Helsinki Watch recommends that the US pressure Turkey, since it provides significant military and economic aid to Turkey ($700 million in FY1992). [TEXT]

46066. Helsinki Watch; Human Rights Watch. "Appendix B: Foreign Service Dispatch 132: Damage Caused To Greek Orthodox Community Establishments During The 9/6/1955 Riots, Part 3", in Denying Human Rights & Ethnic Identity. The Greeks of Turkey. New York: Human Rights Watch, Helsinki Watch, March 1992. Extensive damage also seems to have been suffered by the educational establishments of the Greek community. At least 36 of the 48 schools of the community are reported to have been more or less seriously damaged. The principal victims are the Zappaion Girls College at Takeim and the Megoli Scholi Boys College of Panar, the Theological school at Heybili, and the high schools at Haskdy, Edeine Kapu, Bekeriy, Galata, Takeim and Aphasvutkyd. The elaborate dispensary of the Takrim High School and invisible. They are the women of a fourth world nation--Kurdistan, a country which has no political existence in the modern world because there was never room for independence among the claims of Arab, Turkish, and Persian nationalism. Kurdish women, tucked away in some of the most inaccessible mountain terrain in the Middle East, are beyond the westernization programs of the governments which control their territory. Modern Iranian, Iraqi and Turkish family laws such as those which have abolished or limited the practice of polygamy have no meaning for these women. They continue to live according to ancient tribal and religious (Islamic) law. If their very clothes are a threat to the faraway men who want to rule them, they are also a comfort to the men who really do rule them, much closer to home. When I lived in Urmieh, a city in northwest Iran, I spent a long time looking for Kurdish women. I could see them well enough on the street and bustling through the marketplace in bunches--they were always in bunches--but I could not meet them, could not talk with them, [Bishop] Gennadios Arabatzoglou (age 80); place: Yenikoy: manner of death: Beaten, died of injuries.

[Priest] Name unknown; place: Edirenkapi; manner of death: Disappeared.

[Priest] Name unknown; place: Chalke; manner of death: Found dead.

[Church caretaker] Erpapazoglu; place: Pasa Bahci; manner of death: Was killed inside church which was dynamited.

[Caretaker] Name unknown: Anadoluhisar; manner of death: Was killed at the shrine there.

Abraham Anavas (age 65); place: "Moton" Store; manner of death: Was killed in store.

Olga Kimiades (age 77); manner of death: Beaten, died of heart attack.

Thanassiss Misir oglou: place: Hatzopoulos Passage; manner of death: Was killed at his store.

Hebe Giolma (age 16); place: Stegi Bragazenon Korasidon; manner of death: Was abducted, raped, killed.

Name unknown; place: Yeni Cami area; manner of death: Person described as "disrespectful Greek" by Turkish newspaper was lynched by mob.

Iasa Uludag: place: Besiktas; manner of death: Died at the school in which he was a caretaker in the fire set by the mob (Ulu dag was one of those who had changed his Greek name).

Theopoula Papadopoulos; place: Uskudar; manner of death: raped, killed (reported in a speech by MP Alexandros Hatzopoulos in Turkish parliament).

Giannis Bal Kissis; place: Bakirky; manner of death: Found dead in Street. [-]

46068. Kahn, Margaret; Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. "Behind the Invisible Veil", in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 2, October 1, 1981. pp. 4-5. Kurds in Turkey are both the most and the least visible women in the Middle East. From a distance, in the bazaars and towns of eastern Turkey, northern Iraq and Syria, and the USSR, Kurdish women stand out like exotic butterflies. Their rainbow-colored satins, velvets and brocades are famous among their Arab, Turkish, Persian, and Armenian neighbors, many of whom have opted for relatively drab western dress. In Turkey, Kurdish clothing has been effectively outlawed. Yet, the women go on wearing what they can--bits and pieces of the old finery.
could not find out the first thing about their lives.

After much effort I met some Kurdish men. I expected soon after to be introduced to Kurdish women, but the men put me off by saying, unaccountably, that they did not know any Kurdish women. (This from men with two, even three wives.) One male acquaintance promised, "I will try to find an educated woman for you to talk with," even though I protested that any woman would do. Later I discovered that there were very few educated women, since in the villages it is considered shameful to send a daughter to school.

After great perseverance I did meet the women, en masse. They were gathered in the upstairs sitting room of the house of the sheikh to whom they belonged. It took me a while to understand that at least four were married to the same man. On the first day I traveled, a little breathlessly, through the front door, up the stairs, through another door, and into the small room where they rose, clothes rustling to greet me.

These were some of the most protected women I have ever seen. Even their clothes are a kind of fortress. Needless of the day's temperature, they may wear two floor-length overdresses of nonabsorbent synthetic material, several more underdresses of the same, a slip, long pantaloons, and a headcovering. They travel and live in groups, both for the sake of their reputation (a life and death matter) and because they are used to it. They dislike being alone. A Kurdish friend used to call me up every morning and inquire about my health.

"How are you?" she would carol in throaty Kurdish. And then because there was no one else to ask after--no mother or mother-in-law, no sisters or sisters-in-law, no aunts, or cousins--she would ask, "How is your cat? And your cat's doll?" She and the other women piloted my relatively solitary state. To them the fact that I was married offered little consolation since in Kurdish women socialize only with other women.

Once I had met the group, I kept trying to separate them into individuals. As an American, I was used to dealing with people one at a time. For me, at first, there were disconcertingly many faces. I thought I would never learn their language if I had to sit there day after day with ten pairs of ears trained on my every utterance. But asking Kurdish women to meet me individually was asking them to violate every rule they knew.

The birth of a girl in Kurdistan is, in general, a less auspicious event than the birth of a boy. The reasons for this are rooted in basic aspects of the culture and economy. One concrete reason for a Kurdish mother to wish for a son rather than a daughter is the general knowledge that only a son will add to the long-term wealth and power of her household. A son can manage the land and the her. A son can bring brides to serve his mother. A daughter can bring only a bride price, which officially belongs to the father. Although in some dialects of Kurdish this is called sheer baha, literally "milk money," it goes not to the real provider of that milk but to the head of the household. Kurdish women have good reasons to keep their daughters at arms length. If the daughter is married to a tyrant or her husband's village is far enough away (in some cases over national borders) her mother may never see her again. Perhaps it is this knowledge, that a daughter absolutely ceases to be a daughter once she is a wife, that enables Kurdish mothers to accept to hideous marriages for their daughters. During the time I spent in Kurdistan I saw a 15 year old married off to an old deaf man with two other wives. Another woman, who at 18 had been given to a man older than her own father (and consequently unable to have children) said she would never forgive her mother for the role she had played in the decision.

Kurdish girls tend to be dressed like little boys until they are between the ages of seven and ten. At first they may be required to wear only headscarves. Then they are dressed in diminutive versions of the entire woman's outfit--and are thus too encumbered to participate in childish games with boys. At this point serious responsibilities begin. While boys may go off to school in the village or even in faraway towns where they live quite independently, girls are assigned to care for groups of the youngest children in the extended family. Daughters are expected to cook and clean, to tend gardens and milk animals, to serve men and guests. However, not even daughters work as hard as daughters-in-law, who are the outsiders, brought, not so much by the husband for his pleasure, but by the mother for the maintenance of her household. Daughters-in-law, who are called brides even after ten years of marriage, are the true workhorses of Kurdish villages. The two brides of a wealthy village family I knew went around daily with glum expressions and complaints of headaches. Both, before marriage, had been high spirited girls with a different attitude toward life.

Once I asked an important Kurdish sheikh why he did not send one of his younger daughters to the dentist since she had a toothache. He just shrugged. The answer was the same for why she did not attend school with other daughters. This sheikh, who had never attended school himself, was eager for his sons to go to college. But the expectation for his girls was quite different. Kurds understand that their sons must be equipped to function in the rapidly modernizing outside world. Thus, the people I knew saw nothing odd in betrothing a graduate in engineering from Imperial College in London to an illiterate girl who had never been out of her village for more than a week at a time. The fact that they were cousins and of equal social status was far more important than common interests or experience.

Kurdish women's lives are intimately tied to the welfare of the extended family. While men may disappear for years at a time, away at school, in the army, or just wandering or smuggling or fighting in a Kurdish liberation movement, the women are always in the village, carrying on. Marriage customs are particularly revealing about the true state of things. Kurdish girls speculate endlessly about marriage. They are tired of having to keep their reputations unsullied to a degree Americans would find hard to believe. But marriage very often does not bring the relief they imagine. If everything goes properly, a Kurdish bride does not see her husband before the actual wedding night. If she lives in a different village, the groom's kinsmen will come to fetch her. Her own family will stay at home weeping after she is gone. She will then be brought alone to the new village, led into a special room, and left to wait until the festivities hosted by the groom's family are over. Afterwards she will be led to her husband's bed; proof of her dewlooring is expected to follow soon.

She is not supposed to see her own family for a full year after the wedding and after that she may visit only with her husband's permission. Her life consists of two eras. The first is her childhood and early adolescence in her father's house or, if her father has one more than one wife and can afford it, her mother's house. The second era is with her husband and female in-laws. Faced with an incredible workload and the depressing knowledge that, barring unforeseen disasters, all the possibilities are now played out, many Kurdish women look back nostalgically on their girlhoods.

The degree of sameness, the lack of opportunity or variety, in a Kurdish women's life is hard for women in the West to appreciate. I had difficulty at first, sitting hour after hour in the village, in understanding why I felt so bored and oppressed. The women received me eagerly when I came. I was an extraordinary diversion. Every word I uttered was remembered and repeated. There was little else to break the monotony. When I could not stand it any more I would go over to the other side of the wall and speak with the men. They would talk to me on any subject--news from abroad, the state of the economy, the pilgrimages they had made to Mecca--anything except of the state of their women.

"Tell me about the time you and your first wife eloped," I asked the important sheikh. His wife, an old woman now, had just been recounting the story to me in the harem. The sheikh turned pale. His fifth and most recent wife was in her early twenties and currently pregnant, while the eldest wife, who had borne him only girls, must have seemed like part of a previous life.

"I cannot speak of such things," he said to me sternly.

I went back to the harem and the women continued their storytelling, half giggling in embarrassment and fear that perhaps the sheikh would hear them talking so openly about how they had been married.

"I didn't like the sheikh at all when I was married to him" the third wife revealed shyly, but refused to say more.

Later, we all went to the house of the second wife where I passed the microphone of my tape recorder around the room. A woman servant seized the opportunity to talk of how her husband had just taken a second wife. Her openly expressed bitterness shocked the other women and they tried to shut her up.

Another time, on a return visit to Kurdistan, the same sheikh was trying to take a sixth wife, a clear violation of Islamic law and a serious threat to the welfare of his already numerous children. His eldest sons threatened to kill him if he went ahead with his plans. Yet, during a stay of two weeks only one person told me what was really going on—the daughter who would never forgive her mother for marrying her to an old man.

The Kurdish women I knew were very proud of their Kurdishness, a pride represented superficially by the clothes and on a much deeper level by a political outspokenness unmatched by anyone else I met in Iran, including Kurdish males. Some of these women recited outlawed Kurdish verse on holidays. Others were treasure stores of tribal wisdom, links in the chain of stories handed down from generation to generation.

Sometimes I think back to the day when I was sitting among those women who were faced with a husband, a father, a brother, or uncle who wanted to take a sixth wife. "He is not a real sheikh," one of the women muttered, but then I did not understand what they were talking about. The other complaints to me had always been about much less serious matters. What did I know of their sorrows and joys? I was a foreigner. A woman in a time machine.

"You are almost a Kurd," they told me as I was leaving Kurdistan after my first stay there. It was a great compliment.

But, when I returned for a visit three years after that, still childless, my teeth and skin intact, wearing jeans, and insisting on climbing a mountain with a group of men, despite the women's attempts to dissuade me, I understood better. I might become a Kurd, if I learned to aim a gun, to love the mountains, and to speak their language, but I could never, never be a Kurdish woman.

How do international norms, recommendations and rules get “translated” into domestic political culture at the national level? Are they automatically implemented, are they transformed in the process of implementation, or are they not heeded at all? What sorts of domestic political conflicts result? These questions have not yet received the attention they deserve. The international relations literature has often treated states as “black boxes”, leaving the domestic politics of compliance aside. What has not been significantly explored is the interaction between the international norms and rules on the one hand, and the particular domestic setting of the country on the other. I will argue that international norms and rules may be very influential in prompting policy changes in a particular country, but whether or not these policy changes are more than words on paper depends upon relationships between state and society.

A certain level of international pressure and the desire to avoid embarrassment in an international arena may prompt state representatives to go along with decisions taken at international conferences. For example, Tekeli (1990) found that the more links a state has to international organizations that are sensitive to women’s equality, the more progressive policies on women it tends to devise. International organizations, though, still cannot enforce compliance. According to Oran Young (1989, p. 371), the lack of well-entrenched and properly financed supranational organizations in international society ensures that international regimes must rely heavily on the ability and willingness of individual members to elicit compliance with key provisions within their own jurisdictions. Young (1989, p. 371) goes on to say: “While trade restrictions are hard enough to verify and police, it is not easy even to imagine how to implement a regime requiring the individual members to take concrete steps to control the forces causing habituation within their jurisdictions. To propose that states make changes regarding women’s roles and status creates deeper problems than just verification and policing because issue areas that propose changes in the relationship between national states and its subjects are especially sensitive. (Krasner 1985, p. 118). As Krasner (1985, p. 11 8) points out, prevailing international norms and practices place few restrictions on a state’s discretionary control over its own subjects. My interests in this paper are the norms and rules regarding women that are formulated at the international level and the extent of compliance with these norms by national governments. I will use the Turkish response to these norms as a case study to illustrate my arguments. [=]

46070. Kardam, Nuket. International Norms, the Turkish State and Women: Part 02: International Agenda on Women and the Turkish Response. G.E. von Grunebaum Center Working Paper 5. Pamphlet. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 1991. pp. 3-6. The International Women’s Movement succeeded in bringing women on the agenda, as witnessed by the conferences held under UN auspices since the 1970’s, and by the many women’s units set up within international development agencies and within governments (Kardam, 1991 and Staudt, 1990). The nature of the International Women’s Movement is reformist. As Jacques (1981, p. 8f) indicates: While UN women’s conferences, and their mix of liberals, socialists, NIEO advocates, and others spent considerable time identifying and debating the source of women’s subordination, from male prejudice to international capitalism, their solutions are limited to practical, incremental bureaucratic reform and women’s pressure activity.” The essence of the women in international development (WID) approach was defined as ascertaining what women actually want and do within a society and providing them with the opportunities, skills, and resources to enhance that participation. The WID strategy rests on creating more rational and even-handed planning which takes into account the sex division of labor, fair returns for labor, and the equitable infusion of new opportunities and resources to all members of a given community (Staudt 1985, p. 43). The ambiguous nature of demands such as more equitable development for women exemplifies this approach; yet, it is this reformist strategy that also made it possible for governments with different ideological orientations to agree to sign the Nairobi Forward Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women at the UN Conference in 1985.

In order to assure the implementation of the “Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women” (adopted at the UN Nairobi Conference in 1985) at the national level, one of the recommendations stipulated that governments set up appropriate units to deal with women’s affairs. Appropriate machinery with sufficient resources and authority should be established at the highest level of government as a focal point to ensure that the full range of development policies and programmes in all sectors recognizes women’s contribution to development and incorporates strategies to include women and to ensure that they receive an equitable share of the benefits of development” (UN 1986, p. 33). What does this mean at the national levels Alvarez (1990, p. 274) points out that in the past, international feminist solidarity successfully brought pressure to bear on the international development establishment, indirectly pushing Third World states to open up some political space, however minimal, for the articulation of progressive gender discourses and policies. However, as the following account of the Turkish response to the stipulation will show, there is no way to understand what this means without an analysis of how gender discourses play out in the relationship between state and society. The demand for “more equitable development for women” is devoid of meaning unless it is made clear what it means for particular people and why it is defined this way.

The Turkish government introduced a bill to set up a Directorate for Women's Status and Problems in 4/1990, publicly proclaimed to be a response to and in accordance with the Nairobi Conference recommendations. In the Turkish case, the interpretation of "equitable development for women" provoked fierce battles among groups and organizations competing for social control. Women's issues had not been so fiercely disputed since the 1930s when Mustafa Kemal Attaturk established hegemony over the gender discourse in Turkey. Why is it that in the 1980s and 1990s, the seemingly innocent bill to set up a unit for women's affairs within the government created such a furor? In order to understand these events, it is necessary to link international events with the domestic context and place gender discourses within the context of state-society relations.

Before we probe these issues further, it is useful to define what is meant by the state. I will adopt the definition of the state found in Michael Bratton's work (1989): "The state is an organization within the society where it coexists and interacts with other formal and informal organizations from families to economic enterprises or religious organizations. It is, however, distinguished from the myriad of other organizations in seeking predominance over them and in aiming to institute binding rules regarding the other organizations activities". Third World states, as Migdal (1988, p. 27) points out, struggle to achieve certain goals: "the central political and social drama of recent history has been the battle pitting the state and organizations allied with it (often from a particular social class) against other social organizations dotting society's landscape. Within this context, those who make the rules acquire social control. In relatively new states, rules of the game are not necessarily agreed upon. State elites try to penetrate society, regulate social relationships, extract resources and do so with varying degrees of success. For example, the seemingly inconsequential conflict in Mustafa Kemal's Turkey over the proper hat for men was in fact about who had the right and ability (religious elites or bureaucratic elites) to make rules. State leaders do not necessarily achieve predominance for the state. The most subtle and fascinating patterns of political change and political inertia have resulted from the accommodation between states and other powerful organizations in society. Such accommodating could not have been predicted using existing models and theories of macro-level social and political change." What this perspective suggests is that political life is not simply a struggle over the allocation of resources, or the competition of interest groups, but also over the rules of the game and the underlying ideology.

The best way to understand the nature and extent of the Turkish response to the Nairobi recommendation then, is to perceive it as a battle over the rules of gender discourse between the Turkish state and society. This perspective illuminates the political discourse more effectively than do the other two prevailing approaches in comparative politics. Liberal development theory lacks the historical context, while neo-Marxist analyses, because of their focus on classes, obscure the battle over rules of the game that cut across class distinctions. [4] 46071. Kardam, Nuket. International Norms, the Turkish State and Women: Part 03: State-Society Relations. G.E. von Grunebaum Center Working Paper 5. Pamphlet. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 1991. pp. 6-8. Alvarez (1990, p. 22) suggests that rules over women's status and behavior form part of the structural and ideological grid upon which state power is based. Cagatay and Soysal (1990, p. 302) contend that those groups vying for political power offer different gender policies than the ruling groups; this is one of the major ways opposing groups distinguish themselves from the discourse of the rulers. The Turkish case illustrates both theoretical points well. From its establishment in the 1920s up to the 1980s, the Turkish state controlled the rules over what women could and could not do, and this hegemony formed one important basis of the newly formed Turkish state's power. The Turkish Civil Code outlawed polygamy, gave equal rights of divorce to both partners, and permitted child custody rights for both parents in 1926. In 1934, women were granted the vote and could be elected to political office. These policies were devised to achieve international acceptance of Turkey as a "modern" or "Western state, as well as to achieve domestic control over previously central religious elites that represented Ottoman-Islamic influences (Tekeli, 1981). As a result of the state's control over the gender discourse, and the its claim of having bestowed upon women their rights, women's organizations in the 1930s were closed, claiming that there were no meaningful demands women would make on the state since the state had already given women their rights.

The hegemony of the Turkish state over the gender discourse was not absolute however. The rights given to women were implemented across the board, and benefitted mostly the elite women. The Turkish state ignored instances of polygamy practiced by clan leaders and landowners, and the continuing high number of marriages only by religious ceremony (The law required a civil marriage ceremony in order for a marriage to be legitimate). When the secular, bureaucratic state elites had difficulty penetrating society to achieve compliance, participation, and legitimation of new gender rules, they struck a bargain with local strongmen, what Migdal (1988, p. 32) calls, a "hands-off policy that allowed the strongmen to build enclaves of social control."

While the bureaucratic elites were capable of striking a bargain with the religious elites, they were less interested in engaging in any dialogue with women's groups in society. In fact, up until the late 1970s and 1980s the women's groups in society followed Attaturk's interpretation of gender issues and expressed gratitude to the secular state for having granted them their rights. A number of reasons are cited to explain the lack of independent women's movements in the Third World. These reasons, generally related to the nature of the Third World states and societies, holds true in the case of Turkey as well. (Cagatay and Soysal, 1990). It is suggested that Third World states favor nationalist ideologies that reject class, gender and ethnic divisions, and espouse some version of unity or a "classless society where everyone works for the common good." Studies from many parts of the Third World show newly independent Third World states have co-opted emerging women's movements for the above reasons, and also as a means of dismantling the old order. (Massell 1974 and Molyneux 1981).

Bratton (1989, p. 429), writing in the state-society tradition, tells us that the conflict arises when a movement or organization tries to engage the state in a political space the state elites have already occupied and intend to hold. Since the 1980s, it has been clear that the Turkish bureaucratic secular elites are no longer able to dictate the terms of the gender discourse. They share power with elites who support religious conservatism, and who have openly begun to redefine the gender discourse along their values and beliefs. This is far beyond just allowing clansmen to build their own enclaves of social control, but an open challenge to the previously accepted definition of gender roles. Meanwhile, women's groups of various ideological persuasions have proliferated and become more vociferous. In short, in the 1980s, a rising women's movement (composed of liberal, radical, and socialist feminist orientations), as well as a strengthening of the position of religious elites, brought women's issues back on the national agenda and started questioning the legitimacy and the adaptability to modern times of "state feminism" as conceived by Mustafa Kemal Attaturk. [5] leftist ideologies were repressed, and as Marxist women became convinced that a revolution was not likely to bring about gender equality, they turned to socialist feminism. Others argue that when all political parties were closed and all groups that were perceived to be politically active were disbanded and their leaders taken into custody, space for political debate on hitherto unexplored issues opened up. It is also possible that political suppression raised the importance of informal groups to meet and discuss their issues. When Turkey returned to democracy in 1982, the new government, headed by Turgut Ozal did not feel threatened by the emerging women’s movement, partly because it allowed the government to see itself as democratic, partly because the government did not attach much importance to a few women speaking out on women’s rights, and also because the women’s groups themselves did not challenge state authority and, in fact, preferred to have minimal interaction with the state.

What were the strategies and activities of the Turkish Women’s Movement? Alvarez (1990) writes that women’s movements are deliberate attempts to push, redefine, and reconstitute the boundary between political and personal, and between natural and artificial. The movement began pushing women’s issues beyond Kemalist feminism. I use Kemalist feminism and state feminism interchangeably to mean the gender philosophy and policy established by Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, founder of modern Turkey. Tekeli (1990) suggests that one of the first strategies of women movements is to change discriminatory laws. Turkish feminists, even though they did not attempt to claim political power themselves, did try to influence government policy. Two of the civil code items that were recently revised as a direct result of feminine pressure group activity now grant women the right to work without the permission of their husbands, and give equal punishment for rape, regardless of whether or not the victim is a prostitute. Besides activities to amend discriminatory civil codes, 6000 signatures were collected and presented to the parliament demanding the implementation of the UN Declaration of Women’s Rights which Turkey had officially signed. This declaration bound its signatories to accord citizens equal rights regardless of sex. Other activities of a number of women’s groups have ranged from the publication of books, newspapers and journals, to setting up organizations such as the Association for Discrimination Against Women, The Women’s Library and Information Center Foundation, a Women’s Culture House, ‘The Mor Cat (Purple Roof)’ Foundation which assists battered women and ‘Kadinlevre’ (The Women’s Circle), a service and consultant company whose function was to evaluate the work of women, paid or unpaid, outside or within the home, to campaigns and marches to protest against battering and abuse of women, against forced virginity tests for female civil servants, and against the sexual harassment of women on the streets (Sirman, 1989). It must be emphasized that while these activities were carried out for the most part in urban areas by educated, privileged women, all of these activities were extensions of the older, more simple, gender agenda set from above through pressure “from below”.

The gender discourse that previously lay dormant now ranged from socialist feminism and radical feminism, to the proponents of the “female sphere ideology who have been called “the turbaned feminists” by the popular press. These groups differed in their ideologies, as well as their relationships with the state. Even more important, they were groups of women, not male bureaucrats who spoke on behalf of women. Their differing perceptions of gender equality is a good way to discern their varying discourses. Socialist feminists argued gender equality would come with a socialist order accompanied by the dismantling of patriarchal practices, while radical feminists draw attention to how traditions and culture perpetuated the patriarchy and relegated all women to the position of second class citizens. The “turbaned feminists” maintain that women are already equal to men albeit in their separate sphere. They argue that capitalist development with its accompanying corrupting influence have worsened the situation of women by burdening them with both waged work and housework, and by turning them into commodities. Finally, the discourse of the Kemalist feminists emphasizes the maintenance of secularism and the upholding of the rights that Attaturk gave women against the onslaught of religious conservatism.

For Tekeli (1990, pp. 7-24), this wide ideological range of the gender discourse reflects the tremendous social changes Turkey has undergone in the 1980s. According to Tekeli, a civil society has grown and matured in Turkey so that neither the state nor the civil society is predominant anymore. This is the result of the tremendous socioeconomic changes Turkey has undergone in the last decade. Urbanization has advanced to the point where half the population now lives in urban areas. Those who work in the agricultural sector are now equal in number to the workers in the industrial and service sectors. Turkish society has become more complex and at the same time, paradoxes abound. ‘Yuppies’ and tribe members rub shoulders on the streets; the influence of westernization and integration of Turkey into the world market economy clash with the need to maintain Islamic traditions; and returning immigrant workers from Europe inevitably change Turkish society as they make their reentry. According to Sirman (1989), the 1980s is a period marked by new attempts to define and regulate the social order in Turkey through efforts to redefine modes of legitimate participation within the political domain. She continues to suggest: in the process, the very identity of the individual as a Turkish citizen was being carved into question. This search for new conceptions of democracy and individuality was (and still is) a process that involved all sections of the political spectrum and is indeed conducive to the creation of new forms of political participation. This search for ‘democracy’ can perhaps best be understood as producing a new balance between the drive toward modernization and individual aspirations for social mobility that will not be unduly disruptive of the social fabric. That such a search also includes a search for female identity has been noted by many observers.

The state elites themselves compete in proposing different discourses on women. The liberal wing of the government promotes a liberal free market economy and believes that the position of women will improve as economic development proceeds. According to this discourse, women should be given equal opportunity to achieve economic independence. The main opposition party, on the other hand, believes that equal opportunity is not sufficient, and that women need to be given special attention, such as in the form of affirmative action quotas in order to remove discrimination against them. This party also proposed a ministry for women’s affairs. Meanwhile, the conservative wing of the government has introduced a discourse called “The Turkish-Islamic Synthesis”. This discourse, uncomfortable with the changes occurring in Turkish society, tries to hang on to disappearing institutions and values such as the extended family and fatalism. They claim that “industrialization, urbanization, and interaction with other cultures have harmed the Turkish family. (Ciccek, 1990, pp. 7-24). Women working outside the home have contributed to the disintegration of the family. Women are not considered separately but are called upon to reclaim their domestic roles and rebuild the traditional family. The state minister, Cemel Cecik, one of the leaders of the conservative movement, claimed feminism to be one of the major obstacles to the formation of the Turkish-Islamic family, along with the increase in premarital relations, moral degeneration caused by increased communication, and industrialism and tourism in Turkey. (Arat, 1990).

Given this wide range of discourses on women that already existed in Turkish society, how was the introduction made in the Parliament to set up a Directorate of Women’s Status and Problems in accordance with the Nairobi Conference? The following account shows that it highlighted both existing disputes and the lack of genuine communication between the state and groups within society. At the same time, the events that followed the introduction of the bill make it clear that Turkish state society relations have taken on a much more complex and open character, as compared to 50 years ago. [=] issue as reflected in the number of public meetings, announcements and newspaper articles has been extraordinary. The revised bill finally became law on 10/15/1990, after a number of changes and an 8-hour debate in the National Assembly.

Before the analysis of the response to this bill, let me point out what it proposed to do. This bill would establish a directorate under the auspices of the prime ministry that would define the status of women in social and economic life and offer solutions to what are regarded as women’s problems. The directorate will work “to increase women’s level of education, to increase their economic participation in agricultural, industrial, and service sectors, to increase women’s security in the health, social and legal arena, to improve women’s status and to establish their deserved status as equals in social, economic, cultural and political arenas” (The Turkish Official Gazette, 4/20/1990).

Introduced by the only woman on the cabinet, İmren Aykut, then Minister of Labor and Social Welfare, it reflects the Nairobi recommendations as well as the liberal, free-market philosophy of the Özal government. Aykut, as a member of the liberal wing of the cabinet, believes in the preservation of Kemalist feminism and believes that increased opportunities for women and their integration into the development process will serve the general goal of a free-market oriented economic growth. The following points on the bill bear witness to this view: the Economic and Social Affairs Unit of the Directorate has the responsibility to a) make sure that women participate in all decision mechanisms so that they may be integrated into social life and contribute to development b) increase employment opportunities for women to ensure economic independence c) ensure women’s training and education so that they may compete for jobs in a free market economy and d) consider women in all social, economic and political decisions so that they may be fully integrated into the development process. The above arguments are the same ones made in international forums to change the norms and principles governing women’s role in developing societies.

Liberal feminism conforms to the ideals of a free market economy and political arenas” (The Turkish Official Gazette, 4/20/1990). The opposition to the bill did not stem from the general content of the bill (even though questions were raised about the ambitious nature of the goals), but rather from the use of certain words that evoked religious conservatism, and procedures that implied control of rather than cooperation with women’s groups. The items listed below were strongly criticized by women’s groups and opposition parties (The Turkish official Gazette, 10/15/1990):

- To promote cooperation and coordination among institutions who work in the area of women’s affairs, to regulate and support the activities of independent women’s associations, to observe all activities of local administrations related to women.
- To engage in appropriate activities to protect women’s status, and to prepare principles, policies and programs to solve women’s problems.
- To acquire knowledge on the activities and research of the women’s studies units of universities.
- To direct the activities of voluntary women’s associations in accordance with the national viewpoint to be formulated.

Women’s groups protested the bill’s intent to regulate the activities of women’s associations. As the English language newspaper, Dateline observed: “Several women’s associations, among them the Turkish Women Lawyers’ Association, the Association for the Promotion of Contemporary Life, the Istanbul University Center for Research into Women’s Problems, the Turkish Women’s Union, the Soroptimist Clubs Federation, and the Turkish Women’s Council issued a press release in which they objected to the decree in its present form and proposed amendments. The women’s associations objected to what Gultekin Batik, Chairwoman of the Turkish Women’s Union (Istanbul Branch) called the government’s intention to control the activities of the independent women’s associations. (Dateline, 10/15/1990).

University professors protested the bill’s intent to acquire information about all activities and research on women, claiming that this is a violation of their academic freedom.

The phrase “national viewpoint” that appears on the bill created even more outcry. In Turkey, “national viewpoint” connotes a conservative perspective as it was a slogan used by a rightist, religious party, and it is widely known to represent a conservative, religious perspective. This slogan, coupled with the public knowledge that Mehmet Keceri, one of the conservative state ministers on the cabinet, was involved in the drafting of the bill raised doubts about its liberal goals. Meanwhile, State Minister, Cemil Cevik contributed to the furor by publicly declaring the following (Dateline, 11/17/1990): “Flirting is nothing different from prostitution. Flirting, and pre-marital relationships are human beings’ rapprochement with animal instincts. According to law 41 of the Constitution, the Turkish family structure is to be preserved. This was not just a natural obligation after 1982, as it became a social obligation...Industrialism, urbanization and interaction with other cultures brought along social changes. It was the family which was harmed by these changes. We are an old nation, a family nation. At first, the family was confronted by mass communication. Satellites enabled us to watch the world’s television programs. A lot of tourists visit Turkey, and they have a certain influence on the Turkish people which is hardly positive. Family values change. Instead of taking the developments of science and technology, we are imitating the degenerated values of the West.”

Women’s groups have vehemently objected to these claims. One of the leaders called Cicek’s views “unacceptable”. She said: “They are trying to put women behind bars. There are human rights in Turkey with equality of women and men.” A member of the main opposition party, the Social Democratic Populist Party, claimed: It is useless to try to revive the model of traditional Moslem Turkish women; it is like making rivers flow upstream (Dateline, 11/17/1990): What does national viewpoint mean? As I understand it, national viewpoint has been articulated by Erbakan for 20 years [Erbakan is the leader of the religious conservative party], is this Erbakan’s national viewpoint? If it is not, since it represents a particular political party’s perspective, what is it? Does national viewpoint mean the traditional Turkish family structure where women sit at home, do not work and look after their children? Whose national viewpoint is this?

While the bill to set up a directorate articulated liberal solutions to women’s problems, conservative policies on women were being voiced by the same government. For example, a report of the Commission on the Turkish Family Structure, prepared as a reference document for the Sixth Five Year Development Plan indicates that (The Turkish Family Structure, 1989): “Turkish television should emphasize national programs. In music, literature, and folklore, the Turkish culture should be promoted and a Moslem-Turkish personality should be created.” According to this report, the Turkish family structure has been disintegrating as a result of rapid cultural changes and the roles of men and women in the family have begun to change. However, the report continues, in the Moslem-Turkish family, the father has a sacred role and women are reverred as mothers. This report implies that the disintegration of the Turkish family structure is partly due to women working outside the home and proposed ways for women to work in cottage industries in the home. One of the conservative state ministers, Cemil Cicek, heads the new Family Research Institute, established in 1989 and has been entrusted with formulating a national policy on the family.

The discussions revolving around the bill culminated in a revised version which became law on 10/15/1990 (The Turkish Official Gazette, 10/28/1990). The following revisions regarding the responsibilities of the Directorate were made:

1. Instead of “To engage in appropriate activities to protect women’s status and to prepare principles, policies and programs to solve women’s problems,” the revised version reads: “To engage in appropriate activities to protect and improve women’s status and to prepare principles, policies and programs in accordance with Atatürk’s reforms”.

2. Instead of “To acquire knowledge on the activities and research of women’s units in universities, the revised version reads: “To use the research and publications produced by women's units in universities.

3. Instead of To direct the activities of voluntary women's associations in accordance with the national viewpoint to be formulated, the revised version is: "To provide information to voluntary women's associations who are members of international organizations on national values as reflected in Atatürk's principles and reforms.

4. Instead of "To promote cooperation and coordination among institutions in the area of women's affairs, to regulate and support the activities of independent women's associations, to observe all activities of local administrations related to women", the revised version is: "To promote cooperation and coordination among institutions who work in the area of women's affairs, to request information from them, to support the activities of independent women's organizations and to observe all activities of local administrations related to women".

The revisions respond to most criticisms by giving up the phrase regulating women's organizations and national viewpoint and guarantees adherence to Atatürk's gender discourse calming the fears of Kemalist feminists that their rights are in jeopardy. The unit is no longer called a directorate but was set up under the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare as a department. It is now structurally located within a state ministry headed by the previous Minister of Labor and Social Welfare, presumably because she is the only woman on the cabinet. At this time, it is too early to evaluate this unit's effectiveness; however, the process that led to its establishment yields some important insights about domestic compliance with international norms. [=]

46074. Kardam, Nuket. International Norms, the Turkish State and Women: Part 06: Conclusions. G.E. von Grunebaum Center Working Paper 5. Pamphlet Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 1991. pp. 19-23. In the 1930s, the implementation of gender policy by a secular bureaucratic elite that brought Turkish women a Western woman's status served not only as a demonstration to the international community that Turkey was becoming a "Western" nation, but also to establish control of gender role definitions within Turkish society. The wish of the state elites to appear "modern" to the international community coincided with their wish to define gender roles in their own terms (as one way to establish dominance over society). In one sense, what we see in the 1980s and 1990s is rather similar: A bill to set up a women's bureau is prepared to impress the international community and to show that Turkey abides by the international norms on women, but the vague statement of norms; that women receive an equitable share of development necessary to elicit international agreement, also leave both the content and the process of implementation open to discussion. Given the nature of state society relations in Turkey in the 1980s, the Turkish state could no longer pass a bill quietly to abide by international pressure. Furthermore, the Turkish state no longer could impose one gender discourse on Turkish society because different gender discourses were being discussed and debated with no overall agreement in sight.

This dispute has to be analyzed and understood within the context of the 1980's Turkey. Competing state elites voiced contradictory gender discourses. More importantly, within the same government, one sees contradictory gender discourses. The liberal wing promotes the integration of women into a liberal capitalist economy and, therefore there is an interest in preserving Atatürk's gender policies. The conservative wing, on the other hand, espouses patriarchal policies, and women's return to the home, in an attempt to roll back the impending change that accompanies capitalist development. Meanwhile, Turkish society has become much more complex: varied, and democratically oriented. Although a women's movement has arisen, different feminist groups are at odds with each other; moreover, they are distrustful and fearful of the state and especially of the potential move away from secularism.

Given this context, it is not hard to imagine how the introduction of a bill ostensibly to implement an international recommendation could serve as a lightning rod and become the focal point of the battle between secularism and religious conservatism that had been brewing for a long time. The introduction of the bill also highlighted the complexity of civil society and the growth of disparate voices within society. Finally, it showed the narrowed but still present chasm between the Turkish state and society that at times prevents communication. In the case of gender issues, state and society relations still require time to achieve genuine communication and interaction.

The original version of the bill didn't help to build trust between the state and women's groups because the top-down approach that permeated the bill reflected an attitude that is used to deliver services to goods, to regulate and support the activities of independent women's associations, to observe all activities of local administrations related to women. Notwithstanding the fact that the bill was introduced by the only woman minister on the Turkish cabinet, Imren Aykut, a self-professed Kemalist feminist, and alleged to be on the liberal wing of the Turkish cabinet, it was ironic and unfortunate that it was opposed by most women's groups. Even though she personally had been popular, her government has not. (Only 20% of the people claim they will vote for ANAP in the coming elections.) The increasing influence of the conservative wing in her government grew fear and suspicion that she alone would not be able to withstand the increased influence of the conservative wing of her government. Furthermore, some women would presumably find unacceptable whatever policy she introduces because they happen to support other political parties. All these arguments contributed to the opposition to the bill whose professed public raison d'être was to implement the recommendations of the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies.

The presumed power or the religious conservatives in government, along with a lack of clear lines of communication between the government and women's groups moved the debate away from the bill itself into the much larger debate of secularism versus religious conservatism. The docile and quiet associations of women professionals were threatened by the wording of the bill that promised to "regulate" independent women's associations, in accordance with a "national viewpoint" which was yet to be formulated. This was especially true given the increasing influence of the conservative Wing of ANAP on government policy and in the light of the activities and public statements of the newly established "Family Research Institute" headed by Cemil Cicek, a conservative minister. The reports by the Family Research Institute alarmed most women's groups because they claimed that the Turkish family is disintegrating and becoming corrupt as a result of Western influences and as a result of women's employment outside the home. Many professional women's associations were motivated to protest the bill establishing a women's directorate partly because they realized that the rights given to them by Atatürk could no longer be taken for granted, and partly because of pressure on them to act exerted by socialist and radical feminists. They joined hands with these feminists to protest discriminatory civil codes and the barring of women and allied themselves with leftist opposition parties who promised to preserve secularism but are still not open to the democratic participation of women within their own ranks. Meanwhile, radical and socialist feminists remain distrustful of the state, preferring to work within the society to change cultural norms and practices that discriminate against women.

In short, the bill to implement the Nairobi recommendations in Turkey illustrated what compliance with international norms really means in a specific domestic context. On the surface, Turkey set up a women's unit within the government, but what does this really mean? Perhaps, compliance should not be understood in strict terms, but in the way international norms spark, provoke and change domestic debate in a particular issue area. The Turkish bill provoked and fueled the discussion of appropriate gender roles, as well as appropriate relations between the state and groups in society and highlighted that a great deal of disagreement exists regarding these issues. Looking at the Turkish case, it is apparent that the nature and extent of compliance with international norms and recommendations cannot be understood without an analysis of the existing debates in a country against the background of state-society relationships. [=] would have cost millions of dollars to repair). Television, the institution authorized to check TVs and radios) for the Turkey Point Nuclear Power Plant (there the safety concerns raised by Lambda Istanbul, we protest RTUK (High Committee of Radio and Television) for disregarding them.

Refused psychiatric counselling after raising safety concerns at the nuclear power plant, Kerber, Ross. "Was Therapy Used To Punish Nuclear Workers? A Nuclear Plant Engineer Who Raised Safety Issues and Was Subsequently Ordered To Undergo Psychological Testing Said, 'In Certain Societies, Psychiatry Is Used To Curb Dissent; I Think This Is What Is Occurring Here'" in Wall Street Journal, March 20, 1996, p. B1. B9. When security engineer Glenda Kay Miller questioned the reliability of a proposed security system at TVA's Browns Ferry Nuclear Plant near Decatur, Alabama, she was sent to company psychologists. After confrontational interrogations by company psychologists, she was fired as 'unfit for duty' and was portrayed as a 'terrorist'. Her complaint is pending.

The week is planned to include the following: An Igbo film festival (Possibly at Beyoglu and Alkazar cinemas on Istiklal Caddesi, Taksim, Istanbul); Seminars and panels; Gay/lesbian sections in bookstores around Istiklal Caddesi, Taksim; AIDS stands, delivery of condoms and lubricants; Sale of posters, badges, t-shirts, etc.; A dance party for the benefit of AIDS prevention; A weekend excursion into the countryside.

Contact address: Ekspres GL, Tarlabasi Bulvari 60, Taksim, Istanbul. Tel/Fax: +90 (212) 256-1150. Meet organizers at the bar 5. Kat, BILSAK, Taksim Ilkyardim Hastanesi, karsisi, Istanbul, Tel: +90 (212) 293-3774. [=]

Lambda Istanbul. Press Release: Lambda Istanbul Organization Description & Contact. Lambda Istanbul Homepage, N.D. Lambda Istanbul is a liberal group for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered people in Turkey. It has a stable membership of around 100.

Lambda, Istanbul is the largest queer liberation group in Turkey. It was formed by a small number of gays and lesbians as a result of a police ban on Christopher Street Day celebrations in 1993. Since then, Lambda, Istanbul has grown in membership and aims to raise its voice on behalf of the gay communities in Istanbul.

Homosexuality is not a criminal offence in Turkey, but some articles of the highly flexible police regulations can be used very easily to ban meetings and demonstrations on so-called public morality grounds. In 1995 and 1996 Lambda, Istanbul planned activity weeks which would have included gay and lesbian themed films, panels discussions, and exhibitions. On both occasions, they were banned by the police and the Governor of Istanbul, who claimed they were against public morals. The organizing committee was advised by police not to make any further attempts as the Turkish society was not yet ready for the visibility of homosexuality!

Despite this pressure and opposition, we are still carrying out our projects:

Our eighth issue of our bi-monthly magazine is out in 6/1997, it is available in alternative bookstores in Istanbul and in Ankara.

We are on air with a weekly one hour GL radio program on Acik Radio since May 1996. It is the first GL program in Turkey's history and has enabled us to reach a greater number of people.

In collaboration with the AIDS Prevention Society in Turkey we have prepared the first Safe Sex brochure addressing gay men. The current objective of the AIDS Prevention subgroup of the group is to increase the availability of water-based lubricants as well as safe condoms. A safe sex hot-line project is in process as well.

Despite the serious work we do, we are all volunteers, who come together determined to keep on working against our society's prejudices, homophobia and Turkey's anti-democratic law and regulations.

You can contact Lambda Istanbul at: PK 103 Goztepe, Istanbul Turkey, Fax: +90 212 224-3792 (Talk first to ask for connection to fax). [=]

Lambda Istanbul. Press Release: Turkish Parliament Outed. Lambda Istanbul (P K 103, Goztepe, Istanbul TURKEY), December, 1996. On the November 7th, it was announced that gay members of Turkish parliament would be declared on a TV channel called "Kanal 6". Although gay deputies were not individually outed, it was claimed that parliament has gay members.

After this declaration "Kanal 6"'s broadcast was suspended for 24 hours. The reason was that claiming the parliament has gay members was declared as an insult to the Parliament of Turkish Republic.

The issue is that the word "homosexual" is taken as an insult. As Lambda Istanbul, we protest RTUK (High Committee of Radio and Television, the institution authorized to check TV's and radios) for the... decision. And we invite all the gays around the world to protest this humiliating action. Fax number of RTUK is 90-312-2320474 and its president is Ali Baransel.

Thank you for all your support. [Lambda.Istanbul, P.K 103, Goztepe, Istanbul TURKEY.] [=]

46080. Lambda Istanbul. Press Release: UPDATE: Report by Lambda Istanbul, on Ulker Sokak, Lambda Istanbul (P.K 103, Goztepe, Istanbul TURKEY), December 18, 1996. The harassment and the pressure against the transvestite (TS) and transexual (TV) community has always been present in Turkey, but for the last 12 months the intensity and the frequency of it has been increasing.

A 65-year old woman has moved to the Ulker Street a year ago, called Ms. Gungor (Guengoer), has been provoking all actions against TV/TS community. She has big support from the police and extremist right wing party members or organizations; radical Islamists and Nationalists.

For the couple of first months she was very friendly to and with the girls who have been living in the area for more than 20 years. She has bought some flats for very cheap prices and rented them to the girls with the normal rates. After a while she started to demand enormous amounts like increasing the rents from 20 million to 100 million TL. The girls refused to pay these rates as it is stated in the contract law that the owners are only permitted to increase the rent 60% maximum. This is the point where everything started to go down for the girls.

She has initiated a campaign of “cleaning operation”. She with her neighbours placed a desk to the street with patrols in charge to control the area day and night. She covered her head to gain support from extremist Islamists and from their organizations. She was not satisfied with the results. A few months ago she started a campaign of labelling called “Hang a Turkish Flag if you are not homosexual”. She aimed to gain support from the extremist Nationalists and she did. The organizations called “Ulku (Uelkue) Oçakları”, the youth branches of extremist right wing party MHP, took part on her side. They joined the harassment process with the premise that the homosexuals are not excepted as Turkish. They don’t belong to the race since they represent a lower form of human beings. This was told to a university student who was making a market research for an assignment.

One of the biggest support came from Mr. Suleyman (Suyeleym) Ulusoy who was chief of the Beyoglu Police Department until 1991. He came back to duty just before UN Human Settlement Conference, Habitat II. Not only he fights against homosexuals but against street children, street peddlers and gypsies as well.

Before the above mentioned conference, the police warned the TV/TS community to leave the conference area. Mr. Demet Demir and other TV/TS started several petitions but couldn’t get any response neither. Moreover, another four houses has been set on fire since, in another district of Beyoglu, but nobody applied for any legal action since they were scared and they knew through the previous example that their attempts would have been futile even if they had tried. İlhami Kaya is another TV who lives in the street who has a similar experience in which the windows of her house smashed down with stones thrown. Ms. Demet Demir’s front door has been broken for 3 times and the telephone cables were cut to prevent her from informing the solicitors and/or the press.

At this point I feel the urge to state that homosexuality is not illegal in Turkey. There is no law in force in the constitution against homosexual acts. On the other hand, torture is illegal. The current situation is ironically ridiculous when these points are highlighted. Though this is the case, Ms. Demet Demir got a criminal record which states illegal demonstration. She stayed in the jail for 8 months. After 10 years all criminal records are normally deleted. Her record still exists after 14 years to everybody’s surprise.

The police are breaking the doors with hammers and axes, forcing their way in to the houses to cause the most damage that they can. At times if they find occupancy in the house they take the person to the station to keep them under detention. A person can be kept under detention only for 48 hours the most. The police’s practical solution for this is to transfer the person to another station so that they can keep somebody for more than a week if they want to do so. The police raid the houses and the clubs to arrest. You show your ID but it is not sufficient enough. There are lots of means to an arrest in Turkey and the police forces are well prepared to teach you these means.

TV/TS community are continuously accused of prostitution and raping young boys. They are seen as potential criminals. In the year 1994 and 1995, just before the World AIDS Day the clubs were raided to bash the TV/TSs since they are believed to be the cause for AIDS. This is a very vicious cycle. Since they are seen as potential danger, criminal and always as immoral they are forced out of the society. They don’t have any means to live properly. They end up on the streets as prostitutes as this is the only thing they are permitted. If they can do this it means that there is demand as well. Then everybody becomes ethical activists when it is time to blame them, but they never talk about whom they slept with the night before.

The current situation is that the TV/TS community in this area is reduced to 7 from 70. They are left with only one solution as a consequence: to move. The clean water supplier on the street was closed down with the reason that it didn’t have any license. You start to ask how it was permitted in the first place then. The newsagent was closed down with threats as well. The hair-dresser was closed down because it was, allegedly, used as a whorehouse. All these closing downs were done by the local council of Beyoglu. Any clever person can not deny the question: “Were these places closed down because they were serving to the TV/TS community living in the area?”.

Everything that is going on around the street has to be done in secret as a result. For example, during Habitat Conference a foreign TV channel was having an interview with Ms. Demet Demir in her house. It is at this point the police broke into her house. The reporter hid the tapes and cameras otherwise they would have been taken away. Police was so determined to take them to the station but couldn’t have done it because Mr. Turgul Erbaydar from AIDS Prevention Society told this group of policemen that they were having a meeting about AIDS.

In the beginning of December one of the transexuals named Ece was beaten up by the police because she couldn’t manage to be secret enough. Although she has a house in the street she can not live there. She comes in secret to feed her dog. The last time her neighbour heard her coming and phoned the police. She was caught in her apartment. She was beaten up first in the street and then in the police station. She was beaten up so badly that her legs was bruised even after a week.

Mr. Suleyman Ulusoy has a nickname which is “Hose Suleyman”. He likes to beat, especially to the head, with plastic hose pipes and this is where his nickname comes from. There are several files in the Human Rights Association regarding these tortures. Cutting the hair, pumping pressurized cold water, beating bulllocks are the most common of these tortures in the police stations.[=] important as it is that woman should be emancipated from her status as man’s “property”, with such possessions as she has legally the property of the man she marries—as in France to-day—important as are Marriage Bills for easier divorce, and a more rational attitude to marriage—generally, important as are all these things which are obtainable within the existing system, certain vital aspects of women’s freedom are only possible in the classless society which is the socialist ideal. Reforms of one kind or another may do much to make marriage easier and happier, but woman’s real need is for moral revolution in the society in which she lives, and you cannot get oral revolution by reformist methods; to achieve that the whole of the existing form of society must be smashed and something new fashioned nearer to the heart’s desire. The existing moral code is part and parcel of the social system, that is to say, it is determined by the controlling forces of religion, education, and economic factors. Moral training comes to us via the Church and the School; one of the first things social revolution throws overboard is religious tyranny—as in the Russian Revolution of 1917, and the Spanish revolution of 1936—and a new interpretation is given to education, consistent with the new demands and ideals of the new society. The Great War, as we have seen, represented something in the nature of a moral revolution as far as women were concerned, so that not merely were they given the freedom of commerce, industry, the professions, for the first time, but something approaching sexual freedom which had hitherto been a male prerogative. We have seen, too, the freedom given women by the undermining of the power of the Church in the French Revolution and by the defiance of religious edicts in Turkey, when Mustafa Kemal separated religion and education, and “unveiled” the women. We have seen how the moral as well as the social emancipation of women has marched side by side with revolutionary movements in Ireland, China, India, Palestine. Especially in the case of Russia and Spain—both backward countries—has this moral emancipation been noticeable as a direct outcome of the Revolution, the new dignity and sense of responsibility, and of a place in society co-equal with man; in Spain freedom from the power of the priests might be said to have given women a new lease of life, restored, as it were, their souls into their own keeping. Moral freedom—in the broadest sense—is always only possible when human beings are freed from the tyranny of religious orthodoxy.

The teachings of Christ and what to-day passes or Christianity—and which is in fact Paulianity—are not all the same thing; Christ preached Life, Love, Kindness, Forgiveness, toleration of human failings; what we call Christianity, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant or any other brand, is anti-life; it preaches fear, and intolerance, and hate. (Are not the clergy the first to support the imperialist wars of their own countries as right and just?) One of Christ’s friends was a prostitute, and he consorted with publicans and sinners, and chose his disciples from humble working-folk. What to-day passes for Christianity frowns upon sex except as a means of reproduction, is puritanical about the pleasures of the flesh, and patronizes the poor. It teaches human beings to be ashamed of their bodies (supposed to be made in God’s image) and to regard sexual relations as something shameful and unclean; it demands that before men and women obey their natural impulses towards each other they take out a licence permitting them to sleep together; this licence is called a marriage certificate, and costs the same as a dog licence and rather less than a radio licence. And having insisted that Christian men and women shall refrain from sexual relations until they have obtained a marriage certificate, so that their sleeping together is sanctioned by both the Law and the Church, they make masturbation, the natural substitute for the sex act, a sin, filling human beings with fear and a torturing shame concerning it, whilst homosexuality is made a criminal offence. Men and women are required to marry without having the slightest idea as to whether they will suit each other either physically or spiritually—how is it possible to have any idea as to whether without having lived together first, to get to know each other’s bodies and minds and human habits? It is like buying a pair of shoes without trying them on, but whereas with a pair of shoes that pinch you can take them back to the shop and exchange them for something more comfortable, the Church demands that having taken on a marriage partner in the same way, you must keep to your bargain, and if there is any “pinch” you must put up with it, even though it may in the end destroy your body and cripple your soul. Men and women who cannot find permanent partners are expected to live celibately, for sex without marriage is a “sin”, a deadly sin. Better human beings should become neurotic and grow sour and bitter and perverted through frustration than that they should contravene the law of the “Christian” church. Christianity is not concerned with human beings being happy, only with them being “good”—that is to say, conforming to the anti-life edicts of Christ. The same applies to divorce. It never occurs to your orthodox Christian that if human beings can be made happy they will be good, and that this applies to grown-ups and children alike.

So Christian marriage is as pitiless as only stupidity can be; the Roman Catholic Church does not permit of divorce at all, under any circumstances (a husband may be physically cruel to his wife, may give her venereal disease, be consistently unfaithful to her, be a lunatic, but the Roman Catholicwife is expected to remain tied to him for life, however much happiness with someone else may beckon to her; she is not free to marry someone who would make her happy, and to live with him or have relations with him without marriage is a “sin”), and the rest of Christianity tolerates a clumsy and stupid machinery of divorce, regarding as immoral the idea of divorce by mutual consent. In Christian divorce to-day there must always be one unwilling party; if both partners agree that a divorce would be a good thing, that constitutes “connivance” and cannot be tolerated. In England after a divorce has been granted the person who sued for the divorce is required to live celibately for six months, however ardently he or she may be in love with someone whom, perhaps, it is intended to marry as soon as the decree is made “absolute”. Any lapse from this half a year of unnatural existence is sufficient to cause the divorce to be cancelled. Until the passing of Mr. A. P. Herbert’s new divorce bill (1937) to which Lord Drogheda added the clause enabling a petitioner to secure a divorce for three years of desertion, one person deserting another for a period of years, though it rendered the marriage null and void, was not considered to do so, and was not grounds for divorce—unless something called, unpleasantly, “restitution of conjugal rights” was sued for and failed to bring back the errant partner. The very idea of conjugal “rights” is an indictment of the existing marriage system, and again, the deserted partner of a marriage may not want these “rights” restored; such a thing might well be the last thing in the world he or she desires, all that is wanted being the solution of the unhappy marriage. But Christian morality seeks to make divorce as difficult as possible, and frowns upon divorcees; have we not just seen the attitude of the bishops to a king who dared to assert himself as a man and insist on marrying the woman of his choice, who happened to have been married previously; we have seen how the Church brought pressure to bear on the abdication of that king, and how, having forced him out of office, they denied him the Church’s blessing on his new marriage, though with more courage and imaginative sympathy and tolerance than his fellows defied the authority of the Church and in defiance of the bishops performed the marriage service. A. S. Neill, the great educationist and psychologist, says that the Devil is “the obverse side of the God coin; he is God made human—and lovable.... The glad side of life belongs to the devil—the dancing, singing love side of life. Christianity in its perversion of Christ’s message has changed God into the devil.... Calvinism worships the Devil, only it calls him God”. [In: Is Scotland Educated? (Routledge, 1936).]

At the end of the nineteenth century, the great American free-thinker, Robert Green Ingersoll, wrote “A Thanksgiving Sermon” in which, before thanking those who have enriched the world, he inquires, “What has the Church done?” He denounced it as being opposed to “the pleasures of sense, the ecstasies of love”, as making women slaves to their husbands, the property of their husbands, as teaching that “a nun is purer, nobler than a mother”, as inducing “millions of pure and conscientious girls to renounce the joys of life, to take the veil woven of night and death, to wear the habiliments of the dead”, in the belief that they were the brides of Christ, “a man who had been dead for eighteen hundred years”. He sums the so-called Christians up as “loving with their mouths, and hating with their hearts”. [This is collected in a selection of the Lectures and Essays, published by Watts and Co., 1913.]

It is upon this hate—hated of the flesh and glorification of the spirit—that the Church establishes its moral code. What chance of freedom can there be within such a code, anti-life, rooted in fear and hate? The Roman Catholic Church even forbids women birth-control, giving them no choice between more pregnancies than they can physically and very often economically support, and an abnormal life of continence, which can only be productive of nerve-strain, ill-health, neurosis, and unhappiness, for themselves and their husbands, and strike at the very foundations of married happiness. Apart from its restrictions on human freedom and happiness in the lives of individuals, the Church has always been bound up with political intrigue, associated with the ambitions of princes and the horrors of war, and right up to the present day and the Abcication of Edward VIII we have seen its power. Social revolution does not demand that those who wish to worship an orthodox God in the orthodox way, in the Church, shall not be allowed to do so (all over Russia to-day churches which still "function", as the Russians say, are to be found, and people worshipping in them without interference) but of its very nature it does not permit of "the Church", as an institution, with power in State affairs and authority to dictate a moral code. When the moral dictatorship of the Church is abolished, as always in social revolution, and as it will be in the revolution to come, consider the vast contribution that will be made to human freedom and happiness, especially where women are concerned! Nor let that fine word freedom be confused with licence. No revolutionist advocates anything as stupid and unsatisfactory as sexual promiscuity for its own sake, nor is there any reason to suppose that human beings are so depraved that when sexual intercourse outside of marriage is no longer regarded as immoral, fastidiousness, restraint, and fidelity, will promptly cease to exist. It is a common belief that morals are very "loose" in the USSR since there are no moral taboos on "illicit" love; in actual fact sexual promiscuity is frowned upon, and always has been. In a conversation with the late Klara Zetkin, Lenin disposed of the sex-as-simple-and-unimportant-as-drinking-a-glass-of-water theory as "completely un-Marxist, and moreover, anti-social". He insisted that in love two lives are concerned, and that a third arises, and that it "is that which gives it its social interest, which gives rise to a duty towards the community". He had no patience with sexual preoccupation, and regarded dissoluteness in sexual life as bourgeois, decadent, as "a phenomenon of decay", and all such questions of morality, marriage, sexual relationships, the family, as an integral part of the woman question. He protested against "the decay, the corruption, the filth in bourgeois marriage, with its difficult divorce, its freedom for the man, its enslavement for the woman", and declared that "the repulsive hypocrisy of sexual morality and relations fills the most active-minded and best people with deep disgust". [Reminiscences of Lenin, by Klara Zetkin (Modern Books, Ltd., 1929).] [s]

46082. Marcus, Amy Dockser. "Palestinian Workers Pushed Aside In Israel By Asians and Europeans", in Wall Street Journal, April 25, 1995. p. A17. Closing the border of the West Bank and Gaza Strip to exclude Palestinians from their workplaces has led Israel to find replacements in Thailand, Ghana, Turkey and Rumania. Some 70000 temporary expatriate workers have been brought into Israel to create an apolitical workforce that can be deported at will and can permanently displace Palestinians from even the menial occupations to which they are restricted. Most of the foreign workers are men who arrive without relatives, and they have created slums and created a demand for prostitution; many have fallen prey to alcoholism, even as they are cheated out of their wages and are paid less than minimum wages. For Palestinians, this new Israeli measure has been a catastrophe, with 60% unemployment, $1 million per day in lost wages. Many Palestinians argue that the Israeli moves to destroy the Palestinian economy by bringing in the expatriates will destroy any meaningful progress toward peace. Most Thai expatriate workers are eager for the work, and have no clear idea of where they are or the political context of their work.

46083. Massell, Gregory J. The Surrogate Proletariat: Moslem Women and Revolutionary Strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1919-1929: Part 05: Early Soviet Actions, 1924-1927: Toward a Strategy of Engineered Revolution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1974. pp. 185-191. The complex set of justifications for mobilizing women as a Soviet revolutionary stratum in Central Asia was necessary both to justify the unorthodox methods to the broader Soviet policy-making community, as well as to justify what was, in the eyes of traditional Central Asian patriarchal-feudal society, the most illegitimate possible course of social reforms. It was this environment that led the Soviet leaders in Central Asia to adopt a policy of social insurgency in the region in order to extend the effective power of the central government from urban hubs to the vast rural hinterlands. This extreme policy was seen necessary to implement a "psychological and organizational revolution at the nerve centers or a relatively intact social order."

Soviet social engineering developed three methods of implementation: 'revolutionary legalism' (revoluzionnoia zakonnost), 'administrative assault' (administrativnyi naskos), and "systematic social engineering" (sistematscheskaia rabota, 'systematic work'). Revolutionary legalism relied on the superimposition of a new judicial system for the routinization of revolutionary norms in traditional society; supplanting traditional adjudicative institutions allowed the systematic application of revolutionary principles throughout a society (operating in the intermediate term, sought retention of power and incremental change, emphasized avoided risks, was normative, focused on the provision or rights, initiated social mobilization by legislation, expected basis of mass-response through adherence to rules, emphasized consolidation of commitment through prescription, and expected breakdown of the old order through reform). Administrative assault relied on the replacement of traditional institutions and involved massive, public and dramatic violations of traditional taboos (with women, induced mass unemployment and reinforced sexual desegregation on the streets) (operating in the short-term, sought cataclysmic revolutionary overturn, emphasizing immediate payoffs irrespective of risks, was dogmatic, focused on violation of traditional taboos, initiating social mobilization by command and conscription, expected basis of mass response through outrage and obedience, emphasized consolidation of commitment through conversion, and expected breakdown of the old order by destruction).

Systematic Social Engineering called for systematic evaluation, exploitation and coordination of diverse courses of action: legal, associational, cultural and economic, recognizing the short-comings of revolutionary legalism and administrative assault (operating in the long-term, sought institutionalized social revolution, emphasized balancing payoffs and risks, was instrumental, focused on redefinition of roles and opportunities, initiating social mobilization by involvement, expected basis of mass response through self-interest and achievement, emphasized consolidation of commitment through socialization, and expected breakdown of the old order by subversion and atrophy). Soviet policy developer Cera Azar developed a hesitant, trial-and-error progression from Revolutionary Legalism (1924-1928), to Administrative Assault (1927-1929), to Systematic Social Engineering (1929-present).

46084. Massell, Gregory J. The Surrogate Proletariat: Moslem Women and Revolutionary Strategies in Soviet Central Asia, 1919-1929: Part 06: Early Soviet Actions, 1924-1927: Towards Radical Judicial Reform: The Pattern of Revolutionary Legalism. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1974, pp. 192-212. The Soviet program to displace Muslim adjudicative institutions was based on the desire to attain complete homogeneity of state legal and administrative mechanisms, and was based on the need to accelerate disintegration of traditional patriarchal structures by judicial activism implementing a strict legalistic consistency. Initially, the establishment of the new Soviet legal system was expected to necessarily impose new legal norms simply because they embodied the law. In 1925 the First Congress of the Uzbek People with deep disgust". [Reminiscences of Lenin, by Klara Zetkin (Modern Books, Ltd., 1929).] [s] customary tribunals, and their replacement by Soviet secular, uniform, centralized, bureaucratic and hierarchical courts, (2) decreed abolition of religious and customary law (especially relating to personal status and family matters) and replacement with a secular, egalitarian, uniform and written code of statutory laws. In 1918-1927, traditional courts were progressively undercut by growing competition by Soviet courts, by reduction in budgets (budgets set at zero in late 1923 to early 1924), by influx of judicial personnel, and by delimitation and successive amputation of judicial jurisdiction (traditional courts losing right to levy fines in criminal cases in 1923; losing all jurisdiction in criminal cases in 2/1924; losing civil jurisdiction in cases above 25 rubles; and abolition of kalyam, polygamy and forced marriage in 10/1924). In 10/1926, a new code on domestic relations invalidated all religious authority in marriage, culminating the Soviet drive for a secular, uniform code of statutory laws in family, personal status and criminal matters that would both support revolutionary norms and that would be able to address ‘crimes based on custom’. Nevertheless, while the Uzbek criminal code of 7/1926 banned traditional forms of marriage, the Turkmen code merely granted kalyam payers the right to sue payees for return of the bride-price. In 4/1928, the unified code, ‘On Crimes Constituting the Relics of the Tribal Order’, was implemented as a special supplement (Chapter X) to the RSFSR Criminal Code; within months it would be adopted in all Central Asian republics; it prescribed customary forms of inter-tribal and inter-clan relations (blood-vengeance and blood-money), proscribed bride-price, child-marriage, force marriage, marriage by abduction, rape, polygamy, levirate and all forms of traditional compulsion of females. The premises of this revolutionary legalism were that: (1) there was a direct relationship between Soviet legalism and female emancipation in Central Asia; (2) divorce rights were linked to revolutionary consciousness; and (3) female emancipation was necessary for radical socio-cultural change. 46086. Masaillides, Bobbies. “Coalition Government Collapses In Turkey”, in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), July 1, 1996, p. 3. The three-month-old coalition government of the Motherland and the True Path parties collapsed in Turkey June 6 after Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz resigned. Yilmaz stepped down in the face of a no-confidence motion put forward by Necmettin Erbakan’s Refah (Welfare) party, which is described in the big-business media as the party of “Islamic fundamentalism.” The minority capitalist coalition government was put together in March to keep Refah (RP) from power after the party came in first in December’s general election, capturing 158 of the total 550 seats in parliament. Both the Motherland Party (ANAP) and Tansu Ciller’s True Path Party (DYP) are posing as the defenders of secular Turkey. The fall of the bourgeois government in Turkey registered the crisis the rulers there face in their capacity to form a regime stable enough to impose further austerity measures on workers and farmers, and to continue their bloody war against Turkey’s Kurdish population. The insecurity felt by capitalist interests was registered by a sharp drop in Istanbul’s stock exchange. “The only news is bad news,” said Attila Yesilada of Global Securities. “But if we haven’t reached the bottom we are probably very close to it.” The Turkish lira fell to 78340 against the dollar while average annual inflation is running at nearly 60%. Since taking office, Yilmaz promised Turkey’s capitalist families, the International Monetary Fund and imperialist banks which are pushing to collect Turkey’s nearly $74 billion foreign debt, that his government will squeeze working people further. He announced a package of austerity measures that included steep tax increases, cuts in health care, and the raising of the retirement age to 65 years for men and 60 for women. He vowed to continue the privatization of state owned industries such as the Tupras oil refinery, the pharmaceutical company Pefkim, and Turkish Airlines. Half of Turkey’s manufacturing industry and 60% of its financial sector are owned by the state. Since modern Turkey emerged from the ruins of the Ottoman empire in the 1920’s, tobacco, oil, shipbuilding, and other industries became state monopolies, protected by high tariffs and import bars until the 1970’s. Austerity measures similar to those Yilmaz tried to push through, were attempted by previous governments, including the one of Ciller. These attacks faced widespread resentment among working people and provoked strike mobilizations that eventually led to the downfall of her government last October. On May Day, tens of thousands of working people gathered at Kadikoy square in Istanbul to celebrate this international day of struggle and to protest Yilmaz’s austerity attacks. The protest, which was declared illegal by the government, was organized by the General Workers Federation Turk Is, the illegal Federation of Public Workers, the Revolutionary Workers Union Federation DISK, and the labor federation Hak Is, which politically looks to Refah. The Kurdish Workers Party (PKK), which is banned, also participated with its own banners. The police attacked the protest brutally, killing three people and wounding 45. The cops arrested some 220 unionists.

Turkey's capitalist rulers have also failed to stop the resistance of Kurds for their national rights, which is centered in the southeastern part of the country. This region is being ruled under “state of emergency” measures. Estimates of the Kurdish population range between about 20-20 million among the country’s 63 million people (no official census identifying Kurds is allowed). Poverty and the war by Turkey’s army have forced millions of Kurds from the countryside into the shantytowns around the big cities. Istanbul's population, for example, is growing by an estimated 400000 people per year, many of them Kurds. A report from the UN “Habitat Summit” held in Istanbul on June 6, said that “the migration has fostered a discontented and exploited population that is growing by the day in Turkey’s major cities.” This growing discontent among Turkey’s workers and peasants was registered in the growth of Erbakan's Welfare Party. In scattered local elections held on June 3, the Refah gained 33.5% of the vote in 41 local polls across Turkey. It increased the vote by 3.5% over what it received in the same districts in the December general elections at the expense of the ruling bourgeois coalition. The ANAP came in second with 21%, while the DYP trailed third with 12%. Refah has presented itself as the voice of the poor in the ghettos of the cities and the impoverished peasants in the countryside. Leaders of the party oppose imperialist intervention in Arab countries. They denounced the recent massive bombing of Lebanon by the Zionist regime in Israel. The party’s vice-president Abdullah Gul said on June 9 that an RP government would cancel the recent five-year military cooperation agreement between Israel and Turkey, which was backed by Washington. The government crisis was precipitated by charges of corruption brought against Ciller by Refah deputies. Motherland decided to support the corruption probes against its coalition partner. Ciller is accused of making millions for her personal coffers from sales of state-owned industries during the privatization campaign by her government. After the resignation of Yilmaz, Erbakan proclaimed victory. “By the end of June,” he said, “the RP will form a government that will receive a vote of confidence.” Erbakan called both ANAP and DYP to participate in his new government.

46087. Morden, Bettie J. The Women's Army Corps, 1945-1978: The End of the Draft and WAC Expansion: Expansion and Overseas Assignments. Army Historical Series. Center of Military History. United States Army. District of Columbia: GPO, 1990. p. 282-284. Another major challenge facing expansion planners was the need to increase the number of WACs overseas. In 6/1945, the WAC had 15908 women in overseas theaters. Though 17.5% of WAC strength, the number was only 3% of the total Army strength overseas of 4.9 million. In 1972, approximately 40% of all enlisted men and 8.6% of the enlisted women were serving overseas. The percentage of women overseas compared to total Army members overseas was still .3%. [Mattie E. Treadwell, The Women's Army Corps, US Army in WWII (District of Columbia: GPO, 1954), Appendix A, Table 7, p. 772; Strength of the Army Report (DCSPER 46), Part I. Strength by Type and Command, 6/30/1972.]

With the success of the WAC expansion, General Rogers wished to achieve a more equitable overseas ratio. Women should share with men the burden of performing overseas duty, and the number of assignments open to both could be increased. If women occupied the majority of positions in CONUS, whether in traditional or nontraditional MOSs, and were unable to serve overseas, the Army could not rotate women back to CONUS when they completed their foreign tours. Beginning in 1973, enlistment options under which men went directly overseas after much shorter tours. Because of this discrepancy and because of budget problems, the Army directed that effective 1/1/1976, single men, single women, and unaccompanied personnel would serve the same length of overseas tour. When the Army's budget problems lessened in 1977, foreign service for all personnel was reduced to thirty-six months in long-tour areas (e.g., Europe, Japan), and twelve months in short-tour areas (e.g., Turkey and Korea). [DA Messages (DAPE-MPE-DR) 111755Z 3/1975, subject: Reduction of PCS Moves and Costs (DAPE-MPE-DR) 021805Z 1/1976, subject: Interim Change to AR 614-30, Overseas Service; and (DAPE-MPE-DR) 041314Z 11/1976, same subject. All in ODWAC Ref. File, Regulations, AR 614-30, OMG] [47]

46089. National Organisation of Women Students Australia. Press Release: Racism and Sexism: How To Fight Them. Australia: National Organisatition of Women Students Australia, July 5, 1994 Is there a connection between sexism and racism? What role, if any, should the women's movement play in the fight against racism? Questions such as these will be among the issues taken up at the National Organisation of Women Students Australia (NOWSA) conference, being held at Macquarie University in Sydney July 11-15, SUJATHA FERNANDES provides a contribution to the discussion. Racism has an economic function: it justifies the exploitation of a part of society on the basis of physical difference. This was obviously its role in connection with slavery in the United States. After slavery was abolished, the capitalist ruling class in the US still had a material interest in perpetuating racism, which maintains a layer of the working class whose super-exploitation boosts profits both directly and by putting a downward pressure on the wages of all workers. In Australia the Aboriginal population experiences institutionalised racism. Aborigines are the poorest section of the population, systematically denied access to education, employment and welfare. They make up an alarmingly high proportion of those in prison and under custodial care; they are targeted by the police and justice system, the most common "offences" being non-payment of fines, drunkenness, vagrancy and social security fraud. Institutionalised racism against Aboriginal people is part of the history of white Australia. Its function is to protect specific material interests, namely those of the capitalist class, who benefit from the appropriation and mining of the land stolen from the original inhabitants. Unlike black Americans and Maoris, Aboriginal people were initially excluded from the labour force. Later, although openly discriminatory laws were changed, racism remained to keep Aborigines deprived and excluded. Migrants in Australia often experience racism, but in a form different from that against Aborigines. For a number of historical reasons, migrants are not a homogenous group. They do not constitute a single super-exploited layer in society. The 1950s influx of migrants from southern Europe, Turkey and Lebanon provided the capitalist class with a cheap labour force at a time of large-scale infrastructure development and expansion of industry. By the 1970s, the migration pattern had changed, with many arriving from war-torn countries in South-East Asia. In both periods, this exploited labour force did not lead to the creation of a permanent under-class of migrants in the way that US capital created a black under-class. This was because the exploitation of migrants was not based primarily on physical differences, but rather on their lack of English. While Vietnamese refugees can be found in sweatshops and on factory floors along with migrants from eastern Europe, non-English speaking migrants tend to be concentrated in the lowest-paid jobs; English-speaking migrants are more commonly located in the higher paying professions. The cultural and linguistic barriers that provide the basis for the super-exploitation of migrants are overcome through the generations. Institutional barriers do not prevent second and third generation migrants, who have acquired language skills, from entering professions. The children of migrants, in other words, are native-born Australians. Aborigines, despite their tens of thousands of years in Australia, were not even legally citizens until the 1967 referendum. Racial prejudice against migrants of colour does not of course always provide a direct and immediate material benefit to someone. On arrival in Australia, many Indians and Japanese do not join the super-exploited layers of the workforce, yet they may still face some discrimination. Some interpret this prejudice as the product of another individual's ignorance. But such "personal" prejudice is a by-product of the institutionalised racism that serves material interests. If we are serious about fighting racism, we have to be willing to challenge the ruling class which uses it to divide people who have common interests. Similarly, in tackling sexism, we have to challenge the same system, which creates and perpetuates the structured inequality between men and women. The historical exclusion of women from education, the lack of publicly funded child-care facilities, which forces women to stay at home, and the systematic underpayment of women are examples of how discrimination against women is structured into the system. The historic role as the primary breadwinner and mother, capitalism profits enormously from women's unpaid social labour. Thus sexism, like racism, has a material base in the drive of capital to make super-profits. We need independent women's and anti-racist movements to challenge and change this situation. When women have organised themselves independently of the major political parties, they have been very successful in winning changes. Pressure from the second wave of the women's movement in the 1970s forced governments to introduce a range of legal reforms relating to women's wages, access to education and better employment opportunities. The Jobs For Women campaign which recently won its 14-year anti-discrimination battle against BHP shows that women organising in defence of their interests is essential for change. People of colour also have to organise together in anti-racism movements to bring about change. The mass black liberation movement in the US played a major role in raising consciousness about, and opposition to, racism. In Australia, Aboriginal people have been able to win reforms through their organisation in land rights and other movements. Focusing on personal prejudice within small groups, such as feminist collectives, does nothing to alter the power relations of society. Mass movements which challenge the structures and institutions of racism are the most effective way of breaking down the root cause of personal prejudice. It is only in this context that consciousness raising can occur on a large scale: people change their attitudes through action, not through being told how racist they are. Today, in the absence of anti-racist and women's movements, academic postmodernist theories have influenced much thinking about sexism and racism, persuading many people that mass action is irrelevant to political strategy. Postmodernists argue that the whole concept of a unified mass movement is "phallic" and "problematic". They say that solidarity and sisterhood are just another way of using "discourse" to "mask power relations", and that because women come from such different class and racial backgrounds there can be no solidarity. We need to reject romanticised ideas that seek to present all women as equally oppressed. However, we will not be able to defeat sexism and racism unless we do unite in a mass way to fight back. Sisterhood, as an expression of political solidarity, is something we can unite around. While the strength of the women's movement comes from its autonomy, this does not mean that it can fight sexism in isolation from other progressive movements. The strength of each movement for human liberation comes from other movements which also challenge the common enemy. This is the important connection between the women's, the anti-racist and the workers' movements. [=]

46089. Ozturk, Sedef; Yaras, Fusun; Kadin Cevresi; Peoples Translation Service [trans.], "Marriage: Turkey: Fathers, Imams and Ataturk", in Connexions, An International Women's Quarterly, n. 20, April 1, 1986, p. 28. [This article was written for Connexions in 2/1986 by Sedef Ozturk and Fusun Yaras, two members of Kadin Cevresi (Women's Circle), a women's group based in Istanbul, Turkey.]

When Aisha was born, her father barely hid his disappointment. Having a female child is like having no child at all. She grew up serving her family, especially her brothers, who had as much right over her as her father. She was 14 when her father started looking around for acceptable suitors. The man who had the means to raise enough money to buy her chastity would get her. When a prospective bridegroom was found, Aisha was seen and approved by him. She, however, was allowed to make only one glimpse of him.

The imam (religious officer) married them and that night she lost her well-protected virginity. Bedsheets stained with drops of blood were sent to the groom's parents the next day. Had she not been a virgin a fight would ensue. She then joined her family and entered her father-in-law's household. She bore seven children in 12 years. Her husband would say... he had three children because only boys were worthy of that title.

Aisha and her husband toiled hard to keep the family alive. The work aged them quickly. And then came the day when her husband brought home a younger woman, a second wife. Aisha gave her consent, resentfully perhaps, but she gave it. (Hadn't the prophet allowed for four wives to each man?) She lived as her mother had done and saw to it, in her turn, that her daughters kept their virginity intact for their husbands.

And when Zeynap, her eldest daughter, was 14... Circle (Kadin Cevresi), in which women of different backgrounds with different notions of how to gain liberation have come together. We publish books, have a reader's club and organise weekly meetings and seminars.

Contact: Kadin Cevresi Yayinlari, Kloid Farer Cad. 45/36, Servet Han, Cagaloglu, Istanbul, Turkey. Further Reading: Sex Roles. Family and Community in Turkey, edited by Cizdem Kazictibai. Indiana University Turkish Studies, 1982. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

46090. Peoples Translation Service [trans.], "Turkish Girl: 'Nobody Asks Me'", in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 2, October 1, 1981, p. 9. [Dilek is 16 years old. Six years ago she came to West Germany from Turkey. At the moment she is in the tenth grade in a West German school. She would like to stay in West Germany and learn a profession. The following is a translation of an excerpted interview from Courage's special issue on girls. Translated from Courage Sonderheft Madchen, No. 4, West German feministic publication, 1981.]

When I get out of school next year, I'll have to go to work; I don't know yet what kind of a job I'll be able to get. I would love to go to nursing school, but that's not possible because my grandmother, who lives in Turkey, doesn't want me to. My father wouldn't mind, but what my grandmother says, goes.

It's also possible that I wouldn't be able to get into nursing school because of my poor grades, and besides, they don't accept that many students. But I don't even have the chance to try. I'll have to work in a factory and do menial jobs. That's why I don't even feel like studying during this last year of school. What for? I don't pay attention in school any more. In the history classes—in one ear, out the other. I've become completely cold.

Of all the foreign women in West Germany, I think the Turkish girls are in the worst position. Their families watch them very strictly. They have to work hard at home, and they're never allowed to say anything. Whenever I want to tell my father the truth, I'm told: "Be quiet, you are stupid, and so little." My mother says: "Be quiet, don't talk back." I don't want to talk back, I just want to say the truth. They would like it best if I would not say anything at all.

After school I have to come home immediately to prepare the meals, wash the dishes, clean up, do housework. I'm never allowed to go out in the evening; that's completely impossible. During school vacation, I have to stay home all day. That's why I'm always glad when the vacation is over. At least then I can go to school.

Once a week I'm allowed to visit a German girlfriend, but only until four in the afternoon. If the others go for a hike, I'm not allowed to join them. Soon all the students will go on a field trip to the mountains. But not me. My father says I would only fuck. Ha! There are only three boys in my class and they are such weaklings one could feel sorry for them. But my father only thinks bad things. Those girls might want to do other things, like hiking, sports or games—he just doesn't believe it.

For Turkish girls it gets harder and harder the older they get. When I came to West Germany at the age of ten, things were better for me. My father even gave me money, sometimes five marks, sometimes ten. And now I don't get pocket money at all. I secretly do house cleaning for other people, so I make about 30 marks a month. If my father found out, he would beat me up badly.

Turkish girls often do get beaten. I was once beaten black and blue, and you know why? Because my shoes were broken and I had... taken them to a shoemaker. At home I had said it would cost only nine marks, but when I went to pick them up, they cost 19 marks. I didn’t dare tell my parents. Instead, I took the money from my metal piggy bank. My father found out because the metal was bent. “What did you do with the money?” he demanded. Of course he didn’t believe me and started beating me. It lasted for two years! Again and again, he would ask me and beat me: “What did you do with the money?” They told everybody in Turkey that they had found me and done something wrong.

Turkish girls like gold–bracelets, necklaces, earrings. When I came to West Germany, I had a gold bracelet that my mother had given to me. During gymnastics I had to take it off; the teacher was very strict. And after the lesson it was gone. I didn’t know German then, so I didn’t say anything. And at home I was beaten. What had I done wrong? What crime had I committed? Ever since then I’m cold toward gold. I never wear gold jewelry anymore.

It is hard for Turks to live in West Germany. But for the Turkish girls, it is the hardest. Their parents still live “Turkish,” that means the father is the boss of the family, the mother his servant. The sons are allowed to be a bit more “German.” Perhaps they will stay here and make good money. But the daughters have to remain completely “Turkish,” because that improves their chances of finding a Turkish husband. But the parents who demand that from their daughters, send them at the same time to a German school. There, the Turkish girls see how the German girls live and what freedoms they have, and they want the same things for themselves.

I want to be free, and at home I’m kept as in a prison. What can I do? I can leave my parents as soon as I’m 18 years old. But then I won’t have a family any more, never again. That hurts. I would not survive that. The other possibility is to do what my family expects me to do: get a job as an unskilled worker; give money to my family; and get married. I would not be allowed to choose a man; I would have nothing to say.

Many Germans don’t know that in Turkey it is not the father of the girl who finds her a husband, but the parents of the boy who look for a wife for their son. Their main concern is if the girl can cook well, clean the house and if she will work hard to not only serve their son, but also them, his parents. I would have to wait until the parents of some boy would take a liking to me. Then the father would talk to my father. My father can refuse if he doesn’t like the guy or his family, but nobody asks me. And the guy is not being asked either. On the wedding night, all my needlework will be shown and also the sheet with blood. If there is no blood, the bridegroom can reject the bride on the same night. If I would marry a German man that would not be the case. I wouldn’t mind marrying a German, but my chances are nil. For German boys, Turkish girls are nothing, they are the bottom of the barrel. Sometimes Turkish boys have German girlfriends, but I’ve never seen a Turkish girl have a German boyfriend—except maybe girls who have left their families and are regarded as “bad.”

At times I think that the only way I would be free would be to marry. That way I could escape from my father. If my husband would be nice and if he would allow me my freedom, that would be good. But if he would exploit and oppress me, the same way my father does, then I could get a divorce. In West Germany, that would mean that I would be free. But in Turkey, as a divorced woman, I would have to obey my father again. That is why they want to take me back to Turkey, so that I will never be free.

At night I dream that my father is dead and my mother buried in Turkey. I would write to my grandmother to send me all my papers. Then I would finally be free.

For more information: “Ayse—Vom Leben einer Turkin in Deutschland” by Gudrun Ebert-Behr, Gerhardt Verlag, West Germany, 1980.

Kommitte der Frauen aus der Turkei, Kadiye Tozun, Hohestr. 18, 2100 Hamburg 18, West Germany, 040/765832. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-5505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]
most follow their husbands or families. Couples and families cannot enter West Germany together since work permits are only issued to one person at a time. After a year's residency immigrants may bring their relatives, husbands, wives and children into the country. When Turkish wives join their husbands, most live in the big Turkish ghettos which have become part of all major West German cities. Their lives there do not differ significantly from the slum life they experienced back home, and very few have the opportunity to enter the job market. This trend changed in the early '70s when West German companies eagerly sought Turkish women for low-paid, tedious production work. But with the recession in the mid-'70s, employers returned to their earlier practice of giving employment preference to men.

Most of the estimated 500000 Turkish women in West Germany are not skilled workers, and very few are familiar with modern production processes. Over 90% of Turkish women worked in the fields back home. Consequently, only 1.5% have experience in production, and just 2.5% have experience in the service sector. In 1970, 48.6% of all Turks in West Germany were illiterate; 30.9% of them were men and 64.4% were women. Even today, girls stay home to prepare themselves for the future (married) lives and have no access to education. Turkish women who do paid work outside the home have to raise their children in addition to doing all the unpaid housework. Housework for Turkish women is particularly arduous because families cannot afford the luxuries that ease the burden of housework in a highly industrialized society. Moreover, they often live in run-down apartments that lack bathrooms and frequently even running water. The small number of Turkish women who work in factories or shops do so because of economic necessity. Their husbands would prefer them to remain at home, because they fear their wives may develop too much independence and self-awareness. This fear is especially expressed by fathers whose daughters are influenced by their contact with West German society (see related article). But the men often cannot earn enough money to feed their families, so women must supplement their husbands' wages with additional income.

Factor labor is far removed from the agricultural activities with which Turkish women are familiar, but women suffer most from general working conditions rather than their specific jobs. One woman told the West German daily, Frankfurter Rundschau, "The most difficult part for me is that I have no contact with other women while working. Nobody around here appears happy. We all seem to have lost our dignity as human beings. Work can be hard, I don't mind that, especially if the workers get along with each other. We are treated like animals, and that's what we suffer from." These conditions produce long-lasting effects on the physical and mental health of immigrant women. Many complain about frequent headaches, back pains, depression and nervousness. When asked about the reasons for these ailments, the most frequent answer is "sadness."

There are few opportunities for these women to express their dissatisfaction. One foreign shop steward said, "In unions, immigrant women are faced with many more difficulties than West German women. They have no previous union experience and are also afraid of losing their jobs as soon as they open their mouths."

West Berlin--The Largest Turkish City Outside Turkey: Recently, attempts have been made--sometimes successfully--to organize Turkish women and to bring them together both, with other immigrant and West German women.

West Berlin, which has the largest Turkish population outside of Turkey, has become the center for organizing. There are an estimated 100000 Turks living in the city, mainly in the areas known as Turkish ghettos. In the Kreuzberg district, for example, Turkish is spoken more often than German, and Turkish food is readily available on every street corner. In some schools more than half the students speak Turkish as their native language. Many of these Turks have become increasingly sensitive to what West German officials have long denied: discrimination against Turks exists in the work place, at school, and in daily urban life. Disillusioned and surrounded by hostility, many Turks in West Berlin are seeking shelter in their national subculture or in radical Islamic groups. Eighteen mosques and numerous prayer sanctuaries have sprung up in West Berlin's back alleys and in private apartments. There are also Koran schools attached to several of the mosques where instruction in the traditional teaching of the Koran includes right-wing political messages.

Some right-wing groups based in Turkey, but active throughout Europe, have established their own women's organizations. Zümrüt Turman, chairwoman of the Grey Wolves' (a fascist militia) women's organization explained: "Women's groups have been unable to deal with our problems. But we truly enlightened women will deal with these problems. The most important duty of a woman is to be a mother. In the struggle for salvation of Turkish society we have to rely on our Turkish mothers a great deal."

Grey Wolves in West Berlin have systematically attacked progressive Turkish woman. One woman who was living by herself with her three children was frequently harassed by her neighbor, who is a Grey Wolves supporter. He would stop her in the hallways and insult her. "You smell like a German woman. You don't send you children to Koran school. You don't wear a kerchief. You are no longer a true Turkish woman. I will kill you if you continue to wear Western dresses, and if you don't send your children to the mosque."

Despite such attacks and the potentially threatening presence of these right-wing groups in some ghetto neighborhoods, Turkish women have come together at conferences and in meeting centers to talk about their problems.

Immigrant Women's Conference: In 1980, a conference in Frankfurt was organized to discuss the problems of immigrant working women. One Turkish woman who attended talked about her impressions of the conference: "The new West German women's movement is very much a middle class movement, and they have very little in common with poor, rural women from Southern Europe. All they have in common is being female. But as long as the specific sexist oppression does not create a common level of consciousness, just being a woman does not lead far. For many foreign women, the women in the movement are strange, disorderly or even whores. For them, it is harder to join the women's movement than for West German working class women..."

"A few foreign women are organized in more traditional groups, like church circles. These organizations are for the most part opposed to concepts like 'feminism' or 'male chauvinism'. Nevertheless, some women's groups have been formed within such organizations, starting with cooking and sewing together, celebrating International Women's Day, and discussing problems of childrearing. While not radical, these groups are more progressive than the traditional ones."

"I share with Turkish women the same mentality, personal origin, language. We have a similar upbringing and similar experience. I find it easy to make contacts with Turkish mothers and young girls who come to my workplace. We started a group for Turkish girls. I know what it means to fight for a work permit, to fight for an extension of your visa. There is an unquestioned feeling of solidarity between us. "But when it comes to the women's movement, to feminism and lesbianism, I identify with West German women. Am I Turkish? Am I German? With Turkish women, I can discuss questions like relationships between women, feminist work, etc. And as a feminist and foreign woman, I have problems with the women at my workplace who think and live differently from me. And very often I encounter subtle hostility toward foreigners—which makes me very angry."

"Because I've always wanted to talk about my identity problems as a foreign woman, I joined a workshop in which foreign women shared their experiences. But many of the women had very different problems, partly because they were women of the first generation and not connected with the women's movement. But for me, a woman of the second generation, the problems of identity are much more of an issue. And I'm active in the women's movement. But I was still glad to talk to other foreign women about their activities."

"But at the conference nobody mentioned foreign lesbians. I was angry at myself, because I didn't say anything, either. It is very important to me, but I was afraid—I guess, because a negative reaction would have hurt me very much and would have made me feel much more isolated. That's probably why the other lesbians didn't say anything either. And I know now that at least two other women are gay. I drove back to West Berlin with a Spanish woman who is a lesbian. She was as frustrated as I was. We want to start a group for foreign lesbians because we want to make homosexuality a public issue among foreigners, and we want to discuss it with others."

Crossroads Kreuzberg: A group for foreign lesbians is just one way to get immigrant women together and find solutions to many of their problems. A West German and a Turkish sociologist initiated the "Meeting and Information Center for Turkish Women" in Kreuzberg. Both founders worked with Turkish immigrants for several years and were familiar with their problems. The center is a place where Turkish women can meet, talk, drink tea, take courses from literacy classes to German classes—and get counseling. Many come—battered wives, women who have lost their visas or work permits, and young girls who have run away from home.

In 2/81, a group of women from the center, some Turkish and some West German, decided to invoke "squatters rights" and moved themselves into an empty house near the center. The group issued a statement which said they needed the house due to the severe housing problems they faced. By repairing the building and living in it, they wanted to set an example of how West German and Turkish families can reside together in a city with a large immigrant population. The group managed to carry out its plan, despite some bureaucratic obstacles. Due to their success, they are now searching for another empty house in Kreuzberg which can be transformed into a new information center which will house and provide a safe refuge for women from different cultural backgrounds.

Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 2, October 1, 1981. p. 7. According to 1980 government statistics, almost 3 million foreign workers are registered in West Germany. 600000 of these are from Turkey, but only 151000 out of the total are women. (These figures do not include dependents. There are an estimated five million foreigners among West Germany's population of 60 million.) There are more than 600000 immigrant women from diverse nationalities employed by West German corporations. Immigrant women work on assembly lines (13.8%), in cleaning jobs (10.6%), as clerks (8.2%), in the textile industry (7.8%), and in food industries (7.4%). Of the 7.5 million West German women who are employed, 31.3% work in administrative jobs, 13.4% are salespeople, 6.5% do cleaning jobs, and 2.5% earn their living on the assembly line. (Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.)

Hungary: 27000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: United Kingdom.

USSR: 66000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: United States, Israel. [Source: Worldwatch Paper 43.] (Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.)

46094. Pope, Nicole. "Oiling the Wheels of Turkish Diplomacy in Azerbaijan; Turkey Is Stepping Up Diplomatic Activity Over Nagorno-Karabagh and a Project for a Pipeline From Baku", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, September 19, 1993. p. 13. PM Tansu Ciller's visit to Moscow signals the continuing importance of Russia to Turkey, and follow the fall of Azeri PM Abdullaz Elchibey, who was considered to be too pro-Turkish. In that visit, Ciller raised the issues of the fighting in Nagorno-Karabagh and the proposed oil pipeline project. Turkey has been angered by the inexorable advance of Armenian forces in the fighting over Nagorno-Karabagh. While Russia has been willing to establish a hotline to Ankara, Russia has made no secret of its plan to re-establish its power in Azerbaijan without Turkish assistance. Turkey is seeking to connect Baku with the the pipeline from Iraq to the Mediterranean, but such a pipeline would either have to pass through Iran or Armenia. [TXT]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

elsewhere be so happy? Of course, this is not what the results mean at all. The piety and religiosity of the Turkish people is beyond question. The Naqshbandi and other sufi orders flourish there as nowhere else in the Muslim world, despite decades of fervent State secularism. Even Yilmaz and Ciller were obliged to pay lip service to Islamic unity and values in their election campaigning.

All the results show is that the Turkish people know that the elections are not about Islam. They understand that they are voting for secular politicians and secular parties operating in a secular system in an equally secular State. And they choose their votes in secular terms. Had they really thought Erbakan to be an Islamic leader, and Refah an Islamic movement, Erbakan would most likely have secured 91% of the vote rather than 21%. This is not to underplay Erbakan's achievement. The leaders of Islamic Parties in other Muslim countries would give anything to achieve 21% of the vote. It is not an Islamic achievement. It is the achievement of a wily old politician who has proved a master manipulator of Turkish politics. It did not take him long to start back-tracking on even the limited Islamic tone of his campaign once the elections were over and political deals needed to be made in order to build a coalition. No Islamic leader could ever consider going into partnership with Tansu Ciller, whose personal ambitions and total lack of principles are notorious. Nor is it to deny that many of those within the Refah party, and those who voted for it, are sincere and dedicated in their commitment to Islam. But if they think that they can achieve anything through Turkey's secular "democracy," they are being simplistic. Turkey's own history shows that this is not possible. Looking further afield to Algeria and Pakistan, for example, only reinforces the point. In the almost total absence of effective government since the collapse of Ciller's regime in 9/1995, the country has been doing quite well. It is continuing to pursue its war on the Kurds, its membership of NATO, its quest to join the European Union, and its military cooperation with Israel. Turkey's bureaucracy, like that of Italy, seems to have reached the stage of the Han and Hatun, the King and Queen, who together received foreign envoys and performed the duties of state. The birth of a daughter was a "victory" for Islam. [=]

46096. Sniffen, Michael J. "Ex-Rep. Solarz's Wife Agrees to Guilty Plea in House Bank Probe", in Seattle Times, April 18, 1995. p. A5. Nina Solarz, wife of former Rep. Stephen Solarz, agreed to plead guilty to writing a $5200 bad check on her husband's House Banking Committee account. The bad check was written to a charity she headed; she then stole $7500 from the charity, American Friends of Turkish Women, of which she is president. Former Rep. Solarz will not be charged. [TEXT]

Most respectable Commander Marcos: My name is Oliviero Toscani, and for twelve years I have conceived the communication of United Colors of Benetton. For a long time United Colors of Benetton has chosen to use a large part of its advertising budget to address the most dramatic problems of this century: AIDS, war, racism, intolerance. It's a way to create a different dialogue with the 'consumers' who for us are first of all 'men and women.' We have always chosen to photograph 'true persons'-not models--in the places where they actually live. In this way, we have highlighted the beauty of the Chinese, of the Turks, of the inhabitants of a little Italian village, and, recently, of the Palestinians of Gaza.

Today, we address ourselves to you because we sense that you know that communications can be a form of struggle. We ask you to give us an opportunity to photograph you with the men, women and children of your group, the Zapatista National Liberation Army. We would like to give you a chance to show the beauty of the faces of those who struggle in the name of an idea. We believe that an ideal brightens the eyes and lights up the faces of those who fight to realize it. We do not believe in the beauty myths propagated by consumerism. For this reason, we ask you to receive us among your people and to give us the opportunity to find another way of making your lives and your history known. -- Oliviero Toscani. [=]

46098. Turkish Information Office. Women in Modern Turkey. Turkey Today 7. Turkish Information Office [444 E. 52nd. St., New York 22 NY], N.D. (1950?). It would be almost impossible for anyone acquainted only with present-day Turkey to imagine the condition of subjection in which women were forced to live only twenty-five years ago, before the advent of the Republic. Before 1923, any woman who tried to assume the personal, social, economic and political equality that is guaranteed to her by today's Constitution, would have been stigmatized as "sinsful". Complete freedom and equality for women are no considered as most natural and fundamental rights, essential to a modern Turkish society. The high degree of cultural and intellectual standing of the present-day Turkish woman, and her social and political maturity, make it even more inconceivable that only 25 years ago she possessed only the status of a household object in a masculine abode, assigned duties, but accorded not the slightest rights or responsibilities. However, five centuries of isolation, acquired social traditions intrinsically foreign to Turkish culture, and a rigid system of education rooted in obsolete religious concepts and canon misinterpretations which placed the woman behind latticed windows, did not suffice to eradicate the Turkish woman's love of freedom and liberty, or her passion for private and public responsibility. Before the Ottomans, in the earliest days of Turkish community life, women and men were free and equal. In the family as well as in the affairs of society as a whole, men and women enjoyed the same rights and privileges with, of course, an equal part in responsibilities. In the past this was a fundamental characteristic of the Turkish social order. In times of war as in times of peace, women stood beside their husbands in the people's assemblies. The early Turkish empires were ruled by grace of the Hsn and Hatun, the King and Queen, who together received foreign envoys and performed the duties of state. The birth of a daughter was a matter for rejoicing and not despair. A mother had rights over her children, and when she became a widow she was their sole guardian and the sole manager of her home. Time brought the Turks in contact with other civilizations in which women played an inferior role. In Constantinople they found veiled women who lived apart from men in the women's sections of the city. From the empire that they conquered the Turks inherited a social system which excluded women from the daily life of men. What happened to the free and happy life of early times? Now, when a girl was born, she grew up behind latticed windows, waiting for her father's choice of a husband. It frequently happened that she was not even allowed to see her husband until after the wedding ceremony. Once married, she lived in ignorance and in slavery. Only a few books on ethical subjects were allowed her, for too much book learning was considered unnecessary for women.

Her children, therefore, grew up in ignorance like herself. As far as possible she lived within the house, and when she ventured forth she was dressed from head to foot in ungodly garments that served to disguise her from view. Married, she had rival; for her husband was entitled to marry up to four times. There were also odalisques to share with her the home which was really never hers. In exchange for all these restrictions, she lived in a state of insecurity, for her husband could divorce her without recourse to legal proceedings. In matters of inheritance her brother always had the advantage over her. She was not allowed to divorce her without recourse to legal proceedings. In matters of marriage, she was their sole guardian and the sole manager of her home. Time brought the Turks in contact with other civilizations in which women played an inferior role. In Constantinople they found veiled women who lived apart from men in the women's sections of the city. From the empire that they conquered the Turks inherited a social system which excluded women from the daily life of men. What happened to the free and happy life of early times? Now, when a girl was born, she grew up behind latticed windows, waiting for her father's choice of a husband. It frequently happened that she was not even allowed to see her husband until after the wedding ceremony. Once married, she lived in ignorance and in slavery. Only a few books on ethical subjects were allowed her, for too much book learning was considered unnecessary for women.

Her children, therefore, grew up in ignorance like herself. As far as possible she lived within the house, and when she ventured forth she was dressed from head to foot in ungodly garments that served to disguise her from view. Married, she had rival; for her husband was entitled to marry up to four times. There were also odalisques to share with her the home which was really never hers. In exchange for all these restrictions, she lived in a state of insecurity, for her husband could divorce her without recourse to legal proceedings. In matters of inheritance her brother always had the advantage over her. She was not even permitted to testify in court; she could not act as a witness to any legal deed. Such was the life of women in the heyday of the Ottoman Empire. In the country, however, the old Turkish family structure retained many of its original characteristics. Women of the poorer classes, therefore, were never completely restricted. They shared in the work to be done, and the veil, to them, was a convention which in their own villages could often be dispensed with. Ibn Batuta, [Ibn Batuta. (1304-1378) one of the greatest travellers of his time. He made a circuit of the Turkish lands and has written on his travels. His accounts are classics on the Middle East.] who visited Anatolia in the fourteenth century, wrote of seeing women always in the company of men, apparently somewhat to his surprise. "As to tradeswomen, they, too, were respected. I saw one of them riding in a carriage drawn by a horse, while three or four servants held her train. She wore a bonnet adorned with jewelry and peacock feathers. The windows of the carriage were open and the woman's face could be seen. Another woman, also escorted by her maids, was exchanging sheep and milk for perfume. The men who accompanied their wives were taken for their servants. The husband was clothed in a sheepskin mantle and wore a cap similar on his head. In the late nineteenth century, the condition of women improved somewhat. It became the fashion to allow them a certain amount of education, and a number of cultured women of letters appeared.

During the First World War, when the guns were heard at Gallipoli, the women stood ready to do their share in protecting their threatened homes. They nursed the wounded and tended the sick, cared for refugee children, ran schools and offices. Eventually, foreign warships lay anchored in the Bosporus, and the country was invaded on all sides. Then thousands of veiled women were seen everywhere, filling the streets and squares and meeting-places like a flood. In the days following the armistice of 1918, mass meetings were held in Istanbul and elsewhere. A frequent speaker at such meetings was Halide Edib, already a novelist with an established world reputation, who once addressed two hundred thousand men and women in Sultan Ahmed Square while Allied airplanes flew in and out among the minarets above.

In 5/1919 Atatürk landed in Anatolia, and the Turkish War of Independence began. Thousands of men and women escaped from Istanbul to the interior, to join the struggle. "When, in 1920, I had to flee from Istanbul to Ankara," writes Mrs. Ferid Tek, [Mrs. Ferid Tek. Well-known Turkish woman writer and authoress, especially known for her writings on the Turkish War of Independence. She is of the generation of Halide Edib.] "I took a little boat bound for Inebolu. On the bridge was a crowd of peasants with their wives. They were returning home after having sold their cattle. The Black Sea was as tough as it can be. I was ill and distressed. Suddenly, above the sound of the wind and sea rose the music of a folk song, proud and joyful. All the 'farmers' turned into officers, and when we landed at last in Inebolu I saw that the women's boxes held nothing but munitions." In Ankara, then a heap of ruins with here and there a modest house of wood and brick, Mrs. Tek was to meet Halide Edib and many other women from Istanbul who were working day and night for victory. But they were not the only ones—sturdy peasant women from all over the countryside took part in this mass movement for liberty. Countless stories are told of women who carried shields on their shoulders, who took their husbands' and sons' hunting rifles and marched to the front. "In the year 1921, we were going to Ankara by way of Inebolu. As we were crossing the solitary roads of Anatolia, the silence of the night was suddenly broken by a distant noise. It was the creaking of wheels. As a vehicle approached us we saw in it a young girl of twenty, driving a team of oxen. I shall never forget her brave countenance and gentle smile as she calmly answered, when I asked her where she was going, 'To the front'. The cart was full of munitions and we now understood why the wheels were making this dreadful noise. The scene filled us with a sense of shame and inferiority. We asked the girl whether she was not afraid to go at midnight on these solitary roads. She shrugged her shoulders and smiled, saying 'What should I fear: the mountains or the roses?' We continued asking, 'Have you any relatives fighting?' Upon which she replied, 'My father, my brothers and my lover all gone, why should I wait?'

At last the war was fought and won. Victory was sealed by the Treaty of Lausanne. Out of the ruins of the empire, the Turks built a compact and vigorous republic, and the era of reforms began. Patiently Atatürk began the task of preparing public opinion for a change in the status of women. He spoke repeatedly of the problem as he traveled over the country. "If you study Islam and Turkish history," he said in Izmir in 1924, "you will not find in them any of our present conventions. In Turkish social life, women have never been mentally inferior to men and they are even found to be superior in some cases. "Let us study the situation in our country today. We see two phases, one where women plough the fields with men, and ride to neighboring villages to sell their eggs and hens and corn, and after buying what they need, return to their villages and assist their husbands and brothers in their various occupations. The other, the legendary life behind latticed windows which is spoken of in foreign novels, is undoubtedly due to the influence of the life of the Court upon the population at large. Here are a few last words: our mothers have done their best to educate us. But what we need hereafter are men with a different mentality and culture, and this will only come through future mothers. They are, and will be, the foundations required to maintain the independence and honor of the New Turkey."

In 1926, the new Civil Code was enacted. It gave back to Turkish women their rights and the Turkish family too; a new step toward rebuilding itself. Divorce became a matter for the law courts, and the right to demand it was given to women as well as men. The new code also affected the rights of inheritance, recognizing equality between men and women in this respect as in others. It remained for women to acquire their political rights. Four years after the Civil Code, the Assembly passed a law giving women the right to participate in municipal elections. This gradual unfolding of reform was carefully thought out, to allow both women themselves and public opinion in general to become adjusted to the new scheme of things. Many women were elected to municipal councils and proved themselves conscientious and hardworking citizens. In 1935 the Assembly recognized their full political rights. At the first election after the new law was passed, seventeen women won seats in the Grand National Assembly of Turkey, the Turkish Parliament. It is little short of amazing to see how quickly and securely women have made a place for themselves in every walk of public life. In its program of reconstruction, Turkey needs trained and intelligent workers and allows no sex restriction to stand in their way. Every career is open to women, every year new women judges are appointed to the different courts, and there are many young women lawyers, several of whom have won nation-wide repute. Statistics for 1948 reveal that there are in Turkey today 101 Law School-trained women judges and public prosecutors; 19 women assistant judges and 26 women law-clerks, in the various courts and tribunals. The Istanbul, Ankara and Izmir Bar Associations have among their members many women who are practicing attorneys. Many banks, industrial and business establishments, as well as a number of government ministries have for years retained the services of women legal advisers and representatives. In 1946, in Turkish schools, from elementary grades to the universities, colleges and technical schools, there were 11250 women teachers, instructors, lecturers, and assistants to professors. Under the Republic, Turkish women attend international meetings, conventions and conferences. On most Turkish delegations there is at least one woman member representing the country. Early in October 1948, two Turkish women, Mrs. Makbule Diblan, deputy in the Grand National Assembly, and Mrs. Nermin Abadan, lawyer and journalist, were in Sweden as the Turkish representatives to the Middle Eastern Women's Congress, Stockholm. On their homeward journey, they were guests of the Women's Association of Denmark. Another Turkish woman, Mrs. Tezer Taskiran, a well-known child psychologist and educational authority, now a member of the Grand National Assembly and author of many publications on education, was a member of the Turkish delegation which attended the UNESCO Third General Session, held in Beirut, the Lebanon, in 11/1948. Mrs. Mihr Pektash represented Turkey at the Conference of the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women, held at Lake Success early in 1/1948. Mrs. Pektash is a former deputy in the Grand National Assembly. She is an educator by profession. Turkish women participated in the Women's International Exposition, Silver Jubilee, held in the 71st Regiment Armory, New York, between 11/1/1948, 11/7/1948, exhibiting exquisite samples of Turkish women's handicrafts, particularly specimens of expert needlework.

When, in 1935, the Women's International Congress convened in the Yildiz Palace in Istanbul, hundreds of women belonging to the various civilized nations of the world expressed their appreciation of the vocations and professional achievements of their Turkish sisters, and expressed admiration for their high degree of cultural and intellectual maturity. In 1957 another woman, Professor Afet, Vice-President of the Association of Historical Research, presided with great success over the International Congress on Turkish History. There are many hundreds of women doctors practicing in all parts of the country. Their is perhaps Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Turkey

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

the greatest satisfaction, for they are accepted with unquestioning confidence by thousands who entrust them with their lives. There are today, in European countries and especially in the United States, many young Turkish women physicians doing post-graduate work, research, and in particular, clinical study. In a flying school on the outskirts of Ankara, young girls are training for civil aviation. You see them in their trim uniforms when they come to the movies on Saturday afternoons. Many have already won their wings. Another Turkish woman some years back won the automobile races from Ankara to Athens. Today in modern Turkey, young girls are studying dancing, dramatics and singing at the Ankara Conservatory. Girls spin at Marguerite's wheel or lean against Juliet's balcony while their mothers sit in the audience, hoping that the curtain will not go down too soon. In factories everywhere, thousands of women are employed. In the Ismet Inonu Institute, many hundreds are learning useful trades, which they practice in various parts of the country. In laboratories and in offices, women are working normally, and it has become the natural thing. In the Village Institutes, thousands of girls, along with the young men of the villages, attend a seven-year course of training for leaders and teachers in Turkey's program of Village Uplift. Here they are taught everything from dancing and music to first aid and sanitation, child care and the social sciences. These girls, when their period of training is over, go to their villages and farms to become social workers and village leaders. In the literary world, Mrs. Halide Edip Adivar is perhaps the most widely known of Turkish women writers in modern prose. She is a graduate of the American College for Girls, Istanbul. A novelist of international renown, she is primarily interested in the science of pedagogy and in history. As we have seen, she served with the national armed forces and saw action during the War of Independence. She held successively the ranks of corporal, sergeant and sergeant-major. She has traveled widely in Britain, France and the United States, writing and lecturing. During 1931-32, she was visiting professor of modern Turkish thought and literature at Columbia University, New York. In 1933 she became visiting professor at Calcutta University, India. Later, she continued her lectures and conferences throughout the world. She is at present professor of English language and literature at Istanbul University. "The Turkish Ordeal", dealing with the Turkish struggle for Independence and Liberation, is one of her best known books. She has also written a two-volume history of English literature. Hundreds of names of other famous Turkish women scientists, physicians, teachers, lawyers, judges, executives, etc., could be added. Their contribution to Turkish social life is no less significant and no less glorious than that of Turkish men. With the late Kemal Ataturk, Turkish society as a whole today believes that Turkish community life has two fundamental elements of equal importance: The Turkish man and the Turkish woman.

In 1946, there were 38249 teachers in Turkey's 14615 schools of all types. Of these teachers, 11250 were women. At the same time, Turkey's schools had a total enrollment of 1522384 students, of whom 530625 were girls and women. These figures speak eloquently of the fact that Turkish women are cooperating side by side with Turkish men in the building of their country's future. In conclusion, it would be a modest tribute to state that the Turkish woman has shown herself to be a perfect mother, a cooperative and understanding wife, and a good citizen whom the whole nation holds in loving esteem. [=]

46100. US Department of State. Turkey Human Rights Practices: Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association: Gay and Lesbian Pride Conference Banned. Reprinted by Lambda Istanbul (F.K. 103, Goztepe, Istanbul TURKEY), July, 1995. A gay and lesbian pride conference scheduled for July 2-6 in Istanbul was banned at the last minute by the governor of Istanbul on July 2, apparently on the grounds that it would be contrary to Turkey's "tradition and moral values" and that it might disturb the peace. He allegedly sent men to many hotels in Istanbul, instructing them not to provide lodgings for participants. The next day, Turkey's authorities arrested 28 foreign delegates, most of them while they were on their way to participate in a press conference in protest of the ban. They were detained for over 5 hours, threatened with possible strip searches and human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) tests, and deported on a Turkish airline to Germany. The organizers had previously received approval of the event from the Interior Ministry.

Associations must submit their charters for government approval, a lengthy and cumbersome process. [=]

What influenced these designers?

The Assyrian-Babylonian, Hittite, Lydian-Phrygian, Hellenistic and Ottoman civilisations are just five cultures which had existed in Anatolia. Pinar Aygun, Eynel Celebi, Bahar Korcan, Sema Gucer and Hakan Yildirim are just five of the hundreds of young Turkish designers.

When invited to design fashions for the show, Eynel Celebi chose the Assyrians, Pinar Aygun the Hittites, Bahar Korca the Lydians and Phrygians, Sema Gucer the Helenes and Hakan Yildirim the Ottomans for their inspiration.

What remains of these five civilisations for these young designers today? Museum galleries and university libraries provide a wealth of statues, reliefs, vases decorated with human figures and books. But the clothing in this fashion show illustrated that the most important legacy of these civilisations is something that mankind has always possessed: the courage to create!

Eynel Celebi chose to adapt the Assyrian woman and her clothing of 2000 BC to modern life. Based on pictures and reliefs in which warriors and their exploits prevail, she interpreted them in a process of re-creation. Her collection, named “Pocket”, left a startling and striking effect on the audience. She used the implements of Assyrian warriors as accessories for her clothes: metal leg coverings, black tasselled whips, helmets made of plush and shiny fabrics. She used plush, gabardine, lycra and silky fabrics in her creations. Every shade of brown, copper, bronze, cold and silver predominated in the collection, which features long skirts with front slashes revealing high cut shorts and tall flat-soled knee boots. Eynel Celebi was struck most of all by the fact that the Assyrians were the first to use pockets in their clothes, and almost all her outfits have large, eye-catching, conspicuous pockets. It is as if this young 20th century designer is acknowledging our debt to the Assyrians for this indispensable invention.

Pinar Aygun selected the Hittites, who colonised Anatolia around 2000 BC, because she admired the primitive simplicity of their costume. She created a three-dimensional collection from two-dimensional documents.

The colour and third dimension in the clothing derives from the designer’s own creativity and imagination. To the question about why her clothes are so often made in black fabric, she replies, “Imagination and courage!” Reddish brown is the complementary colour reflecting the fact that the Hittites were a civilisation of the soil.

Her fabrics are chiffon, fur, lycra and satin, with plenty of gold. All the clothes feature Hittite solar discs of exaggerated size, which form the most memorable accessory of the collection.

Pinar Aygun has captured the refinement of the Hittite reliefs in her clothes; simple, primitive, fine and elegant, almost intangible lines, like the Hittite civilisation. Is it the transparency of the black chiffon or the slenderness of the modes? The answer to this question lies between the darkness and lightening of the podium.

Here come the Phrygians and Bahar Korcan’s collection. The migrations which swept across Anatolia around 1200 BC, known as the Aegean Migrations or the Migration of the Tribes, brought fresh cultures into Anatolia. As a matriarchal society, the Phrygians held women in greater esteem than almost any other Anatolian civilisation.

The huge number of statues of the Mother Goddess which they produced is clear evidence of this. According to the Phrygians, women should be worshipped for their fertility and their role in creation.

The woman represents abundance, and life. Bahar Korcan was influenced by the Mother Goddess, known to the Phrygians and Lydians as Cybele. This was the perfect choice for a mixed collection entitled “The Woman in Anatolian Civilisations”.

Although the Bible declares, “In the beginning was the Word”, Bahar Korca says, “In the beginning there was stone.” She has called her collection “Stone and skin”, skin symbolising man himself, and stone the story of his creativity. The fabrics are velvet, lycra, chiffon and fur. Her models walked onto the podium wearing crowns of plain gold or silver plaques and carrying tambourines. The designer’s colours are all shades of grey and skin colour representing the ordinary woman to the Mother Goddess of antiquity. On the catwalk sounds turn to colour to civilisations. And the Hellenistic period…Sema Gucer chose the Hellenistic civilization of the Aegean which covered the period 300-30 BC. For women this was a memorable age when women poets and artists were celebrated in stone inscriptions. Sema Gucer has been influenced by Homer’s Iliad. The multitude of written documents and sculpture was an advantage for the designer. But who would choose these colours without the courage of creation? Shades of cherry, cream, maroon and brown for combinations of lycra, leather, silk and chiffon.

The outfits are worn either with sandals laced to the knees or specially designed matching shoes. From inscrutable marble statues whose clothes drop in heavy folds Sema Gucer has courageously shaped her own classical woman.

And the Ottomans. Here we come to the last civilisation represented at this event, the Ottoman Empire, which lasted from 1299 to 1922.

Hakan Yildirim got the chance to interpret the Ottomans, with their readymade extravaganza of colour and design. What luck! To interpret the known and accepted, to re-create them, is the hardest job for the designer. Hakan Yildirim began with a perceptive insight into this culture, with all its splendour and ostentation. An empire which had extraordinary fabrics woven for its emperors, which used the richest colours, juxtaposed contrasting designs, and had a penchant for hundreds of buttons.

Undershirts, sleeves trailing on the ground, boleros...Ottoman turbans influenced this young designer. He has interpreted these turbans for the 20th century to embllesh to all his outfits. His shoes are a combination of the traditional “takunya” and “mest” forms. His jewelry and shoes have been especially designed and made for the collection. He has generally used upholstery fabrics with huge designs, predominantly in purple, mustard, reds verging on maroon, turquoise and yellow. The undershirts are in chiffon prints with Iznik ceramic designs. Boleros of upholstery fabric, caftan-like coats in patterned fabric with plain linings and high neckbands, long and short skirts and narrow cut trousers…In short a layered style of dress in bright colours and designs, with buttons and buttonholes.

The lights go out on the podium, but there is a light that will always shine from the Assyrians to the Ottomans - our courage to create![=]

46104. Wheeler, Tim. “Resignations and Suspensions Follow Fasist Drug Trafficking Scandal in Turkish Government”, in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), December 21, 1996. p. 14. The Turkish government is embroiled in a major scandal that links death squads, heroin trafficking and the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in 1979. The case began with a traffic accident in which three passengers were killed, police official Hussein Kocadag, fugitive and heroin dealer Abdullah Catli, and Gonca Us, a mistress of several druglords. Sedat Bucak survived the accident; he is a Kurd to receive $1.2 million a month from the Turkish government to “bankroll death squads”. This juxtaposition has led to many embarrassing questions in the press. Police have linked Catti to Mehmet Ali Agca, who attempted to assassinate Pope John Paul II, in a plot by the Gray Wolves to frame Bulgaria for the assassination.

46105. Yang Zheng. “Women March into the 21st Century Together with Men-A Warm Welcome to the Beijing Fourth World Conference on Women (FWCW): Rabia Kadar: The Richest Woman In Xinjiang: Rabia Kadar, A Uygur Woman Having 11 Children, Has Become The Wealthiest Person In China’s Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region-Home To A Total Of 14.54 Million People. She Is Currently Chairwoman Of The Board Of Her Company, Akdar Industrial & Trade Co. With Fixed Assets Of 100 Million Yuan: Part 2: A Steep Rise”, in Beijing Review, September 4, 1995. In 1987, Rabia rented a patch of land in South Jiefang Road in Urumqi where she opened a March 8th Store, wholesaling goods for women and helping them also to earn more money and get rich. In 1990, she built a six-storey dwelling, the first privately funded residential building in Xinjiang. In 1992, with much support from local government authorities, her March 8th Store was revamped as a modern and typical Uygur style architecture-the Rabia Building. Xinjiang has become a leader in China’s reform and opening drive since the Euro-Asian bridge, the railway linking western Pacific coast and eastern Atlantic coast, was opened to traffic in 1992. Deng Xiaoping-Father of China's epoch-marking economic revolution-spoke on further reform and opening that year. As a result, people-to-people exchanges between China and the countries of the former Soviet Union developed, providing still another opportunity for Rabia. In that year, her first private enterprise, the Akdar Industrial and Trade Co. which is totally operated by Uygur women, was established focusing on the border trade. The disintegration of the former republics created economic chaos in these newly independent countries, especially the lack of daily necessities. China's light industrial products, particularly cotton textile products and garments, became very popular in these countries, while their heavy industrial products were needed by China's economic construction. As smart as she was, Rabia figured that it was time to expand her businesses abroad, and she tried barter trade first, importing automobiles, steel and waste copper needed in domestic markets. At the same time, she launched a leather-processing factory in Xinjiang and set up a jointly-funded industrial and trade company with local businessmen and a Rabia Store in Kazakhstan. In 1994, Rabia established a small-scale garment factory, a knitting mill and a computer composition system. In July and August of that year, Rabia was invited to Great Britain and Turkey on business, where she attended talks on establishing joint ventures.

728
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Turkey

A court previously determined she had been raped by the man she killed, to army personnel. Several other women judges investigating human payment of blood money to the family of the man she stabbed to death. investigating several mass killings of banana plantation workers, linked Sentence", in Seattle Times, October 30, 1995. p. A2. An Islamic court curtail her legal work. Death threats also preceded the shotgun killing of lawyer who provides legal aid for political prisoners and the Domingo Siazon will investigate the working conditions of Filipinas in reason was ever given for her detention. Solema Jubilan, a Filipino lawyer urged the Confederation Generalle des Travail to “take a clear, strong and comprehensive agenda against imperialism and to define a program for a new proletarian-led social order towards genuine socialism and supplant forever imperialism’s new world order.” The Kilusang Mayo Uno also thanked the congress for passing a resolution calling for the unconditional acquittal of Filipino worker Sarah Balabagan in the United Arab Emirates. In his letter of thanks to the congress, Beltran said the resolution was a “realization of workers’ international solidarity that would make an impact on the UAE government and all concerned.” Beltran was also there to give French workers and foreign delegates to the congress an idea of the trade union situation in the Philippines. He was able to meet and exchange ideas with various trade union leaders from different countries. While in France, Beltran participated in three marches in solidarity with French Prime Minister’s Alain Juppe’s package of government subsidies and social welfare cuts. [=]

48000. -------. “1996: of Portents to Come: Kilusang Mayo Uno Chairperson Beltran Attends Confederation Generale des Travail”, in Correspondence (Kilusang Mayo Uno), November-December 1995. p. 10. Kilusang Mayo Uno Chairperson Crispin Beltran attended the forty fifth Congress of the Confederation Generale des Travail in France last 12/3-8/1995 and participated in the general strike launched by workers in the French capital. Beltran attended the congress to extend Kilusang Mayo Uno’s solidarity to the Confederation Generale des Travail, to find out the new policies the congress might pass, and to explore specific issues which the Kilusang May Uno and Confederation Generale des Travail may work on together. In his message to the Confederation Generale des Travail’s forty fifth congress, Beltran on behalf of Kilusang Mayo Uno noted that the gathering came at a time of “great workers’ upheavals in France against anti-worker government policies in conjunction with the dictates of monopoly capitalism.” “It also coincides with the Philippines’ centennial of the national democratic revolution continuously being waged by the workers and the people to win national democracy and socialism,” the Kilusang Mayo Uno statement said. Kilusang Mayo Uno recognizes the “worldwide impact” of the French workers’ one hundred years of struggle and the inspiration which it has given to working class movements worldwide. “Your experiences in victories or defeats, happiness or sorrows, are shared by many of us—all in the defence and advancement of working class interests towards a just, democratic, humane and progressive social order,” Beltran said. While aluding the congress’ calls for solidarity, full employment, democracy, alliance and unity, the Kilusang Mayo Uno said the Confederation Generale des Travail should do more. The Kilusang Mayo Uno urged the Confederation Generale des Travail to “take a clear, strong and comprehensive agenda against imperialism and to define a program for a new proletarian-led social order towards genuine socialism and supplant forever imperialism’s new world order.”

The Kilusang Mayo Uno also thanked the congress for passing a resolution calling for the unconditional acquittal of Filipino worker Sarah Balabagan in the United Arab Emirates. In his letter of thanks to the congress, Beltran said the resolution was a “realization of workers’ international solidarity that would make an impact on the UAE government and all concerned.” Beltran was also there to give French workers and foreign delegates to the congress an idea of the trade union situation in the Philippines. He was able to meet and exchange ideas with various trade union leaders from different countries. While in France, Beltran participated in three marches in solidarity with French Prime Minister’s Alain Juppe’s package of government subsidies and social welfare cuts. [=]

48001. -------. “Abu Dhabi: Filipina Maid to Be Retried For Killing Arab Employer [teenage maid was sentenced to seven years for killing an employer who raped her]”, in Seattle Times, July 31, 1995. p. A6. [TXT]

48003. -------. “Filipina Convicted of Killing Arab Employer Files Appeal [Sarah Balabagan files appeal; Philippine Foreign Affairs Secretary Domingo Siazon will investigate the working conditions of Filipinas in UAE]”, in Seattle Times, September 19, 1995. p. A5. [TXT]

48004. -------. “Filipina Maid Gets Lashes, One Year In Jail As Sentence”, in Seattle Times, October 30, 1995. p. A2. An Islamic court sentenced Sarah Balabagan to 100 lashes, a year in jail and deportation on payment of blood money to the family of the man she stabbed to death. A court previously determined she had been raped by the man she killed, and awarded her $27000 compensation, but refused to accept a self-defense plea. [TXT]

48005. -------. “Filipina Maid Returns Home a Hero; Teenager Escaped Death penalty for Killing Employer [Sarah Balabagan returns from UAE where she stabbed her employer when he tried to rape her; she was released after serving 3 months of a seven year sentence]”, in Seattle Times, August 1, 1996. p. A3. [TXT]

48006. -------. “Filipina Maid, 16, is Ruled Both Victim and Criminal in UAE; She Gets 7 Years For Killing Rapest Employer [Sarah Balabagan awarded $27000 for being raped; sentenced to seven years for killing in self-defense]”, in Seattle Times, June 26, 1995. p. A7. [TXT]

48007. -------. “News in Brief: Arabian Peninsula: Emarat Oil Fires Female Gas Attendants”, in Crescent International, July 1-15, 1996. p. 2. Emarat Oil, Dubai’s oil company, has taken another leaf from western, especially American, oil companies’ policy. Emarat Oil has started firing female gas attendants to attract customers. [=]

48008. -------. “News in Brief: Arabian Peninsula: UAE to Free Sarah Balabagan”, in Crescent International, July 16-31, 1996. p. 2. Sarah Balabagan, a Filipina maid jailed for killing her employer who tried to rape her, is set to be freed by the United Arab Emirates at the end of the month, an official said on 7/6/1996. Her case highlighted the plight of Filipina maids at the hands of corrupt shaikhs and other employers in the oil producing shaikhdoms. [=]

48009. -------. “Philippine Maid’s Death Sentence Dropped; Arab’s Family Accepts Compensation Amount [charges against Filipina maid Sarah Balabagan, 16, dropped; Balabagan claimed she stabbed her employer when he raped her]”, in Seattle Times, October 15, 1995. p. A2. [TXT]

48012. Amnesty International. Press Release: Women in The Front Line. London: Amnesty International, February 1991. [In country after country, women suffer assaults on their dignity by governments which give priority to their human rights. Women, men and children are imprisoned for their peaceful beliefs and activities, tortured, denied the right to a fair trial, put in prison and “disappeared” , and both judicially and extrajudicially executed. But women are also deliberately targeted for certain patterns of abuse solely or primarily because of their gender. Again and again they are viewed by governments as second class citizens who can be ill-treated with impunity] Women from all walks of life have been targeted for human rights abuse. In many cases, the reasons are connected with a woman’s occupation or peaceful, legitimate activities. Governments detain or direct violent attacks against women who are physicians, lawyers, journalists, trade unionists, teachers, housewives, human rights activists, community organizers and peasants. In the United Arab Emirates, Dhahia Khamsi-Meshair, a journalist whose published works include articles on the status of Arab women, was arrested in 5/1987. She was held without charge or trial for 10 weeks. No official reason was ever given for her detention. Solema Jubilan, a Filipino lawyer who provides legal aid for political prisoners and the disadvantaged, has been the target of death threats since 1986. The threats appear to be made by government security forces attempting to curtail her legal work. Death threats also preceded the shotgun killing of Maria Elena Diaz Perez, a Colombian judge, in 7/1989. She had been investigating several mass killings of banana plantation workers, linked to army personnel. Several other women judges investigating human rights violations attributed to military and paramilitary forces have received death threats.

730

Some of them have left the country. Women have also been targeted because of their work to protect women's rights. Cecilia Olea, who belongs to the Flora Tristan women's group in Peru, has received death threats from a paramilitary group reportedly linked to the armed forces. Flora Tristan members publicize women's issues through the media, organize educational programs, and provide legal and social assistance to working women. The author of this passage intensifies a woman's torture and ill-treatment. Whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted for the purposes such as obtaining information or punishing, intimidating, or coercing a person. Rape is used to intimidate women from pursuing particular activities and to extract information or "confessions" from them. Rape is also used as a punitive measure. In June 1986, government soldiers in Myanmar (formerly Burma) were alleged to have repeatedly raped an 11-year-old girl and her 22-year-old-aunt who were discovered trying to return home after an officially declared curfew. In India, according to official estimates, about 1000 women (many of whom belong to the disadvantaged sectors of society known as the Scheduled Castes or Tribes, formerly the "Untouchables") are raped each year. Many of these rapes are reportedly committed by police. A Times of India editorial noted in 1986 that "custodial rapes seem to be occurring so frequently that 'cop molests woman' has become an almost daily fare for newspaper readers." Women are particularly vulnerable to rape between the time of arrest and arrival at official detention centers. In some countries, law enforcement officials or military personnel have committed rape and other sexual abuses without having officially arrested the victim. However, confinement in an official place of detention does not necessarily protect women from rape or other sexual abuses. Many have reported that prison guards have raped them or threatened them with rape.

Rape is used as a form of torture because those responsible fully realize that their victims may be constrained from revealing what has occurred. A common accompaniment to rape is a perpetrator's threat of additional violence if the victim tells anyone of the assault. The shame associated with rape can be a strong inducement to silence. In Colombia, a woman who testified in 1990 that military personnel had raped her in custody so that they had told her "to forget everything because my dignity as a woman was compromised, and my husband was not going to like knowing this". She was released only after agreeing to sign a statement declaring that she had been treated well in custody. She now lives in exile. Rape often carries traumatic social repercussions, which may be affected by a woman's cultural origins or social status. In some countries, a woman who has been raped may face reprisals from her relatives for bringing dishonor upon her family. Women are also subjected to heterosexual contact falling short of rape, verbal humiliation, threats of violent attack, or forced acts intended to degrade them. All of these violate their basic human rights by subjecting them to cruelty, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In Iran flogging is a punishment for offences such as failure to observe veiling or other clothing regulations. The authorities reportedly impose this punishment inconsistently; in some cases women reportedly have been flogged on the open streets without any legal proceedings whatsoever. While men and women both fall victim to a range of human rights violations it is women who are the predominant targets of certain patterns of abuse. Many women are subjected to human rights violations merely because they happen to be wives, mothers, daughters or friends of people whom the authorities consider to be "dangerous" or "undesirable". These women are threatened, held as substitutes for their relatives, tortured or even killed as governments attempt to exert their will over those closely connected in some way with the women.

In many African countries a strong tradition of family or community solidarity has protected prisoners in vulnerable situations. This has led some governments deliberately to exploit family relations, by imprisoning, threatening and harrassing prisoners' relatives. In Guinea, under the rule of the late President Sekou Toure, wives were pressured by the state to divorce their imprisoned husbands. Family asylum was also used to intensify a woman's torture and ill-treatment. Women who give birth in detention are particularly vulnerable to threats and abuses related to their newborn infants. In Iraq, babies have been taken from their detained mothers. The women have been forced to listen to their infants' cries while being denied access to comfort or feed them. The leading human rights activists in many societies are prisoners' relatives: often wives and children, endlessly in the front line, campaigning for the prisoner's release, confronting government officials, trying to care for the prisoner. Prisoners' families bear the burden of providing assistance of all sorts - from daily meals, medicine and clothing, through to raising funds to pay legal fees, ransoms or to publicize the case. Countless women are forced to live in the shadow of their husband's "disappearance". A woman may suddenly become her family's sole source of support just at the time when she is facing the absence of a close relative and is trying to locate the "disappeared" victim. She may be effectively widowed by her husband's "disappearance", yet unable to claim state or other benefits because her husband has not been declared dead, officially or legally. Members of the National Coordinating Committee of Widows of Guatemala, an Indian group known as CONAVIGUA, have denounced their government's attitude to providing compensation. The group has repeatedly alleged that government compensation is granted only if a widow attributes her husband's death to opposition guerilla forces and if she ceases to pursue investigation into her husband's death or "disappearance". Relatives of the "disappeared" face additional, emotional suffering. Women often refuse to give up hope and search for years for husbands and children who have "disappeared", even though relatively few victims of "disappearance" are found alive. But unless or until they reappear, or their bodies are found, their families suffer years of uncertainty, unable to properly mourn their loss and thus perhaps to lay their grief to rest. In areas of civil turmoil and armed conflict, women are often subjected to punishment simply because they live in a particular location or belong to a particular ethnic group. They are often caught in the crossfire between armed opposition groups and government forces, living under the threat of violence from both sides. The rape of peasant women, either while in formal custody or when held by soldiers during counterinsurgency operations, is systematic and common. Governments often are compliant in the face of such abuse. Effective investigations into cases of rape in these circumstances are rare and few perpetrators are ever brought to justice. A majority of adults who flee their countries are women. When fleeing persecution, some women are seperated from their families and lose the support provided by a community or familiar cultural environment. With few resources to protect them from abuse or to provide the means of redress, they become victims of a range of violations. Rape, abduction, sexual harassment and physical violence remain a reality for many refugee women. In addition, many women are forced to perform sexual acts to obtain documentation papers or reliefs goods for themselves and their children. Women may face particular problems in establishing their claim to refugee status. A well-founded fear of persecution for reasons such as race, religion, political opinion, or membership of a particular social group is an internationally accepted standard for granting asylum. However, as persecution often takes the form of sexual assault, few women are able to discuss this experience with a male interviewer. As well, immigration officials may fail to recognize that rape in these circumstances constitutes torture as defined in the United Nations Convention against Torture. Catalina Mejia, a dressmaker who worked in a province of El Salvador particularly affected by the 11-year-old conflict in that country, fled to the United States in 1985. She had been raped by a solder who had accused her of being a guerilla, and on two subsequent occasions was accussed by soldiers of being a guerilla.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
United Arab Emirates

Throughout the 1980's, and into the 1990's, patterns of arbitrary arrest, torture (including rape), and killings have continued in El Salvador. In denying Ms Mejia's application for political asylum in 1988, the United States immigration judge ruled that she had failed to establish that she would be at risk of persecution if returned to El Salvador. The judge stated in her decision that the rape of Ms. Mejia by a soldier who accused her of being a “guerilla” was not an act of persecution but “was because she was a female convenient for a brutal soldier acting only in his own self-interest”. Ms. Mejia's appeal against the decision, to the United States Board of Immigration Appeals, was pending in 12/1990. Women who chose not to remain silent in the face of human rights violations inflicted upon them may face barriers such as official tolerance of the injuries caused to them. If they are from disadvantaged social or economic groups, they may find that official channels of communications are closed to them.

Law enforcement officials may not listen, and they may have no place to turn. During the past decade, increasing numbers of women have spoken out for human rights protection. They have stated publicly and clearly what they and other members of their community have suffered. They have also organized community and national groups to protest against human rights abuses. In some countries their vulnerability to such abuse has increased as they have assumed public leadership roles and spoken out about the special measures needed to protect women's human rights. Despite this, they continue to make their demands heard. The Committee of Mothers and Relatives of Political Prisoners, the Disappeared and the Assassinated, known as COMARDES, has been prominent for many years in the struggle to protect human rights in El Salvador. COMARDES continues its work today, despite repeated threats against members of the group and violent attacks such as the 10/1989 bombing off its San Salvador office. The Mutual Support Group for the Appearance of Our Relatives Alive, known as GAM, has been a target of violence in Guatemala. GAM members press government authorities to account for the “disappeared”. Several GAM leaders were abducted and killed in 1985, apparently by government agents. Other GAM members are now the target of threats. The group's leader, Nineth Montenegro de Garcia has received so many death threats that human rights activists worldwide have sent appeals on her behalf to the Guatemalan authorities on a number of occasions. Her mother, whose house was strafed with machine gun fire in 1990, appears to be at risk from government forces or people associated with them. The bullets recovered from the attack reportedly were of a calibre known to be used by the military. Susan Aniban of Task Force Detainees, a human rights group in the Philippines, was reportedly detained and tortured in 11/1988. Numerous women human rights workers there have been subjected to such abuse. Women have played prominent roles in South African human rights organizations such as the Detainees' Parents Support Committee and the Black Sash. Despite decades of repression, women activists have continued to mobilize against mass detentions, torture, and the injustices perpetrated by apartheid. The determination of women like these in the face of such persecution, along with the courage of many other women and men who continue to fight for human rights, has yielded significant results in recent years. More information than ever before is now available to the international community about the violence against women worldwide. The momentum to end patterns of abuses has increased as more women have joined efforts to publicize the facts and to press for change. Amnesty International and other human rights organizations have joined in these efforts. A growing number of Amnesty International sections have established working groups and networks to carry out long-term work on behalf of women who have been subjected to human rights abuse. In February, representatives from a number of sections will meet in Geneva, Switzerland, to develop an international action plan to promote Amnesty International's work on behalf of women. [↩]

48013. Bel Fekih, Cherif Moulay. Modern Secondary Education In The United Arab Emirates: Development, Issues And Perspectives (Education Development). Temple University. Dissertation. 249pp. AAC 9316454. [Advisor: Amato, Anthony] This dissertation examines the secondary education system in the United Arab Emirates and attempts to trace its development in the following areas: goals and objectives, structure, human and material resources, students, curriculum and instruction, graduates and the differential impact it has on different groups. Major issues were identified and its future perspectives discussed. There were three stages of development of modern education in general in what is now the United Arab Emirates: (1) From 1905-1953 (2) From 1953-1971 (3) From 1971-1995. The period from 1953-1971 saw educational missions from neighboring countries such as Kuwait, Qatar, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. It was in this period that secondary education began. Enrollments grew slowly and students were mainly male. (3) The creation of the federation in 1971 gave an impetus to secondary education and enrollments soared under a unified Ministry of Education. The turning points in the development of education in general were the setting up by Britain of the Trucial States Council in 1953, the rise of Arab nationalism under Egyptian president Nasser and the setting up in 12/1971 of the new state grouping the seven emirates of the Trucial States Council, the perfect welfare state keen to provide all kinds of social services, of which education, to its citizens. Materials gathered through interviews, primary and secondary data reveal remarkable continuity in objectives and ways of achieving them despite reorientations the system has undergone since its introduction. Despite all the components of a good system e.g., adequate financing, qualified and experienced teachers, the system is found to be plagued by low internal and external efficiency as drop out rates are high and the curriculum largely theoretical and fails to prepare students to function adequately in an economy still run by expatriates. It was found that females, expatriates and secondary level students outperform males, nationals and middle level students as measured by examination results and drop-out rates. No significant differences exist between urban and rural students in achievement. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,] [↩]

48014. Bracey, Derek. “In Brief: Filipina Sentenced to Death”, in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), October 2, 1995. p. 2. A court in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) sentenced Sarah Balabagan, 16, to death on 9/16/1995 for killing her employer when he attempted to rape her. The Filipina, who was working as a maid, had been convicted on 6/26/1995 for the death and sentenced to seven years in prison. Balabagan's lawyer said he would appeal the verdict. The earlier court ruling accepted Balabagan's explanation that she killed in self-defense and awarded her $27000. It also ordered her to pay $41000 as “blood money" to his family. Balabagan's case is being followed closely in the Philippines, where up to 6.5 million workers are employed in other countries. Of 100000 immigrant maids in the UAE, 20000 are from the Philippines. Tens of thousands of Filipinos protested the execution of Flor Contemplacion in 3/1995, another worker from the Philippines employed as a maid in Singapore. [↩]

48015. DS. “Near East and North Africa: United Arab Emirates: Part 01: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a federation of seven emirates established in 1971. None have democratically elected institutions or political parties. Each emirate retains extensive control over internal and external efficiency as drop out rates are high and the curriculum largely theoretical and fails to prepare students to function adequately in an economy still run by expatriates. It was found that females, expatriates and secondary level students outperform males, nationals and middle level students as measured by examination results and drop-out rates. No significant differences exist between urban and rural students in achievement. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,] [↩] members manage to reach top positions in the Federal Government. The is enough for the emploYee's basic needs and to secure a means of the UAE's Shi'a minority has enjoyed commercial success, few of their Social Affairs. The purpose of the review is to ensure that the pay offered relatively new to government service and because there continues to be Workers in the industrial and service sectors are normally employed positions, but there are few women in senior positions because they are practiced. Most of the work force is composed of foreign nationals.

other prominent tribal rulers. Women are free to hold government grant workers the right to engage in collective bargaining, and it is not choice of a new emirate ruler falls to the ruling family in consultation with Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. UAE law does not national level Members of the Federal National Council (FNC) are sources report a low incidence of medical cases resulting from spouse abuse is rarely reported in the UAE. Knowledgeable sensitive to the Government. [=] 48016. DS. "Near East and North Africa: United Arab Emirates: Part 13: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Most women play a family-centered, subordinate role in UAE society because of the frequency of early marriage and traditional attitudes about women's activities. As noted earlier, husbands may bar their wives and children from leaving the country without their consent, and married women may not take employment without their husbands' written consent. In cases of divorce, Islamic law is observed. The woman receives custody of children until they are 7 years of age. After that a child usually lives with his or her father unless there are circumstances that convince judicial authorities that custody should be given to the mother. In divorce cases in which the mother is a non-Muslim or a foreigner, the court usually rants custody to the father regardless of the child's age. A woman who remarries forfeits her right to the custody of children from a previous marriage. Polygyny, in accordance with Islamic law, is permitted for men. In practice, few UAE men have more than one wife. Women are restricted from holding majority shares in most major types of businesses. UAE women employed outside the home generally receive equal pay for equal work. A woman's property is not commingled with that of her husband's.

movement to advance rapidly. Female enrollment at the UAE University, for example, now constitutes 70% of the student body, thought this is partially attributable to the fact that UAE women rarely study abroad, as many UAE men do. Opportunities for women are also growing in government service and in traditional occupations such as education and health. Women are officially encouraged to continue their education, and government-sponsored women's centers provide adult education and technical training courses. The UAE military service accepts women volunteers in the officer corps and as enlisted personnel. A special military training course for women, started after the Gulf war, continues. Spouse abuse is rarely reported in the UAE. Knowledgeable sources report a low incidence of medical cases resulting from spouse abuse. However, when reported, the local police authorities take action to protect women from abuse. UAE laws also protect women from verbal abuse or harassment from men, and violators are subject to criminal action. There continue to be credible reports of abuse of female domestic servants by both UAE and foreign employers, but the authorities do take action against the offender when an incident is reported. [=] 48018. DS. "Near East and North Africa: United Arab Emirates: Part 20: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (b) The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. UAE law does not grant workers the right to engage in collective bargaining, and it is not practiced. Most of the work force is composed of foreign nationals. Workers in the industrial and service sectors are normally employed under contracts that are subject to review by the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs. The purpose of the review is to ensure that the pay offered is enough for the employee's basic needs and to secure a means of...
women in the middle east and north africa
united arab emirates

women in the middle east and north africa
united arab emirates living. For the resolution of work-related disputes, workers must rely on conciliation committees organized by the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs or on special labor courts. Domestic servants and agricultural workers are not covered by UAE labor laws and thus have great difficulty in obtaining any assistance in resolving labor disputes. In the free port where manufacturing takes place, the same laws and regulations apply as in the rest of the country. [=]

48019. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section
1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance
Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
GPO, February 1995. There were no reports of torture in 1994. The Constitution prohibits torture or degrading treatment. Shari'a, or Islamic, courts frequently impose flogging on Muslims found guilty of adultery, prostitution, and drug and alcohol abuse. According to press accounts, punishments for adultery and prostitution have ranged from 80-100 lashes.
In several cases, Muslims convicted of drunkenness have been sentenced to 80 lashes. Non-Muslims may also be sentenced to such punishments, but the Federal Supreme Court ruled in 1993 that convictions do not require the imposition of Shari'a penalties on non-Muslims. In 1994 several non-Muslims were reportedly sentenced to lashing after their convictions for adultery and prostitution. There was no indication that the punishments were carried out. No amputations were known to have been carried out. [=]

48020. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section
2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
GPO, February 1995. There are no limitations on freedom of movement or relocation within the country, except near defense and oil installations. Unrestricted foreign travel and emigration are permitted to male citizens except those involved in financial disputes under adjudication. However, a husband may bar his wife and children from leaving the country without his permission. All citizens have the to return. There is a small population of stateless residents, many of whom have lived in the UAE for more than one generation. They are Beduins or the descendants of Beduins who are unable to prove that they are of UAE origin. The Government does not issue them passports. Citizens are not restricted in seeking or changing employment. However, foreign workers, except for primarily professional, one may not change employers without first leaving the country for 6 months. This law is often not enforced. The government does not have any formal procedure for accepting refugees. It may detain persons seeking refugee status, particularly non-Arabs, while they await resettlement in a third country. There is no formal procedure for naturalization, although foreign women receive citizenship by marriage to a UAE citizen, and anyone may receive a passport by presidential fiat. [=]

48021. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section
3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance
Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
GPO, February 1995. The UAE has no formal democratically elected institutions, and citizens do not have the right to change their government or even to form political parties. Although there are consultative councils at the federal and emirate levels, most executive and legislative power is in the hands of the Federal Supreme Council. The seven emirate rulers, their extended families, and those persons and families to whom they are allied by historical ties, marriage, or common interest wield most political power in their own emirates. Decisions at the federal level are generally made by consensus of the sheikhs of the seven emirates and their leading families. A federal consultative body, called the Federal National Council (FNC) consists of advisers appointed by the rulers of each emirate. The FNC has no legislative authority but may question ministers and make policy recommendations to the Cabinet. Its sessions are usually public. The choice of a new emirate ruler falls to the ruling family in consultation with other prominent tribal figures. By tradition, the rulers and ruling families are presumed to have the right to rule, but their incumbency ultimately depends on the quality of their leadership and their responsiveness to their subjects' needs. Emirate rulers are accessible, in varying degrees, to citizens who have a problem or a request. Tradition rather than law has limited the rob of women. Women are free to hold government positions, but there are few women in senior positions because they are relatively new to government service and because there is pressure in many families against women entering the workplace. Although the small Shi'a Muslim minority has enjoyed commercial success, few Shi'a Muslims have top positions in the Federal Government. [=]

48022. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section
5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance
Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government is committed to the welfare of children. Children receive free health care, free education, and guaranteed housing. There is no pattern of societal abuse of children. [=]

48023. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section
5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations,
United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance
Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia:
GPO, February 1995. Most women play a subordinate role in society because of the frequency of early marriage and traditional attitudes about women's activities. As noted in Section 2.d., husbands may bar their wives and children from leaving the country and married women may not accept employment without their husbands' written consent. Islamic law is applied in cases of divorce. The woman receives custody of children until they are 7 years of age. Children older than 7 years live with their fathers unless judicial authorities decide otherwise. In divorce cases in which the mother is a non-Muslim or a foreigner, the court usually grants custody to the father regardless of the child's age. A woman who remarries forfeits her right to the custody of children from a previous marriage. Islamic law permits polygamy for men, but they rarely practice it. Women are restricted from holding majority shares in most businesses. Women who work outside the home generally receive equal pay or equal work, but do not receive equal benefits, such as housing.
Women continue to make rapid progress in education. They constitute 70% if the student body at the UAE University, largely because women rarely study abroad. Opportunities for women have grown in government service, education, and health services. Women are officially encouraged to continue their education, and government-sponsored women's centers provide adult education and technical training courses. The armed forces accept women volunteers. There is a special military training course for women which started after the Gulf War. Spousal abuse is rarely reported. When reported, the local police authorities may take action to protect women from abuse. The laws protect women from verbal abuse or harassment from men. Violators are subject to criminal action. There continue to be credible reports of abuse of female domestic servants by both UAE and foreign employers (see Section 6.e.). The law prohibits cohabitation by unmarried couples. The Government may imprison or deport noncitizens or women if they bear children out of wedlock. In the event that courts sentence such women to prison, the local authorities will hold the newborn children in a special facility until the mothers’ release and deportation. Children may remain in this facility longer in the event of a custody dispute. [=]

734

48024. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (b) The Right to Organize and Bargain Collectively", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The law does not grant workers the right to engage in collective bargaining, and it is not practiced. Workers in the industrial and service sectors are normally employed under contracts that are subject to review by the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs. The purpose of the review is to ensure that the pay will satisfy the employee's basic needs and secure a means of living. For the resolution of work-related disputes, workers must rely on conciliation committees organized by the Ministry Labor & Social Affairs or on special labor courts. Labor laws do not cover domestic servants and agricultural workers, who have difficulty in obtaining any assistance to resolve their labor disputes. In the Jebel Ali free zone in Dubai Emirate, the same labor laws apply as in the rest of the country. [=]

48025. DS. "United Arab Emirates: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There is no legislated or administrative minimum wage. Supply and demand determine compensation. However, according to the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs, there is an unofficial, unwritten, minimum wage rate which would afford a worker and family a minimal standard of living. As noted in Section 6.e., the Labor & Social Affairs Ministry reviews labor contracts and does not approve contracts that stipulate a clearly unacceptable wage. The standard workday and workweek are 8 hours a day, 6 days a week, but these standards are not strictly enforced. Certain types of workers, notably domestic servants, may be obligated to work longer than the mandated standard hours. The law also provided a minimum of 24 days a year of annual leave plus ten national and religious holidays. In addition, manual workers are not required to do outdoor work when the temperature exceeds 45 degrees Celsius (112 degrees F). Most foreign workers receive either employer-provided housing or a housing allowance, medical care and homeward passage from their employers. Most foreign workers do not earn the minimum salary of approximately $1370 a month required to obtain a residency visa for their families. Employers have the option to petition for a one-year ban from the work force against any foreign employee who leaves his job without fulfilling the terms of his contract. The Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, municipalities and civil defense units enforce health and safety standards. The Government requires every large industrial concern to employ a certified occupational safety officer. An injured worker is entitled to fair compensation. Health standards are not uniformly observed in the housing camps provided for foreign workers. Workers’ jobs are not protected if they remove themselves from what they consider to be unsafe working conditions. However, the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs may require employers to reinstate workers dismissed for not performing unsafe work. All workers have the right to lodge grievances with ministry officials, who make an effort to investigate all complaints. However, the Ministry is understaffed and underbudgeted so that complaints and compensation claims are backlogged. Complaints may be appealed to the Ministry and ultimately to the courts. However, many workers do not protest for fear of reprimands or deportation. There have been reports, some published in the local press, of abuses suffered by domestic servants, particularly women, by their employers. Allegations have included excessive work hours, extremely low wages, and verbal and physical abuse. [=]

48026. Noakes, Greg [Compiler]; American Education Trust. "Issues in the News: From the Middle East Press: Big Bucks for UAE Bridesgrooms", in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (American Education Trust, Box 53062, Washington DC 20009), April/May 1993. pp. 55-57. Men in the UAE who marry local women will be offered up to $200000 to cover the cost of marriage, according to the official WAM news agency. The high costs of weddings and inflated dowries for local women have prompted many men in the emirates to look abroad when considering marriage. Labor and Social Affairs Minister Sair Al-Jarwan said the offer was designed to control the “negative results on future generations” of marriages between UAE men and foreign women. [=]

48027. Williams, Maurice. "In Brief: Philippine Maid Spared Death", in Militant (SWP), November 20, 1995, p. 2. Sarah Balabagan, a Philippine maid sentenced to death for killing a man who raped her, was spared execution by an Islamic court in the United Arab Emirates. The court sentenced her to 100 lashes, a year in prison, and deportation after she pays a fine of $41000 to the dead man's family. The judge said the 15 months Balabagan had already sent in jail would not count toward her sentence. [=]
Yemen

50000. ---. "Briefs: Inquiry Into Fate of Yemenite Children [Justice Minister David Libai given authorization to tell Knesset it supports an inquiry into disappearance of Yemenite children in the 1950’s]. 5 bills by Avigdor Kahalani (Labor), David Mena, Yeshoshua Matza, and Ron Nahman (Likud), and Eliezer Zandberg (Tsomet) have been introduced on the issue. No formal action taken, while awaiting report by commission headed by Moshe Shalage."

50001. ---. "Criminal Inequality of Today’s World", in Revolutionary Worker, July 24, 1994. p. 13. According to a new United Nations report, the amount of wealth created in the world has been increasing at a remarkable rate. Over the past half a century, total world income increased sevenfold (in terms of "real gross domestic product") and the average income per person more than tripled. The so-called "human development index"—which measures income, life expectancy, literacy, and education—doubled in developed countries and increased by 80% even in the poorest countries. This means that human society has more and more means that could be used to eliminate poverty and hunger throughout the world. But that is no happening. Increases in average income or average literacy or average life expectancy doesn't mean that no people have more money, education or life span. As one expert told the Los Angeles Times (June 14), "That's like the man- with his head in the oven and his foot in the icebox. The average temperature doesn't tell the story." The new Human Development Report, released last month by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP), documents that the poor of the world are getting poorer and more desperate. The rich are getting richer. And the gap between the rich and poor is growing—not shrinking. In particular, the study confirms that most wealth is channeled to just a handful of countries. The UNDP refers to these wealthiest imperialist countries as "the industrialized countries" or "the North"—and it calls the poor, oppressed countries "the developing countries" or "the South." More and More Poverty Alongside Growing Wealth: The UNDP report shows that the world capitalism have created widespread and spreading absolute poverty—where a major part of humanity owns virtually nothing but the clothes on their backs and often does not know where their next meal is coming from. More than one billion people worldwide are surviving on the equivalent of $1 a day. More than a third of the people in the oppressed countries live below the poverty line (the minimum income that officials claim covers the basic necessities of life). The peoples of Latin America, Africa, and many parts of Asia have seen their desperately low standards of living decline even further over several decades. This worsening poverty is particularly sharp in Africa where many countries are poorer today than 30 years ago. Africa has twice the population of the United States, but the UNDP writes, "Africa's total wealth is just slightly above Belgium's." Belgium is a tiny, European country with a population the size of Ohio's. Nine of the world's ten poorest countries in the world are in Africa. The Arab country of Yemen was already one of the poorest countries in the world in 1988. But over just three years the average annual income per person dropped 14%—to $1374 in 1992. A fifth of Yemen lives in "absolute" poverty. Capitalist economics call countries like this "economically marginalized" because the world's capitalists do not see a way to make money off the masses of people in Yemen, the country is just left to stagnate. Yemen's Deputy Minister of Information told the Los Angeles Times "Yemen has its own peculiar problems, but a lot of what is happening here is like what is happening in the world. As it gets worse, we're going to witness a kind of revolution of the poor in all forms of unrest that is eventually bound to spill over into other areas too." According to the UNDP report, the majority of humanity (the poorest 80% of the world population) saw their share of world income drop between 1960-1991—while the share that went to richest 20% grew. The richest 1 billion people on earth—about 20% of the world's population—now receive almost 85% of wealth created on earth, while the poorest 1 billion receive less than 2%. This means that the top layer of world society takes 60 times as much wealth as the bottom. This gap between the richest and the poorest has doubled over the last 30 years— in the mid-'60s the top fifth of the world's population received 30 times what the bottom fifth did.

The Rich Poor Gap Within Countries: Capitalism has also widened the gap between rich and poor classes within countries. In Brazil, the top 20% earn 32 times more than the poorest today—a drop from 26 to 1 in just two years. South Africa's wealth and standard of living ranks it as 93rd in the world—right in the middle of the world's 173 countries. But if the white-settler minority within South Africa is looked at as a separate country, their living standard ranks 24th in the world, above Spain. If black South Africans are looked at as a separate country, they would rank 123rd— one of the poorest people in the world. The UNDP says that South Africa is "not just two different peoples, these are almost two different worlds." Poverty has also been increasing within many imperialist countries. Because of intense capitalist crises, between 20-70% of the populations in former Soviet bloc countries are at or below the poverty line. 40% of the population in Russia has dropped below the poverty line. In Russia, life expectancy has been dropping rapidly. Though the average per capita consumption of goods and services increased by 70% in the US over the last 25 years, fewer goods make it to those at the bottom: 15% of US children were poor in 1970, but today 20% are poor. The top 20% of the US population receives nine times as much wealth as the bottom 20%. This is the largest gap between rich and poor in the imperialist countries. The Intolerable Inequalities of This System: The workings of capitalism constantly produce criminal misuse and distribution of the world's wealth. Just one nuclear US aircraft carrier costs more than the GNP in 53 countries. Tremendous wealth is spent to enforce the world's status quo, while 20 million children in the Third World die each year from hunger and malnutrition. Stores in cities like Paris and New York routinely offer handbags and watches for $1500, while each of these luxury items costs more than the average person lives on for a whole year in over 40 countries. In the imperialist countries there is about one doctor per 400 people and an explosion of unnecessary cosmetic surgery for the rich. In oppressed countries, there is an average of one doctor for 7000 people and hundreds of millions of people die from easily preventable diseases. In short, the labor of billions of people has steadily increased the basis for eliminating poverty, hunger, and suffering—but the workings of world capitalism have systematically created more and more suffering in the midst of more and more wealth. As RCP Chaimlan Bob Avaldan points out in these quotes from his book, Bullets: "In today's world with its oppressing and lopsided social and international relations, starving children in Africa and-for that matter, the great majority of humanity, which lives only a few short steps from starvation—do not have the right to make plans for the distribution of the world's productive forces and resources in a way that could eliminate such starvation and misery and make possible a whole new life. Nor, for that matter, do the people in the 'advanced' imperialist countries have this right (or even the right to take practical, meaningful steps to forestall mass starvation in the very short run) even if they wish to do so. Such rights, and whole new visions of freedom, can become reality only through world-overturning revolution that in its ultimate achievement will sweep away the bourgeois notions of what constitute freedom and justice. To put it simply: we've reached the point now where not only is the world fucked-up, but it's upside down when it doesn't have to be any longer. If one is conscious of the fact that the world is dominated by imperialism and if one has any inkling of the consequences of this for the great majority of the world's people, then one should feel compelled to help shatter the whole imperialist system and its entire framework, to remake social relations on an international scale." what they considered a prosecutor's insult to women during a rape case. Prosecutor Abdul Aziz al-Thawrani said the allegations by a woman and her daughter that they had been raped by policemen were baseless. [=]

50003. AID. "Appendix B: Fact Sheet: AID's Women in Development Program: Highlights of the Agency's Women in Development Actions: Portfolio Reviews", in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger, United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 87-97. USAID/Yemen has undertaken a portfolio review of projects to assist with appropriate WID interventions. The suggested interventions will be used as the basis for developing scopes of work to be carried out by Title XII consortia technical specialists and thus will not only contribute to improving Yemeni women's participation in AID development projects, but also support PPC/WID efforts to ensure that WID activities are coordinated even when carried out by a variety of AID collaborators and contractors.

USAID/Bangladesh asked PPC/WID to assist in the preparation of a "Women in Development Implementation Plan" to promote the objectives of their existing women in development strategy. ICRW was able to work with the mission's Program Office, WID Committee, Project Managers and local government and PVO counterparts to review the Mission's portfolio of projects and programs and develop concrete WID goals, priorities, and targets for every project and organize them into a coherent plan. The plan give priority to certain agricultural activities, micro-enterprise development, education and training, and to a lesser extent food-for-work and infrastructure projects. The roles and responsibilities of different staff in the Mission and counterpart agencies were included in the guidelines for implementation, as were mechanisms for tracking progress. [=]

50004. AID. Congressional Presentation, FY 1995: Part 113: Asia and Near East: Yemen. District of Columbia: AID, February 22, 1994. FY 1995 Sustainable Development Request: $10.575 million. The Republic of Yemen is one of the most populous countries in the region in the Near East region with over 12 million people and the poorest, with per capita gross national product (GNP) at approximately $540 in 1991. In development terms, Yemen has great need for economic assistance, particularly in the categories on which the USAID program focuses. It is a country faced with formidable economic problems which have reached near-crisis proportions -- inflation is over 50%, the fiscal deficit is 20%-25% of GDP, total debt is 200% of gross domestic production (GDP) and unemployment is over 35%.

USAID SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT GOALS AND MISSION STRATEGIES (MSOs):
(1) Broad-Based Economic Growth: Increased Participation by Yemeni women and their families in Expanded Educational, Health and Economic Services in Project Areas. Women have traditionally played an invisible role in Yemeni society. Providing women with the tools to compete in an economic environment will empower them to have greater control over their own lives as well as that of their families and provide a greater contribution to Yemen's economic and societal development.

USAID is working with a women's development nongovernmental organization (NGO) to provide training and income generation opportunities. A small loan program is also being initiated and, of those women granted loans, over 200 will still be employed 12 months after receiving their loan. 90% of the borrowers will repay their loans within the required period. In addition, 480 women will participate in NGO-provided management training by 1997, including literacy training. 22% of the NGOs' regional centers will offer a standard package of training to women in their catchment area by 1997. While the actual number of beneficiaries from this program are expected to be small, it is the demonstration nature of the program that is so important. This is the first program of its kind in Yemen. If it succeeds, USAID expects that additional resources from other donors and perhaps the Yemeni Government will be devoted to similar efforts. USAID will track those resources and related activities which its own funds are able to leverage.

(2) Stabilizing Population Growth: Increased Participation by Yemeni Women and Their Families in Expanded Educational, Health and Economic Services in Project Areas. Yemen has one of the world's highest average fertility rates (7.6 children per family) and the most dangerous child and maternal mortality rates: 190 per 1000 live births and 1000 per 100000, respectively. In addition, the country's high population growth is outpacing the economy's ability to support its population. USAID has integrated family planning with maternal and child health into the strategy to bring the size of the technical force to bear on this problem by assisting in the development of more supporting national policies and improvements in service delivery. USAID will increase the number of new family planning users at project-assisted clinics from 4500 in 1993 to over 14000 in 1997. USAID is promoting the development of an integrated model of maternal and child health and family planning services for rural clinics, and will track the diffusion of this model to centers other than those which USAID is assisting. The percentage of targetted primary health care clinics meeting quality criteria will increase from 0% to 65%. USAID will also increase the availability of contraceptives at pharmacies by 50%. In addition, treatment of diarrhea with oral rehydration salts will increase. USAID is working with the new National Population Council to develop policies that encourage the expansion of family planning.

(3) Building Democracy: More Efficient and Accountable Governance. Assistance to Yemen is provided under the Bureau's strategic objective to achieve more efficient and accountable governance. Serious social and economic upheaval followed the unification of the former North and South Yemens. In the midst of daunting problems, Yemen produced a successful experiment in democratic pluralism in the 1993 parliamentary elections. Yemen is today the only country in the Arabian Peninsula with a multiparty system, universal sufrage and a free press. The USAID strategy for this objective is being updated and will provide a new set of indicators later in FY 1994.

USAID MISSION RESULTS: USAID's current strategy began in FY 1993. USAID will not have quantified reports on performance against the strategy until late 1994 when data for 1993 become available.

(1) Broad-Based Economic Growth: Increased participation by Yemeni women and their families in expanded educational, health and economic services in project areas. USAID is working with a Yemeni NGO, the "Yemeni Women's Association," to improve and expand women-specific services offered by its branches. Services include grass-roots support to further develop older girls' and women's literacy as well as enable them to become economically independent through the creation of small and micro enterprises. Literacy training includes learning useful skills in health and nutrition, and learning how to plan and organize an economic enterprise. USAID is also helping increase the availability of selected maternal and child health services. In 1993-1991, USAID supported a nationwide immunization campaign against childhood diseases that reached over 85% of infants. Coverage has dropped since the campaign but remains around 40% in rural areas, well above the pre-campaign level of 15%.

(2) Stabilizing Population Growth: Increased Participation by Yemeni Women and Their Families in Expanded Educational, Health and Economic Services in Project Areas. While it will likely be several years before family planning programs in Yemen will show an impact on population growth rates, studies indicate that pent up demand exists for such services. In dealing with the population growth problem, USAID has assigned high priority to the improved planning of population programs and the increased availability of quality family planning services in project areas. USAID was one of the principal donors to alert the Yemeni Government to its impending population crisis and to encourage it to develop a population strategy and action plan. USAID guided the integration of maternal and child health into the strategy. This integration assures that the provision of family planning services takes advantage of institutional health facilities familiar to women and their families.

If the USAID Mission's Sustainable Development Request is funded, USAID will be able to work with the mission's Program Office, WID Committee, Project Managers and local government and PVO counterparts to review the Mission's portfolio of projects and programs and develop concrete WID goals, priorities, and targets for every project and organize them into a coherent plan. The plan give priority to certain agricultural activities, micro-enterprise development, education and training, and to a lesser extent food-for-work and infrastructure projects. The roles and responsibilities of different staff in the Mission and counterpart agencies were included in the guidelines for implementation, as were mechanisms for tracking progress.

737 supported the election process. USAID has also provided a computerized voting system and initial operation and maintenance support services for the parliament chamber as well as enhanced administrative services to run the system.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-MANAGED ACTIVITIES: None.

OTHER DONORS: In 1992, the United States provided about 4% of total donor funding. The leading donors were the World Bank, the Netherlands, Japan, Germany and France.

FY 1995 SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT REQUEST: The Administration requests $10.575 million in Sustainable Development funds for: broad-based economic growth ($275000); population ($8.91 million); and democracy ($940000). [USAID Representative: William D.
McKinney.] [2]

50005. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 04: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign proscribes "physical punishment and degrading treatment." It is widely believed, however, that security officials resort with impunity to force or the threat of force to extract information from detainees. Some continued to be reports in the Yemeni press alleging torture and mistreatment by prison officials. Amnesty International reports that at the beginning of 1993 at least 60 of the 1000 persons arrested in anti-government riots in 12/1992 remained in detention. Some detainees were reportedly subjected to torture, including beatings and electric shocks. Credible reports indicate that Mansur Muhammad Ahmad Rahi, a writer and NDF activist, who remains imprisoned, has been subjected to torture throughout his incarceration. There was a credible report that a European tourist was detained and tortured in July. There were no reported instances of amputation in 1993. In seven out of eight cases in which amputation penalties were imposed, the Yemeni Supreme Court refused to confirm the sentences and in several cases ordered the prisoners released upon a finding that their periods of incarceration, which ranged up to 10 years, were adequate punishment. The eighth case was still pending. Substandard conditions in Yemeni prisons represent a threat to the health of inmates. Visitors from human rights organizations and local press reports have described inadequate food, medical, and sanitary facilities, and severe overcrowding. In the women's section of Sanaa central prison, prisoners were in some instances unable to obtain milk for their children who were incarcerated with them. Although they are theoretically banned, shackles are still used in a number of Yemeni prisons. Mentally ill persons are occasionally shackled, as are those involved in "blood-money" cases, i.e., prisoners held until they can pay a specified amount of compensation to the family of someone they have killed, usually in a traffic accident. [2]

50006. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US
House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Yemeni citizens enjoy freedom of travel within Yemen, although there are many checkpoints on major roads.
Foreigners are required to obtain permits for travel outside the capital, but the regulations are not strictly enforced and allow the Government to respond more quickly in case of need. Permission for most tourist travel is easily obtainable through travel agencies, and there are no reports of permission being denied. Most Yemenis are able to travel abroad freely and to emigrate. In contrast to 1992, Yemeni Jews are now able to emigrate with relatively little hindrance. The Government has taken the stand that Yemeni Jews, like all Yemenis, are entitled to passports and that if they follow the prescribed procedures they will be issued travel documents. This policy is being implemented in practice. For most Yemenis, obtaining passports is a relatively simple matter. Exit permit procedures have been simplified, and permits are generally available at the airport. However, young males who have not yet completed their service sometimes are prevented from leaving abroad. Moreover, women seeking exit visas are often asked to prove that male relatives do not object to their travel. There have been no reports of Yemenis being denied the right to return. Following a dramatic increase in the number of refugees (primarily from Horn of Africa countries) in 1992 from about 10000 to over 60000, the influx in 1993 was insignificant.
There are no known cases of refugees being denied asylum and there were no reports of forced repatriation. Many of the refugees have family or tribal ties to Yemen and have found work in Yemen. The Government has offered Somalis without ethnic affiliation to Yemen asylum under the care of UNHCR. The Government closely monitors all political activity by refugees. Many of the Palestinians who arrived in Yemen from Lebanon in 1982-1983 have departed, the remainder live in camps near Sanaa and Aden are closely watched by the security services. Other Palestinians are employed, often as teachers or business people, and are not subject to significant restrictions on their freedom of movement. [2]

50007. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 12: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The right of the citizens of Yemen to change their government was successfully tested—at least to some degree—by the holding of the new Republic's first elections in April in which 301 members of Parliament were chosen and which were generally judged to be free and open. All the top leaders of the former YAR and PDRY have remained in power after unification. The Constitution divides powers to the Parliament: these include electing the President and the Council of Ministers. However, the President ordered confidence from the Government, questioning the Prime Minister and other Ministers, ratifying international agreements, and approving the budget. In its initial sessions, the Parliament vetoed some government-sponsored bills and requested modifications in others. Parliament has shown less independence on issues of substance, as in the debates over constitutional amendments.
Implementation of laws passed by the Parliament has been uneven as local government and other officials retain considerable discretion in interpreting and enforcing the law. A five-member Presidential Council with broad executive powers has functioned since unification. Its chairman is the former YAR President, Ali Abdullah Saleh, and its Vice Chairman, the Yemeni Socialist Party (YSP) Secretary General, Ali Salen al-Bish. The Council's executive powers include the right to pass laws by decree when the Parliament is not in session. Laws passed by decree must be submitted for review by the Parliament within 30 days. The Council appointed Haydar Abu Bakr al-Attas Prime Minister in 5/1990, and he formed a government now comprised of 30 ministries, divided among the three coalition members. The new Constitution permits political parties, although by law their programs may not oppose the Islamic religion or the goals of the Yemeni revolution or violate Yemeni international commitments. Under the law, government financial support must be given to recognized political parties, and parties may establish their own newspapers. Even before unification, while technically illegal in both the YAR and the PDRY, new political parties began to organize. There are currently 54 political parties in Yemen, but only one has been registered in accordance with the 1991 political parties law. Women may vote and hold office by law, although this right is limited in practice by cultural and religious traditions. Two members of the 301-member Parliament are women, and few women hold senior leadership positions in the Government or political parties. [2]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Yemen

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

50009. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Although the Constitution provides for equality of the sexes, significant restrictions on women are imposed by tradition and law. Under current law, polygamy is allowed, husbands may divorce their wives without justifying their actions before the court, and, in case of divorce, both the family home and the children are often awarded to the husband. Until this year the relatively progressive family law from the south was still applied in Aden. Earlier this year, however, a presidential decree containing more restrictive regulations against women was issued. Since it has never been ratified by Parliament, it technically is not law. A prominent lawyer in Aden, however, cites from personal experience before the courts their enforcement of the more restrictive regulations. The institution of dowry payments is widespread. The amount of payments has continued to increase; government efforts at limiting their size have been ineffective, due to societal restraints. Societal pressures also often force women to defer to the guidance of male colleagues and the general supervision of male relatives as, for example, in seeking to travel abroad. Education of women in significant numbers began in the YAR only at the end of the civil war in 1970, although education of women in the PDRY was more advanced. It is conservatively estimated that 80% of Yemeni women are illiterate (some estimates range as high as 9%), compared to 40-50% of all men. In Aden, women work in midlevel jobs in several ministries and in banks and other businesses. Yemen's largest factory group employs women on the same pay scale as men, and women have risen through the ranks to lower management positions. There are female judges and lawyers in Aden and lesser members in the north. The Ministry of Justice has only one female employee. Wife beating and other physical abuse of women does occur in Yemeni families. Statistics on wife beating are unavailable. Although there is little public discussion of this matter, it has received increasing attention in the press. The female victim usually turns to a male relative to pressure the perpetrator to stop the abuse- she may seek a legal remedy, but social traditions usually compel women and their male relatives to seek mediation and keep the matter within the extended family. There is a government-sponsored women's association which promotes female education and civic responsibilities. [=]

50010. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Yemeni Government claims to be fully committed to protecting children's rights and hosted an international children's rights seminar in 1993. In the face of continued government preoccupation with the political crisis, however defense of children's rights is a low priority. Yemen is an extremely impoverished nation and cannot provide all the health, education, and welfare benefits children enjoy in more developed countries. There is, however, a system of universal education for children, as well as Government health clinics. Child marriage remains common in rural areas. A form of female genital mutilation, clitorectomy, is practiced in the Thama Red Sea coastal region and in the region of the Hadramaut along the Gulf of Aden, especially among Yemenis of African origin. The extent of the practice is unknown. While some government health workers in the Thama actively discourage clitorectomy, there is no government directive or guidance against the practice. Conservative social mores effectively prevent public discussion or government acknowledgment of the practice. [=]

50011. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 18: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (e) Religious Minorities", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Apart from several Adeni Christian families and 20-30 underground Bahais in the north, Jews are Yemen's only indigenous religious minority. By custom, non-Muslims are not permitted to carry weapons, traditionally carried by Muslim Yemenis. With the recent lifting of travel restrictions, the most blatant form of discrimination against Jews has been removed. More subtle forms of discrimination, such as lack of political and economic opportunities, and the inability of Jewish men to marry outside the Jewish community, remain. Such discrimination is usually the result of custom rather than government policy, however. [=]

50012. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Yemen: Part 23: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There was no minimum age for employment of children in the YAR. Labor by minors aged 12-14 was regulated by the Labor Code. In the PDRY the Labor Code prohibited the employment of children (defined as between 7 and 12 years of age) and regulated that of young persons (between 12 and 16 years of age), although these provisions were not rigorously enforced. Currently, apprentice employment of young persons aged 14 and older is permitted. This minimum age requirement is not enforced, and child labor is common throughout Yemen, particularly in rural areas. For the most part, it is sanctioned by family tradition, and it is not uncommon to see children working in workshops or stores. In the south, child labor often occurs on family, cooperative, and state farms. [=]

50013. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution is ambiguous on its prohibition of cruel or inhuman punishments. It states that the Government may not impose President. The President has the authority to introduce legislation and genital mutilation, the Government has not passed any legislation or nor.

...power still rests in the hands of relatively few leaders, particularly the practice. While some government health workers discourage female child marriage is still common in rural areas. Female genital mutilation.

1993 parliamentary election. Although the Government is accountable to civil war. Moreover, the Government lacks the resources necessary to.

Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Yemeni Human Rights Organization is the only local nongovernmental human rights group. It is headquartered in Sanaa with branches in seven other cities. The Yemeni Organization for the Defense of Liberties and Human Rights, wasbased in Aden. After the civil war, the Government dissolved it because it was purportedly regarded as a separatist" organization. There is a human rights committee in Parliament, which has done little of significance aside from holding meetings and hosting an international 50016. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 4: Governmental Attitude Regarding International and NGO Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Yemeni Human Rights Organization is the only local nongovernmental human rights group. It is headquartered in Sanaa with branches in seven other cities. The Yemeni Organization for the Defense of Liberties and Human Rights, wasbased in Aden. After the civil war, the Government dissolved it because it was purportedly regarded as a separatist" organization. There is a human rights committee in Parliament, which has done little of significance aside from holding meetings and hosting an international childrens rights conference in 1993. Amnesty International and Middle Eastern Watch observe Yemen closely, especially in the wake of the civil war. There is an International Committee of the Red Cross representative resident in Yemen. The Government has given these groups relatively broad access to government officials, records, refugee camps, and prisons. [=]

50014. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended, Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government does not obstruct the freedom of travel, although the army and security forces maintain checkpoints on major roads. The Government does not obstruct travel abroad or the right to emigrate and return. In recent years it has removed bureaucratic obstacles that prevented most Jews from traveling abroad. Women must often obtain permission from a male relative before applying for a passport. The Constitution prohibits the extradition of a citizen to any country. [=]

50015. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. International observers judged as generally as free and fair the 1993 parliamentary election. Although the Government is accountable to the Parliament, there are significant limitations on the ability of the people to affect change within their society. To date the Parliament is not an effective counterweight to executive authority it has done little more than debate issues. Decisionmaking is not transparent, and real political power still rests in the hands of relatively few leaders, particularly the President. The President has the authority to introduce legislation and promulgate laws by decree when Parliament is not in session. Decrees must be approved by Parliament within 30 days after reconvening. In theory, if the decree is not approved, it does not become law; in practice, very little happens if the decree is not approved. The President appoints the Prime Minister who forms the Government. The Cabinet is comprised of 27 ministers, with 16 ministers from the GPC, 9 from Islaah, and 2 independents. In northern and southern governorates, tribal leaders retain considerable discretion in the interpretation and enforcement of the law. Central government authority in these areas is often weak. Some observers maintain that tribalism may promote accountable government in some ways by dramatically drawing the Government's attention to the grievances of the people. There is a functioning multiparty system. All parties must register with the Government, but such registration is routinely granted. The Constitution prohibits the establishment of parties that are contrary to Islam or oppose the goals of the Yemeni revolution or violate Yemeni international commitments. By law the Government must give financial support to all recognized parties, and parties are permitted to establish their own newspapers. Many of the approximately 50 political parties are very small and exist on paper only. The three largest are the GPC, the Islah Party, and the YSP. The opposition is weak and divided among miniparties, except for the YSP which, even in its weakened state, still has weight, especially in the South. Although women may vote and hold office, these rights are limited by cultural and religious custom. Only 2 women have been elected to the 301-member Parliament, and few hold senior leadership positions in the Government or political parties. [=]

50017. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government's commitment to protecting childrens' rights was adversely affected by the political crisis and the civil war. Moreover, the Government lacks the resources necessary to ensure adequate health, education, and welfare services for children. Child marriage is still common in rural areas. Female genital mutilation is practiced by Yemenis of African origin in the coastal areas along the Red and Arabian seas. There is no available information on the extent of the practice. While some government health workers discourage female genital mutilation, the Government has not passed any legislation or nor.
made any other effort to eradicate the practice. [6]

50018. DS. "Yemen: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 5208(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Prior to 1994 the Constitution stated that no discrimination shall be practiced due to sex, color, racial origin, language, occupation, social status, or religious beliefs." However, as amended in 1994, the Constitution now states that "all citizens are equal in general rights and duties." The change has been interpreted as an attempt to weaken previous constitutional guarantees of equality, especially for women. Women face significant restrictions imposed by law and social custom. Men are permitted to take as many as four wives, provided they treat their wives equally. Husbands may divorce wives without justifying their actions before a court and, in the case of divorce, both the family home and children are often awarded to the husband. Women also have the right to divorce their husbands in accordance with precepts of Shar’a. Islamic law permit a Muslim man to marry a Christian or Jewish woman, but no Muslim woman may marry outside of Islam. Social pressure often forces women to defer to the guidance of male relatives if they wish to travel abroad. Married women do not have the right to confer citizenship on their foreign-born spouses; but they may confer citizenship on children born in Yemen of foreign-born fathers. The practice of dowry payments is widespread, despite government efforts to limit the size of such payments. An estimated 80% of women are illiterate, compared to 40-50% percent of men. In general, women in Aden are better educated and have somewhat greater employment opportunities than women in northern Yemen. Before the civil war, women in Aden worked in private business and at mid-level government jobs. Several women worked as lawyers and judges. After the civil war, the number of working women in Aden appears to have declined. Many observers say this is due to the increasing "Islamization" of Adeni society, although there is no concrete evidence of this. Although spousal abuse is known to occur, reliable statistics on its extent are unavailable, and there is little public discussion of this matter. In theory, abused women have the right to sue their husbands, but few do so. According to social tradition, battered women are pressured to keep spousal violence problems within the family. They may seek help and mediation from male relatives to halt abuse. The Government has established a women's association to promote female education and civic responsibilities, and a nongovernmental organization has also been established for the same purpose. [6]

50019. Dixon, Ruth B.; AID; DS; Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination: Office of Women in Development, WID. "Part 04: Current Evaluations of Women in Development Projects: A Review and Analysis: Background", in Assessing the Impact of Development Projects on Women, District of Columbia: Department of State, AID, Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination, Office of Women in Development (WID), May 1980. The Elliott and Sorsby report includes profiles of 43 projects funded by AID or by private voluntary organizations (PVOs) in which women are specified as beneficiaries (in whole or in part) and, for AID projects, that have been evaluated. A number of these do not comply with the more restrictive definition proposed by AID's Office of Women in Development, however, which identifies a WID project as one designed for women only to help them "catch up" with men, or one with a strong women's component as an integral part of a general project. AID's definition, which emphasizes women's economic roles, excludes activities such as maternal and child health or family planning that do not reach women and girls, and services in the absence of training or other assistance aimed at increasing productivity or earnings. According to the Special Concerns Code for classifying AID projects, the WID category should: Include activities which will help integrate women into the economy of their respective countries, thereby both improving their status as well as assisting the total development effort. (See Section 113 of the Foreign Assistance Act.) Programs and projects which are in whole or part specifically designed to afford women the opportunity to participate in the development process in a significant way are to be included in this category. Not all projects which include women as beneficiaries are to be included. For instance, population projects in which women are merely recipients of contraceptives, or health projects where mothers receive food and services for their children, are to be excluded. However, where, in addition to the provision of goods and services, women receive training or other assistance designed to increase their earning capacity or enhance their economic productivity, include the relevant portion of the funding for the women's component in this category. Where a specific women's component is designed into an integrated project, include the proportion of that component as a women in development effort. (emphasis added).

Of the 43 projects included in the Elliott and Sorsby report, 3 are reviewed here. Of the 11 that were excluded, 6 are AID agency-wide grants to US institutions for training or research in which the analysis of social impact on intended beneficiaries is not possible [Grants to Stanford University for the design of radio prototypes for teaching elementary math in LDCs; to Stanford University for curriculum development in low-cost communication; to Florida State University for the development of educational technology useful for LDCs; to the University of Massachusetts for training in non-formal education; to Oklahoma University for research in low-cost methods of water and waste treatment in LDCs; and to the American Home Economics Association for training third world home economists in family planning.]; one is an urban water project with no clear women's component [Taiz Water Rehabilitation in Yemen Arab Republic (AID/NE).]; one is a day-care center for nutritionally deprived children [Day care center for hardship children in Chile (AID/LAC).]; one is a grant for the evaluation of an educational TV system [Evaluation of education TV projects in El Salvador (AID/LAC).]; and two are clear women's projects for which documentation could not be obtained [Poultry development in Yemen Arab Republic (AID/NE).; Caritas de Honduras housewives clubs (Inter-American Foundation).]. Evaluations were obtained from AID files and from the July 1978 and January 1979 Directory of Projects Involving Women in Development, compiled by the Secretariat for Women in Development of the Organization of American States. An additional compilation of Women in Development projects can be found in the Directory.

The remaining 32 Women in Development projects are listed in Table 1 according to their respective categories. Purposes can be classified according to a number of criteria. A recipient agency --a Ministry of Education,a marketing cooperative, a women's association--receives aid on the "promise" that it will provide goods or services (directly or indirectly) to a targeted class of beneficiaries within given parameters such as budget and time constraints and through designated procedures. These goods or services are intended to achieve specific project purposes, e.g., "to increase annual net cash farm incomes over 50% in a five-year period, by adopting modern sericulture practices." One useful approach is to distinguish between projects designed primarily to increase the productivity of beneficiaries (classes of individuals, households, or localities) and those designed to improve their welfare. "Welfare," for lack of a better term, refers here to the fulfillment of basic human needs. The distinction between productivity and welfare is somewhat artificial, since material prosperity (deriving from productivity) is a basic element of human welfare, while health, education, and organizational capacity can all increase productivity.)

Projects defined as increasing productivity try to raise production, employment, or incomes among the target group(s) either directly through skills training (formal or nonformal), group mobilization, technical assistance, credit, or job creation, or indirectly through the expansion of physical infrastructures such as electricity, irrigation, and roads, or through other means. They may focus on productivity in food and... agricultural production and distribution, on nonagricultural production and services, or on some mix of these. Included in the agricultural sector in Table I are a palm oil purchasing and food marketing cooperative for women in Cameroon, a sericulture project for farm families in northeast Thailand, a pig raising project in the Republic of Korea, a land conservation scheme in Lesotho, and a rural water systems project in Kenya. The nonagricultural sector includes skills training and production centers in sewing and clothing industries in Ghana; mixed income-generating and training projects in Cambodia, Sri Lanka, Zambia, Salvador, and the Philippines. Mixed income-generating projects—the most frequently occurring category—include a variety of small-scale agricultural and nonagricultural production schemes for low-income rural and urban women such as handicrafts, poultry raising, and food production and processing.

Projects defined as improving welfare include general education in the formal or nonformal sectors (school construction or staffing in Uganda and Afghanistan, functional literacy and self-help activities in Ethiopia, Guatemala, and Sri Lanka); health programs (health and education in Tanzania); and support for national or local organizations for leadership training, research, program planning, community outreach, and other activities intended to promote citizen participation. This latter category, the second most frequent on the list, includes seven projects in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

Some projects overlap the boundaries because of the diversity of their purposes or the phased sequence of activities. Several projects in the community organization category, for example, have as their eventual goal the expansion of income-generating opportunities for women although they are still in the formative stages of leadership training or research. An integrated rural development scheme (listed separately) of the CARE/AID water project in Kenya. In general, however, the women-specific projects are significantly smaller in scale than are the mixed projects that have the potential, at least, of reaching larger numbers of female beneficiaries.

The treatment of women’s roles as summarized in Table 2 is analyzed under three headings: the extent of women’s participation in decision making, either as project staff or as members of the group; the extent of women’s direct access to project benefits; and the immediate and long-term effects of the project on women’s social and economic status. [For other approaches to measuring women’s participation (or “popular participation”) in development projects, among others] American Council of Voluntary Agencies for Foreign Service (1975); Cohen and Uphoff (1977), pp. 27-58; Dulansey (1977);
Mickelwait, et al. (1976); Palmer (1979).]

Participation in decision making refers to women’s involvement in decision design, implementation, and evaluation. It is useful to distinguish here between the role of women as staff members in donor agencies and recipient institutions (service providers) that administer the project, and the role of women as intended beneficiaries. First, to what extent and in what capacity are women represented among staff members in donor and recipient agencies responsible for decisions regarding project planning and management? Second, does the decision-making process within donor and recipient agencies reflect an institutionalized concern for the interest of girls and women as beneficiaries? Third, to what extent and in what capacity do women from the class of intended beneficiaries participate in decisions of what to do and how to do it? How are their needs and priorities determined and reflected in project design and implementation? To what extent do women from the client group participate in project monitoring and evaluation?

Access to project benefits refers to the extent to which girls and women are represented among direct recipients of goods and services such as vocational training, agricultural credit, or membership in cooperaive societies. It is important to distinguish here between direct access to project benefts, and indirect access in which it is assumed that females benefit as members of families from activities in which males participate. Numbers and proportions of females among beneficiaries can generally be obtained from project records pertaining to direct client contacts: farmers contacted by extension agents, children enrolled in school, workers on a construction project, recipients of bank loans, and so on. The identification of beneficiaries within this context does not prejudge the question of whether they actually benefited, however, nor does it assume that those without direct access to project benefits did not benefit at all, or lose in some obvious or subtle ways.

The effects of the project on the status of women refer to the various ways in which women’s position in the family and the community may be affected by the projects, either in absolute terms or relative to males. Some changes may be positive and others negative; some changes may be immediate and others may develop over time; and immediate effects should be distinguished from long-term impacts where possible, although most formal evaluations are undertaken too soon to pick up long-term impacts.

In the discussion that follows, the Women in Development project evaluations included in Table 2 are scrutinized for the adequacy of their treatment of these three dimensions of female participation and for the “lessons learned” regarding the achievement of their goals. [=]

50020. Dixon, Ruth B.; AID; DS; Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination; Office of Women in Development; WID. “Part 05: Assessing the Impact of Development Projects on Women: An Analytical Framework: Background”, in Assessing the Impact of Development Projects on Women. District of Columbia: Department of State, AID, Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination, Office of Women in Development (WID), May 1980. The discussion in Section II focused on three dimensions of female participation: their role in project decision making, their direct access to benefits, and the effects of the project on their position in the family and the community. Information on decision making and on access to benefits is far easier to collect from project records and interviews with personnel at various levels than is information on the immediate or long-term effects of the project on the status of girls and women. Evaluation documents, on the whole, are addressed primarily to the logistical questions of whether the project is “on time” and functioning as planned rather than to social impacts.
Although this preoccupation with institutional support and technical transfers (the means of development) is understandable, it obscures the more important questions of the wellbeing of recipients (the ends of development). What happened to trainees and their families after they completed their courses? Did they find jobs? Where? Did cooperative members become more productive, use the credit for intended purposes, participate in community decision making? Who were the primary beneficiaries of large-scale rural water supply systems, and how did their lives change? How were benefits distributed between males and females? Who gained, and who lost? In what ways?

This section describes an approach to performing both midstream evaluations of the immediate social effects of ongoing projects, and ex-post evaluations of long-term impacts following project termination. By choosing projects rather than sector-level or country-level analyses, more qualitative as well as quantitative methods of assessing changes within and among households can be considered.
Questions raised in the evaluation framework regarding differential effects on males and females can shape the inquiry of the preliminary social soundness analysis and baseline data collection. Such questions can also form a basis for project monitoring, especially if formal evaluations are scheduled too late for major revisions of project policies and practices affecting women.

Whether the project is a women-specific vocational training program (“low-income women from barrios of San Jose”), a poultry development scheme with a women’s component (“small farmers in the Yemen Arab Republic of whom women are expected to assume a major gerole”), or a radio education program aimed at a general population (“16,000 illiterate highland Indians engaged in subsistence agriculture”), the process of assessing its social impact on women and men, in both absolute and relative terms, would address two major questions.

First, what are the direct effects on primary beneficiaries (male and female), i.e., how has their access to important resources changed in absolute terms as a result of the project? This target population may be defined as classes of individuals such as malnourished children or unemployed youth; classes of households such as tenant farm families or members of an agricultural cooperative; or whole localities such as villages or districts within integrated development schemes.
Second, what are the distributional effects of projects across different categories of persons both within and outside the targeted population? Of particular importance to the analysis of women's situation is the allocation of resources within households. How has the project altered the division of labor within the household, or the distribution of resources such as food or schooling, on the basis of the sex, age, or relationship to household head of family members? When families or households fall into different classes of individuals, do benefits accrue to all household members or is the domestic balance of resources significantly altered depending on who has direct access to project goods and services?

We are also interested in analyzing distributional effects of projects across households, both within and between the targeted and non-targeted populations. Are women-headed households bypassed when titles are granted in land distribution schemes, for example? Do benefits from membership in a women's marketing cooperative accrue disproportionately to those from better-off households or from dominant racial, religious, or ethnic groups? Does a project that introduces new technology in agricultural or nonagricultural production to one class of persons (e.g., men employed in modern fish freezing facilities) result in the displacement of another (e.g., women engaged in traditional fish drying and marketing activities)?

Table 3 summarizes the framework for evaluating the absolute and relative effects of projects on people's access to a wide range of resources that determine their physical, economic, and social wellbeing— that is, their position in the household and community social structure. In the following discussion, some examples are given of how projects can affect males and females differently, in some cases narrowing the gap between them in their access to important resources, and in other cases widening it. Sometimes, of course, improved access to one type of resource may impede access to another. Full-time wage employment for women, while offering badly needed cash incomes, can result in the elimination of home garden production with severe nutritional disadvantages for the entire family, the early cessation of infant breast feeding, and a critical shortage of agricultural labor during periods of peak demand, among other consequences.

The likelihood of mixed results poses a major dilemma to policy makers who must decide just what economic or social costs recipients may be expected to bear in order to achieve some other (presumably more valuable) economic or social benefit. The question of "what works and what does not in specific socioeconomic environments" is thus complicated by the fact that a project can work in one way but not another. Purposes may even be contradictory: for instance, a project might increase agricultural production more rapidly—at least in the short run—through authoritarian leadership that contradicts the goal of consciousness raising and participatory decision making.

The framework summarized in Table 3 and elaborated below includes a number of resources that determine people's physical, economic, and social wellbeing. Implied in the framework is a definition of development that includes "(1) a general improvement in living standards of living, together with (2) decreasing inequalities of income distribution, and (3) the capacity to sustain continuous improvements over time" (Kocher, 1973, p. 5). This latter element, which derives in large part from the acquisition of important social resources such as knowledge, power, and prestige, is of particular relevance to the analysis of women's situation. [=] 50022. Humphrey, Michael. "Radical Movements: Migrants, Workers and Refugees: The Political Economy of Population Movements in the Middle East", in Middle East Report, March-April 1993. pp. 2-7. The start of the Gulf Crisis saw the exodus of 1 million Asian and Arab workers, ad 460000 Kuwait refugees; perhaps 1 million Yemines were compelled to leave Saudi Arabia. During the civil war in Iraq that followed the war, 1.5 million Kurds were dislocated and tens of thousands of Iraqi Arabs fled to Iran or Turkey. In 1991, 11.2 million refugees originated in the Middle East. The emergence of a world market has created a worldwide flow of labor, beginning with the creation of the Atlantic slave trade; in the later part of the 19th century saw the creation of the coolie trade (in 1834-1937 some 30 million Indians were dispersed throughout the British Empire on labor contracts: Malaysia, Fiji, Ceylon, British Guiana, South Africa and the West Indies); some 25.5 million workers were drawn into US industrialization in 1820-1914, and industrialization in Europe drew workers in from its periphery (Britian from Ireland; France from North Africa and Spain; Germany from Poland). World capitalism, raising barriers to labor migration even as it stimulated migration, created the refugee, numbering 100 million in 1912-1969. Labor migration in the Middle East follows this general form. Migration started with Lebanese and Syrians leaving the Ottoman Empire, returning remittances. After WWII, Lebanese and Syrians went to the US, North Africans to France, and Turks to Germany. In addition, refugees have been created as nation states have been formed, especially Palestinians. The growing political activism among refugees has led to the new strategy of keeping refugees in place, as in the Northern No-Fly-Zone of Iraq or in Somalia. The recruitment of oil field workers in the Gulf represents a new stage in the flow of indentured labor, representing a South-South flow. By the early 1980s, foreign workers represented 70% of the total labor force in Kuwait, 42% in Libya, 81% in Qatar, 40% in Bahrain, 85% in UAE and 75% in Saudi Arabia. Even Jordan saw Egyptians become 40% of its workforce, as so many Jordanians and Palestinians had gone to the Gulf. The foreign workforce in the Gulf remains mainly male, although Asian women from Sri Lanka and Philippines have provided a domestic workforce.

50023. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 02: Summary. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The subject of this report is women and their integration into the development of Yemen. The roles and position of Yemeni women and society should be viewed in the context of the important social and economic changes which are taking place. The forces for change include the massive inflow of remittances from Yemeni workers abroad, the shortage of male labour, and substantial development aid from foreign countries. To understand how the roles of women in Yemen are changing, one must begin by acknowledging their roles in the traditional situation. The position of Yemeni women is, and has always been, determined by their status in law and custom, and the roles that they play in the household and outside it. Yemeni society, like other Arab societies, is patrilineally and patriarchally organized. Males have the ultimate power, and men also have the responsibility to provide for the women (and children) who are dependent on them. The dependency of women, and the duty of men to support them financially, are bases of all family laws, particularly marriage, divorce and inheritance. Women have the right to control property. The largest amounts of wealth a woman may manage in her lifetime are probably her bride wealth and inheritance, but she also can control profits from business undertakings. The financial resources of women do not enter into the family budget, and remain theirs to spend and save. The status of women is also affected by customary interpretations of the Qur'an, which tend to be restrictive and demand in some instances, veiling and seclusion. (It should be noted that the modern legal system in Yemen, while based heavily on the Qur'an, is comparatively more liberal on the question of women than other states in the Arabian Peninsula.) Women have important roles in reproduction and in production. Child-bearing and work in the home are the most important traditional roles of city women. In addition to these, rural women play important productive roles in the traditional agricultural economy. Women's work predominates, in fact, where subsistence crops are produced, and they have less extensive tasks in the cultivation of both traditional and modern cash crops. There appears to be a negative correlation between the wealth of a community and how active the women are in agricultural work. The wealth was derived traditionally from cash crops such as coffee, qat and grapes, but, the bases of new wealth are more varied due to links with the cities and internationally through employment. In any case, the families who can afford to, tend to restrict their women as a sign of distinction and a measure of status, hiring others to work their lands. While the great majority of Yemeni women are rural and participating actively in the traditional agricultural economy, urban women have the chance to participate in modern sector employment. This includes employment in the health and education fields, office work and some jobs in industry. Numerically, this group of women is small. They tend to be women and girls who have some education—a small and elite group—or poor women who are often migrants to the cities. International goals on "women in development" stress, as a first step, the provision of basic education and medical services. Though the analysis cannot cover all the different regions of Yemen, it might sharpen the sensitivity of the reader to discover specific differences in the project area where he or she is involved. There is no doubt that more sensitivity is needed by both project planners and implementors. This is illustrated in the chapter that evaluates some on-going projects in their neglect of the female population in their project areas. After a short look at international strategies for the integration of women in development and the discussion of their applicability to Yemen, some recommendations are given on project components which may directly benefit women. For the project planner, a basic check-list is suggested which elicits the necessary information on women in the project area and allows a more ready assessment of the effects of the project on women. It is very satisfactory to note that the proposal to give institutional support to the Yemeni Women's Association was presented as a request by the Ministry of Social Affairs during the Yemeni-German government negotiations on financial and technical cooperation in 3/1979, right after this study was completed. DM 1.3 million were committed for this project. This report takes the position that Yemen women should be progressively involved in the development of their country, at all levels. It does not advocate a revolution to change the roles and status of women, but demands a realistic appraisal of what is possible in the present social, economic and political framework. Matthias Weiter, Advisory Team to the Central Planning Organization, San'a'.[=]
These include: improvements in the agricultural equipment which women use, a broadened extension service which would educate men and women equally on subjects ranging from agricultural practice to nutrition and hygiene, housing improvements with more healthful kitchens, extensive use of the media for educational purposes, and more appropriate health and educational services. [Arabic Introduction not reproduced.] [x]

50025. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979.  (1) Childhood does not last long for most Yemeni girls. Their important social and economic roles are well-defined, particularly in the rural areas, giving women a self-confident outlook on the world. The girl pictured, from Jebel Sabr near Ta'izz, has been wokening in the fields. It is likely that she is married or betrothed for she displays two signs of private wealth inherent in betrothal and marriage: bridewealth jewelry and keys to unlock the chests wherein her private valuables are kept.

(2) In rural Yemen, physical strength is as necessary an attribute of a prospective bride as are her moral qualities. Girls are trained to carry heavy weights on their heads from an early age. The woman photographed is carrying an oil drum which serves as a container for petrol and kerosene, grains or water. Women, donkeys and low-status men can be observed carrying imported objects like televisions, freezers for breadmaking in traditional ovens, but more attention should be given to the possibility of alternative sources of fuel and increased distribution networks.

(3) A fully veiled woman carrying a television on her head exemplifies the visible contrasts between the old and the new apparent everywhere. Remittances from migrant relatives make imported luxury goods commonplace juxtaposed with the custom of veiling women as a protection of their honour and a measure of their status.

(4) Another effect of the inflow of remittances is the proliferation of imported foodsstuffs to even the most remote villages. Shops such as these are well-stocked with packaged and tinned foods which are used in increasing proportion to food produced locally. Increasing food imports and in particular, the use of powdered milk for infant feeding, have serious economic and health ramifications. In fact, the diet for infants and adults alike may be harmed by this trend.

(5) An essential part of every marriage contract is the bridewealth payment. Part of what each groom pays goes to the bride in the form of jewelry. Common taste has changed from silver to gold, though in some areas silver pieces are still used. This piece, which is worn on the forehead, consists of Indian and Austrian (Maria Theresa) coins, coral and beads. Yemeni women are proud of their bridewealth and regard it as high-status decoration, usefully movable and their security.

(6) The rate of divorce is high in Yemen and it is customary for children to remain with their mother after the divorce until they are teenagers. If their mother is unable to care for them or remarry, their maternal grandmother is usually given the task of bringing them up. In any case, the raising of children is always shared by the women of each traditional family, and indeed around the village.

(7) In Yemen the veil (sharshaf) is largely an urban phenomenon. Mostwell-educated young women who work in banks and offices in San'a' remain veiled during work. They wear the latest European fashions underneath. Only a small group of city women do not veil, and these would include the elite who have lived and studied abroad and the poor akhdam women from the coast.

(8) The market (suq) is an important meeting place in the public world of men. Most women do not enter the market as either buyers or sellers. In some markets, however, women sit on the periphery and sell baskets, fodder, firewood and fruits. The women pictured are selling baskets at the Suq al-Talh near Sa'dah. They barely have the skills of numeracy but deal in three currencies: Maria Theresa dollars, Yemeni and Saudi rials.

(9) Bread is the most important food in Yemen and is made in the vertical cylindrical oven (tannur) as often as twice daily. Smoke rises directly out of the tannur into the darkly lit traditional kitchen, making it an unhealthyplace for work. Simple improvements to the lighting and ventilation of kitchens would aid Yemeni women immensely.

(10) On most days the Yemeni family eat their main midday meal together. For special occasions, however, the meal is prepared and laid by the women then eaten first by the men of the household and their guests. The women and children eat separately afterwards. The meal pictured consists of cakes and warm bread, whipped fenugreek (hilba), meat and condiments like chives and radishes. In households where the men are away, the daily diet of the women and children is much simpler.

(11) Water supply is one of the most serious problems in Yemen. Women in rural areas often spend many hours per day fetching water from distant springs. This women from al-Mahabisha in the northwestern highlands needs several hours in the dry season to fetch one pail of water. In more populous southern districts women often have to wait in queues at springs for many hours during the dry season.

(12) In most villages women and children share the task of taking goats and sheep to grazing areas which are away from the cultivated lands. One family might specialize in the service. In addition, fodder for cows and donkeys in collected by women and girls and sorghum stalks and lucerne are fed to the animals by a time consuming process.

(13) Of all the tasks Yemeni women perform, collecting firewood is the most difficult. Sources are being depleted and wooded lands are being claimed as private property. In some areas wood is now purchased and delivered by the truckload, but in inaccessible areas women go on long and tiring expeditions to fetch wood.

(14) Pictured are the ploughing and planting of sorghum in the Hujariyya. The man operates the plough which is pulled by a pair of oxen, while the woman follows stepping on the seeds she drops in the furrows. She is carrying the seeds in a basket on her head. Ploughing is mechanized in parts of Yemen but generally both ploughing and planting are done by traditional methods.

(15) A Hujariyya woman applies manure to the sorghum fields in preparation for ploughing and planting. Men apply modern fertilizers, but the above task and others such as thinning, weeding and harvesting belong to women.

(16) Threshing can be accomplished by beating the heads of the grains with long sticks or, as is common in the region around San'a', donkeys can be used. In many areas low-status men are hired to do the threshing, as a supplement to family labor. Threshing is one agricultural task which may be the easiest to mechanize in Yemen.

(17) Winnowing is usually done by women in breezy areas. Often, however, members of a household share the tasks of the busy harvest season. Here an old man pours the grains while his daughter-in-law sorts the grains, taking the largest ones as seeds for the following year then clean and store them.

(18) Women of the lowest social strata have earned money in traditional ways open to them such as in healing, decorating brides, working as servants or running coffee houses with their husbands. This woman is drumming and singing at a wedding, a lucrative task but relegated to a low status person. She is chewing qat, taken more often by men than by rural women.

(19) Water is a problem in urban Yemen as much as it is in rural Yemen. Here, a girl delivers a donkey cart of water to houses in San'a. In addition to donkey carts, women also deliver containers of water on their heads and men balance two hanging tins of water across their shoulders. This is a traditional remunerative task of men and women of low social status.

(20) Young women could attend nursing school in Yemen before they could attend secondary school. The first nursing school was established in 1957 and its descendnet institution — The Health Manpower Institute—trains nurses and midwives. Nursing remains a controversial mode of employment for females however, and a serious shortage of female nursing staff exists.

(21) Status is a complex evaluation for it comprises one's birth (family name and family wealth) and also the reputation gained from the roles a person plays as defined by sex and age. Old women can be powerful characters in their communities as well as in their households. In their households they are responsible for the work of subordinate women and children; in their community they may be a respected source of opinion and mediation.

(22) Education is stated as one of the rights of all children in Yemen yet it is not within reach of many. Only a small number of girls are ever educated because of the prevailing attitudes that it is not proper for a girl to be away from home and possibly taught bad habits. Girls contribute to the labour of the household and may not be given the luxury to study. This San'atni girl is helping her mother with the washing of clothes and fetching of water, and will most probably never receive any education.

(23) In most areas only daughters of the elite are educated. It is noteworthy that the dropout rate for girls is lower than for boys, at least at the primary level. This means that if a girl and her parents decide that she go to school, they intend that she complete the course and get the certificate. Boys may drop out when the opportunity for employment arises.

(24) In general Yemeni children are the pride of their parents. The man pictured was pleased by his four daughters, but extremely proud of the arrival of the fifth, a boy. To him the son will help him guard his family's honour. Women are aware of the pressure to produce sons yet feel fortunate to have many daughters around for it means more help around the house.

(25) Modern projects in rural areas to increase agricultural production are impressive, but analysis of planning documents has shown that the situation and roles of women have not been taken sufficiently into account though women do a major part of agricultural work. Until now, technical rather than social aspects of projects have been stressed. The picture shows an irrigation weir in Wadi Zabid.

(27) Pictured is a simple water distribution system in Haja which women who often instigate the move toward independence in residence, and entertaining rooms to maintain the household and its furnishings might be ordered from the migrant abroad with large purchases or major improvements waiting until his return. To the contrary of some assumptions, women do not appear to be moving in a wider decision-making role because of the emigration of their men. Women have always had a tremendous influence in household decision making, but this depends on the quality of the marital relationship and as yet, the males in residence have the last say. For example, women may pressure for a nuclear household residence, and women may refuse to cook with certain grains or foods, yet it is their men who have the mobility to go the market or to the bank. Most women cannot enter the public world of men. [=]

Women in an extended household are organized by seniority. The mother-in-law has a say as far as what is cooked daily and what work is done by the other women and children. These relationships are often problematic, particularly if one woman is thought to be shirking her work responsibilities or is ill continually. Household work in urban areas is less strenuous and less time-consuming than in the rural areas. The heaviest tasks are done by the younger women. These would include fetching the water if the house does not have piped water, and the washing, housecleaning and breadmaking. In the rural areas, the older women of the house do the lightest work, which includes feeding the animals and some of the cooking. Younger women perform those tasks as well as carrying water, fetching fuel and much of the agricultural work. Women depend on children for help in running the household, varying from delivering messages to doing some of the difficult work. This is especially true in a nuclear household where only one adult woman is present. Sons older than 10 years old may go to the market for their mothers. Daughters are taught to cook and clean from an early age, and begin carrying water and animal fodder from the age of 6. Both boys and girls take goats and sheep to pasture and help with the agricultural work in the countryside. In sum, women have a considerable influence on all that concerns the household, whether it be extended or nuclear. Their power is restricted in that they do not participate in the public world of the market. [There are exceptions to this generalisation, notably the Jabal Sabr women who buy and sell in the Ta'izz suq and some tribal women in the northern part of the country who sell fruits, animal fodder and fuel,] nor have ultimate control over the monthly household expenditures. All final decisions rest with the males who are responsible for the support of the household. The household is organized by a division of labour by sex and age. The younger wives and teen-age daughters do most of the work: cooking, cleaning, fetching the fuel and water. In rural areas, all the family participates in agricultural work though, again, it is the young women who have the major share throughout the cultivation season. [–]

50030. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 08: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Legal Institutions Affecting Women. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The Qur'an, and Shari'a law which is derived from the Qur'an, are the bases of all laws affecting women in Yemen. During 1970 and 1978 new legal codes for Labour and Family Law came into effect. Both are Qur'anic in spirit and do not vary significantly from previous interpretations of Shari'a (Qur'anic Law). The Labour Law affirms that women are due the same rights as men, and are afforded special privileges at the time of pregnancy and childbirth. Suggested amendments to the law increase the benefits for working women concerning maternity leave with full pay, personal leave options, breastfeeding time, time off for the mourning of the death of a husband and working hours for pregnant women. The articles of Family Law allow for various interpretations concerning age at marriage, divorce and so on. It should be remembered, however, that most disputes are settled outside the formal legal framework according to custom and popular interpretations of the Qur'an. Insofar as the new Labour and Family Laws address themselves to the status of women, they are included, in part, in Appendices VI and VII. The position of women in Yemen society is determined, to an important extent, by their status as vis a vis written law and custom. A look at the legal institutions and customs which have a bearing on women provides some information on two particular issues which are important in terms of development: economic rights and responsibilities women have, and customary constraints on women. [–]

50031. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 09: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Legal Institutions Affecting Women: Marriages. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Islamic marriage is a contract between two parties, the groom and a male wakil (deputy) of the bride. The bride's wakil is usually her father. Marriage concerns two individuals—husband and wife—but in fact has wider implications ranging from political alliances, to maintenance of class, to calculations about where their inheritances will be going. In theory, the girl should be willing to marry and should not be coerced. In practice there are always examples of marriage by force. In cases where the bride is very young, she may not be in a position to make a judgement contrary to that of her father; her silence can be interpreted as acceptance. Still, in villages boys and girls know each other by sight and reputation and often romances result in marriage. In some places, the girl is asked if she agrees to the match both at the time of the engagement and before the signing of the marriage contract ('aqd). In theory the girl should have reached puberty, but it is often the case that girls married earlier. The Myntti survey in 1977 of al-Nadhir, Jebel Razih showed that 65% of the ever married women had married before puberty. Protecting the modesty of girls, and the need to incorporate more female labour into a household are cited as two main reasons for early marriage. The new legal code proposes that the bride be not younger than 16 years of age, but these matters are very difficult to enforce. Marriage establishes reciprocal rights and duties between the husband and wife. The man is entitled to: sexual access, to have his wife live in his house, to her obedience and fidelity. The woman is entitled to: support (money for expenses and clothes), a house to live in, bridewealth and freedom to manage her own money. Shari'a law specifies that husband and wife mutually inherit to 1/8 of the total inheritance of their spouse. Every Muslim man is allowed up to four wives on the condition that he treat them all equally. Multiple marriages are not common in Yemen with the Census Report showing that only 4.3% of all males enumerated had more than one wife. (Swiss, 1978, p. 80). [–]

50032. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 10: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Legal Institutions Affecting Women: Marriages. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The transfer of money from the groom to the wakil, deputy, of the bride is an essential part of any marriage contract. Despite former government regulations and intra-tribal agreements to regulate this payment, bridewealth is costly and continually inflating. An example of how the payment has inflated is shown in the Sani'a category where Bornstein [Throughout this report, many quotes will be drawn from the works of FAO Social Anthropologist A. Bornstein which present the best information on the society of Yemen to date.] found the 1972 price to be $1330. The 1979 payment can be more than ten times that amount.

Some sample bridewealth payments are as follows:

- Sani'a:
  - Bornstein 1972: 6000 YR; US$1330.
- Zabid: 20000 YR; US$4440.
- Haja: 15000-40000 YR; US$3330-8880.

In some areas of the northern Hashid tribe bridewealth is reputed to have escalated to between 100000 and 200000 YR ($22220 – $44440). Bridewealth payments vary according to the hereditary social class (Traditional Yemeni society is divided into a hierarchy of social strata. Marriage and occupational rules have kept these divisions distinct. Sayyid: This is the hereditary religious elite. Sayyid women, particularly in Zaydi areas, do not marry out of this strata. The Sada (p) were the political elite under the Islamic system and still participate in religious, legal and administrative posts. Qadhi: This is the hereditary class of Criminal. Theoretically every bride can have her wakal (deputy) specify that she would like the right to initiate divorce in her marriage contract, but this is never done. There are several ways man can divorce his wife, but the most common way is to go to a judge with two witnesses and simply ask for it. If he divorces his wife, he is legally bound to pay a three-month support fee. This is to make certain that the woman is not pregnant with his child, and the amount for three months does not seem much to the man, but the more prolonged, the more endemnity costs. A man is bound by law to support any children from a union which ends in divorce. Usually the mother takes the children, at least until they are ten years old, but they often stay with her until they are adults. There is some complication if the woman should remarry. If her new husband is not willing to take the children, the children would be raised by their maternal grandmother, preferred to the paternal grandmother.

Women in Yemen can initiate divorce, though the methods are not straightforward and often the financial penalties are high. First, she may return to her father’s home in protest and live there for some time. Eventually her husband may divorce her, but she will forfeit either her three month support payment and/or, with her father, have to return all or part of her original bridewealth. It appears that the return of all or part of the original bridewealth as a penalty for initiating divorce is not Islamic law but custom. After a woman is divorced she is taken in, in most cases, by her parents or a brother. If her family do not support her, she is left to her own means of support. On one hand she is pillared because she has financial insecurity but on the other she is envied for her relative freedom. (What options women have for remunerative work to support themselves is discussed in Section 2.3. on the work roles of women.) The Census figures show that only 2.1% of the female population were divorced at the time of the census, 2/1975. Qualitative information from the countryside suggests that the divorce rate is much higher but so is the remarriage rate. Thus at any one time few women are in the divorce state. The 1977 rural survey by Myntti shows that while 3.5% of the women interviewed were “currently divorced”, 17% had been divorced once and 4% twice. Divorce does not seem to have a social stigma in Yemen as it does in other parts of the Middle East, and most persons remarriage. Divorce is most common in the early years of marriage, particularly if the woman has not produced any children. Often the blame of infertility falls on the woman. If she is thought to be sterile she may marry an older man who is a widower or be taken on by another as a second wife. [-]

---

50034. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 12: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Legal Institutions Affecting Women’s Inheritance. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Women in rural Yemen inherit according to the prescriptions in the Qur’an: As a daughter: half the share of her brother (as an only child: half the total inheritance). As a mother: 1/6 of the total inheritance. As a wife: 18 of the total inheritance. When Islam was founded in the 7th century AD, the fact that women could inherit and possess private property was revolutionary. Women inherit less than their brothers because they are considered to be dependent on men. If a man is responsible for his dependent wife, children, parents and even sisters—the reasoning goes—he should take a larger share of the inheritance. Most women argue in favour of this arrangement. Inheritance, an important part of any woman’s personal property, can take the form of land, buildings or parts of buildings, movable wealth such as animals and machines, and money. In some parts of the Muslim Middle East women do not inherit at all, inherit only cash or give their inheritance to their brothers. In Yemen most women can choose, like their brothers, how they would like their inheritance. Women in the Hujariyya tend to take their share in each category of wealth. It is reported that in Zabid women prefer to inherit a room in their parental house to serve as a residence in reserve. Should they be divorced. In Rida’ women may sell rooms or land inherited to their brothers, preferring movable wealth and cash. It has been noted that the personal wealth (such as inheritance and bridewealth) of a woman is never to be used for household expenses. Household expenses are the total responsibility of her husband.
Theoretically her brothers serve as her financial advisers and her wealth is kept as her security. There is some evidence in other Middle Eastern countries that this notion is changing due to economic pressures on couples, particularly in urban areas where women are earning salaries, but in Yemen a woman's wealth is her private property to do with as she pleases and in no way is she expected to help with the household finances. No statistics are available on the personal wealth of women and how many actually inherit. Inheritance among the women of the landless poor should be minimal or nothing at all. Whatever the possibilities of inheritance might be, concern over the inheritance of females is expressed in marriage patterns. Arabs in general are thought to be endogamous, that is they prefer to marry within their group, however that may be defined. The preferred marriage—patrilateral parallel cousin or Ibn 'amm (son of paternal uncle)—is the closest one can marry within the patrilateral group without violating incest prohibitions. It is the preferred marriage—it is often argued—because of inheritance, though this is a controversial issue. By marrying her Ibn 'amm, the reasoning goes, the woman's inheritance will not be alienated. Her children, part of her husband's lineage, will inherit from her wealth which has come predominantly from her father who is often the same lineage as her husband. The wealthy tend to follow this pattern more closely because they have more at stake. Father-in-law and paternal uncle are one and the same word, 'amm, in Yemeni terminology, reflective of the ideal marriage. No statistics exist to demonstrate how often this ideal is actually achieved in Yemen. In many cases it may not be possible demographically. In parts of Hujairiyah it is preferable to marry within the village only. If a woman marries into another village her inheritance from her parents will eventually be passed on to her children, belonging to a lineage of "outsiders". Political and economic problems may result. Thus there is a lot of pressure on girls to marry within the community for the sake of inheritance. Bridewealth is often much higher should the girl marry "out", which discourages marriages with men from other villages and makes them pay for the alienation of her inheritance. In sum, women benefit from Islamic law in that they inherit and can manage their private property. More research needs to be done on who inherits and how much.

It seems that the wealth of women is a reserve security; if property is in land and gold, for example, both are continually appreciating in value but the wealth is not utilized in any active capital development sense. The custom of coercive early marriages, the difficult divorce with high penalties if the woman initiates, are the most harmful practices to Yemeni women. One could argue that they are violations of human rights. [=]

50035. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 13: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Legal Institutionalizing Women: Customary Restrictions on Women. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Islamic law deals with conflicts which may be brought to the courts. Customs also exist which have the strength of law but are never settled in court. In general, these are restrictive of women in Yemen. Women are expected to behave with a certain decorum particularly in public but also within the house. Modesty in dress, quiet polite speech and submissive behavior are the ideals. An impeccable reputation within the community is essential. The issue at stake is the honour of the family. Men, by their actions in the community, can enhance as well as destroy the honour of their family. It is often argued that women cannot enhance family honour but only destroy it. Honour is a precarious social evaluation and the restricting of women is a major attempt to safeguard it. The veil is the most visible expression of modesty in Yemen. Not all rural women however, are veiled. Women tend to veil more if they are in the presence of "outsiders", or if they are from the religious elite, sayyid class. For example, village women may not veil within the bounds of their village but dress in full sharshaf (black veil worn in urban Yemen) if they are walking to the nearby town for medical treatment. They argue that the village is one a big family while the town is full of strangers. Women are veiled in rural marked towns such as: Zabid, Mawza, Turba, Rida' and al-Nadhiri, Jabal Razih. In Mahwit, the veil is a recent phenomenon and can be traced to the growth of the town from migrants from villages and the increased importance of the suq (market). Veiling connotes an air of preservation and privilege. Women see it as more sophisticated and comparatively more urban. While it may seem completely natural to be free and unveiled in a village, it is also completely natural to veil in a town. For village women, it definitely has the air of "dressing up". The veil is an urban phenomenon. The most plausible theory of its origins is that it is a Middle Eastern paracultural derivative, or a product of the Middle East and North Africa being conquered and converted to Islam. The veil was a matter of distinguishing free from slave women. Veiled women were free, usually high status and urban. Unveiled women were slaves taken in conquest or rural bedouin and peasants. The veil contains elements of class. In villages around Rida', Mawza and Razih, sayyid women are veiled as a matter of distinction. Some of these women can be seen carrying water and working in the fields with veils on. Despite the utter impracticality of this, it is an expression of their moral superiority. They are protected by their anonymity. The logical extension of this is to keep women in the house where no one can see them at all. There are women who appear in market towns unveiled. They are women of the lowest social strata, akhdam, and tribal women selling animal fodder, wood and fruits. akhdam women are often despised as "dirty". The tribal women are beyond the pale of evaluation in the town; they are from another area and are performing a traditionally recognized function. They are neither admired nor despised. Jabal Sabr women, who sell qat [Qat, lat. Catha edulis, is a shrub cultivated in highland Yemen, its leaves are chewed regularly by a large pari of the population. Its effects are described as similar to stimulant drugs.] and other produce in the Ta'izz suq, are an exception since they seem to be admired by women in Ta'izz for their wealth and freedom. Just as the veil, as one expression of modesty, may protect a woman's reputation, her visibility in a community may be limited by giving her restricted spatial boundaries.

A general problem for most rural women and many city women is their lack of mobility. Rural women are restricted to work in the fields and visiting other women within a certain distance. They do not go to markets to buy goods and many are restricted from going to town hospitals and clinics. Urban women vary in how far outside the house they are allowed to go. Some can be seen studying in schools and working in offices. Others are free to leave the house only in the afternoons when they visit other women. Still others rarely leave the confines of their houses, not even to buy provisions at a nearby shop. In some cases, the mobility of women is restricted because of heavy work load within the house and childcare responsibilities. More often than not, however, the seclusion of women functions primarily to preserve their reputation for modest behavior. Constraints on the mobility of women, as well as the general question of modesty, should be considered when planning projects dealing with women directly (such as formal and non-formal education, health services) and indirectly (such as agricultural extension work). The obstacles are not insurmountable but demand careful attention. For example, it is known that some families restrict their females from schools and clinics on the grounds that they come in contact with males and this is not acceptable. Before the slow tide of public opinion changes in favour of schooling and medical treatment for women, publicity campaigns could center on the respectability of not only working in schools and clinics, but attending them. In addition agricultural extension work has great potential for reaching people in rural areas with new ideas on farming technology. Women, as the bulk of the labour force in many areas, could contribute to this dialogue of improving agricultural production. Extension officers, predominantly young and male, should be trained in methods of educating non-schooled women, appropriately, publicly and discreetly. [=] men and women have certain tasks, children and old people have others. What sayyid women are allowed to do may vary from what akhdam women do. In the urban setting, training and education play a part over and above the traditional criteria in what sort of work people do. The variation of tasks will be described in this section. Women are based in the household primarily because of their roles as bearers and educators of children. In Arab culture, this function of women is often praised and reinforced. The primary responsibility of men to their households, on the other hand, is the provision of adequate financial resources which takes them more and more into the public world of employment. [=]

50037. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 15: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. In addition to caring for their children, all Yemen women whether urban or rural, have the household-based tasks of cooking, cleaning and clothes washing. Many households, even in the cities, do not have piped water, so it is the job of women to fetch adequate supplies for household consumption. Caring for animals is also a female task in both urban and rural areas. Various fuels are often bought in cities and rural towns, but in areas where fuel is made or collected, it is the task of women. [=]

50038. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 16: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Cooking and Food Preparation in the Yemeni Kitchen. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. A Tihama kitchen consists of a designated place in the open-air courtyard of each house. Village kitchens use a simple oven made of stones, operating on the principle of the tannur or cylindrical oven of the highland areas. Bread is cooked in this oven. Simple charcoal braziers are used for preparing other foods. A highland kitchen is usually located on upper levels of the house. Bornstein describes the kitchen she encountered: “Both the kitchens and ovens have certain drawbacks, which could be remedied without much difficulty. For different reasons, sometimes ‘to prevent anyone from looking in’, sometimes ’to protect from draught and dust’, the windows and doors are kept very small and the ventilation holes are completely inadequate to let the smoke out. The women spend several hours of the day in these dark places which, when the ovens are lit, get exceedingly hot and smoky. A person who is not used to the smoke can hardly bear the atmosphere for more than a few minutes. Apart from being very unpleasant, the heat and the smoke must in the long run, have negative effects on the health of the women, especially on their respiratory organs.” (Bornstein 1974, p. 23).

Utensils: In Yemen cooking utensils are simple and few. Generally one would find: round platters for serving rice, and metal pots for cooking rice, a tea kettle, metal or clay pots for boiling meat. In the north one commonly would find stone pots for cooking. Bread is stored and served in flat baskets. Metal and wooden spoons are used to stir and serve the food. Imported thermoses, tea cups and china dishes are available and popular in both cities and rural areas. Pressure cookers and blenders are also used increasingly where butagas cookers and electricity exist. In most rural households food is eaten out of one communal dish and sometimes spoons are used. City manners in many cases, are more westernized.

The Diet: Everywhere in Yemen the staple food is sorghum and other cereals. Fenugreek (hilba), rice, vegetables and beans are eaten occasionally and the consumption of meat, dairy products and eggs depends on the economic status of the household. Meat, eggs and fresh and tinned fruits are status foods and would be eaten when men of the household are present or if guests are invited. If men are living away, women might not indulge in such special foods for themselves and their children. A recent nutrition survey in Yakhtul, 10 miles north of al-Mukha on the coast, revealed that the average daily diet is better than that of World Health Organization prescribes as minimum requirements. It was noted, however, that the food distribution is not always equal within the household with women and girls eating less than their share by giving it to the males (Martinez and Poulin, 1978). The traditional diet is not bad, particularly with protein-rich sorghum and beans consumed regularly. Nutritionally they are incomplete however, and one result is anemia particularly in women. Clearly, nutrition education is one of the most important avenues for development assistance. Trends are away from the wholesome sorghum-based diets toward more junk foods and white rice. If anything, the nutritional standard of the diet appears to become worse, not better, with the beginnings of modernization. In cities tinned/dried fresh fruits and vegetables are available but appear to be consumed by the elite or by others only occasionally. If men do the shopping and women do the cooking, nutrition education should be directed at both.

Meals and Work: In all of Yemen the midday meal is the largest and most important of the day. Breakfast of tea or coffee and bread is served between 6.00 a.m. and 8.00 a.m. depending on the region. Agricultural labourers usually get a coffee break of food (often beans, fish and bread) and tea or coffee. An evening meal is served when men return from sunset prayers at the mosque. This meal is often leftovers from lunch, or tea, bread, and beans or eggs. Yemeni cooking is frugal and less-time-consuming than food preparation in other parts of the Arab world. Three “woman-hours” maximum would be spent in the kitchen per day. In places where tannur-baked bread is not made twice a day and where butagas is used, preparation of the midday meal can take a mere half an hour. A typical midday meal in the Hijaziya is rice with a sauce of potatoes and tomato paste, nuti bread which is white and store bought, karath (chive-like onions) and tea. If men are at home, meat may be eaten several times a week. If not, perhaps once a week on Friday. Sorghum porridge, ‘asid, is sometimes substituted for the rice dish. A typical midday meal in Jebel Razih would be fresh maluj bread, fenugreek (hilba), mcalt and tea. A special bread and honey dish (fatat and bint as-sahn) might be occasionally served as a first course. Bread is the most important basic food in rural Yemen. In the northern highland areas like Razih and Hamdan, the tannur cylindrical oven is heated twice daily because warm bread is preferred at meals. Wood for the tannur is very expensive and in many areas tannur-baked breads have been reduced to once a week. In the south, fried bread (khubs tawwa) may be made once in a while, otherwise ruti is bought where possible. Lahuh, a pancake-like sorghum bread, may be made if guests are invited or during Ramadan. This bread is fried on a ceramic skillet and dungi is often used for fuel. Lahuh is the main ingredient of the festive dish, shafut, which is made with sour milk and chillies. The time spent bread-making varies throughout the countryside. The grinding of grains varies also. In the Tihama the grains are generally ground by hand. In many places village mills have been established and this saves considerable time and energy for women. Fees are nominal and all grains can be ground. In Mahwit it is reported that women prefer the taste of grains ground by hand and do not frequent the village mill. Cooking and food preparation are shared by the women and girls of the house. The making of bread is an art learned at a young age, and teen-age girls help their mothers with all aspects of meal preparation. Dairy products are processed by women, particularly older women. A hollow gourd is shaken to make butter and other milk products. Saman, clarified butter, is highly prized and so is sour milk (laban or haqin). Goat products are used more in the Tihama while cows are the main dairy animal in the highlands. These products are often shared within a large kin group or exchanged for services. Tea, coffee (bun) and the drink made from coffee husks called qishr are made and consumed several times a week. If not, perhaps once a week on Friday.
Republic: Part 17: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Cleaning the House. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. On the whole, Yemeni houses are given minimal care. In the morning blankets which were used during the night are aired on the roof. Mattresses and cushions in the main sitting room may be shaken and straightened. Qat leaves and other refuse from the previous afternoon would be swept out. Daughters help with this and it does not take more than half an hour. Each woman is responsible for her own bedroom, but time spent is minimal. Kitchens receive very little care; food and debris on the floor may be swept out after a meal. Bathrooms tend to be kept clean, partly due to the use of water for ritual prayer ablutions. Superficially Tihama houses appear to be better kept than highland houses. The houses are much simpler however and water is not usually a problem. The huts and surrounding courtyard are swept out. The most serious problem of cleanliness and hygiene is the disposal of human waste. Falling from open toilets and out in the open, it presents a perfect environment for bacteria and parasites which constitute a major health problem. Children play in the same areas, which may be rain-water run-off areas for cisterns also. The cistern water, needless to say, is highly polluted if the water runs off anything but a fenced-in protected area. [2]

50040. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 18: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Washing Clothes. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. If a woman is fortunate enough to have daughters over ten years of age, this task is often given to them. Washing of clothes can be done in the home in large, flat metal pans or at the public source of water in villages. In Mawza women wash near the wadi, or stream. In Mahwit, women wash to the rear of the mosque where there are water taps. This seems to be a pleasurable task if done communally, but not all village women are allowed such visibility. In many places the work is confined to the roof of the house. Some women in the Hujariyya have complained that this is their most tiring task. They all remember the days when the standard of cleanliness was far lower. Women used to wash clothes once every two weeks, not daily as today. Tide, Chinese soap powders and scrub brushes can be found in many rural homes. If washing is done outdoors, clothes are rubbed against a wet and soapy stone. What is very obvious watching Yemeni women wash clothes is how little water they use. With their vigorous pounding and scrubbing of the clothes, it is no wonder that cisterns say that the best examples of clean and efficient ones are to be found in Hayfan, al-Hujariyya. In an extended family, the task of fetching water rotates among the healthy younger women, while others manage household chores.

If a woman is alone in a house, or without a son and a donkey who could help in a pinch, fetching water during the winter months is a real problem. Women in a nuclear household are at a disadvantage when the water supply becomes short, because fetching water at great distances demands a cooperative effort of several women, not girls. In the mountain areas, fetching water is literally back-breaking work if it entails going down the mountain and returning with a full tanaka on one's head. In other areas where the terrain is flatter, water fetching is tiring but gathering around a village well is one of the most pleasurable activities for women. Children help their mothers with water. Small boys take donkeys and fetch water with them. Girls begin carrying small containers on their heads from rain-water off roofs and off the ground. People say that water collected during the rainy season in these cisterns is enough for the household for the year. There are problems however. In many places the water runs off filthy places with human waste and is full of disease causing bacteria and parasites. People familiar with the idea of the cistern say that the best examples of clean and efficient ones are to be found in Hayfan, al-Hujariyya. In an extended family, the task of fetching water rotates among the healthy younger women, while others manage household chores.

Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Cleaning the House. Women in the Middle East and North Africa.
brought nearer to their homes. The heavy and unhealthy burden of carrying water will be lessened, and the improved quality of the water will benefit the health of the community at large. Care should be taken, however, to incorporate those persons who traditionally have earned a living from transporting water into new schemes. [=]

50042. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 20: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Caring for Animals. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. If a household has cows, donkeys, chickens, rabbits, goats and camels, all but the camels fall into the female sphere of work. The care of camels by men is an old Arabian tradition Yemeni women say, because camels are too dangerous for women to handle. Urban households often keep chickens, rabbits, goats or cows in the lower floors of the house. They are fed with left-overs from the kitchen and lucerne purchased in the market. In the rural areas women and children tend to share the work: Goats are usually taken to graze by the children of the family though at times when no crops are planted they are allowed to roam freely. Goats and sheep are important sources of meat and dairy products. They are smoked to give both a special smell and also as a means of preservation. Butagas (the Arabian name for the smokehouse) has been built on the floor and kettles and skillets put on stones surrounding the fire. The latter method is common in the south, for boiling and frying. Dung cakes are made only by women. The animal dung is mixed with water and straw, formed into a cake and set in the sun to dry. The cakes can often be seen on the walls of houses. Sorghum stalks and roots are used like wood in the tannur or in an open area of the kitchen where fires are built. In the Hujariyya people buy a Toyota Stout truckload of wood for up 1000 YR (US$220) and these last several months. Because of such prohibitive costs, the villagers are decreasing the number of times per week that they eat tannur-baked breads. It is unfortunate because some of the most nutritious traditional breads are not being made as much as they used to be. Dung is used as a fuel in tannurs and open cooking areas where foods, including fried breads, are cooked in skillets, pots and kettles. Dung is an important supplement to wood in most northern areas. Sorghum stalks and roots are used like wood in the tannur or an open area of the kitchen where fires are built on the floor and kettles and skillets put on stones surrounding the fire. The latter method is common in the south, for boiling and frying. Charcoal is used in braziers (maugad) for cooking, or often to keep tea and coffee hot outside the sitting room. Butagas is used like wood in the tannur or in an open area of the kitchen where fires are built. It is often used to keep cows and sheep warm. Butagas is not expensive but it is more expensive in more remote areas. If possible, men from the household buy kerosene in larger containers in the market towns. It is undoubtedly cheaper this way and a necessary economy since kerosene is used for lanterns in villages where there is no electricity. (Electricity is spreading rapidly throughout rural Yemen. In many villages the mosque and perhaps the house of the shaykh are electrified first. In better organized villages cooperatives have been started wiring all the houses to a large, central generator. In the cases of private generators, they are run usually only at night and started by the women of the house at sunset.) Butagas is becoming increasingly popular in the country, particularly in market towns which have access to roads and cities. At 40 YR (US$0.80) for a replacement cylinder in the Hujariyya, butagas is not inexpensive but it is more convenient than traditional fuels. Mahwit town has recently had a butagas dealership established. It is not improbable that butagas is spreading to other parts of Yemen too. If such things as refrigerators, chest freezers, electric generators and televisions can be carried up mountains on donkeys so too could butagas. Needless to say, butagas is a comfort to women easier. Rice, sauces, tea, coffee and even fried breads are being made with butagas. In cities, butagas-run cookers with ovens are preferred by women and commonly used. Until other sources of cooking energy such as solar energy, become available and economical, butagas provides the most convenient benefits and social prestige of having dairy products. Clearly, there is scope for improving the practices of animal feeding. In the field of animal health and nutrition, as well as in the economics of feeding practices, applied research is needed. It is hoped that the on-going veterinary and livestock projects will make some advances in these fields, incorporating ideas and labor of local women. (An experimental dairy project east of Yarim is training "milkmaids", local women, in mechanised milking procedures with hopes of setting up small scale household-based dairy industries which will be run by women.) The implementation of technical and more economic procedures rests with the women. [=]

50043. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 21: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Household Tasks: Collecting Fuel. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Fuels vary by region, but the most common are: wood, dung, sorghum stalks and roots, charcoal, kerosene and butagas. Wood is used in the tannur ovens for most breads. In some areas, particularly in the rural northern highlands, women still go on wood gathering expeditions, often as far as the Tihama plain. They leave during the night carrying torches and small hatches, returning up to 8 hours later with 20 kilos of wood on their heads. Women of the Hujariyya remember doing this 20 years ago. Among city women and the affluent rural women, the alternative to collecting wood is buying it in the markets. While wood seems TO be available in most rural markets, people who have road access prefer to buy it by the truckload. In the Hujariyya people buy a Toyota Stout truckload of wood for up 1000 YR (US$220) and this lasts them several months. Because of such prohibitive costs, the villagers are decreasing the number of times per week that they eat tannur-baked breads. It is unfortunate because some of the most nutritious traditional breads are not being made as much as they used to be. Dung is used as a fuel in tannurs and open cooking areas where foods, including fried breads, are cooked in skillets, pots and kettles. Dung is an important supplement to wood in most northern areas. Sorghum stalks and roots are used like wood in the tannur or an open area of the kitchen where fires are built on the floor and kettles and skillets put on stones surrounding the fire. The latter method is common in the south, for boiling and frying. Charcoal is used in braziers (maugad) for cooking, or often to keep tea and coffee hot outside the sitting room. Butagas is used like wood in the tannur or in an open area of the kitchen where fires are built. It is often used to keep cows and sheep warm. Butagas is not expensive but it is more expensive in more remote areas. If possible, men from the household buy kerosene in larger containers in the market towns. It is undoubtedly cheaper this way and a necessary economy since kerosene is used for lanterns in villages where there is no electricity. (Electricity is spreading rapidly throughout rural Yemen. In many villages the mosque and perhaps the house of the shaykh are electrified first. In better organized villages cooperatives have been started wiring all the houses to a large, central generator. In the cases of private generators, they are run usually only at night and started by the women of the house at sunset.) Butagas is becoming increasingly popular in the country, particularly in market towns which have access to roads and cities. At 40 YR (US$0.80) for a replacement cylinder in the Hujariyya, butagas is not inexpensive but it is more convenient than traditional fuels. Mahwit town has recently had a butagas dealership established. It is not improbable that butagas is spreading to other parts of Yemen too. If such things as refrigerators, chest freezers, electric generators and televisions can be carried up mountains on donkeys so too could butagas. Needless to say, butagas is a comfort to women easier. Rice, sauces, tea, coffee and even fried breads are being made with butagas. In cities, butagas-run cookers with ovens are preferred by women and commonly used. Until other sources of cooking energy such as solar energy, become available and economical, butagas provides the most convenient... alternative for Yemeni women. As long as traditional breads are preferred, wood will be necessary for the tannur ovens. Afforestation projects might provide fuels as well as general benefits to the ecology. [=]

50044. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 22: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work of Women: Rural Work: Women in Agriculture. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Yemeni women play a crucial role in the subsistence agriculture of Yemen. They perform laborious tasks year round whereas men, generally speaking, work at ploughing and threshing periods only. The dominance of women in agricultural work appears to be correlated negatively which how wealthy the community is, particularly due to cash crops. Whatever the case may be, the work that women do in agriculture is not a traditionally-defined division of labor by sex alone. Their work is dictated by age, land tenure, social class, residence and as mentioned above, which crops predominate in the area.

Age: Older women carry out the lighter tasks such as sowing the seeds, thinning and weeding. Children assist with weeding and thinning.

Land tenure: How the land is worked can vary among the following arrangements:

- Mulk: private ownership, family labour; Mulk: but with mixed family labour and day hires; Rahn: or pawning [Rahn (pawned) land is taken by the working family in exchange for a sum of money they pay to the owner. The working family pays all costs and takes all profits from the land. This is an un-Islamic practice and it is not known how common it is.]
- Family labour and/or day hires; Sharak: share-cropping, rented.
- Rent and his family only; Sharak: share-cropping with the renter and his family working along with day hires.

Women’s positions in the land tenure system are determined by those of their husbands. The wife of a landowner, the wife of a share-cropper and the wife of a man who has taken lands in pawn work according to the above mentioned divisions by age and sex. The following points are qualifications, however:

Social class: sometimes women of the elite, particularly of the sayyid strata, do not work at all or do not work on any other lands but their own. Their lands may be rented out or daily workers may be hired. If so, they are relieved of their agricultural tasks and remain at home. In some areas, like Wadi Mawza, daily agricultural laborers are recruited from the akhdam, services class. Landless qaba’il (tribemen), for example, would enter into a sharak or share-cropping arrangement rather than work on the daily hire basis. Akhdam women follow their men in these cases and doing the tasks defined as women’s work. In Wadi Mawza their wages are in kind, not cash. Residence: Women in rural towns, such as Haja, Mahwit, Zabid, Rida, Mawza and Turba, work less on the land than do women small villages. Their lands are rented out. Bornstein has argued that women in some areas of the Tihama do no agricultural work. This has been verified in Wadi Rima where women do not participate in agricultural work at all.

Crops: It seems to be a general rule that women do no significant work in cash-cropping (such as cultivation of qat, grapes and coffee). The exceptions may be cotton in the Tihama and qat from Jabal Sabr near Ta’izz. New evidence suggests that women do some of the work on family plots of vegetables in the ‘Amran area, and this is thought to be a new trend after the out-migration of males from the area and mechanized irrigation. In Rida’ women weed the qat fields only. In areas of the Hamdan tribe, qat and grapes alike are cultivated, harvested and sold by men only. It may be postulated that labour out-migration is comparatively lower from areas where men participate actively in lucrative cash crops. As owners and wage labourers there is a good economic profit from the local situation. In sum, it can be said that women are the crucial element in the agricultural work force. Their importance varies by crop and is less vital where there is cash-cropping. In areas of high out-migration of males and with sorghum cultivation, women have the most intense agricultural production roles. Since sorghum appears to be the most widely cultivated subsistence crop in Yemen, it is instructive to look at how it is cultivated in detail. There are always exceptions to every generalization that is made about the division of labour in agriculture.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Yemen

Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 23: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Work Roles of Women: Rural Work: For Renumeration. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. If a woman needs to, or would like to, there are ways in which she can be paid for her work. In rural towns (where there is modern sector work) women can work as: Hospital cleaners and staff; School teachers—formal education and Qur'anic tutoring; Bank workers; Tea shop worker, usually with husband; Women who prepares the bride, (muzayyina).

In villages and rural towns women work as:
- Seamstresses; Water carriers; Clothes washers; Bread makers;
- Basket makers; Traditional health workers: including midwives;
- Construction workers; Servants; Traders: selling gold and clothes at parties or tinned goods at home Animal tenders; Potters, weavers; Agricultural labourers. Rural women who have no support from a husband or kin are likely to work at any of the above occupations to earn payment in either cash or grains. There are many women who are not destitute but who choose to work because they like to and would like the payments to improve their lives and those of their children. Some of the above occupations vary by region and by social class. Evidence shows that only women in the southern part of the country work in construction. Women in the Hujariyya earn lunch and 25 YR ($3.50) daily for carrying water, small stones and mud at construction sites. Men working in the unskilled construction jobs earn at least twice what women do, plus qat and cigarettes. Perhaps women are employed in construction in the south because the ratio of emigration is highest from there and there is a definite shortage of male labour. In addition, due to the wage differentials it is more economical to hire women. Specialized bridal preparations take place more often in towns than in villages. The Muzayyina, from the class of barbers, does this work. Other jobs restricted to lower class women are: working in tea shops, being servants, applying mud and dung to houses (in Mawza) and drumming at female wedding parties. Handicraft work, apart from basket-making, tends to be restricted to a lower class group. Potters can include women both in the Tihama and the highlands. The trade is usually family-organized. Most weaving tends to be done by men, though women spin wool into yarn in Rida' and in the east (Shelagh Weir, 1975, pp. 65–69). Traditional healers are often from the sayyid class; this goes for men as well as women. Sayyid women who are healers earn their income by burning (against fear and chronic pains), massaging (against rheumatism and infertility) and writing holy papers as amulets and cures. Their charges are minimal 5—15 YR ($US1.10—US$3.30). Women exorcists in the Zar cult [The Zar cult is found among women in the Tihama and involves group rituals with African styled dancing and drumming.] have big earnings but are few in number. When planning rural development projects, traditional remunerative tasks of women should be acknowledged. If there is the possibility of incorporating traditional specialists into a modern framework, all the better. Care should be taken so as to avoid threatening the earning capacity of such women. [=]

50046. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 25: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: The Social Roles of Women. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. In Yemen, men have three distinct areas of social interaction: the mosque, where males gather to pray, discuss current events and make decisions; the market where important information is passed on in the arena of buying and selling, and afternoon qat parties. These represent the intensely social, public world of males. [For further insights on the male world of Manakha, a town in Jabal Haraz, see Tomas Gerholm's Market, Mosque and Mafraj.] Women, on the other hand, do not pray communally in the mosques, nor do most women participate in such activities. Rather, women meet at formal qat and tea parties in the afternoons or through informal "door step" chats with neighbours. Afternoon gatherings tend to be more formalized in town and cities. Rural women, in general, have more interaction with other women and village men through their work. Tasks like fetching fuel and water, and working in the fields are often done in groups. Working songs are sung and latest news is spread, making the tasks themselves not so tiring. Children are not only part of the labour force of a community, but socialize freely with women throughout the day. In villages this is more casual than in cities. Indeed, children are raised by the community of women in a village, not by their mothers alone. Women evaluate each other with various criteria. Some attach a high value to the amount of gold and kind of clothes other women have. If a woman displays such items of status, surely she has an attentive, generous husband and this may be envied. Women are admired for certain personal qualities, like helpfulness, dignity (not indulging in gossip) and physical strength. The most powerful characters in any community of women are usually old women. They have proven themselves through time and command respect for having raised their children well and lived an honourable life. Often the most mobile women are widows and divorcées. It is these women who might be famous for some specialization which earns them their livelihood and appear to be more free in their work and socializing. Without a doubt, city women lead a less social life than rural women. Women may not even socialize with their neighbors, particularly in newly constructed and anonymous housing areas where migrants from the countryside live. These women have a less pleasant life, and indeed, a less informed one. If they are lucky enough to have a television, it would become their main source entertainment and information. [=]

Women and Health: Access to Medical Treatment. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Even if hospitals are within walking distance, women may be forbidden to seek medical advice there. The question of modesty is part of the problem. Many Yemeni men will not tolerate that their wives be examined by a male doctor. In addition, some medical facilities do not have good reputations and no honourable woman would be allowed to be seen there. Female circumcision is practised in the Tihama and not in the highlands. A campaign should be mounted by the Ministry of Health to deal with this dangerous mutilation of the female body. [\textit{\textsuperscript{5}}]

50050. Myrntt, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 28: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Women and Health: Access to Medical Treatment. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Clearly, strong social sanctions exist against educating girls—even at the primary classes and approximately 11% each for the secondary level. Clearly, strong social sanctions exist against educating girls—even at the primary level—in the northern provinces of Sa’dah and Mahwit as well as in the eastern province of Marib. For this year, 1978/79, only 59 girls are expected to complete teacher training at the preparatory level and only 26 will complete the secondary teacher training schools. Yemeni women represent 7.7% of the Yemeni student body at the University of San’a, with a high percent female of the total enrollment in the faculty of Education (12.1%) and lowest, (3.6%) of the total enrollment in the Faculty of Law and Islamic Law. Total of 23 females were fourth year students during 1977/78. While this seems low, it must be remembered that the number of women in the university has risen from 4 to over 1000 in the last six years. The Health Manpower Institute is the only formal institute for health workers in the country. Only 13 female nurses were expected to complete the three-year course in nursing by the end of the year. Yemen suffers from the legacy of no education for females, so it will be many years before the changes occurring now, at the primary levels of the formal education system, ever so modest, can be felt. The 1975 Manpower Survey by Socknat and Sinclair predicted that about 3000 females will be completing primary school by 1984/5 and that 800 will be finishing secondary school. While it is correct that consideration for the future of Yemen demands an emphasis on bringing girls into the formal education system form their early years, there are many women in the country over 15 years of age who could profit from non-formal education. Learning basic literacy and numeracy skills as well as being educated in simple hygiene and nutrition would have wide-ranging benefits since this perceive as ideal appears to depend on what idea they have of their future. Birth attendants also may be the old women of the extended family for whom circumcision is practised in the Tihama and not in the highlands. A campaign should be mounted by the Ministry of Health to deal with this dangerous mutilation of the female body. [\textit{\textsuperscript{5}}]

50051. Myrntt, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 29: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Women and Health: Access to Medical Treatment. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Yemeni women are aware that marriage in the mid-teenage years is very important in the household of their parents, more so in the countryside than in the cities. Too, marriage in the mid-teenage years is most common and this might not permit the completion of secondary school. What can be observed from school attendance statistics is that the females are still under-represented even in the first six years of school, when their labors is not so crucial to the household nor are they about to be married. Worth noting is the rising percentage of girls in the total attendance by class at the primary stage. This indicates that if families choose to send their daughters to school, they intend that the girls stay to complete the six years and acquire the primary school certificate. Boy students may attend for a few years and drop out when employment opportunities arise. The percentage of female students in the total student population varies from governorate to governorate. As to be expected, the governorates of San’a and Ta’izz have the highest percentages of female students, 15.4% and 23% respectively for the primary classes and approximately 11% each for the secondary level. It is reported that interest is high, but that classwork has been too far from showing his daughter to study publicly, report from the Ministry of Education Women’s Project suggests that the major constraints to educating females in Yemen are “social attitudes and parental ignorance, family obligations keeping girls at home, and the pattern of early marriage” (B. Awad, 1978, p. 3). It is true that the labour of girls is very important in the household of their parents, more so in the countryside than in the cities. Too, marriage in the mid-teenage years is most common and this might not permit the completion of secondary school. What can be observed from school attendance statistics is that the females are still under-represented even in the first six years of school, when their labors is not so crucial to the household nor are they about to be married. Worth noting is the rising percentage of girls in the total attendance by class at the primary stage. This indicates that if families choose to send their daughters to school, they intend that the girls stay to complete the six years and acquire the primary school certificate. Boy students may attend for a few years and drop out when employment opportunities arise. The percentage of female students in the total student population varies from governorate to governorate. As to be expected, the governorates of San’a and Ta’izz have the highest percentages of female students, 15.4% and 23% respectively for the primary classes and approximately 11% each for the secondary level. Clearly, strong social sanctions exist against educating girls—even at the primary level—in the northern provinces of Sa’dah and Mahwit as well as in the eastern province of Marib. For this year, 1978/79, only 59 girls are expected to complete teacher training at the preparatory level and only 26 will complete the secondary teacher training schools. Yemeni women represent 7.7% of the Yemeni student body at the University of San’a, with a high percent female of the total enrollment in the faculty of Education (12.1%) and lowest, (3.6%) of the total enrollment in the Faculty of Law and Islamic Law. Total of 23 females were fourth year students during 1977/78. While this seems low, it must be remembered that the number of women in the university has risen from 4 to over 1000 in the last six years. The Health Manpower Institute is the only formal institute for health workers in the country. Only 13 female nurses were expected to complete the three-year course in nursing by the end of the year. Yemen suffers from the legacy of no education for females, so it will be many years before the changes occurring now, at the primary levels of the formal education system, ever so modest, can be felt. The 1975 Manpower Survey by Socknat and Sinclair predicted that about 3000 females will be completing primary school by 1984/5 and that 800 will be finishing secondary school. While it is correct that consideration for the future of Yemen demands an emphasis on bringing girls into the formal education system form their early years, there are many women in the country over 15 years of age who could profit from non-formal education. Learning basic literacy and numeracy skills as well as being educated in simple hygiene and nutrition would have wide-ranging benefits since this perceive as ideal appears to depend on what idea they have of their future. Birth attendants also may be the old women of the extended family for whom circumcision is practised in the Tihama and not in the highlands. A campaign should be mounted by the Ministry of Health to deal with this dangerous mutilation of the female body. [\textit{\textsuperscript{5}}]

50052. Myrntt, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 30: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Women and Health: Access to Medical Treatment. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Yemeni women are aware that marriage in the mid-teenage years is very important in the household of their parents, more so in the countryside than in the cities. Too, marriage in the mid-teenage years is most common and this might not permit the completion of secondary school. While it is correct that consideration for the future of Yemen demands an emphasis on bringing girls into the formal education system form their early years, there are many women in the country over 15 years of age who could profit from non-formal education. Learning basic literacy and numeracy skills as well as being educated in simple hygiene and nutrition would have wide-ranging benefits since this perceive as ideal appears to depend on what idea they have of their future. Birth attendants also may be the old women of the extended family for whom circumcision is practised in the Tihama and not in the highlands. A campaign should be mounted by the Ministry of Health to deal with this dangerous mutilation of the female body. [\textit{\textsuperscript{5}}]

50049. Myrntt, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 27: Yemeni Women: An Analysis of the Status Quo: Women and Health: Basic Problems. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Yemeni women are aware that marriage in the mid-teenage years is very important in the household of their parents, more so in the countryside than in the cities. Too, marriage in the mid-teenage years is most common and this might not permit the completion of secondary school. While it is correct that consideration for the future of Yemen demands an emphasis on bringing girls into the formal education system form their early years, there are many women in the country over 15 years of age who could profit from non-formal education. Learning basic literacy and numeracy skills as well as being educated in simple hygiene and nutrition would have wide-ranging benefits since this perceive as ideal appears to depend on what idea they have of their future. Birth attendants also may be the old women of the extended family for whom circumcision is practised in the Tihama and not in the highlands. A campaign should be mounted by the Ministry of Health to deal with this dangerous mutilation of the female body. [\textit{\textsuperscript{5}}]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Republic: Part 31: International Strategies Versus Yemeni Goals and Possibilities. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The question of "women in development" descends directly from the movement to dissect change into groups which are known to play active roles in change, and into others which are thought to be the recipients of the benefits of change. The concern springs from empirical evidence which demonstrates that "change", "modernization", and "development" do not affect all segments of the population in the same way, and can have both positive and negative impacts on parts of society. Concerned about how women fare in the process of change, many development organizations have incorporated the imperative to "integrate women into development" into their policies. In spirit this means that national development needs women—to maximize human resources—and women need development—to maximize their own personal growth. The directive "integrate women into development" has had some definitional problems, however. Taken superficially, it assumes that women are integrated into development if they participate in modern education and the industrial labor force. Development, the reasoning goes, means training women for "modern work". While this aim is important for urban Yemen particularly, it misses the whole texture and dynamics of rural, traditional Yemeni society) 90% of the population. Integrating women into development in Yemen must deal with changes going on in the countryside totally apart from the "modern sector". Thus development for women in Yemen must be two-pronged; making sure that women participate and are positively affected by changes in the traditional sector as well as integrating women into the modern sector through education, training and employment. [a]

50054. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 32: International Strategies Versus Yemeni Goals and Possibilities: The Plan of Action: Declaration of Mexico. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The first serious effort to list objectives of development for women was the World Plan of Action of the International Women's Year. It is a plan based on the consensus of the delegates to the conference in Mexico City, 1975. The document addresses basic needs and rights of women, and more philosophical issues such as the re-evaluation of sex stereotypes. The use of such a document for Yemen lies in its reaffirmation of the "basic needs first" approach. It makes the preliminary steps explicit. Let us consider some of the list of Minimum Goals which are immediately relevant to Yemen (The complete list of Minimum Goals is found in Appendix V): (1) marked increase in literacy. (2) extension of technical and vocational skills to women. (3) equal access to education at every level. (4) establishment of the infrastructural services in rural and urban areas. (5) improved provision of health education and services, sanitation, nutrition, family education and other welfare services. (6) promotion of women's organizations. These goals answer basic human needs, and development policy should address these above all, first. [a]

50055. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 33: International Strategies Versus Yemeni Goals and Possibilities: The Policy of the Yemen Government: The Five Year Plan and Opinions of Officials. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The Five Year Plan of the Yemen Arab Republic states that at the basis of economic development in the country lies the establishment of an adequate infrastructure and the maximization of human resources in the country. The full utilization of human resources in the country will result from a marked increase in literacy, equal access to education at every level, extension of technical and vocational skills to everyone and increased health. Too, the promotion of women's organizations like the Yemeni Women's Association will foster the increased personal development of women through non-formal training and other assistance. [See Appendix IV for the Yemeni Women's Association statement at The Yemen International Development Conference.] In spirit and in directives, the Five Year Plan is in harmony with "basic needs first" and the Minimal Goals of the World Plan of Action. Generally speaking, government officials feel that the situation of women in Yemen will improve as basic services such as water, health and education spread. These are fundamental human needs and must be satisfied first. To appreciate what this means in practical terms we must look to the various programmes of the government. In the Ministry of Education, a Women's Section has been established to supervise formal and non-formal education for girls and women. They have worked to establish an appropriate health and home economics curriculum for the schools. Centers have been established where older girls and women can study for the Primary School certificate, learn basic literacy skills, study home economics or be given some vocational training. The Ministry of Social Affairs gives moral and material support to the Yemen Women's Association, which also offers basic literacy and training to women in San'a'. The ministry has a Women's Bureau which organizes research on women. A study is presently being conducted on women in the modern labour force, and what rights they have as employees. The Ministry supports women to attend international conferences, and activities like Mothers' Day. The Five Year Health Programme of the Ministry of Health stresses the implementation of a wide-ranging health service which includes provision of safe water (along with the Ministry of Public Works) sanitation, better housing, and nutrition education. The Programme also stresses the implementation of a primary health care system, designed to provide rural communities with services for mothers-child health and local birth attendants. Agricultural extension is the programme of the Ministry of Agriculture which could have the most direct impact on women in the countryside. The service is not fully operational, yet it has great potential. (Extension will be discussed more fully under Section 4, and evaluation of on-going projects). In sum, the Yemen Government has established programmes with a direct impact on women in several of the ministries. Each has had its own set of problems, ranging from difficulties recruiting female staff to traditions inhibiting participation of women (particularly in health, education and work as female agricultural extension agents). Positive advances have been made, despite the constraints, and government officials believe that progress will demand patience and persistence. [a]

50056. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 34: International Strategies Versus Yemeni Goals and Possibilities: Perceptions of Yemeni Women. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Yemeni women themselves have varying perceptions about what will better their lives. Without exception, rural women identify their problems with those of the community: lack of roads, water supply, schools for their children, clinics, electricity and difficult agricultural work. If anything, one is struck by how content rural women are in many ways. Certainly they feel that they have never been economically so well off. Dissatisfaction comes from comparison, and the only comparison that rural women can make is that their lives are more comfortable now than they were even in the recent past. Many city women, however, are content with their lifestyle which is comparatively more restricted than that of rural women. Their routine of household work and afternoon socializing is what they know best. There is, however, an increasing number of women who would choose to improve themselves with education and training, or to work and earn a wage. It is ironic that rural women have always had two spheres of influence, in the home and non-formal education for girls and women. They have worked to study for the Primary School certificate, learn basic literacy skills, study home economics or be given some vocational training. The Ministry of Social Affairs gives moral and material support to the Yemen Women's Association, which also offers basic literacy and training to women in San'a'. The ministry has a Women's Bureau which organizes research on women. A study is presently being conducted on women in the modern labour force, and what rights they have as employees. The Ministry supports women to attend international conferences, and activities like Mothers' Day. The Five Year Health Programme of the Ministry of Health stresses the implementation of a wide-ranging health service which includes provision of safe water (along with the Ministry of Public Works) sanitation, better housing, and nutrition education. The Programme also stresses the implementation of a primary health care system, designed to provide rural communities with services for mothers-child health and local birth attendants. Agricultural extension is the programme of the Ministry of Agriculture which could have the most direct impact on women in the countryside. The service is not fully operational, yet it has great potential. (Extension will be discussed more fully under Section 4, and evaluation of on-going projects). In sum, the Yemen Government has established programmes with a direct impact on women in several of the ministries. Each has had its own set of problems, ranging from difficulties recruiting female staff to traditions inhibiting participation of women (particularly in health, education and work as female agricultural extension agents). Positive advances have been made, despite the constraints, and government officials believe that progress will demand patience and persistence. [a]
Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 35: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Foreign aid development projects in Yemen can be grouped into 5 general categories: (1) Technical support (providing advisers and technicians); (2) Infrastructure and capital development (building of roads, water projects, schools, hospitals and industrial projects); (3) Manpower training (specialized training institutes and fellowship programmes); (4) Agricultural projects (livestock and veterinary, agricultural mechanization, plant protection and crop experimentation) and, (5) “integrated rural development projects” which combine all of the above.

In the literature on women in development, it is often argued that any development project has a social impact—and therefore an impact on women—so must explain its objectives, and costs, in social terms. In Yemen, certainly the last four categories of projects should be liable to scrutiny. It has been shown, for example, that infrastructure development projects such as roads and irrigation schemes may have negative effects on part of the population of the area they are intended to serve. The development of small agricultural industries may also displace people who have earned a traditional livelihood from related tasks. Women and poultry production are a prime example of how traditional remunerative tasks might not fit into modern schemes. In any case, these kinds of issues should be considered in the initial planning phases of projects and checked on during later phases of project implementation. Organizations and institutions in Yemen which are involved in development have very few secondary sources on social background on which they can rely. Apart from A. Bornstein’s report on Food and Society in Yemen (1974) little exists on the private world of women. It is instructive, therefore, to look at how various projects deal with sociological variables in general, and the question of women in particular. The projects evaluated are involved in rural development work, and have comparatively large budgets. They are not a representative sample of all development projects, but demonstrate some of the problems not uncommon in other fields. They are: Southern Uplands Regional Development Project (SURDP); The Tihama Development Authority: Extension Service, Zabid; Rida’ Integrated Rural Development Project; al-Baun Project, ‘Amran; Local Resources for Development in al-Hudaydah and Haja Governarates (USAID); Yemeni-British Agricultural Engineering Project; The British Veterinary Project. [=]

50058. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 36: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: Criteria of Evaluation. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. A first criteria of evaluation is the composition of project teams. Multidisciplinary teams, including sociologists and women, would be the ideal. Sociologists are likely to pose certain kinds of questions and view the project in social terms. Women, whatever their discipline or interests may be, have access to Yemeni women by virtue of their sex. One reason why so few women come on project missions is the prevailing belief in the West that a Western woman cannot deal as a professional in a culture like that of Yemen. Enough exceptions now exist to prove this belief false. Too, Europe and America have far too few women professionals in such high-level positions anyway. Voluntary organizations are redressing this imbalance slightly, with younger professional women taking up positions in countries like Yemen. Of the projects surveyed, the general composition of project teams was economists, agronomists and various other technical personnel. Only the Rida’ Integrated Rural Development Project and the USAID Local Resources Project included social scientists in their initial teams and included women for research among the local women. A second criteria is if the project defined the social parameters of the target group or area. What sort of socioeconomic base line data were collected? Did they include information on changing agricultural patterns, division of labour, decision-making and remunerative traditional tasks? A third criteria is if the research in the planning stages of the project provided information on local priorities and “felt needs”. A final consideration, for projects in late phases of implementation, concerns evaluations of the project in social terms. Have any of the projects done this? These criteria—social parameters, felt needs and evaluations—will be discussed separately under each project description. [=]

50059. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 37: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in YemenSummary of Projects: The Southern Uplands Rural Project. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. This project, funded by the World Bank and IDA, was initiated in the Ta’izz and Ibb provinces during 1976 with the specific goals to: increase agricultural production, to improve per capita income and to reduce dependence on imports for essential foodstuffs. SURDP I depleted its funds in 1976 and SURDP II will continue the original project and complete the unfinished work in a wider geographical area. A report was prepared for the SURDP II identification mission in mid 1978 and contained facts from the 1975 census on population, agricultural cultivation and livestock, schools and hospitals. "Labour Force Participation" statistics were also presented, but are of questionable value in rural Yemen since they do not include non-wage family labour which is crucial to the understanding of agricultural production. The sociological information presented is, unfortunately, superficial. The project has had two systems of enquiry into local expectations. The agricultural extension agents, who work out of the Central Agricultural Research Station in Ta’izz and in cooperation with SURDP, have a routine questionnaire on what farmers want from the extension service. SURDP also has conducted a survey of the Local Development Associations since it is through the LDA’s that they work. An evaluation of SURDP I was made in the report prepared for the identification mission for SURDP II. "Due to flexibility shown by the project management and the high inflation rate, the projects achievements were different from those projected." (SURDP II, 1978, Annex 2 P. 2) The infrastructural development such as roads and water systems, as well as technical assistance were limited because of inflation and slow recruitment of staff. No detailed analysis was presented on who had actually benefited from the first project. One lesson, at least, can be learned from the SURDP experience: How can census figures and other statistics be used to define social parameters, and what are their limitations? The census provides valuable information on the sex and age structure of the population, emigration rates, numbers of school and hospitals. The "labour force participation statistics, on the other hand, must be used very carefully when explaining the rural economy. The census is a useful framework, but it gives a static picture and does not really explain why things are the way that they are. [=]

50060. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 38: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: The Tihama Development Authority: Extension Service, Zabid. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The agricultural extension and training department of the Tihama Development Authority was established in 1974 for services in Wadi Zabid. Its aims were to train a cadre of Yemeni extension agents for the area and to carry our research on crop varieties. Much of the socioeconomic information the project has has been gathered empirically, over time, and has never been formalized into a report. Quite a lot is known about division of labour and the role of women in the area, but the leadership of the project has been reluctant to write it down because it is not measurable or quantifiable. The needs and opinions of the people are made known in the on-going dialogue between the farmers and the extension agents. For example, women have refused to cook with a new strain of sorghum developed because it is dark in colour. The extension agents are now trying to convince the women, indirectly through male family members, that the new, dark grains are better. There has been no formal evaluation of the project and its successes and failures in social terms. It is unfortunate that the project papers concentrate on crop production outputs and other quantifiable data when it would be useful to their project in the future, and to others involved in extension and rural agricultural projects, if more of the data on attitudes and social organization which are well-known now, would be written down. [=]

50061. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 39: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: The Rida’ Integrated Rural Development Project. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. This project has been an experiment from the beginning, using a research-oriented approach. A preparatory mission of multidisciplinary experts came to Yemen in 1977, and within six months, a Dutch team had arrived in Rida’ ready to begin work. The project objectives have not been explicit. Rather, action-oriented research into agricultural practises and the society in and around Rida’ were emphasized as a first step. Some work has been done on crop experimentation, construction of roads and water projects. Research has been the prime activity of the Dutch team and appropriate for Yemen, the team leader argues, because so little baseline socio-economic information exists. Only now do they know what messages to extend and how to communicate with the society at large. Full-time research on women has been an integral part of the project. Local expectations have proved to be problematic for the project in that the people of Rida’ expected more immediate services and visible benefits of the project. The dissatisfaction has been expressed in a variety of ways and the project has tried to adapt itself by giving more demonstration lectures. A formal evaluation of the research and project activities to date will be issued in 1979, and will make policy suggestions based on their social and agricultural studies. In sum, the Rida’ project provides an alternative approach to “integrated rural development”. Project goals are dependent on the outcomes of the research which has been a major activity of the project to date. The most extensive and systematic information on women in the country has been collected, and it is hoped that a model strategy on women in the development of rural Yemen will be devised from it. [=]

50062. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 40: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: Al-Baun, ‘Amran. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. This project is in the feasibility study phase with efforts now directed to experimentation with crop varieties, extension and demonstration and the construction of on-site housing for the project staff. The project team has already found out that the economic forecasting carried out by the identification mission had not specified the labour shortage problem nor the inflation which is already causing budgetary constraints. Aware of the need for current socio-economic information, a sociologist was recruited for a short time. In his report, he noted that women, old men and children are participating in agriculture more than before. Apart from this comment, which needs some historical perspective, the report contains no information on attitudes, the roles of women and how they might participate in the project. Much of what is being done in al-Baun is based on years of research on crop experimentation in the ‘A’in area. As yet, there has been little feedback or evaluation on what is being in the al-Baun area itself. The al-Baun area is interesting in that it includes production of subsistence crops based on rain-fed irrigation, as well as both traditional and modern cash crops which demand mechanized irrigation. It presents a microcosm of Yemeni agricultural practice and for this reason information on how production is organized and the roles of women would be extremely useful. [=]

50063. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 41: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: Local Resources for Development in the Al-Hudaydah and Haja Governorates (USAID). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. This “integrated rural development project” is in its planning stages. A multidisciplinary team conducted a socioeconomic survey of the two areas in 1978. Interest centered on local political institutions and their ability to muster support and match funds for roads and other projects. Information was collected on the LDA’s [LDA: Local Development Associations (Co-operatives)], markets, the land tenure system and agricultural practice, and the activities of women. The same socio-economic survey contained questions on what the local people regarded as their development priorities. As anticipated, roads and water are among the top priority needs, so will be concentrated on initially. Continuing evaluation is being built into the project from the beginning. A team of researchers, to include one woman sociologist, will reside in the project area, and evaluate the effects of the project at various stages. The preliminary research for this project has begun in the right directions assessing local development priorities against the ability of the Yemeni institutions in Haja and al-Hudaydah to share responsibility for the projects. It is hoped that the project will define specific development priorities for women in the Hudaydah and Haja governorates through systematic and continuous research. [=]

50064. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 42: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: The Yemeni-British Agricultural Engineering Project. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. The aims of this project are to experiment with and introduce appropriate mechanization into Yemeni agriculture. Mechanization is especially important due to the labour shortage in the country and particularly crucial during peak work periods like planting and harvesting. The project was located in Ta’izz because of the population and cultivation density of the area. An experimental project, much of their information on social organization has been collected in the field as the work is being done. For example, the team leader mentioned that the tasks which are traditionally male — ploughing and threshing — appear to be easiest and most economical to mechanize. Women’s tasks such as planting, thinning, weeding and harvesting are more difficult to mechanize, particularly on small plots. There is a continuous dialogue between the project members and the farmers of the Ta’izz region, so feedback on what is liked and disliked is constant. The project plans to hire an economist to look at the question of family labour versus daily hire and/or mechanization. The assumption is that there is more to mechanization than the machines alone. In sum, a lot of practical sociological information has been gathered in the field by members of this project. This, along with the proposed study into the economics of family labour versus mechanization, should add to the understanding of the changing agricultural production in Yemen. A positive addition to the project would be the addition of a component to improve the agricultural tools of women. [=]

50065. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 43: An Evaluation of On-Going Development Projects in Yemen: The British Veterinary Team. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. This project provides a health service for livestock and poultry throughout the country. Its activities include a vaccination program, visits to disease-ridden areas and laboratory work. While the team has an abundance of practical knowledge on how livestock and poultry are cared for in the country, none of the social background to animal production has been reported on, at least in a formal report. Local “felt needs” are articulated primarily through emergency calls to the team. Objectively, some of the animal feeding techniques are antiquated and time-consuming for women and even harmful to animals. The team members are aware of this problem, but until now, the project has not been flexible enough—both staff-wise and time-wise—to deal with the matter. In sum, the veterinary project could be useful, = harmful to animals. The team members are aware of this problem, but...
Other measures do this by quantifying health and educational services, implementation. Reasons for consideration: It is necessary to be able to but they do not give us an understanding of the real terms of development. Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study; Evaluation During succeeding can be measured in monetary terms such as GNP, GDP and traditional sector: This concerns remunerative activities which persons to make people better off. Whether or not the process of development is (5) Consideration: Wages earned by men and women in the Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Reasons for Consideration: This consideration makes clear not only the Mahwit project has concentrated on training local health workers, and Consideration: To be able to affect change, it must be known who has the planning, and evaluation. The following checklist is modest in size but not modest in demands. It demands a general understanding of fundamental social issues, and rural Yemen of the "integrated rural development" nature, yet some of the points are applicable to urban projects as well. [5] 50067. Mynitti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 46: Recommendations on How Women Can Participate in and Profit From the Development Process: Improvements in Project Planning: A Checklist. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Consideration: (1) Consideration: Degree of fit with local priorities regarding women: This is designed to check whether the project objectives are appropriate to the priorities within the country and the felt needs of the women themselves. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Project Identification. Reasons for Consideration: A project will be accepted at all levels only if the project addresses locally perceived needs. (2) Consideration: The demographic picture: Information such as the sex rates and age structure of the population in the project area can be obtained from the 1975 census. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Project Identification. Reasons for Consideration: This check makes the manpower situation and who is on the ground explicit. It will provide the project planners with knowledge of the parameters of the target population, but it may be too late to make changes. (3) Consideration: Organization of the family: This point includes data on decision-making within the family and roles of family members. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study. Reasons for Consideration: To be able to affect change, it must be known who has the decision-making power, even at the smallest unit of society, the household. The explicit statement of who does which tasks (cooking, buying food, water, fuel etc.) makes it clear where services and education should be directed. (4) Consideration: Agricultural Tasks: The Division of Labour. Variation should be noted by sex, age, social status and which crops are produced. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study. Reasons for Consideration: This consideration makes clear not only which tasks are important in agricultural production in Yemen, but who does the work. Where improvements can be made and to whom they should be directed, is necessary for the project planner. (5) Consideration: Wages earned by men and omen in the traditional sector: This concerns remunerative activities which persons in the project area have participated in prior to the project. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study: Evaluation During Implementation. Reasons for consideration: It is necessary to be able to predict the harmful effects a project might have, particularly on the wage-earning capacity of persons. Plans could be made to incorporate these.
persons into the modern scheme.

(6) Consideration: Strategies to address women: Specific steps—from recruitment of personnel to plans of activities—should be listed. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study; Evaluation During Implementation. Reasons for consideration: This point concerns the recruitment of necessary project personnel, possibly women, to meet the project's goals.

(7) Consideration: Women as participants in the project: The labor and energy of women as an important source of manpower in the country-being utilised to the fullest? Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study; Evaluation During Implementation. Reasons for consideration: There should be an awareness of how women are restricted in cultural terms and how this might negatively influence their participation in the project. Positive steps should be taken to overcome these. Possible changes in the roles of women should be explained.

(8) Consideration: WOMEN as beneficiaries of the project. Time of Consideration (Stage of Project): Feasibility Study; Evaluation During Implementation. Reasons for consideration: This general consideration should note how women are to benefit from the project. care should be taken that they are brought into the process of modernization. [=]

50069. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 47: Recommendations on How Women Can Participate in and Profit From the Development Process: Possible Project Components for Women: Agriculture. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. All developments have impact on women in as much as they affect the population as a whole. Nevertheless, there are many projects which would better suit the needs of women if some of the components were directed at women, after a careful analysis of their situation has been made.

(1) Mechanization: The question of mechanization in Yemen presents an interesting problem. As yet, it appears that the easiest tasks to mechanize are those traditionally male, ploughing and threshing. In the short term, this will help alleviate the problems due to the outmigration of males, but there is no reason why women could not be taught how to use machines, too. Threshing machines could be run by women, for example. One cannot believe that women are not strong enough to run machines when one observes other work that women do. More experimentation should be supported on the development of simple labour-saving devices which would assist women in their agricultural work. Women should not be left out of the modernization of agriculture. Projects dealing with agricultural mechanization and appropriate technology should make improvements in the agricultural tasks of women one of their primary focuses.

(2) Extension: Agricultural extension has great possibilities for bringing practical education to rural people, men and women. While it is true that in most cases women are the bulk of the labour and men are the decision-makers, this does not justify an extension programme aimed at men only. Modern techniques should be shared by everyone. If extension agents are honourable and polite in their behavior, and lectures are publicly held, there is no reason why women could not participate. In addition to lessons on improved agricultural practice supplementary courses could be given on nutrition, first aid and basic hygiene, to the entire village. Mobile units, with visual aid and use of media, could provide village-wide entertainment and education at the same time. One wonders if a special extension service for women would not be counterproductive. The “Total Village” approach is certainly more egalitarian and also more realistic given the shortage of trained, mobile females. Emphasis on home economics segregates women further and does not address other subjects, like agricultural work, which are important in their daily lives. Literacy training should be secondary, since rural women do not have the academic discipline nor the time to devote to studying and can rely on theiriterate children for reading messages and instructions. “Integrated rural development projects” might employ women (local Yemeni or wives of Arab school teachers resident in the area) for special home economics services—child care, cooking, sewing etc.—but these should be supplementary to general extension services aimed at the village as a whole.

(3) Training and employment: Women should be encouraged to participate in training courses related to agriculture and as counterparts in agricultural projects. Advertisements, interviews in schools and other publicity could be used in recruitment. Response may be low in the beginning, but each project should give women the opportunity to participate. With more and more girls receiving a formal education each year, the pool of possible candidates for training and employment is increasing.

(4) Media and agriculture: The media could also become involved in transmitting messages to improve agricultural work and rural life in general. The initiative has been taken by San’a’ Radio to establish a programme on rural life and work which would be taped in the countryside and broadcast at a later date. This service should be supported and women should be encouraged to participate in San’a’ and as contributors in the countryside. [=]

50070. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 49: Recommendations on How Women Can Participate in and Profit From the Development Process: Possible Project Components for Women: Livestock. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (1) Feeding practises: The veterinary team has noted that various rural practises regarding animals are harmful and antiquated. The custom to keep animals inside houses is harmful to their health, for example. Too, the making and feeding of “lucerne lollipops” to cows is a very time-consuming task for women. Both of these practises, and others, could be changed if a concerted effort were made and strategy of extension, directed at both women and men, were planned. The Veterinary Project or the Livestock Project within the Ministry of Agriculture could be expanded to cover these subjects.

(2) Dairy products: Women, who process all dairy products, could be taught improved methods. The Yarim experiment in training “milkm-aids” for mechanized milking and the establishment of female-run, household-based dairy enterprises will serve as a lesson on the problems and possibilities in this field. Integrated rural development projects might want to add this component to their project proposals.

(3) Poultry production: Like household dairies, small-scale poultry farms could be operated and managed by women in villages. Preliminary research must be carried out, however, on how large an enterprise can be and remain in the sphere of women.

(4) Research on animal fodder: Of indirect benefit to women would be research in experimental farms on animal fodder cultivation in rain-fed areas. If fodder which does not need mechanized irrigation like lucerne could be grown in fallow fields, it would save valuable time which women spend going far distances for fodder. It would be a useful source of food in addition to sorghum stalks. [=]

(2) The possibility of afforestation projects may provide some parts of the country with bigger supplies of wood for cooking.

(3) More research is needed on what fuels women prefer to cook with. The costs of various fuels can be calculated in terms of time, effort and money, but what is used for cooking, in the end, rests with the preferences of women. [=]

50072. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 50: Recommendations on How Women Can Participate in and Profit From the Development Process: Possible Project Components for Women: Education. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (1) The future of the country rests with the increased participation of girls in primary education and up. Attitudes against educating daughters might be changed, or changes accelerated, through a media campaign aimed at both daughters and parents, stressing both the importance and respectability of education for girls.

(2) An advertising campaign to encourage increased participation in employment-related training institutes in health, secretarial and commercial fields should be carried out.

(3) Non-formal education: There are many females in the country over 15 years of age who have never participated in the formal education system at all. This cohort of women will be mothers and wives for some time to come, so provision of a basic education in home economics, nutrition and literacy through the non-formal system could benefit them as individuals and have positive effects on the well-being of their families. The non-formal system should be encouraged and teachers recruited from the community of Arab teachers living and working in all areas of the country. [=]

(2) Television: Regularly scheduled, locally-produced programmes which would interest women are a necessary addition to the current programmes. Any number of subjects are important: nutrition; cooking; hygiene; publicity for education, training and employment; life stories of Yemeni women; country life, highlighting women in agriculture; demonstrations on household improvements.

(3) Participation of the Yemeni Women's Association in the production of programmes should be encouraged. [=]

50077. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 55: Appendix One: List of Persons Consulted. Yemeni OFFICIALS: Central Planning Organisation: Mr. Ali Al-Bahr, Deputy Minister; Mr. Anwar Harazi, Director of Projects Department; Mr. Abdul Rabu Gerada, Head of Planning Department; Ms. Asma Basha, Loans Department. Ministry of Social Affairs, Youth and Labor: Mr. Ahmed Salih Al-Ru'ayni, Minister; Mr. Isma'il Al-Fadhil, Director, Social Affairs Authority. Ministry of Public Works: Mr. Abdul-Bari Salih, Head Rural Water Projects. Ministry of Agriculture: Mr. Muqbil, Director Planning Department. Ministry of Education: Ms. Fatima Fadhl, Director Women's Section. Yemeni Women's Association: Mrs. Sale'a Dallal, President. University of San'a: Mr. Abdul Ali Othman, Professor, Department of Sociology.

PROJECTS: MULTILATERAL DONORS: Central Agricultural Research Station, Ta'iizz: Mr. Fuad Salim, Extension Head. Livestock Credit and Processing Project: Mr. Kim Kuneman, Project Head; Mr. Arnold, Dairy Division. Ministry of Agriculture, Institutional Support: Mr. Mikhail Shafiq, Project Head; Mr. Mahmoud Salih, Planning Department; Mr. Homsi, Statistics Department. Tihama Development Authority, Zabid: Dr. Ahmed Rafa'ie, Director, Extension Division. SURDP, Ta'iizz: Mr. Hassan Huraybi, Co-manager; Mr. P.O. Tewari, Extension Expert. UNDP: Mr. Tim Howick-Smith, Programme Officer. UNESCO: Dr. Elias, Head, UNESCO project in the Ministry of Education.

Projects: Bi-Lateral Donors: Al-Baun Project (West Germany): Mr. Werner Moesbrugger, Head; Mr. Konrad Engelberger. American Save the Children: Mr. John Salamack. British Veterinary Team: Mr. Peter Heath. British Volunteers: Mr. James Firebrace. Integrated Rural Development Project of Rada'a (the Netherlands): Mr. Rudolf Th. Wiersinga, Team Leader; Ms. Fatima Huraybi, Counterpart, Research on women. Overseas Development Ministry (UK): Mr. Hugo Haig-Thomas. Rada-Barnen (Swedish Save the Children) Clinic, Ta'izz: Mr. Lars-Johan Johnsen, Administrator; Ms. Stina Almroth, Nutritionist. San'a Radio (West Germany): Dr. Martin Schneiderfritz. Suq Al Baqr Clinic (West Germany): Dr. Jens Herrmann, Health Planner. USAID: Ms. Lee Ann (Pixie) Ross, Economic Programme Officer. Yemeni-British Agricultural Engineering Project, Ta'izz: Mr. James Williams, Project director; Mr. Abdul Ghani Ash-Shamiri, Counterpart director.

Researchers and Their Local Affiliations: Ms. Sheila Carapico, State University of New York, Binghamton, (USAID); Ms. Samar El-Daher, Queens College, University of London (Basic Services, Ministry of Health); Mr. Richard Tutwiler, State University of New York, Binghamton (American Save the Children Project. Mahwit) =

50078. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 56: Appendix III: POLicy Statements From Development Agencies Concerning Women. Germany; German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (1) Federal Republic of Germany: Memorandum (included in the summary records of negotiations signed in Bonn on 7/4/1978). The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany wishes to inform the Government of the Yemen Arab Republic that it attaches special important in its cooperation programme to projects capable of improving the situation of women and enhancing their contribution towards development. In doing so, it is acting in response to the findings of the UN World Conference of the International Women's Year in Mexico in 1975 and especially to the World Plan of Action adopted by consensus at this conference. Opportunities for cooperation along this line are relatively varied, for example, in areas of particular importance for family life (e.g. housing, drinking water supply, health, education, population policy). Cooperation can also help towards increasing women's contribution to the development process (e.g. specialised training, small industries and crafts, production and processing of foodstuffs, trade). Other possibilities are measures of direct benefit to women and women's activities (women's organizations, specific programmes of and for women). By drawing attention to the above opportunities, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany wishes to indicate that it is ready in principle to promote such projects. Its readiness is based on the belief that these areas are very heavily influenced by the general conditions in the country concerned and by its society and culture, and that, therefore, specific proposals and suggestions for cooperation must come from the partner. With this in mind, and considering the great importance of the participation of women in the development process, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany would welcome proposals for such operation.

(2) The Netherlands: A statement was issued after the International Women's Year Conference in 1975 which stated that projects should take women into account and integrate them into the process of development.

(3) UNDP: "The Project Document: Project Identification and Preparation", from UNDP Policies and Procedures Manual. Dec. 1975. P. 8: "In addition to the pursuit of its objectives, the project may be concerned with one or more economic or social goals . . . ." Included: integration of particular groups in the population (viz women) into the development process. UNDP also published a paper in 1977: "Guidelines on the Integration of Women in Development.

(4) USAID: USAID has a congressional mandate to help the poorest of the poor, in countries such as Yemen. The Percy Amendment of 1973 is AID's guide for programme assistance to women. "Programmes shall be administered so as to give particular attention to those programmes, projects and activities which tend to integrate women into the national economies of foreign countries, thus improving their status in the total development effort."

(5) The United Kingdom, ODM: The ODM is committed to helping the poorest citizens of the least developed countries in the world. For this reason, they are involved in primarily rural development projects in Yemen. There is no special memorandum on women in development.

(6) World Bank: "The need to recognize and support the role of women in Development is an issue which the World Bank considers of great importance for itself and its member Governments. The Bank expects to participate to an increasing extent in the efforts of more Governments to extend the benefits of development to all their population, women as well as men, and thus ensure that so large a proportional at the world's human resources underutilized. Integrating women into Development. 1975, p. 29.=&

50079. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 57: Appendix IV: Report of the Yemen International Conference.12/1/1977:Report of the Women's Role in the Development Plan. Germany; German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (174) The representative of Yemeni Women's Association in San'a Mrs. Zal El-Ham, introducing this subject, stated that the Plan gave importance to the role of the Yemeni woman in the implementation of its economic and social programmes. It recognized the necessity of preparing women to bear their responsibilities through designing programmes for their education and training. The Plan aimed at increasing the share of women's access to all educational stages, particularly, the primary and secondary stages. It also provided them with the opportunity to join the teachers, and training institutions to qualify them for many kinds of jobs. It was estimated that 5000 women would be added to the work force during the Plan period. Through non-formal education, women will participate in literacy centres. They will also be assisted in organizing family life and obtaining health services. The Plan aimed at supporting the Yemeni Women's Association and establishing branches in the various regions with a view to improving women's living conditions, their social activities, their orientation towards their rights and duties and their production skills.[=]

50080. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 58: Appendix V: Minimum Goals. Germany; German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (1) Federal Republic of Germany: Memorandum.readiness is based on the belief that these areas are very heavily influenced by the general conditions in the country concerned and by its society and culture, and that, therefore, specific proposals and suggestions for cooperation must come from the partner. With this in mind, and considering the great importance of the participation of women in the development process, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany would welcome proposals for such operation.

The Plan aimed at increasing the share of women's access to all educational stages, particularly, the primary and secondary stages. It also provided them with the opportunity to join the teachers, and training institutions to qualify them for many kinds of jobs. It was estimated that 5000 women would be added to the work force during the Plan period. Through non-formal education, women will participate in literacy centres. They will also be assisted in organizing family life and obtaining health services. The Plan aimed at supporting the Yemeni Women's Association and establishing branches in the various regions with a view to improving women's living conditions, their social activities, their orientation towards their rights and duties and their production skills. [=]
(l) The promotion of women’s organizations as an interim measure within workers’ organizations and educational, economic and professional institutions;

(m) The development of modern rural technology, cottage industry, pre-school day centres, time and energy saving devices so as to help reduce the heavy work load of women, particularly those living in rural sectors and for the urban poor and thus facilitate the full participation of women in economic, social, community, national and international affairs;

(n) The establishment of an inter-disciplinary and multi-sectoral machinery within the government for accelerating the achievement of equal opportunities for women and their full integration into national life.

[=]

Chapter One: Definitions and General Regulations (excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. [This English translation was requested by the ATCPO of Promo Services in Beirut and has not been authorized by the Yemen Government. The original legal text has many ambiguities, so allowances should be made when reading the sometimes unclear English version. The document, imperfect as it stands, might still provide useful information which until now has been inaccessible to the non-Arabic reader.]

Article 1: This Law defines the rights and obligations of the workers and employers in the Arab Republic of Yemen and regulates the relations between them.

Article 2: In applying this law, the following definitions should be abided with. (1) By worker, it is meant any person, male or female, working for an employer or under his supervision directly or indirectly, against a wage regardless of its nature and in accordance with a written or verbal contract. (2) By apprentice, it is meant any worker learning a profession or trade, being an adult or under age and working under the supervision of the employer. (3) By employer it is meant any person physical or natural who employs one or several workers against a certain wage of whatever nature. (4) By wages it is meant.. (5) By juvenile (youth) it is meant any male or female who is not less than twelve years old nor is he over fifteen. (6) [omitted] (7) By employee it is meant any person working under the supervision of an employer in accordance with a written or verbal contract, and the nature of his work is either administrative or mainly requires mental effort.

Article 3: The provisions of this law are excluded from the LabourLaw; Official Gazette dated 15 Sha’aban 1390 i.e. 10/15/1970:

Chapter Four: Individual Labor Contract (Excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 30: Considered as an apprentice is any person contracteds work for an employer with the intention of learning his profession.

Article 31: Any apprentice over sixteen years of age can conclude his training contract and determine in it his training period. The wage scale should be gradual in order to achieve in its final stages the minimum salary assigned for the workers in the specific category he is being trained in.

Article 32: The minister responsible for Industrial or Commercial establishment specified by his decree and in which he finds the necessity to train the Yemeni workers in the nature of their work, can compel those establishments to accept a number of workers for training under skilled laborers.

Article 33: The employer may break the contract with the apprentice if he has proof of his lack of capability or willingness to learn an assigned profession properly, the trainee may also terminate his employment by giving the other party at least one week’s notice of his desire to cancel the contract.

Article 34: All conditions of the labor code apply to working women without discrimination falling in the same category without breaching the rules of the following articles.

Article 35: It is not permissible to have women work between the hours 6 p.m. and 6 a.m.

Article 36: It is not permissible to engage women in jobs injurious to the health or had labor work or others being defined by decree of the minister concerned.

Article 37: A working woman can obtain a maternity leave of 70 days, this being the period before and after delivery. Therefore, it is not permissible to assign work to a working woman for forty days following the delivery date.

Article 38: An amount equivalent to 70% of her wages will be paid to the working woman for the maternity leave so granted.

Article 39: Every employer who employs a working woman or more should post on site a copy of the Women Labor Code.

Article 40: Youths under fifteen should not be asked to work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. nor should they be engaged in effective work for a period exceeding 6 hours a day.

Article 41: It is not permissible to ask youths to do any overtime work, irrespective of the circumstances.

Article 42: Every employer who employs a juvenile or more: (1) Should include in the labour register a copy of the laws governing the youth work. (2) Should post in a prominent position a schedule of working and rest hours for juveniles. (3) Should submit to the Social Welfare and Labour Authorities a list giving the name, nature of work, and the date of employment for each juvenile. [=]

Article 60: The employer should bear the expenses for the repatriation of the worker or the employee to the place where he was originally engaged should the worker or the employee submit such a request under the following cases: (a) If the employer terminates the services of the worker or the employee for any of the reasons stipulated in article (50), (b) On the expiration date of the contract, (c) If the worker or the employee terminates his employment for any of the reasons reported in article (52), (d) Upon termination of the services of the worker or the employee after completing his paid sick leave entitlement and is still sick.

Article 62: The employer has no right to terminate the services of the worker or the employee during their absence on paid sick leave.

Article 63: The worker or the employee is entitled to a compensation for the services stipulated in article (51) of this Law, on the following conditions—(a) Upon termination of services of the worker or the employee, (b) If a woman relinquishes her services for reasons of marriage.

50084. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 62: Appendix VI: Yemen Arab Republic Labor Law (1970): Presidential Decree of Law No. (5) 1970; Regarding the Issuance of the LabourLaw; Official Gazette dated 15 Sha’aban 1390 i.e. 10/15/1970; Chapter Four: Minimum Scale of Wages (Excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 84: (1) The minimum scale for wages is the minimum salary payable to be worker or employee as per decree of the Wages Committee for any trade or branch thereof or profession or category of workers or employees. (4) The minimum scale of wages for juveniles, workers and employees on probation and training is determined on the basis of not less than one third of the agreed minimum wage of the same category.

Article 86: It is incumbent on the employers who are covered by the decrees of the Wage Determination Committee to post on the facade of their premises notices stating the minimum scale as decreed by the Wage Determination Committee and to keep records of wages in accordance with the directions issued by the Head of Social Welfare and Labour Authorities and the Minister.

50085. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 63: Appendix VI: Yemen Arab Republic Labor Law (1970): Presidential Decree of Law No. (5) 1970; Regarding the Issuance of the LabourLaw; Official Gazette dated 15 Sha’aban 1390 i.e. 10/15/1970; Chapter Four: Working Hours (Excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 68: It is forbidden to engage a worker in effective work for over 8 hours per day or 48 hours per week during the whole months of the year, except for the month of Ramadan Al Mubarak, whereby the effective working hours should not exceed 6 hours in any one day or 36 hours per week. The effective working hours do not include time devoted for prayer, rest and eating. It is possible to increase the daily working hours to 9 hours in certain categories of work or industries or jobs whereby the worker does not work on continuous stretch such as, official establishments, hotels, bars, restaurants and others. It is possible to reduce the daily working hours for certain categories of workers, or in some industries or in dangerous and injurious works. The categories of workers, industries, and the works referred to in this article will be determined by a decree issued by the minister concerned based on the suggestion of the Head of the establishment concerned.

Article 89: The daily working hours should include one more intervals not less than one hour to be allotted for rest, prayer and eating. In factories where the work is carried on continual night and day shifts, then the Minister by decree establishes the system of rest intervals.

Article 90: Friday is considered as a weekly day of rest fully paid. The employer however, may after obtaining the approval from the Labour Authorities, replace this day by any other day provided the total working days per week would not exceed 6 days and provided this will enable the worker under any circumstances to attend to his religious obligations.

Article 91: The employer may not be bound by the provisions of the three aforesaid articles under the following conditions: (a) Annual Inventories, Preparation of Budget, Liquidation, Closure of Accounts, Preparation for sale on reduced prices, Preparation for new seasons provided the number of days required for such preparations will not exceed thirty days per annum. (b) If work is required to prevent the occurrence of a dangerous accident or repair what has resulted therefrom or to avoid a sure loss in materials liable for deterioration. (c) If extra work is intended to meet an unusual pressure. In the two latter cases the Labour Authorities should be informed within 24 hours to assess the emergency and the period required to complete the work, and obtain a written approval thereto. (d) Feasts, Seasons, Other occasions and seasonal fluctuations which are determined by decree issued by the Minister. In any of the aforementioned conditions it is not permissible for the effective working hours to exceed 10 hours per day.

50086. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 64: Appendix VI: Yemen Arab Republic Labor Law (1970): Presidential Decree of Law No. (5) 1970; Regarding the Issuance of the LabourLaw; Official Gazette dated 15 Sha’aban 1390 i.e. 10/15/1970; Chapter Seven: Precautions and Medical Services (Excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 92: Every employer should take the necessary precautions for the protection of workers and their safety against dangers and diseases arising from the nature of the work or the equipment used. The employer should not charge the workers or deduct form their wages any amount to provide this protection.

Article 93: Every employer should adhere to the following rules: (a) The establishment should be kept in a hygienic condition, clean and free from unpleasant odours which emanate from the drains or from other sources. (b) The workshops in the establishment should be aerated, with enough space and room for breathing, in accordance with the norms and hygienic standards decreed by the Minister. (c) To execute the necessary preventive measures for the safeguard of workers from damages resulting from any gas, dust or smoke or of any refuse that may generate during the work. (d) Lighting and heating of the establishment during working hours to be in a satisfactory condition. (e) Install water closets and toilets within easy reach with an average of one W.C. for every fifteen persons or less and allocate separate W.C.'s and toilets for female workers should there be any. (f) Adequate potable water should be provided in convenient places. (g) Provision of adequate water for the easy use of workers.

Article 94: If the nature of the work exposes the worker to body injury poisoning or illness, then the Minister will issue a decree with a view to regulate the safety of the work and the means the employer should institute for the safeguard of the workers. The employer or his representatives should explain to the worker upon his engagement the dangers of his work and the precautionary measures which he should take.

Article 95: Every employer should take the necessary precautions against fire, the preparation of the technical means for its extinction and provide exits for escape which should be kept in good condition for use at any time.

Article 96: The employer should provide first aid facilities for the workers in accordance with the Standards approved by the Minister jointly with the Minister of Health Should the number of his workers exceed 50 in one particular location or one town or a sector with a ray of 15 kilometers, then he should employ a nurse, well conversed with all first aid means on full time basis and should appoint a doctor to attend to them in a location assigned for this purpose. If the number of workers increases to over one hundred under the conditions stated above, the employer would have to provide the workers with the means of treatment which may require the assistance of specialists capable of surgical operations. Should the number of workers be less than fifty, the employer should then provide a first aid box, well kept containing bandages, medicines and disinfectants as decreed by the Minister jointly with the Minister of Health in order to provide the workers with first aid services.

764
assistance.

Article 97: Every employer should keep a medical file for each worker, containing the respective Labour Office of the doctor's name appointed for the treatment and the days fixed for the doctor's call to examine the workers and attend to them which should not be less than three visits per week.

Article 98: Every employer should keep a medical file for each worker, containing the results of the medical examination carried out upon his engagement, details of his sickness, the phases of treatment, the period of his absence from work and stating the kind of sickness whether normal, professional or industrial accident.

Article 99: Every employer should provide his workers with means of transportation from their residence or from an agreed upon pool to the place of work and ensure their return should their residence not be served with the usual regular means of transportation. [=]

50087. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 65: Appendix VI: Yemen Arab Republic Labor Law (1970); Presidential Decree of Law No. (5) 1970; Regarding the Issuance of the Labour Law; Official Gazette dated 15 Sha'aban 1390 i.e. 10/15/1970: Chapter Eight: Industrial Accidents (Excerpts). Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 103: In the case of an industrial accident occurring during work, the employer is under obligation to pay all medical and treatment expenses, cost of medicines, plus transport charges of the injured to hospital or to the doctor, until complete recovery or confirmation of total disability or the completion of one year from the date of injury, whichever comes first.

Article 104: Should any temporary or permanent disability or deaths result from industrial accident, the employer should pay the injured worker or his dependants the compensation due. The estimation of the extent of the injury and its confirmation should be based on a doctor's certificate issued by the assigned medical committee.

Article 105: It is conditional that the compensation should not be less than the death compensation. In case of complete disability the compensation will be calculated in the light of its causes and circumstances in accordance with this chapter by the assigned Committee for determining compensations.

Article 106: If the injured worker is temporarily disabled, he is entitled to his full pay for the first month of his absence and to 75% of his pay until complete recovery or until the expiry of one year from the date of his disability whichever comes first. And if it is medically confirmed that the temporary disability resulting from the accident turns into a permanent disability, the compensation will be paid to the injured in a lump sum in accordance with the rules of the following articles, and the employer has no right to deduct the amounts already paid by him to the injured worker during his period of temporary disability.

Article 109: If the injury results into a partial permanent disability, the compensation should be paid in accordance with the report submitted by the Compensation Committee concerned. [=]

50088. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 66: Appendix VI: Suggestions for Inclusion in the Labour Law Concerning Working Women. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. (1) Amendment of Article (38) of the Labour Law entitling the working woman to obtain the maternity leave with full pay and not 70% thereof in order to put her on equal footings with her counterpart working in the Public Administrative Office as per article 48 of Law No. 49, 1977, covering regulations for government employees which stipulates that she should be granted maternity leave with the basic salary together with a subsistence allowance.

(2) To provide the working woman upon her request in case of her husband's death a maximum leave of one hundred and thirty days from the date of death in order to put her on equal footings with her counterpart employee in the Public Administrative Office in accordance with article 48 of the Law No. 49, 1977, covering regulations for government employees obtaining such a leave with basic salary together with a subsistence allowance.

(3) To provide for the reduction of working hours for a working woman during pregnancy not to exceed 6 hours per day.

(4) After delivery the working woman has the right to use the following privileges: (a) Should be allowed one hour per day during official working hours to breastfeed her baby during the first year after delivery. (b) To grant her upon her request a two years leave from the date of delivery at half the basic salary to lock after her newly born baby.

(5) To allow the working woman two years leave without pay for special family reasons to be supported by evidence and will be subject to the assessment of the Labour Office.

(6) Forcing establishments employing a certain number of working women to establish a nursery for nursing their children who are of pre-school age.

(7) The working woman health care system should include her health supervision periodically during pregnancy and breastfeeding.

(8) A provision giving the working woman the right to combine her salary with the salary she is entitled to resulting from the death of her husband. This is a report on the conditions of the working woman which is written in the light of the Labour Law which I submit for kind consideration. (Samira Mohd. Abdo), Womens Bureau, Social Affairs Authority. [=]

Article 1: The prescriptions of the Law of the Family attached, come into effect.

Article 2: This law shall be published in the Official Gazette, and it comes into effect as from the date of its promulgation. This law was issued by the Leadership Council on 1/8/1978.

Signed: Ali Assaman Judge and Minister of Justice; Mukaddem (Colonel) Ahmad Hussein Al-Ghashmi Chairman of the Leadership Council and GC of the Armed Forces; Abdel Aziz Abdel-Ghani a member of the Leadership Council and Prime Minister. [=]

Article 1: Marriage Contract: Chapter One: Conclusion of Marriage: Part One: Fundamentals and Conditions of Marriage. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 1: Marriage is an attachment of a husband and wife under a legal pact whereby the woman becomes legitimate to a man, so that they form together a family based on proper cohabitation.
Article 2: Marriage shall not be considered as: betrothal, promise for marriage, collection of dower, acceptance of presents or likewise. In such cases either party has the right of refusal. The fiancée may nominate the immediate part of the dower at its equivalent at the time of collection, whereas the fiancée being the refusing party; shall return all presents or likewise received.

Article 3: Marriage is fulfilled in one session by utterance of the affirmative made by a non-prohibited and legally capable commissioned male agent who states that marriage has been concluded according to usage, and by the acceptance of same from his counterpart. The affirmative and acceptance must be achieved at the same time. Any condition which does not bear a purpose for either party (husband or wife) shall be neglected.

Article 4: Should the marriage involve a legally accepted condition pertaining to a purpose of either marrying party, the contract shall stand as valid and the condition as binding and revocable only with the consent of the party that set up the condition.

Article 5: The marriage may be established by utterance or by letter or message from an absentee. Such letter or message shall be read out in the session. A contract may be validated by a taciturn or a dumb through comprehensible signs.

Article 6: The establishment of a marriage contract requires the presence of two impartial moslem witnesses who shall listen to the words of the two contracting parties or of the letter or message.

Article 7: Any contract based on coercion of the major husband or wife, shall be considered as invalid.

Article 8: A mentally sick person may marry under an authorization from the Ruler, if it has been ascertained that his marriage would not harm anybody and that it would benefit his concerns, provided that it conveys the explicit consent of the other party.

Article 9: A man may marry up to four wives on condition that he is apt to being fair, otherwise one only.

Article 10: Should any non-moslem and his wife convert to Islam, their marriage shall be recognized, unless Islam does forbid it.

Article 11: The Ma'zoun (the Sheikh) who draws up the context of the contract and the agentS representing the husband and wife must see to the registering of the certificate of marriage with the authorities concerned, in the register set up therefor, within a week from the date of the contract, or else, each one will be liable to the penalty determined in the Panel Law. If any one of the aforesaid persons has carried out the registration of the document, the others shall be discharged of such liability. [-]

50091. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation; Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 70: Yemen Arab Republic: Family Law (1978): Law-Decree No. (3) 1978 Sanctioned by the Leadership Council For the Promulgation of the Law: Book One: Marriage Contract: Chapter One-Conclusion of Marriage: Part Two: Representative Agency in Marriage. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 12: The representative Agent is supposed to be the nearest of kin or who comes next, according to the following order: The father and upward and the son and downward, then the brothers and their sons, and next the uncles and their sons thereafter, and then the father’s uncles and their sons as well. A relative to a father comes first if he exists. If there are several relatives of the same degree, each one of them shall be entitled to the agency and the one that precedes the others in the conclusion of the marriage validates its contract. The conclusion of the marriage by those who were late in acting for its conclusion for more than one person at the same time or of the conclusion gets confused, the contract shall be invalidated.

Article 13: The rular may act as a representative agent for a person who does not have an agent, and if a woman of an unknown kinship claims that she does not have a representative agent, and her claim has not been contested, she is to be believed after an enquiry has been carried out by the Ruler, and asserted by oath.

Article 14: If the nearest of kin is of a different religion or is insane, or if it was impossible to be contacted or his whereabouts are not known, or if he showed the least defect, the agency shall pass to the next of kin. The woman’s say in the matter must be substantiated by evidence.

Article 15: The agent shall be considered as inoperative if he declines to operate the woman’s marriage while she is being adult, reasonable and consenting to her match, unless he does so intending to take his time in order to study the situation of the finances.

Article 16: One person may carry out in the session the conclusion of the marriage contract by acting for both sides, and uttering the wording of the affirmative and the acceptance.

Article 17: Proxy in marriage is valid even when the delegating agent is absent at intervals. The delegated deputy may marry himself of the woman for whom he has deputized, unless it is provided otherwise. Also, the representative agent may marry himself of the woman he is acting for if such action does not conflict with the provisions of Article 20 of this Law.

Article 18: Shall be considered as intruder whoever takes part in the conclusion of a marriage without being a representative agent or without proxy. The conclusion of such marriage by an intruder is considered as null.

Article 19: Shall be considered as invalid the marriage of a minor under the age of fifteen.

Article 20: Consent of a minor is mandatory. The silence of a virgin gives consent and the consent of a girl is by her utterance. The marriage of the adult shall not be concluded without her consent. The marriage of a minor concluded by her agent is valid, provided that she gives consent thereto at the time of wedding. The meeting with the girl in privacy is not permissible, nor her wedding for consumption of marriage unless she is not less than sixteen in years and is apt (fit) for intercourse. Whoever violates the provisions of this Article shall be liable to a term of prison, not less than one year and more than three years, plus an indemnity for what felony would have been committed and what fine that may entail. [-]

50092. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation; Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 70: Yemen Arab Republic: Family Law (1978): Law-Decree No. (3) 1978 Sanctioned by the Leadership Council For the Promulgation of the Law: Book One: Marriage Contract: Chapter One-Conclusion of Marriage: Part Three: Preventives of Marriage. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 21: The kinship prohibited to a person: His forebears and offsprings and their wives and the descendants of his father, and the descendants of his forebears at the first degree and the forebears of his wife once his marriage of her has been concluded, and her offsprings after the consummation of her marriage. The prohibition of the forebears and offsprings provides that the kinship must be the outcome of a valid marriage.

Article 22: What is prohibited by kinship is prohibited by sucking. The prohibition from the sucking woman and her husband is established as the sucking takes place, and the sucking is established by the sucking of the infant from the breast of the sucking woman during the first two years, five separate sucklings.

Article 23: The man is prohibited to marry a woman in the following cases: (1) Being of a different religion unless she belongs to scriptural one. (2) Who defected from Islam. (3) A wife of another person. (4) Who exchanged excommunication with whom he excommunicated. (5) Whom he divorced completely unless she has consummated marriage with another husband and completed her period of waiting. (6) Whom he divorced and wanted to remarry while she is in the period of waiting from another divorce or separation. (7) Prohibited by pilgrimage or Omra (pilgrimage of the season). (8) Being a hybrid or of cross-breed. (9) Being the wife of a missing person before abrogation of the marriage has been decided.

Article 24: If a man marries two women together and it was found out that one of them happened to be a male, he is prohibited to keep the other one.

Article 25: The man is prohibited to keep in his custody more than four wives, and if one of them is in the period of waiting from a restitutional divorce she is to remain in the custody of her divorcing husband until the completion of the period of waiting.

Article 26: A moslem woman is prohibited to marry an non-moslem. [=] 50095. Mnrtt, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 73: The Family Law: Book One: Marriage Contract: Chapter Two-Prescriptions of Marriage: Part Three: Good Cohabitation. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 37: The husband has the right of obedience of his wife concerning what may realize the interest of the family especially in such matters as: (1) Moving with him to the matrimonial home, unless the contract of marriage stipulates that she shall remain in her own house or in her parents' house and then she will be required to enable him to live with her and consummate their marriage. (2) Enabling him to reach her and have legitimate intercourse with her in privacy. (3) Obeying him and carrying out her house work as others do. (4) Not to go out of the matrimonial house without his permission, whereas the husband is not supposed to prevent her from going out for a legitimate excuse or for what usage may allow, without prejudicing the honor or her duties towards him, and in particular, going out for improving her concerns or carrying out her function. An excuse which is considered as legitimate for a woman is serving her helpless parents who have nobody else to attend to them.

Article 38: A wife is considered as rebellious if she goes back on her obedience to her husband by leaving the matrimonial house. The wife is not considered to have gone back on her obedience to her husband except in the following cases: (1) If the husband refuses to give her urgent dower. (2) If he does not provide for her a legitimate habitation. (3) If she does not feel secure, with him for herself or for her possessions. (4) If he refuses to spend on her (to subsist her) and it has not been possible to execute the court decision for her expense because he has no obvious money available.

Article 39: Requirements on the husband towards his wife are as follows: (1) provide her with a legitimate house (home) which becomes her and becomes her or his like. (2) to provide her with expense and clothing like her or his like. (3) to treat her fairly as he treats his other wives, as to expense, boarding and mid-day nap if the wives live together in the same house.

Article 40: The legitimate home must be independent so that the wife has security for herself and her possessions (money, jewelry etc.), considering the husband's situation, the habitation of his equal and customs of the town, without harm to the wife the husband may live with his wife and children from her and from another wife if they were adults; and to his parents and any other woman he is supposed to provide them with a dwelling-place, provided that the house is large enough to accommodate them and that no harm is caused to the wife, unless the contract does not provide otherwise. [=]

Article 42: The dissolution of marriage must be denoted by word or by indication.

Article 43: The marriage shall not be dissolved except by order from the Ruler. If dissolution is for a reason which makes the woman illicit to a man, their matrimonial association shall cease and their separation shall be mandatory until it has been decided under all circumstances, if the dissolution takes place after consummation the period of waiting shall be required once dissolution has been ordained.

Article 44: If there is between husband and wife a cause for prohibition, the dissolution of marriage shall be ordained.

Article 45: Both husband and wife may ask for dissolution if either one finds out a personal defect whether it existed before marriage or happened thereafter. Insanity and leprosy are considered as defects in both husband and wife. Shall be considered as sexual diseases in the woman such as a gland plug in the pelvis or sterility. The right to claim dissolution is forfeited if the defect is explicitly or implicitly tolerated, except in the case of insanity or leprosy, or any other incurable and contagious disease where the choice is limited, even if it preceded women

Article 61: The divorce occurs precedently or unprecedently.

Article 62: A divorce shall not be followed by a divorce unless it has been resisted in the meantime verbally or actually.

Article 63: The divorce connected with a number, small or big, effect one occurrence only:

Article 64: The divorce occurs immediately if it is not limited by condition or time.

Article 65: The contingent divorce depends on its condition, negatively or affirmatively.

Article 66: The restitutional divorce is that which occurs during the period of waiting and after real consummation and it does not entail conclusion of a new marriage or a financial recompensation or a benefit, provided that it was not completed (three divorces). If the period of waiting was completed and no restitution took place the divorce becomes a temporary separation which entails a new marriage and a new dower. If [Ban ouna Sughra] the divorce was completed (three divorces) it becomes a [Ban ouna Kubra] permanent separation which requires for restitution that the divorce be married to another man and then be divorced by him with a period of waiting of three months (to make sure she is not pregnant).

Article 67: The restitutional divorce does not do away with matrimony and the husband may contact his wife for restitution during the period of waiting. If such period has been completed and no contact has been made the divorce becomes a final separation.

Article 68: A divorce (at less than three instances) with a temporary separation eliminates matrimony immediately. Such divorce of temporary separation does not prevent the divorcing husband from marrying his divorcee under a new contact concluded during or after the completion of the period of waiting, and it entails a new dower. On the other hand, if the divorce is final (three instances) and with permanent separation the divorcee shall be prohibited to him unless she marries another man and actually consummates marriage with him. The first husband may restitute her under a new contract of marriage for a new dower provided that she has been divorced by her new husband and has completed the period of waiting.

Article 69: If the husband and wife agreed on occurrence of divorce but disagreed whether it is restitutional or of permanent separation, the party denying the latter shall have the say unless the husband has admitted that he divorced her completely (three instances) and then the say shall be his. If the woman comes under prohibition and remains so while being unable to produce evidence, she will be considered as rebellious. If the husband and wife disagree as to the occurrence of divorce in the past, the say shall be to the denier of the occurrence, whereas, the husband shall have, at the present or in the future, the say as to its occurrence or denial. If they disagree on the occurrence of condition, the denier shall have the say if in the affirmative, whereas, the claimant shall have the say, if it is in the negative. If they disagree as to the nature or description of the condition the husband shall have the say whereas the denier of condition shall always have the say.

Article 70: Disengagement is a separation between husband and wife against recompensation from the wife or from others, in terms of money or benefit, even if it exceeds what the contract requires, or if it is unknown.

Article 71: Disengagement occurs between husband and wife with mutual consent or by indication denoted in the contract or by condition. Disengagement requires what has been stipulated in the divorce and that the wife shall have the right of disposition with regards to the recompensation.

Article 72: Disengagement is considered as a divorce with a provisional separation (right of restitution under a new contract of marriage) unless the divorce has become complete (three instances) with a final separation (restitution requires consummated marriage with another husband and her divorce of him and completion of the period of waiting. Also, disengagement requires the discharge of the recompensation by the wife).

50097. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 75: The Family Law: Chapter Two: Part One: Divorce and Dissolution. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 57: Divorce is a specified statement which conveys the disengagement of association between husband and wife and which is to be clear and does not bear the probability of other than the constitution of an information and its admission and declaration, even if it is meant to be a hoax or metonymy for a probability of divorce or so forth. It is provided that such statement should convey intention both in word and sense. The divorce occurs in Arabic or in any other language of a person who knows its meaning, and in writing or by a comprehensible sign if the person is inarticulate.

Article 58: The husband is entitled towards his wife, to three utterances of divorce ("you are divorced"), renewable when another husband has consummated actually his marriage of her.

Article 59: The husband or his proxy may effect divorce. The Ruler may authorize the folks of an insane or an idiot to effect divorce on his behalf, if he finds out that there was a reason therefor and that an advantage would be realized.

Article 60: The divorce by a drunk who lost his head or the power of discrimination, does not occur, if such a condition is evidenced by his words or actions.
The husband is prohibited to marry such woman who is prohibited to stated by an articulate husband or by a representative agent and it shall of her husband. (4) Incumbency of habitation. (5) Incumbency of expense. Article 99: Prohibition by adjuration requires that the oath shall be clear

Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 97: Atonement of prohibition by comparison in absence of his wife before atonement, the prohibition shall not be annulled and his wife remains prohibited to him and he will be prohibited to continue bedding Article 95: The wife may apply to the Ruler for the cessation of her until he has atoned.

Periods of waiting for the non-pregnant, is as follows: (1) Three periods of menstruation for the menstruant, excluding that period during which she was divorced. (2) Three months for the non-menstruant, such as a minor. If the minor becomes mature by menstruation during this time, the period of waiting is three periods of menstruation. (3) For the woman who has irregular interrupted periods of menstruation, for a cause, she has to wait for three months. If she did resume menstruation during the period of three months, her period of waiting comes to an end. In case menstruation comes back to her she has to resume three periods of menstruation. (4) The period of waiting for the woman who resumed her menstruation is three periods in case she remembers their dates and number, if not it will be for three months. If the husband dies during a period of waiting resulting from a restitutions or death. The period of waiting under a provisional divorce or under a complete divorce has six requirements: (1) Period of waiting. (2) No inheritance. (3) Going out without the husband's permission. (4) Non-cumbency of habitation. (5) Non-cumbency of expense or alimony. (6) Permissibility of marrying such a woman prohibited to him because of his wife's marriage.

Republic: Part 76: The Family Law: Chapter Three: Part One: Restitution. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 73: Restitution takes place by utterance even as a hoax or by action. It is not limited by time or so forth, and it becomes valid without consent of the wife or her next of kin. Article 74: If the wife is restituted by utterance, the husband is required to have it testified by witnesses and to inform the wife thereof. If she is illegitimate or insane, her guardian is to be informed.

Article 75: If the husband and wife, disagree after the expiration of the waiting as to the fulfillment of restitution, the say shall be to the denier. Article 76: If the woman claims (without being contested) that her period of waiting has expired she shall be believed under oath unless doubt prevails as to her telling lies. [=] 50099. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 77: The Family Law: Chapter Three: Part Two: Period of Waiting and Absence of Pregnancy. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 77: The period of waiting takes place either by divorce, dissolution or death.

Article 78: The period of waiting following divorce or dissolution does not become incumbent except after consummation of marriage and it begins in divorce from the date of its occurrence, provided that the woman has knowledge of the divorce, and if not, the period begins from the date of its coming to her knowledge. As for dissolution, the period begins from the date of its being ordained. The period of waiting after death, occurs before and after consummation and it begins from the date of the death of her husband once the death becomes known to her. The deduction in consummation, is required in case of suspicion and it begins from the date of knowledge of the deterrent.

Article 79: The period of waiting, for the pregnant, expires under all circumstances, after delivery. In the case of non-pregnancy, the period of waiting after the death of her husband, is four months and ten days. Article 80: Periods of waiting by divorce for the non-pregnant, is as follows: (1) Three periods of menstruation for the menstruant, excluding that period during which she was divorced. (2) Three months for the non-menstruant, such as a minor. If the minor becomes mature by menstruation during this time, the period of waiting is three periods of menstruation. (3) For the woman who has irregular interrupted periods of menstruation, for a cause, she has to wait for three months. If she did resume menstruation during the period of three months, her period of waiting comes to an end. In case menstruation comes back to her she has to resume three periods of menstruation. (4) The period of waiting for the woman who resumed her menstruation is three periods in case she remembers their dates and number, if not it will be for three months. If the husband dies during a period of waiting resulting from a restitutions or death. The period of waiting under a provisional divorce or under a complete divorce has six requirements: (1) Period of waiting. (2) No inheritance. (3) Going out without the husband's permission. (4) Non-cumbency of habitation. (5) Incumbency of expense. (6) The husband is prohibited to marry such woman who is prohibited to him because of the marriage of his wife. (7) The husband is prohibited to marry a fifth wife. (8) Resumption of period of waiting in case of restitutions or death. The period of waiting under a provisional divorce or under a complete divorce has six requirements: (1) Period of waiting. (2) No inheritance. (3) Going out without the husband's permission. (4) Non-cumbency of habitation. (5) Incumbency of expense or alimony. (6) Permissibility of marrying such a woman prohibited to him because of his wife's marriage.

Article 81: In disengagement, the woman completes her period of waiting by one period of menstruation if she is menstruant, and if not the period of waiting shall of three months.

Article 82: The period of waiting in disengagement is as follows: (1) Such woman who was illegally married will complete her period of waiting by one period of menstruation if she is menstruant and if not, by three months. (2) Other disengaged women will have the same to fast, atonement will occur by the feeding of sixty poor persons. [=] 50100. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 78: The Family Law: Chapter Four: Prohibition of Comparison by Adjuration: Part One: Prohibition By Comparison. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 83: In such a case where the completion of the period of waiting occurs in one period of menstruation, the woman shall have the say under oath if she claimed completion of the period of waiting otherwise, if she claims not to have completed it, a period of menstruation each month shall be required.

Article 84: The period of waiting under a restitutions or death. The period of waiting under a provisional divorce or under a complete divorce has six requirements: (1) Period of waiting. (2) No inheritance. (3) Going out without the husband's permission. (4) Non-cumbency of habitation. (5) Incumbency of expense. (6) The husband is prohibited to marry such woman who is prohibited to him because of the marriage of his wife. (7) The husband is prohibited to marry a fifth wife. (8) Resumption of period of waiting in case of restitutions or death. The period of waiting under a provisional divorce or under a complete divorce has six requirements: (1) Period of waiting. (2) No inheritance. (3) Going out without the husband's permission. (4) Non-cumbency of habitation. (5) Incumbency of expense or alimony. (6) Permissibility of marrying such a woman prohibited to him because of his wife's marriage.

Article 86: The woman pregnant from adultery shall be at discharge of adultery by delivery; whereas the non-pregnant shall be at discharge by one period of menstruation if she is menstruant and if she is not after a period of three months. Article 87: If a woman has embraced Islam she is at discharge if pregnant, if not, she will be at discharge by one period of menstruation if she is menstruant and if she is not she will be at discharge after a period of three months. [=] 50101. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 79: The Family Law: Chapter Four: Prohibition of Comparison by Adjuration: Part Two: Prohibition By Adjuration and Its Prescriptions. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 88: Prohibition by comparison occurs when a husband who compares or likens his wife to his mother or sister and so forth and it takes place by a clear utterance or in writing, and it can be absolute or temporary. Article 89: It is required that the prohibition by comparison is to be from a legally capable moslem husband to his wife and it requires the presence of intent, in absence of intent requirements are not applicable. Article 90: Prohibition by comparison occurs by such utterance as saying "I compare you or you are compared to my mother" and it can be in writing. The comparison of his wife to his mother or sister or aunt, etc. or to a part of his mother, will be of a temporary prohibition by saying for instance "You are prohibited to me by comparison for one month". Article 91: Prohibition by comparison may occur even if it is limited by time or condition. Article 92: Prohibition by comparison requires the prohibition of the husband of bedding his wife or what may lead to it. The wife under such prohibition may prevent him of having sexual intercourse with her. Article 93: Prohibition is removed by atonement after he has shown intent for sexual intercourse. If he has had intercourse with his wife before atonement, the prohibition shall not be annulled and his wife remains prohibited to him and he will be prohibited to continue bedding her until he has atoned. Article 94: Temporary or conditional prohibition comes to an end by the expiration of its time or by the cessation of the conditions, but before that it has to be ended by atonement.

Article 95: The wife may apply to the Ruler for the cessation of prohibition and then he will require from the husband to atone or divorce, and if he does not, the Ruler will confine him until he has atoned or divorced. Article 96: Atonement increases in number as the number of prohibited wifes increase, even if the prohibition in their respect occurs by one utterance and it does increase in number by the increase of the number of utterances, before intercourse.

Article 97: Atonement of prohibition by comparison in absence of emancipation requires two months of fasting, and if the husband is unable to fast, atonement will occur by the feeding of sixty poor persons. [=] 769 conjects the prohibition of another wife, the prohibition occurs on the second wife by conjunction.

Article 101: The adjuration shall be clear and shall express that he will not bed the wife adjured during the time of prohibition and it shall be adequate as to express that he will not approach her or share his pillow with her.

Article 102: The adjured may require from his wife to come back to him and to resume their matrimonial life as it was in the past, and if he actually does that, he shall atone because of breach of oath.

Article 103: The wife may wait for four months as from the time of adjuration, and if the husband does not come back during this time, she will submit her claim to the Ruler, for his return, and the Ruler shall require from him his return or his divorce. Should the husband refuse the Ruler then will confine him until he has returned or divorced.

Article 104: The return may come from the husband who is able to carry out sexual intercourse, but he is required to atone for breach. Further, the return is to come from an articulate husband and, thence his atonement shall be required only if he beds his wife.

Article 105: If husband and wife disagree, the say shall be to the one who denies the prohibition by adjuration or by the expiration of the time limit. The evidence shall be required from the one that claims the occurrence of the adjuration or by the expiration of the time limit. [=]

50102. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 80: The Family Law; Chapter Four: Prohibition of Comparison by Adjuration: Part Three: Sworn Allegation of Adultery and Its Prescription. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 106: Sworn allegation of adultery is that allegation made under a swear by a legally capable husband alleging the commission of adultery by his wife who is apparently chaste and who is fit for sexual intercourse and who is still kept by him true marriage and if she has a child the husband cannot avow to be his or prove that he is unlawful by adultery. Such allegation eliminates the marriage by a decision from the Ruler.

Article 107: The husband or the wife may apply to the Ruler who shall advise them and urge them to make it up between them, and if they refuse, the Ruler shall adjure first the husband four times by repeating "By God Almighty, I am truthful in alleging you of adultery and I disavow your child" and a fifth one shall be added thereto by repeating "May the curse of God fall on me if I were untruthful" then the woman in turn also shall be adjured four times repeating that her husband is untruthful in alleging her of adultery and in the fifth time that may the curse of God fall on her if he is truthful. If the woman was adjured first, and unless the husband was adjured, then she shall be adjured once more after her husband.

Article 108: If the oath is taken as prescribed in the preceding article, the Ruler will order the separation of husband and wife and the disavowal of the child's relation to the husband and the elimination of marriage, hence, the punishment by whipping of the husband will be discarded and the wife shall be prohibited to him forever.

Article 109: If the man refuses to take oath even once, he will be liable to punishment by whipping, for defamation, and if the woman also refuses she will be liable to punishment for adultery.

Article 110: If the man goes back on his disavowal of the child such going back becomes valid and the child will be in his keeps. On the other hand, the man remains liable to the punishment by whipping for defamation while the prohibition remains for ever. [=]

50103. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for Technical Cooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 81: The Family Law: Chapter Four: Prohibition of Comparison by Adjuration: Part Four: The Missing Husband and the Prescriptions in This Regard. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 111: The Ruler shall adjudge the death of the missing husband after the elapse of seventy years since his birth unless the missing husband has gone away at a circumstance susceptible to death such as a war and so forth. In such a case he shall adjudge his death after four years of absence. However, an enquiry shall be carried out in all ways to determine whether he is dead or alive.

Article 112: If after the husband has been declared dead, it was found that he was still alive, while in the meantime the wife got married to another man, the wife shall be his unless the Ruler has ruled the dissolution of the first marriage and thus she will remain the wife of the second husband. [=]

Article 114: The filiality of a child to his mother is established simply by the establishment of delivery (even with absence of admission or avowal and without condition).

Article 115: The filiation of a child of unknown relation and the certain conception are established by the person who avows his filiation even at death, bed under the following conditions: (1) Not to be belied by reason, custom or law. (2) Not to be admitted by a man that he was a wedlock. (3) Not to be repelled by his avower if her is adult and not berepped by him after maturity if the child was minor. If the avower is a woman, married or in period of waiting, and the conditions of the relation of her husband were not satisfied as prescribed in article (113) the relation of the child to his father is not established without his confirmation.

Article 116: If an illegitimate person of an unknown father or mother admits his relationship to another person, such relationship will not be established for an avower unless it has been approved the latter and provided that it has not been belied by reason, custom or law, and that the person has not admitted that the child is a wedlock.

Article 117: If a wedlock admits his relationship to another person, such relationship is not established in favour of that person, unless it has been recognized by same and that it has not been belied by reason, custom or law, and provided that such relationship has not been admitted to be the outcome of adultery, with the satisfaction of the provisions of article (116).

Article 118: If the relation is established by admission of a person of an unknown father and mother, there will not be a going back on it and it will be subject to all the prescriptions connected with the relationship.

Article 119: The man is considered to be adult, if he claims the attainment of puberty with probability, and if he was ten years old or more whereas the woman is considered adult is she claims the attainment of puberty, with probability and if she was nine years old or more. Under all circumstances, the person is considered to be adult if he or she is fifteen years old or more and in case of disagreement on the probability of puberty or on the evaluation of age because of absence of a formal proof, the help of a specialized doctor shall be asked.

Article 120: The least period of pregnancy is six months and the most is nine months with no limit for the most, if there are proofs which indicate its continuation, supported by a specialized doctor.

Article 121: If the woman gave birth to a child and she claimed that there remained another pregnancy, with proofs which support her claim, and with the confirmation of a specialized doctor, the second child shall related to the husband.

Article 122: If the woman gave birth to a living child before the completion of the period of waiting connected with a restitutional divorce, the relation of the divorcing husband as established; whereas the child born before the completion of the period of waiting connected with a complete divorce of a second marriage, shall be related to her second divorcing husband if she conceived of the child since the day of the second divorce and within the period prescribed in article (120). If the woman conceived of a child after she has admitted the completion of the period of waiting, being less than six months since her admission, the child shall be related categorically to her divorcing husband under the restitutinal divorce and shall be related to same if she conceived of the child since the day of the second divorce from the second marriage after a complete divorce from her first husband while the conception has happened within the period of pregnancy prescribed in article (120), the child shall be related to the second husband.

Article 124: If the two husbands agreed that the wife will be returned to her first husband, the child shall be related to the second husband if she conceived of the child for six months from the day of the husband's probable bedding; whereas if she conceived of the child for less than six months, the child shall be related to first husband.

Article 125: The child shall be related to the deceased husband if she conceived of the child since the date of death within the period of pregnancy prescribed in article (120).

Article 126: The child will be related to the husband by a marriage which has not satisfied its fundamentals and conditions and was actually consummated with the wrong woman and that woman conceived of the child within six months or more and before separation. If she conceived of the child after separation, the child shall be related to the husband, if the conception occurred with the period of pregnancy prescribed in article (120).

Article 127: Adoption does not establish the relation even if the adopted child is of an unknown relation. [=]

50105. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 83: The Family Law: Book Three: The Relation and Its Prescription: Chapter One: Relation, Relationship or Kinship and Suckling and Custody: Part Two: Suckling and its Prescriptions. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 128: The mother is required to suckle her child if there was no other suckler available. The mother is more entitled to suckle the child unless she claimed a wage which exceeds that which is usually applied for her or his likes. If the child was sucked by another woman, the suckling will be at the mother's home unless she has lost her right of suckling. The suckler merits expense and clothing similar to that of her or the child's like, for a period which will not exceed two years from the date of suckling. Such expense will be considered as a debt which will become null by satisfaction or discharge. [=]

50106. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 84: The Family Law: Book Three: The Relation and Its Prescription: Chapter Two: Relation, Relationship or Kinship and Suckling and Custody: Part Three: Custodianship and Its Prescriptions. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 130: Custody is the function of a custodian who is supposed to take care of the child and to bring him up and protect him from what may cause his death or living in harm, provided that it will not conflict with the right of his custodian, such right which is not surrenderable.

Article 131: The period of custody is seven years unless the Ruler raises it up to ten years.

Article 132: The custodian is supposed to be mature, active and guard for the youngster, and capable of bringing him up and of protecting him. Further, if the custodian is a female, she is not supposed to be a non-moslem and shall refrain from scornful Islam before whosoever is adverse to it. Also, she is not supposed to go out of the house, away from her custodianship duties, unless she finds somebody to act for the child. If the custodian is a male he must be of the same religion.

Article 133: The mother is entitled to have the custody of her child provided that she proveS to be qualified therefor. If the mother surrenders her right, such right shall not cease unless the child accepts another custodian, as he has the right to do so. Meanwhile, the other husband, through a second marriage, cannot refuse such situation if there was not another custodian available. The non-virtuous mother cannot be denied the right to be the custodian of her child until he is five years of age.

Article 134: If the mother passes away or if her custody of her child has ceased, such custody is passed over in the following order to: her mother, grand mothers, child's aunts moslem father, husband's mother and grandmother; wife's mother and grandmothers, sisters; cognitive aunts and their daughters; brothers' daughters and their daughters; agnate cousins; father's aunts and their daughters and daughters of the father's uncles. If the women are not available, custody passes in the following order to taboed cognitive next of kin males; tabooed cognates and if unavailable, non tabeoed next kin males and if not available, tabooed agnates. Shall come first for each wife, those on the mother's side before those on the father's side and if they are unvirtuous, the custody shall pass to the more fit, and if they are fit, the Ruler will decide and the Ruler may overlook the order of custody as he may deem appropriate for the child.

Article 135: The custody shall pass from a custodian to another in the following cases: (a) Insanity and so forth —Leprosy —Blindness —Negligence —Adultery —Carelessness towards the child -- Marriage if not of a person cognate to the child.

Article 136: The father and any other member of the family may remove the custody of the child to another person under the following two conditions: (1) The second custodian be like the first as to caretaking and upbringing or even better. (2) If the custodian has asked for wages more than those of her like, and the evidence shall come from the person in charge.

Article 137: The custodian is required to carry out what is good for the child, except the expense and its incidentals, which are required from the person on charge according to the expenses indicated under the Part of Expenses. The custodian may remove the child to his town provided that it will not prejudice the child financially or morally. Should the child be in the custody of a parent of his, the other has the right to see him in the manner agreed upon by both sides or by what the Ruler may deem fit.

Article 138: The custodian is entitled to a wage for the custody that comes from the child's money, if available, or from the person in charge, as indicated in the Part of Expenses. The wage for custody is estimated according to the situation of the person obligated thereby. The custodian shall not be entitled to a wage if the custodian is in the custody of the father. If the father cannot afford, such wage will be paid from he mother's money without being recoverable, whereas, if the money is not paid from the mother's money but from another source it will be recovered by an order from the Ruler.

Article 139: The custodian is responsible if he neglects knowingly any wrongdoing of the child, and the responsibility for such fault by ignorance shall be that of the family. [=]

50107. Myntti, Cynthia; Weiter, Matthias [editor]; German Agency for TechnicalCooperation. Women and Development in Yemen Arab Republic: Part 85: The Family Law: Book Three: The Relation and Its Prescription: Chapter One: Relation, Relationship or Kinship and Suckling and Custody: Part Four: Sponsorship After Termination of Custody. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 140: If the child, whether male or female, becomes mature, and his father and mother are in disaccord, he is to make the choice between them as his interest requires. If those who have the sponsorship other than his father and mother disagree, thereon, the Ruler shall select a sponsor who after taking the opinion of the child, is appropriate, as the child's interest requires. [=]

Prescription: Chapter Two: Expenses and Prescriptions: Part One: Wife's Expense. Germany: German Agency for Technical Cooperation Ltd., 1979. Article 142: Expense is due to the wife regardless of her situation with her husband and according to how things have been since the conclusion of marriage; the expense as to food, clothing, habitation, furniture, medical care and services, with consideration of the circumstances of the husband whether straightened or pleasant.

Article 143: The husband shall provide an alimony to his wife, divorced by him restitution an to his pregnant divorcee, until the period of waiting has been completed.

Article 144: Considering the provisions of Article (38), alimony will not fall due for the mature and soundminded rebellions not confined wrongly. The obedient and soundminded woman shall have the say in reluting rebellion in the past and during its period.

Article 145: The wife's right does not become void by procrastination, in the past nor by discharge in the future. The wife may discharge the husband of the alimony that was due to her in the past and if somebody contributed to the wife's alimony, the alimony will not cease unless the contributor acted for the husband.

Article 146: If the husband abstained from spending on his wife or if he absented himself and it was ascertained that he did not subsist her, the Ruler shall decide that the alimony be effected from the husband's money according to the provisions of article (143) and she shall have the say as to past expense.

Article 147: If the woman could not obtain the alimony from the husband, she shall have her means of living from such person who was in charge before her marriage. The wife may borrow on the alimony fixed for her judicially or by consent, from a person not responsible therefor. The lender in either case may ask for the reimbursement of the money borrowed and the wife in turn, will return to the husband for the payment of same. [=]

Article 149: The alimony for a needy or insane child whether he is well off or impoverished is due on the father and then on the next of kin. If the father is impoverished or unable to earn his living the alimony will be due on the well off mother and next of kin or other relatives according to the provisions of article (155) of this Law. If the child is well off the alimony will be due on him.

Article 150: The alimony of a child who is mature and of a sound mind, and impoverished and capable of earning his living, and who seeks for education at a secondary level, and did not exceed twenty years of age, such alimony will be due on his well off parents, two parts on the father and one part on the mother as provided for in the case of inheritance. If one of the parents is impoverished, the alimony will be due on the other well off parent, but if both are impoverished, and they have a well off son, the alimony will be due on him. The Rule for the alimony of an unmarried mature girl who is impoverished and capable of earning her living but not doing so, will be the same applied to the minor and provided for in the preceding article.

Article 151: The affluent father is required to marry his impoverished son to one wife only if needed.

Article 152: The alimony of the impoverished father and mother, even if they are capable of earning their living, is due on their well off son and if not, it will be on the next of kin whether male or female, old or young, and it will be divided between the well off children of the same class. The alimony of the mother and then of the father has priority on the alimony of other relatives.

Article 153: The alimony of the wife of an impoverished father is due on the son and in the case of several wives, the alimony will be due for one only. The well off son shall help his impoverished father if he is to many again. If the father is old or sick and needs a wife or a servant to attend to him the well off son will take care of it.

Article 154: The impoverished father may spend from the money of the minor or the insane according to his need even in case of sale, without authorization from the Ruler. The impoverished father is permitted to spend from the money of the son whether present or absent without an authorization from the Ruler.

Article 155: The alimony of an impoverished relative being unable to earn a living, is due on the well off and inheriting relative in case of the former's death. If the inheriting relatives are numerous, the alimony on each one of them will be according to his share of the inheritance. The provision of a servant for a relative is required only in the case of disability or old age.

Article 156: The alimony of a relative for a past period becomes void if it has not been claimed for, unless the relative concerned is a father or a minor or insane. The Ruler shall not decide thereon in the case when the claim was made more than two months before prosecution.

Article 157: Concerning alimony, the person is considered to be well off, if he has the means which exceed his needs, whereas the person is considered as impoverished if the case is contrary to the preceding premises, except when he has the means for one day and one night.

Article 158: If the two relatives disagree, the evidence will be required from the claimant if there is a confusion as to affluence and lack of means of living.

Note: The word Ruler stands for Judge. [=]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Yemen
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
Economies. Department of Tourism: 1 woman.

villages in the Yemen Arab Republic. Ministry of Local Administration: 0.

Agriculture and Mother and Child Care. Ministry of Supply: 2.

Tewari, P.O.: 1974 Y.A.R. Agricultural Extension. The Central Agricultural Research and Training Center Project. [=]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Yemen

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

Department of Sewerage & Water: 3.
Civil Service Commission: 3.
C.O. Control & Audit: 3.
Finance & Administration Organization: 1 woman.
National Office for Food: 1 woman.
Highway Authority: 3.
Yemen Bank for Reconstruction: 0.
Central Bank of Yemen: 60.
Other Banks: 0.
Central Planning Organizations: 12.
Textile Factory (San'a'): 0.
Biscuit Factory (Taizz): 0.
Tricot Factory (San'a'): 0.
Pharmaceuticals Co.: 0.
Foreign Trade Co.: 0.
Yemen Airways Corp.: 4.
Other Private Companies: 0.
Total: 1146. [=]

Ministry of Education: 1000.
Ministry of Health: 300.
Ministry of Finance: 24.
Ministry of Municipalities: 18.
Ministry of Communication: 47.
Ministry of Foreign Affairs: 10.
Ministry of Supply: 4.
Ministry of Public Works: 8.
Ministry of Agriculture: 10.
Ministry of Economy: 10.
Ministry of Local Administration: 0.
Ministry of Social Affairs: 0.
Ministry of Justice: 0.
Ministry of Interior: 0.
Department of Customs: 0.
Department of Min & Petrol: 0.
Department of Tourism: 0.
Department of Civil Aviation: 0.
Department of Civil Aviation: 0.
Department of Sewerage & Water: 0.
Civil Service Commission: 0.
C.O. Control & Audit: 0.
Finance & Admin. Organization: 0.
National Office for Food: 0.
Highway Authority: 0.
Yemen Bank for Reconstruction: 20.
Other Banks: 0.
Central Planning Organizations: 10.
Textile Factory (San'a'): 800.
Biscuit Factory (Taizz): 300.
Tricot Factory (San'a'): 18.
Pharmaceuticals Co.: 15.
Foreign Trade Co.: 15.
Yemen Airways Corp.: 10.
Other Private Companies: 100.
Total: 2589. [=]

50119. New American View. "Crazy-Quilt Society", in New American View-Monitoring the Special Relationship Between the United States and Israel, Vol.3(14). October 15, 1988. A veteran reporter from a major New York newspaper told New American View: "It's a crazy, mixed-up place. It's nothing like it is advertised to Americans by its big fans in the Jewish community." The journalist had recently returned from Israel, where he had spent three weeks on a fact-finding mission with other writers on his paper. "You have Orthodox religious fanatics throwing rocks at the secular types because they are driving cars or going to the movies on the Sabbath," he said. "You've got gunslinging settlers in the West Bank acting like they're playing cowboys and Indians in the old West. And in the cities, especially Tel Aviv, you've got a disco, singles-bar society like we had here several years ago. "In the cities and at the seashore resorts," he continued "there are some impressive displays of wealth. Maybe ostentatious is a better word. There are expensive homes and lavish condos, flashy cars—all the trappings of the good life. There are supermarkets, McDonald's-type fast food outlets, classyboutiques—everything that you see in the US and Western Europe. Everybody looks well-heeled." But off the beaten track, some of the urban neighborhoods

774
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Yemen

are run down, close to being slums. And in the rural areas, particularly in the Negev region in the south, you see a lot of ordinary people—many Oriental Jews and Arabs—struggling to make a living. Things there aren't so nice as Tel Aviv. It's almost like being in Syria or Egypt. And it's a lot different from the Israeli of Jerusalem and the kibbutzim that the American Jewish organizations promote in their public relations campaigns. Commenting on the impact of the Palestinian uprising on Israeli society, the veteran reporter said, "The environment there reminds me a lot of the US during the Vietnam War years. There's a lot of debate over the military necessity for retaining the Arab lands and a lot of discussion over the moral implications of the bloody repression of the revolt. "You see pro-peace demonstrations, and you see the angry animosity they evoke from the anti-peace crowds. Anybody who demonstrates for peace with the Palestinians is called a traitor or worse. The women demonstrators are called whores and other vile names. It gets pretty nasty, ugly. "Another thing that is similar to the Vietnam era is that, except for the occasional pro-peace demonstrations, there is little sign of the 'war' at home, in Israel proper. You don't see a lot of soldiers. Even those who have been called up for temporary duty stay out of uniform if they are on leave. The 'war' is being fought over there, in the 'war' is being fought over there, in their country, in the West Bank and Gaza. But somehow it's always present, just beneath the surface in everybody's life." The journalist provided numerous other examples of internal Israeli social conflict, all of which are diligently avoided by pro-Israeli advocates when promoting the Jewish state to Americans. "There is a surprisingly high level of crime in Israel," he said. "In fact, the prisons are full, and there is a good deal of public pressure on the government to build more facilities. Most of the criminals are Jews. "And drugs are a big problem, too. There's a lot of hashish from Lebanon and cocaine from Iran on the market. Ironically, the dope epidemic started with the invasion of Lebanon; the returning Israeli soldiers brought the stuff home with them. "But the biggest problem ispace faces is the demographic one. It's growing fast. But I'm not talking about the 'Arab problem' although that is important, too. In another 10 years, the Palestinians will outnumber the Jews in the combined areas of Israel, Gaza and the West Bank. "I'm referring to the 'changing face' of Jewish Israel. The Oriental Jews are already about 60% of the Jewish population, and they are multiplying at a much faster rate than the European Jews. This, along with the pitifully small number of Western Jews emigrating to Israel and the expanding brain-drain of the educated Israelis to the West, is turning the country into an Oriental Jewish nation—sort of another mini-Middle Eastern state. And these people are really anti-peace and down on the Palestinians. They tend to follow wild men like Meir Kahane." As he concluded the interview, the veteran journalist said, "You get some sense of the shifting demographics when you see how popular Yemenite food is becoming. Ethiopia was undertaken: in 1935-1941 the population of Asmara increased 600%. The Italians pushed Eritrean men into gold and platinum mines, and women into domestic work and prostitution: this proletarianization of Eritreans saw the beginning of their resistance. Italians kept Eritreans at a very low level of work skills: all trades and occupations were restricted to Italians, Eritreans were forced to remain illiterate, as well as the generally low status of women. [>] 50121. United States House; House Committee on International Relations. Middle East Overview and US Assistance to the Palestinians: Appendix: Prepared Statement by Terrence J. Brown, Deputy Asst. Administrator, Bureau for Asia and the Near East, US Agency for International Development:Yemen. Hearing Before the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives. District of Columbia Government Printing Office, April 6, 1995. p. 33. USAID also has a small program in Yemen, one of the poorest countries in the world. USAID's assistance program is designed to help Yemen deal with the related problems of extraordinarily high fertility, maternal mortality, and female illiteracy, as well as the generally low status of women. [>]

50122. Warburton, David. "Despots and Democrats: Political Change in Arabia: A Campaign Rally At Sana", in Middle East Report, November-December 1993. p. 12. Dr. Raufa Hassan Al-Sharqi (f) campaigned outside the walls of the old city of Sana in a poor neighborhood. Her speech about the importance of women in Yemeni history received intermittent applause from men and women. She carefully explained the lawfulness of voted for a woman to be in parliament. The rally was peaceful, as her supporter's and those of her opponents distributed leaflets. [Warburton is director of the American Institute of Yemeni Studies in Sana.] [TXT]

50123. Wilson, Amrit. Women and the Eritrean Revolution: The Challenge Road: Part 02: Mabrat's Story. Trenton, N.J.: Red Sea Press, 1991. pp. 9-32. Women were involved in the Eritrean revolution from the beginning, even if ignored in standard histories of the revolution written by men. Mabrat fled an arranged marriage to Asmara at 13 (ultimately she would be surgically sterilized without her knowledge by an Italian gynecologist who was pursuing one Italian initiative to address the Eritrean population problem). There the Italian buildup for the war with Ethiopia was undertaken: in 1935-1941 the population of Asmara increased 80%. The Italians pushed Eritrean men into gold and platinum mines, and women into domestic work and prostitution: this proletarianization of Eritreans saw the beginning of their resistance. Italians kept Eritreans at a very low level of work skills: all trades and occupations were restricted to Italians, Eritreans were forced to remain laborers. Significantly, there was such a surplus of European labor that even road construction was reserved for them. Many Eritreans found work in the production of cotton, castor-oil seeds, peanuts, coffee and sugarcane. Italians treated Eritreans with contempt, calling them 'flies', 'slaves', fachyanera [blackface] or merde [shit]. Segregation was practice in restaurants, with the entire Caserma Mussolini area in which Eritreans would be arrested on sight. Rape of Eritrean women by Italian men was common, and Italian women often forced Eritrean women into prostitution. The death of an Eritrean when hit by a car driven by an Italian was seen as an insignificant matter, with informal compensation for such a death set at 30 francs. After WW II, British Military Administration of Eritrea would be even more brutal and racist than the Italian rule. The British used Eritrean resources with abandon, and allowed many Italians to maintain themselves in a sub-imperial role, as managers of the Eritrean masses. It was during the British occupation that the first resistance party was established, the Party of Love of Country (PLC) was established. The PLC program called for the abolition of the feudal system; the British response was to set Christian Ethiopians against Muslim Eritreans by whipping up anti-Muslim sentiments (PLC was expressly based on Christian-Muslim unity); in 1944 the Society for the Unification of Ethiopia & Eritrea (SUEE) was established by Ethiopia to combat the PLC. British also set local groups against each other (starting conflict between Geberti, Tigrinya-speaking Muslims, and Jebelli, people originally from Yemen), or set Muslim Sudanese Defense Force soldiers against Christian Coptic Eritreans (in the infamous Sudanese Defense Force Incident, the soldiers killed 40 Copts). In 1946 the PLC would dissolve into the Muslim League, Pro-Italian Party, National Muslim Party of Massawa and others.

In 1952, the UN granted Eritrea to Ethiopia as a spoil of war. In 1963, a US telecommunications base was established in Eritrea by the US. Popular resistance started to Ethiopian rule: women protesters played a very important role since women protesters were not attacked by the police (as would later happen when local Eritrean police were replaced by Ethiopian police). In 1958, the Group of Seven (also called the Eritrean Liberation Movement (ELM)) was established: it was the first revolutionary group in Eritrea. It led to the formation of the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF) in 1961. The 1960s and 1970s saw the rise of armed resistance by the ELF and the EPLF. [=]