Print on Demand Edition.
Fulltext download at www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa: A Bibliography Middle East Abstracts & Index Vol. 20E(i)
A Reprint of the edition of 1997
New Introduction © Reference Corporation 2007
New Index © Reference Corporation 2007
© Reference Corporation 1997
Post Office Box 45610, Seattle, WA 98145
www.ReferenceCorp.net

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission from this publisher.
Table of Contents

Volume 20E(i)

Table of Contents .......................... i
List of Figures ............................ ii
Bibliographic Essay ....................... iii

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Accession Numbers</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>General Middle East and North Africa</td>
<td>10000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Afghanistan</td>
<td>12000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Algeria</td>
<td>14000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bahrain</td>
<td>16000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cyprus</td>
<td>18000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Egypt</td>
<td>20000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iran</td>
<td>22000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iraq</td>
<td>24000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jordan</td>
<td>26000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kuwait</td>
<td>28000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lebanon</td>
<td>30000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Libya</td>
<td>32000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Morocco</td>
<td>34000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oman</td>
<td>36000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qatar</td>
<td>38000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saudi Arabia</td>
<td>40000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Syria</td>
<td>42000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tunisia</td>
<td>44000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turkey</td>
<td>46000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UAE</td>
<td>48000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yemen</td>
<td>50000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Volume 20E(ii)

Table of Contents .......................... i
List of Figures ............................ ii

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Accession Numbers</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Israel-Palestine</td>
<td>60000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author Index</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Subject-Corporate-Named Persons Index</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
List of Figures in Vol. 20E(i-ii)

[Figures are numbered by the record that presents the numerical data used in that figure.]

Volume 20E(i)

Figure 20113. Percentage of Women Elected to the Egyptian Parliament.
Figure 22031. Numbers of Guerrillas Who Died In The Struggle Before the Iranian Revolution (1963-1977): Marxist Groups.
Figure 22032. Numbers of Guerrillas Who Died In the Struggle Before the Iranian Revolution (1963-1977): Islamic Groups.
Figure 22037. Percentage Literacy Rate Among Iranian Women, 1977 (estimated).
Figure 46033. Percentage of Women Students in Turkish Universities, 1927-1983.
Figure 46034. Percentage of Female Turkish civil Servants, 1938-1982.
Figure 46035. Percentage of Female Faculty Staff in Turkish Universities, 1932-1983.

Volume 20E(ii)

Figure 60032-A. Percentage of Children Among Extrajudicial Killings of Palestinians Under Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir (August 1992-January 1993).
Figure 60032-B. Percentage of Children Among Extrajudicial Killings of Palestinians Under Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (August 1992-January 1993).
Figure 60054. Palestinian Marriages That Ended in Divorce Among Couples Married At Ages 15-20 As a Percentage of All Divorces.
Figure 60115. Comparison of Average Monthly Incomes of Israeli Men and Women in 1996.
Figure 60388. Jewish Immigration to Palestine, 1931-1940.
Figure 60408. Gaza Strip Intifadah Casualties in 9-10/1988 (Not Including Tear Gas Injuries).
Figure 60493. Percentage of the 80000 Palestinian Children Jailed in The Gaza Strip Reported By The International Red Cross Committee in Gaza To Have Been 'Systematically Tortured'.
Figure 60560. Percentage of Higher Civil Service Positions Held By Women in Israel (c. 1990).
Figure 60564. Composition of Military Occupational Specialties To Which Women Are Assigned in the Israeli Army (1977-1978 data).
Figure 60674. Ethnic Composition of Hebron (c. 1995).
Figure 60712. Comparison of the Percentage of Women in the Palestinian Electorate With the Percentage of Women As Candidates.
Figure 61021. Percentages of Palestinian Refugee Girls Attending School (7/1980).
Bibliographic Essay

This bibliography on women in the Middle East and North Africa, defines the region after the Bureau of the Census statistical report Women of the World: Near East and North Africa, of February 1985.¹ That statistical survey includes: Afghanistan, Algeria, Cyprus, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Tunisia, Turkey, and Yemen (North); it did not include: Bahrain, Gaza Strip, Israel, Kuwait, Libya, Oman, Qatar, United Arab Emirates (UAE), Western Sahara or Yemen (South).² Therefore, the area of coverage of this bibliography is: Afghanistan, Algeria, Bahrain, Cyprus, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Israel-Palestine (including Gaza Strip, Israel, Palestine and the West Bank), Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco (including Western Sahara), Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Tunisia, Turkey, UAE, Yemen (including North Yemen, South Yemen and unified Yemen), and General Middle East and North Africa (a regional definition that is reasonably close to the are coverage of Middle East Abstracts). This volume, Women in the middle East & North Africa (1997), is Middle East Abstracts Vol. 20E(i-ii).

The Bibliography has two indicies: an Author Index, and a Subject-Corporate-Named Person Index.

Bibliometric Overview

This bibliography of women in the Middle East and North Africa has three levels of documentation. These levels of documentation can be thought of as focusing, from the grassroots, up, from the data on women in Middle Eastern and North African societies, to studies of the data, and to studies of the studies. The first level is the record of the activities of women in the region, including biography, political and economic activity, dissent and other incidents of daily life that is sublimated into the news. The second level of documentation is broader synthetic studies of women, whether anthropological, historical, sociological, statistical or political. The third level of analysis is that of recursive studies of the study of women in the region or of the study of Women’s Studies that relate to the region. Predictably, the first level includes about 95% of all records in this bibliography; the second level 95% of what remains, or 4.75%, and the third level includes about 0.25% of the records.

The bibliography includes 3115 record in 22 geographic areas. The breakdown by nation-state is (bolding indicates places omitted from the Bureau of the Census statistical study): Afghanistan, 217 records; Algeria, 92 records; Bahrain, 18 records; Egypt, 245 records; Iran, 143 records; Israel-Palestine, 1333 records; Jordan, 58 records; Kuwait, 42 records; Lebanon, 84 records; Libya, 20 records; Morocco, 43 records; Oman, 27 records; Qatar, 12 records; Saudi Arabia, 69 records; Syria, 46 records; Tunisia, 20 records; Turkey, 106 records; United Arab Emirates (UAE), 28 records; Yemen, 124 records; and General Middle East and North Africa, 75 records. Or, looking at these countries by quartile and in order of size (bolded countries are omitted from the Census study):

First quartile: (top five, 2225 records; 71.4%):
- Israel-Palestine, 1333 records;
- Iraq, 287 records;
- Egypt, 245 records;
- Afghanistan, 217 records;
- Iran, 143 records.

Second quartile: (second six, 550 records; 17.7%):
- Yemen, 124 records;
- Turkey, 106 records;
- Algeria, 92 records;
- Lebanon, 84 records;
- General Middle East and North Africa, 75 records;
- Saudi Arabia, 69 records.

²The Bureau of the Census WID Database did not include data from Bahrain, Kuwait, Libya, Oman, Qatar, United Arab Emirates (UAE), Western Sahara or Yemen (South), and the compilers of the volume choose not to include data from Gaza Strip or Israel in this report for unstated reasons.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Introduction

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

Kuwait: 648
Third quartile: Iran: 425
(third six, 244 records; 7.8%): Bahrain: 352
Morocco: 323
Jordan, 58 records; Sudan: 322
Syria, 46 records; Lebanon+OSL\(^5\): 300
Morocco, 43 records; Tunisia: 290
Kuwait, 42 records; Algeria: 262
UAE, 28 records; Egypt: 163
Oman, 27 records.

Fourth quartile: Morocco, 43 records; Tunisia: 290 (bottom five, 96 records; 3.1%):
Cyprus, 26 records;
Libya, 20 records;
Tunisia, 20 records;
Bahrain, 18 records;
Qatar, 12 records.

This distribution of coverage is worth comparing to the coverage of the Middle East (defined slightly differently) in the Amnesty International report on Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack (August 1995). The rank order of coverage by word count\(^3\) in that document by area is:

Iraq: 923
Israel+Palestine\(^4\): 901

\(^3\) Counts of subsets of words in sentences and sidebars in the Amnesty report include: Algeria (Berber): 262; Bahrain+Bahrain-Iran: 352; Bahrain-Iran (exile in UAE): 113; Egypt (Cairo)+Egypt-Israel: 163; Iran+Bahrain-Iran-Iran Iraq War: 425; Iraq+Iran-Iraq War+Iraq-Kurds-Turkey+Iraq-Kuwait (occupation, Collaborators): 923; Israel (Tel Aviv)+Egypt-Israel: 221; Israel (Tel Aviv)+Israel and Palestinians (Occupied Territories): 476; Israel (Tel Aviv)+Occupied Southern Lebanon: 470; Kuwait+Iraq Kuwait (Occupation, Collaborators): 648; Lebanon+Lebanon-Syria (Occupation): 83; Lebanon+Southern Lebanon: 300; Libya: 41; Morocco+Morocco and Western Sahara (Polisario): 323; Occupied Southern Lebanon (Israel-Lebanon/OSL-Israel/Hezbollah etc)+Israel-Lebanon (OSL-Israel/I/S?a?): 249; Palestinians (Is-Pal, Syr-Pal, Pal alone): 176; Saudi Arabia: 70; Sudan (Omdurman, Kharfoum, Nuba, Nuer, Bahr al-Ghazal, SPLA): 322; Syria+Lebanon-Syria (Occupation): 154; Tunisia: 290; Turkey (Iraq-Kurds-Turkey only): 80; UAE: 22; Yemen: 63. Generally speaking, Amnesty International (AI) data seems to correlate loosely with two variables (with high attention corresponding to a high rate of human rights abuses as defined by AI): (1) nations that are “rogue states”, that is, designated enemies of the United States, and (2) nations that are more open to AI investigations. So, Saudi Arabia, a state which poorly conforms to the Western Feminist model of women’s rights employed by AI, and which is very closed to AI investigations, has a very low level of attention in this AI report. By contrast, Iraq, given the highest human rights violations rating by AI, even as AI ignores the embargo and its affects. The relatively high ratings of Bahrain, Israel, Morocco and Tunisia are partly the product of openness to AI investigations, and in the case of Bahrain and Israel, a very high level of human rights violations.

\(^4\) Israel-Palestine includes Israel, Palestine, the Occupied Territories (herein Gaza Strip ad West Bank, but not the Golan Heights, which never appears in the Amnesty report) and Occupied Southern Lebanon (OSL).

Subject Coverage: Data

The subject coverage of this bibliography is very broad, including information form hundreds of sources, from newspapers to monographs to government documents to political ephemera. The bibliography includes abstracts, full text documents and a limited number of enumerative entries. The three major clusters of information that are covered are:

Women in Society: gender policy/gender sociology, ethnic policy/multiculturalism, Women’s Studies, rape, violence against women, sexuality, class, child and youth issues, women in religion, women in art, lesbianism, feminism, philosophy, sociology, motherhood, marriage law and marriage sociology, women in combat/revolution/civil war, history, oral history, women’s suffrage, women in business, women in the economy, urban sociology, rural sociology, tribes, poverty, employment, sexual harassment, cultural ideology, ideological evolution, and patriarchy.

Women in Politics: Office holders, policymakers, civil rights, civil rights leaders, women’s international associations, women-centered international political organizations, activism, demonstrations, women’s movements.
rights/human rights movements, women-oriented services, and lobbying.

Women’s Health: public health, abortion, social surgery, psychology, aging, women’s medicine, and AIDS.

This bibliography attempts to provide systematic coverage of many of these subjects, but ultimately is both burdened and limited by the availability of information. For many disciplines that are associated with the study of women in the Middle East and North Africa, there remain significant lacunae. For example, questions are addressed both institutionally and systematically: human rights issues in every country are covered by the bibliography through State Department human rights reports, as well as by other sources (with regional coverage from groups such as Amnesty International Human Rights Watch/Middle East Watch, and Minority Rights Group). However, human rights studies are simply data, often very ephemeral data and anecdote, and few include much analysis. At the same time, the growth of indigenous human rights institutions is accelerating, ranging from human rights groups built on Western NGO models to the emergent articulation of an Islamic human rights responses to both that Western model and of the West itself.

As women play a larger and larger public role in Middle Eastern and North African societies, that is, assume visible leadership roles, the volume of information that deals with, for example, women in politics becomes almost unmanageable. When women become prime ministers, is it still a matter of documenting the role of women in politics when a she is the leader of a political party and government? In the future it may not be a subject matter of Women’s Studies to document the role of women in politics, but at present there should be considerable interest in figures like Tansu Ciller; frequently described in the American media as merely an attractive blonde (and therefore pro-Western), she is in fact a central and controversial political figure in Turkey in a time of unknowable, and incomplete, transition. Similarly, there is a growing volume of important autobiography and biography form Middle Eastern women, including: Nawal El-Sadaawi’s Memoirs From the Women’s Prison (1994) [Record 20098], a biography of the indefatiguable Henrietta Szold, founder of Hadassah and the Godmother of Israel, Joan Dash’s authoritative Summoned to Jerusalem; The Life of Henrietta Szold (1979) [Record 60555] or the autobiography of Irgun Zvai Leumi operative Doris Katz, The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation (1953) [Record 60716 seq.].

Similarly, the biography of American women political figures can provide significant data in studying the formulation of American foreign policy and of women in formulating that policy, for example, the intense political commitment of Geraldine Ferraro as described in her Ferraro: My Story [Record 22072], and the odd travelogue/autobiography of Cynthia Helms (wife of former CIA director and then ambassador to Iran Richard Helms, An Ambassador’s Wife in Iran (1981) [Record 22084]. By contrast, the role of civil rights attorney Susan Campos in defending the Iraqis used in the CIA mercenary army in Erbil in 1996 who were imprisoned by the US as potential terrorists after they fled Iraq with US assistance, illustrates the omnipresent role of American women in Middle East issues, in this instance as a attorney [Record 24186], even in rather murky matters. Nevertheless, the inclusion of the record of women leaders as a subject matter for Women's Studies remains problematic: while Georgie Ann Geyer can praise the appointment of Madeleine Albright (a "Skirt") as a triumph for women's rights and praise Albright for the special woman's sensitivity for children that she will bring to the State Department (article not included in this bibliography), Secretary of State Albright's gloating about the death of 500,000 Iraqi children form the US enforced embargo on Sixty Minutes, June 12, 1996 is certainly a matter for a Middle East bibliography of women (even if her comment was never reported in the mainstream United States media as a result of the comments being made in the most ephemeral of all media, television; but see the press release of Dialogue for Just Peace [Record 24192]).

6 The question of how such a broad discipline as Women's Studies can be delimited remains relatively untouched by studies in the method of Women's Studies: even if many are... uneasy with the role of First Lady Nancy Reagan as a real power broker in the Reagan Administration, the declaration of her astrologer, Joan Quigley, that the Strategic Defense Initiative was "very Aquarian" may have changed history.

Concurrent with the emergence of women as leaders in Middle Eastern societies is the growth of institutions that address gender-policy and gender-sociology question. UN agencies such as the Division of Palestine Rights [Record 60491 seq.] and the Department of Humanitarian Affairs in Afghanistan [Record 12096 seq.] provide detailed authoritative, primary documentation on women in those countries. Documentation form the UN Population and Development Conference in Cairo in 1994, included as part of the entries for Egypt illustrate, the range of discourse in the Middle East on questions affecting women is limitless.

Similarly, coverage of Middle Eastern and North African women at the UN Women's Conference in Beijing in 1995 (and especially at the NGO Forum in Hairou) illustrates the growing range and confidence of Islamic and minorities' women's organizations (including articles such as Farida Mahomed's Life Style: Experiences of Muslimahs at the Hairou Conference (1995) [Record 22093], or the Caucus Statement of the Kurdish Women Delegation--Working Group on Kurdish Women (1995) [Record 24134]).

Institutionalization of women's NGOs has provided a very large literature of primary documentation that has largely escaped collection by American Universities. The largest published collections of such ephemera are that reprinted in Middle East Abstracts, and that produced by the Peoples Translation Service in its Connexions: An International Women's Quarterly. The complete fulltext of the Middle East and North African documents of Connexions are reproduced by permission in this bibliography.

In contrast to the massive flow of raw data of news and opinion, the studies of this data are just beginning.

Subject Coverage: Studies

Studies of women in the middle East and North Africa are largely anthropological or sociological, with the number of historical studies starting to grow.

Many of these studies are more properly reports of data collection from fieldwork, such as the two gender-sociology, anthropological reports on Oman: Christine Eickelman's Women and Community in Oman (1984) [Record 360019] and Unni Wikan's Behind the Veil in Arabia: Women in Oman (1982) [Record 36025]. However, there are a growing number of gender-policy, gender-sociology and gender-history studies emerging from this inchoate data collection process for the vast region encompassed by Middle Eastern, North African and Islamic studies.

Nevertheless, it is worth remembering that Feminist method in history, sociology, anthropology and other disciplines is primarily a critical apparatus, in the manner of traditional Academic Marxisms or of contemporary environmentalism. While a wild variety of data has been collected in this bibliography from scores of Marxist parties worldwide, ideologically informed criticism of the status of women in Islam by Marxists of various flavors rarely attempts to be more than critical new reports or mere dismissive polemic; one rare exception is the recent essay by Bob Avakian of the Maoist Revolutionary Communist Party in the United States [Record 20050 seq.]. Excesses in criticism of Muslim societies, often politically motivated, have left Islamic scholars who try to present the Islamic perspective forced with the necessity of arguing that Muslims love their daughters as well as their sons, as in Jamal Badawi's The Status of Women in Islam, Muslim Student Association of the United States and Canada [Record 10014 seq.].

---

8 A few of the NGO participants at Cairo appearing in the bibliography include, the Women's Caucus, Coordinating Committee for the US Network of Cairo, Sisterlove, Project Azuka, Georgia Women Preventing AIDS Campaign, Action for Youth, Tam Cam Foundation, National Women & HIV/AIDS Project, Boston Women's Health Book Collective, Gathering Place, Women of All Red Nations, One With Creation, Anoka United Methodist Church, African American Future Society, Committee on Women Population & the Environment, International Council on Women, People Sustaining People, National Council of Maubere Resistance]
The best gender-historical studies are those which provide insights into a historical period by the examination of institutions in societies that were overlooked because they were institutions peopled by women: a remarkable example in Mamluk History is the article by Carl F. Petry, "Class Solidarity Versus Gender Gain: Women As Custodians of Property in Later Medieval Egypt," in Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries In Sex and Gender (1991) [Record 20183]. Similarly, the ethnic and gender policies of settler colonialism in the Middle East, and its institutional logic, is highlighted no only in Petra, but from Hellenistic History in Sarah B. Pomeroy's Women in Hellenistic Egypt: From Alexander to Cleopatra (1990), which is a fine work of history with a very classical heft [Record 20185 seq.].

The study of political mobilization of women in the Middle East is highlighted by the powerful presence of women in politics in Iran and Palestine: in both countries women played a critical role in the national struggles for human rights. In Palestine and Israel, many NGOs have been create by women to address women's issues there: a few of those represented in this bibliography are: Women's Organizations for Women Political Prisoners, Women's Zionist Organization, Women's Zionist Organization of America, Women in Black, Women Against Silence, Women's Pro-Israel National Political Action Committee, Women's Union in Gaza, Women's Welfare Society, Hadassah, Women Against the Occupation, Women Against the Invasion of Lebanon.

The interaction between disciplines within feminist social sciences is also starting to yield interesting dialectical exchanges: the application of the theory of public and private spaces in defining women's roles in society in the History of Religion presented in Karen J. Torjesen's When Women Were Priests: Women's Leadership in the Early Church and the Scandal of Their Subordination in the Rise of Christianity (1993) [Record 20211] finds a firm response in the Anthropology field work presented in Mary Elaine Hegland's "Political Roles of Allabat Women: The Public-Private Dichotomy Transcended", in Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries In Sex and Gender (1991) [Record 22083]. Such inter-disciplinary dialectics are continuing processes, and are just beginning to lay the groundwork of a more thoroughly grounded study of gender in history and society.

Subject Coverage :Studies of Studies

The studies of studies in Women's Studies of the Middle East and North Africa suffers from the common problem of American academic confusion between method and methodology, exemplified by the collapse of both terms into the single term 'methodology', confusing the discussion of the two very different levels of analysis. Generally in this bibliography, the questions of research methods appear in the Subject Index under the descriptor 'Research Methods'.

The best single volume that addresses the question of method/methodology in Middle Eastern and North African studies of women and by women is Arab Women in the Field: Studying Your Won Society (1988). Eight abstracts appear in this bibliography from that book: the introductory essay [Record 40049]; Suad Joseph's Feminism, Familism, Self and Politics: Research As A Mughtaribi [Record 30057] (Lebanon); Soraya Altorki's At Home In The Field [Record 40008] (Saudi Arabia); Soheir Morsy's Fieldwork In My Egyptian Homeland: Toward the Demise of Anthropology's Distinctive-Other Hegemonic Tradition [Record 20162] (Egypt); Camilla Fawzi El-Solh's Gender, Class and Origin: Aspects of Role During Fieldwork in Arab Society [Record 20101] (Egyptian peasant settlement in Iraq); Seteney Shami's Studying Your Own: The Complexities of a Shared Culture [Record 26051] 9Circassian-Palestinian refugees, of several classes, in Jordan); and Lila Abu-Lughod's Fieldwork of a Difful Daughter [Record 20042] (Egyptian Bedouin). Unfortunately, such self-reflection on method remains "extremely very" rare: there appears to be no significant body of thought on 9 Of course, methodology is the study into the epistemology underlying a body of method and the determining what constitutes meaningful data (i.e., phenomenology or positivism), while method is the specific intellectual tool(s) employed to organize the data required by the method selected (i.e., statistical method, or the method of gendering). The collapse of the terminology of methodology into a monolithic, but, naive, positivism in modern American academic thought.

method in Middle East studies, beyond the debate on Orientalism stated initiated by Edward Said. Interestingly, one large body of criticism of the general failure to separate Western ideologies and discourse on the Middle East was that voiced by Middle Eastern women, and especially Muslim women, at the NGO Forum in Beijing.

By contrast, Simon Ford’s manifesto of his Movement for Avant-Garde Librarianship, “The Disorder of Things; Art Libraries, Postmodernism and Hypermedia” in Afterimage (1994) [Record 20104], makes clear why such Post-Modernism has produced little clarity into the discourse of Middle Eastern studies, in a manner more convincing than any criticism of Post-Modernism ever could. His radical statement of post-Modernism would simply abolish books and even history, arguing, for example, that his personal history of ancient Egypt in which he is Pharaoh is more valid than any more traditional historical approach to Ancient Egypt.

Of course, it may just be the prejudice of a bibliographer arguing that the basis of the study of the Middle East lies in reading and building its literature, rather than, as Simon Ford argues, in burning those books and turning its libraries into museums-of-the-book as an obsolete artifact. But it was for just this purpose of making this vast and growing literature available that this two-volume bibliography, Women in the Near East & North Africa was produced: to make this literature more accessible.

10 Simon Ford was not in fact Pharaoh.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

General-Middle East and North Africa

10000. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 1: Preface. New York: Amnesty International, August 1995. Women in the Middle East are speaking out for their rights. They are also joining human rights groups in growing numbers, determined to make the world a safer place for all humanity. In countries such as Algeria, Israel and Tunisia, women play a leading role in Amnesty International's groups. Their work is dedicated to campaigning against human rights violations in countries outside their own. They have participated in International campaigns to protect people they have never met, nor are ever likely to meet, in countries as far apart as the USA and China. They have joined thousands of other women and men in writing to governments of every political persuasion in all regions of the world on behalf of individual victims of human rights violations. They have sent appeals to armed opposition groups urging them to respect the basic principles of humanitarian law. They have also worked to raise awareness about human rights in general inside their own countries. Amnesty International members and groups always operate openly and within the law, and keep the authorities informed of their peaceful activities. Despite this, in several Middle Eastern countries they have been refused permission to organize and in others they have been facing increasing harassment and restrictions on their activities.

Humankind is precious and every person is entitled to basic human rights. These rights are defined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and many international human rights instruments. Rights are a human necessity and a fundamental property of every human being. Every person has the right to seek and enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health, and the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, and the right to social security in old age, sickness, and in case of disability, invalidity and unemployment.

Women in the region are organizing in many other ways to defend human and women's rights. Widad Hilwani is typical of many women who have been propelled into activity by personal tragedy. After her husband 'Adnan "disappeared", she helped to establish an organization in Lebanon to search for the thousands of women and men who went missing during the 1975 to 1990 civil war. She testifies: "When 'Adnan was kidnapped, I couldn't believe it... I told all the military authorities... I kept being told he'd be back at any moment... Two weeks passed and 'Adnan didn't return. While looking for 'Adnan, I'd ask if there were others in a similar situation... I don't know how, I became involved with all the families of the kidnapped. The kidnapped list kept getting longer and longer: two or three new cases a day. I thought of getting all the families together. Many came. We set up a committee and we lobbied on a large scale."

In Israel and the Occupied Territories, Palestinian and Israeli women have organized to campaign for the release of political prisoners and administrative detainees and to protest against human rights violations. Many of the most active groups have been founded by women whose relatives— female and male—have suffered political imprisonment or have "disappeared". Maysun al-Wahaydi set up the Committee of Mothers in Solidarity with Political Prisoners after her daughter, 'Abir al-Wahaydi, was held as a political prisoner (see infra). Another woman, Suha al-Barghouti, founded the Committee to End Administrative Detention after her husband, Ahmed Qatamesh, was administratively detained.

In Morocco, too, women relatives of political prisoners helped establish the Association of the Families of the "Disappeared", Political Prisoners, Martyrs and Exiles. The Association subsequently expanded its work to carry out activities on a range of human rights violations.

In Egypt, Dr Susan Fayad runs the El Nadim Centre for the Management and Rehabilitation of Victims of Violence. The Centre, which was founded in Cairo in 1993, helps women, men and children who are victims of torture, including rape, domestic violence and child battering. Another woman, Dr 'Aide Saif al-Dawla, heads the New Woman Research Centre, which deals with violence against women, rape and other women's issues. Both organizations campaign for the banning of female genital mutilation in Egypt.

In Tunisia, a group of women signed a petition in June 1994 calling on the authorities to respect freedom of expression; several were subsequently questioned by the police and asked to deny that they had signed the petition. In 1995 women human rights activists in the Democratic Women's Association wrote to the Minister of Justice asking him to ensure the fair application of the law for this they later faced prosecution for defamation. The case is still pending.

In Sudan, women regularly stage protests, carrying placards and photographs of relatives who were executed in April 1990 within a day of being arrested on suspicion of attempting a coup. In Algeria, Bahrain and Iraq/Kurdistan, women have taken to the streets to demonstrate for political prisoners. Women are also resisting the discrimination and violence they suffer in their everyday lives. In early 1994 Palestinian women in Kfar village in Galilee set up a shelter for victims of domestic violence—an abuse which devastates the lives of millions of women across every continent, culture and class. The Kfar village shelter was the first of its kind for Arab women in the Middle East. Sahar Dawud, the woman who runs the shelter, said: "In the past Arab women were reluctant to take such drastic steps; today, they have started to understand that they don't have to put up with violence. It's a process of education about rights."

This report calls on governments and armed political groups in the Middle East to listen to the voices of women—voices that are too often silenced by repression and discrimination. It urges them to ensure that women can continue their peaceful activities without fear of intimidation, attack or prosecution. [Caption: 1] A protest organized in 1993 by relatives of Moroccan prisoners of conscience. From left to right: the sister and mother of Mohcen al-Khatib; the mother of Omar Boudaoui; the mother of Abdelhaq Chbada (who died during a hunger-strike in August 1989); and the wife of Said Tabali. (2) The sister and niece of Lieutenant Colonel 'Abd al-Moneim Hassan Al Karrar, one of 26 officers summarily executed in Sudan on 4/24/1990. Despite persistent harassment, the families continue to protest against the executions.][= 10001. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 2: Introduction. New York: Amnesty International,August 1995. Women's human rights are under attack across the Middle East, as they are in every other region of the world. In the violence of wars and conflicts, women are killed, taken hostage, raped and driven from their homes. In peace, they are imprisoned and tortured for opposing the government or simply for being related to political activists. Several of the region's governments openly flout the UN Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, which calls for "the universal application to women of the rights and principles with regard to equality, security, liberty, integrity and dignity of all human persons". Most violate the International human rights treaties under which they are obliged to protect the fundamental rights of all their citizens, and many have refused to ratify relevant International instruments. Despite their International obligations, the region's governments violate human rights with impunity on the grounds that they are protecting national security or have to combat "terrorist" threats—but these can never justify practices such as torture, extrajudicial executions and "disappearances". And when it comes to women's human rights, several governments take a particularly restrictive view, in contravention of the commitment made by governments at the 1993 UN World Conference on Human Rights that "...the human rights of women and of the girl-child are an inalienable, integral and indivisible part of universal human rights".

For the women whose fundamental rights are being violated, the excuses governments make are nothing but an insult. The women in Syria who are on trial simply for belonging to a political party have had their basic human rights violated—whether or not the Syrian Government has effectively outlawed that party. The unarmed Palestinian women and children shot dead by Israeli security forces have been denied their basic right to life—whether or not the Israeli government believed that national security was under threat. The Saudi Arabian women detained for driving cars have had their basic human rights violated—whether or not the Saudi Arabian government believes such a punishment is necessary to maintain social order. Women's human rights are not only applicable in all contexts and situations. They are also indivisible. The women in Tunisia who are arbitrarily detained without charge, the women in Iran who are tortured, the women in Algeria who are victims of deliberate and arbitrary killings, the women in..."
Iraqi women who are made to “disappear”, the Bahraini women who are forcibly exiled—all these women have no chance of exercising their social, economic and cultural rights. Without respect for women’s fundamental rights, women’s rights to equality, development and peace—the themes of the Fourth UN World Conference on Women to be held in China in September 1995—are also unattainable.

This report covers 17 countries in the Middle East and North Africa and presents a series of reports on women in different parts of the world. Amnesty International takes no position on any of the conflicts mentioned, nor on the types of government or legal systems in place. Amnesty International’s sole concern is with specific human rights, which its one million plus members in all regions of the world, including the Middle East, campaign to defend and promote. In particular, Amnesty International believes that no one should be imprisoned as a prisoner of conscience [Amnesty International considers anyone detained for their beliefs or because of their ethnic origin, sex, color or language to be a prisoner of conscience, provided they have not used or advocated violence.] and that no political prisoner should be imprisoned without a prompt and fair trial. Amnesty International also takes action to oppose torture, the death penalty, extrajudicial executions and “disappearances.” Alongside such work, the organization opposes human rights abuses committed by armed political groups, including deliberate and arbitrary killings of civilians, torture and hostage-taking.

This report shows that whenever there is conflict, either across borders or within countries, women figure largely among the victims, although their suffering often remains hidden. They are killed in reprisal assaults and other deliberate attacks on non-combatants. They are raped and sexually abused by armed men intent on terrorizing civilian populations or in situations of lawlessness. They face hardship and deprivation as they struggle to support their families, while male relatives having been killed or made to “disappear”. They are forced to make arduous journeys as refugees, often risking abuse on their way or in the refugee camps. In recent years the Middle East has been beset by conflict, often accompanied by widespread human rights violations. Between 1980 and 1988 up to a million people are estimated to have died in the war between Iran and Iraq. In 1990 and 1991 there were thousands of casualties in the Gulf following Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. The region has also been riven by other prolonged conflicts. Israel and the Palestinians; Morocco and the Sahrawis; the 1975-1990 civil war in Lebanon; and fierce internal wars in Sudan. Elsewhere, in countries such as Algeria and Iraq, there are continuing conflicts between government forces and armed opposition groups.

This report also shows that women in the Middle East are not passive victims of violence and injustice. They are organizing to defend their rights, to protest against violations and to campaign for justice, equality and freedom. Often they are persecuted by both government and armed political groups precisely because they are standing up for their rights. Women activists are subjected to violations such as rape and threats of sexual abuse to which they are particularly vulnerable, as well as other serious human rights violations. Moreover, in several countries they face detention as prisoners of conscience, torture and harassment simply for being related to male activists wanted by the authorities. The human rights violations suffered by women in conflict and peace occur in the context of legalized discrimination against women, including criminal penalties for exercising the full range of their civil and political rights. In many parts of the Middle East, women’s participation in public life is severely limited. Along with men, their rights to freedom of association and expression are curtailed, but the additional discrimination they face means that they are even less able than men to take an active part in determining how their societies are run. Even in the countries where they are allowed into the offices of power, they are grossly underrepresented. Some governments in the Middle East have said they will put women’s rights on their agenda, but nowhere in the region have women been accorded the full rights and protection that they are entitled to under international law.

During the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait, the exiled Kuwaiti royal family promised to grant full political rights to both women and men if they were resumed to power. Women were praised for risking their lives by joining the Kuwaiti resistance and feeding and hiding male members of the resistance. But when the Iraqi forces were expelled, the Kuwaiti royal family proved reluctant to honour their promises, and even when it did introduce democratic reforms, only some men benefited. The reaction of many Kuwaiti women was summed up by Professor Laila al-Qadhi, a women’s rights activist and teacher: “It’s outrageous in today’s world that we are denied our rights. When the Iraqis came they did not discriminate by occupying only male Kuwait; they took all of Kuwait; all of Kuwait suffered.”

In Tunisia, where the government publicly commits itself to promoting and defending women’s and human rights, women activists and relatives of political opponents have had their human rights persistently violated. In March 1995 the government prevented a celebration of International Women’s Day which had been jointly organized by the Tunisian Section of Amnesty International and the Tunisian Women’s Democratic Association. The following pages highlight the tragic consequences for women when their fundamental human rights are devalued, ignored and violated. [Caption: (1) An Israeli border policeman strikes a Palestinian woman taking part in a demonstration in East Jerusalem to mark International Women’s Day in 1994. (2) Kuwaiti women demonstrating in 1992 for the political rights they were promised by the Kuwaiti royal family and then denied.] [Sidebar: “To all who are concerned about Mansour, to all who know Mansour’s fate, to all who wish for the freedom of Mansour, and to all those, like Mansour, whose fate is unknown: From me, and from all mothers whose hearts are filled with pain...we say: season’s greetings to you all... Eighteen months have passed since our loved one was taken away from us—18 months of grief, of endurance, of hope, and of anger. ‘Eid is coming all of you who are concerned about Mansour’s case. Where is Mansour—and the thousands like him?... Help us. Return our loved ones to us.” – Mrs Baha’ Mansour al-KikhIya, writing an appeal on behalf of her husband, Mansour, and others who have “disappeared”, on the occasion of the Muslim festival ‘Eid al-Adha. Mansour KikhIya, a former Libyan Minister of Foreign Affairs and opposition activist, “disappeared” while attending a human rights conference in Cairo in 12/1993. There are fears that he may have been abducted by Libyan government agents and returned to Libya.] [ ]

10002. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 3: Women and Conflict. New York: Amnesty International, August 1995. The mutilated body of Asrar Qabandi was dumped outside her family’s home in Kuwait by Iraqi soldiers. She had been interrogated for weeks about her work for the Kuwaiti resistance and tortured in front of her father. She was just one of many women who suffered almost every known human rights violation during the Gulf conflict of 1990 to 1991, a conflict which still dominates many women’s lives as they struggle to cope without their husbands or search for missing relatives. Hundreds of unarmed civilians, including women, were deliberately killed in Kuwait when Iraqi troops invaded the country. Children were shot in the head at close range by Iraqi soldiers and their bodies dumped outside their houses for their mothers to find. Many women were sexually abused; in particular, foreign domestic servants were raped by Iraqi soldiers. Hundreds of Kuwaitis and other nationals who were transferred to Iraq during the occupation remain unaccounted for. Some are believed to be still held, but there are fears that others died as a result of torture or were executed. Among those still missing are Wasiymiya Fahd Shuwaireb al’Ajmi, now aged 33, and Mansour al-KikhIya, a former Libyan Minister of Foreign Affairs and opposition activist, “disappeared” while attending a human rights conference in Cairo in 12/1993. There are fears that he may have been abducted by Libyan government agents and returned to Libya.
The killing of an estimated 5000 civilians by chemical weapons in the More than 300 civilian women are reported to have been killed by armed Muslims, and Christians—as well as members of prohibited political between government forces and armed groups continues to claim an sign of resistance. The victims included people from a wide variety of Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) had made major gains in the first round, "disappeared" during the 1980s as the authorities clamped down on any the cancellation of the second round of multi-party elections after the conflict erupted in early 1992. While many of them died in armed operations; some have been taken as concubines or sold into Popular Defence Force (PDF), a government-created militia, during military operations to forcibly resettle civilians in so-called peace villages. A former security official who witnessed assaults on Nuba villages in 7-8/1992 described the government's tactics when clearing villages: "...ground troops entered the villages, shooting indiscriminately and killing hundreds of civilians... Many women were raped by the soldiers... The people were loaded on to trucks each of which could transport about 80 persons. Many had to walk to Kadugli under army guard. The dead bodies were left behind as prey for the animals." Because of the shame attached to rape, few of the victims have talked openly about their experiences. One who did, a woman from the Moro Hills who was raped by soldiers in Kadugli in 10/1992, said: "I was taken on the way home by soldiers and tied down. I was... taken to the barracks. I refused them... Once I was tied up they did a lot of things to me." Women have met a similar fate in northern Bahr al-Ghazal, particularly when troops have been driving people away from the railway line linking north and south Sudan. Women and girls have been abducted by members of the Popular Defence Force (PDF), a government-created militia, during such operations; some have been taken as concubines or sold into domestic slavery. Among those still missing is Apui Majok, aged 12, who was abducted in 1993. Women have also suffered gross abuses as a result of fighting between armed opposition groups. For example, in 10-11/1991 many women were killed, raped or abducted when SPLA-Nasir forces briefly took over land controlled by SPLA-Mainstream in Upper Nile. In 3/1993 SPLA-Mainstream troops attacked the village of Pagau in retaliation; 32 women were lined up and shot in the head. Their only "crime" was to be of Nuer origin and therefore suspected of loyalty to the SPLA-Nasir faction.

In Algeria over 40000 people are reported to have been killed since conflict erupted in early 1992. While many of them died in armed clashes, thousands of civilians are reported to have been extrajudicially executed by the security forces or deliberately killed by armed groups defining themselves as Islamic groups. The violence erupted following the cancellation of the second round of multi-party elections after the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) had made major gains in the first round, and since 2/1992 a state of emergency has been imposed. The conflict between government forces and armed groups continues to claim an increasing number of civilian lives; during 1994 and early 1995 the number of violent attacks on unarmed civilians by both sides escalated. More than 300 civilian women are reported to have been killed by armed groups since the beginning of 1992. Civilian women are also reported to have been killed and injured by the security forces during raids and at
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

check-points. Tens of thousands of women have been widowed as a result of killings by the security forces and by armed groups; others continue to search for their relatives who “disappeared” after arrest. The conflict in Algeria has again seen the use of rape as a weapon of terror. Because of trauma and the social stigma associated with this form of torture, women are often reluctant to report rapes. In Algeria, this reluctance, combined with the absence of independent human rights monitoring, makes it difficult to assess the scale of the problem. However, reports of abductions and rape by groups of armed men, particularly in rural areas, have been increasing. Some women are reported to have been held prisoner and used as forced domestic labour. The victims and their families are often threatened with further abuse if they speak of their experiences. Many have fled their homes fearing further attack; some have been ostracized by their families. Algerian women have also been the victims of widespread campaigns of terror by armed groups calling themselves “Islamic groups”. Professional groups—such as teachers, journalists, magistrates and civil servants—have been targeted, as have students and relatives of the security forces. Death threats have been posted up in public places and sent to individuals’ homes. The sources of the threats are not always clear; the effect, however, is. They have created a climate of fear in which many women are terrorized. Rachida Hammadi, a 32-year-old journalist working for the national television station, and her 36-year-old sister, Hourria, were shot by gunmen on 3/21/1995 on their way to work in Algiers. Hourria was killed on the spot and Rachida died from the wounds some weeks later. Rachida Hammadi was one of 40 journalists killed since 5/1993 in attacks reported to have been carried out by armed groups calling themselves “Islamic groups”.

Groups defining themselves as Islamic groups have increasingly abused women in Algeria for not covering their hair, for going to beaches or for travelling on public transport because male and female passengers are not segregated. Kala Bengana, a 17-year-old student, was shot dead in Bilda in 2/1994, reportedly after receiving threats that she would be killed if she did not wear the hijab (Islamic veil). After her death an anti-Islamist group, the Organization of Young Free Algerians, issued a statement saying that for every woman not wearing the veil who was attacked, they would kill 20 veiled women. Soon after, on 29 March, two young women students wearing the veil were shot dead at a bus stop near their school. Armed groups defining themselves as Islamic continue to carry out attacks on women, including the murder of two girls and a man, who were killed by a suicide car bomber. Hamas described the attack as “legitimate retaliation” for the killing of Palestinians by an Israeli settler in Hebron two months earlier. In yet to mount an adequate investigation into her death.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Among the Palestinian girls who have been killed was 11-year-old Rana Abu Tuyur. On 12/19/1992 she was sent out by her mother to buy milk as a long curfew had just been lifted. She came across soldiers who were trying to stop a group of stone-throwing youths who were some 500 metres away. She was on the other side of the road to the soldiers, between 50-100 metres away. Witnesses say the soldiers fired at her across the road, killing her. The scale of the soldiers fired and hit Rana Abu Tuyur in the chest. She died before reaching hospital. An official investigation found that two soldiers had deviated from the rules of engagement, but found no connection between the shots fired and Rana Abu Tuyur’s death. However, details of the methods and results of this investigation have not been made public, contrary to international standards.

Women have suffered other human rights violations at the hands of the Israeli authorities during the intifada. For example, many have been made homeless since mid-1992 as a result of a policy of house destruction. Typically, houses in which the Israeli authorities believe suspects may be hiding are surrounded and their inhabitants ordered out and held in nearby houses. The houses are then attacked with heavy fire, including machine-gun fire, grenades and anti-tank missiles. Afterwards, soldiers enter the houses, firing at any place where survivors may have been hiding. In many cases, soldiers blow up the houses with explosives, suggesting that one of the aims, if not the main aim of these operations, is to impose a form of collective punishment on the occupants. In one such operation in Hebron in 3/1994, a pregnant woman was killed in disputed circumstances.

The Israeli authorities denied that these operations were a form of collective punishment, claiming that they were designed to protect their forces from surprise attacks by people inside the houses. They also denied that houses were blown up after soldiers had entered them. However, the authorities have never clarified evidence provided by military experts that the houses were indeed blown up from the inside.

The Israeli authorities have also destroyed the houses of Palestinians who have participated in attacks against Israeli civilians, rendering their families homeless. In November 1994 the house of the family of Salah ‘Abd al-Rahim Nazzal, who was responsible for a bus bomb in Tel Aviv which killed 23 people, including himself, was demolished after the family’s appeal to the High Court of Justice against the demolition order had been rejected. Such collective punishment violating fundamental principles of international law.

Women have also suffered at the hands of Palestinian armed opposition groups. Unarmed civilian women have been deliberately and arbitrarily killed by such groups. Many attacks in recent years have been carried out by the Islamic Resistance Movement, Hamas, which continues to oppose the peace process. For example, in 4/1994, four women, two girls and a man were killed by a suicide car bomber. Hamas described the attack as “legitimate retaliation” for the killing of Palestinians by an Israeli settler in Hebron two months earlier. In 10/1994 women were among 23 people killed in a suicide bomb attack on a bus in the centre of Tel Aviv carried out by Hamas.

The wider Arab-Israeli conflict has also threatened the physical integrity of many other civilians, including women and children. In 7/1993 a week long confrontation in south Lebanon and northern Israel between Israeli forces and Hizbullah, a Lebanese armed group fighting against Israel’s continuing occupation of a strip of south Lebanon, led to thousands of civilians in both countries having to flee their homes for safety. Israeli forces carried out a widespread bombardment of villages and Palestinian refugee camps in south Lebanon. Israeli officials stated that the bombardment was deliberately aimed at forcing the civilian population to flee the area and at putting pressure on the Lebanese Government to prevent Hizbullah from carrying out attacks against Israel. Radio broadcasts warned village residents to leave or risk death. Over 200,000 people fled northwards, and over 130 people, including civilians, were killed. During the same period, Hizbullah launched over 270 Katyusha rockets against northern Israel and the “security zone”, killing two civilians and forcing tens of thousands of others to leave their homes to seek safety. Deliberate targeting of civilians by anyone can never be justified.

In Morocco, the government has used a system of secret detention to punish its political opponents, particularly supporters of the pro-independence movement in Western Sahara. Several hundred women, men and children from the south of Morocco and the Western Sahara have “disappeared” since 1975. They were reportedly arrested by Moroccan security forces and later imprisoned in secret jails. In several cases, whole families “disappeared”. Almost all the victims were suspected of sympathizing with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro, more generally known as the Polisario Front. For example, five women were arrested by Moroccan security forces on 3/3/1985 during a wave of arrests in Laayoune. Among them was 40-year-old Saïka ment Najem oudar Oulmah. Police came to her house in the morning, broke down the door and arrested her on suspicion of distributing leaflets in support of the Polisario Front. She has never been seen again. Her children were left to fend for themselves. Magboula ment Boucharaya oud Mohamed Yadhif “disappeared” four years earlier. Security officers raided her house in Laayoune in the middle of the night in 1/1981. They searched the premises but found nothing. Nevertheless, they took Magboula ment Boucharaya away in a police van. For two months her family was able to take food and clean clothes to her in Laayoune prison. Then they were suddenly forbidden to do so, although no reason was given. They have heard nothing of Magboula ment Boucharaya since then. In 1991 more than 300 women and men who had “disappeared” for up to 16 years were released during a worldwide campaign against human rights violations in Morocco. Nevertheless, hundreds of people reported to have “disappeared” since the 1960s remain unaccounted for. The government denies any knowledge of them, just as it had for years denied knowledge of the 300-plus “disappeared” who were released in 1991.

10003. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 4: Women Activists. New York: Amnesty International, August 1995. In the Gulf state of Bahrain, women have increasingly been participating in “pro-democracy” demonstrations, calling on the government to reconvene the National Assembly, which was dissolved by Amiri decree in 1975, and to respect the country’s 1973 Constitution. They have also been protesting against the government’s handing response of the authorities and demanding the release of political detainees. As a result, they are finding out what the inside of Bahrain’s jails look like and some have reportedly been beaten or otherwise ill-treated by security officials. One woman, who joined a protest by women outside the Ministry of Justice building in 2/1995, described how the protesters were treated that day: “We were about 20 women coiling for our relatives to be released. The whole area was surrounded by police. They ordered us to leave the area but we refused. I was beaten and carried by six policemen and forced into a jeep, but I managed to jump out again. One woman had her clothes torn and her chest was exposed. Another woman was pregnant. They humiliated and insulted us.” Some Bahraini women have been singled out for arrest either because of their activities or because they are related to male activists. Zahra Salman Hilal and a 12-year-old girl, Ayat ‘Abd al-Jabber Salman, were rounded up in mass arrests in early 4/1995 and taken to the Juveniles Prison in Madinat ‘Issa. A few days later Zahra Salman Hilal went on hunger strike to demand the right to see her husband, who had been detained since 1/1995. She remained in prison without charge or trial until 29 May. Ayat ‘Abd al-Jabber Salman was released in mid-April. On 6 April 1995, several security forces surrounded the home of ‘Abd al-Amir Mansur al-Jamri, a prominent Shia Muslim religious scholar and member of the former National Assembly, in the village of Bani Jamra. He and 18 members of his family were placed under house arrest without charge, including his wife, Zahra Yusuf, three daughters, three sons and other young children. All were denied access to the outside world and had their telephone lines disconnected. On 15 April Shaikh ‘Abd al-Amir al-Jamri was transferred to an undisclosed location. There was no information on his fate or whereabouts until 9 May, when he was taken to al-Qa’a Prison in al-Manama. There, one of his daughters, ‘Afat, was brought to see him, allegedly in order to tell him that he would be sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. While in the prison, ‘Afat al-Jamri was reportedly beaten by women police officers. She was taken into custody herself later that day and remained held at a detention facility in Madinat ‘Issa until her release on 5 June. She is 31 years old and has two young children. Her father, Sheikh al-Jamri, remains held without charge or trial.

In Tunisia in the past few years, hundreds of women have been detained without charge or trial, harassed and ill-treated. Scores of them have been tortured, sexually abused and threatened with rape in the Ministry of the Interior and in police stations. Dozens have been detained as prisoners of conscience for peacefully exercising their right to freedom of expression, association and assembly, and many have been imprisoned after unfair trials. Some of the women cited in this report cannot be named for fear of further endangering their well-being and that of their families. Most have been targeted because of suspected links with al-Nahda, an unauthorized Islamist movement. However, other political activists have also been subjected to human rights violations.

A woman who was five months pregnant was arrested at her home in Gabes on 11/6/1992 and accused of carrying out political activities on behalf of the Tunisian Workers’ Communist Party (PCOT). Police said that while she was incommunicado detention in Gabes police station, she was partially undressed, beaten with sticks and threatened with rape and further violence if she did not talk about her political activities. One of the policemen reportedly told her: “We’ll bring out what you have in your womb.” She was forced to sign a police statement without knowing its contents. The next day she felt ill and seemed in danger of miscarriage, and was released. A few days later she was rearrested and interrogated while lying on the floor as she was too ill to stand up. On 11/18/1992 she was tried and sentenced to four months imprisonment for belonging to an unauthorized organization and collecting money without permission. Her lawyer requested a medical examination and an investigation into her allegations of ill-treatment, but these were denied. Although she was granted bail pending appeal, she continued to be detained until 1/11/1993, when the appeal took place. Her sentence was upheld, but she was released the following day by presidential pardon. No investigation was carried out by the authorities into the allegations of ill-treatment and those who ill-treated her were not brought to justice.

Women activists in Iraqi Kurdistan have continued to suffer gross violations of their rights since the area came under the control of Kurdish political parties in 10/1991. Some have been detained without charge or trial and subjected to torture and ill-treatment. During a demonstration in the city of Arbil in 8/1992 against the Turkish military bombardment of a Kurdish town in southeastern Turkey, Kurdish security forces shot into the peaceful crowd to disperse the protesters. Among the dead was the six-year-old daughter of Laila Ali Musa, who was herself held as a political prisoner. In prison, she told Amnesty International: “When the shooting started I was immediately hit. Then my daughter Kurdistan was killed as a bullet shot through her head... After the shooting they arrested a group of us and took us inside the Asayish [security forces] building.
They tortured me for about one and a half hours in one of the offices. They beat me on the bullet wound and on my back with a hosepipe."

Another woman, Paymam Sulaiman Hamid, who was also arrested after the demonstration, told Amnesty International: "They tied my hands behind my back and then suspended me from a height against the wall. I was beaten with a hosepipe. The torture lasted for about one and a half hours. I fainted three times and each time they poured water on me. They then burned me with cigarettes on my legs [scars on her legs were still visible at the time of the interview]. All the time I was blindfolded. Then they threatened to assault me sexually in front of my husband."

These two women, along with two other female and nine male detainees arrested at the same time, began a hunger-strike on 21/29/1992 demanding access to their families and a meeting with the investigating judge. This was granted on 12/1/1992 and on 11/11/1993 all were released without having been brought before a court. None of the security personnel involved in either the killing of the demonstrators or the torture of detainees has been brought to justice. None of the victims of torture or the families of those killed has been compensated.

In Iran, women who have peacefully opposed the government since the 1979 revolution have faced severe penalties. Several have been held as possible prisoners of conscience for many years in connection with their alleged activities for organizations such as the Tudeh Party and People's Fedaiyan Organization of Iran. Those suspected of political opposition in Iran are routinely tortured and ill-treated during interrogation. In 1988 thousands of political prisoners, many of whom were already serving prison sentences, were summarily executed. The mother of one of the victims wrote to Amnesty International; her experience mirrors that of many others. Her daughter was arrested in 1982 for alleged possession of leaflets issued by the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran (PMOI) and tried by an Islamic Revolutionary Court. For six years the mother was able to visit her daughter regularly in Evin Prison in Tehran. In 8/1988 the visits were suddenly stopped. In 11/1988 she was informed that her daughter had been executed. She has never been told where her daughter's body is buried. To this day the authorities have failed to account for the thousands killed in 1988. One former female prisoner told Amnesty International: "We were aware of the massacre of the men prisoners [in 1988 and 1989] and assumed that the Mojahedin women prisoners had also been executed. We discussed this among ourselves... We could not see the future clearly. We thought at that time that we were in a world of death. There was no contact with the world of the living."

Women political activists in Syria have also been jailed for their peaceful opposition to the government. Doha 'Ashur al-'Askari, for instance, has been in prison since mid-1993. Her trial was still in progress at the end of 1994, but there has been no news of her since. She was arrested for suspected membership of the Party for Communist Lebanon. She had been living in hiding since 1986 when she found out she was wanted by the authorities. Her daughter Kamiya has known nothing but prison life; she was born in Duma Women's Prison in Damascus a few months after her mother was detained.

In Egypt, women have been detained without charge for peaceful protests. On 3/24/1995 Warda Mahmoud and Nawwara Nagm, students at Cairo University and 'Ain Shams University respectively, were among dozens of people arrested after they had peacefully protested against Israel's participation in the International Trade Fair being held in Cairo. The two women were held at al-Qanatir al-Khayria Prison until 3 April, when they were released without charge.

The Israeli authorities have jailed women suspected of opposing the Israeli occupation of West Bank and the Gaza Strip or of being members of illegal organizations. Some of them have been ill-treated. 'Abir al-Wahaydi, a 23-year-old engineering student at Bir Zeit University on the occupied West Bank, was arrested in 6/1992 on suspicion of being involved with activities organized by Fateh, the main faction in the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and of planning to kill an Israeli settler. She was taken for interrogation to the General Security Service wing in Ramallah, where there are reportedly no separate facilities for women. Three days later she was transferred to Moscoobiyyah detention centre in Jerusalem. She testified in a written affidavit: "...I was taken to Moscoobiyyah for interrogation. They took me out to the courtyard on Friday after five days of no sleep with a sock on my head and my hands handcuffed. Above me there was a loudspeaker and it was very cold. I felt as if I would collapse from the sound coming out of the loudspeaker... The interrogation lasted for 14 days without letting me see a lawyer." Her interrogators repeatedly threatened her. She testified that they told her she would go mad and that they would kill her. They beat her with cigarettes on her legs [scars on her legs were still visible at the time of the interview]. All the time I was blindfolded. Then they threatened to assault me sexually in front of my husband."

After 17 days she was brought before a judge, having been forced to sign a statement that she alleged she had not read. For 52 days she was kept in solitary confinement and then transferred to Hasharon Prison. In 4/1994 she was sentenced to 17 years and four months' imprisonment. Two days after she was sentenced the Israeli authorities demolished her house. Her mother recounted: "They came in the morning... and said we should empty the house of all the people. They said someone who was wanted was in the house. We swore there was no one. They locked us into a room at our neighbor's... they started hitting the kids. At 12.30 they brought anti-tank rockets and started shooting the house with more than 16 rockets... The house was new. We'd saved for it for 26 years and only lived in it for 27 days. My daughter had never lived in it." The Israeli authorities told Amnesty International that they had investigated 'Abir al-Wahaydi's allegations of ill-treatment and found them to be false. They also said that when questioned about her treatment, she denied having any complaint. However, in the military court system in the Occupied Territories detainees are subjected to numerous improper pressures to plead guilty and enter a plea bargain. Defendants are reluctant to ask for an exclusion of their confessions if they were obtained under duress as their allegations of torture or ill-treatment are almost impossible to prove, and, if an application for such a ruling is unsuccessful, they are likely to receive substantially longer sentences.

Palestinian women have also reportedly suffered human rights violations in the areas under the jurisdiction of the newly established Palestinian Authority. Several have alleged that they were ill-treated in custody by Palestinian police officers. The new authorities have failed to conduct prompt, thorough and impartial investigations into their complaints.

In south Lebanon, at least seven women remain locked up in the Khiam detention centre, which was set up in 1985 by the South Lebanon Army (SLA) with Israeli's assistance and supervision. They are detained outside any legal framework and for years they had no access to the outside world; family visits were resumed in 1/1995 after a gap of eight years. All are believed to be Lebanese citizens; some are suspected of belonging to armed organizations opposing Israel and the SLA inside Lebanon; others may have been arrested to put pressure on their relatives. Among those held in Khiam is Suha Fawwaz Beshara, accused of trying to assassinate the commander of the SLA in 11/1988. She is reported to have been kept in solitary confinement almost continuously since her detention in late 1988. Like the other detainees in Khiam, she has never been charged or tried. Many detainees in Khiam have been tortured or ill-treated. Methods commonly reported include beatings all over the body, sometimes with an electric cable; electric shocks, often applied to the nipple; and threats, including of rape and sexual abuse.

In other parts of Lebanon, women activists have been gunned down while peacefully demonstrating or detained and ill-treated. In 9/1993 women were among nine people shot dead when the security forces opened fire on a peaceful demonstration protesting against the peace agreement between Israel and the PLO. The authorities have never revealed the results of the investigation they said they had opened into these killings. In 9/1994, three women—Huda Yamin, Lina Ghurayeb and Muna Shkayban—were detained and charged with security offences before a military court for distributing leaflets opposing the Syrian presence in Lebanon. All were allegedly tortured or ill-treated while held in the Ministry of Defence and may have been prisoners of conscience. Amnesty International is not aware of any investigation into the allegations of torture or ill-treatment. The three women were released on...

Other women in the region have had their basic human rights violated for exercising their rights as trade unionists to peaceful association and expression. In Morocco, for example, Khadija Benamer was sentenced to a year in prison in 3/1995 for joining her fellow workers in a peaceful sit-in at her workplace in Sidi Slimane. They had been on strike since 2/21/1995 and the sit-in was staged to call for Morocco's Labor laws and International labor rights to be respected. In the course of the protest, police arrested Khadija Benamer, the Secretary General of her factory's branch of the Moroccan Labour Union, and five others. Three of them, including Khadija Benamer, were charged under Article 288 of the Moroccan Penal Code, which allows for the imprisonment of people who organize or participate in a concerted withdrawal of labour. All three alleged they were ill-treated in police custody; they reportedly still bore marks of bruising on their faces and hands when they appeared in court. Khadija Benamer was also found guilty of offending the person of the King. She was reportedly accused of having said that her employer should be saluted rather than the King. She denied the charge. On 27 April Khadija Benamer was released on bail pending an appeal, which was due to be heard on 5/30/1995, but was postponed. [6]

10004. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 5: Women at Risk: 'Guilty By Association'. New York: Amnesty International, August 1995. A 35-year-old Tunisian woman, the mother of three children, was repeatedly arrested, tortured and ill-treated in 1991 and 1992. She had committed no crime. She was not a political activist. But she was the wife of a prominent member of al-Nabda, an unauthorized Islamist movement, and that was enough for the security forces. “After my husband left Tunisia, I had to report three times a week to the Ministry of the Interior, where I would be held for several hours at a time, often for a whole day. They asked me about my husband’s whereabouts, but did not believe me when I said I did not know where he was, and threatened me. Once in 8/1992 they kept me for a whole day; they undressed me in front of several male policemen, two policewomen and my brother. Another male al-Nabda member detained there was brought in the room and I was told that they would make him rape me. They stubbed cigarettes on my genitals whilst two policemen held my hands and a policewoman held my face. They suspended me by the hands, beat me all over, and broke my right arm.” Most of the hundreds of women related to Islamist opposition political activists who have been arrested in Tunisia since 1990 have never been charged; they were interrogated solely about their husbands’ activities and whereabouts. Those who have been tried have mostly been charged with illegally collecting money for the families of imprisoned Islamist political activists, and belonging to an illegal association (al-Nabda). The harassment of such women began after the government launched a crackdown against al-Nabda in late 1990. As the repression intensified in 1991, many activists went into hiding and later fled the country. As a result, the security forces focused on their female relatives in order to crack down on them. Wives of detained or exiled Islamist political activists have been put under extreme pressure to give evidence against security forces. "After my husband left Tunisia, I had to report three times a week to the Ministry of the Interior, where I would be held for several hours at a time, often for a whole day. They asked me about my husband’s whereabouts, but did not believe me when I said I did not know where he was, and threatened me. Once in 8/1992 they kept me for a whole day; they undressed me in front of several male policemen, two policewomen and my brother. Another male al-Nabda member detained there was brought in the room and I was told that they would make him rape me. They stubbed cigarettes on my genitals whilst two policemen held my hands and a policewoman held my face. They suspended me by the hands, beat me all over, and broke my right arm.” Most of the hundreds of women related to Islamist opposition political activists who have been arrested in Tunisia since 1990 have never been charged; they were interrogated solely about their husbands’ activities and whereabouts. Those who have been tried have mostly been charged with illegally collecting money for the families of imprisoned Islamist political activists, and belonging to an illegal association (al-Nabda). The harassment of such women began after the government launched a crackdown against al-Nabda in late 1990. As the repression intensified in 1991, many activists went into hiding and later fled the country. As a result, the security forces focused on their female relatives in order to crack down on them. Wives of detained or exiled Islamist political activists have been put under extreme pressure to give evidence against their husbands. Their homes have been regularly visited, especially at night, by the security forces, who sometimes enter by force. Many say they were threatened, pushed or hit. Some were subsequently repeatedly taken in for questioning at police stations, often having no time to make arrangements for the care of their children. Most of these women say they were verbally abused and threatened, but not physically ill-treated, although scores testified that they were beaten, undressed, sexually abused and threatened with rape in detention.

Aicha Dhaouadi, a secondary school teacher from Bizerte and mother of a four-year-old girl, was arrested in 11/1993 and questioned for several days about the whereabouts and political activities of her husband, an exiled supporter of al-Nabda, and about her contacts with the families of imprisoned or exiled al-Nabda supporters. She was then released on bail. At the beginning of 1994 she was tried and sentenced with five other women to two years and three months imprisonment on charges of maintaining a political party and collecting donations, charges often used against women and men suspected of having helped the families of imprisoned or exiled al-Nabda supporters financially. She remained on bail and at the beginning of 1995 her sentence was reduced on appeal to nine months’ imprisonment. On 5/19/1995 she was taken into custody and imprisoned in Bizerte.

Wives of Islamist activists sought by the authorities in Egypt face similar treatment. Many Moroccan nationals have been arrested and detained as substitute prisoners or hostages to force their husbands to give themselves up. Again, they are rarely charged with any offence. They are simply used as pawns, their human rights flouted with impunity. One such case is that of Hana ‘All Farrag, a 17-year-old student, who was arrested at her home in Minya in 7/1990 and interrogated about the whereabouts of her brother, Sayyid, who was wanted by the Egyptian authorities: “They took me to the police station and put me in a room. Three of them asked me where my brother was hiding. It must have been around midnight and I kept telling them I didn’t know where he was. The head of the State Security Intelligence told the others to suspend me and they obeyed. I was swinging upside-down from a bar under my knees and they hit the soles of my feet with a thick wooden stick, and kept repeating the same questions ‘Did you take him food? Did you go and see him? Where is he hiding?’ Afterwards we submitted a formal complaint of my detention and treatment, but it has never been investigated. My brother Sayyid was not wanted in connection with any offence, it was just the usual detention.”

The pattern is repeated in Syria. Wafa Fahmi ‘Abidat has been missing since 11/1986. A fourth-year dentistry student at the University of Damascus, she was 28 when she “disappeared” after her arrest. She was not apparently involved in any political organizations or activities; it appears that she was arrested solely because of her brother, Hani ‘Abidat, who had been detained a month earlier for alleged membership of Abu Nidal’s Fateh-Revolutionary Council, a Palestinian armed group. Wafa ‘Abidat’s family have spent years searching for her, making inquiries at every possible office. So far, they have received not a word of information. Miyaasser Jamil ‘Abd al-Ilsawi “disappeared” after leaving her home in Damascus to visit her husband in prison on 9/3/1985. Ten years later, her family have still received no information about her fate or whereabouts. Her mother told Amnesty International: “I ask every human being who has blood and feelings, sight, taste, speech and a country—I ask them, I appeal to them—i, Daniez Jamil ‘Abd al-Ilsawi, I demand my right to know where my daughter is…”

In Algeria female relatives of members of the security forces have been targeted by armed groups defining themselves as Islamic groups. For example, on 3/10/1995 the Groupe islamique armé (GIA), Armed Islamic Group, issued a statement in which it threatened to kill women members of the security forces or relatives of members of the security forces unless the authorities released all Islamist women prisoners. In the following week, nine women, including relatives of members of the security forces, were reported to have been murdered by the GIA. Among the victims was 15-year old Fatima Ghodbane, who was abducted from her school in Oued Djer, near Blida, by a group of armed men who slit her throat outside the school. The mothers, wives and sisters of thousands of men arrested or killed by the Algerian security forces have been traumatized. Some have seen their male relatives killed before their eyes; others are still searching for their relatives.

Women relatives of suspected Bahraini dissidents have faced another form of human rights violation—forcible exile from their country. In the early 1980s former political detainees—primarily Shi’a Muslims suspected of having links with Iran —and entire families were rounded up, stripped of their Bahraini passports or identity documents, and forced to board boats bound for Iran. Most had no knowledge of Iran or its language and no known relatives to stay with. In some cases the Bahraini authorities gave them false documents stating that they had been born in Bahrain. In recent years Bahraini nationals attempting to return home from abroad have also been forcibly expelled. The victims include the wives and families of political prisoners who had fled Bahrain to avoid harassment. Some of these women and children have been detained for up to a week at Bahrain’s International airport before being
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

forcibly expelled from Bahrain. No reasons for the expulsions or details of the legal basis for such measures are given, and there is no appeal procedure. As a result of these policies, several women and their families have been forced to travel around the region in search of temporary sanctuary. A few Bahraini women have been forcibly exiled because they themselves were suspected of opposition. Among them is Badita Hassan Yusuf, who is currently in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) with her four children; she had been arrested in Bahrain in 1982 on suspicion of membership of a prohibited organization linked to Iran. [=]

10005. Amnesty International. Women in the Middle East: Human Rights Under Attack: Part 5: Women at Risk: Under Attack By Law. New York: Amnesty International, August 1995. In several Middle Eastern countries women face imprisonment, cruel punishments and even death under laws which discriminate against women in many areas of life. They can be prosecuted for the clothes they wear or for the clothes they do not wear. They can be condemned to brutal physical retribution for their sexual behaviour. They can even be locked up for driving a car. In Saudi Arabia, dozens of women staged a symbolic protest for women's rights when they defied a die-facto ban on women drivers by driving a convoy of cars along one of Riyadh's main streets in 11/1990. They were stopped by police who detained 49 of them without charge. They were not released until male members of their families had signed an undertaking that the women would not drive again. Many of the women lost their jobs as a result of the demonstration. A week after this protest, the Ministry of the Interior introduced legislation formally banning female drivers.

In Yemen women and men face sentences of flogging and stoning to death for sexual offences. Stoning to death, which is prescribed by Yemen's Islamic Penal Code for hudoud offences such as adultery, has been used to execute dozens of women since 1979. For example, Mina Kolvat, a married woman, was reportedly stoned to death in Evin Prison on 2/1/1994 for having an affair with her cousin and planning the murder of her husband. Her cousin was executed by hanging. Iranian law states that a woman should be buried up to her chest and specifies the types of stone that should be used. Article 104 of the Penal Code, which refers to adultery, gives some indication of the cruel, inhuman and degrading nature of this form of punishment: "In the punishment of stoning to death, the stones should not be too large so that the person dies on being hit by one or two of them; they should not be so small either that they could not be defined as stones." Scores of women have reportedly been flogged annually in Iran in recent years for various offences, although details have been almost impossible to obtain. Amnesty International has been denied access to Iran to research human rights violations since 1979. Stringent restrictions on freedom of association inside the country have prevented the creation of local independent human rights organizations which could take up such cases and the authorities do not publish information about these issues.

In the United Arab Emirates, too, the laws provide for cruel, inhuman and degrading punishments for certain offences against the moral code. However, practice varies between the different emirates and sentences are sometimes commuted or overturned. In 1994, for instance, a pregnant foreign national, who was tried and convicted of adultery, was reportedly sentenced to death by stoning. The Court of Appeal overturned the sentence, imposing instead a nine-month prison term and 100 lashes to be administered 45 days after she gave birth. In another case, a woman and man were sentenced in 2/1995 to flogging and imprisonment for adultery. It is not known if these sentences were carried out.

In Yemen, women imprisoned for offences against the moral code are kept in jail indefinitely if they have no male relatives to go to or if their relatives disown them because of their offences. By contrast men imprisoned for the same offences are invariably released on completion of their sentence. The government policy of keeping women in prison indefinitely if they do not have male relatives to receive them is based on the perception that such women, if released, would commit further such offences. Scores of women imprisoned for offences against the moral code are believed to be currently held in Yemeni jails, most of them years after expiry of their prison terms. Some of them are held with their children.

In several Middle Eastern countries the clothes that women wear—or do not wear—can result in them being harassed, dismissed from their jobs, arrested and even flogged. In some cases women may have infringed the dress code for conscientious reasons—a non-violent expression of their beliefs. In Iran women risk arrest and flogging if they fail to obey the dress laws: the law provides for 74 lashes for such offences. In 7/1993 the Human Rights Committee, the body of experts which monitors implementation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Iran is a state party, noted with concern the "punishment and harassment of women who do not conform with a strict dress code" and recommended that active measures be taken to "enhance the status of women... and guarantee their equal rights and freedoms".

In Sudan women have been flogged for dressing in ways that infringe the military government's laws on public morality. A woman living in Omdurman was fined and sentenced to 35 lashes after being arrested in late 1991 because she was wearing trousers. She recalled: "I was stopped by the police who grabbed the whip and twisted it. Then two or three policemen grabbed me and tied my hands to my back. After I received 40 lashes ... I gave him a venomous look. He noticed and gave me another five lashes." Another woman, a student at Khartoum University, who was wearing a blouse and skirt, was stopped by a guard in 12/1993 and told to change her clothes. She refused and was punished by 25 lashes.

In Tunisia, on the other hand, the authorities have increasingly put pressure on women, especially students and those working in the public sector, to stop wearing the hijab as this is considered an indication that they belong to or sympathize with the illegal Islamist opposition movement. Many have been threatened with dismissal if they do not comply. A university student who was arrested three times in 1991 and 1992 was threatened with imprisonment if she did not stop wearing the hijab. She complied and was forced to sign at the police station three times a week until the end of 1994, when she left the country. Women wearing the hijab are also systematically stopped at prison gates and prevented from visiting relatives or leaving food for them.

[Caption: (1) Zahrâ' Habib Mansur al-Nasser, a 40-year-old housewife from the village of Awjam, Eastern Province, Saudi Arabia. She was arrested with her husband on 7/15/1989 at the checkpoint on the Saudi Arabian-Jordanian border. Police who searched them allegedly found a Shi'a prayer book and a photograph of the Ayatollah Khomeini. They were held in the Hudaitha check-point detention centre where Zahrâ' Habib Mansur al-Nasser reportedly died as a result of torture three days later.] [=]

[This study was conducted in 1983/84 with the assistance of a sabbatical leave from Wayne State University and a contract with the Arabic Community Center for Economic and Social Services (ACCESS) Dearborn, Michigan. The initial version of this was presented in MESA Annual Meetings, 11/1988. Some of the statistical figures have been presented in a lengthier article. (1991)]

It is often said that the married immigrant women in the Southend of Dearborn Michigan cannot get jobs because they do not have skills for an industrial society, including the knowledge of English. This is true to some extent, but they differ little from many of their husbands in this respect. The removal of production processes from the household has historically made it difficult for women to combine childbearing and domestic functions with employment, both in some highly urbanized areas of non-industrialized cultures and even more so in many industrialized cultures particularly those with basically capitalist economies (O'Kelly and Carney 1986). In the "Southend" of Dearborn, the site of this research, the male dominated nature of the auto industry is also responsible, while two additional factors affect the current employment position of women who have migrated into this Muslim working-class community. The first factor is the belief that women's traditional mentality of their husbands with its associated emphasis upon female modesty which is reinforced by Islamic values. The second factor is the new acceptance of welfare brought about by the combined auto recession on the early 1980s, which resulted in up to 40% unemployment in the community and economic pressures brought by many new immigrants.

The Southend of Dearborn has been a depot for Lebanese, Yemeni and Palestinian Muslims. It was founded when the local Lebanese community in Highland Park which was working in Ford's first auto company, moved to this region when Ford did in the 1920s. The neighborhood was primarily Eastern European and Italian until the 1960s when more and more Arabs came to the area and the Europeans began to move out. It has always had the atmosphere of a primarily close community with a dozen coffee houses, a mosque, numerous stores and bakeries. It is a community where people live close to each other, share and know each other's business. It has had some stormy periods when the city was determined to destroy it (See Aswad, 1974), but it remains today as a lively center for immigrants and a home for up to three generations. The Southend community expanded north and most of the immigrants who were part of the growing influx from the wars in South Lebanon and Beirut entered the new sister community which now exhibits 56 Arab shops in 6 blocks of Warren Ave. (Aswad 1991 b). Many of these recent immigrants from Lebanon have skills and higher educations. They are not the subject of this paper. [=]

10007. Aswad, Barbara C. How the 'Rich Peasant Mentality' and Welfare Affect Immigrant Arab Women and Employment Patterns in Michigan: Part 02: Relevant Studies Abroad. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's Series. Working Paper 1. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-13, 1991. pp. 2-5. Of the many relevant studies of women and work, we can mention several. Abu-lughod writing 30 years ago about migration from rural Egyptian villages into Cairo found a decrease in many wives' functions including a reduced work load, reduced social life and confinement to the neighborhood. She contrasted this to their husbands, whose work typically took them outside the neighborhood and brought them into association with a variety of men (1961). Joseph (1978) and Dorsky (1968) have emphasized the importance of neighborhoods among working-class women in Lebanon and Yemen. Myntti found a similar process occurring in Yemen among migrants that moved from Yemeni villages to Yemeni towns (1984), and certainly these processes have occurred in Dearborn.

In the lower class communities in Cairo, Rugh found women's employment was degrading for their husbands and threatened their masculinity. A husband should provide for his family or his self image would be damaged (1985:279). She found work for women was judged by how protected the work place was, how public the display of family need is, the status of the work, how much was earned and how much it interfered with her homework (1985). Mohsen found that husbands of lower middle class Egyptian working women resented their work and blamed women for many social problems such as juvenile delinquency, and in fact placed more restrictions on these women (1985). In Middle Eastern cities, their are also more chances for piece meal and part time jobs such sewing and cooking in the home, selling, and jobs which might interfere with housework as much as full time jobs in industrial societies. Davis reports even more options in towns where agricultural work is also available (1985). Even working as a cleaning woman in more affluent homes, a commonly regulated job in America, and one Chesley found common among the Alevi in the geccekondus of Turkey (1988) is difficult in Dearborn due to distances, lack of transportation, language barriers and, as Rugh notes in Cairo, it subjects women to the control of another household and protection of women, is felt to be endangered and is discourage. (1985). At the same time as these results were first presented, Cinar also reported that one of the reasons for women to subcontract work in their Turkish homes was the lack of permission by husbands for work outside. (1988).

In the last 15 years, a number of studies of female Turkish workers in Europe have been made, however, most were guest workers who worked in factories where they had been peasant mentality of their husbands with its associated emphasis upon female modesty which is reinforced by Islamic values. The second factor is the new acceptance of welfare brought about by the combined auto recession on the early 1980s, which resulted in up to 40% unemployment in the community and economic pressures brought by many new immigrants. The Southend of Dearborn has been a depot for Lebanese, Yemeni and Palestinian Muslims. It was founded when the local Lebanese community in Highland Park which was working in Ford's first auto company, moved to this region when Ford did in the 1920s. The neighborhood was primarily Eastern European and Italian until the 1960s when more and more Arabs came to the area and the Europeans began to move out. It has always had the atmosphere of a primarily close community with a dozen coffee houses, a mosque, numerous stores and bakeries. It is a community where people live close to each other, share and know each other's business. It has had some stormy periods when the city was determined to destroy it (See Aswad, 1974), but it remains today as a lively center for immigrants and a home for up to three generations. The Southend community expanded north and most of the immigrants who were part of the growing influx from the wars in South Lebanon and Beirut entered the new sister community which now exhibits 56 Arab shops in 6 blocks of Warren Ave. (Aswad 1991 b). Many of these recent immigrants from Lebanon have skills and higher educations. They are not the subject of this paper. [=] might be due to having fewer relatives around than in the village, although she seems to contradict herself since earlier she mentions that most Lebanese have many relatives in the community. She may be relating this to the decrease of relatives in the home itself. Allredge feels that the women have changed their attitudes towards daughters vis-à-vis sons, supporting daughters more, and uses the rather low percentage of 25% who wanted the same opportunities for daughters as sons to support her contention.

When we look at several studies of other early Arab immigrants to the US, we find that both Naff and Orfalea mention the employment and hard work of women in peddling, family stores and clothing factories in the East. Of course unlike auto industries, these factories primarily employed female laborers. (Naff 1985:175, 274-276; Orfalea 1988:76-79). Naff also reports cases of exploitation of daughters who sometimes gave up or delayed marriage and a family by working to help support or educate their brothers (1985:276). Doumato reports a case of a woman who had been indentured to owners of a New York garment factory at 12 years of age to pay for her passage, (1985:13). I am certain she wasn’t the only such girl.

The nature of the employment is very important. In the early Middle East, women often dominated some slash and burn societies, but as land became more restricted in their work, hired labor takes their place in the family. Women often dominated the family. Aswad (1971), and sometimes under dangerous conditions, since approximately 80 Chaldean shopkeepers have been shot during these years. They were constantly under the watch of male relatives. I feel that another factor affecting early Christian Lebanese women was their participation in the local silk industries in Lebanon. This was reported by Tannous (1954) and others. The Muslim communities in South Lebanon did not participate in this as much in Lebanon.

Thus, both Lebanese and Yemeni women came from villages with little employment history to a region of the male dominate auto industry. Cainkar’s recent study of Palestinian Muslim women in the Chicago area points to the important connection of political attitudes and women’s behavior, stressing that immigrant men didn’t want their wives to become too American or it would be considered disloyal. Outside employment was part of this consideration (1988). Likewise she found middle class women were more assimilated in relation to employment. In a study of Muslim values in America, Haddad and Lummis sampled different classes and occupations and found upper classes and the second generation more flexible about women working outside the home. (1985:108-110). [x]

10009. Aswad, Barbara C. How the ‘Rich Peasant Mentality’ and Women Affect Immigrant Arab Women’s Employment Patterns of Middle Eastern Women in Michigan: Part 5: The Rich Peasant Mentality and Its Relevance. G.E. von Grunebaum Center’s Series. Working Paper 1. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-13, 1991. pp. 8-13. Let us return to the concept of the rich peasant mentality, and why it occurred in the US. A rich peasant is generally defined as a peasant who manages a medium amount of land, has a surplus, and who does little physical labor himself on the land, and neither does his family members. Instead, he hires members of a poorer peasant category who have little land, or sharecroppers who have no land (Wolf 1968:290-1). Increasingly, they have begun to use machinery in the Middle East. (Esther Bosch felt that in a cooperative scheme, women often dominated some slash and burn societies, but as land pressure increased, the plough was introduced and ploughing becomes the first important male task in agriculture. Then, as the wealthy classes become more restricted in their work, hired labor takes their place in the fields. (1970).) They are often recognized in the West as kulaks, the Russian words for them. Endowed with a surplus, they serve as middlemen in the flow of trade and capital to poorer rural peasants in areas of peripheral capitalism such as Lebanon and Yemen (Dow 1973). This is also combined with political and often spiritual factions. Rich peasants generally have extended kin groupings, which they use in a generally corporate political and economic fashion. In the Middle East villages I found that they are more highly patrilineal, are more endogamous and have higher rates of polygamy and first cousin marriage on their fathers’ side than middle or poor peasants (Aswad 1971).

Middle peasants, on the other hand generally till their own plots with family labor, are more bilateral and less patrilineal, have smaller families, and less polygamy than rich peasants. An early study by Peters in a Lebanese Shia village demonstrates the more bilateral relations, that is relationships through both mothers and father’s descent groups, of middle peasants in marriage and landholding patterns (1963).

Poor peasants and sharecroppers with no land usually had nuclear families, are mobile and have no patrimony, have a very limited sense of partiality, virtually no polygamy and marry outside of their kin unit. Poor peasant and sharecropping families work primarily for richer peasants and large landowners, and their major alignment is to their patrons rather than extended kin.

Having lived in and studied a Muslim Arab village of rich peasants, I found that male attitudes towards agricultural and other manual labor is obviously to avoid it at all costs. I clearly remember one of our first conversations in which I asked them how many weeks they worked a year. At first they rather proudly said, “None.” When I protested that this was impossible, they thought and answered, “About 8.” My initial response was, “My God, these people will never give me a straight answer.” But as I sat there month after month and saw no male movement, I realized they were not lying. While they occasionally performed some political, managerial and curing functions, their estimate was not far off. They certainly did no manual labor, sometimes to their economic and certainly to their physical detriment. Many were overweight and there were numerous heart attacks among men in their forties. Leisure was definitely considered a reward.

Second only to their own delegation of labor for themselves, was their desire not to have their wives or daughters be seen in the fields laboring with men and for other persons. The symbolism of power and control over their women greatly affected men’s status and honor. Many times I was told that their wives “didn’t have to work”, even though, of course, the wives were working very hard processing food, washing clothes and caring for children. However, their definition of work meant employment for others outside the home. Women accepted this reduced labor requirement, and likewise looked down on agricultural work outside the home. A change did occur, however, when the boys went off to school in the cities, got urban jobs and often married urban girls, stranding their female cousins. Their sisters and cousins, not allowed to follow the same path, began to pick cotton with apprehension about their futures. Fathers were concerned, but as of last summer are still keeping them in the village and away from urban areas where the schools are.

Standards of morality vary according to the status of peasants. A striking example is revealed when a pregnant wife was murdered because her rich peasant husband suspected he was not the father, and this was accepted by the men of the patrilineage. At the same time a sharecropping father allowed his unwed pregnant daughter to have her baby, in the hope that a rich peasant, suspected of fathering the child, would marry her. In fact he did and the girl’s father got a job with his new son-in-law. Aligned with the pride of unemployed wives and daughters was the fact that women could have more time to produce and care for as many children as possible, for these status seekers used marriages and brideprices to cement power and economic alliances with as many men as possible. I have discussed this phenomenon elsewhere (Aswad 1971, 1981). Even though they have only one job rather than the two or poorer women, they were certainly secondary in terms of political activity to their husbands, and had less than Hegland reports among merchants’ wives in Iranian villages (1986). The middle peasants in the area emulated rich peasant behavior and if they obtained the wealth, as few did, they followed the rich peasant customs and morals. This rich peasant behavior, as we mentioned earlier is found cross-culturally and is associated with various ideologies.

I had another chance to observe a situation in which poorer peasants emulated middle and rich peasant styles when they were given land in a government reform project. They increased their number of children, continued to put their children to work, but tried to restrict their wives work, and they tried to rent tractors and workers to reduce their own load. In that case, these strategies worked for only one generation, since they had many children, and no additional land from the government. They had individual plots, no economic corporations and acted as individuals undercutting each other rather than developing patrilineal corporate lineages. Most were soon back to their previous positions if not worse, with the exception of a few who had gotten access to credit as individuals and who were primarily responsible for the others’ demise. The successful few totallyimitated the rich peasants, and their wives did not work in the fields. (Aswad 1981).

How does it relate to our study? All the women in the survey moved into a working class community composed primarily of unskilled auto workers and their families. The vast majority came from middle peasant backgrounds. The husbands earned salaries unheard of in the villages of Yemen and Lebanon. The women have been hindered in gaining employment in the US and thereby hindered in gaining control over resources by the attitudes of the auto companies and their husbands. The men couldn’t initially adopt the leisure habits of the rich peasants for themselves due to the nature of their unskilled wage labor jobs, but they could attain the attitudes for their wives. Heads of patrilineages have, however, built political bases similar to those in the Middle East. It should be added that while individual wage labor jobs make patrilineal corporate kin units less viable than joint rural land ownership, urban shop ownership such as that of the Chaldeans is more amenable and we find some persons sitting leisurely in the suburbs when successful. The recent Lebanese immigrants on Warren Avenue have also opened shops and practically monopolize the gas stations in the region, but most have not acquired enough wealth to become leisurely.

Entrance into an alien culture also increased the emphasis upon Islamic modesty and female segregation, particularly since the host culture encourages dating and permit premartial intercourse as part of the process of mate selection. Traditional Islamic concerns over female virginity before marriage required more vigilance and may result in early arranged marriages with consequent retardation of educational opportunity for girls. This further limits employment opportunities and emancipation. The rise of traditional Islamic values in the Middle East has added to these attitudes. The increased religiosity in the community is due both to infusion of immigrants and as an expression of solidarity against the antagonism felt in the US and Dearborn against Arabs and Islam.[=]

The Yemeni women in the survey all came from villages and small towns and have no education, and no job experiences. They do not drive and seldom venture from the Southend. Only one is employed and she teaches English to the others. All are from middle peasant background or have been recently urbanized. The few rich peasants live in a middle class city of Southfield 15 miles away and feel rather isolated. Most Yemeni women have come only in the last 15 years, most are fairly young and have few family member here from 4-10 compared to the 40-200 which the Lebanese listed.

50% expressed a strong desire to work and had a strong desire to learn English to do so. None except the teacher has ever been to school, 50% said their husbands would be strongly opposed to their working anywhere. The other half said their husbands would not mind at all and would welcome the money. Very importantly, in this last group, of those who would welcome work, half were on welfare. 80% said their husbands would be strongly opposed to their working in local factories. They themselves weren’t too anxious to work there either. None had ever been to the bank and all said that their husbands controlled the money in the house. They felt they are losing control of their patrilineal assets in Yemen as well through migration. All said their husbands made the major decisions.

The effect of religion can be seen in the fact that the majority indicated that their husbands used religion and religious authorities to control them. Half of them described themselves as not religious at all and 40% as very religious. Few attended the local mosque because of the high illiteracy rate, few read the Koran. Although there is a small women’s group, they are not as active as Lebanese women in their mosques. Women do veil when they attend the mosque, but seldom do so in the community which they view as their village. In Yemen they veiled when they went to town, but do not do so here when they leave the Southend which is seldom. Their dress is that of the villages.

There is a great sense of boredom among these Yemeni women. With their jobs confined to household chores and raising children visiting, watching videos and TV, and their restriction to the Southend, there seems to be a need for activity. As Hatem mentions, mothering in the extended family in the Middle East is not the exclusive occupation for women. Rather, women combine various jobs such as processing food, sewing, poultry raising etc. Thus, exclusive and intensive mothering is an alien activity to working class families. (1988). For the Yemeni who live in nuclear families, as most do, their is a positive side however, they feel some freedom from kinship pressures. They said they miss their mother and sisters, but not their mother-in-law. The neighborhood has replaced their kin and they exchange many services and visits. See Joseph 1978, Donley 1986.

Most Yemeni men are not active politically in local Dearborn or American issues, rather they are primarily involved in politics relating in Yemen. (Abraham 1983). Likewise their women are less involved, and perhaps due to the fact that they have few relatives here, seem to be cut off from Yemeni village politics also. 50% said they weren’t concerned about Middle East politics but all said their husbands were and they expressed concern about their husband’s anxieties. Only 10% of the women belong to any local Arab American Group.

The fact that there are several hundred Arab women from the local community signed up for English courses given as the local community center, ACCESS, demonstrates several factors. 1) They want to improve their skills, 2) They want to get out of the house to relieve boredom 3) It is an activity their husbands consider legitimate and it is in the community. 4) As welfare recipients, they may take classes which improve their hirability as part of the workfare regulations.

What of their attitudes toward their daughters? 60% of the Yemeni said they would permit their daughter to work if she went in work with other women. They also want them to get a good education, but they are concerned about dating in the high schools, and a number discussed the possibility of sending their teenagers back to Yemen until they marry, especially their daughters. All Yemeni women want their children to marry Muslims and 90% want them to marry Yemeni. The situation presents a mother with a paradox. The fear of scandal, which Nazuzal has so well described (1986) is placed on the mother’s head, and pressures her to cut her daughter’s education and marry her at 14 or 15 years of age. Daughters resistance to this and other controls are one of the primary problems brought to the Family Counseling Center of ACCESS. Of the 60 major cases brought during the first year, 43% concerned mothers having problems with their daughters discipline, 36% of the problems were between mothers and sons, 17% were between fathers and sons, and 4% between fathers and daughter. This also reflects the fact that the major clients were women (80%).[=] women's participation in employment, particularly in auto factories. It is stronger among the Yemeni than the Lebanese, less for women who work or have worked. Religious attitudes, dynamic and outspoken among the Yemeni, operate differently among the two communities, and are more limiting among the Yemeni.

Women's own attitudes show that the vast majority want to be employed, and would allow their daughters to be employed. Although they may not prefer factory work, some 20% of the Lebanese would allow their daughters to work at Ford. However, some women have experienced a need for more security for their daughters in an alien environment and may themselves limit their daughters potential by removing them from school, pressuring early marriages, or restricting their movement and opportunities for mobility and involvement by constant vigilance. There are numerous informal reports of girls and boys sneaking off in cars when they are supposed to be "in the library". Those who do enter a university, will be encouraged to attend a local university or college so they can live at home. At the university, the girls' brothers assume the surveillance duties, thus it is a place of limited freedom.

We also found that the current high unemployment rates have forced some men to accept welfare and their wives' employment in some form. Is welfare on the increase and what are the implications? Of the 1033 Arabs who visited the Family Counseling Center in 1986, 70% earned less than $10000 and 40% had some form of financial assistance. 188, nearly 20% of the clients were on ADC. In contrast, when Wasfi wrote in 1964, he found one person on AFDC in his sample. (1964). In my survey in 1971 of 200 randomly selected families, I found 13% of the general population, and thus there would seem to be a rise in this status. The reasons other than increased unemployment and the new influx of refugees can be attributed to the new access to the system through the community center staffed by Arabic speaking social workers and secretaries. There are numerous feminists among the younger generations.

Many women feel it is difficult to accept welfare. Two-thirds of the 40 in this study felt this way, and 45% of that group had husbands who were employed. On the other hand, all of the one-third who didn't feel shame had unemployed husbands, as we might expect. In relation to their husband's attitudes, close to 60% said the husband would find it hard to accept welfare and a third were unemployed. Of the other 40%, who felt their husbands do not have problems being on welfare, 83% are unemployed. Therefore, as one expects, among both male and female, more acceptance is found among the unemployed. One of the primary reasons given was the high cost of health insurance, which is paid for those on welfare.

What are the social changes accompanying this? Are we finding more female headed households? Is there a transfer of power over resources? Men in the community are frequently heard complaining that "America is a country for women". They indicated that welfare, custody and divorce favor women here. Although Michigan allows two parent households to receive welfare, it has traditionally been easier or more beneficial to get through separation or divorce, and establishing two residences. Since some may be also cheating, that is putting the wife on welfare while the man continues to work and in fact remains in a family unit, it is difficult to research, but the tentative questions may be drawn.

1. As with other ethnic groups, welfare is being used to supplement low income lives with the family remaining intact, and the money is often in fact still controlled by the husband.
2. It may discourage women from seeking employment. How a woman can contribute to the family income without leaving the area is an important factor affecting the shame of the husband.
3. It is being used to support widows.
4. It is encouraging women to learn English since in Michigan they must register for workfare, which involves either working, education or job retraining. English language classes are the option most satisfactory to the women and their husbands, partially because they are offered in the community. A new job retraining program offered through ACCESS may also involve increased numbers of women.
5. We found that when a husband is unemployed, he is more agreeable to women working and to welfare.[=]

10012. Aswad, Barbara C. How the 'Rich Peasant Mentality' and Welfare Affect Immigrant Arab Women and Employment Patterns in Michigan: Part 09: Conclusions. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's Series. Working Paper 1. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-13, 1991. pp. 21-22. We find that numerous issues operated against women's employment including lack of skills and education, fewer piecemeal or part time jobs than in the Middle East, the rich peasant mentality of husbands with it emphasis on increased female modesty and restricted environments, even though males were restricted in attaining rich peasant habits themselves; increasing Islamic values operating in host country which lacks promarital chastity values, restrictions and sometimes reduced educations placed by some of the mothers an daughters even though they accept concepts of employment and education for them; restrictions of the male dominant auto industry in contrast to family run business. Most women have also not accepted restrictions for themselves in relation to employment and paradoxically through high levels of unemployment and growing acceptance of welfare which provide language and job training programs, may suppress their husbands' marketable skill levels, a situation laying the basis for further gender change.

Differencesfoundbetween Lebanese and Yemeni attitudes are due to the background of immigrants, community and work experiences with the Lebanese presenting more liberal attitudes.[=] 10013. Awwad, Hanan. "Women's Literature in the Arab World", in Al-Fair Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 17, 1993. pp. 11, 15 Literary critics and readers alike question the slow growth of the Arab women's literary movement in comparison to that of men. Whereas some critics find a safe reasoning in the dominance of traditional and cultural values, others consider it purely a failure of gender responsibility, i.e., women alone are responsible for this perceived lack of progress.

Literature is art, an expression of natural talent, and has little to do with whether one is a man or woman.

The concept of "feminism," for example, is now part of our global dictionary, its meaning and interpretation both applauded and decried. In modern literary criticism, another relatively new concept has appeared: "so-called" women's or feminist literature. With many definitions and appearances in numerous critical reviews, this issue continues to attract controversy.

I use the term "so-called" women's literature because there has never been any clear-cut definition of Arab women's literature. Most Arab critics, men, define it with vague, nondescript terms. Yet they all seem to agree that it is written by women, or deals with women's issues including emancipation, oppression, and denial of basic rights. However, some of these critics' pronouncements should be weighted with care since they seem strangely unaware of the extent to which their male prejudices taint their appreciation of the writings of women.

The view that male dominance in highly traditional Arab culture is primarily responsible for the slow growth of women's literature holds great sway at first glance. To a large extent, such potent obstacles to self-expression among women did influence women's writing and imposed considerable restrictions on women's freedom within the framework of the extended family.

The wider Arab society holds its own views on such issues. Living under the inhibiting restrictions of an earlier age, women did not have an adequate opportunity to share in the benefits accrued from the inevitable socio-economic changes that have occurred in different parts of the Arab world.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Such a lifestyle may well have harbored the spirit of change, but at the same time, it undoubtedly goaded women into raising their voices against the rigidity of the social structure and fueled their demands for greater social freedom. Numerous Arab women writers have criticized the position of women in the Arab world. The position of woman, they claimed, has become unbearable, particularly in regard to such matters as education; virginity and marriage; the concept of honor and dignity; and individual freedom, all of which are weighed on unbalanced scales. They called for a rethinking of women's relationships with every form of male authority -- husbands, fathers, brothers and sons -- and for the creation of a new understanding between men and women in our society.

The voice of women was first heard in the latter part of the 19th century with the appearance of essays, stories, poetry and articles on "women's issues" in various magazines and newspapers in certain parts of the Arab world. Writers of note during this period were: Wardah al-Yaziji (1838-1924), Azynab Fawwaz (1850-1914), Labibah Hashim (1882-1952), Salma Sayegh (1889-1953), and Hana Kasbani Kurani (1870-1898). These women paved the way for the next generation of women writers, allowing their successors to take part in the development of the women's literary movement.

It should be noted that journalism played an important role in popularizing these women. Since the early part of this century, other women writers have emerged, displaying even greater resolve and courage in raising and discussing women's issues. Among these authors were Bvathitat al-Badiyah (1886-1918) and Mayy Ziyadah (1886-1941).

The articles of al-Badiyah began to appear in Al-Jaridah newspaper in Cairo as early as 1907. In 1911, she published her most widely known book, entitled "Nisa'yat" (Feminist Essays), a collection of several articles about prominent women in the Middle East. Her work is regarded by many as a landmark in Arab literature.

Ziyadah in particular admired the book, and as a result, wrote a critical study of the life and works of al-Badiyah. In her personal letters to al-Badiyah, Ziyadah advocates encouragement and support to al-Badiyah's defense of women's rights. In one of her letters she writes:

"The days pass and we [women] are still in an unspoken state of confusion. Male struggles in an economic war, he busies himself with many undertakings. When he wants to write literature, he does not reach the level of women's sentiments, for he writes from the viewpoint of his egotistical thinking and hardheartedness, whereas the woman enlivens her mind, emotions and passions."

She then calls upon al-Badiyah to combine her efforts with those of others in attempting to rescue this generation from "perplexity and hesitation," and asks her to help liberate women by making them aware of their rights and responsibilities.

The writings of Zihadah, herself, during this period are considered to be an important contribution to women's literature because of their ringing endorsement of the emancipation of women.

Born in Nazareth of a Lebanese father and Palestinian mother in 1886, she lived for some time in Cairo. Then in 1914, at the age of 28, her home became a literary salon, some of the most prominent writers of the time, including Taha Hussein, Lutfi al-Sayyid, Mustafa Abd al-Raziq, Mansur Fahmi, Khalil Mutran and others, were frequent visitors to her salon.

Ziyadah had a great influence on the literary life of the times due to her charm and intelligence and her charismatic personality. Her articles were in such demand by the readers of the Egyptian Al-Ahram daily newspaper that they dominated its front pages. She is the author of a number of books that include "Equality," in which she calls for a society based on equality and justice with the full participation of women.

Ziyadah personified the cause of the Arab woman, analyzing the various significant factors in their lives, such as rights and obligations. Her major emphasis is given to the biological and social problems related to the nature of women. In a letter to the renowned Lebanese writer Khalil Gibran, she wrote:

"I basically share with you some opinions about women's liberation. Like many, a woman should have her own choice of spouse from among young people, according to her own desire and taste and without coercion from any quarter."

Her understanding of the role of women appears more clearly in a letter to the writer Lutfi al-Sayyid concerning the memorial ceremony on the 40th day after the death of Fathi Zaghlul Pasha. In this letter she blames him for not extending invitations to women:

"It is strange that you did not invite women to such an important meeting, which might have a great impact on their way of life, open their minds to the importance of education, and teach them about the greatness of their fatherland and its noble personalities, whereas you do allow them to frequent the opera house."

The women writers of this era wrote in a number of literary forms: articles, essays, anthologies of poetry, and short stories. The output of short stories and novels was not abundant. It appears that most women writers of that day thought it best to deal with specific non-fictional subjects, concentrating mainly on educational and moral issues and confining themselves to traditional social commentary, for which fiction is not the best medium.

Up to the end of WWII, most works by Arab women were dominated by the sad and melancholy characteristics which reflected women's feelings within the context of their subjugation to the prevailing traditional, civic and religious codes. But paradoxically enough, female writers at the time displayed a genuine respect for tradition, coupled with a respect for emancipation.

Such issues are reflected in the work of Widad Sakakini, "Peoples Mirrors," written in Cairo in 1947. Sakakini was a writer who, through her stories, analyzed social events essentially from a feminist standpoint. She may be regarded as a defender of women's rights, but not a strenuous one. The majority of women writers focused mainly on the emotional aspects of women's problems. They did not discuss in depth any other matters related to an individual woman's political, social, or intellectual aspirations, nor did they advocate any real fundamental changes in her life.

Above all, writers such as Ziyadah, Bahithat, al-Badiyah, and Fawwaz seemed to be very much aware of the obstacles they had to overcome and the struggle they had been forced to wage in their attempts to assert the needs and rights of women. These obstacles include social and religious pressures, as well as women's economic and political powerlessness. All these matters were further complicated by the long and hated domination of the Ottoman empire and later by theunsettling impact of Western imperialism.

Imperialism oppressed many parts of the Arab world and its removal demanded continued struggle. It directly dominated the men, and as Qasim Amin states in his 1980 book, "Women's Liberation: "In the East, we find the woman is in man's bondage and the man is in the government's bondage."

"When the women enjoy their personal freedom, the men enjoy their political freedom. The two cases are well-intertwoven."

At the same time, Amin stresses that man has monopolized all rights, leaving nothing for the woman but what the master throws to his animal. The woman has been separated from the means of production and left without any economic independence. Amin goes further and draws a parallel between the women's condition of lagging behind and the dominance of despotic and military regimes.

The spread and influence of imperialism throughout the Arab world preoccupied the people of the Middle East, both in their resistance to its influence and in their struggle for respective freedoms. It led the way to national revolutions in Egypt, Algeria and Palestine. In turn, these countries witnessed national independence heralding dramatic changes of a political, social and economic nature.

The women's literary movement drew momentum from this radicalization of their environment, and drew apace under the impact of Western culture and the development of certain social and educational institutions. It thereby became possible for women to wield greater influence in many parts of the Arab world.

Certain Arab countries succeeded in gaining their sovereignty while others experienced a new form of occupation. Lebanon nurtured a new intellectual openness, while the Revolution of 1952 in Egypt generated radical social change, whose influence was felt not only in Egypt but also in the surrounding Arab countries. The principles and events of these two national movements, among others, affected the hearts and minds of the inhabitants, especially women.

Palestine, with its particularly rich literary past, was to know foreign invasion and military occupation. The calamity of Israel's establishment in 1948 carried great impact upon all aspects of national and cultural life, sweeping up in its wake the struggle of women and giving fresh material to a new generation of writers.

During the late '40s and into the '50s, many women writers appeared in the Arab world. One of them was the Lebanese writer Layla Ba'albaki, author of "I Live" and "A Spaceship of Tenderness to the Moon." Ba'albaki was strongly critical of Arab social and religious traditions. She portrayed the Arab woman as a weak, conservative creature who could not rise above her role as wife and mother. Ba'albaki wrote openly of sexual politics and virginity.

In 1964, she faced charges of public immorality, and all her books in Lebanon were confiscated. This was the first case of its kind in Lebanon. Subsequently the case was dismissed, however, and her books returned to circulation.

Several other women writers emerged in this period: Collette Chouri of Syria; Lebanese writers Nur Salman, Layla Usayan and Emilie Nasrallah; and Egyptian writers Nawal Sa-adawi and Ghada al-Samman, to name a few. Although their works touch upon the relationship between men and women - portrayed as oppressor and oppressed - some of her earlier works lacked depth.

Ghada al-Samman is a prolific writer with a long list of short stories, articles and novels, all of a high standard. In her novel "Departure from Ancient Ports," she expresses her views on the Arab defeat of 1967 and the Palestinian revolution. Her later novels: "Beirut 75" and "Nightmares of Beirut," define al-Samman as a writer on broad issues.

Critic Ghali shukri admits that in his early critical study, "The Sexual Crisis in Arab Fiction," he deliberately avoided studying al-Samman's writings because he felt that she did not attain her full potential, whereas all the others had reached their peak, including Ba'albaki. "They could not present us with any new revelations... even if they wrote a thousand more pages," wrote Shukri.

However, he emphasizes the distinctive nature of al-Samman's later works, stating that she had "broken away from the association of female authors whose writings are so thematically similar that it is difficult to distinguish one from the other." According to Shukri, the reason for this unfortunate categorization is a lack of experience and awareness, not talent.

Shukri views women's literature as that which is written by modern women with women's issues as their focal point. He described it as "separatist" and created out of social pressure.

On the other hand, Muhi ad-Din ascribes women's literature as promoting rebellion against home, society, school, religion and other pillars of tradition. He considers it "individualist literature."

Literary critic Afif Farraj sees no need to distinguish between one woman writer and another, but rather to distinguish between a female and male writer.

Finally, the Iraqi poet Abdel Wahhab Al-Bayyati commended in 1980:

"I don't agree with this difference and discrimination, because it is derived from the narrow vision of Arab writers. I view with sorrow the fact that it has forced women to write about their social oppression and call for sexual revolt as part of their expression of individual freedom.

But how can we expect these women writers to escape the numerous straitjackets that bind them, be it the label "woman's literature," or male dominance and conservative tradition? The demeaning view held by some is reflected in this passage by al-Samman:

"He screamed at me. 'Your head was not made to think, but to wait for me in my bed. Go there and wait for me.' So I carried my small head and left, and he came in with his big body to begin brainwashing me once more."[=

10014. Badawi, Jamal A.; Ahmad, Anis [preface]. The Status of Women in Islam: Part 1: Preface. [Reprint of Muslim Student Association of United States & Canada, P.O. Box 38, Plainfield, IN 46168.] Riyadh: Islamic Dawah Committee, World Assembly of Muslim Youth (WAMY) [POBox 10845, Riyadh 11443], April 1980. Family, society and ultimately the whole of mankind is treated by Islam on an ethical basis. Differentiation in sex is neither a credit nor a drawback for the sexes. Therefore, when we talk about status of woman in Islam it should not lead us to think that Islam has no specific guidelines, limitations, responsibilities and obligations for men. What makes one valuable and respectable in the eyes of Allah, the Creator of mankind and the universe, is neither one's prosperity, position, intelligence, physical strength nor beauty, but only one's Allah-consciousness and awareness (taqwa). However, since in the Western culture and in cultures influenced by it, there exists a disparity between men and women there is more need for stating Islam's position on important issues in a clear way. Dr. Jamal Badawi's essay, The Status of Women in Islam, was originally published in our quarterly journal, Al-Ithihad, Vol. 8, No. 2, Sha'ban 1391/Sept 1971. Since then it has been one of our most-demanded publications. We thank Br. Jamal for permitting us to reprint his essay. We hope it will clarify many of the misconceptions. [Jumada al Thani 1400/April 1980] [Anis Ahmad, Director, Dept. of Education and Training, Muslim Student Association of United States & Canada, P.O. Box 38, Plainfield, IN 46168 USA.][=]

10015. Badawi, Jamal A. The Status of Women in Islam: Part 2: Introduction. [Reprint of Muslim Student Association of United States & Canada, P.O. Box 38, Plainfield, IN 46168.] Riyadh: Islamic Dawah Committee, World Assembly of Muslim Youth (WAMY) [POBox 10845, Riyadh 11443], April 1980. The status of women in society is neither a new nor is it a fully settled one. The position of Islam on this issue has been among the subjects presented to the Western reader with the best objectivity. This paper is intended to provide a brief and authentic exposition of what Islam stands for in this regard. The teachings of Islam are based essentially on the Quran (God's revelation) and Hadeeth (hadith) (elaborations by Prophet Muhammad). The Quran and the Hadeeth, properly and unbiasedly understood, provide the basic source of authentication for any position or view which is attributed to Islam. The paper starts with a brief survey of the status of women in the pre-Islamic era. It then focuses on these major questions: What is the position of Islam regarding the status of woman in society? How similar or different is that position from "the spirit of the time," which was dominant when Islam was revealed? How would this compare with the "rights" which were finally gained by woman in recent decades? [=]

10016. Badawi, Jamal A. The Status of Women in Islam: Part 3: Historical Perspectives. [Reprint of Muslim Student Association of United States & Canada, P.O. Box 38, Plainfield, IN 46168.] Riyadh: Islamic Dawah Committee, World Assembly of Muslim Youth (WAMY) [POBox 10845, Riyadh 11443], April 1980. One major objective of this paper is to provide a fair evaluation of what Islam contributed (or failed to contribute) toward the restoration of woman's dignity and rights. In order to achieve this objective, it may be useful to review briefly how women were treated in general in previous civilizations and religions, especially those which preceded Islam (Pre-610 CE).CE throughout this paper stands for Christian Era (AD) Part of the information provided here, however, describes the status of woman as late as the nineteenth century, more than two centuries after Islam.

Women in Ancient Civilization: Describing the status of the Indian woman, Encyclopedia Britannica states: "In India, subjection was a cardinal principle. Day and night must women be held by their protectors in a state of dependence says Manu. The rule of inheritance was agraic, that is descent traced through males to the exclusion of females." [Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed., 1911, Vol. 28. p. 782] In Hindu scriptures, the description of a good wife is as follows: "a woman whose mind, speech and body are kept in subjection, acquires high renown in
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

15

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

this world, and, in the next, the same abode with her husband.” [In Mace, David and Vera. Marriage East and West. Dolphin Books, Doubleday & Co., Inc., NY, 1960.] In Athens, women were not better off than either Indian or the Roman women. “Athenian women were always minors, subject to some male - to their father, to their brother, or to some of their male kin.” [Allen, E.A., History of Civilization, Vol. 3, p. 444.] Her consent in marriage was not generally thought to be necessary and “she was obliged to submit to the wishes of her parent, and receive from them her husband and her lord, even though he were a stranger to her.” [Ibid., p. 443.] A Roman wife was described by an historian as: “a babe, a minor, a ward, a person incapable of doing or acting anything according to her own individual taste, a person continually under the tutelage and guardianship of her husband.” [Ibid., p. 550.] In the Encyclopedia Britannica, we find a summary of the legal status of women in the Roman civilization: “In Roman Law a woman was even in historic times completely dependent. If married she and her property passed into the power of her husband . . . . the wife was the purchased property of her husband, and like a slave acquired only for his benefit. A woman could not exercise any civil or public office . . . . could not be a witness, surety, tutor, or curator; she could not adopt or be adopted, or make will or contract.” [Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed., 1911, op. cit., Vol. 28, p. 782.] Among the Scandinavian races women were: “under perpetual tutelage, whether married or unmarried. As late as the Code of Christian V, at the end of the 17th Century, it was enacted that if a woman married without the consent of her tutor he might have, if he wished, administration and usufruct of her goods during her life.” [Ibid., p. 783.] According to the English Common Law: “. . . all real property which a wife held at the time of a marriage became a possession of her husband. He was entitled to the rent from the land and to any profit which might be made from operating the estate during the joint life of the spouses. As time passed, the English courts devised means to forbid a husband’s transferring real property without the consent of his wife, but he still retained the right to manage it and to receive the money which it produced. As to a wife’s personal property, the husband’s power was complete. He had the right to spend it as he saw fit.” [Encyclopedia Americana International (Edition), vol. 29, p. 108.]

Only by the late nineteenth Century did the situation start to improve. “By a series of acts starting with the Married Women’s Property Act in 1870, amended in 1882 and 1887, married women achieved the right to own property and to enter contracts on a par with spinsters, widows, and divorcées.” [Encyclopedia Britannica, 1968, Vol. 23., p. 624.] As late as the Nineteenth Century an authority in ancient law, Sir Henry Maine, wrote: “No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred upon them by the Middle Roman Law.” [Quoted in Mace, Marriage East and West, op. cit., p. 81.] In his essay, The Subjection of Women, John Stuart Mill wrote: “We are continually told that civilization and Christianity have restored to the woman her just rights. Meanwhile the wife is the actual bondservant of her husband; no less so, as far as the legal obligation goes, than slaves commonly so called.” [Ibid., pp. 82-83.]

Before moving on to the Quranic decrees concerning the status of woman, a few Biblical decrees may shed more light on the subject, thus your own nature, and has given you from your mates, children and grandchildren, and has made provision of good things for you. Is it then in vanity that they believe and in the grace of God that they disbelieve? (Quran 16:72) The rest of this paper outlines the position of Islam regarding the status of woman in society from its various aspects - spiritually, socially, economically and politically.

(1) The Spiritual Aspect: The Quran provides clear-cut evidence that woman is completely equated with man in the sight of God in terms of her rights and responsibilities. The Quran states: “Every soul will be (held) in pledge for its deeds” (Quran 74:38). It also states: “. . . So their Lord accepted their prayers, (saying): I will not suffer to be lost the work of any of you whether male or female. You proceed one from another.” (Quran 3:195). “Whoever works righteousness, man or woman, and has faith, verily to him will We give a new life that is good and pure, and We will bestow on such their reward according to the their actions.” (Quran 16:97, see also 4:124.) Woman according to the Quran is not

The position of the Christian Church until recent centuries seems to have been influenced by both the Mosaic Law and by the streams of thought that were dominant in its contemporary cultures. In their book, Marriage East and West, David and Vera Mace wrote: “Let no one suppose, either, that our Christian heritage is free of such slighting subjections of women. It would be hard to find anywhere a collection of more degrading references to the female sex than the early Church Fathers provide. Lecky, the famous historian, speaks of (these fierce incentives which form so conspicuous and so grotesque a portion of the writing of the Fathers . . . woman was represented as the door of hell, as the mother of all human ills. She should be ashamed at the very thought that she is a woman. She should live in continual penance on account of the curses she has brought upon the world. She should be ashamed of her dress, for it is the memorial of her fall. She should be especially ashamed of her beauty, for it is the most potent instrument of the devil). One of the most scathing of these attacks on woman is that of Tertullian: Do you know that you are each an Eve? The sentence of God on this sex of yours lives in this age: the guilt must of necessity live too. You are the devil’s gateway: you are the unsealer of that forbidden tree; you are the first deserters of the divine law; you are she who persuades him whom the devil was not valiant enough to attack. You destroyed so easily God's image, man. On account of your desert - that is death - even the Son of God had to die. Not only did the church affirm the inferior status of woman, it deprived her of legal rights she had previously enjoyed.” [Mace, Marriage East and West, op. cit., pp. 80-81.] blamed for Adam's first mistake. Both were jointly wrong in their disobedience to God, both repented, and both were forgiven. (Quran 2:36, 7:20-24). In one verse in fact (20:121), Adam specifically, was blamed. In terms of religious obligations, such as the Daily Prayers, Fasting, Poor- due, and Pilgrimage, woman is no different from man. In some cases indeed, woman has certain advantages over man. For example, the woman is exempted from the daily prayers and from fasting during her menstrual periods and forty days after childbirth. She is also exempted from fasting during her pregnancy and when she is nursing her baby if there is any threat to her health or her baby's. If the missed fasting is obligatory (during the month of Ramadan), she can make up for the missed days whenever she can. She does not have to make up for the prayers missed for any of the above reasons. Although women can and did go into the mosque during the days of the prophet and thereafter attendance at the Friday congregational prayers is optional for them while it is mandatory for men (on Friday). This is clearly a tender touch of the Islamic teachings for they are considerate of the fact that a woman may be nursing her baby or caring for him, and thus may be unable to go out to the mosque at the time of the prayers. They also take into account the physiological and psychological changes associated with her natural female function.

(2) The Social Aspect

(a) As a child and an adolescent: Despite the social acceptance of female infanticide among some Arabian tribes, the Quran forbade this custom, and considered it a crime like any other murder: "And when the female (infant) is buried alive - is questioned, for what crime she was killed." (Quran 81:8) Criticizing the attitudes of such parents who reject their female children, the Quran states: "When news is brought to one of them, of (the Birth of) a female (child), his face darkens and he is filled with inward grief! With shame does he hide himself from his people because of the bad news he has had! Shall he retain her on (sufferance) and contempt, or bury her in the dust? Ah! What an evil (choice) they decide on?" (Quran 16: 58-59). Far from saving the girl's life so that she may later suffer injustice and inequality, Islam requires kind and just treatment for her. Among the sayings of Prophet Muhammad (P.) in this regard are the following: "Whosoever has a daughter and he does not bury her alive, does not insult her, and does not favor his son over her, God will enter him into Paradise." (Ibn Hanbal, No. 1570). "Whosoever supports two daughters till they mature, he and I will come in the court of the reservation as this [and he pointed with his two fingers held together]." A similar Hadith deals in like manner with one who supports two sisters. (Ibn-Hanbal, No. 2104). The right of females to seek knowledge is not different from that of males. Prophet Muhammad (P.) said: "Seeking knowledge is mandatory for every Muslim." (Al-Bayhaqi). Muslim as used here including both males and females. [Some less authentic versions add "male and female." The meaning, however, is sound etymologically even as it is consistent with the over-all nature of Islamic duties in applying equally to males and females unless special exemptions are specified.]

(b) As a wife: The Quran clearly indicates that marriage is sharing between the two halves of the society, and that its objectives, beside perpetuating human life, are emotional well-being and spiritual harmony. Its bases are love and mercy. Among the most impressive verses in the Quran about marriage is the following: "And among-His signs is this: That He created mates for you from yourselves that you may find rest, peace of mind in them, and He ordained between you love in kindness and retain them not for injury so that you transgress (the limits)." (Quran 4:19). (See also Quran 2:229 and 33:49).

(c) As a mother: Islam considered kindness to parents next to the worship of God. "And we have enjoined upon man (to be good) to his parents: His mother bears him in weakness upon weakness. . . ." (Quran 17:23). A man came to Prophet Muhammad (P.) asking: "O Messenger of God, who among the people is the most worthy of my good company? The Prophet (P.) said, Your mother. The man said then who else: The Prophet (P.) said, Your mother. The man asked, Then who else? Only then did the Prophet (P.) say, Your father." (Al-Bukhan...
...and Muslim). A famous saying of The Prophet is "Paradise is at the feet of mothers." (In Al'Nisa'I, Ibn-Majah, Ahmad). "It is the generous (in character) who is good to women, and it is the wicked who insults them."

(3) The Economic Aspect: Islam decreed a right of which woman was deprived both before Islam and after it (even as late as this century), [For example, it was not until 1938 that the French Law was unended so as to recognize the ability of women to own property. However, it was still required to secure her husband's permission before she could dispense with her private property. See for example Al-Sibaai's op cit., pp. 31-37.] the right of independent ownership. According to Islamic Law, woman's right to her money, real estate, or other properties is fully acknowledged. This right undergoes no change whenever there is a necessity for it, especially in positions which fit her nature and in which society needs her most. Examples of these professions are nursing, teaching (especially for children), and medicine. Moreover, there is no restriction on benefiting from woman's exceptional talent in any field. Even for the position of a judge, where there may be a tendency to doubt the woman's fitness for the post due to her more emotional nature, we find early Muslim scholars such as Abu-Hanifa and Al-Tabary holding that nothing wrong with it. In addition, Islam restored to woman the right of inheritance, after she herself was an object of inheritance in some cultures. Her share is completely hers and no one can make any claim on it, including her father and her husband. "Unto men (of the family) belongs a share of that which parents and near kindred leave, and unto woman a share of that which parents and near kindred leave, whether it be a little or much - a determinate share." (Quran 4:7). Her share in most cases is one-half the man's share, with no implication that she is worth half a man! It would seem grossly inconsistent after the overwhelming evidence of woman's equitable treatment in Islam, which was discussed in the preceding pages, to make such an inference. This variation in inheritance rights is the position of various religions and cultures on the issue under investigation. Part of this exposition extends to cover the general trend as to recognize the ability of women to contract. A married woman, in the Quran, one Hadeeth of the Prophet is interpreted to make woman ineligible for the position of head of state. The Hadeeth referred to is roughly translated: "A people will not prosper if they let a woman be their leader." This limitation, however, has nothing to do with the dignity of woman or with her rights. It is rather, related to the natural differences in the biological and psychological make-up of men and women. According to Islam, the head of the state is no mere figurehead. He leads people in the prayers, especially on Fridays and festivities; he is continuously engaged in the process of decision-making pertaining to the security and well-being of his people. This demanding position, or any similar one, such as the Commander of the Army, is generally inconsistent with the physiological and psychological make-up of woman in general. It is a medical fact that during their monthly periods and during their pregnancies, women undergo various physiological and psychological changes. Such changes may occur during an emergency situation, thus affecting her decision, without considering the excessive strain which is produced. Moreover, some decisions require a maximum of rationality and a minimum of emotionality - a requirement which does not coincide with the instinctive nature of women. Even in modern times, and in the most developed countries, it is rare to find a woman in the position of a head of state acting as more than a figurehead, a woman commander of the armed services, or even a proportionate number of women representatives in parlaments, or similar bodies. One can possibly ascribe this to backwardness of various nations or to any constitutional limitation on woman's right to be in such a position as a head of state or as a member of the parliament. It is more logical to explain the present situation in terms of the natured and indisputable differences between man and woman, a difference which does not imply any "supremacy" of one over the other. The difference implies rather the "complementary" roles of both the sexes in life, [=] during the present era was not achieved due to the kindness of men or due to natural progress. It was rather achieved through a long struggle and sacrifice on women's part and only when society needed her contribution and work, more especially during the two world wars, and due to the escalation of technological change. In the case of Islam such compassionate and dignified status was decreed, not because it reflects the environment of the seventh century, nor under the threat or pressure of women and their organizations, but rather because of its intrinsic truthfulness. If this indicates anything, it would demonstrate the divine origin of the Quran and the truthfulness of the message of Islam, which, unlike human philosophies and ideologies, was far from proceeding from its human environment, a message which established such humane principles as neither grew obsolete during the course of time and after these many centuries, nor can become obsolete in the future. After all, this is the message of the All-Wise and All-Knowing God whose wisdom and knowledge are far beyond the ultimate in human thought and progress. [="" 10019. Badawi, Jamal A. The Status of Women in Islam: Part 6: Bibliography. [Reprint of Muslim Student Association of United States & Canada, P.O. Box 38, Plainfield, IN 46168.] Riyadh: Islamic Dawah Committee, World Assembly of Muslim Youth (WAMY) [POBox 10845, Riyadh 11443], April 1980. (1) The Holy Quran: Translation of verses is the Occupation”; and Women in Black is not an organization with a hierarchy or a formal structure, but is only the name given to the protest vigils throughout Israel and in other countries.

The women who started the Women in Black vigil in Jerusalem had a clear political commitment to finding a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict based on Israeli recognition of the PLO and on the creation of an independent Palestinian state in all of the territories occupied by Israel since 1967. However, they recognized the political importance of encouraging the vigil’s growth by allowing women from the broadest political spectrum to feel comfortable standing side by side.

This goal was achieved in the original slogan, “End the Occupation.”

There were intermittent attempts to add to this slogan over the years. The method for gauging women’s reactions to the suggested changes was to simply “do a round” and ask each woman to present her view. If there were more than one or two objections, the suggestion was dropped.

The many hundreds of women who have taken part in the Jerusalem vigil over the years have all helped in contributing to the mistaken image of Women in Black as an organized political group. In reality, the success of this vigil was due to a core of about 30 women whose commitment to standing in protest was paramount - not one of them would make an avoidable appointment for Fridays at one o’clock, the “sacred” hour. These 30 or so women were all active in other feminist, human rights, or anti-occupation organizations.

Another hundred or so women came to the vigil on a less regular basis. For most of these women, the Women in Black vigil was their sole political activity (apart, perhaps, from the occasional Peace Now demonstration). At its height, these women formed the majority of the vigil, but never showed much interest in taking part in discussions or decisions regarding Women in Black. [=""

10020. Branigan, William. “China Hampers Private Women’s Forum; Hillary Clinton’s Role in UN Conference on Women Is Debated”, in Demonstration). At its height, these women formed the majority of the vigil, but never showed much interest in taking part in discussions or decisions regarding Women in Black. [=""

At the same time there is a growing debate on the wisdom of having Hillary Clinton play a key role in the conference. Delegation chairwoman Madelaine Albright states the ‘US human rights agenda’ will be advanced with or without Hillary Clinton. Albright states the US will lead an attack on the Chinese ‘policy restrictions on the births of females’[sic].

While 36000 have registered for the NGO Forum, the obstacles may reduce the attendance by 10000. One person denied a visa is Julie Berriault, American director of the Unrepresented Nations & Peoples Organization, which represents Australian aborigines, native Hawaiians, Taiwanese and Tibetans [but not Palestinians]; China regards Taiwan as an abreakaway province. More typical is the delay in issuing visas to delegates: the Washington office of Amnesty International USA has not received its visas yet. [TXT] 10021. Cohen, Ruth. “Women in Black Step Down: Part 1”, in Challenge, November-December 1993, p. 11. On Wednesday, October 20th, Women in Black of Jerusalem made the historic decision to end the weekly Friday vigil. I doubt whether a single one of the women who have stood in Paris Square for the past five-and-a-half years did not feel a sense of emptiness and regret on Friday, October 22nd, at one o’clock.

Women in Black has been the most consistently visible and well-known of all the protest groups started in Israel since the beginning of the Intifada. My purpose is not to write the final chapter of the story, nor to relegate the phenomenon of Women in Black to the history pages. It is far too soon for that. What follows is a personal view of the steps leading up to the decision to come down from the wall and leave the view of the flowers in Paris Square unrestricted for passing traffic.

Those of us who have spoken publicly about Women in Black in general, and the unique features of the Jerusalem vigil, have taken care to stress two points: each woman stands as an individual with her own personal and political interpretation of Women in Black’s slogan, “End the Occupation”; and Women in Black is not an organization with a hierarchy or a formal structure, but is only the name given to the protest vigils throughout Israel and in other countries.

The women who started the Women in Black vigil in Jerusalem had a clear political commitment to finding a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict based on Israeli recognition of the PLO and on the creation of an independent Palestinian state in all of the territories occupied by Israel since 1967. However, they recognized the political importance of encouraging the vigil’s growth by allowing women from the broadest political spectrum to feel comfortable standing side by side.

This goal was achieved in the original slogan, “End the Occupation.”

There were intermittent attempts to add to this slogan over the years. The method for gauging women’s reactions to the suggested changes was to simply “do a round” and ask each woman to present her view. If there were more than one or two objections, the suggestion was dropped.

The many hundreds of women who have taken part in the Jerusalem vigil over the years have all helped in contributing to the mistaken image of Women in Black as an organized political group. In reality, the success of this vigil was due to a core of about 30 women whose commitment to standing in protest was paramount - not one of them would make an avoidable appointment for Fridays at one o’clock, the “sacred” hour. These 30 or so women were all active in other feminist, human rights, or anti-occupation organizations.

Another hundred or so women came to the vigil on a less regular basis. For most of these women, the Women in Black vigil was their sole political activity (apart, perhaps, from the occasional Peace Now demonstration). At its height, these women formed the majority of the vigil, but never showed much interest in taking part in discussions or decisions regarding Women in Black. [="" was small. The first of these meetings was an ad hoc gathering of fourteen women who met after the announcement, but before the signing of the agreement. Only one woman took what proved to be a prophetic view of what lay ahead for Women in Black. She believed there would be a steady decline in the number of vigil participants, which would gradually weaken the impact of Women in Black. The rest of us were in favor of continuing the vigil, while adding some sign acknowledging the new political situation. We made a hasty decision to provide a white sash saying "Yes to Peace" for any woman choosing to wear it.

On the following Friday, it was clear that the majority of women who participated did so in the kind of celebratory mood that was prevalent elsewhere after the announcement of mutual recognition and the signing of the agreement between Israel and the PLO. Without any need for a formal decision, all the women, apart from the 30 core activists, were bidding their farewell to Paris Square on Fridays. Nevertheless, two subsequent discussion meetings were held, during which the dilemma over whether or not to Continue the vigil became clear.[-] 10023. Cohen, Ruth. "Women in Black Step Down: Part 3", in Challenge, November-December 1993 p. 13. Without exception, every woman at the meetings understood that the agreement would not mean an immediate end to the occupation, nor to human rights abuses. The few women who, from the start, were in favor of ending the regular vigils were equally certain that events, in the coming months, might prompt them to stand again.

What fragmented the majority was the attempt to retain the broad consensus around the slogan of "End the Occupation." The additional slogan "Yes to Peace" did not make the clear political statement that women were looking for. Adding other traditional leftist slogans (such as "Two States for Two Peoples") would change the broad consensus basis of the vigil and lead to a situation similar to that in Tel Aviv, where the vigil never achieved the breadth of support enjoyed by the Jerusalem group. In the final analysis, what had always been seen as a source of strength for Jerusalem Women in Black became the reason for ending the vigil.

Does this really mean the end of Women in Black? Personally, I think not. What began as a local protest against the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip has turned into a model for women's political action adopted worldwide. Five and a half years of putting one's political views on the line every week has been an empowering experience for every woman who has participated. In Jerusalem, the vigil has shown many women with no feminist background the effectiveness of a feminist model of cooperative action and decision-making. Each individual in Women in Black knows that she can voice her opinion and make a difference. If the current attempt to find a just solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict does not measure up to expectations, we will, one by one, resume our weekly stand against the occupation.

1. The Tel Aviv Women in Black recently decided to continue standing. [Ruth Cohen is one of the founders of Women In Black and of Shani]. [-]

Arab Women's Council
Activities: Registrant arranged a media tour, which included several interviews and appearances by members of the foreign principal, to communicate information to the American public that the principal is seeking peace and the cessation of bloodshed in Lebanon. Finances: $332309 for the five month period ending 11/10/1982.

Political Propaganda: In addition to arranging media interviews and appearances, the registrant disseminated press releases dealing with the Arab Women's Council. [=-]

10025. DPR. "Australian Government Contributes a $300000 For UNRWA Emergency Programmes", in DPR, June 1993. The following press release was issued by UNRWA on 6.16/1993: "The Australian Government has announced a special contribution of A$300000 (about $202000) to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) to support the Agency's programme of Extraordinary Measures in Lebanon and the Occupied Territory. The programme covers emergency relief, including food and cash aid as well as expanded medical services to Palestinian refugees. Senator Gareth Evans, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Australia, informed UNRWA Commissioner-General Iltter Turkmen of the contributions during their meeting in Vienna on 6/15/1993. The special contribution came in response to urgent Agency appeals to donor Governments to increase their regular and emergency contributions. UNRWA is facing a financial deficit of $28.5 million at a time when its emergency programmes are critically needed, particularly in the West Bank and Gaza Strip where economic conditions have sharply declined since the occupied territory was sealed off from Israel at the end of March. The measure of the occupied territory continues to prevent up to 100000 Palestinian labourers from returning to work in Israel, causing daily wage losses of some $2.5 million. The local economy has also been severely disrupted by restrictions on movement resulting from the closure, which led to millions of dollars of losses in agriculture, industry, transport and commerce. Unemployment is at an all-time high in both the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Australia is a major donor to UNRWA's regular health, education, relief and social services programmes for more than 2.7 million Palestine refugees in the Middle East. In 1993, Australia is contributing A$2.65 million (about $1.7 million) towards the Agency's regular budget. UNRWA recently built a new preparatory school for girls in the West Bank, using a special 1988-1989 contribution of A$1 million (about $795000) from the Australian Government." [=-]

10026. DPR. "General Assembly Adopts Resolutions On Israeli Practices In The Occupied Territories: 47/70. Report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and other Arabs of the Occupied Territories: G", in Division of Palestinian Rights, December 1992. At its 85th plenary meeting, which was held on 12/14/1992, the General Assembly adopted the following resolutions:

The General Assembly,
Bearing in mind the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, 2/ Deeply concerned about the continued and intensified harassment by Israel, the occupying Power, directed against educational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory,

Taking note of the relevant decisions adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization concerning the educational and cultural situation in the occupied Palestinian territory,
1. Reaffirms the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949, to the

==============================================================================

Finances: $332309 for the five month period ending 11/10/1982. Organization concerning the educational and cultural situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

2. Condemns Israeli policies and practices against Palestinian students and faculty members in schools, universities, and other educational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory, especially the opening of fire on defenseless students, causing many casualties;

3. Also condemns the systematic Israeli campaign of repression against universities, schools and other educational and vocational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory, in large numbers and for prolonged periods, restricting and impeding the academic activities of Palestinian universities by subjecting the selection of courses, textbooks, and educational programs, the admission of students, and the appointment of faculty members to the control and supervision of the military occupation authorities, in flagrant contravention of the Convention;

4. Demands that Israel, the occupying Power, comply with the provisions of that Convention, rescind all actions and measures taken against all educational institutions, ensure the freedom of those institutions and refrain forthwith from hindering the effective operation of the universities, schools, and other educational institutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly as soon as possible, but not later than the beginning of the forty-eighth session, on the implementation of the present resolution. [—]

10027. DS. "Lebanon: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Other Grounds", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended, Joint Committee Print, District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution calls for social justice and equality of duties and rights among all citizens without prejudice or favoritism. In practice, aspects of the law and traditional mores discriminate against women. Only males may confer citizenship on their spouses and children. In some cases, this means that children born to Lebanese mothers and stateless fathers are themselves stateless. The law stipulates that a woman must obtain her husband's approval to open a business or engage in trade. The Parliament has not yet acted on an amendment introduced to change this law. Women may own property but often cede effective control over it due to cultural reasons. The law also accords preferential treatment to males accused of crimes of honor (see Section 1.e.). Religious groups have their own family and personal status laws administered by religious courts. Each group differs in its treatment of marriage, family property rights, and inheritance. Many of these laws discriminate against women. For example, Sunni inheritance law gives a son twice the share of a daughter. Although Muslim men may divorce easily, Muslim women may do so only with the concurrence of 11 of their husbands. Women have employment opportunities in government, medicine, law, academia, the arts, and, to a lesser degree, in business. Social pressure against women pursuing a career is strong in some parts of society. Males sometimes exercise considerable control over female relatives, restricting their activities outside the home or contact with friends and relatives. Violence against women occurs, the press frequently reports cases of rape. However, there are no authoritative statistics on the extent of spousal violence. Doctors and social workers believe most abused women do not seek medical help. The society's emphasis on personal privacy and honor make it difficult for women to seek legal redress. The Government has not expressed an interest in the problem of violence against women nor has it made an effort to combat it. [—]

10029. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (c) Freedom of Religion", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on International Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Lebanese practice their various religions freely. There are 17 officially recognized sects, including numerous Christian denominations, Muslims (Sunni, Shia, and others), and Druze. There is no state religion, but Lebanese's confessional political system means that a wide range of government positions are filled on the basis of religion. There are no restrictions on any particular religious groups, foreign clergy, or places of worship. Religious groups are free to publish religious material, operate schools, and establish charitable organizations. Lebanese have the legal right to convert from one religion to another, but the confessional character of society makes conversion to another religion difficult. Women however, often adopt the religion of their husbands. Conversion can mean ostracism from family and friends. Local religious leaders often pressure members of their congregations against taking part in the religious activities of other groups. [—]

10030. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 13: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Lebanon is a parliamentary democracy in which the people have the constitutional right to change their government. However, until the Parliamentary elections in 1992, the people had not been able to exercise this right during 16 years of civil war. According to the Constitution, direct elections for the Parliament must be held every 4 years. The Parliament, in turn, elects the President every 6 years. The President and Parliament choose the Cabinet. Political parties may form, and some flourish. Since the emergence of the post-1943 state, a relatively restricted group of traditional and sectarian leaders largely have determined national policy. The unwritten 1943 National Pact allocated power on a confessional basis. The government were allocated on a similar basis between Christians and Muslims. Efforts to alter or abolish the confessional system of allocating power were at the center of Lebanese politics for more than 3 decades. Those religious groups most favored by the 1943 formula sought to preserve it, while those who perceived themselves to be disadvantaged sought to revise it on the basis of different demographic data or to abolish it entirely. The struggle Rave a strongly sectarian coloration to Lebanese politics and to the continuing civil strife in the country. Under the National Reconciliation Agreement reached in Taif, Saudi Arabia in 10/1989. Members of Parliament agreed to alter the National Pact to create a 500 Christian-Muslim balance in the Parliament and reordering the powers of the different branches of government Constitutional amendments embodying the political reforms stipulated in the Taif agreement, which represented a dramatic political and psychological change, became law in 1990. They included an expansion of the number of seats in Parliament and the division of seats equally between Muslims and Christians and the transfer of some powers from the President to the Prime Minister and Cabinet. Parliamentary elections were held in 1992. The elections were not prepared and not carried out in a manner to ensure the broadest national consensus. Because the results do not reflect the full spectrum of the body politic in Lebanon, they cast doubt on the ability of the Lebanese people to change their government through truly democratic means. Palestinians in Lebanon, with the exception of the few who have gained Lebanese nationality, have no political rights. An estimated 17 Palestinian factions operate in Lebanon, ranging from several characterized as "Islamic" to numerous pro- and anti-Arafat organizations, many built around prominent individual leaders. Most Palestinians live in refugee camps, under the control of one or more political factions. Leaders are not elected, and there are no representative institutions that would permit popular participation in running camps. Fundamental protections and freedoms expected of governments exist in some but not all Palestinian areas. There are no legal barriers to participation by women in politics, but the culture discourages it. Three women were elected to Parliament in 1992. Two were related to deceased politicians, and the third is the sister of the Prime Minister. Very few women hold policy-level positions in the Government. [2]

10031. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Sixteen years of civil war blocked progress in many social fields, including laws and practices on discrimination. In 1993, the Cabinet and Parliament considered amendments to laws that discriminate against women, children, and the disabled but no action was taken. [2]

10032. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 16: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Lebanese women, many of whom have professional degrees, can work outside the home and increasingly do so out of necessity. The idea that women should be supported by men prevails, however, and many, including those with professional training, remain home with their families or until their children are grown. Males exercise considerable control over female relatives, often restricting such activities outside the home as travel or contact with friends and relatives. Women may own property but may not be able to exercise control over it due to legal and cultural restrictions. The law stipulates that a woman must obtain the prior approval of her husband to open a business or engage in trade. The Judicial Institute refused to accept 200 female law graduates in November, offering no grounds for the decision. Violence against women occurs, and the press reports frequent cases of rape, but judicial authorities have no statistics on the extent of the problem. Doctors and social workers believe most abused women do not seek medical help. The society's emphasis on personal privacy and honor makes it difficult for women to seek legal redress, suggesting that cases reported in the papers are but a fraction of the total number. The Government has neither expressed an interest in the problem nor made an effort to combat it. Each confessional group in Lebanon has its own family and personal status laws administered by religious courts, and each group differs in its treatment of marriage, family property rights, and inheritance. Many of these laws discriminate against women. For example, Sunni inheritance law gives a son twice the share of a daughter. Although Muslim men can easily divorce, Muslim women can do so only with the approval of their husbands. Divorce is difficult for Christians following Catholic rites, including Maronites. Many seeking divorce convert to an orthodox faith. Parliament approved in November a law that allowed women to testify in matters related to land registry. Previously, a woman's testimony had carried only half the weight of a man's. [2]

10033. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 17: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government has not placed priority on children's rights and welfare. There is no evidence of government spending to protect children, although Lebanon has ratified the Children's Rights Charter. The area of children's rights is one of many demands made on a state that is just emerging from years of social and financial chaos. The plight of children is a growing concern in Lebanon. A huge number of children are neglected, abused, exploited and even sold to disreputable adoption agents at a rate of $5000 for an infant, according to children's rights monitors. Hundreds of abandoned children are found in the streets, begging and cleaning car windows; others are hired illegally at low wages. Juvenile delinquency is rising. There are 428 cases before the delinquency court in north Lebanon alone, and many delinquents wait in ordinary prisons for trial and remain there after sentencing. Limited financial resources have hindered efforts to build adequate facilities to rehabilitate delinquents. [2]

10034. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Lebanon: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (c) Prohibition of Forced or Compulsory Labor", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. While not prohibited by law forced labor is not practiced or condoned by the Government. However, children, domesticics, or other foreign workers are sometimes forced to remain in situations amounting to coerced or bonded labor. [2]

10035. Hsu Kuang; Chi Pen [editor]. "Women's Liberation Is an Integral Part of the Entire Revolutionary Movement: Part 02", in Chinese Women in the Fight for Socialism. Peking: Foreign Languages Press, 1977, pp. 7-11. Running the Country: Since liberation, and especially since the Cultural Revolution began, the Party and government have made special efforts to train and promote women leaders. More and more women have been admitted into the Communist Party and the Communist Youth League. Increasing numbers of outstanding women from worker or peasant families are taking their place in leading posts at all levels, some becoming Party or government leaders.

In the Cultural Revolution, Wu Kuei-hsien, a textile worker, showed outstanding political and organizational ability in unifying and leading the masses in the struggle against the counter-revolutionary revisionist line. She is now an alternate member of the Party Political Bureau and a Vice-Premier of the State Council. Li Su-wen, a clerk in a Lebanese women, many of whom have professional degrees, can work outside the home as travel or contact with friends and relatives. Women may own property but may not be able to exercise control over it due to legal and cultural restrictions. The law stipulates that a woman must obtain the prior approval of her husband to open a business or engage in trade. The Judicial Institute refused to accept 200 female law graduates in November, offering no grounds for the decision. Violence against women occurs, and the press reports frequent cases of rape, but judicial authorities have no statistics on the extent of the problem. Doctors and social workers believe most abused women do not seek medical help. The society's emphasis on personal privacy and honor makes it difficult for women to seek legal redress, suggesting that cases reported in the papers are but a fraction of the total number. The Government has neither expressed an interest in the problem nor made an effort to combat it. Each confessional group in Lebanon has its own family and personal status laws administered by religious courts, and each group differs in its treatment of marriage, family property rights, and inheritance. Many of these laws discriminate against women. For example, Sunni inheritance law gives a son twice the share of a daughter. Although Muslim men can easily divorce, Muslim women can do so only with the approval of their husbands. Divorce is difficult for Christians following Catholic rites, including Maronites. Many seeking divorce convert to an orthodox faith. Parliament approved in November a law that allowed women to testify in matters related to land registry. Previously, a woman's testimony had carried only half the weight of a man's. [2]

In the Cultural Revolution, Wu Kuei-hsien, a textile worker, showed outstanding political and organizational ability in unifying and leading the masses in the struggle against the counter-revolutionary revisionist line. She is now an alternate member of the Party Political Bureau and a Vice-Premier of the State Council. Li Su-wen, a clerk in a food market in Shenyang and a national model worker, is a member of the Party Central Committee and a ViceChairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress (NPC).

Many women were active organizers of China's first agricultural and stock-raising cooperatives and later the people's communes. They are pace-setters keeping the Chinese countryside on the socialist road. Lu Yulan, 33, is a member of the Party Central Committee, a member of the NPC Standing Committee and a deputy secretary of the Hopei...
In trying to break down male supremacy, women lash out at such Confucian ideas as "women and slaves are hard to manage," the "three cardinal guides and five constant virtues" and the "three obediences and four virtues." [The "three cardinal guides" meant the sovereign guided the subject, the father guided the son, and the husband guided the wife. That is to say, the sovereign, father and husband had absolute authority, while the subject, son, and wife could only obey. The "five constant virtues" referred to the so-called immutable principles of benevolence, righteousness, propriety, knowledge, and sincerity. They were the reactionary ethics the Confucians used to support the "three cardinal guides and regulate society. The "three obediences" meant obedience to the father when young, obedience to the husband when married, and obedience to the sons when widowed. Women were thus placed under the rule of men from the cradle to the grave. The "four virtues" were women's virtue, speech, appearance, and work. Specifically, women's virtue meant that a woman must know her place and act in complete compliance with the feudal ethical code. Women's speech meant that a woman must not talk too much. Women's appearance meant that a woman must adorn herself according to the feudal ethical code. Women's work meant that a woman must do all the household work well, and willingly serve her husband and parents-in-law. They hit hard at the counter-revolutionary idea that "women are backward" and "women should devote themselves to their husbands," spread by Lin Piao and his followers. Criticism has raised the women's political efforts of those two Middle East personalities. Rawhi Al-Khatib, the mayor of Arab Jerusalem, died in 7/1994. Hind Husseini, the founder and chairwoman of Dar At-Tifl, died in 9/1994. Both dedicated their long lives to the better application of the policy of equal pay for equal work. Work Hind Husseini was no different. She also dedicated her life to the women's liberation movement. }
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

helped spread knowledge and understanding among her people. Like Rawhi Al-Khatib, Hussein did this work alone, with the support only of a few friends in Arab states and in Europe. Both of these civic leaders call on Arabs and Muslims around the world to support East Jerusalem. They traveled, talked, urged and warned. If they had gotten the support they had asked for, they would have saved more of the besieged city and assisted more of its needy residents.

Both leaders were totally dedicated, determined and self-sacrificing. Both worked for others, not for themselves. Both built important economic and social institutions in Arab Jerusalem. They donated their own lands and properties and turned them into public works for the benefit of future generations. They did not amass wealth for themselves. They gave all they had so others could live an honorable and dignified life in Jerusalem.

Today, we need leaders like Rawhi Al-Khatib and Hind Hussein. We need leaders who will give rather than take, who will build for the public good and not for themselves, who will care for all needy Palestinian children and not only for their own. The people of Arab Jerusalem will forever remember good deeds, the public services and the humanitarian work of Rawhi Al-Khatib and Hind Hussein. [=]

10037. Issroff, Judith. "Council For Children and Youth", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994. pp. 13-14. The Jerusalem Council for Children and Youth in a non-political organization whose sole aim is the advocacy and advancement of youth and children in all Jerusalem, regardless of sex, race or religion. The council studies the problems of children and determines their needs, in order to direct attention to neglected issues, and to improve the availability, efficiency and quality of existing services. With the help of donor agencies, attempts are made to set up projects which will address these needs.

In 8/1994, a comprehensive study prepared by Sarah Hirshkowitz, Asher Ben Arie and, Jaffa Tsionit was published, which deals with the status of youth and children in Jerusalem. The statistical evidence portrays just how great the needs of children are in both sectors of Jerusalem. The council has information for the Arab sector available in Arabic, and welcome phone calls on any issues related to the welfare of children and youth. Every effort is made assist in all matters, whether in reference to education, health, or cultural issues.

Several different types of task forces have been set up on various topics, including: safety and accidents involving children; children's health and health care; early childhood; parenting; children at risk; and children and economy.

East Jerusalem lawyer, Awni Habash, a council member, has specialized in representing children in courts of law. Like his colleague, layer Philip Marcus, he is interested in issues relating to the rights of children.

Ideas for projects would be welcomed by the council. [=]

10038. Keddie, Nikki R.; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]: Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 01: Introduction: deciphering Middle Eastern Women's History. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 1-22. The position of women in the Middle east has aroused much interest but little scholarship; there is even less on women's history in the Middle East. Most historical studies of the Middle East are male oriented. Gender inequalities are ancient in the region; many "Islamic" customs pre-date the rise of islam. Veiling first appears in an Assyrian legal text of the 13th century BC, noting that it is restricted to respectable women and is prohibited for prostitutes. Asserting rather glibly that the Quran was written [sic: and therefore, in Islamic terms, is not revelation, and in turn that Islam is a false faith] (p. 4), Keddie notes that it is a matter of controversy as to how much of an impact the Quran had on women, although did bring some reforms (affecting dowry, inheritance and banning femaleinfanticide). However, much of Islamic gender policy owes more to patriarchy that to the Quran. Generally, Keddie observes, Islamic gender policy toward women is an "atrocity", although somewhat less so than the Hindu gender policy in India. (p. 7) In any event, "Islamic trends will not necessarily continue strong far into the future" and only Iran is turning back the clock on women's rights. (p. 19)

10039. Kostelnky, Kathleen Lenore. The Psychological And Behavioral Effects Of Political Violence On Palestinian Children Living In The Israeli-occupied West Bank (Trauma, Violence). Loyola University Of Chicago, Dissertation, 161 pp. AAC 9326167. An increasing number of children throughout the world are growing up in the midst of war, insurrection, revolt, and occupation. Children subjected to violent experiences relating to political conflict exhibit a variety of responses and symptoms, ranging from mild stress to severe trauma. Most of the research on the impact of war-related violence on children addresses single acute episodes of warfare. The literature of children exposed to chronic violence is less well developed. This study investigated the effects of the ongoing political violence on Palestinian children living in the Israeli-Occupied West Bank. Additionally, risks relating to maternal and family functioning, and protective factors relating to maternal mediation were examined in light of children's experiences with political violence. A sample of 150 Palestinian children and their mothers was recruited from cities and villages in the West Bank in 9/1990. Psychological and behavioral symptoms of children were measured using the Child Behavior Checklist administered to the mother. The Conflict Tactics Scale, Parenting Stress Index, Cornell Behavior Description, and Violence Questionnaire were used to measure the variables of political violence, family violence, problems in maternal functioning, and child rearing strategies. The results demonstrated that Palestinian children who experienced a serious Intifada-related injury, an Intifada-related arrest of a family member, or a recent violent Intifada event, displayed significantly more psychological and behavioral symptoms than children who did not have these experiences. Moreover, children who experienced both violence within the family and political violence achieved significantly higher scores on psychological and behavioral symptomatology than children who did not experience both types of violence. Additionally, the accumulation of risk factors in children's lives was significantly related to increased psychological and behavioral problems. Furthermore, mothers were found to be important mediators of stressful experiences for their children. While mothers who were depressed could not protect their children from negative developmental outcomes, mothers who engaged in high levels of verbal reasoning with their children had children who had lower levels of psychological and behavioral symptoms. Finally, boys were more susceptible to negative outcomes from family and Intifada risks than were girls, and younger children (aged 6-9) were more vulnerable than were older children (aged 12-15). [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [=]

10040. LCOME; Bruskin, Gene. "Intifada, US Unionist Report", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter 1990. KFARNNAMEH IS A SMALL mountain village of 4000 inhabitants in the West Bank on the outskirts of Ramallah which sits close to the end of a long twisting road to the mountain top. In January, I visited the village with a US delegation following the international 1990: Time for Peace" demonstrations in Jerusalem. As our bus struggled to climb the mountain I wondered why we were visiting this village which seemed too isolated to be part of the intifada, let alone a threat to the Israelis. Nearing the village, a partially destroyed home, the Intifada, became a reality. The literature of children exposed to violent experiences relating to political conflict exhibit a variety of responses and symptoms, ranging from mild stress to severe trauma. Most of the research on the impact of war-related violence on children addresses single acute episodes of warfare. The literature of children exposed to chronic violence is less well developed. This study investigated the effects of the ongoing political violence on Palestinian children living in the Israeli-Occupied West Bank. Additionally, risks relating to maternal and family functioning, and protective factors relating to maternal mediation were examined in light of children's experiences with political violence. A sample of 150 Palestinian children and their mothers was recruited from cities and villages in the West Bank in 9/1990. Psychological and behavioral symptoms of children were measured using the Child Behavior Checklist administered to the mother. The Conflict Tactics Scale, Parenting Stress Index, Cornell Behavior Description, and Violence Questionnaire were used to measure the variables of political violence, family violence, problems in maternal functioning, and child rearing strategies. The results demonstrated that Palestinian children who experienced a serious Intifada-related injury, an Intifada-related arrest of a family member, or a recent violent Intifada event, displayed significantly more psychological and behavioral symptoms than children who did not have these experiences. Moreover, children who experienced both violence within the family and political violence achieved significantly higher scores on psychological and behavioral symptomatology than children who did not experience both types of violence. Additionally, the accumulation of risk factors in children's lives was significantly related to increased psychological and behavioral problems. Furthermore, mothers were found to be important mediators of stressful experiences for their children. While mothers who were depressed could not protect their children from negative developmental outcomes, mothers who engaged in high levels of verbal reasoning with their children had children who had lower levels of psychological and behavioral symptoms. Finally, boys were more susceptible to negative outcomes from family and Intifada risks than were girls, and younger children (aged 6-9) were more vulnerable than were older children (aged 12-15). [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [=]

VILLAGE TELL STORY: We were greeted by smiling children and economy. were girls, and younger children (aged 6-9) were more vulnerable than were older children (aged 12-15). [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] village without even a single telephone? What I understood from their explanation was that Kflameh was being punished for being defiant, for its residents maintaining their dignity; they flew Palestinian flags, wore freedom slogans on the village walls and hung posters of Yasser Arafat from their lamp posts. Afterward, we visited a women’s clothing production cooperative in the village where approximately 20 women produce shirts and jeans of impressively high quality. The co-op was organized with the help of the Womens’ Action Committee with Israeli army, was first published in Jordan in 1985. In it Tuqan recounts her struggle to become a free and creative person in a society in which women have not been allotted any independent role whatsoever. “In this house, enclosed by its high walls that exclude the entire outside world from the scrutiny of the women buried alive inside it, my childhood and my adolescence and much of my youth were stilled” (p. 27).

The story of her life is interwoven with the account of the struggle of the city of Nablus against its occupiers and the deepseated identification of Tuqan with the fate and the heroes of the Palestinian people. Fadwa sees herself as a Palestinian poet who has been greatly influenced by her closeness to the revolutionary poets of her people, including her brother Ibrahim Tuqan, whom she considers her spiritual mentor. There was always a strong link between the Palestinian poet and the movement conducting the national struggle, since the Palestinian poet was the product of the struggle as it evolved while at the same time also influencing that struggle.” But as a woman, not allowed to take an active part in political life, Fadwa finds it difficult to write political propaganda poetry.

Fadwa had the good fortune of not becoming an obedient and submissive woman, as was expected from females of the bourgeois class to which her family belonged. Instead she rebelled against societal norms and attained her emotional and intellectual aspirations. Yet the non-Arab reader cannot fail to realize what a high price she was obliged to pay for this. She has remained too vulnerable and sensitive, and for most of her life she has preferred isolation to the society around her.

Mifras Publishers, pioneers in translating Arabic literature to Hebrew, deserve much credit for enabling us to make the acquaintance of this remarkable woman. Perhaps the time has come to translate her poetry as well.[=]

10042. Levy, Howard S. The Lotus Lovers: The Complete History of the Curious Erotic Custom of Footbinding in China: Part 2: Curious, Buffalo, N.Y.: Integral Publishing; Prometheus Books, 1992. After the abolition of footbinding in the twentieth century, it is easy to forget that footbinding was advocated and practiced for a millennium. Respected writers, such as Fang Hsun, the self-styled ‘Doctor of the Fragrant Lotus’ wrote essays advancing the lotus foot that were read for centuries. In his work he enumerated 58 kinds varieties of the human lotus, listed in nine categories of quality (‘from Divine Quality’ to the ‘False Article’ that resembled a ‘climbing monkey’). Fang Hsun detailed the etiquette necessary for women with the Lotus Foot, games that focus on small feet, and cited poems and folk sayings that condemned the large-footed woman; Fang Hsun also detailed the conduct required of men towards ‘ladies whose feet were so finely bound that they seemed to give rise to lotuses with every step”. (p. 112) Fang Hsun lived in a time when footbinding was unquestioned (while Manchu officials publicly legislated against footbinding, they privately conceded the “superior merits of the tiny foot”), and even more modern apologists for footbinding observe: “Permanents and plucked eyebrows were imported from abroad. If China were now the greatest power in the world, wouldn’t every foreign woman today be studying footbinding?” (p. 127) Modern apologists also dismissed the role of imperialism, feudalism, private and public possession, economic dependence or even the influence of men for footbinding, noting that “since it was instinctive for women to use adornments to win the male, binding served this instinct. By destroying a part of their bodies women caused men to love this part even more, to the point of madness.” “The poor copy the rich; the rich copy the courtesans.” (p. 128) Foreign observers noted that footbinding was desirable due to the sexual attraction of footbinding (illustrated in a vast pornography of lotus-foot manipulation supplemented with special training manuals for sexual techniques involving the tiny-footed) and putative (and medically unconfirmed) effects of footbinding on female genitalia. At the same time, rubbing the arch of the bare tiny foot was widely described as very erotic by women and was seen as a special intimacy; even prostitutes routinely refused to unwrap their feet. Men found the smell and taste of tiny feet to be erotic, even to the extent of drinking the water used to wash the feet of the tiny footed women. Women would use their tiny feet to masturbate their male partners, and women often shared their tiny feet with other women so that they could participate constructively and profoundly in shaping the life of the country." In this paragraph of the 1962 National Charter, the late President Gamal Abdel Nasser laid down the principle of Egyptian women's equality with man. Six years earlier, the man who had led the 1952 revolution, had taken the bold step of giving Egyptian women the right to vote, a right that had been withheld from them despite several decades of campaigning. Soon afterwards women were enabled to stand for election to the National Assembly and to membership of Egypt's political organization, the Arab Socialist Union. In 1962, a woman, Haknet Abu Zeid, was nominated to a cabinet post as Minister of Social Affairs and, for the first time since it was established more than a thousand years ago, the Al-Azhar University extended its instruction to girls students. But women continued to be deprived of many basic human rights: the Charter reflected Nasser's determination to break down the persisting social prejudices that kept so many of them, still, on the fringe of society.

This year, International Woman's Year, Egyptian women have been measuring the ground covered since the movement for women's emancipation started, early this century. Women from many international organizations have joined them, to compare notes with what is happening elsewhere in the world and exchange ideas. The picture that has emerged is a tribute to the Egyptian woman's courageous struggle for equality during the first half of the century and to the ease with which she adapted to the dramatic change in her prospects after 1952. The last twenty years have witnessed a veritable invasion by girls and women of male stronghold - universities, the administration, professions, industry, the business world. After 1952, all stages of education were opened to women, free of charge. In that year there were 3490 girls in university colleges against 37821 boys. According to the latest available figures, those for 1970-1971, 43255 girls and 109027 boys were by then attending universities. The girls' proportion of the total number of students had thus increased from roughly 8% to over 28% eighteen years later.

The urban Egyptian man is reconciled to the presence of women in nearly all his places of work, from offices and factories to hospitals, laboratories and law courts. Rural man has also revised his views. Country women have always worked with their menfolk. The problem in rural areas was to overcome male objections to daughters attending school (and university) and training for work other than handicrafts or helping in the fields. There too, there was a breakthrough after 1952. But, if Egyptian man has bowed to the granting to woman of the right to study and work, he is still holding out stubbornly against recognizing the personal and social rights that are hers by virtue of Islam and the country's constitution. Masculine prejudices are still stronger than rulers and legislators, even than the revealed word.

According to Mrs. Seza Nabawari, one of the leaders of the feminist movement in Egypt, it was in 1908 that women began to act collectively for their emancipation: a group of them, appalled by the alarmingly high rate of infant mortality, founded the first free women's welfare organization - the Muhammed Ali clinic. In 1910 a woman, Malika Hefni Nassif, submitted to the National Congress the first written report. She observes, "Overall, the children of if Egyptian man has bowed to the granting to woman of the right to study and work, he is still holding out stubbornly against recognizing the personal and social rights that are hers by virtue of Islam and the country's constitution. Masculine prejudices are still stronger than rulers and legislators, even than the revealed word."
later, in 1926, an intensive press campaign by the ulama (religious pundits) thwarted the Egyptian woman's attempts to secure reforms of Islamic law governing her personal status. The proposed reforms, submitted to the government, were: (i) that polygamy be allowed only in special cases such as the wife's sterility or incurable sickness; (ii) that divorce should be made more difficult and all divorce cases be heard in court in the presence of two relatives, trying to reconcile the couple; (iii) that the Bait el Ta'a (House of Obedience) under which a divorced woman has custody of her children should be extended up to the time of a daughter's marriage or a son's age of puberty; (iv) that the Bait el Ta'a (House of Obedience) regulation should be abolished. This regulation, intensely humiliating to women, empowers a husband to compel his estranged or runaway wife to return home and cohabit with him, resorting, if necessary, to the police to drag her back by force.

In 1929, Mrs. Nabawwai recalls, "woman was granted a small consolation"—the right to ask for divorce on grounds of ill-treatment by the husband. On the other hand his obligation to pay alimony was reduced from three years to one. Little progress has since been made with regard to woman's personal rights and status. Mrs. Aziza Hussein, who is chairman of the Cairo Family Planning Association and who has represented Egypt for many years on the United Nations Status of Women Commission, attributes this primarily to the fact that industrialization and economic development have been given precedence over social reforms. Mrs. Amina Said, the dynamic chief editor of a leading Cairo women's magazine and the first woman director of the Press Syndicate Board, blames the fact that the personal status law reforms are still blocked, after years of discussion, on "reactionary groups fighting progress".

In 1974, students and members of the staff of Al Azhar marched through Cairo to the People's Assembly waving religious banners and posters and shouting "No to Socialism, no to Nasserism, yes to Islam". The demonstration was not, as the slogans suggested, against an ideological trend in the country, but in protest against the long-debated reforms to grant women greater security and dignity in marriage. Three representatives of Al Azhar, who had approved the reforms during debate took part in the demonstration. "This could never have happened in the days of Nasser", Mrs. Amina Said commented. One of the arguments used by those who oppose the restoration of woman's rights is, she explained, that woman's emancipation "opens the door to communism, socialism and foreign ideologies". When I met Mrs. Amina Said recently, she had just written an angry reply for publication in her magazine to an article in Al Ahram, the leading Cairo daily, in which the Sheikh of Al Azhar condemned family planning, stating that it was forbidden by Islam. Such a statement by the highest religious authority in the country could, by a stroke of the pen, wreck years of uphill work by women's organizations and the official Family Planning Association.

When the government launched the family planning campaign in the mid-sixties, the previous Sheikh of Al Azhar helped to overcome misgivings by affirming that Islam did not oppose birth control but even advocated it when it was a question of saving a woman's life or health, and ensuring the happiness and welfare of the couple and family. Family planning has already had some impact on the birthrates and in releasing women for work outside the home. Women today make up over 48 per cent of a total work force of about 11.5 million.

Women in the feminist movement argue with apprehension that regression in family planning would mean regression in all fields. It would drastically weaken the important role Egyptian women have come to play in society in the past twenty years. They point out, too, that it could have a devastating effect on the country's economy, currently in a state of acute crisis, and on plans for future development. The proliferation in Egypt, in the past few years, of extremist groups advocating the reposition of what progressive Muslims view as erroneous interpretations of Islam is causing grave concern. Emancipated women are arguing that it is not a feminist movement that is needed so much as a movement for the liberation of man from the complexes and false values that distort his judgment. Women, they say, prove every day and everywhere that they are equal to men. It is men who have to be made to see. [↩]
Arab world, despite the fact that even in permissive Beirut non marital sex is almost unheard of and casual dating is by no means the norm. Abortion is punishable with imprisonment and although contraception is socially acceptable among the middle class; it remained forbidden by law, a rather lamentable situation in a country whose density of population is higher than that of any other area of South West Asia.

Of the total Lebanese work force 17.5% are women, 60-70% of whom work on small plots of land. Muslim women tend to lead more reserved lives within the family circle and are under little pressure to pursue professional careers. Ultimately the position of women in Lebanon, as in any country, hinges on their rights under the law. Lebanese law, particularly when it concerns the personal status of the individual is so complicated that in the past it has proved too baffling for the majority of women to understand, let alone challenge. Today however Laure Moghaizal, lawyer and militant feminist, is battling no] only to clarify Arab country to send women delegates to the United Nations. In its tribal areas there were two famous women judges. Before the 1958 revolution education for girls in schools, universities and a number of training colleges was already firmly established, and all education was free for boys and girls alike. Facilities for girls were again expanded after the revolution. The Baath Baath Socialist government - in power since 1963 expressed its intention of further improving the position of women in its National Action Charter of November 1971. This provided for "the liberation of women from feudalist and bourgeois concepts and from the conditions and bondage that had rendered her a mere means of entertainment or second-class citizen."

10047. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 07: Iraq. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Modern Iraq has always been a country where the exceptional woman could rise to the top. After the Second World War it was the first Arab country to send women delegates to the United Nations. In its tribal areas there were two famous women judges. Before the 1958 revolution education for girls in schools, universities and a number of training colleges was already firmly established, and all education was free for boys and girls alike. Facilities for girls were again expanded after the revolution. The Baath Baath Socialist government - in power since 1963 expressed its intention of further improving the position of women in its National Action Charter of November 1971. This provided for "the liberation of women from feudalist and bourgeois concepts and from the conditions and bondage that had rendered her a mere means of entertainment or second-class citizen."

For the purpose of this report Dr. Al Attia Fawzia, head of the department of sociology at Baghdad University, was asked what progress women had made. She replied that during the past ten years they had made great advances, not in their "political and economic organization but in social relationships, particularly those between men and women". She provided much of the following information:

The most striking evidence of women's emancipation is in their wide range of employment. They form 30% of the country's doctors and pharmacists 30% of its teachers and university lecturers 34% of the staff of government departments, 26% of workers in industry and 45% of those on farms. Equal pay in government service is normal. Married women get the same pay as single men and are allowed 40 days maternity leave before delivery, 43 days after, and can then, at once, return to work if they wish. Their infants cared for in creches until they are three years old. Of course there is much to be done before reforms make their mark on rural areas. An Indian observer who recently toured some villages found them much like Indian villages, the women "backward, uneducated and lethargic". On government farms, however, women work as tractor drivers, mechanical engineers and agricultural technicians. Some of the modern farms are run entirely by women. As in Egypt and Syria, veiling is rare either in town or country but in Iraq the abaya (black cloak) is customary among less educated women and outside Baghdad is thrown on even by women teachers when they come out of school. An important development in the breaking down of sex barriers is the government's encouragement of many more mixed schools and colleges. This is of special value in primary schools, where most children were formerly segregated and so, at an early age, received an enduring impression that boys and girls were ordained to exist apart. At universities and other institutes of higher education women make up 24% of the total number of 45910 students.

The legal status of women seems likely to be improved through the work of a special committee, recently set up by the government with the object of bringing women nearer to equality with men. It hopes to abolish polygamy and strengthen women's divorce and inheritance rights. Dr. Fawzia maintains that the only outstanding distinction between men and women is the exceptional importance attached to a woman's pre-marital virginity. In this respect, she says, social attitudes have not changed at all. "Therefore", to quote her own words "men enjoy many more privileges than women in every section of society. Speaking, emancipation of women is limited and women in our country are still subject to discrimination. Such discrimination offers from one country to another."

---
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General

The 1956 law replaced the Koranic law with a unified legal system for all Tunisians (Moslems, Christians and Jews), and placed them under the jurisdiction of the common law courts. It forbade polygamy and repudiation. It gave women equal rights in asking for divorce and the right to choose their spouses rather than accept the family's choice. The law was ambiguous on the question of Tunisian women marrying non-Muslims. In theory a Muslim woman was allowed to marry outside her religion, but it was left to a judge to decide whether the difference in religion was an impediment. In practice, the judge often ruled that it was. The law laid down that women could not be married before the age of 15, and put to work before 17. Since then Tunisian women have had the age of marriage raised officially to 17. In practice, however, girls do still get married before this age. According to the law, men and women must receive equal pay for equal work and any man or woman convicted of adultery is liable to 5 years in prison. The law has, of course, only created an atmosphere, and not yet brought about deep country-wide changes. This is particularly so because it was far ahead of entrenched male attitudes.

There are also two Tunisiens. The division lies between Tunis and the rest of the country, with the one qualification that the coastal areas are less conservative than the interior. The relatively prosperous Tunis wife has 3-4 children. By contrast, her rural sister, with 5-6 children, finds life rough and hard. Medical care in the countryside is sparse and housing often grim. In visual terms, the streets and cafes of the villages are male preserves (as they are in the older parts of Tunis). Inevitably, the programmes of education and family planning have made less impact in the villages. The concept dies hard that there are more working hands available and greater security in having many children. More sacrifices are made for boys than for girls.

Some progress has been achieved, but Tunisian women feel that not enough is being done. Statistics show that for every five jobs created for males, only one is created for women.

Currently there are only four men members of the national assembly, and no ministers. In 1973, of 4325 directors or senior engineers in government projects 182 were women, at university 2514 out of 10992 were women; at primary level 362,000 out of 935000 children. A survey of 340,000 women in jobs showed that 73.5% were in agriculture, 12 per cent in textiles and leather work, 3.5% in administration, 2.3% in business, and 8.7% in other jobs. Experience has shown that equal pay is observed in the breach when recruiting is done for women at all, often not observed on the factory floor, and hardly at all in the countryside.

The active Union Nationale des Femmes Tunisienennes (UNFT) which has played a major role both in forwarding women's rights and also family planning education, makes the point that the statutory one month's pregnancy leave is a medical minimum, and that while family planning is welcomed its application has to be careful as well as practical. One set of figures shows the uneven way in which some methods are applied. In Tunis the proportion of abotions to the irrecoverable tying up of the Fallopian tubes was 110 to 31, while in Jendouba it was 6 to 38, and in Kairouan 6 to 25. The family planning programme has been conducted vigorously in the press and on radio and television. Since 1964 it has received a credit of 4.8 million from the International Development Association as well as assistance from European countries. The IDA credit provides the foreign currency for the whole $7.7 million programme. This included, apart from raising the level of technical instruction, the building of maternity hospitals at Bizerta, Tunis, Sousse and Sfax, and many centres for mother and child care.

In Tunisia itself, the sexes mingle easily inside and outside their places of education, but open dating in pairs is still frowned on. Parental approval is required. The spousal is prevalent. The public debate in Tunisia about women's rights shows that the question is being handled on a sophisticated level. Some inroads are being made in the distant governorates, where women are becoming head mistresses, professors, teachers and doctors. But for further advances, more economic development—as well as improvement in educational and medical facilities—is needed, particularly in the countryside. Tunisia has made a creditable start on the core of the problem of women having equal rights in a Muslim society, practice has yet to catch up with the theory for which legislation has been made. [=]

10048. Minority Rights Group; McDermott, Anthony; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 08: Tunisia. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Advanced legislation, considerable investment in education and President Bourguiba's drive - from the earliest days of independence - have brought Tunisia to the position of having one of the more enlightened approaches in the Arab world towards women's rights. Almost 20 years since the promulgation of the seminal Personal Status Code of 1956, the results can be seen in the streets of Tunis. There almost as many women throng as men. The veil is a rarity except in the poorer and older parts of the city. Chic, western-dressed women can be seen in shops, offices, buses, and behind the wheels of cars. In the country's newspapers and magazines there are lively debates about women's rights and responsibilities and such subjects as the merits of sex instruction in schools.

10049. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 09: Algeria. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. When Algeria became independent a group of Algerian heroines of the resistance made a tour of the Arab capitals and were feted everywhere. On arriving at Kuwait and smilingly descending from their aircraft, they found themselves greeted by a row of expressionless faces. The Kuwaiti women, lined up at the airport to welcome them, were blacked out by heavy veils. At the close of their visit a transformation scene took place. The same Kuwaiti women, before driving to the airport to see of their Algerian guests, received instructions from their government to go unveiled. Since then no young educated Kuwaiti woman has worn a veil. Thus the women of Algeria, who by their exertions did so much to liberate their country, helped their Kuwaiti sisters by their example. The twist in the tail of this story is that visitors to Algeria today are always struck by the extent to which the veil is retained there, outside the small educated class.

Under French rule women clung to the veil in defiance of French attempts to westernise them. They are encouraged to wear it still as a mark of the Algerians' intention to develop along their own non-western lines. The chosen lines are socialist and Islamic, but whereas socialist Algeria, with its planning of heavy industry and admirable social services, is essentially forward-looking, Islamic Algeria looks backwards to reinforce Arab traditions. It is women who suffer the brunt of this; but hope for their future lies in Algeria's steadily expanding educational programmes. In 1962-1963 there were 14346 girls in secondary schools compared with 36868 boys. By 1970-1971 the numbers had increased to 66570 girls and 236884 boys. In 1962-1963 only 579 girls went on to higher education as against 2230 boys. By 1970-1971 the numbers had risen to 4938 girls and 19213 boys. If girls have not increased their proportion of places, it is because, under France, the "boys themselves were so exceptionally deprived. At the close of their visit a transformation scene took place. The same Kuwaiti women, before driving to the airport to see of their Algerian guests, received instructions from their government to go unveiled. Since then no young educated Kuwaiti woman has worn a veil. Thus the women of Algeria, who by their exertions did so much to liberate their country, helped their Kuwaiti sisters by their example. The twist in the tail of this story is that visitors to Algeria today are always struck by the extent to which the veil is retained there, outside the small educated class.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
==============================================================================
28
commit suicide rather than to submit to such marriages. In her book, La Femme Algerienne, (Maspero, 1969) Fadella M'Rabat recorded 175 such suicides (or attempted suicides) in 1964, the figure having been given by a doctor on Algerians radio as applying to cases brought into a single hospital in Algiers. The wave of suicides took place in the immediate aftermath of independence, when so many women were disappointed at the new Algeria could not offer them a better deal. Fadeda M'Rabat records that Algerian religious leaders, who had thought it too black a general picture but her specific documentation from press and radio is careful. Algerian women are forbidden to marry foreigners (non-Muslims) and birth control is discouraged (but not, as in Lebanon, prohibited) since Algeria hopes to support a population much larger than its present 15 million when its economic plans mature.

The lot of the vast majority of Algerian women—those in rural or poor urban areas - has recently been described by an Algerian sociologist, writing under the pseudonym "Maht" in People, the organ of the International Planned Parenthood Association (Volume 2, Number 1, 1975): "Their fathers, brothers, or paternal uncles, and later their husbands and sons, decide everything for them and manage their property. If the man abuses his authority, the woman will become his slave, in the strictest economic sense of the word... If he is good, she will have to give thanks every day of her life for the good fortune that has placed her in the hands of such a good master. For it is from her master that she derives her social legitimacy. A woman alone—a widow or a single woman without male relatives—finds it almost impossible to obtain recognition from ubiquitous authority, for example in getting a flat through the state bureaucracy. ... Many such women lost their men in the liberation struggle but others are similarly placed as a result of repudiation, which allows a man to send his wife away without giving her freedom to remarry and thereby regain legitimacy by means of a legal divorce."

This description might have been written about the backward areas of some other Arab countries except that it is not common Islamic practice for a man to repudiate his wife without setting her free. In Algeria confusion has existed because a law, new in 1959 and which should have been helpful to women, required that all divorces be decided in court. Repudiation, however, was such a deep-rooted custom that men went on with it, regardless, since legal procedures are so intricate, particularly to the illiterate. (70% of Algerian men are illiterate and 91% of women). Those women, unaware of their rights, were always getting cast into limbo. In recent years, however, divorce cases, including suits for custody, have vastly increased in number and it looks as if the divorce laws are at last taking proper effect. A new family code that would further improve women's rights in marriage has been under debate for some years but runs into opposition from the ulema and indifference in high places. The men who underpin Colonel Boumedienne's regime, whether as technocrats, soldiers or party leaders, have many of them, risen from peasant or workerbackgrounds, where men and women alike take the subservience of women for granted. Older women are as tough as the men in wanting to keep women in their place. Today's young educated women describe themselves as the "sacrifice generation" because they have gained so little personal liberty from Algeria's own liberation but believe that their daughters - perhaps even their younger sisters - may reap fuller benefits. This belief may well be shared by President Boumedienne, whose policies are always gradualist. While the regime pours all its energy into creating in Algeria an industrialized socialist state designed to give all Algerians a decent standard of living, he asks for patience from men as well as women; men wait for jobs just as women wait for rights. [=]

10050. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 10; Saudi Arabia. Ramphlet. London: Minority Rights Group December 1975. In Saudi Arabia women's place is in the home and their life is more circumscribed than in any other Arab country. This is the heartland and bastion of Islam, the centre from which the great Arab expansion originated. It was the home of the Prophet Muhammad and is the custodian of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. Perhaps even more relevant from the point of view of social life today, it was the homeland two centuries ago of the puritanical reformer, Muhammad ibn Abdul Wahhab, who found his most enthusiastic followers among the Bedouin of Nejd and the Saudi family. When their descendant, Abdul Aziz ibn Saud, conquered the Hejaz half a century ago his followers brought their fanatical religious views to the west coast as well. They have not taken such deep root there however, and society in Jeddah is more permissive than in Riyadh.

Social life is completely regulated by Sharlyah law and the strict Saudi interpretation of it ensures that women's life is secluded and lived largely within the family. Most marriages are arranged by the family, and a first cousin on the father's side is the preferred match. As one educated young woman, happily married to her own first cousin, said: "If there is a 'nice cousin, why bother to look farther afield. The family will be happy too, since such a marriage keeps the inheritance intact". The prevalence of cousin marriages might be expected to produce an undue proportion of handicapped children. Educated Saudi girls seem aware of this, but remark that it is second and third cousin marriages which are dangerous; first cousin marriages, the preferred match, are considered safe.

Polygamy is not likely to disturb the marriages of the educated young today. It was common among the older generations, particularly in the royal family. Both King Abdul Aziz and King Saud produced dozens of sons, the offspring of many wives, but this was probably as much for political as uxorious reasons. Among the ordinary people today the desire for consumer goods and a comfortable home, and to some extent the influence of the west, have made polygamous marriages rare. Where they do occur in unsophisticated society they can be happy in a way which is quite incomprehensible to western minds. "Of course my neighbour and I are close friends" one middle aged woman remarked, "our daughters had the same father" (who incidentally divorced both mothers after). Another pair of young wives lived inseparably as sisters, cared for each other and each other's children, and were openly gleeeful when their lorry driver husband went off on one of his long trips, leaving them in peace together.

Women go out little unless accompanied by their husbands, and their company consists of women and children. In the shops most purchases are made by men, and it is absolutely usual in the towns to see not a single woman in the street. When women do go out they are always veiled to some extent. Among the most evoluee this may be just a token bit of black material thrown over the hair. But for the majority veiling consists of a long black gown, the abaya, which covers them from head to foot and over the face a black veil whose thickness depends on their husband's strictness. Some veils are now so diaphanous as to hide nothing; and an increasing number of women are abandoning face veils altogether. In the south eastern desert, bordering the United Arab Emirates, the nomad women still wear face masks, hung in some districts with silver coins. The discomfort of wearing them in the great heat is considerable.

Though home life is still secluded, and in the larger houses the women live mostly upstairs and do not even seem to have the run of their homes and garden, it has acquired several added pleasures in the past few years. Among these are television and the telephone. The latter is an extraordinary boon to the better off Saudi women who can thus chat for hours with the friends whom they cannot often see because they are forbidden to drive cars (though many hold international driving licenses) or to go about much alone. The birth rate is still high but family size has for some time now been widely limited by all classes who have grasped the boon of family planning. The government's ban, this year, on the import of contraceptives because of the recent low census returns has not been greeted with dismay.

Outside the close social circle few pastimes are available. Some women's societies were opened a dozen years ago, two in Jeddah and one in Riyadh. They provide a little social life on a strictly segregated basis but much enjoyed for all that, they do some welfare work with orphans and poor families, but their main task is educational, offering classes to women and girls over school age.
Indeed since female education was introduced it has become the main outlet for the women of Arabia, in the towns at any rate. Starting from scratch 15 years ago, and in the face of considerable opposition (King Faisal had to bring out the troops to open a girls' school in Buraida), schooling for girls now seems totally accepted. There are currently school places for about half as many girls as boys (264,000 girls to 527,000 boys in all), but the proportion of girls drops sharply after primary. In secondary schools there are 27,000 girls to 78,000 boys and at university level there are only 1,000 girls to 13,500 boys. The quality of girls' higher education is lower than that for boys. The university in Jeddah has a separate, smaller library for girls; that in Riyadh offers no library access to girls and books are brought out to them. Many of the girls' classes in Riyadh are given by television for lack of suitable women teachers; in Jeddah no first year students were admitted last year because the women's university was under threat of closure. But girls do take the same exams as the boys so their final degree is completely valid.

The labour market was virtually closed to women up to a decade ago, except for some domestic servants who were born slaves and stayed on contentedly in the families in which they were brought up. For indigenous Saudi women the scope was non-existent, and it is still severely limited. Only 1% of women now work outside the home (surely the lowest participation rate in the world, but double the figure of 5 years ago). Labour regulations prohibit women from working in close proximity with men. But the government now encourages girls to work as teachers in girls' schools, nurses in women's hospitals, and doctors and social workers caring for women and children. Currently some 50% of primary teachers are Saudi women, but only five teach at university level. Work in offices has been frowned on and in 1973 companies were asked to dismiss their women staff and employ men instead. Several Saudi girls lost their jobs with foreign firms at that time, but with remarkable persistence have quietly found similar jobs since. There are now an increasing number of girls working unobtrusively in offices. A senior official in the Labour Department recently commented that soon there would be thousands of educated Saudi girls and that it would be better from the economic point of view to consider utilizing “this portion of the labour force through ideal methods and in accordance with the traditions, customs and labour laws, instead of resorting to recruitment from abroad.” If his words are heeded they should herald a breakthrough for Saudi women.

Women who do work are free of one of the major handicaps of working women in the west. They have no problem of reconciling a family with a career. Living in the extended family system and in a country still well endowed with domestic servants, the working mother can go out with no worries about her children. And pregnancy is taken as such a normal state that it causes no disturbance to a career. Socially, restrictions have eased noticeably over the past three years. One can point to more mixed social life in the wealthier classes, less veiling, less of the mixing with men.  But the government now encourages girls to work as teachers in girls' schools, nurses in women's hospitals, and doctors and social workers caring for women and children. Currently some 50% of primary teachers are Saudi women, but only five teach at university level. Work in offices has been frowned on and in 1973 companies were asked to dismiss their women staff and employ men instead. Several Saudi girls lost their jobs with foreign firms at that time, but with remarkable persistence have quietly found similar jobs since. There are now an increasing number of girls working unobtrusively in offices. A senior official in the Labour Department recently commented that soon there would be thousands of educated Saudi girls and that it would be better from the economic point of view to consider utilizing “this portion of the labour force through ideal methods and in accordance with the traditions, customs and labour laws, instead of resorting to recruitment from abroad.” If his words are heeded they should herald a breakthrough for Saudi women.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

10051. Minority Rights Group; Petran, Tabitha; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 11: People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (South Yemen). Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Since their country became independent under the leadership of the National Liberation Front (NLF) in 1967, South Yemeni women have come to the forefront of the Arab women's emancipation movement. They have already achieved the most advanced family status law in the Arab world. The Marxist NLF is committed to women's emancipation because it believes development and use of this latent resource essential to construct a socialist society. The Women's Union, founded in 1968, shares the task of women's political education with the Student and Youth Unions, encourages women to become literate, to participate in campaigns for women's rights and helps with marriage and divorce problems. Although underrepresented in higher NLF and government councils, women's leaders have proved to be militant and independent fighters for more radical advance. Preparation of the Family Law of 1/5/1974 shows the NLF's manner of winning popular participation in, and acceptance of, radical change. The Women's Union, trade unions and NLF cadres first discussed, amended and applied to themselves the provisions of a draft family law—later rejected by the People's Supreme Council—so as to be more radical. The government meantime reorganized the courts dealing with family law, replaced traditionalist judges with modern younger men and limited the husband's right to unilateral divorce by ordering all divorce cases to be adjudicated by the Women's Union. Experience gained in handling such cases contributed to members' political education, increased their self-confidence and helped to create a climate favorable to reform. In rural areas, women encouraged by NLF cadres—began to demonstrate against polygamy and compulsory marriage and publicly to burn their veils. Their activities soon coalesced with the peasants' crash struggle against the feudalists and the drive to implement the land reform. By 1973 the social climate for nationwide discussion of a new draft family law had been created. Over a four-month period a committee of judges, officials and religious and Islamic learned men discussed the draft in open meetings, attended by hundreds, sometimes thousands, in almost every district of each governorate. Popular demands rationalized the law: most notably in establishing a woman's right to marry the man of her choice and so also the man's since traditionally the father often selected his son's bride.

Among other important provisions the law forbids parents to betrothe a daughter without her consent, limits exchanges of pre-marital presents and the dower paid by the bridgroom to prevent “buying” of daughters of the poor, outlaws child marriages and unilateral divorce, underlines “equal rights and obligations” in marriage and gives both partners the right to divorce on grounds of incompatibility, desertion and cruelty among others. The law did not respond to the many demands from both men and women to outlaw polygamy but did make taking a second wife impossible except in extreme cases. In matters of custody the mother is favoured even if she remarries; the court retains absolute discretion at all times to determine custody in the child's best interests.

Between 1967-1973 the number of girls attending primary school increased almost fivefold. Completion of the Five Year Plan (1975/4 to 1978/9) should increase the number of girls at all levels from primary through university by 150% from 24% of all students to 31%. The official Anti-illiteracy Movement (including numeracy, general and political education) involved almost 53,000 people, of whom more than half were women, in 1973/4, far exceeding plan projections. Trade unions, mass organizations, cooperatives, government departments, public corporations and projects wage their own anti-illiteracy campaigns. The plan aims to eliminate illiteracy by 1978/9.

In the past working women were mainly unpaid agricultural laborers or servants. Agrarian reform, organization of fishery and agricultural/cooperatives and state farms are altering this division of labour. To speed this process a school accommodating 3,000 girls (300 from each governorate, hence a majority from the countryside) started this year to teach women to drive and repair tractors, trucks, fishing boats, etc. and to learn carpentry, masonry, building, mechanical and other skills. Women are also encouraged to work in light industries, as teachers in girls' schools, nurses in women's hospitals, and doctors and social workers caring for women and children. Currently some 50% of primary teachers are Saudi women, but only five teach at university level. Work in offices has been frowned on and in 1973 companies were asked to dismiss their women staff and employ men instead. Several Saudi girls lost their jobs with foreign firms at that time, but with remarkable persistence have quietly found similar jobs since. There are now an increasing number of girls working unobtrusively in offices. A senior official in the Labour Department recently commented that soon there would be thousands of educated Saudi girls and that it would be better from the economic point of view to consider utilizing “this portion of the labour force through ideal methods and in accordance with the traditions, customs and labour laws, instead of resorting to recruitment from abroad.” If his words are heeded they should herald a breakthrough for Saudi women.

estimated 360000 in 1975. The increase is due to the influx of foreign laborers and specialists who make up as much as two-thirds of the population in the towns of Abu Dhabi and Dubai. Only a few bring their families. This accounts for the imbalanced population structure in the UAE, where males outnumber females by almost 3 to 1. This article is concerned only with the locally born women.

Until the impact of oil was felt in the very different parts of the UAE, the seclusion of the local female was remarkably uniform throughout the region and all strata of society. For most women the essence of their way of life is still unchanged although there are many material innovations. Every woman's daily life is governed by the fundamental rule that the local household has two sections. The harem (sasracsect) is reserved for the head of the household, his womenfolk, including mother, sisters, aunts and the children. Only the closest male relatives are allowed to cross the threshold of this part of the family compound.

The majority of local women wear a mask of canvas dyed purple, covering part of the forehead and reaching just below the mouth. The burqa is taken off only for prayer performed at home, since women do not go to the mosque, and in the harem. But the custom is dying out - in most families now girls reaching puberty are no longer expected to don the mask.

The age of marriage for girls - 12 years upwards - is being postponed because the majority of girls are enrolled in school. The bride-price—consisting of a sum paid to the girl's father, money to buy jewellery and clothes and a fixed sum which the woman receives if she is divorced - is limited by a new law to £100. But for reasons of prestige most families will still not give their daughters away unless gifts and wedding festivities costing much more have been arranged. The less well-to-do and the elderly look for wives among poor girls from India and Egypt. The educated young men, too, often find a girl from a northern Arab country a more congenial partner. Thus for reasons of either price or the lack of formal education a great number of the local girls remain at present unmarried.

With the exception of some members of the ruling or the merchant families, little use was ever made of the provision in Islamic law for a man to have as many as four wives at a time. Most men could not afford to maintain more than one family. The common reason for having a second wife was if the first one was infertile. Most local men now favour monogamy as a matter of principle and a part of life portrayed as 'modern'. There are some who use their newly found wealth to establish and maintain several families - often in different towns. The few cases where girls of former slave origin are taken as concubines are vanishing. Divorce rather than a further marriage has in the past been the usual way out of childlessness or incompatible marriage. The girl returned to her parents and no stigma was attached. Hardship only arose if the woman had no family to go to, or if through age or illness she was unlikely to marry again and became a burden to her family. Divorce is practiced less readily by the educated and is discouraged by the religious authorities. Legally, only a husband can seek divorce, but there are instances in which young women dissatisfied with their arranged marriages, often wanting to continue at school, have deliberately driven their husbands to seek divorce.

No woman can be compelled by her father or guardian to enter into a marriage contract without her consent. However, out of shyness, ignorance and deference, young girls rarely oppose arrangements made by their fathers with the prospective husband whom they may never have seen before. It would mean an intolerable loss of security for the girl to risk cutting the closest ties she has in life - those with her own family.

The present generation of girls will experience fundamental changes in their lives as women and in the upbringing of their own families. While previously only a few girls learnt to read and recite the Koran, most girls now go at least through primary education, even in remote desert and mountain areas. Because the first girls' schools opened (in Sharjah) only in the 1950s, there are still very few females who have completed secondary education or a professional training. At present there are local girls students at Arab and European universities. Only in Dubai and Sharjah is it acceptable for veiled women to drive cars.

In the process of social change the original uniformity of social standards has given way to regional differences in the adaptation of new and alien standards. Among the merchant communities there are more families in which some fundamental changes in the lives of women have already accompanied the material ones. Efforts are being made through women's societies, television, evening schools and mothers' councils in schools to bring the older generation into contact with the changing environment which their children are experiencing. A small percentage attend courses offered in literacy and domestic sciences. In the new towns and villages women no longer need to fetch water and firewood or tend gardens and animals. They are separated from their relatives and tribal neighbors by communities of expatriates in blocks of flats and by streets full of foreign men. Therefore many women confine themselves to their own houses than before.

Previously women were fully aware of all the facets of the family's economic activities and its place in society. In this transitional period women are no longer in tune with the world in which their male and their young relatives live. But few women are even aware of this predicament. Their daughters will have to cope with the full range of changes such as reducing the number of family members living together and adjusting to women's role in professions and in public. [=]

10053. Minority Rights Group; Ingrams, Doreen; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 13: Oman. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Every morning - except Friday - groups of young girls, laughing and chatting, can be seen making their way to school in the towns and villages of Oman. They wear long trousers, tight at the ankles, a tunic and a veil thrown loosely over their heads and shoulders. Some of the older girls wear the abaya. Each girl carries a brief case, either in her hand or on her head. All books have to be carried to and from school as owing to lack of staff and buildings there are at least two shifts every day. Many school buildings are brand new with up-to-date equipment, but in rural areas tents may provide temporary accommodation. Considering that in 1970 there were only three primary schools, attended by 900 boys, and by the end of 1974 there were 110 schools with some 35,000 pupils, of whom nearly 8,000 are girls, development has been amazingly rapid.

The only education available for girls prior to 1970 was in a Mission school in Muscat, or privately. When the first government girls' schools opened the demand for places was so great that first-year classes consisted of girls from six to sixteen, and the impact of educating girls soon had its effect on the women, some of whom began attending evening classes in order to keep up with their daughters. For the most part, however, Omani women have had no formal education at all. Unlike other countries of the Arabian peninsula many of them do not veil, but they maintain the traditional custom of seclusion. In spite of this the women have been quick to take advantage of the excellent free health services, which have expanded as rapidly as the education services. They have their children in hospital and confidently take their sick children to be treated as inpatients. Mothers are allowed to stay with their children and the hospital provides their food.

Television only came to Oman in November 1974, but already aeri als have sprung up all over Muscat and neighboring towns, not only on villas and modern blocks of flats, but on the small stone-built houses of the poorer families, and even on the barastis, the palm-frond huts. It is too soon yet to know what influence western films and international news pictures will have on the women who hitherto have been shielded from the outside world.

Not all Omani women are secluded, however. There are many who are playing a prominent role in public life, in government offices, in the business world, or in the medical and educational services. These are the Omanis from Zanzibar who lost their homes after the revolution in that island and who returned to their original homeland. They have had a different background to the women brought up in Oman. They have never been secluded. Many of them have had a good education, although some have only a smattering of Arabic as Swahili was their mother tongue. Whether as matron of a large hospital, an inspector of schools, a policewoman in the Immigration department, or a secretary, the Zanzibar Omani woman is a great asset to this rapidly developing country.

Expatriate women - Egyptians, Jordanians, Indians, Pakistanis, are also prominent in the expanding social services as teachers, doctors or nurses. Oman has always absorbed people of other races and it may be this which gives it a relaxed air of tolerance. The fact that so few women are veiled is proof of that, and it will be surprising if, when the first generation of educated Omani girls leave school, they do not begin the change which eventually will lead to all the women taking a fuller part in Omani life. [=]

10054. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 15: Other Countries: Libya. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. LIBYA, like Algeria, practice Islamic socialism but the Islamic impact on women is cushioned by the country's exceptional oil riches. These ensure well-paid work for men and social security provisions on a generous scale. For example, in 1973 President Qaddafi raised widows pensions from 4-20 diners (about £35) a month. Not many women of the poorer class need to work but work exists for them, making cigarettes in Tripoli, or textiles and rugs in Benghazi. The arranged marriage, more or less de rigueur, tends to be stable, again because financial sufficiency makes for domestic peace. Few women are seen in public. Those who must go out to work or shop are wrapped in the all enveloping baracan, covering all but one eye. Richer women move about by car and young educated women are beginning to drive themselves. The one area where the rules against women meeting men are lifted is the university, where the sexes mix. The number of girls at university rose from 222 in 1967 to 948 in 1972. Most women graduates hope to stay on for postgraduate studies, partly because their student days have been so happy and partly because there are few outlets yet for their talents outside academic life. There are a handful of women doctors, some women lawyers working for the government and various university lecturers and headmistresses. Women are also working in quite large numbers as nurses, radio and television announcers, secretaries, telephonists and receptionists, sometimes replacing Palestinians or Egyptians who used to do all these jobs. But the average Libyan woman, marrying at 16 and having a lot of children (the government encourages large families since Libya is underpopulated) is still content with her role. If anything it is a small minority of sophisticated travelled young men who are beginning to turn against the traditional type of marriage, with a home always cluttered with visiting female relatives, and opting for a more private life with a wife from Egypt or Palestine, or, often enough, from Europe. [=]

10055. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 16: Other Countries: Kuwait. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. KUWAIT has a small group of women of singular intellectual distinction but in such a small country it is hard to find posts for its gifted women to fill. Some work in television and radio and administrative government positions and there are excellent women physiotherapists. One of these, who trained in England, has opened a first class hospital physiotherapy department and set up a school for handicapped children. Few girls work as nurses or secretaries (these positions are mostly filled by Indians, Egyptians and Palestinians), and no Kuwaiti woman does menial work. Since 90% of Kuwaiti men work for the government and social security looks after every contingency— even giving a monthly pension to any girl who, at eighteen, is still unfortunate enough not to have found a husband - everybody lives comfortably: the minimum wage is the equivalent of £3500. In such a contented atmosphere a small "women's lib" group that seeks to reform the Sharia, laws and give women the vote and more opportunities at work, makes only a little headway, but may gather more support as more girls with good education find time hanging heavy on their hands. Education is compulsory for all children and at Kuwait university 60% of the students are women. Kuwaiti's special contribution to women's emancipation is in all the schools and universities it has paid for in poorer countries and the extent to which girls in those countries have benefited. [-]

10056. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 17: Other Countries: Bahrain. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. BAHRAIN - with less money, but enough - has been able to give a fuller life to a greater number of its women. Many are doing the jobs that are done in Kuwait by foreigners. There are 39 government officials, 718 teachers and 197 nurses and girls are pouring into secretarial work as the need for their services arises in government departments, the oil industry, and new industrial projects. A considerable step towards breaking down social sex barriers was taken in the 1960's when several mixed social clubs were founded. There has never been a Bahraini feminist movement. Emancipation has been coming about gradually in response to economic requirements and thanks to a steady educational process that began much earlier than Kuwait's - that is, when oil was first found forty years ago. Dr. Ali Hassan Taki, from whose monograph, published this year, The Changing Status of Bahraini Women, much of this information has been taken, also mentions the attitude of Bahraini men as "quite flexible and tolerant". Less privileged women still lead the traditional life and, unlike the others, are veiled. The regular Shariah laws remain in force but the new facts of life are changing their impact. The marriage dowry, still obligatory, now places such a burden on men that the age of marriage has advanced for both sexes. Many women do not marry until they are over 20. A man university graduate earns, initially, only the equivalent of £1140 a year and the cost of living is only a little lower than in Britain. He therefore often chooses a wife who herself is earning. In such cases, as elsewhere in the Arab world, the woman waives her Islamic right to keep her earnings to herself and contributes to the family budget. Thus the idea of equal partnership in marriage is gathering strength. [=]

10057. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 18: Other Countries: Qatar. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Conditions for women in QATAR are much the same as in Saudi Arabia, since Qatar also belongs to the Wahabi sect of Islam. Nearly all women are veiled and have their separate quarters in the household. Education for girls is, however, coming on apace: in 1974 there were 10000 girls at schools compared with 12000 boys. Girls will be able to attend the university that is now being built in Doha. Instruction will be separate but the sexes will mix in the library common rooms and canteen. (The same system prevails in Kuwait). Few women are working as yet but the Emir of Qatar has recently expressed himself "confident that women will be able to play their full part without our social customs being in any way affected". Cable and Wireless Magazine, No.9 1975, which reported this statement, also tells of a revolutionary breakthrough having come with television: "For the past 18 months or so Qataris have been treated to the nightly sight of Qatari girl announcers, unveiled and wearing western dress and make-up, on the small screen." After an initial shock, Qatari viewers accepted this new dispensation with equanimity: "Oh, that is just television" they say". [=]

10058. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 19: Other Countries: Yemen Arab Republic (North Yemen). Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Because of its poverty the YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC (NORTH YEMEN) is one of the world's least developed countries. It is only in the last five years - since its civil war petered out - that it has been able to think about social reform. School education for girls is still in a pilot stage. A nursing college has been set up and girls, when up to it, will be able to attend the new university, which already has some women students. A number of these are refugees from South Yemen, who are comparatively emancipated. Women's work is mainly on farms. Some have learned to handle textile machinery at the Chinese built factory in Sanaa. Girls at university tend not to think of careers but, rather, of improving their chances to marry well. For the most part North Yemeni women are submerged in deepest tradition. Towns women are swathed from head to foot in cumbersome drab coloured wrappings; thick black or dark blue veils hang down from the tops of their heads, thus covering the whole
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
General

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

10059. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 20: Other Countries: Morocco. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Women in MOROCCO hold many high positions in business and the professions and abound at the secretarial level. They shine in diplomacy. King Hassan's sister, Princess Lalla Aisha was ambassador to London from 1965-1969 and had on her staff a most gifted woman cultural attachée. Social changes have come very rapidly since independence, for which women fought alongside men. The same generation gap as exists in Algeria is felt between the neat trouser-suitied modern Moroccan girl and her conservative parents. But Moroccan restrictiveness is less harsh than Algeria's. Most middle class families disapprove of night clubs and night entertainment generally but Saturday afternoon parties of unchaperoned young men and women are much in fashion. In all classes girls are urged into an arranged marriage only if property interests are at stake. (But the same might be said of Christian Italy or Spain.) The strong Berber strain in Morocco's ethnic make-up produces unusual nuances in local customs. An exceptionally tentative attitude towards marriage among simple people is described in Vanessa Maher’s study of life in the Middle Atlas, Women and Property in Morocco (Cambridge University Press, 1975). Unril rural areas” she writes, “marriage for the girl is merely one of a series of temporary unions...” The main object of marriage is to procreate legitimate children; the woman's commitment to her husband is much slighter than that to her own family, to whom she returns when divorced. “The matter of importance is not that a girl should remain married but that she should have married status, thus safeguarding the family nif (honour)...” In the rural hinterland women marry many as often as six times. In more prosperous urban areas, however, marriage is more stable—because a man can give his wife greater economic security and, in return, has stronger claims on her—and divorce, though it happens, is deplored. Mme Halima Embarek Warzasi, who has served her country with great distinction at the United Nations, makes the point that while emancipation is not discouraged by men in Morocco, they do not help to promote it; and if women are to end the everyday discriminatory customs that depress their personal status, it is up to them to make their own stand for a full and firmly drafted reform of family law. [≡]

10060. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 21: Other Countries: Jordan. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. In JORDAN educational standards for women are high and women make up more than 30% of the country’s work force. They are prominent in all the professions and have responsible posts in various branches of government, including the police. King Hussein's modern style of life is reflected in urban society generally. Women in army uniform are a common sight. The formation of a women's army corps caused no public outcry since the major hurdle results. In Egypt and Algeria it is said that while so much concentration

10061. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 22: Other Countries: Palestine. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. Mention has already been made of PALESTINIAN women as torchbearers for women's emancipation. Scores of thousands are citizens of Jordan and thousands more are dispersed all over the Arab world. The fathers of better-off families who went into exile after the creation of Israel no longer put all their savings into land and property but paid much more attention to educating their daughters - as they had always educated their sons. To poorer refugee girls the schools provided by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency have given a sound education and high standards of proficiency are attained in UNRWA vocational training schools. So everywhere in the Middle East Palestinian women are serving as doctors, headmistresses, school and university teachers, administrators, nurses, secretaries and in the less advanced countries are providing living example of how, in a Muslim society, women may lead useful outgoings lives without loss of dignity or principle. [≡]

10062. Minority Rights Group; Dearden, Ann [editor]. Arab Women: Part 23: Other Countries: Conclusion. Pamphlet. London: Minority Rights Group, December 1975. The Arab woman in professional work is at present better placed than her European counterpart. If she is married, her children are usually well looked after by their grandparents, aunts or kindly domestic servants. Once established, she is highly respected and encounters little sex discrimination. At lower levels of work Arab women meet the familiar western type of discrimination - they are given the poorest jobs and, in most work, lower rates of pay. Arab women in the privileged classes freely exercise their Islamic right to conduct their own business. This applies even in the Arab Emirates where masked and illiterate, but perspicacious women from the leading families may be running anything from a fleet of taxis to a farm. In village society the same right cuts little ice. The village woman may well be talked out of any small inheritance she has by her brothers and could probably not run a business if she tried. These are the penalties of being an ignorant peasant, not of being a Muslim.

Wherever the Shariyah laws run, women of all classes are liable to have their marriages broken up at their husbands' whim and, in consequence, to lose custody of their older children. Great difficulties, both emotional and legal, are put in the way of their instituting divorce proceedings themselves and, should they succeed in a suit, they still stand to lose their children. The fact that in many countries there seem to be fewer divorces among middle class people who have been married for a reasonable time, than occur in similar groups in the West does not justify the preservation of discriminatory legislation—such legislation lowers the worth of a wife in her husband's eyes. and affects the way he treats her. In poorer circles women are often repudiated simply for being ill or for some other reason unable to pull their weight. In this sense repudiation is a form of staggered polygamy. Polygamy itself is hardly a burning question but, so long as it is permitted, it equally, by inference, debases the status of a wife. Only two countries (Tunisia and South Yemen) have reformed family status laws to give equal rights to women. Tunisian women owe their improved position to the vision of one man, President Bourguiba, who has continually backed up the law with personal exhortation. (He used to call the veil "that odious rag".) South Yemen has delved deeper into the grass roots and obliged men and women to re-think their problems together—with some remarkable results. In Egypt and Algeria it is said that while so much concentration is needed on economic development, to embark on any radical reform might cause too much popular unrest. Yet Tunisia and South Yemen are two of the poorest countries and have carried out reform without serious repercussions. It is true, however, that economic underdevelopment puts a major brake on women's liberation.

Sufficient educational, medical and family planning services cannot be provided—nor women be given—through work and welfare benefits—an alternative depending completely for their security on pleasing their male relations. An Example of this has recently come from South Yemen itself. The wife of a charmingly liberal young man was asked why she still wore a veil, when her husband did not require
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

---

her to. She replied, "Because of my father. If I were to be divorced he might not take me back if he knew I had unveiled". As in Tunisia, it will take a long time for practice to catch up with the theory of South Yemen's new Family Law, though South Yemen is doing more to force the pace. What cannot be gauged in a country where all opposition is suppressed is the true state of public feeling.

Religious opponents of social reform in Egypt are unlikely to be impressed by South Yemen's pioneering efforts since they are being carried out by a Marxist government. In ideological argument women, it seems, cannot win. For socialist countries, such as Algeria, Iraq and Syria, women have been liberated along "western bourgeois" lines. This, at first sight, appears discriminatory since the higher up men in these countries, many of whom have risen from worker-backgrounds, are permitted to indulge bourgeois tastes, wear bourgeois clothes, drive bourgeois cars, live in bourgeois villas and encourage their wives to have domestic servants in bourgeois style. And, indeed, it is difficult to see how higher standards of living can be achieved except along some such lines. It may be that, in considering women, what Arab socialist governments condemn as "western and bourgeois" is the latter-day permissiveness in North America and North West Europe with its easy acceptance of premarital and extra-marital sex. But here Arab women, even the most emancipated, themselves draw the line. Of the many who have been consulted in the preparation of this report, nearly all have acknowledged their debt to the West in having provided an example (more or less) of the independent status and equal partnership in marriage they wish to have. But one and all have said that they want to achieve this status without loss of their most precious Arab traditions. Among these a strong family base and a certain Islamic decorum rank high. As far as sex is concerned, Islamic law includes penalties for adultery and fornication and these are retained, for example, in Tunisia's reformed legal system, but with prison sentences the same for men as for women. Legislation about such matters would not be acceptable in the West but may give Islamic society the safeguards it requires. In any event, it is impossible to conceive that the Arab people, who have imprinted their culture so indelibly on so many other races, could themselves suffer loss of identity in conceding to women the dignified personal status that many Islamic scholars believe was envisaged in the scriptures. Customs will change for all classes, as they have for the privileged class, with fuller economic development; but the psychology of equality cannot be established until women have equal rights before the law. [=]

No one could have been as surprised and unprepared for the collapse of the USSR as the leaders of the Central Asian successor states: this explains the strong support by theses leaders for the creation of some new umbrella group, such as CIS. There are longstanding ethnic tensions between Russians and Central Asians: Russians see Central Asians as superstitious, disease ridden, and as having large families that need Russian welfare payments (many share the sentiment of Solzhentsyn who argues that Russian settled areas of Kazakhstan should be annexed by Russia, and the rest of Central Asia be cast away); Central Asians see Russians as uppstart, near barbarians who imposed a crude Communism on their ancient cultures. The Brezhnev years were ones of relative prosperity (Gorbachev dismissed the period as stagnation), and this era was appreciated by the leaders of the Central Asian republics. The era saw broad development programs, even if their implementation was incomplete (numerous rural hospitals were built, but few had indoor plumbing). After Brezhnev's death, Andropov tried to implement reforms in Central Asia by taking on the old, corrupt Republic leaders. In Kazakhstan Yegor Ligachev and Gorbachev tried to reform the corrupt cotton industry, removing Muhammednazar Gapuroy (Turkmenistan), Rahm fool Nabie (Tajikistan), and Usbaliyev (Kirghizstan), each the head (first secretary) of their respective republic Communist parties. In 12/1986, Dinmuhammad Kunaev was forced into retirement in Kazkahstan in favor of Gennadi Kolbin: this was followed by riots that left 2-168 dead; the re-thinking of policy reform in Central Asia that followed merely allowed the revival of the boss system. However, the collapse of the USSR left the republics bereft on their longstanding subsidies from Moscow: the Central Asian republics remain the poorest in the USSR. Central Asia has a high birth rate, very high infant mortality (many women are pregnant every year and end up burying their infants), very poor health, high unemployment, worker shortages, and shortages of skilled workers and technicians (which will grow worse as Russians and Ukrainians leave Central Asia). The breakdown of the Communist Party has allowed the emergence of local factions: in Kirghizstan, three groups have emerged: clans from Naryn (led by party boss Turdaluk Usbaliyev and Pres. Askar Akaev, terming themselves the 'Democratic Bloc'), the Talas clans (deposed CP leader Absamat Masaliyev), and those from Osh (tied to the Ferghana Valley Uzbek party); in Tajikistan two groups: the Leninabad (Khojent) group, and the smaller Kulaib faction; in Uzbekistan five oblast based factions (Ferghana Valley, Bukhara, Samarkhand, Jizzak and Tashkent); in Kazakhstan four groups (the Great Horde group led by Pres. Islam Karimov who controlled the old Communist Party, the Middle Horde faction, the Lesser (Small) Horde faction, and the ethnic Russians who seek alliances with one of the Kazakh factions); and in Turkmenistan two factions (divided along tribal lines, with the faction led by Pres. Saparmurad Niazhov having predominant power from having been entrenched for so long). The current elites hope to remain in power long enough to select their successors from a new, more worldly generation. For the foreseeable future, popular participation in Central Asian government remains blocked.

10064. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. “Introduction”, in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 2, October 1, 1981. pp. 2-3. “Immigrant," "refugee," "guest worker," "bracero"-labels freely used to describe tens of millions of the world's people. But these are often inaccurate, arbitrary and deceptive. A Cambodian crossing into Thailand to flee hunger and political upheaval is regarded as a "political refugee" by the US government.A Haitian woman driven by the lack of food, work and housing to risk her own and her children's lives by escaping in a flimsy boat, is considered an "immigrant," a term suggesting a willful decision to flee from home. Yet the distinction between refugees (political refugees) and immigrants (economic refugees) is increasingly ambiguous. Is an Italian worker who has left home, family and friends to live in squalid conditions to work in exchange for West German marks really a guest worker? Are the Palestinians in their own land refugees?

Displaced Persons: According to the United Nations, there are 16 million refugees in the world. It is a figure many feel can only increase in light of the volatile international situation, a situation characterized by rivalries over land and resources and by the unequal distribution of wealth. Of the 16 million displaced persons, the majority are women, many of whom are widowed or heads of households.

For women, refugee life is particularly hard. They are often victims of rape, assault or abduction, not only in international waters, but also in remote areas and in the over-crowded refugee camps. Additionally, women are often the sole supporters of their families. It is the women who stand in line for food, fuel and water, who cook and clean, and who take care of the children.

Women suffer from a variety of health problems including shock and malnutrition. Many have amenorhea (disruption of the menstruation cycle) which can lead to sterility. Consequently, women bear few children in the camps. Those children who are born have little chance of survival because their mothers are often unable to breastfeed, a result of poor health which causes them to stop lactating within a few months after giving birth. Normally, many women would nurse their children until the age of two.

Overburdened by taking care of the family, women refugees have a minimal amount of time to receive training, counseling or learn another language. But the problems continue even after they are resettled in a new country. Isolated and with little opportunity for paid work, the women become more dependent on their husbands and further cut off from the outside world.

---

34

International Attention: It was not until the 1980 UN Mid-Decade Conference on Women that the particular situation of women refugees was addressed in an international forum. At the conference, the committee concerned with the condition of refugees, the United Nations High Commission on Refugees (UNHCR), was pressured to acknowledge the majority of refugees as women. Specific aid and education programs for them. Nonetheless, there are still millions of women who do not even qualify for the limited aid the UN has to offer.

Who Defines, Who Decides: According to the UN, a refugee is defined as a person who has a "well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion." Refugee status gives people the fundamental right not to be sent back to the country from which they fled.

However, refugee status is arbitrarily awarded or denied; ultimately it is determined by the countries on the receiving end of refugee flows. The UNHCR specifically states that "reasons of a purely economic character may not be invoked" in claiming refugee status. As a result, the US has been able to assert that Haitians are "economically motivated" immigrants. Yet the arrival of Haitians coincided with governmental acceptance of about 12400 Cuban refugees, only a handful of whom met the requirements for political asylum. The Salvadorans are the latest group to be subject to this double standard. Honduras, El Salvador's neighbor, and the Reagan Administration have labeled them immigrants in search of economic gain, although they are people trying to escape the ravages of war.

The differentiation between economic and political refugee status is based on the "voluntarism" of the migration. Severe unemployment has an effect similar to military turmoil and it has caused millions of people to seek jobs and higher wages in Western Europe, North America, and the Middle East. Yet, those refugees fleeing poverty and starvation are called "voluntary" exiles, those fleeing war are "involuntary."

The Price They Pay: Emigration is regarded by the refugees' home countries as a panacea for unemployment and a much needed source of foreign currency. Many immigrants send a large portion of their salaries to their relatives or bank accounts back home. It has been estimated, for example, that undocumented Mexican workers in the US support an average of 5.4 dependents in Mexico.

But the benefits are not one-sided. Immigrants have been the backbone of the agricultural sector of the US and France, while the manufacturing, construction and service industries in most of Europe and the Middle East are heavily dependent on immigrant labor. This untold number of people do the work no one else wants to do. Most important, immigrants can be used and discarded at will; many have only "guest worker" status which means they can be asked to leave in the advent of an economic slump.

Immigrants pay a heavy price for a few years of employment. They have become the scapegoats of their host country, blamed for its every social and economic ill. For many women migration has meant an alteration in their traditionally binding roles. Bombarded by a new culture, economically forced to work outside the home and to witness the change in their children who, in school, learn the values, language and way of life of the host country, women who have been forced to take on a different role in a newly adopted society. As one Turkish woman now living in West Berlin puts it; "We hope that we will return one day. But we know that we have changed and we are not the same as when we came. We can't pick up our lives as if we had never left. Return is no longer possible."

and that women play voluntarily or involuntarily, not only help to justify but also motivate soldiers to play theirs.

Besides its mobilizing function, propaganda in its less direct forms provides an even more subtle yet equally vital service for the military, and thus militarism. Suffused throughout the society at large, propaganda at this level is designed to construct a social reality in which the presence of the military is seen as a normal, essential and familiar point of reference in daily life. Absorbed throughout the society, militarism as a “mindset” appears in language, fashion, games, etc.

If the militarization of a society, economically, psychologically and ideologically, is a concrete reality of militarism, it is also then a state of war. Indeed actual combat is but one facet of war. Seen this way, there are very few countries that are not in some way “at war.” For example, can a nation, whose policies spawn war or whose power enables it to wage war by “remote control,” boast of being a nation at peace?

Similarly, can it be considered a state of peace when a nation must maintain internal order by systematically torturing or “disappearing” its own population?

And is the war really over when the gunfire has stopped? Can the remnants of broken cultures, families and landscapes, the lingering health, psychological and social disorders be what we shall call peace? Can children reared in refugee camps amidst the anger and despair of homeless people be expected to bear within them the promise of future peace? Only when we begin to understand the complexity of war can we effectively challenge it in all its disguises.

10066. Peoples Translation Service [trans.]. “Women in Exile At Home and Abroad: Introduction”, in Connexions. An International Women’s Quarterly, n. 26, June 1, 1988, p. 1. Millions of women around the world live in exile. In fact, the majority of the world’s exiles are women, yet often these women are referred to as migrants, refugees, or immigrants. In this issue, we have redefined them as exiles. This terminology is not a matter of semantics, but one of politics. The word exile evokes the idea of a complex human being who is making an implicit political choice by refusing to submit to repression. Being an exile means having a rightful claim to an identity, if not to a country. Refugees, on the other hand, are seen as an anonymous mass of bodies being shuttled from one country to another. And even if they are mistreated, refugees are supposed to feel grateful for having been given asylum. Thus refugees are thought to be victims; exiles, however, are not simply acted upon—they resist.

Exile takes many forms. First, there is “exile” in the conventional sense of the word: the political oppression that induces women to leave their native country and seek asylum elsewhere. One woman’s escape from and subsequent return to Chile highlights both the larger political issues and the sexist immigration laws women often face.

There is also an expanded sense of the word: “de facto” exile in which borders segregate or exclude entire peoples. Caught between the boundaries of four countries, twenty million Kurds are a nation without a country. Although unrecognized as a nation, they are singled out as a people for discrimination and used as pawns in disputes between countries that encompass them. In this collective exile, however, Kurdish women have become more actively involved in deciding the future of their people.

Palestinian women living in refugee camps in Lebanon are also essential to the future of their people—they risk their lives to ensure the survival of their children. In refugee camps, trying to make ends meet, women often suffer from malnutrition, ill-health and physical exhaustion. As mothers, they are both more vulnerable and more courageous in an environment of deprivation and death.

Migration because of economic depression is another kind of exile. And since economic depression is politically conditioned, economic exile is also politically motivated. Many women migrate and emigrate because their country of origin does not offer them a chance to earn a living. Once they arrive in their new country, regardless of their qualifications, immigrant women often end up working as ill-paid and harassed domestic servants or prostitutes on the brink of deportation. Yet immigrant women are beginning to resist such powerlessness. In Norway, for example, Third World women immigrants have started a self-help group which produces its own radio program. The Filipina women’s organization, GABRIELA, successfully protested against the imminent execution of four Filipinas who had been raped by their Kuwaiti employers. GABRIELA also demanded bilateral laws protecting migrating women.

In this expanded sense of the word, exile is not necessarily expressed in geographical terms. Invetorate sexism and racism can mean institutionalized exclusion and internal exile. In Switzerland, gypsy mothers and children were systematically institutionalized in order to alienate them from their identity. White Australian society dehumanizes Australian Aborigueans; women in particular are sexually harassed and raped. Women activists such as Mariella Mehr and Helen Boyle have responded by organizing resistance among Swiss Gypsies and Australian Aboriguine. Their courage and strength in face of these systematic genocidal attempts serves as an inspiration to women everywhere. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

Q: How did you become a filmmaker?
A: As a child I was not allowed to dance, play the piano or even to draw. I was sent to a French school, which punished me if I spoke Arabic, but I didn’t want to express myself in the coloniser’s language. Lebanese is a merchant society, a sectarian society. I was born in a Jewish community. Jews in Lebanon, being a minority without parliamentary representation, are obsessed with respectability. Being an artist wasn’t respectable. The model was Einstein. But my parents themselves unconsciously were good artists. My mother’s drawings are great and my father is one of the best singers in the Jewish community. And despite themselves, they helped me. Without that cultural background, I would not have been able to create those marriage scenes, songs and dances in the film.

Q: How did the sectarian society hinder you as an artist?
A: I almost conformed and nearly became a chemist, but my teachers told me, “Be a good artist, and not a bad chemist.” At the age of 15, I became a self-help group which produces its own radio program. The Filipina women’s organization, GABRIELA, successfully protested against the imminent execution of four Filipinas who had been raped by their Kuwaiti employers. GABRIELA also demanded bilateral laws protecting migrating women.

Q: But film is a very exclusive and visual medium, and you’re...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

General

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

The patterns of women's lives in all the above situations are nearly the same. And in all these situations, if women don't bargain for themselves from the beginning, they will be the ultimate losers, like in the French, the Russian, the Iranian Revolutions.

I want women to invade men's empires, their political, economic bases, not like Indira Gandhi or Golda Meir, but to change men's laws, change the game of politics, and to say the hell with your rules, games. We want to set different rules, and play different games. I want my films to express this intervention.

Q: How has your film been received in the Jewish community?
A: I am a freak in the Jewish community. I think all Jewish thinkers and artists become so when they make a decision to leave the Jewish community, because the community is warm and supportive but stilling and self-destroying.

There is a tradition of Jewish radicals being expelled from the community which I benefited from. But most of all I benefited from the cosmopolitan life in Beirut which, before the Civil War, was culturally very fertile and exciting. Being Jewish was a hindrance because your family didn't want you to mix with gentiles in case you married them.

Q: Can you tell us specifically how Jewish women are oppressed in Arab countries?
A: I don't like the trend of thought among Zionists that your Jewishness is your first identity. I feel I am first a woman, then an Arab, Lebanese and Jewish. I fight viciously against antisemitism and all types of racism. I hate Zionism and what Israel has done to the Jews as well as the Palestinians. I don't think Jewish women in Lebanon are more oppressed than Arab women. I don't think this is true of any Arab country that I know of. The Jews in the Arab world have suffered less than any other minority; the Drouse were butchered, Christians, Armenians and Kurds were massacred. And this is not because Arabs love Jews but because Jewish communities were smaller and they didn't join the power struggle. At the time of my grandmother, the Jews allied themselves with the Drouse who were strong. During my time, they sided with the Christian Maronite rulers, and it will change. The rising power is now Islam and they will side with them.

I am at odds with Western feminists because I am prepared to understand their special condition in their society, but they are rarely prepared to meet me half way to understand my special condition in my society and my right to struggle for women's liberation in my society the way I want to. My hope is that there will be more Third World women filmmakers.

10068. UN Division for Economic & Social Information; DESI. Strategies To Improve the Status of Women Over the Next 15 Years 1985-2000: Introduction: Part 1. UN Division for Economic & Social Information (DESI), Backgrounder, n. 29, September 13, 1985. 15pp. At the conclusion of the Nairobi World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the UN Decade for Women (7/15-16/85) the major document on strategies to improve the status of women during the next 15 years was adopted without a vote by consensus. Called "The Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the advancement of Women", the document included revisions and amendments to paragraphs bracketed in earlier versions of the strategies.

The document contains strategies covering a wide range of issues: for governments, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and others to follow after the UN Decade for Women ends in 1985. It sets out the historical background to the Decade and the current and future trends. Its information is based on replies sent by 124 Governments that reviewed the achievements of the Decade for Women and identified talking about Arab women being silenced throughout history. How can you break that with films?

A: The power of patriarchal fascism hasn't been challenged for something like seven thousand years, and it is so totalitarian that any woman who challenges it gets crushed. I'm happy that I developed and started working at the time when the women's movement started to develop and gain strength. Until now my father has never recognized that his daughter is a filmmaker, and I just received a letter from my mother telling me, "I hope that now you can behave and think of finding another job."

But you have to know that in the Arab world, the moral terror and the pressure on women is terrible. In the Carthage film festival (Tunisia), my film was very well received, and I was really surprised because before me an Algerian filmmaker, Assian Djehan, who is a very famous writer in Algeria, made a beautiful film about Algerian women called The Feast of the Woman for which she was abused and insulted in a most horrible way.

Q: Why did you want to show women's struggle in Arab history through Palestinian women, in Leila and the Wolves?
A: And through Lebanese women, because part of the film is on Lebanon. Because I was born in Lebanon, where you have half a million Palestinians out of a population of about three million. During very crucial years of my life the Palestinian presence on Lebanese soil was a very big issue. Even in the Arab world, the Palestinian woman, the token Palestinian women, were made a cause celebre. These token women are used by political parties institutions and states to hide the daily lives of the majority of women. These women are made to be symbols to compensate the reality. I respect them. They are brave, but I'm saying that these women are being used.

My film is precisely about the silent, unglamorous sacrifices of the women in Lebanon. During the Civil War, each militia had its token woman. Incidentally, the Phalangists had more token women than the rest of them.

If sectarianism is guiding the gun, women had better not use the gun. In the Palestinian part, it is a just war. Women should participate, but at this moment we are not getting anything out of it. In the Lebanese part of the film, I am saying that it is an absurd war. It is a power struggle between the Christian Maronites and Muslims, and women make enormous sacrifices.

The Western-made image of Lebanon under the Christian rule was that it is the only democratic country in the Middle East. Let me tell you about this democratic land; the same Islamic rules that have governed Saudi Arabia have governed Lebanon. The "honour" killing of women (for allegedly bringing dishonor upon the family) continues; two women are killed by the male relations in a week in a country of only one and half million women, and the killers go free. But there is a law if a man kills his neighbor's dog, he will be imprisoned for three months.

Q: When did you think of making the film? And how long did it take?
A: Ideas came to me very early on. Since I was a kid, I heard my mother saying, I am the only servant who is not paid and doesn't have a job." Q: How has your film been received in the Jewish community? A: I am a freak in the Jewish community. I think all Jewish thinkers and artists become so when they make a decision to leave the Jewish community, because the community is warm and supportive but stilling and self-destroying.

There is a tradition of Jewish radicals being expelled from the community which I benefited from. But most of all I benefited from the cosmopolitan life in Beirut which, before the Civil War, was culturally very fertile and exciting. Being Jewish was a hindrance because your family didn't want you to mix with gentiles in case you married them.

Q: Can you tell us specifically how Jewish women are oppressed in Arab countries?
A: I don't like the trend of thought among Zionists that your Jewishness is your first identity. I feel I am first a woman, then an Arab, Lebanese and Jewish. I fight viciously against antisemitism and all types of racism. I hate Zionism and what Israel has done to the Jews as well as the Palestinians. I don't think Jewish women in Lebanon are more oppressed than Arab women. I don't think this is true of any Arab country that I know of. The Jews in the Arab world have suffered less than any other minority; the Drouse were butchered, Christians, Armenians and Kurds were massacred. And this is not because Arabs love Jews but because Jewish communities were smaller and they didn't join the power struggle. At the time of my grandmother, the Jews allied themselves with the Drouse who were strong. During my time, they sided with the Christian Maronite rulers, and it will change. The rising power is now Islam and they will side with them.

I am at odds with Western feminists because I am prepared to understand their special condition in their society, but they are rarely prepared to meet me half way to understand my special condition in my society and my right to struggle for women's liberation in my society the way I want to. My hope is that there will be more Third World women filmmakers.

obstacles that were encountered during that time.

Each of the Conference themes—Equality, Development and Peace—is analyzed in the context of the obstacles still preventing attainment of equality for women followed, in each case, by basic strategies needed to overcome these obstacles and measures to implement the strategies at the national level. The chapter on Equality identifies the obstacles still hindering women's equality and the basic strategies to deal with them. The chapters on Development and Peace include constitutional and legal measures, equality in social participation and equality in political participation and decision making.

In the case of Development, areas for specific action are identified which include employment, health and education (the three sub-themes of the Decade), as well as food, water and agriculture, industry, trade and commercial services, science and technology, communications, energy, environment, social services, housing, settlement, community development and transport.

In the chapter on Peace, obstacles remaining after the Decade and basic strategies to deal with them are likewise enumerated. Measures to implement the strategies at national level state that women should participate in peace negotiations, and that all communities should introduce education for peace. [=]

10069. UN Division for Economic & Social Information; DESI. Strategies To Improve the Status of Women Over the Next 15 Years 1985-2000: Introduction: Part 2. UN Division for Economic & Social Information (DESI), Backgrounder, n. 29, September 13, 1985. 15pp. The items "Women and children under apartheid" and "Palestinian women and children" are now contained in the section on Peace. Previously these were contained in the chapter on Areas of Special Concern. In the paragraph on apartheid, the international community is called upon to give assistance "to the most oppressed groups under apartheid—women and children". With help from their governments, women are urged to "strengthen their commitment to the eradication of apartheid and support to their struggling sisters." "The special and immediate needs of Palestinian women and children should be identified and appropriate provisions made" the document states, and "United Nations projects should be initiated to help Palestinian women in the fields of health, education and vocational training." A third new item in the chapter on Peace is entitled "Women in areas affected by armed conflicts, foreign intervention and threats to peace." This section was previously in the chapter entitled Areas of Special Concern. The "constant fear, danger of displacement, destruction, devastation, physical abuse, social and family disruption and abandonment" experienced by women and children living in such areas creates particular problems which could be ameliorated by implementing the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions which provide guidelines for the protection of the civilians "in times of hostilities", and the 1974 Declaration on the Protection of Women and Children in Emergency and Armed Conflict.

A separate chapter is devoted to "Areas of Special Concern." These areas listed as: women in areas affected by drought, urban poor women, elderly women, young women, abused women, destitute women, those in detention, and women victims of trafficking and involuntary prostitution. The list also includes women deprived of their traditional means of livelihood, women who are the sole supporters of families, women with physical and mental disabilities, refugee and displaced women and children, migrant women, and minority and "indigenous" women.

The Nairobi World Conference took place at a critical time. As the Forward-Looking Strategies points out, ten years ago when the Decade was launched, there was hope that accelerated economic growth, sustained by growing international trade, financial flows and technological development, would allow more women to participate in their country's economic and social development. These hopes have not, however, been realized. Moreover, the economic crisis has prevented setting up new programmes for women and the maintenance of those that were already under way. [=] 10070. UN; Department of Technical Cooperation for Development.

"Chapter VI: Attendance and Organization of Work: A. Date and Place of the Conference", in Report of the International Conference on Population, 1984. Mexico City 8/6-14/1984. New York: UN, Department of Technical Cooperation for Development, 1984. E/CONF.76/19. (205) The International Conference on Population was held at Mexico City from 8/6-14/1984 in conformity with General Assembly resolution 38/148 of 12/19/1983. During that period the Conference held 12 plenary meetings. [=] 10071. UN; Department of Technical Cooperation for Development. "Chapter VI: Attendance and Organization of Work: B. Pre-Conference Consultations", in Report of the International Conference on Population, 1984. Mexico City 8/6-14/1984. New York: UN, Department of Technical Cooperation for Development, 1984. E/CONF.76/19. (206) Pre-Conference consultations open to all States invited to participate in the Conference were held at Mexico City on 8/5/1984 to consider a number of procedural and organizational matters. The pre-Conference consultations were conducted under the presidency of Mr. Geronimo Martinez (Mexico) Chairman of the Preparatory Committee. The report on these consultations (A/CONF.76/L.1) was submitted to the Conference and was accepted as the basis for the organization of its work. [=] managed charity to assist Palestinians. Today, UPA stands out as the only Palestinians charity independent of any political affiliation or ideology whose mission is purely humanitarian. Its main objective is to help alleviate the suffering of Palestinians living in the West bank, the Gaza Strip and other Arab countries.

(208) The United Nations Council for Namibia represented Namibia at the Conference. (209) The Palestine Liberation Organization attended the Conference in the capacity of observer. (210) The following national liberation movements were represented by observers: African National Congress (South Africa), Pan African Congress of Azania. (211) Members of the Secretariat of the following United Nations offices were present throughout or during part of the Conference: Office of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Cooperation Department of International Economic and Social Affairs Department of Technical Co-operation for Development. (212) The secretariats of the following regional commissions...

Health Care: Each year, UPA allocates a significant share of its resources to critical and acute health care needs of Palestinians in the areas of medical supplies and emergency relief. Since the Intifadah began in 1987, UPA has contributed over $1 million to health care institutions and rehabilitation centers.

Community Development: UPA funds the development of quality projects that help the largest number of people at the lowest cost. UPA emphasizes indigenous solutions to local needs and encourages projects in which people are involved at every stage of program development, implementation and administration. Priority is given to projects serving particularly deprived communities.

Education: Through its Scholarship Program, UPA offers educational opportunities for promising students with limited means. Each year, partial scholarships are provided to needy and qualified Palestinian students studying at local universities and abroad. UPA also seeks to find projects that improve and modernize Palestinian education and schools.

Child Sponsorship: In response to the escalating number of injured, handicapped, deprived, and orphaned children, UPA's sponsorship program matches caring sponsors with the neediest children. Today, hundreds of children receive monthly allowances through 27 institutions. In addition, many more children benefit from projects supported by UPA's Childrens Fund.

were represented at the Conference: Economic Commission for Europe Economic Commission for Latin America Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific Economic Commission for Africa Economic Commission for Western Asia.

(217) At its first plenary meeting on 8/6/1984, the Conference, by acclamation, elected as its President H.E. Mr. Manuel Bartlett Diaz, Minister of the Interior and head of the delegation of Mexico.

(218) In a statement after his election the President, after thanking the Conference for the honour done to him and to his country, said that Mexico upholds the principles of human brotherhood and equality of rights without distinction as to race, sex or origin. Mexico was, therefore, an appropriate setting for a Conference that was concerned essentially with the conditions of life of human beings.

(219) Tracing the demographic evolution since 1974, he stressed that the history of population changes should not be reflected only in statistical data: social and economic phenomena should also be taken into account, as was stressed in the World Population Plan of Action. At the same time, the position of the individual woman and man was primordial. It was the task of the Conference to contribute, by its recommendations, to the betterment of the equality of life of these individuals and to the full development of their capabilities.

(220) He stressed that while considerable progress had been achieved since 1974 in the realization of the objectives of the Plan of Action, a great many inequality still remained between countries and regions, and even within countries. He expressed the hope that the deliberations of the Conference would lead to a better understanding of the problems that remained and to their solution.

(221) A message from the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics addressed to the participants in the Conference was read by the head of the delegation of the USSR. [–]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

-------------------------------------------------------------------

Afghanistan

12002. ------. "Bitter Fruit of Washington's Anti-Soviet Dirty War: Afghanistan; Hell for Women, part 1", in Workers Vanguard, October 25, 1996, pp. 1 and 3. On 9/27/1996, Kabul, the capital of Afghanistan, fell to the Taliban, a fundamentalist Islamic militia. Four years of horrific rule under a shifting "coalition" of warring factions of reactionary Islamic mujahedin ("holy warriors") had already brought Kabul to the point of famine and devastation. Now, the Taliban killers have begun to wreak bloody vengeance against any vestige of social progress overlooked by the vultures who preceded them. One of their first targets was Najibullah, the pro-Soviet Afghan president ousted by the mujahedin in 1992, who was dragged from his sanctuary in the city's United Nations' compound and beaten, shot and hanged, his body left strung up on the street for several days. Justifying this atrocious act of savagery, a member of Kabul's Taliban council railed that Najibullah "was against Islam. He was a criminal, and he was a Communist." Without question, the chief victims in the consolidation of Islamic fundamentalist reaction in the aftermath of the Soviet military withdrawal in 1989 have been Afghanistan's miserably oppressed women. While the civil war has now resumed, with ethnically based militias which supported the former mujahedin regime launching an offensive against Taliban positions outside Kabul, all the contending forces are deeply reactionary. Among the first acts of the Taliban after seizing Kabul were to bar women from all work, to close down all girls' schools and to order women to remain locked in their homes in purdah (social isolation) unless accompanied by a man. As a result, almost all educational facilities have been shut down, since seventy-five percent of teachers are women, overwhelmingly any and all forces opposed to the Stalinists in power--from sadistic butchered by the Afghan fundamentalists is also on the hands of those leftist organizations internationally which lined up behind United States' imperialism's anti-Soviet dirty war in Afghanistan!

For years, groups like the social-democratic International Socialist Organization, United States' supporters of Tony Cliff's British Socialist Workers' Party, marched in lockstep behind Washington's drive for the defeat of Soviet troops by the mulish-led forces who were openly fighting for the enslavement of women in Afghanistan. Now, they have gotten what they wanted. These self-styled "socialists" contributed, to the extent their limited means allowed, to bringing about the horror which is today being inflicted upon Afghan women. In the nineteenth century, utopian socialist Charles Fourier observed that social progress can be gauged by the status of women in society. This is unambiguously clear in the case of Afghanistan. For Marxists, as indeed for all opponents of women's oppression, taking the side of those fighting the United States' backed Islamic fundamentalists in Afghanistan was as clear and obvious a position as was the support of Karl Marx's First International for the Union forces led by Abraham Lincoln in the American Civil War against slavery. How then, could self-styled socialists like Cliff's International Socialist Organization/Socialist Workers' Party line up with those fighting for the enslavement of women in Afghanistan? The answer lies in their virulent hostility to the Soviet bureaucratically degenerated workers' state. From the moment the Bolshevik Revolution toppled capitalism in Russia in 1917 until the capitalist counter-revolution led by Boris Yeltsin several years ago, the imperialists' central aim was focused on restoring capitalist exploitation in the Soviet Union and overturning the social gains which remain despite decades of Stalinist degeneration. That is why the entire apparatus of political indoctrination in the United States and West Europe was geared to producing hatred for and fear of the Soviet Union. Because groups like the International Socialist Organization bought into the anti-Soviet program propagated by the bourgeoisie, they lined up with any and all forces opposed to the Stalinists in power--from sadistic Islamic fundamentalists in Afghanistan and Iran to the Vatican-backed anti-Communist, anti-Semitic and anti-women Solidarnose movement in Poland. [=]

12003. ------. "Bitter Fruit of Washington's Anti-Soviet Dirty War: Afghanistan; Hell for Women, part 2", in Workers Vanguard, October 25, 1996, p. 3. Historic American Trotskyist leader James P. Cannon, in waging a factional struggle within the then-revolutionary United States' Socialist Workers’ Party against the Shachtman/Burnham minority which argued to abandon the Marxist position of military defense of the Soviet Union, said in 1939: "The question of the Russian revolution and the Soviet state which is its creation has drawn a sharp dividing line through the labor movement of all countries for twenty-two years. The attitude taken toward the Soviet Union throughout all these years has been the decisive criterion separating the genuine revolutionary tendency from all shades and degrees of wavering, backsliders and capitulators to the pressure of the bourgeoisie." In the case of Afghanistan, this dividing line not only separated revolutionaries from reformists, but the opponents of social progress from those who backed, openly or otherwise, medievalist barbarism. Uniquely in modern history, the rights of women were a central issue in the civil war which raged in Afghanistan from the late 1970s to the early 1990s. After coming to power in an April 1978 coup, pro-Moscow intellectuals and army officers in the 1970s, to, most recently, the Taliban cutthroats. Even as women were being beaten and brutalized in the streets of Kabul, Clinton's administration spokesmen rushed to meet with Taliban representatives, hailing the efforts of these medieval killers and torturers to "liberate Afghanistan." The unspeakable hell which has descended on women, teachers, doctors, working people, ethnic and religious minorities and all secular elements in Afghanistan is the bitter fruit of United States' imperialists' unrelenting drive to undermine and destroy the former Soviet Union, whose military presence in Afghanistan in the 1980s was the chief bulwark against Islamic fundamentalist reaction. For over a decade, Washington armed the mujahedin murderers to the hilt, building them up to wage a proxy war against the Soviet Army and the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan. But the blood of very unveiled woman butchered by the Afghan fundamentalists is also on the hands of those People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan sought to implement some minimal reforms to bring the country closer to the twentieth century; land distribution, freeing women from the burka (the head-to-toe "veil"), reducing the bride price to a nominal sum and providing education for girls. However, such basic democratic reforms can be explosive in a cruelly backwards country like Afghanistan, not least because women's subordination in the family has decreed them as the "bearers" of the tradition. But they had the next generation in mind for a withdrawal in the 1980s. The mullahs launched a ferocious jihad (holy war), burning down schools and flaying teachers alive for the "crime" of teaching young girls to read.

When Moscow airlifted Red Army troops to Kabul in December of 1979 to prevent its People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan client regime from falling to the Islamic reactionaries and to protect its southern flank against imperialist incursion, the "Russian question" was posed pointblank. Democratic president Jimmy Carter's savage proxy war against the Soviet troops in Afghanistan and his retaliatory embargo against the Soviet Union were the opening shots of Cold War Two. Under Carter's successor, Republican president Ronald Reagan, the United States spent hundreds of billions of dollars on high tech "Star Wars" weaponry aimed at facilitating a first-strike nuclear attack against the USSR. And over two billion dollars worth of equipment was lavished on the Afghan mujahedin in the biggest Central Intelligence Agency's operation in history. Meanwhile, the capitalist media kept up a hysterical propaganda barrage against the Soviet "evil empire." As consistent defenders of the gains of the October Revolution, we Trotskyists of the International Communist League (then the international Spartacist tendency) proclaimed: "Hail Red Army in Afghanistan! Extend social gains of October Revolution to Afghan peoples!" We warned that the Kremlin bureaucracy reluctantly intervened simply to stabilize a strategically placed client state and might well cut a deal with the imperialists. Nonetheless, sending troops into Afghanistan was an ambigiously decent and progressive act, cutting across the grain of the reactionary Stalinist-nationalist dogma of "socialism in one country," which renounced Lenin's fight for world socialist revolution in favor of a futile quest for "peaceful co-existence" with imperialism. Moreover, we recognized that it was only the Soviet military intervention which offered the possibility of opening the road to emancipation for the hideously oppressed peoples of Afghanistan. If liberation was to come to Afghanistan, it had to come from without. The tiny prolletariat was dwarfed by a far more numerous Islamic clergy, the urban population was surrounded by a sea of nomadic herdsmen and peasants beholden to the khans, the forces of social progress were outweighed by reactionary forces for tradition and the status quo.

The conservative Brezhnev leadership in the Kremlin did not send one hundred thousand Soviet troops to Afghanistan to make a social revolution. But the very presence of these troops brought with it the possibility of social liberation, as did Napoleon's military drive through Europe in the early 1800s in the wake of the Great French Revolution. As Trotsky noted in "The Revolution Betrayed", his definitive analysis of the Stalinist bureaucracy, "In the sphere of national policy, as in the sphere of economy, the Soviet bureaucracy still continues to carry out a certain part of the progressive work, although with immediate overhead expenses. This is especially true of the backwards nationalities of the Union, which must of necessity pass through a more or less prolonged period of borrowing, imitation and assimilation of what exists." Under the Soviet military umbrella, Afghan women were liberated from the veil and trained and brought into the workforce as teachers, nurses, doctors and government functionaries; thousands served as soldiers and commanders in the Afghan army and self-defences militias. The vast gains which were potentially open to the Afghan peoples were visible in the stark contrast between Afghanistan's backwardness and the massive advances in living standards, education, health care and women's rights north of the Amu Darya River in the Soviet Central Asian republics. These achievements were the result of the working-class revolution led by Lenin and Trotsky's Bolshevik Party in October 1917 and extended to Central Asia largely through armed intervention by the Red Army against the mullahs and tribal khans and a campaign by heroic Bolshevik women who even donned the veil as part of a tactic to bring social progress to the women of that backward region.

Following Moscow's military intervention in Afghanistan, the imperialists and their "left" hangers-on rallied against "Soviet expansionism." But far from seeking to incorporate Afghanistan, the Kremlin oligarchy fought the war half-heartedly, despite the fact that Soviet troops were winning the war on the ground in the early 1980s. When Mikhail Gorbachev came to power in 1985, he immediately began talking of a "liquidation of the war." Soviet troops in the hope of a withdrawal from Afghanistan, the United States, wrote to the Afghan government in February 1989, offering to organize international brigades to help fight the Central Intelligence Agency's fundamentalist cutthroats. Though this offer was declined, the Partisan Defense Committee and fraternal organizations around the world responded to an appeal by the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan's regime for funds, raising forty-four thousand dollars in the hope of financing a "peaceful" withdrawal.

12004. ------. "Bitter Fruit of Washington's Anti-Soviet Dirty War: Afghanistan; Hell for Women, part 3", in Workers Vanguard, October 25, 1996, p. 4. As an expression of solidarity, we dispatched a "Workers Solidarity" SolidarcorrespondentitoKabul and Jalalabad. As we wrote at the time: "Jalalabad besieged was the focal point of imperialism's jihad (holy war) against social progress and the Soviet Union. Jalalabad victorious can inspire revolutionary struggle throughout the region, from India to Turkey. That requires above all the program of Leninist internationalism, the banner of the International Communist League." "Front Line Afghanistan", "Workers Vanguard" number 482 (7/21/1989). Our Jalalabad campaign struck a chord among class-struggle fighters everywhere. Contributions poured in from tens of thousands of people around the world: immigrant workers throughout West Europe, Asia and North America; trade unionists; students eager to take a stand against the Central Intelligence Agency; and everywhere from women, including in Muslim communities. It was in the course of this campaign that we decided to launch the International Communist League, underscoring that our tendency, uniquely, fights for the communism of Lenin and Trotsky. The Cliffites responded to the 1979 Soviet intervention by retailing the line of every imperialist government in the world: "Soviet troops out of Afghanistan!" The British "Socialist Worker" (1/12/1980) tried to whitewash the Central Intelligence Agency-backed mujahedenoopposition, saying "it speaks the rhetoric of Islamic fundamentalism. But in this time and place that tells us little." It didn't take a Marxist to know what the "rhetoric of Islamic fundamentalism" and, on the other hand, the Soviet intervention meant for Afghan women. This was recognized even by some Western bourgeois journalists, notably women. Writing as the last Soviet troops were pulling out, Mary Williams Walsh reported in the "Wall Street Journal" (1/19/1989): "The plight of Kabul's women is a poignant reminder that the West's vicarious victory over communist expansion here isn't without its ambiguities. In a backward country where the female peasantry still toils like medieval serfs, Kabuli women have managed to hold on to many twentieth century freedoms.... Instead of staying at home behind purdah walls, they emerge each day and work in offices, hospitals and schools."

The Cliffites opportunistically pose as "revolutionary" opponents of the capitalist rulers, but they take their cue from the reformist leader, who are themselves (in Lenin's words) "social-imperialist" lackeys of the bourgeoisie. But over Afghanistan, the Cliffites even surpassed their reformist Labourite big brothers in abject treachery. The British Cliffites were actually able to make even the artificial border controls of the imperialists' anti-Soviet drive by making common cause with...right-wing Tories. In 1980, Socialist Workers' Party leader Paul Foot, writing in his column in the bourgeois "Daily Mirror", attacked the virulently anti-Communist Conservative government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher from the right by denouncing the possibility that British meat exports to the Soviet Union might be going to Soviet soldiers in Afghanistan. The incendiary "reveals" in Foot's column provoked an anti-Soviet frenzy on the floor of Parliament, helping to justify an escalation of imperialist support to the Afghan mujahedeen. Though particularly flagrant in their embrace of imperialist anti-Sovietism over Afghanistan, the Cliffites were far from unique on the left. After some initial zig zagging, the fake Trotskyist United Secretariat of the late Ernest Mandel issued a statement in 1981 toeing Reagan/Thatcher's line, with the call "For an End to the Soviet Occupation of Afghanistan!" The political bandits of David North's Workers' League and its "International Committee" screamed along with the United States' imperialist rulers that the Soviet intervention was an attack on "the national rights and feelings of the Afghan people" ("Bulletin", 7/8/1986). Somewhat more contradictory was the centrist Workers' Power group in Britain, which arose as a split from Cliff's organization. In response to the imperialist uproar over the Soviet intervention, Workers' Power took a step to the left, breaking from Cliff's absurdly anti-Marxist theory that the Soviet Union was "state capitalist" (without either a capitalist class or a capitalist economy) and announcing its formal adherence to Trotsky's analysis of the Soviet Union as a bureaucratically degenerated workers' state.

But while not calling for an immediate Soviet withdrawal at the time, Workers' Power joined the rest of the anti-soviet Stalinophile left in "condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan" as "counter-revolutionary" ("Workers' Power", February of 1980). When the Kremlin later pulled out of Afghanistan, Workers' Power turned around and denounced the withdrawal. And all the while, they vituperated against our call, "Hail Red Army!" Behind Workers' Power's insistence that the eminently progressive Soviet intervention was counter-revolutionary lay a deeply ingrained anti-Soviet prejudice inherited from their Cliffite origins. But the Cliffites themselves showed no such qualms, consistently supporting the imperialist left. As Gorbachev was preparing the Soviet withdrawal, the International Socialist Organization gloated: "Just as socialists welcomed the defeat of the United States in Vietnam, we welcome the defeat of the Russians in Afghanistan" ("Socialist Worker" [United States], May of 1988). This comparison is truly grotesque! The International Socialist Organization sees no essential difference between medieval fundamentalist killers coming to power in Kabul and the victorious social revolution—which the International Socialist Organization forebears refused to support—that drove United States' imperialism out of Indochina! With the fate they welcomed having come to pass and its horrendous consequences daily described in the bourgeois press, Cliff's Socialist Workers' Party can only wring its hands and hypocritically moan about the "long series of tragedies to beset the Afghan people" ("Socialist Worker", 10/5/1996). Even now, with the Soviet Union gone, the Cliffites continue to whitewash the role of the Islamic fundamentalist anti-woman terrorists and their Pakistani and United States' backers, writing that "the Taliban's success comes from popular disenchantment with the leaders who oppose it" and complaining that "the Taliban has no answer to the terrible crisis of the country." These fundamentalist reactionaries do have an "answer"—a program of all-sided reaction and extermination of even the most modest social advances for women!

Again borrowing from Western imperialist propaganda, the sole fig leaf that the Cliffites and the rest of the anti-Soviet camp offered for their line was that the Soviet intervention violated Afghan "national self-determination." For Marxists, the question of self-determination is subordinated to over-riding class considerations—in the case of Afghanistan, defense of the Soviet Union against imperialism and the struggle against feudal reaction and women's oppression. Moreover, Afghanistan is not a unitary nation, as the Cliffites assert, but a caldron of distinct, feuding nationalities (as well as tribal and other ethnic groupings) that has been artificially bordered by the imperialists to split the Afghans and the Uzbeks into the former Soviet republic of Uzbekistan, while the Tajik people overlap the border with both Tajikistan and Iran. The hue and cry about the "national rights" of "poor little Afghanistan" had about as much validity as the cries of "stated rights" raised by the Confederacy during the American Civil War and again one hundred years later by die-hard Dixie segregationists. Precisely because the Soviet Union was not capitalist/imperialist, the Red Army intervention into Afghanistan, rather than deepening oppression and reinforcing the forces of reaction as imperialism does in its semicolonies, posed the possibility of bringing progress to that backward land of fragmented peoples. As Afghanistan demonstrated, the Cliffites' ludicrous "state capitalist" analysis and their posture as leftist opponents of Stalinism were simply a cover for their profound programmatic hostility to Trotsky's analysis of the Soviet Union as a bureaucratically degenerated workers' state.

12005. ------. "Bitter Fruit of Washington's Anti-Soviet Dirty War: Afghanistan; Hell for Women, part 4", in Workers Vanguard, October 25, 1996, p. 5. Opposition to Stalinism from a revolutionary, Trotskyist standpoint meant defense of the social foundations of the Soviet Union--centrally the existence of a planned collectivized economy, a necessary precondition for the creation of an international classless, communist society. The Trotskyist call for proletarian political revolution to oust the Stalinist usurers was premised on our defense of the gains of October, including our unconditional military defense of the Soviet Union against internationalevolutionary and imperialist attack. In his 1939 speech, "Workers Vanguard" number 181 (11/11/1977). Stalinist treachery and imperialist terror have left Afghanistan devastated, with a total breakdown of transportation, trade and economic life. The country has been turned into a patchwork of regional fiefdoms ruled by ethnically based warlords, with the Taliban, based on the predominant Pashtun grouping, controlling the gutted capital and two-thirds of the country in the south, while the Uzbek region in the north is ruled by Abdul Rashid Dostum and Ahmed Shah Massoud's militia lords over the Tajiks. While Dostum and Massoud's forces are today painted as supposed "moderates" relative to the Taliban, Massoud remains allied with Gulbuddin Heikal, one of the most savage fundamentalist leaders during the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan regime.

The martyrdom of Afghanistan is a direct product of the counter-revolutionary cataclysm which resulted in the restoration of capitalism in East Europe and the former Soviet Union. This has emboldened reactionary forces not only in backward areas like Afghanistan but in West Europe and the United States as well. While various bourgeois commentators are now wagging their fingers over the horrors being carried out by Islamic fundamentalists in Afghanistan, "family values" Christian fundamentalists in the United States also aim to drive women back into the home. This is revealed not only in attacks by "right to life" terrorists on women seeking abortions but in the growing barbarism of the racist capitalist "justice" system (see "California Castration Law," above). The horrors being played out in Afghanistan today are the starkest expression of the choice which has been posed, with increasing sharpness and urgency, throughout this century: socialism or barbarism. Young fighters against social oppression must study and learn the lessons of past struggles and defeats, including the world-historic defeat represented by the destruction of the remaining gains of the October Revolution. Group after group is going forward to win new victories. The International Communist League fight for a new October, both in the United States and around the world. We fight to forge Bolshevik parties internationally to lead the workers--standing at the head of all the oppressed--to power and to a society in which capitalist oppression and enslavement of women are relics of a barbaric past. [9]

12006. --------. "Cruel and Barbaric: California Castration Law," in Workers Vanguard, October 25, 1996, p. 5. California has now become the first state in the country to mandate castration as a form of punishment. On 9/17/1996, Governor Pete Wilson signed a bill, passed with overwhelming bipartisan support in the state legislature, which would force any man convicted twice of "child molestations" to receive injections of the drug Depo-Provera while on parole. Those refusing the injections could be "voluntarily" surgically castrated--having their testicles cut off. Judges will also be able to order chemical castration after a first conviction. Underlining the barbaric character of this legislation, an editorial in the "San Francisco Examiner" exclaimed: "What's the next step? Demanding that robbers have their hands hacked off and liars their tongues cut out?" Usually used as a contraceptive for women, when injected in men Depo-Provera causes the testicles to shrink. The side effects include elevated blood pressure, increased blood clotting and higher risks of diabetes, as well as nightmares, fatigue and severe weight gain. Any doctor who agrees to carry out this treatment won't be practicing medicine but torture, like Hitler's Doctor Mengele, who subjected inmates in Nazi death camps and concentration camps to grisly "experiments" involving sterilization and castration. Republican assemblyman Bill Hoge, author of the bill, railed: "I am sending a message to child molesters of the world that you are not welcome in California." Sheila Kuehl, one of two Democrats in the Assembly to oppose the measure, grotesquely argued that castration was not enough to stop "molesters," insisting that they "need to be kept out of society." The "Examiner" (9/15/1996) reported that "the sole organized support for the measure came from the Women's Coalition, an advocacy group in Hoge's district." In the 1980s, "castrate all rapists" was the battle cry of right-wing feminists--and now it seems they've got their reactionary wish. The concept of mutilating and torturing "sex offenders" belongs in the Dark Ages. And in this deeply racist society, it represents a ghastly return to the worst horrors of the Jim Crow South. As we wrote in 1983 after a South Carolina judge gave three young black men convicted of rape the choice of thirty years in prison or surgical castration: "The American rulers' willingness to snatch up the ancient bloodstained knife, who had taken drugs while pregnant eight years ago, although her child is still a prisoner in the county jail, was arrested in the South Bronx as the "war on crime," a terrifying extension of the legal lynching and racist repression that the capitalist injustice system has unleashed against blacks and the poor. The return of chain gangs, the Congressional ban on education for prisoners, the expansion of the racial death penalty and a host of other measures reflect a sinister impulse to genocide against a layer of the black population. In the past decade, California alone has spent ten billion dollars on new prisons. The authorities are not only doing away with education for prisoners, but are trying to eliminate physical exercise and anything approaching a healthy diet. As a result, prisoners can be expected to grow overweight, weaker, more disease-prone and likely to die earlier. This is a conscious attempt to make the prison population flaccid and controllable. Of course, violent assaults on children are truly terrible crimes, but the California castration law has nothing to do with protecting women and children. Another bill passed by California legislators--one of a series of so-called "Megan's law" being proposed across the country--would incite harassment of "sex offenders" who have been released from prison, by opening up their records and addresses to the public. These viciously punitive measures are the latest installment in a ruling-class drive over the past fifteen years to criminalize sex, and particularly sex with or among youth. The demented lengths to which this hysteria has been taken are seen in the recent "sexual harassment" suspensions of six-year-old kids for kissing their classmates. Many sexual encounters now deemed "illegal" in this violently repressive and anti-sex society are entirely consensual. We are in favor of replacing reactionary "age of consent" laws with the principle of effective consent, applicable to people of all ages. Will someone whose boyfriend or girlfriend is simply considered "too young" now be castrated? California already deems sexual relations between an adult and someone thirteen or younger--and in some cases even seventeen years old--a felony offense that counts under the state's "three strikes" law. In Connecticut recently, school bus driver Kerri Lynn Paterson was sentenced to a maximum of one hundred and fifteen years in prison after a fourteen-year-old male student claimed she had seduced him by casting a spell on him.

The government-engineered witchhunt over "child sexual abuse" has destroyed the lives of hundreds of innocent people who have been prosecuted and imprisoned on the basis of lurid and demented "satanic possession" and "recovred memory" fabrications (see "Satan, the State and Anti-Sex Hysteria," "Women and Revolution" number 45, Winter-Spring 1996). Meanwhile, the deadly anti-welfare bill signed by Clinton in August completely eliminated federal aid providing a minimal lifeline for some twelve million people, more than two-thirds of them children. The bizarre theory that an over-abundance of male hormones causes sex crimes has sinister implications for women. In countries dominated by Islamic fundamentalism, like Afghanistan or Iran, women are forced into stifling head-to-toe "veils" when not confined to the home, ostensibly to prevent men from being driven to rape and to curb the supposedly insatiable sexual appetites of men. In fact, this reactionary institution is aimed at enforcing women's role as the property of their fathers or husbands. And in large parts of Africa, young girls are subjected to the barbaric practice of female genital mutilation in order to supposedly ensure docility and "faithfulness." In the United States as well, women are the ultimate principal target of the anti-sex witchhunt. This is reflected not only in the assault by right-wing bigots on the right to abortion, but in the escalating persecution of women over supposed fetal and child "abuse." Since the 1980s, over two hundred pregnant women in thirty states have been prosecuted for acts as trivial as having a drink, or on the grounds that this could harm their fetuses. In a recent case in Wisconsin, Deborah Zimmerman, a thirty-five-year-old waitress, faces up to fifty years in prison on attempted murder for giving birth to a baby with a high blood alcohol level. In July, the South Carolina Supreme Court reinstated an eight-year prison sentence on "child abuse" charges against a woman who had taken drugs while pregnant eight years ago, although her child is perfectly healthy.

The character has also been an epidemic of "child abuse" prosecutions against poor and minority women who have left their children home alone for a few hours. In October, Carmen Santiago, described by neighbors as a caring mother of nine children, was arrested in the South Bronx along with her boyfriend when she was forced to appear in court to fight an eviction notice and couldn't find a baby sitter. Meanwhile, the courts have torn children away from mothers who are lesbians. In a recent Florida case, Mary Frank Ward's twelve-year-old daughter was taken from her and placed in the custody of her former husband, a convicted murderer who killed his first wife! Behind the gambit of measures criminalizing sex, and the imprisonment of wider layers of the population--under increasingly inhumane conditions--is the drive by the capitalist rulers to enforce social conformity as they seek to increase the exploitation of working people. Meanwhile, masses of ghetto youth deemed "expendable" to the profit system are locked away in prison hellholes. It is a mark of capitalist society in terminal decline that these efforts lead to ever more irrational and byzantine measures reaching back to practices which proliferate before the bourgeois revolutions. Only the destruction of the bourgeoisie’s rule through socialist revolution will put an end to the barbarism exemplified by the “California Reich” castration law. [=]

12007.  ------.  "Economy in Numbers: Rural Poverty Explosion", in Dollars & Sense, June 1993. p. 23. More people now live in cities than in rural areas, for the first time in history. However, this movement has been accompanied by a massive impoverishment of rural populations. The International Fund for Agricultural Development with Islamic The dress code and behavior, President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani condemned Israeli barbarism in Lebanon during the meeting of the Economic Cooperation Organization in Tehran on May 14. Founded by Iran, Pakistan and Turkey in the eighties, its members now include the Central Asian Republics as well as Afghanistan and Azerbaijan. [=]

12010.  ------.  "News in Brief: "Islamic Republic Of Iran", in Crescent International, June 16-30, 1996. p. 2. Rabin Raphel, the US secretary of State for South Asia, told the US senate foreign relations committee on 6/6/1996 that Afghanistan was the source of most "terrorist" activity in the Middle East. Raphel had returned from a visit to Afghanistan on 4/20/1996 where she was warmly welcomed. [=]

12013.  ------.  "Nearly 4 Million Children Have Died in Afghan Wars [in past 15 years; UNICEF reports that most of the deaths could have been prevented, since most resulted from famine and lack of basic health]", in Seattle Times, October 13, 1994. p. A14. [TXT]
Providential protection of the Mosque has come as a fresh message of hope and cheer. It has filled them with the conviction that this Mosque is destined to play a distinct role in the spiritual reconstruction of Berlin that now lies torn and bleeding, materially as well as spiritually. The German people stand rudely shaken and disillusioned — just the mood of mind to receive the message of universal human equality that Islam is. That is what the Hand of Providence has preserved the Mosque for.

Another item appeared shortly afterwards in The Light of 12/8/1945 on page 1. It gives some details of the damage sustained by the Mosque due to "the war that was fought even within its sacred precincts", and reports that the Mosque now lies situated in that zone of divided Berlin which is "under the British Army of occupation". It further reported that Dr. S. M. Abdullah was ready to resume his work in Berlin, and that "the Anjuman has moved the Government of India to get the benefit of priority for a sea passage from India to England and an air passage from England to Berlin."

Imam back in Berlin. Under the above heading, a report appeared in The Light of 2/8/1947 on page 3 which is reproduced below:

Dr. Shaiikh Muhammad Abdullah, M.Sc., Ph.D., Imam of the Mosque, Berlin, it will be recalled, had to quit Germany at the outbreak of war. At the termination of war, this Anjuman was anxious that the activities at the Mosque should be resumed as early as possible. Military occupation, food condition and general dislocation of life in that once Naziland, however, made the prospects of reopening the Mosque and its allied missionary activities extremely gloomy. Even in December last, when the Anjuman decided to take the first step in this direction at any cost and sent Dr. Abdullah to England to study conditions from that quarter, the prospects were none too bright either. It was a leap in the dark and it was almost a settled fact that for sometime to come the Imam will have to mark time and keep himself occupied with some sort of missionary work in England.

God, however, comes to the help of those who move in His way. Dr. Abdullah has been afforded every facility to visit Berlin by the authorities of British occupation. Life in Berlin being still in military control, he has been invested with the Honorary rank of a full Colonel which will enable him to enjoy all the facilities associated with that position.

Beneath this is a report headed Berlin Mosque's S.O.S., which is reproduced below:

Maulana Muhammad Ali, Head of the Lahore Ahmadiyya Movement, has issued an appeal for funds for the repair of the Berlin Mosque, which was damaged in the last phase of the war when Nazi resistance took the form of street fighting. When after victory the Allied forces entered Berlin, the Mosque was found littered with the dead bodies of Nazi youth.

According to the estimate received from a Berlin architect the repairs will cost Rs. 92000, prices and wages having risen four times as compared to pre-war rates. The appeal gives two photographs — one showing the Mosque as it originally stood, the other in its present damaged condition. Should this S.O.S. from this House of God bestir the heart of any son of Islam and he would like to see this sole beacon of Light Divine in the dark heart of Christian Europe restored to its original dignity, he may send his contribution to the Financial Secretary, Ahmadiyya Anjuman Isha'at Islam, Lahore.

Reuter's report. In The Light of 5/24/1949 on page 19, a report from Reuter's Berlin correspondent is reproduced regarding the Berlin Mosque which had appeared in the Pakistan newspapers. It contains a brief history of the Berlin Mosque which we quote below: "The foundation of the Berlin Mosque was laid in 1922 by Maulana Sadr-ud-Din who was deputed by the Ahmadiyya Anjuman Isha'at Islam to deliver the message of Islam to the people of Germany. At the same time, he laid the foundation of the Islamic Mission. Within a couple of years there stood in the heart of the German Capital, with all its grandeur and beauty, a huge building of the Berlin Mosque possessing a fascinating charm. A quarterly magazine in German under the title Muslimische Review was also started which rendered valuable services in disseminating the light of Islam in Central Europe. The strenuous work and the devoted efforts of the Islamic Mission attracted the attention of Germans, and by 1925 about forty people of high reputation embraced Islam. The opening ceremony of the mosque was attended by a large number of new converts to Islam as well as by a distinguished gathering of Muslims from Egypt, Syria, Persia, Afghanistan and India, including Allama Lufti, the leader of Muslims in Russia. In his inaugural speech, Allama Lufti said with a sense of pride that he had studied each and every word of the books of the Mujaddid recommended to him by Maulana Sadr-ud-Din and had found in them the light of truth in abundance which showed that he was in fact the Mujaddid of the time. Besides, Egyptians, Syrians, Iranians and Afghan-delivered lectures and each of them expressed his love and appreciation for the mission. All Muslims were brought under one banner. Dr. Marcus, Dr. Grieffelt and Dr. Banning were among the renowned personalities of the time who, realising the magnetic force of Islam, embraced it and devoted themselves to further the cause of Islam. Dr. Marcus' personality needs no introduction. He is the man whose essays on the Holy Prophet, peace be upon him, left a deep impress upon the mind of Dr. Iqbal who, by way of compliment, observed: "Many a Muslim thinker and philosopher have written a great deal about the Holy Prophet, but none comes up to the mark of Dr. Marcus." His way of presenting the Prophet is unmatched in its beauty, his force irresistible and his sincerity very convincing." Until 1938, the Muslim Mission's work went on smoothly and uninterrupted, but with the outbreak of the war the whole thing was upset. Professor Dr. Abdullah, the then Imam of the Mosque, as an Indian national had to leave Germany. A German doctor and his wife offered their services to Professor Dr. Abdullah to take care of the garden, the Mosque and the house adjacent to it. They decided also to bear themselves the expenses of running the Mosque. Sometime later this doctor joined the army and was killed in action. His wife also left the place. A new convert to Islam, Fran Moslar, then came forward to take care of the Mosque and the house. This magnificent Mosque was built at the cost of Rs. 150000. During the war it served as a spiritual centre not only for hundreds of German converts to Islam but also for the thousands of other Muslims who were drawn to Berlin — Russians, Turks, Egyptians, Afghans, Indians and others. During the war, Muslim prisoners of war from India who happened to be in Germany also went to this Mosque for Id prayers. In the final stages of the war, when Berlin was attacked by the Russian forces, the Germans dug trenches in the Mosque garden and it, therefore, became a target for the invading army. Although the Mosque survived the war, it suffered heavy damage. The dome itself was hit and damaged. One of the two minarets, 95 feet high, was practically destroyed. Its repair cost the Anjuman more than 80000 Rupees. The Mosque is situated in the most fashionable locality of Berlin. Well laid out roads on its three sides with a footpath running side by side, lovely hedges and flower plants with a beautiful lawn in front add to the charm of the Mosque. [–] and a teacher, most of whom were released.

12022. "Workers Freed, UN Resumes Afghan Aid [Taliban frees four workers; seven women aid workers were forced from their jobs]", in New York Times, December 12, 1996. p. A5. [TXT]

12023. Afghanistan: The Revolution Continues: Photobook: Part 1: Introduction. Moscow, RSFSR: Planeta Publishers, 1984. Every day the people of Afghanistan are making confident strides along the road of defending their revolutionary gains, raising their living standards and combating illiteracy, poverty and backwardness. They are scoring ever new victories in their efforts to achieve prosperity and build a life free from social injustice. With every passing day we are consolidating the positions won in our heroic struggle. Every new day brings increasingly humiliating defeats to the enemies of Afghanistan, and our people are determined to hold high the banner of revolutionary struggle. -- BABRAK KAFMAL (General Secretary of the PDPA Central Committee and Chairman of the Revolutionary Council of the DRA).

In January 1985, the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan will mark its 20th anniversary. Its record of glorious and selfless struggle testifies to the Party's wholehearted devotion to its people, its determination to promote the independence and progress of the mother country, friendship with all nations of the world. The PDPA was formed on 1/1/1965, in conditions that were favorable both within the country and internationally. Its aim was to lighten the hard lot of the suppressed peoples of Afghanistan. A successor to the advanced movement of the Afghan people, the Party had a rich new revolutionary content, based as it was on the transforming ideology of the working class and on unshakeable loyalty to proletarian internationalism. The formation of the PDPA was a major event in the political life of Afghanistan. The Party opened a possibility, for the first time in history, of emancipation of the Afghan people from oppression and exploitation by the pro-imperialist ruling classes and indicated the way to achieve this aim. Through ceaseless struggle the PDPA managed to rally an organized movement of the Afghan people round the young working class, to impart to it an anti-feudal and anti-imperialist bent, to infuse it with a spirit of proletarian internationalism and unbreakable friendship with the Soviet Union, which represents an invincible bulwark of peace, progress and socialism. The PDPA has exercised a tremendous influence on all aspects of the life of the Afghan people. Convincing testimony to this is provided by the spread of progressive ideas among the working masses, the establishment of an advanced press (publication of the newspapers Khalk and Parcham), the formation of mass organizations of workers, peasants, young people and women, the introduction of progressive international customs and traditions to the country's revolutionary movement such as celebration of May Day and of the anniversaries of the Great October Socialist Revolution and other memorable dates commemorating important events in the struggle of the working class; and consistent and selfless support for the struggle of all revolutionary forces the world over. The scientifically substantiated documents of the PDPA—its Rules and Programme—have played an immense guiding role in the entire revolutionary movement in Afghanistan.

The PDPA has based its activities on a precise knowledge of the actual conditions in Afghan society and chosen various methods and means of struggle corresponding to the needs of the time and the political situation in the country. The Party combined peaceful, legal forms of struggle (strikes, marches, demonstrations, electoral campaigns, the parliamentary rostrum) with illegal ones (setting up an underground military organization) It was able to correctly analyse the actual situation in the country, to head the revolutionary movement of the people and to lead it to the victory of the April Revolution. Reaction and the imperialists, with the help of their agents within the revolutionary movement of the Afghan people and in the ranks of the PDPA, were able to deal severe blows at the unity of action of the national and democratic forces, at the unity of the Party. Hafizullah Amin and his criminal gang, by their treacherous actions, disrupted, for a time, the Party. However, the concerted demand of all members of the PDPA to restore unity was a powerful factor in opposing the attempts of the splitters. At its historical conference of 1977 the Party restored iron-tight unity of its ranks. The experience of the PDPA is yet another confirmation that unity constitutes a pledge of great victories. The restoration of its unity enabled the Party to centralize the leadership of the popular struggle to overthrow the despotic rule of the feudal, comprador bourgeoisie and the corrupt bureaucratic ruling clique and achieve the victory of the April National-Democratic Revolution of 1978. The April Revolution fully met the objective needs and aspirations of the broad classes and strata of Afghan society. From the very beginning it was given all-round support by the population of the country. Because of the backwardness of Afghan society, the intrigues and provocative actions staged by regional reaction and international imperialism, the path of the Revolution proved a thorny one. There have been mistakes and deviations from the course mapped out by the Party and the revolutionary government. Amin and his criminal gang bear full responsibility for these deviations.

The inherent vitality of the April Revolution predetermined the victory of the correct, revolutionary line. With the beginning of a new stage in the development of the Revolution at the end of 12/1979, the course of events turned in the right direction. The present and future generations of Afghan people will never forget the great role of the fraternal assistance rendered by the great Land of Soviets in support of the revolutionary course of the PDPA and the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, in restoring the revolutionary gains and defending its territorial/integrity, independence and national sovereignty. Despite the undeclared criminal war unleashed by reaction and imperialism against the people of Afghanistan, which continues to this day, the April Revolution guided by the PDPA has achieved considerable successes within a short period. A democratic Land Reform in the interests and with the participation of landless and small-holding peasants has been launched in the country. This is the chief victory of the National-Democratic Revolution. The economic life of the country has been placed on a planned foundation. Unification of all national, patriotic and democratic forces of the country, which has been one of the principal goals of the PDPA from the moment of its formation, found its expression in the setting up of the broad National Fatherland Front. Consolidation and resumption of the activities of the democratic organizations of young people, women, and the trade unions of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, the establishment of peasant cooperatives and organization of unions of creative intelligentsia have provided favorable conditions for broad participation by the popular masses in the administration of the country and exercising democracy. Adoption of The Fundamental Principles of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, a provisional constitution for the country, and of the Law on Local Government Bodies were important landmarks on the path to further democratization of social and political life in Afghan society.

At present a cultural revolution is firmly under way in Afghanistan. In carrying it out account is being taken of the ethnic, religious, language and tribal specifics and the customs and traditions of the various peoples inhabiting Afghanistan. In the Programme of Action of the PDPA it was noted: "The Democratic Republic of Afghanistan is the first state in the history of our glorious homeland determined to ensure full and real equality and equal opportunities for the growth of material prosperity and spiritual development of all peoples, ethnic entities and tribes in the country. All peoples, ethnic entities and tribes are ensured and guaranteed equal opportunities for participation in social and state affairs, in effecting revolutionary transformations and defending our beloved homeland." A nation-wide campaign to combat illiteracy has become an essential part of the country's cultural revolution. A growing number of Afghans are mastering the skills of reading and writing. Over one million Afghan citizens have learnt to read and write since the 4/1978, and over 500000 are presently attending literacy courses. Thanks to the active support of the popular masses the ranks of the defenders of the April Revolution are swelling. The republic's Armed Forces have registered an unprecedented qualitative and quantitative growth in the last few years. Never before in its history has Afghanistan had an army which, in terms of its conscience, conviction, loyalty to internationalism, and the will to serve the working people, could equal the republic's present-day heroic Armed Forces. That is a new trend in the political life of Afghan society, which strengthens the ties between the Army and the people and is proof of their active participation in defending the Revolution, and the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the DRA. Under the guidance of the PDPA, the international prestige of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan is being enhanced, and the support of all revolutionary, progressive, and peace-loving forces is growing. These forces are led by the Soviet Union, a sincere friend and protector of the Afghan people and the April Revolution. Speaking about the foreign policy of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan Babrak Karmal, General Secretary of the PDPA Central Committee and Chairman of the Revolutionary Council of the DRA, said, "We are marching in line with all the peace-loving forces of the planet, and together we will fight militarism, colonialism and neo-colonialism, imperialism, Zionism, fascism, racism and apartheid.*

A principled and consistent stand as regards the Afghan Revolution has become a touchstone in judging proletarian internationalism in action. The PDPA has close ties with many workers' and revolutionary-democratic parties and national liberation movements. The Democratic Republic of Afghanistan maintains diplomatic relations with 80 countries. Its fraternal relations with the Soviet Union have successfully developed during the past years. The Party is concentrating its efforts on consolidating unity within its ranks, which is confirmed by the decisions of the National Conference of the PDPA held in 3/1982, and of subsequent plenary meetings of the PDPA Central Committee. The Party has evolved a precise organizational structure both in the centre and in the provinces. At the present moment there are 31 provincial and 26 city Party committees, which have an equal standing; there are also 36 regional and over 200 district Party committees. The growing membership of the PDPA, which is now 120000-strong, is a confirmation of the unity and cohesion of its ranks, and of its firm ties with the masses. "The members of Party committees, Party functionaries, and Party-activists as a whole, said Babrak Karmal, General Secretary Of the PDPA Central Committee, make up a mighty force, which can and must bring new life into Party work and make it more effective, enhance the influence of the Party among the working people, and achieve an atmosphere conducive to creative and constructive labour at the local level in conditions of peace."

The position of the Party as the leading and guiding force of Afghan society is constantly strengthening. The unity and solidarity of all classes and democratically-minded strata of the population, ethnic minorities, the clergy and the ulama are growing stronger in the DRA with every passing day. And with each day their implacable hatred of the counter-revolutionary forces, both inside and outside the country, is mounting, for these forces express the class interests of the big landowners, comprador bourgeoisie, and reactionary bureaucracy overthrown by the April Revolution, and the interests of imperialist powers with the United States in the lead. The people of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, inspired by their faith in the bright future of the Revolution, are working to realize the Programme of Action of the PDPA, to build a new, humane society in Afghanistan and ensure equality and happiness for all women, men and children. The Revolution, the hope and stanchion of Foundations have also been laid for gas and oil production, coal mining, and all the toilers of the country on the basis of the will of the vast masses, profound respect and strict observance of the historical, cultural and religious traditions of the people with definite adherence to the principles of Islam as a sacred religion, respect for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights through policies of peace, friendship and cooperation with all peoples of the region and the world. -- The Fundamental Principles of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. [Extract]

The Democratic Organization of the Women of Afghanistan works for equal rights for Afghan women in all spheres of the country's public life, for peace, against reaction and imperialism. The organization is also working to eliminate illiteracy, raise the political, professional and cultural level of Afghan women and help them become more active in bringing up the rising generation.

Despite all the efforts of internal and external reactionaries to make our people suffer, the Party and revolutionary government confidently pursue their policy aimed at resolving the country's economic, social, national and cultural problems, the policy of securing a lasting peace in the country. The present military and political situation in Afghanistan can be described as a continuously growing supremacy of our revolutionary forces over counter-revolutionaries. The inevitable outcome will be the latter's complete surrender. The PDPA's leading role in state affairs and public life is increasing steadily, and its ranks are growing strong and numerous. Party committees and organizations have gained a certain organizational and political experience of working with the masses. As a result, they have become more efficient in dealing with current affairs in the provinces, cities, districts, areas and work teams. The influence of the Party bodies, in which the people see an active part in state affairs and defending national interests, is also growing continuously. The Party and revolutionary government place a great emphasis on fighting against counter-revolution, building up the Armed Forces, making Army political bodies, Party committees and organizations more active; developing and reinforcing local self-defence units and extending the links between the Armed Forces and the people. -- The Resolution of the 14th Plenary Meeting of the PDPA Central Committee. [Extract] [+]

12025. ------. Afghanistan: The Revolution Continues: Photobook: Part 5: Birth of Industrial Afghanistan. Moscow, RSFSR: Planeta Publishers, 1984. The working class strides in the first ranks of the revolutionary movement to build a new Afghanistan. The April Revolution has liberated the workers from the exploiters and made them co-owners of the means of production at state-owned enterprises. In alliance with rural folk they now constitute the main bulwark of state power. The qualitative and quantitative growth of the Afghan working class is taking place against a breakdown of old social relations and the consolidation and expansion of the state industrial sector. This is being furthered by the economic policy of the PDPA, which is working for creation in the country of a firm and dynamic industrial base. In recent years the metal-working and engineering industries have been given priority development. Foundations have also been laid for gas and oil production, coal mining, electrotechnical engineering and other branches. The road haulage system, which accounts for 95% of all freight transportation in Afghanistan, is being further perfected. Of the 200-odd big and medium-sized state-owned and mixed industrial enterprises in the DRA more than half were built with the USSR's economic and technical assistance.

The textile industry has come on considerably in the DRA. Its largest enterprises are situated in Kabul, Kandahar, Balkh, Jabad-us-Siraj, and Pul-i-Khumri. Some belong to the state, some are managed by the mixed company Afghan Textile. They produce practically a full range of factory made cotton and woolen textiles, as well as rayon fabrics, yarn, thread and knitted goods.

With each year the assortment of products of the Kabul House-Building Enterprise is expanded. Today it includes elements of apartment houses, schools, kindergartens, boarding schools and industrial buildings. There are many women employed at the enterprise in various jobs that were formerly only accessible to men such as bricklayers, drivers of special cars and trucks. Constantly expanding housing and industrial construction requires large quantities of cement and other building materials. They are produced at the cement works in Pul-i-Khurmi and Jabal-us-Siraj, the Kabul Ashton Works and a number of smaller enterprises.

The truck today is the main type of transport in the DRA. Its prevalence and the development of the highway network in the republic has been due to the landscape of the country with its predominantly mountainous or desert regions. Perfecting the territorial distribution of the productive forces in the country and levelling out the economic and social development of the province demands a novel approach to transport. Here, too, the republic receives help from the Soviet Union, which sends experts in road construction and road-construction machinery and big trucks. A big role in transportation is played by the Afghan-Soviet Transportation Co. (AFSOTR) which is responsible for cross-border road haulage and transit haulage across the territory of the DRA. The work of transport and communications in the republic is at present hampered by the sabotage activities perpetrated by bands of hirelings infiltrating the country from abroad. The government is necessitated to detail large forces to protect roads and other communication lines. [=]

12026. --------. Afghanistan: The Revolution Continues; Photobook: Part 6: Road to Knowledge and Progress. Moscow, RSFSR: Planeta Publishers, 1984. The April Revolution has opened broad prospects for the Afghan people in the sphere of cultural development. Among the first measures of the revolutionary government was development of a new comprehensive programme for restructuring the entire system of education, which envisages, among other things, introduction of free universal compulsory elementary education and expansion of the network of educational establishments. A nation-wide campaign against illiteracy has been launched on the initiative of the PDPA. Numerous courses for adults and evening schools for young workers have been opened. Instruction of adults is completely voluntary. It is planned to teach people to read and write and to interest them in active public life, to help them understand the significance of the measures taken by the PDPA to build a new society in the country and to defend the gains of the Revolution. The Soviet Union is helping Afghanistan train qualified personnel. Soviet staff teach in Afghan higher establishments and many Afghan young men and women are sent to receive a higher education at Soviet institutions of higher learning. The Party pays unflagging attention to the mass media and use them in ideological work. Favorable conditions have been provided in the country for the development of national literature, theatre and art, for the spread of physical education and sports. Care for working people’s health, especially of the rising generation, is a law for all Party and state bodies. [=]

12027. --------. Editorial: “Algeria’s Long Night Of Agony”, in Crescent International, January 1, 1995. Algerians go through the third anniversary of military rule this month. This is one anniversary the Muslims, especially those in Algeria, can well do without. Since the cancellation of elections and annulment on 1/11/1992 of the first round (held on 12/26/1991) which the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) won hands down, the people of Algeria have faced the junta’s heavy boot. At least 30000 people have been killed. Even Amnesty International (no friend of the Muslims!) has admitted that 20000 people have died in three years, most shot by soldiers. The junta’s brutal crackdown has not only been supported but also applauded by the west. France is in the forefront of this campaign. The west’s anti-Islamic animus is revealed in every action, big or small, that it takes. From the expulsion of outspoken imams to the clampdown on wearing of hijab by young Muslim school girls, the policy is clear: no manifestation of Islamic sentiment will be tolerated in France. The west’s threshold of tolerance is extremely low. It is for democracy so long as it likes the winner. It will tolerate Muslims in their midst only when they live as docile, helpless creatures on reservations (witness the plight of Muslims in Bosnia). Any demand for their rights will be put down ruthlessly. This, however, should not surprise anyone. It was naive of the western powers during the elections, through their silence, to be allowed to assume power in Algeria peacefully. No ruling elites, especially those in the Muslim world, have ever or will ever give up power voluntarily. They have to be driven out of office through the street power of the Islamic movement. Even if one tyrant is thrown out, as was done in Iran, there is enough residual resistance in the bureaucracy as well as the armed forces, that will make the functioning of the Islamic government very difficult. Iran has paid heavy price for this. Others will go through a similar process. There are, unfortunately no short-cuts in this struggle. We had cautioned in these columns (Editorial, 5/16/1991), seven months prior to the elections in Algeria, that the electoral route is a minefield for the Islamic movement. The ruling elites have a number of options at their disposal that they can and will use to ambush the Islamic movement. These include manipulating electoral boundaries, rigging the elections and if all else fails, to call out the army to frustrate the aspirations of the people. This is exactly what happened in Algeria. The only choice left for Muslims is armed struggle to defeat the army or more precisely, to create a breach between the lower and upper ranks. When the soldiers get fed up of killing their own kith and kin, they will turn their guns on the officers giving out the orders to shoot. Iran’s example again springs to mind during the struggle to overthrow the shah in 1978/79. This stage may be fast approaching in Algeria as well. There are already reports of mass defections from the rank and file. An added factor is what is called the ‘Afghan veterans’, committed Algerian Muslim youths who had served with the jihad in Afghanistan and become seasoned guerrilla fighters. These battle-hardened veterans have liberated large parts of the Algerian countryside. In Algeria, the FIS has operated at two levels - the political party as well as the movement. Clearly, the political party route proved limited in usefulness even though it demonstrated the support the FIS enjoys among the masses. Despite this demonstration, the movement has had to fight the military-backed junta in the streets. It means the FIS will have to offer something more. Naturally, it will demand sacrifices but without offering a hundred thousand or more martyrs, the back of the junta will not be so easily broken. The martyrs’ blood will create a permanent barrier between the corrupt elites, their western backers and the ordinary people of Algeria led by the Islamic movement. The FIS must intensify the struggle and move on to the next, and hopefully, the final stage. There is no turning back. Allah will, insha’Allah, reward their sacrifices. The people of Algeria may yet become the catalyst for change throughout the Arabic-speaking world. [=] media (New York Times, 10/8/1996, for instance) have asked for three things from the Taleban: "stop the export of drugs, weapons and terrorism." Floodling Afghanistan with weapons is, presumably, all right. As long as the Afghans kill each other with weapons supplied by the west and paid for by Saudi Arabia, it is welcomed. By "export of terrorism," the Times really means preventing Islamic activists, being hunted down by the Arab regimes, from seeking shelter in Afghanistan. It is on the question of drugs that the west will find that their own "fundamentalists" are the real culprits. According to the UN Drug Control Program (UNDCP) for 1996, opium production in Helmand and Nangarhar provinces increased by 80% over last year (Helmand has been under Taleban control for two years and Nangarhar just fell to them). Similarly, opium production in Oruzgan and Qandahar has also gone up. So much for the Taleban's restrictions on drugs. There is quick money to be made in drugs and the Taleban are not likely to pass such an opportunity.

The Taleban have achieved one thing though: they have united all other Afghans for a common purpose. The only other time the Afghans were united was when they faced the Red Army in Afghanistan. The Taleban have brought such disparate groups as Abdul Rashid Dostum's Uzbek militia, Burhanuddin Rabbani/Ahmed Shah Masoud's Tajiks and the Shias of Hazarajat, together. Afghanistan is now divided along ethnic lines: the Taleban (Pushthuns) on one side and all the rest on the other. It may be asked: what is in all this for Pakistan? Islamabad's exacerbation with the bickering Afghan leaders was real but little effort was made to patch things up. Pakistan wanted a puppet regime in Kabul. This is an impossible dream which ignores history. Even the Taleban are not likely to play Pakistan's puppets for long; this is not the Afghan character. Recent developments have resulted in splitting Afghanistan along the north-south fault-line. It will frustrate Pakistan's desire for a road link to Central Asia. In fact, the Central Asian republics have already reacted with anger and alarm to developments in Kabul. The other, more serious, danger is the spill-over effect of the Taleban's victory onto the sectarian conflict in Pakistan. At present, it is at a low level but if the Parachinar experience in the Kurram Agency along the border with Afghanistan is any guide, it will have serious consequences. Sectarian passions, once aroused, may be difficult to contain. Pakistan may be playing a dangerous game for dubious economic gains and to please Uncle Sam. [=-]

12029. -------. Kirghiz Soviet Socialist Republic: Part 16: Bonds of Friendship. Moscow, RSFSR: Novosty Press Agency Publishing House, N.D. [1968]. The mountains of Kirghizia are high, but they do not create a barrier to the outside world. Kirghizia has stable international economic ties. Kirghiz goods are sold in more than 50 countries. This includes electrical and agricultural machines, metal cutting lathes and instruments, non-ferrous metals and pumps, melted fat, dried fruits, cotton fibre, fermented tobacco, silk thread and other goods. Kirghizia imports various machines, equipment, machine-tools, and consumer goods. Thus, Czechoslovakia supplies her with equipment for the cement, meat and dairy industries and canning plants; the GDR, with sugar refining apparatus, and printing presses; Hungary, with equipment for an electric lamp works; Poland, with machinery for the primary processing of wool; and Italy, with cotton-printing machinery, etc. The country's workers in science and the arts maintain friendly ties with their foreign colleagues. Thus, the Central Scientific Library of the Academy of Sciences of the Kirghiz SSR exchanges books and periodicals with more than 100 libraries of academies and institutes in dozens of foreign countries. The books exchanged deal with technology, mathematics, physics, chemistry, medicine, history, philosophy, literature, language, geography, economics, etc. The Botanical Gardens of the Kirghiz Academy of Sciences have extensive ties with their counterparts in dozens of foreign countries, exchanging catalogues, plants and seeds. The works of Kirghiz scientists and the books of Kirghiz writers are sent abroad and are translated into the languages of many nations. The paintings of Kirghiz artists S.Chuikov, G. Aitiev, A.Usubaliev and others have been on show in India, Italy, Afghanistan, Burma and Ceylon. Every year, more and more Kirghiz travel abroad, some to make a study of industrial production and farming, others to attend scientific conferences and recitals, compete in athletic contests or simply to have a look. Kirghiz athletes probably travel most, and have been to the United States, Britain, Afghanistan, Brazil, Hungary, the GDR, Italy, Mongolia, Pakistan, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, the FRG, France, Japan and other countries. There are many foreign visitors to Kirghizia, among them scientists and scholars, writers, statesmen and public figures, and they are all given a most heartfelt welcome by the people of Kirghizia. [=-]

12030. -------. Press Release: NGOs Do Less in Kabul until Clear if Women Can Work. Reuters, March 2, 1997. NGOs are slowing down their work in Kabul until the issue regarding their female employees can be settled. Due to the gender policies of the Taleban Islamic Movement, women have not been allowed to go to work. Though the Taleban ministries have authorized women aid workers to return to the medical and health sectors, the Taleban militia is still punishing those who do so, according to Ross Everson of the Agency Coordinating Body for Afghanistan. Everson is asking for the ministers to make their authorizations public in order to avoid any miscommunications or misunderstandings with the militia. [TXT]

Algeria: 150.
Bahrain: 78.
Egypt: 170.
Ethiopia: 162.
Iran: 150.
Iraq: 111.
Israel: 25.
Jordan: 102.
Kuwait: 55.
Lebanon: 52.
Libya: 130.
Oman: 186.
Pakistan: 145.
Qatar: 85.
Saudi Arabia: 140.
Somalia: 162.
Sudan: 156.
Syria: 107.
Tunisia: 138.
Turkey: 153.
UAE: 85.
North Yemen: 186.
South Yemen: 186. [=-]
The colonial imposed system in Muslim societies. Support of the heroin trade, bribery, assassinations and the manipulation of the people's will, were all taken to task for bringing misery to the Muslims. In his welcoming remarks, Brother Ismail Kalla, a prime force behind the conference, pointed out that if Muslims committed themselves to the way of Allah and did not compromise with the forces of kufr and taghoot, Imam Muhammad al-Asi talked about the struggle in Palestine. With so much happening there in recent days and weeks, it was a stirring performance in which the Arab rulers, Yassir Arafat and the Zionists as well as their American masters were all taken to task for butchering Muslims while crying about the plight of a handful of Zionists.

He rejected the nonsensical notion that Muslims were being offered peace. He said that there was no peace for Muslims, only brutality and collective punishments. Peace meant that the Zionists should be allowed to enjoy their ill-gotten gains made through the dispossessions and slaughters of innocent Muslims. Imam Abdul Alim Musa, no stranger to South Africa, like the other imam from Washington DC, was his usual eloquent self. Imam Musa has been recognized by Allah to present the most serious issues in such a humorous way as to penetrate the heart of the audience. He addressed the issue of the west's exploitative policies and why America feared Islam. He said that America and its leaders were all thoroughly corrupt and on their deathbed. They fear Islam because it forbids fornication, usury, robbery, drugs, alcohol and other evils that are rampant in the American society.

In the evening, Dr. Kalim Siddiqui delivered the keynote address. Emerging from his serious illness in 6/1995, Dr. Kalim's arrival was eagerly awaited in South Africa. Muslims around the world, especially in South Africa, had prayed for his health. Allah, in His infinite mercy, answered their prayers and restored Dr. Kalim to health when many others had become quite apprehensive. He spoke on the conference theme, "Creating a new civilization of Islam." Despite his illness and now admittedly not so good health, he gave a stirring performance. He held the audience in thrall. For many, his writings and speeches have been their constant sources of understanding the issues confronting the world of Islam. His ideas have stood the test of time and have been proved correct. At the conference, his latest book, "Creating a new civilization of Islam," Muslims once again demonstrated the unity of the Ummah by attending in record numbers. There was great excitement as speakers outlined what had gone wrong in the Ummah and how to restore it to health. The attendance of thousands of people - men, women and children - had surpassed the estimates of the organizers. Those who attended were not disappointed. Interestingly, much publicity for the conference was also presented when the Zionists and their Arab allies launched a propaganda campaign to discredit the conference. It totally backfired on them and in the process helped publicize the conference more than it would have otherwise been possible.

Aside from the conference there were workshops and seminars dealing with such topics as the Global Islamic Movement, Developing the Islamic Media and getting on the Electronic highway, "Women in the Middle East and North Africa - Afghanistan." www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Turkey: 76.
UAE: 32.
North Yemen: 120.
South Yemen: 120.

Afghanistan: 9000.
Algeria: 300.
Bahrain: 300.
Egypt: 800.
Ethiopia: 5000.
Iran: 1200.
Iraq: 2300.
Israel: 100.
Jordan: 1100.
Kuwait: 200.
Libya: 400.
Morocco: 900.
Oman: 800.
Pakistan: 10500.
Qatar: 500.
Saudi Arabia: 700.
Somalia: 2500.
Sudan: 1400.
Syria: 1400.
Tunisia: 1000.
Turkey: 1200.
UAE: 400.
North Yemen: 3400.
South Yemen: 800. [m]

The largest conference ever held in South Africa got off to an electrifying start with a stirring khutbah by Imam Muhammad al-Asi from Washington DC. The presence of thousands of Muslim men, women and children, was a remarkable sight. The overall theme of the conference, organized by the Crescent International from 4/5-7/1996 in Pretoria, was "Creating a new civilization of Islam." Muslims once again demonstrated the unity of the Ummah by attending in record numbers. There was great excitement as speakers outlined what had gone wrong in the Ummah and how to restore it to health. The attendance of thousands of people - men, women and children - had surpassed the estimates of the organizers. Those who attended were not disappointed. Interestingly, much publicity for the conference was also presented when the Zionists and their Arab allies launched a propaganda campaign to discredit the conference. It totally backfired on them and in the process helped publicize the conference more than it would have otherwise been possible. Despite the immense suffering to which Muslims have been subjected from Srinagar to Sarajevo and from Palestine to Chechnya and as far as Mindanao and Acheh-Sumatra in Southeast Asia, there was no feeling of dejection at the Developing the Islamic Media and getting on the Electronic highway, "Creating a new civilization of Islam." Despite his illness and now admittedly not so good health, he gave a stirring performance. He held the audience in thrall. For many, his writings and speeches have been their constant sources of understanding the issues confronting the world of Islam. His ideas have stood the test of time and have been proved correct. At the conference, his latest book, "Creating a new civilization of Islam," Muslims once again demonstrated the unity of the Ummah by attending in record numbers. There was great excitement as speakers outlined what had gone wrong in the Ummah and how to restore it to health. The attendance of thousands of people - men, women and children - had surpassed the estimates of the organizers. Those who attended were not disappointed. Interestingly, much publicity for the conference was also presented when the Zionists and their Arab allies launched a propaganda campaign to discredit the conference. It totally backfired on them and in the process helped publicize the conference more than it would have otherwise been possible. Despite the immense suffering to which Muslims have been subjected from Srinagar to Sarajevo and from Palestine to Chechnya and as far as Mindanao and Acheh-Sumatra in Southeast Asia, there was no feeling of dejection at the conference. Repeatedly speakers pointed out that if the Muslims are undergoing a difficult phase in their lives, it is a test from Allah. What is in South Africa already but had to rush back to Sarajevo after receiving an emergency call. The issue of Bosnia, however, was not forgotten. More than any other crisis, Bosnia has made Muslims aware of the deep animosity the west harbors towards Islam and Muslims. Dr. Yequab Zaki, formerly visiting professor at Harvard and member of the Muslim Parliament, Janghang Muhammad, deputy leader of the Muslim Parliament, and Iqbal Siddiqui, research fellow at the Muslim Institute, also spoke. A large number of other speakers, both local as well as from overseas, presented their ideas. Other topics discussed were the situation in Algeria, the Arabian Peninsula, the era of political parties and the continuing war in Afghanistan. The west's vicious propaganda war against Islam was also analyzed and discussed at length. A number of workshops dealing with such topics as the Global Islamic Movement, Developing the Islamic Media and getting on the Electronic highway, "Women in the Middle East and North Africa - Afghanistan." www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Turkey: 76.
UAE: 32.
North Yemen: 120.
South Yemen: 120.

Afghanistan: 9000.
Algeria: 300.
Bahrain: 300.
Egypt: 800.
Ethiopia: 5000.
Iran: 1200.
Iraq: 2300.
Israel: 100.
Jordan: 1100.
Kuwait: 200.
Libya: 400.
Morocco: 900.
Oman: 800.
Pakistan: 10500.
Qatar: 500.
Saudi Arabia: 700.
Somalia: 2500.
Sudan: 1400.
Syria: 1400.
Tunisia: 1000.
Turkey: 1200.
UAE: 400.
North Yemen: 3400.
South Yemen: 800. [m]
performance of Amb. Jeanne Kirkpatrick who shed crocodile tears as she related false Soviet atrocity stories. At that time, Najibullah was reporting the distribution of farmland to 335000 landless peasant families in the land reform, with 47% growth of the state and cooperative sector, and with industrial production up 25%. Literacy programs had educated 1.5 million people to read and write, with the fullest equality of women possible. Now, the US-backed Taliban is reversing every advance brought by the Communists to Afghanistan. The photograph of Najibullah’s body on the front page of the New York Times was a deliberate warning to anyone in the world who would struggle to create a better life for the people. [TEXT] 12036. CWS. Afghanistan Emergency First Alert. Church World Service, October 4, 1996. Hundreds of residents of Kabul are fleeing the Afghan capital following last week’s victory of the Taleban militia, which seeks to establish a strict Islamic state. Taleban fighters seized the capital from the relatively moderate Islamic government of President Burhanuddin Rabbani last week.

Many of those fleeing Kabul are members of the educated middle-class who fear imposition of strict religious rules, including the banning of non-television, movies and music, and public separation of the sexes. As a result, schools and colleges in Kabul, where 70% of teachers are women, have yet to reopen a week after the Taleban takeover.

Women doctors and nurses are still working at city hospitals assisted by the International Committee of the Red Cross, but not all have returned to their posts for fear of harassment. They may care only for female patients.

The scene in Kabul is a chaotic mix of people and horn-blaring minibuses, according to news reports. Many of those leaving are headed for Pakistan. The militia have stopped some Kabul residents from leaving with their household goods and families.

Last week, Ashe Michael of the CWS Pakistan office, and Lonnie Turnipseed, former CWS director who is now providing ongoing consultation, entered Afghanistan and remained there three days before returning to Pakistan. They reported heavy fighting and said people were "in a panic."

Call the CWS HOTLINE for updates: (800) 456-1310. [ ]

12037. Crossette, Barbara. "Half the World Lacks Sanitation, Says UNICEF; Cause of New Plagues, Resurgence of Old Diseases and Deaths of Children", in New York Times, July 23, 1997. p. A9. Nearly three billion people have no access to even minimally sanitary toilets; this is the major cause of 2.2 million deaths among children from diarrhea and related diseases. The number of people lacking such access has risen 300 million from 1990. Akhtar Hameed Khan, lead of conference under United Nations auspices at which all parties to the Gulf War to Pakistan. They reported heavy fighting and said people were "in a panic."

Call the CWS HOTLINE for updates: (800) 456-1310. [ ]
the illegal colonizing settlement of Israelis in the occupied Palestinian Territories with the escalation of the continuing process of the alienation of the indigenous Palestinians and the annexation of their land, and attempts to expel them out of their national homeland. We demand the immediate cessation of the construction and expansion of all Israeli settlements in occupied Palestine as a precondition to any peace process.

We draw attention to the fact that Jewish immigration poses a great threat to Palestinian survival on their land and is an obstacle to the resolution of the Palestinian problem due to the ensuing demographic changes. This is especially true while the Palestinians continue to be denied their right to return. We call upon new immigrants to Israel and all Israelis to refuse to settle in the occupied Palestinian Territories, and thus contribute to the efforts for a just settlement of the question of Palestine. We furthermore call upon the Soviet Union to refrain from facilitating Jewish immigration to Israel.

We denounce the double standard of the United States Government, characterized by its attitude with respect to the Palestinian right of self-determination as compared to that of Israel. We also condemn the United States Government’s attempt to evade the need to convene the International Conference on the Middle East under the auspices of the United Nations, and its reluctance to take the necessary measures in order to overcome Israel’s refusal to accept the principle of “land for peace” and bring a halt to its settlement activities in the occupied territories of the Golan, West Bank, including East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip.

We oppose the massive and unconditional aid to Israel provided by the United States and other States which underwrite the continuing occupation. We call upon all Governments to condition all aid, loans and guarantees to Israel on the cessation of Israeli settlement construction and expansion in the Occupied Palestinian and Arab territories, including East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon. We call on all Governments and the United Nations Security Council to institute sanctions against Israeli occupation. We unanimously recognize and support the intifadah as a national liberation struggle for the achievement of the State of Palestine and the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

We condemn the United States and Israeli endeavours to bypass the PLO, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, in the proposed regional conference on the Arab-Israeli conflict. We insist that Palestinians as all other peoples have full right to choose their own political representatives in any peace process. It is unacceptable and illogical that Israel be permitted to choose both the Israeli and the Palestinian delegations. Israel should have no say in naming or vetoing any representative chosen by the Palestinians - whether on the basis of his or her political views, place of birth, present whereabouts or for any other reason.

The issue of the status of Jerusalem should not be excluded from negotiations, nor should Palestinian residents of that city be excluded from participation in the negotiations.

We consider it most urgent that the United Nations provide immediate and sustained protection for the Palestinians under occupation, and that the United Nations Security Council establish in East Jerusalem an authority responsible for the monitoring of human rights violations in contradiction with the Fourth Geneva Convention. We urge the establishment of a subcommission of the United Nations Security Council to facilitate the exercise by the Palestinians of their inalienable rights. We call for the establishment of a United Nations force to protect the Palestinian nation and to stop Israel’s attempts to destroy it.

We also observe that the Palestinians in Israel are subjected to a discriminatory policy of continued confiscations of Arab lands and destruction of Arab homes for the purpose of settlement of Soviet immigrants inside Israel. We alert the NGO network to monitor and publicize these injustices.

We condemn the actions of the Government of Kuwait in forcibly relocating more than 300000 Palestinians who had lived in Kuwait prior to 8/2/1990. We further condemn the collective punishment of an entire community based on the alleged actions of some of its members. Furthermore, we remain concerned about the fate of the 50000 Palestinians still residing in Kuwait, especially the 25000 who carry Egyptian refugee documents. It is incumbent upon the Government of Kuwait either to allow these Palestinians to stay and work in Kuwait and to facilitate their admission to a country of their choice, including the country in which they or their families were born. We NGOs hereby notify the Government of Kuwait that we are monitoring its actions concerning these Palestinians and those still detained in Kuwaiti prisons and detention centres. We NGOs will bring violations of their rights to the immediate attention of the international community through all possible means.

We conducted work together in workshops and specific recommendations for actions are appended here. We consider these practical, action oriented proposals to be the central focus of our collective agenda for the coming year. To enhance our effectiveness we are organizing task forces among NGOs worldwide to concentrate our energies on specific projects. A number of special interest group meetings were also convened within the context of the international meeting and their proposals for actions are also appended. We believe that the implementation of these projects by NGOs world wide is a step on the path to a just and realistic peace in the Middle East.

We express our strongest protest against the action of the Israeli Government in preventing the distinguished experts, Mr. Sa’eb Erakat of Al-Najah University and Mr. Raji Srour of Gaza from attending. We know of other Palestinians living under occupation who were denied the possibility of participating in this meeting by the Israeli Government, such as Ahmed Hatibbi and Rezeq Shuqeir, and we most forcefully denounce this action.

We warmly thank the Committee for convening this international meeting and we greatly appreciate the presence of the Committee delegation. We thank the DPR and all others of the United Nations Secretariat including the interpreters who so valuably assisted us. We express our appreciation to the distinguished experts who spoke here and added valuable information to our deliberations. We express our thanks to the Austrian Government for making available the Austria Centre for our Meeting. We wish to express a special note of thanks and appreciation to Mr. Guido de Marco, President of the General Assembly, for his important and insightful comments. We all consider his participation in our meeting to be a distinct honour. [=]

12039. DS. “Europe and Canada: Tajikistan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (b) Disappearance”, in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The disappearance of Garmi- and Pamiri-origin men continued, although at a lower rate than in 1993. The number of returned refugees who disappeared greatly decreased. In many cases, those thought to have disappeared had in fact been conscripted as part of a government policy actively pursued in August and September in response to increased fighting both on the Tajikistan-Afghanistan border and in the Tavildara district. Young men were rounded up on the streets and in night raids on their homes. Several Dushanbe newspapers estimated that at least 60 men and women had disappeared, aside from any conscripted, in the first half of 1994. The Government has been unwilling to investigate claims of disappearances seriously, asserting that the Procurator General’s office does not have sufficient resources for the purpose. In 12/1993, unknown assailants abducted Tagobek Shukurov, a sitting judge and Supreme Soviet member from Kolkhozobod, who had been a member of the People’s Front during the war and had supported the return of Tajik refugees from Afghanistan. He remained missing throughout the year and is now presumed dead. The 1993 disappearance of Dr. Ayniddin Sadykov, a noted surgeon and chairman of the Dushanbe branch of the Democratic Party, remained unsolved throughout.[=]

12040. DS. "Europe and Canada: Tajikstan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation". Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government has stipulated that Tajikistan citizens and foreigners alike are prohibited from traveling within a 25-kilometer zone along the Republic's borders with both China and Afghanistan without permission from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In practice, however, international aid workers and diplomats travel freely in these regions without prior government authorization. Residents of Dushanbe and those travelers wishing to remain longer than 3 days no longer need to receive a permit, although they must still register with central authorities. Due to the state of emergency which was in place until August, all citizens were obliged to carry their identification cards at all times. There are no legal restrictions on changing residence or workplace. Current regulations require registration at the local Interior Ministry office upon arrival and departure. Tajikistan nationals who wish to travel abroad must obtain an exit visa. There is no evidence that these are withheld for political reasons. Tajikistan does not yet have a law on emigration. Currently those wishing to migrate within the former Soviet Union notify the Ministry of the Interior of their departure. Persons wishing to emigrate beyond the borders of the former Soviet Union must receive the approval of the relevant country's embassy in order to obtain their international passport. Persons who settle abroad are required to inform the Tajikistan interests section of the nearest Russian embassy or consulate. Persons who wish to return to Tajikistan after having emigrated may do so freely by submitting their applications to the Tajikistan interests section of the nearest Russian embassy or consulate. The Government adjudicates requests on a case-by-case basis. There is no indication that persons, other than those who fled Tajikistan following local reasons after the civil war, are not freely permitted to return. A refugee law passed in June guarantees a person granted refugee status the right to work and move freely throughout the country. Following implementation of the law, the Government created a central department for refugees, under the Ministry of Labor, which worked actively with the UNHCR. One unresolved issue pertains to the right of returnees who married in Afghanistan to bring their spouses with them to Tajikistan. Credible reports claimed that the Government maintained an unofficial policy of denying residence permits to Afghan spouses of returnees, thereby allowing the Government to deny any official status to these persons or their children. Due to better cooperation with the Government and an increased level of security the UNHCR increased the rate of return among Tajik refugees in Afghanistan in 1994, leaving only approximately 22000 refugees there and another estimated 16000 internally displaced persons in Gorno Badakhshan. Representatives of the armed opposition in Afghanistan continued their efforts to dissuade Tajiks from turning, using threats and disinformation in the refugee camps. One of the significant impediments to refugee repatriation remained the occupation of returnees' homes by those loyal to the victorious special battalions, special battalion members, and ethnic Kulyabs. The Government is working slowly to evict occupiers. Several factors limited progress on this issue, including lack of will among local officials, fear of revenge by those who protest, and lack of power among officials to act against often armed or well-connected occupiers. There is no legal basis for forcible repatriation, nor is there any evidence to suggest that it was practiced in 1994.[=]

12041. DS. "Europe and Canada: Tajikstan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: National/Racial/Ethnic Minorities", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government initiated a campaign to disarm the local militias operating outside its control in southern Tajikistan. Kulyabi security forces, who were conducting the campaign, engaged in numerous beatings and illegal searches aimed mainly at the Uzbek minority. Human rights groups protested charging that the security forces were employing inhumane tactics in searching for weapons and that in reality Kulyabi forces were using the campaign to disarm their ethnic rivals, the Uzbeks. Another disarmament campaign was launched in December after the presidential election, but it did not target Uzbeks in particular and relied on voluntary surrendering of weapons. The Rahmonov Government, like governments before it, discriminated against Afghan nationals by not giving Afghans who are the victims of criminal elements any official status and thereby allowing them to escape criminal police protection. Although the Government signed the 1951 Convention on Refugees and passed a national law on refugees in 1994, international groups, in particular the UNHCR, charged with the protection of Afghan refugees in Tajikistan, lodged frequent protests with the Government over its treatment of Afghan refugees. The UNHCR registered some 600 Afghans as refugees in Tajikistan during 1994. An unresolved problem stems from the unofficial government policy of denying official status to the Afghan spouses of returning Tajik refugees (see Section 2.d.),[=]

12042. DS. "South Asia: Afghanistan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Repet for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance
Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Armed factions reportedly employed torture and ill-treatment frequently to extract information from prisoners or break their will. Mulia Rockett's forces hung some foreign captives (see Section 1.b.) upside down and beat them to force them to write letters urging that ransom be paid, according to media accounts.

Due to the lack of a functioning national judicial system the Dowers that be reportedly imposed traditional laws and punishments, such as the amputation of hands of those convicted of theft.

Marauding militiamen abused many women in Mazar-i-Sharif in January and in Kunduz in March, according to international media and other sources. The UN Special Rapporteur reported that in 1994 there were innumerable cases of rape and that in some instances women had been "hunted down." In March armed men repeatedly raped a 15-year-old girl in Kabul after breaking into her family's house and killing her father for allowing her to attend school, according to an AI report issued in December. The report added that thousands of women and children had been raped in Afghanistan since 4/1992, when the mujahedin groups took power in Kabul. [=]

12043. DS. "South Asia: Afghanistan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (g) Use of Excessive Force and Violations of Humanitarian Law in Internal Conflicts", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Ten armed factions, aligned in two loose blocs, fought for power in Kabul and the provinces, causing widespread destruction and indiscriminate killing. Command and control of armed men was often haphazard and informal, a condition that obscured the relationship between the perpetrators of human rights violations and the political leaders with whom they were nominally affiliated.

On 1/1, General Dostam's troops in Kabul, theretofore aligned with President Rabbani, switched to Prime Minister Hekmatyar's side and attempted to oust the President in a coup d'etat. The President's forces quickly countered and the ensuing fighting engulfed much of the city and other parts of the country. A significant number of civilians were killed in the northern cities of Mazar-i-Sharif and Kunduz during heavy fighting. Fighting raged in Kabul's old business district with both sides employing heavy weapons and air strikes which took a heavy toll of civilian life and wreaked destruction on much of Kabul. As intense fighting in Kabul continued for most of January, hundreds of thousands fled to safer areas of the country. Most of the belligerents received outside assistance, despite UN calls to halt the influx of materiel to the warring factions.

In February Prime Minister Hekmatyar imposed a food blockade on northern Kabul, the area controlled by President Rabbani's troops. The UN Security Council and the United States Government condemned the food blockade and asked that it be lifted. In March General Dostam's militia briefly captured the northern city of Kunduz from the forces of Ahmed Shah Masood, President Rabbani's de facto Defense Minister. Amid widespread pillaging by the victorious troops, local people revolted and assisted Masood's fighters in retaking the city, according to a Western journalist who visited the area.

Sharp clashes broke out in Kabul in late June, when Masood launched an attack against Dostam's and Hekmatyar's forces and drove them from key strongholds in central Kabul. They reacted by launching nearly daily rocket attacks on the city, which took a heavy civilian toll.

In September the relatively quiet Shi'a quarter of Kabul erupted in intense fighting between rival Shi'a factions, which were quickly backed by other armed groups. In the last half of September alone, some 2650 people, mostly civilians, were reportedly killed or wounded in this fighting. On 9/27 a rocket hit a Kabul wedding party, killing 40 people and injuring 70, according to UN and media sources. In November armed religious students known as the "Taliban" (disciples) movement took over Kandahar and neighboring areas in southern Afghanistan after defeating local commanders in battle. The Taliban cleared roadblocks from the main highway and implemented a strict social code. According to media accounts, the Taliban limited the use of videotapes, prohibited public music and dancing, and restricted other forms of public behavior. The Afghan countryside remained plagued by an estimated 10 million land mines sown during the Soviet occupation. The UN sponsored mine awareness, detection, and removal programs, but the mines will pose a threat for years to come. [=]

12044. DS. "South Asia: Afghanistan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Local administrative bodies and international assistance organizations undertook to look out for children’s welfare to the extent possible. Maltreatment of children as a result of the food blockade was reported in Kabul, and the general disruption of health services countrywide due to the civil war put many young people at grave risk. [=]

12045. DS. "South Asia: Afghanistan: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Afghan custom and tradition imposes limits on women's activities beyond the home. Under the Communist regime of the 1980s, a growing number of women, particularly in urban areas, worked outside the home in nontraditional roles. This trend was reversed with the ouster of the Communist regime in 1992, and in 1994 women were increasingly precluded from public life. In many nonconservative areas in 1994, many women appeared in public only if dressed in a complete head-to-toe garment with a mesh covered opening for the eyes. In Faryab Province the local warlord's forces reportedly directed unmarried women over age 12 to get married or face the prospect of rape by the warlord's gunmen.

The UN Special Rapporteur noted a series of 21 ordinances governing the behavior of women in Afghanistan, reportedly issued by a nine-member committee of the High Court. These ordinances specified, inter alia, that a woman's veil must cover her whole body, that perfumed disruptions of health services countrywide due to the civil war put many young people at grave risk. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO. February 1995. Most citizens enjoy freedom of movement within the country and to travel abroad, but the Government occasionally prohibits movement of persons within Pakistan through "externment orders" when it believes their presence will lead to a threat to public order. Travel to Israel is legally prohibited. Government employees must obtain "no objection certificates" before traveling abroad. Students are also required to have these certificates from their institutions. Pakistanis have and regularly exercise the right to emigrate. Exit control lists are used to prevent the departure of wanted criminals. The resumption of civil war in Afghanistan in early 1994 created a new wave of refugees. In response to this new influx, the Government closed its borders with Afghanistan and officially admitted only those Afghans who were properly documented or in need of humanitarian assistance. Despite these restrictions over 66000 new refugees arrived in the first 9 months of 1994 Approximately 1.4 million Afghan refugees remain in Pakistan. They have limited access to legal protection and depend on the ability of the leaders of their groups to resolve disputes among themselves and with Pakistani society. Women and girls have obtained better education and health care as group leaders gradually secured such services. Many refugees have found employment but are not covered by the labor laws. Traffickers in women bought or lured hundreds of women from Bangladesh with promises of a better life. They transported the women across India and placed them with families as domestic servants or as prostitutes in brothels. The authorities detained some of the women for prostitution under the Haddod Ordinances. Few are able or willing to return to Bangladesh. Many are released into the custody of their exploiters, who set them to work as prostitutes again. Efforts to repatriate Bangladeshis in 1994 were mostly unsuccessful. The "repatriation of Biharis continued to be a contentious issue. The Biharis are Urdu-speaking people from the Indian state of Bihar who went to East Pakistan now Bangladesh, at the time of partition in 1947. Since 1971, after Bangladesh gained its independence, approximately 250000 Biharis have been in refugee camps in Bangladesh. The repatriation of these people is tied to Pakistan's various ethnic problems. While the Mohajir community, made up of Pakistanis who emigrated from India during partition, supports the repatriation, the Sindhi community opposes the move. In 1993 the Government flew 342 Biharis to Pakistan and placed them in temporary housing in central Punjab. No further repatriation has occurred. [–]

12047. DS. Report To The Congress On Proposed Refugee Admissions For FY 1993 Submitted With The World Refugee Report On Behalf Of The President Of The United States To The Committees On The Judiciary, United States Senate And United States House Of Representatives. In Fulfillment Of The Requirements Of Section 207(E) (1) - (7) Of The Immigration And Nationality Act: Part 09: Resettlement Needs in FY 1993: Near East and South Asia. District of Columbia: Department of State, June 30, 1992. The Near East/South Asia region has the largest concentration of refugees and displaced persons in the world: five million Afghans, four million Palestinians, and smaller numbers of other nationalities. There are an estimated three million Afghan refugees in Pakistan and two million in Iran, and several hundred thousand Iranians in neighboring Turkey. An estimated 20000 Iraqi Kurds who entered Turkey in 1988 and another 10000 Iraqis from the Gulf war period remain in that country. Over 280000 Iraqis remain in Saudi Arabia as a result of the Gulf war. Voluntary Repatriation: Most refugees from the Near East would like to return to their homeland. The recent collapse of the Communist regime in Kabul and establishment of an interim leadership council in anticipation of free elections offers hope for continuing massive voluntary repatriation of Afghan refugees. The positive response of the international community to the difficult situation of Iraqis who fled to Turkey, Iran, and other neighboring countries at the end of the war enabled the vast majority to return to their homes in northern Iraq. In recent months UNHCR, in consultation with governments such as the United States, has initiated an international resettlement effort for those who cannot remain in the region. Resettlement in the Region: Few countries within the region are willing to offer permanent resettlement to refugees from neighboring countries, but many have been generous with long-term asylum. Pakistan and Iran have offered asylum to over five million Afghans who are permitted to engage in many economic activities and are not restricted to their camps. Several countries in the Near East have extended work permits to Palestinian, Iranian, and Afghan refugees for long periods of time. Most of the Iraqis in Turkey are permitted to remain without a threat of deportation. However, many live under difficult conditions and are unable to obtain permanent residence. Saudi Arabia does not intend to provide permanent resettlement to Iraqis presently residing within its territory. Palestinian support for Saddam Hussein during the Gulf war has led Kuwait and the other Gulf Coalition Countries (GCC) to reexamine their policies on Palestinian guest workers. Iraqis appear to have the most difficulty in obtaining resident status in countries of first asylum or other countries in the region. Third Country Resettlement: While third country resettlement is not the preferred solution in most cases, it is the only option for certain refugees at risk in countries of first asylum. For example, UNHCR considers third country resettlement to be the preferred solution for most Iranian refugees in Turkey and Pakistan. From FY 1980 to FY 1991, some 71000 refugees from the Near East/South Asia, mostly Iranians and Afghans, were resettled in the United States. Other major resettlement countries for refugees from this region are Australia, Canada, Germany, France, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. Turkey has accepted refugees from the Turkic ethnic groups in Afghanistan and Bulgaria. Additionally, many other refugees reside in Western and Southern Europe.

US Admissions: Proposed FY 1992 Ceiling. The proposed ceiling For FY 1993 for refugees from the Near East and South Asia is 7000. This is an increase of 1000 over the level authorized for FY 1992. While US assistance to the vast majority of persons who fled Iraq in 1990-91 does not involve resettlement, UNHCR believes that members of certain groups risk refoulement and has asked for international aid in resettlement. In response, we have agreed to accept for interview 1,500 Iraqis in Turkey with temporary residence permits and 1000 Iraqis in camps in Saudi Arabia. We expect 1000 non-Kurdish Iraqi admissions in FY 1992 and, with additional groups who may be determined to be in danger during the following year, perhaps as many as 3000 non-Kurdish Iraqis admissions in FY 1993 if sufficient fiscal resources and admissions numbers are available. It has proven difficult, however, to accurately project the timetable in which admissions processing for Iraqis in the first asylum countries of the region can be accomplished. The difficult situation of Iraqi Kurds in first asylum in Turkey since 1988 has been recognized by the international community. In 1/1991, the United States initiated a program to process resettlement to 3000 individuals, most of whom have ties to the US. 400 were admitted in FY 1991, and we anticipate admitting 1000 in FY 1992 and 1000 in FY 1993. In recent months, applications from Iraqis have declined somewhat and we expect about 2000 Iraqi admissions in FY 1992. With the same level of activity predicted For FY 1993, we estimate perhaps 2000 admissions. On 4/12/1991, the US limited new applications from Afghans to those who fall within priority one. Even so, Afghan admissions will continue for the next two fiscal years, with an estimated 15000 admissions in FY 1992 and 1000 in FY 1993. Designated Nationalities. As in FY 1992, designated nationalities For FY 1993 will be Iranians, Afghans and Iraqis. On a case-by-case basis, nationals of other countries may be processed with prior approval from Washington. Processing Priorities. FY 1993 processing priorities for the region are: Iraq, priorities one through five; Iran, one through four, including the expanded definition of priority four; and Afghanistan, priority one only. In special circumstances, adjustment in processing priorities is possible with prior approval from Washington. [–]

12048. DS. Report To The Congress On Proposed Refugee Admissions For FY 1993 Submitted With The World Refugee Report On Behalf Of The President Of The United States To The Committees On The Judiciary, United States Senate And United States House Of Representatives, In Fulfillment Of The Requirements Of Section 207 (E) (1) - (7) Of The Immigration And Nationality Act: Part 14: Domestic Impacts of Refugees: Democratic Impact. District of Columbia: Department of State, June 30, 1992. Population Composition: The demographic characteristics of refugees to be admitted to the US in FY 1993 are likely to be similar to those of refugees admitted in FY 1991 and FY 1992 while varying somewhat from those of refugees admitted in the 1980s. For example, the higher proportion of refugees from the former Soviet Union in the flow since 1989 has meant more adults and fewer children compared to the 1980s, when refugees from Asia predominated. At the same time, refugee populations will continue to vary in age and sex composition from the resident American population as well as from each other. Indochinese refugees, for example, are younger on average than the resident US population. The median age of the Indochinese arrivals from 1975 through 1991 was between 20 and 21 years. Nearly 40% were under age 15, compared to 23% of the American population. In this same period, the percentage who were age 65 and over remained roughly constant at less than 2%. About 55% of the arriving Vietnamese in recent years were males, in contrast to the general US population in which about 49% are males. Because of the large proportion of children among the Indochinese refugees, the ratio of dependents will continue to be higher than in the general US population, although the low proportion of elderly Indochinese is a significant mitigating factor. The young age structure means that a large number of young children from these refugee families will be entering the schools each year for some years to come. Refugees from the former Soviet Union were the largest single nationally group to arrive in FY 1991 and one of the oldest, with a median age of 31. New refugees from Ethiopia and Eastern Europe averaged in their middle twenties in 1991, while those from Afghanistan and Iraq were only 20 on average. Cuban refugees were the oldest, with a median age in FY 1991 of 33. Male refugees outnumber females in most groups, but the former Soviets are an exception, with a slight female majority. Because these nationality groups differ from each other in their background characteristics, any change in the source countries of the refugee flow means a corresponding change in the demographic impact of the refugee population.

Geographic Distribution: During FY 1990, 73.1% of newly arrived refugees and Amerasians were placed in ten States. Ten leading States received 71.6% of the FY 1991 placements. Four of these ten leading States (California, Texas, Washington and Georgia) received a higher share of the arrivals in FY 1991 than in FY 1990. The most notable trend is the decline from 19% to 14% in the proportion of refugees going to New York coupled with the increasing share going to California. The California proportion fell from 45.6% in FY 1988 to 29.1% in FY 1989 and to 25.3% in FY 1990, before rising slightly to 28.9% in FY 1991. Much of this change occurred because the large numbers of Vietnamese refugees, who arrived in FY 1988 and settled near relatives in the Los Angeles area, have been replaced by Jews from the former Soviet Union settling in New York and other cities in the East. Together, California and New York continue to receive more than 40% of all newly arriving refugees. Generally, refugee communities in areas of current resettlement will continue to grow with admission of additional family reunification cases. As Table V shows, the geographic distribution of the Indochinese refugees is now well established, with nearly 40% living in California, and the rest distributed widely. The more than 43000 refugees who have arrived since FY 1980 from areas outside Southeast Asia have a residential distribution different from the Indochinese. This has tended to diffuse the impact of refugee arrivals upon local communities. Large numbers of these other refugees have been resettled in cities in the Northeast and the Midwest. California received the largest number, over 87000, with New York in second place at nearly 77000 and growing rapidly. The shifts in this table show the wide variations in ethnic composition of States’ refugee populations. While 44% of the arriving refugees were non-Indochinese, 17 States resettled a refugee population composed of more than 50% non-Indochinese; and three States and Guam resettled a population of 90% or more Indochinese. Among the States with the largest refugee populations, Florida, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, and New York have majorities of non-Indochinese refugees. As the ethnic composition of the arriving refugee population shifts in response to new needs, so will the geographic placement patterns of the new arrivals. In FY 1991, only 34% of the arrivals were from the former Soviet Union, compared with 41% during FY 1990. Other refugees arrived in about the same proportions as in FY 1990. This means that States that were slated to receive large numbers of refugees from the former Soviet Union saw their FY 1991 arrivals fall below expectations.

SECONDARY MIGRATION: Secondary migration is the term used to describe movement by refugees from the location where they were initially resettled upon arrival in this country to some other place. California is the favored destination of the Indochinese, and they are much less likely to leave California, once there, than are other residents. States in the Northeast and North Central regions have also received significant refugee in-migration. Secondary migration seems to be influenced by several major factors, including a desire to find improved employment opportunities, live in an area with a supportive ethnic community and perhaps near relatives or, in some cases, to have access to public assistance. ORR has developed a system based on reports from the States for compiling and maintaining data on secondary migration. These data are important not only for general program planning, but also for the accurate computation of formulas for distribution of funds to States. Results of the State reports are contained in ORR’s Annual Reports to the Congress.

Economic Impact: The net economic effect of refugees in the US derives ultimately from their contributions to the American economy and from the Federal, State, and local government taxes they pay. In the short term, the primary question is whether or not refugees are obtaining employment which enables them to become self-supporting members of American society. ORR conducts an annual native-language survey of Southeast Asian refugees who have come to the US during the five previous years. The most recent of these surveys was conducted in 1991 and included 608 refugee households with which interviews were completed. Results from the survey indicate that the labor force participation rate (those working or seeking work) for refugees 16 or older was 36%, compared to an equivalent rate of 66% for the overall US population. As in previous years the labor force participation of refugees varied with length of residence in the US. The most recent (1991) arrivals had a labor force participation rate of 23%, while the 1990 arrivals had a labor force participation rate of 35%. This rate increased gradually with time in the United States. The 1991 survey also provides data on unemployed refugees (those who are in the labor force, but not working). In late 1991, the overall US unemployment rate was 6.4%, while the unemployment rate for refugees age 16 and older was 14%. Significant changes in unemployment occur for refugees over time. Those who arrived in 1990 had an unemployment rate of 28% by late 1991. Unemployment declined to 18% for 1989 arrivals and reached lower levels for earlier arrivals. [=] selectivity of those who do participate according to their socioeconomic characteristics.

For those projects with or without a specific women’s component, we need to know in addition what percentage of those who have direct access to goods and services such as loans or training are female. In three of the four projects for which the percentages can be ascertained at least approximately, there appears to be some slippage between the anticipated representation of females and the actual participation in projects and their actual participation as measured in project annual reviews or other documents. In the Thailand sericulture scheme (number 2), 85% of expected participants were reported in one document to be female, whereas another reported actual enrollments in a 1978 sericulture training course of 103 men and 107 women [USAID, Thailand Sericulture/Settlements Project: Joint Mid-Term Evaluation, Jan. 1979.].

The Nicaragua credit cooperatives for market women and agricultural producers, food processors, and artisans included 55% women among their 1,400 members at the time of review—a significant accomplishment, but less than anticipated in a project titled “Rural Market Women’s Cooperatives.” The primary school construction project in Afghanistan (number 20) was unable in some regions to fulfill its quota of 15% of spaces in new schools reserved for girls. Only in the nonformal education project in Ethiopia (number 21) did the actual percentage of female participants (80% of those responding to a questionnaire) appear to meet or exceed expectations.

Six projects did not report percentages of female beneficiaries in documents retrieved for this analysis. Two are rural infrastructure projects aimed at increasing agricultural productivity—soil conservation in Lesotho (number 4) and rural water supply in Kenya (number 5)—for which figures on female participation may be available in World Bank documents cited in Table 2 but are not reported in AID summaries. Two are vocational training programs. In El Salvador (number 7), although women were 45% of the target group of marginal urban service workers, data from the follow-up questionnaires of trainees showing their current employment status and incomes are not disaggregated by sex. Similarly, the Paraguay project (number 13) included specific targets for intended trainees (300 women and 160 men in the first year) but not actual female participation rates in the Project Evaluation Summary (Nov. 1978).

The final two projects are the agricultural radio programs for peasant farmers in Guatemala (number 22) and the integrated development project of Pespire Valley in Honduras (number 32). The Guatemala radio campaign was aimed at two populations: illiterate highland Indians in subsistence agriculture and Spanish-speaking Latinos in the southeast. Symbolized by the radio messages called “Let’s Talk, Mr. Farmer,” the complex experimental scheme to change agricultural knowledge, attitudes, and practices did not once identify in a major summary document whether women participated as farmers, radio listeners, forum discussants, community change agents, or questionnaire respondents (Davidson, 1976). Women’s role as agricultural producers appears to be completely ignored. The Pespire Valley scheme in Honduras included explicit references to a women’s component in the Project Paper (women were to make up 50% of community council members in the 10 village clusters, for example), but according to the Elliott and Sorsby summary of the evaluation, the major income-generating activity for women was a cooperative mango puree plant employing 19 women during harvest, with an uncertain future [The Project Evaluation Summary cited in Elliott and Sorsby p. III-27 could not be obtained for this review.]

The tentative lessons that can be gleaned from the documents regarding conditions that facilitate or impede women’s direct access to project activities include the following:

6. Women have more direct access to project benefits when planners explicitly recognize the prevailing sexual division of labor and design activities that build on women’s work and enable them to control their earnings. In the Cameroon, for example (number 1), men traditionally cultivated coffee and cocoa while women cultivated food crops. Whereas an effective cooperative marketing system was available for both coffee and cocoa, food crop marketing (mostly corn, beans, and potatoes) was left to small itinerant traders (Jackson, 1979, p. 3). It was to solve this problem of unreliable markets and low returns that the members of the women’s palm oil purchasing cooperative decided to organize a marketing system of their own, selling food primarily to the plantations from which they purchased palm oil and using the same transport for both transactions. A plan for marketing food crops through the male-dominated coffee or cocoa cooperatives would undoubtedly result in lower food crop production as women lost control over their earnings. In the Thailand sericulture project (number 2) was explicitly designed to reach girls and women who carried out most of the principle tasks connected with traditional methods of sericulture. In the Philippines sewing project (number 8), women recognized that their needlecraft skills formed a natural basis on which to build income-generating activities.

The strategy of building on women’s work reduces the likelihood that resources will be co-opted by men, but the danger always remains that once an enterprise becomes profitable, men will be interested in taking it over. In the Gambia, for example, about 4,000 women were successfully growing onions as a cash crop when male farmers decided for the first time to ask the government for similar assistance (Tinker, 1979, p. 13). Although their onion schemes were apparently not successful (in part because their wives refused to work on them), the importance of control over earnings as an incentive to production remains central.

7. Project activities that fit with prevailing cultural norms and the allocation of household responsibilities attract higher rates of female participation by reducing resistance from the women themselves from their husbands or fathers, and from the community at large. Although this approach is a conservative one, it appears to offer a valuable means of providing larger numbers of girls and women with direct access to benefits, while at the same time acting as a sort of “wedge” with which to introduce more comprehensive changes in a phased sequence. The Bolivian income-generating project for peasant women (number 12) is a good example:

Women are ... receptive to certain types of participation. What we attempt to do is build upon those areas of participation which are acceptable in order to generate others. Their husbands tend to feel the same, in that they support activities which don’t detract from normal time usage, chores, etc. (New TransCentury, June 1978). Similar experiences are reported in Bangladesh, the Philippines, and Costa Rica.

In Bangladesh, one of the problems of the rural woman in Bangladesh is that she has no opportunity to earn an independent income and thus contribute financially to the welfare of her family. Because of the system of Purdah, she is often isolated in her compound with little chance to learn income generating skills, gain educational qualifications or participate with other women in social activities (New TransCentury, Jan. 1978). In its organization of women’s cooperatives, the Bangladesh project (number 16) worked within these restrictions by offering women new possibilities for earning independent incomes in rice cultivation, seed distribution, oil pressing, etc. while providing an acceptable mode of association with other women. Women in the Philippines (number 18) expressed similar concerns: Income-generating women’s projects to be engaged in [poultry, pig fattening, mushrooms, floriculture] are home-based and small scale entrepreneurial/pursuits since the majority of rural Filipino women express a desire to combine their family household roles with new, compatible means of attaining higher levels of living (New TransCentury, Jan. 1978). In San Jose, Costa Rica (number 6), women reported that “... their husbands did not want them to leave the immediate area to seek employment or training because of family and household obligations” (Project Evaluation Summary, Nov. 1978). Participants decided to locate an industrial sewing facility and baking cooperative within their residential area; evaluators recommended that “An orientation of the project be provided to husbands and fathers of participants.” Some constraints can be overcome. Some simply by redesigning projects to include child-care or dormitory facilities or by adapting the timing or duration of training and employment to women’s daily and seasonal round of work. The Costa Rican women, identifying the complete lack of child care as a major impediment to their participation in training sessions, established a temporary facility with plans for a permanent one. Village women in Bangladesh were able to attend training classes in silkworm production when a dormitory for non-commuting students was constructed. Evaluators of the El Salvador vocational training program recommended that certain courses be offered in smaller communities by mobile teams rather than in larger towns or cities requiring extended absences from home. Policies such as these would certainly facilitate women's access to training. However, due to cost, this option would be excluded from budgets dedicated towards distributing domestic responsibilities among all household members to reduce the weight of women's double burden in the home. [——]

12050. Dixon, Ruth B.; AID; DS; Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination; Office of Women in Development; WID. "Part 04: Current Evaluations of Women in Development Projects: A Review and Analysis: Access of Women to Project Benefits: Part 2", in Assessing the Impact of Development Projects on Women. District of Columbia: Department of State, AID, Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination, Office of Women in Development (WID), May 1980. 8. Women's direct access to project goods and services is frequently limited by customary or legal restrictions on their right to resources such as land, credit, or schooling. Forming the core of a complex system of social stratification based on age and sex (among other attributes), these structural and cultural barriers can sometimes be penetrated with the permission of higher status individuals or groups if the latter can be mobilized to support the project.

Lack of independent land rights can be a severe impediment. Women in the Cameroon cooperative, for instance, receive permission for land use through their husbands who petition on the women's behalf to the village chief. In the land conservation scheme for subsistence farmers of Thaba Bosiu in Lesotho (number 4), women's access to training in animal husbandry or to decision-making positions on range management committees is restricted by the traditional practice of granting grazing land at the age of majority to every Basotho male. In Upper Volta (number 10): At the village level men must be consulted and support gained if women are to participate [in new income-generating activities], because a male head of household usually has authority over the allocation of time and labor of his female members. Also, if the land is needed for an activity since males control access rights to land their consent must be obtained. Further, the involvement of men may be necessary to undertake activities, such as construction of buildings and fences, since according to social norms certain functions are performed by men (Barnes, n.d., pp. 6-7). Projects frequently require that credit be granted to males even when production is based on women's work. In the Thailand sericulture project, for example, each family is entitled to a loan through the Bank for Agriculture and Agricultural Cooperatives to get the project started. Although the available documents do not say whether women can apply as individuals, the family unit is usually represented in formal transactions by the male household head.

Even the basic right to receive certain kinds of training may be denied to women by local tradition. In the Upper Volta project, female regional coordinators and national staff in the domestic economy units are under the direct supervision of men; "hence, the consent of these men is essential for project success. For instance, these officers have to be willing to permit the female staff to participate in training sessions" (Barnes, n.d., p. 7; emphasis added).

The most extreme example, however, comes from Afghanistan (number 20), where only 10% of primary school students in rural areas are girls. Most rural parents refuse to send their daughters to a coeducational school, yet two provinces have no village schools for girls at all. According to the Project Paper, ... "traditional Afghan values dictate women trained by the National Community Development Service and assigned to communities based on the type of project solicited. The poorest village women in the Cameroons were also largely excluded from the palm oil and food marketing cooperatives, in part apparently because some could not buy a share or the membership fee (Jackson, 1979, p. 6). Reaching the poorest of the poor may require bypassing traditional community associations or informational networks, an approach that raises additional difficulties of recruitment and communication.

10. Shortages of volunteers and of trained female staff pose major obstacles to the recruitment of more women as beneficiaries. Although such shortages are likely to pervade most types of development projects, women-specific projects are particularly hard hit because the trend to rely more heavily on volunteers due to funding limitations. In addition, women working in the field as volunteers or as paid project staff members face special problems.

The first issue is the heavy reliance of some projects on volunteers. Although several evaluations report high levels of enthusiasm among volunteers, others hint at their lower incentive to work (e.g., Lesotho number 9). In either case, the capacity of projects to reach large numbers of beneficiaries is constrained by the number of volunteers. The Costa Rican vocational training program, for example, "Currently has more requests for training from government agencies than it can provide, and thus the possibility of reaching the desired number of women exists, but is limited by the current number of available volunteer trainers (9) and research aides (3)" (Project Evaluation Summary, No. 1978, p. 2).

Although the use of volunteers permits women's projects to operate on a larger scale than would be possible if all staff positions were paid, the practice raises serious questions regarding the motivation of governments or donor agencies to provide serious funding for women's projects. It is doubtful that a large-scale project aimed at training men in agricultural techniques or industrial skills would expect male staff members to contribute their labor. The funding of staff positions on women's projects would also permit more active recruitment of women trainees from the target population of beneficiaries, rather than relying on volunteers from a different social stratum. Grants to PVOs for leadership training of volunteers (e.g., Ghana number 25 and number 26, Upper Volta number 27, Latin America number 30, Costa Rica number 31) tend to support middle and upper-class women who may or may not translate their training into genuine advocacy for the poor.

The second issue relates to the working conditions of paid female staff, especially those working as promoters in rural areas. The model of training rural women to teach other rural women, clearly a cost-effective approach to community development, is followed by a number of the projects in Table 2. In Bolivia (number 12), promoters are peasant women trained by the National Community Development Service and assigned to communities based on the type of project solicited. The promoters are all literate although the female community leaders may not be. One of the major problems with the program, according to one evaluation, is that the personnel live under difficult, isolated conditions with low salaries. The social isolation of outsiders in villages is often acute. In Afghanistan, for example: Qualified teachers have been reluctant to work in remote rural areas where motivation is difficult to maintain and urban incentives are non-existent. There have been no houses for rural...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

"where it is not accepted culturally." The expansion of women's workload, whether in unpaid agricultural labor or in paid employment, sometimes results in daughters being kept home from school to help in the fields or at home. Project administrators should be prepared to counteract this tendency with alternative plans for labor allocation. With the altered rice cropping patterns of a land resettlement scheme, for example: girls are now performing more weeding and assist their mothers in weeding and exchanging labor. They can also be seen working on the subsistence plots. Boys, on the other hand, are now freer of labor commitments than previously. This has a recognized effect on the relative attendance of boys and girls in the schools (Palmer, 1979, p. 54).

The benefits of vocational skills training can also be unequally distributed within and across households. Has the project opened up new opportunities for women as well as men, extending their vocational skills into areas formerly closed to them? Is the skills training likely to result in paid employment? How can constraints against female participation be overcome? Many training programs funded by international agencies perpetuate sexual stereotypes. Typically, community extension programs train local women in tasks related to home maintenance and child care, or in handicrafts, failing to prepare them for employment in modernized agriculture, industry, services, sales, or clerical/administrative and technical/professional occupations. Thus women's skills are largely lost to these sectors and the benefits of training accrue disproportionately to males.

One could also consider the impact of the project on women's general knowledge, or world view. In societies placing severe restrictions on women's physical mobility, the limits of their social world are likely to be narrow and their social and political dependence on men is intensified. How does a project affect their access to knowledge and experience of the outside world? Are there deliberate efforts at "conscientization" among beneficiaries, that is, of stimulating a critical understanding of the dynamics of household and community social structures and of possible strategies for change? Do these reach women as well as men?

13. Power. The capacity of directing one's own and others' behavior can be considered as the sum of separate elements: autonomy, as measured by the degree of self-reliance, belief in the efficacy of one's actions; independence of others; freedom from coercion by others; and freedom of physical movement; participation in household and community decision making, including an ability to produce desired outcomes; and mobilization for group action, measured by the number and strength of linkages among individuals and groups, the degree of shared self-interest or group consciousness, and the capacity for effective group action.

Women's autonomy in the household and the community differs widely across and within societies according to social class, ethnic or tribal background, age, and other social factors. The question here is whether development projects expand or constrict women's capacity for autonomous action in either absolute terms or relative to men. An income-generating program can increase women's social and economic independence, while another type of program may undermine it. A family planning project that requires the husband's consent for his wife's sterilization or abortion, for instance, greatly reduces her capacity for autonomous action. Depending on the type of project, investigators could select appropriate questions from among the following possibilities:

How does the project affect the pattern of decision making within the household about important choices such as the timing and number of births, the education of children, the timing of children's marriages and the choice of a mate, what to produce for sale or exchange, how to market it, when to plant and harvest, whether to buy or sell land, and so on? Similarly, what role do women play in the formal and informal decision-making processes in the community at large? In what proportions are they found in formal governing bodies, and with what effect? What social class do they represent?

Knowledge of women's role in household and community decision making should form a central ingredient of development planning (see Mickelwait, Riegelman, and Sweet, 1976), both at the point of baseline data collection to determine project design, and at the point of social impact assessment. Projects can undermine women's current role in decision making, or fail to take advantage of structural opportunities to expand it. In the large Amul Dairy Cooperative in India, for instance, the majority of shareholders are low-income male household heads (owners of one or two milch animals, usually buffalo) who attend meetings, from the board of directors of village societies, and receive the shares of yearly profits (Dixon, 1978, pp. 50-56). Women, who typically care for and milk the animals, do receive daily cash payments when they take the milk to village collection centers. Although this is a valuable source of independence and prestige, women are denied the opportunity for cooperative leadership roles that serve as a training ground for higher level political office in the community and district. Changes in membership rules requiring each household to enroll a female as well as male member, and a quota of half the places on boards of directors reserved for women, could help to correct this inequity.

---

The third dimension of power refers to the mobilization of groups for collective action. How do males and females in the household differ in their access to informal and formal social networks based on kinship, landholding status, occupation, residential location, caste or ethnic or tribal identity, religious affiliation, personal friendship, and other bases of identity and loyalty? How does membership in such groups differ across social classes and other categories? To what extent does the development project facilitate or impede the capacity of women to organize formal or informal groups engaged in collective action?

At the most basic level, failure of planners to recognize the importance of indigenous patterns of group activity can prevent the completion of a project. Women in one Indian community subverted a scheme for piping water into each housing compound because it would deny them their only legitimate opportunity for visiting together around the village well. In Nepal, failure to organize workers into a viable producers cooperative doomed some women who had gone through a training program in machine sewing to non-competitive hand sewing or inactivity because they could not individually afford to buy sewing machines (Dixon, 1978, pp. 155-6).

Even assistance directed specifically to the support of women's organizations can have adverse distributional effects. The evaluation of one program to train middle- and upper-class women volunteers in leadership skills and organizational development concluded that "there are more benefits to volunteers than to poor people," thus widening the resource gap between the classes. Project designers will need to pay special attention to the means by which women denied access to most material and social resources can be mobilized to form an independent power base for articulating their needs and working toward collective solutions.

14. Prestige. Prestige refers to the honor or esteem accruing to persons as individuals or groups members, of which both subjective and objective aspects are important. Self-esteem can be measured by the person's subjective belief in his or her own value as a person; the esteem of others is measured by the degree to which a person or group is "objectively" valued by other household or community members.

Who within the household, and in the community, appears to have the highest levels of self-esteem? Do women value their own contributions as highly as men, or do they tend to be self-deprecating? Preliminary talks with poor women by one community organizer elicited a typical response: "We have no special skills; nothing we do is worth selling [Interview with Sister Michael of Holy Cross, Dacca, Bangladesh, Feb. 1976]." How does the project affect women's feelings about themselves?

Although most development efforts are likely to increase women's pride and self-esteem, especially if women are defined as primary beneficiaries of training or income-generating projects, situations such as the failure of a handicraft center to find a steady market for its goods, or the arrogance of some extension workers, can have the opposite effect. Young girls in a newly opened school who are told repeatedly by the male teacher that they are not as smart as boys quickly become discouraged from learning and drop out, a self-fulfilling prophecy. The loss of self-esteem can act as a major impediment to future risk-taking behavior. Apart from women's feelings about themselves, do other members of the household and community value their contributions more highly? Of course the two are closely interrelated, since self-esteem is so dependent on the esteem of others. Vocational training and income-generating projects for women should—at least in the long run—visibly raise their status within the household and community. But some jobs are viewed as "status-depressing" rather than "status-enhancing" even if they provide badly needed cash incomes, especially when the jobs expose women to possibly dishonorable contact with men. In one project in Bangladesh, although the young women themselves were extremely proud of their skills and ability to earn money as government agents visiting women's cooperatives throughout the district, conservative residents disparaged them loudly for their immorality in breaking purdah restrictions (Dixon, 1978, pp. 47, 162-3). In the absence of strong program efforts to counter such criticism, female workers and their families were under considerable personal strain. Other families, fearing their daughters would be unmarriageable if they engaged in such work, refused to permit them employment.

The shift in northern Belize from corn production to sugarcane has had some interesting implications not only in nutritional standards and women's ability to earn independent incomes from raising chickens and pigs (as discussed previously), but also in the sources of prestige: Because food production has always been woven socially and ideologically into the culture, the change in production patterns has ramifications throughout society. One of the most significant has been the removal of the source of male prestige from the domestic household activities of producing good food and good children and the creation of a new "public" sphere of activity which is western and modern in structure, characterized by material goods. The women's activities are relegated almost totally to [the] domestic sphere, whereas, the acquisition of prestige and status, once accessible to both men and women, is now largely relegated to the public sphere where women cannot compete.... The women were left with domestic activities of devalued social status and responsibility (Stavrakis and Marshall, 1978, pp. 162-3).

This case clearly cries out for some strong programming to create new income-generating opportunities for women that will increase their social value and prestige as well as their economic contribution. Although this discussion of the differential effects of projects on males and females may appear to have dwelled unnecessarily on the negative, it illustrates how even the best intentioned projects can have unanticipated deleterious consequences if women's social and economic roles in the household and community are not fully understood. The more positive side is that projects can almost always be designed to achieve their goals—expanded agricultural output, for instance, --in a way that recognizes women's access to resources such as control over the economic returns to their labor, technical assistance to increase their productivity, or active participation in community decision-making bodies, while minimizing the costs. Palmer's analysis of a land resettlement scheme suggests an alternative design for meeting production goals and satisfying basic human needs of the entire settlement population that allocates productive resources between men and women more equitably at the outset, resulting in a cumulative sequence of more beneficial consequences (Palmer, 1979, pp. 78-80). The actual and alternative strategies she outlines, which are presented in Table 4, are applicable in principle to a wide range of integrated development projects where such comprehensive decisions are made.

Some trade-offs are probably inevitable in any development project; one cannot usually move effectively on all fronts at once. The major issue here is to ensure that the costs are not paid disproportionally by those least able to pay them. [=]
Projects [Numbers in parentheses refer to pages in Section III of Elliot and Sorsby (op. cit.)]

- Formal:
  - Secondary school for girls in Uganda (12).
  - Primary schools and teachers' hostels in Afghanistan (31).

- Nonformal:
  - Literacy & community self help in Ethiopia (5).
  - Radio programs for highland Indians in Guatemala (26).
  - Community development project in Sri Lanka (30). [=]

12053. Dixon, Ruth B.; AID; DS; Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination; Office of Women in Development; WID. Table, "Part 09: Table 2: Women in Development Projects, With Intended Beneficiaries, Major Inputs, and Participation of Women: Construction of 170 Rural Elementary Schools & 40 Teachers' Hostels in Afghanistan (AID)", in Assessing the Impact of Development Projects on Women. District of Columbia: Department of State, AID, Bureau for Program & Policy Coordination, Office of Women in Development (WID), May 1980. Intendedbeneficiaries: Rural children and teachers; 15% of places in newly constructed schools reserved for girls.

- Major Inputs: Physical infrastructure.
  - Participation of women in project decision making: Not stated.
  - Access of women to project benefits: Quota of 15% girls met in Parwan but not in southern zones; percentage teachers female not known.
  - Effects of project on status of women: Not stated.
  - Source of information: Project Paper 1975; Evaluation cable, May 1976. [=]

12054. Gannon, Kathy. "Under Islamic Talib' Rule, Kabul Is a Tense, Fearful City", in Seattle Times, October 6, 1996. p. A17. Kabul is unusually deserted after Talib' capture of the war ravaged city. Ethnic minorities and many widows are continuing to flee the city. Former Communist Pres. Najibullah has dragged from his sanctuary in the UN compound and hung, after four years in that domestic exile. Some 750,000 people remain in the city. The Talib' have ordered all women to terminate their employment and have closed girls' schools. Women have virtually disappeared from the city. The mullahs of Kandahar appear to be in control of the Talib' in Kabul.

12056. General Assembly; UN. Summary Record Of The 25th Meeting. [Official Record]. 47th Session. Third Committee. 25th Meeting Held On Monday, 2 November 1992 At 3p.m. New York. A/C.3/47/SR.25. General Assembly, November 27, 1992. Speakers: Mora Godoy, Jorge Ivan [Cuba]; Raven, Martin [UK]; Kuehl, Craig [USA]; Linjucu, Ruth [Philippines]; Yuan Shoucheng [PRC]; Babadoudou, Berin [Benin]; Arias, Maria Francisca [Colombia]; Cure, Patrice [Martinus]; Sahraoui, Hocine [Algeria]; Ramsh; Villamnez Otavich [Russia]; De Brito Cruz, Humberto [Brazil]; Fenn, R. [UK]; Teranshi, Chiyoko [Japan]; Rata, P. [New Zealand]; Urtasun, Juan Jose [Spain]; Smagulon [Kazakhstan]; Arungu Olende, Rose [Kenya]; Melamed, Moshe [Israel]; Thompson, Wayne [Jamaica]; Lissidini, Adriana [Urugau]; Sharp, Martin Philip [Australia]; Ramirez, Noris Elena [Panama]; Zindoga, Chipo [Zimbabwe]; Moreno Fernandez, Abelardo [Cuba]; Hong Yongan [China]; Tsepow, Boris Anatolievich [Russia]; Lopes Da Rosa, Manuela [Guinea-Bissau]; Kim Jae Hon [North Korea]; Al Majali, Saja [Jordan]; Eldeeb, Abdel Gaffar [Egypt]; Seljuki, Aria [Afghanistan]; Barghouti, Somaia [Palestine]

12057. Goodwin, Phil. "Talib' Win End-Game As Last City Falls", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, June 1, 1997. p. 1. After 20 years of civil war, the Talib's military victories put Afghanistan on the verge of unity, albeit a unity of exhaustion. The fall of Mazar-i-Sharif, the stronghold of Gen. Abdul Raahid Dostam, marks the capture of the last major northern city outside Talib' control. The Talib's new sociual order has become immediately obvious in Mazar-u-Sharif, with men abandoning traditional clothing and women's education being banned. However, few Afghans understand the refusal of most countries to provide relief aid to Talib' Afghanistan.

- Article 1: No one shall engage a girl or give her in marriage in exchange for cash or commodities.
- Article 2: No one shall compel the bridegroom or his guardians to give holiday presents to the girl or her family.
- Article 3: The girl or her guardian shall not take cash or commodities in the name of the dower [mah] in excess of ten dirham according to Sharia, which is not more than 300 afs. on the basis of the bank rate of silver.
- Article 4: Engagements and marriage shall take place with the full consent of the parties involved: (a) No one shall force marriage; (b) No one shall prevent the free marriage of a widow of force her into marriage because of family relationships [iewirate] or patriarchal ties; (c) No one shall prevent legal marriages on the pretext of engagement, forced engagement expenses, or by using force.
- Article 5: Enagamet and marriages for women under 16 and men under 19 are not permissible.

- Article 6: (1) Violators shall be liable to imprisonment from six months or three years; (2) Cash or commodities accepted in violation of the provisions of this decree shall be confiscated. [=]

12059. Greenberger, Robert S.; Cole, Jeff; Bussey, John. "Pakistan Is Considering Taking Jet-Fighter Business Elsewhere; Bhutto May Boost Pressure On US To Lift a Ban on delivery of F-16s", in Wall Street Journal, April 10, 1995. p. A14. PM Bhutto has stated he would turn to France or Russia for military aircraft if the US refuses to allow shipment of F-16 fighter jets long ago paid for by Pakistan ($658 million for 28 F-16s). France and Russia have offered to sell comparable aircraft to Pakistan. The issue of US refusal to honor its contract is a major problem in US-Pakistan relations. Lockheed Martin Corp., which manufactures the aircraft, supports the Pakistani position. Bhutto makes the point that the US must either ship the aircraft or return the money. The ban is causing intense bitterness in Pakistan, with many believing that the US used Pakistan in the war against Soviet forces in Afghanistan, then immediately turned against Pakistan after years of loyal partnership. Bhutto, in the United States, observes: "Our relationship [with the United States] has been more or less frozen. I'm really here to tell President Clinton that Pakistan is an old friend and ally... The US outlook toward Pakistan should not be fixated on one issue." [TXT]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

apart from the technical impossibility, it seemed to me better for practical reasons to describe separately two aspects of the same historical process which, though they coincided in date, were yet different in character—the process actually accomplished in the Soviet Union of equalizing the position of men and women. The fundamental difference lies in the fact that the Russian women were Europeans, who had been seized by the current of western culture long before the October Revolution of 1917 in Russia, indeed, in the middle of the 19th century, and had often played a leading part in the general emancipation of women, whilst the women of the Russian East took part in a movement which started with elemental force after the end of the World War in almost all the hitherto intensely patriarchal peoples of the East. For it is no accident that almost simultaneously in Turkey, in Persia, in Afghanistan, and in other countries, the women of Islam were roused and endeavoured to break completely with a past unworthy of human beings, hitherto forced upon them, with the slavish life they had led for centuries. Undoubtedly the war, but no less the great social upheavals and changes that followed it, prepared the ground for what was to come. But naturally the speed of the process differed very much in different countries. The October Revolution of 1917 in Russia, with its tendency towards social equalization that was particularly vigorous at first, did much to hasten the process of equalization of the sexes. Nevertheless, it is not only here that we must look for the great contrast to the parallel process in the non-Soviet countries. For amongst the millions of women, for the most part Mohammedan, in the Soviet East we have a threefold emancipation: as belonging to their nation, to their social class, and to their sex. And, moreover, without restriction to a relatively small upper class, a regenerative mass movement embracing all classes from the bottom upwards, a real uprising of the masses. And it really is a transformation in a single night from a creature hardly distinguishable from a domestic animal to a full member of the community, self-reliant and conscious of her strength, progressive and capable of development; it is a true attainment of human stature, a new creation. What confronts us, then, is a phenomenon that places immense masses of women in the foremost ranks of the "Europeanization" and emancipation of the East, the mobilization of vast forces, hitherto passive, which promise wholly new contributions to the enrichment of human culture, and we must recognize its bearing as gigantic, its significance as worldwide. And, whatever may have occurred in the past two decades in the immense territories of the Soviet Union, stretching across two continents—whatever attitude one may assume towards it—the fact remains that reconstruction is nowhere more clearly to be seen; nowhere is the gulf between yesterday and today wider. One thing, therefore, is now placed beyond question: a new leaf has been turned in the history of the ancient continent of Asia, and half of it at least will be written by the awakening women of the Russian East. In this sense, then, we are doubtless justified in detaching the liberation of women in the Soviet East from the complex whole—alike from that of European Russia and that of women in the non-Russian East—and treating it separately. In this book I shall endeavour to show in what manner and on what historical foundation, under what conditions and with what success in each separate case the transformation of women in the Soviet East has hitherto been accomplished. In the present book, unlike its predecessor, it has been impossible to attempt, much less achieve, any exhaustive description, in view of the extreme variety of the material. I have been obliged, therefore, to trace the main lines of development in the various territories of the Soviet East, which is inhabited by nearly two hundred peoples, and to report on the state of affairs up to the end of 1936. The material treated in the following pages, of which no systematic study has hitherto appeared, has been drawn from very many sources, and it has often been necessary to devote much labour to testing their reliability, since many questions had either not been raised at all previously, or had been treated in a thoroughly uncritical way. But I have also drawn from my own experience, acquired on repeated lengthy journeys in recent years, especially in Central Asia and the Caucasus, Journeys which often brought me to exceedingly remote spots, to the Persian, Afghan, and Chinese frontiers, and not far from the Indian frontier; some of these places are, as a rule, barely accessible to Western Europeans. I owe a deep debt of gratitude to the many scientific and cultural authorities and institutes in Moscow, Leningrad, Baku, Tiflis, Mashhak-Kala, Tashkent, Samarkand, Bukhara, Ferghana, Ashqabad, Merv, and Stalinobad, and to their branches in many other places, which cannot be enumerated here, and further to all those persons who frequently gave me the most friendly and generous assistance. More especially I thank the Voks (Society for Cultural Relations of the Soviet Union with Foreign Countries), which was always most kind in securing for me the opportunity of getting into contact with all the requisite authorities, and of investigating, extending, and improving my material. I owe, further, warm thanks to Dr. Andreas Gaspers, of Vienna, who has rendered me the most valuable help in situating and arranging the material.

12061. House International Relations Committee; House Asia & the Pacific Subcommittee. Drugs in Asia: The Heroin Connection: Questions for the Panel: Part 05. Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Asia & the Pacific of the Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, 104th Congress, First Session, June 21, 1995, pp. 27-29. Mr. KIM. I am just a little concerned that it’s Burma today. Tomorrow, it will be some other country. I mean, as long as there is a demand and buyers, it will continue.

How are you going to control this thing? I think we should really focus while continuing to have strong measures on human rights and all the other broad, general policies that I have been concerned about.

Dr. BROWN If you ask how the President’s strategy differs from previous strategies, we are placing greater emphasis on requesting more resources to go to reducing the demand for drugs.

I speak to you as a career law enforcement officer. When I was the police commissioner of New York City, we would arrest up to 100000 people every year just for narcotics violations alone. That is a number that is bigger than the population of most cities in America. But did we make a difference? No, we did not.

I am convinced, as is the case with most police officials in this country, we have to try to do something different. That is why one of the major initiatives in our National Drug Control Strategy is to fund treatment slots in order to treat the chronic, hard-core drug user population.

If we had, as we do have in this country, 20% of the drug users consuming three-quarters of the drugs, it makes good sense to focus on the drug users.

The only way I know to do that, which is in agreement with your proposal, is through a treatment program. And it works. In your state, for example; the State of California funded a treatment program for 1992 and invested $209 million and after 1 year, they saved the taxpayers of California $1.5 billion. That is a pretty good investment.

The RAND Corporation looked at all the modalities for addressing the drug problems in the US. How best can you reduce the use of drugs? They came out with the conclusion that treatment is the best way to reduce drug use in this country.

We are now concerned, because we are seeing, Mr. Chairman, our young people using more drugs—particularly marijuana, which is not the object of this discussion, obviously—but all of our hardcore drug users were at one time casual users. Younger people are now using more drugs, and have more liberal attitudes about drug use. And that is why we are requesting more funds for prevention programs, to stop the first-time drugs users.

All of that is to say that the President’s 1995 National Drug Control Strategy is a comprehensive approach. We want to reduce the demand for drugs, prevention, education, and treatment, while at the same time attacking the supply of drugs through aggressive enforcement through interdiction at our borders and ports.

But equally important would be our international programs. And that is why I am greatly concerned to ensure that we get adequate funding for that. And we certainly request your help in addressing appropriations for that funding.

Mr. MANZULLO. Let me bring up a point. When the International Relations Committee considered the request to fully fund the International Narcotics Account at $213 million, it was Mr. Obey, a Democrat, in the Appropriations Committee that led the charge to help reduce that account. Dr. BROWN. That is why we need your help.

Mr. MANZULLO. But we did that last year also because the President had cut back on the number of INS, FBI, and DEA agents. The Republicans worked very hard on the Commerce, Justice, and State Appropriations bills and added back the money on it.

You know, I appreciate what you are doing, Dr. Brown; but I take umbrage with any suggestion that the Republicans are holding back on the financial resources to fight this drug problem in this country.

Dr. BROWN. Well, if you recall --

Mr. MANZULLO. I just wanted to let you know that I worked very closely last year with the DEA. They are doing a tremendous job around the Chicago and Rockford, Illinois areas. It is an extremely high priority.

What I would also suggest is that one of the greatest incentives to stopping this is what Judge Reinhart of Rockford, Illinois was doing. He had a bunch of those guys in his court. Half of them got life. One was a 20-year-old man. And he said that: If I had known that I would be able to get life imprisonment because of dealing with drugs, I would not have been involved.

That was the headline of the Rockford newspaper, and that is what has to get out there. These bums are going to jail. They are going there to be locked up for life, period. We know who they are. They were robbing the streets.

I would just leave you with Judge Bonner’s quote, who is, as you know, the former director of the DEA and has done a tremendous job there, according to his records—and this is a tribute to professional law enforcement officers, who are non-political, such as yourself, who have been involved in this for years, who have an intense passion to make sure that the children of this country are not killed by the drugs that are coming from overseas and domestically. His perception has showed that between 1985 and 1992 there had been a substantial reduction, from 5.8 million in 1985 to 1.3 million in 1992, in marijuana users.

That may have been true for that period of time. This, again, does not depend upon who the President is. But, unfortunately, I understand that there has been an increase in the use of marijuana by young people that started probably around 1990 or something like that.

Dr. BROWN. Just one observation, Mr. Chairman. One of the things that I think is important for all of us who are concerned, such as yourself, is that this is not an issue that is a Democratic issue or a Republican issue. This is an American crisis. This is an issue that has an impact on Americans all over the country. No state, no county, no city, no township is immune from this problem.

Just in response to one of your observations, the President’s budget request was cut by the Congress--$300 million from Defense and $200 million from State. So it is a half a billion dollars that was cut from our programs.

So in terms of my observation about what we need, it is not stated in partisan terms. We need the support of the Congress. We need your continuous support to give the State the funds necessary to carry out our mission. If we do not, we are going to continue to have hearings such as this talking about a very, very serious problem for this country.

You know, as well as anyone in this room, that the drug problem prevents us from having the things we want in life: family and community and work. They are all impacted negatively by the drug problem.

What we have to do right now is get ahead of the heroin problem before we do have the epidemic which we just talked about earlier. We can get in on the ground floor. But for us to be able to do so, we have to have, first of all, a sound strategy; and I think by working with all the government agencies in the Federal Government, we have that strategy.

What we must have right now would be the funding.

Mr. MANZULLO. We are doing that, Dr. Brown. But it was not the Republicans that decimated your staff.

Dr. BROWN. Well, that is the point I am making. This is not a partisan issue.

Mr. MANZULLO. I understand. The sword goes both ways. Let me just assure you of my continued commitment in whatever areas there are. And we have worked with the agencies in the past to try to get the funding that is necessary. But, you know, sometimes getting extra money is not the answer. It is really just that we are reallocating the resources.

You have been very patient, Dr. Brown. I appreciate what you are doing for this country. I appreciate the passion that you have, especially for the children.

Dr. BROWN. Thank you. And I will call on you for your continued support for our efforts.

Mr. MANZULLO. Thank you.

Dr. BROWN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANZULLO. Let us have Mr. Gelbard and Mr. Greene. If you could please come to the table. And forgive us for taking so long, but there was a 45 minute vote, where both Republicans and Democrats voted.

Mr. GELBARD, please. [=]

It is my pleasure to be here with you today to have the opportunity to discuss narcotics production and trafficking in Asia. And equally important, if not more important, is the effects on us here in the US.

With your permission, I would like to just summarize my prepared statement, and the prepared statement will be submitted for the record. Mr. MANZULLO. Without objection.

Dr. BROWN. Over the past year, we have tackled and tracked an increase in the availability of heroin on our streets as a result of lower prices, greater purity, and bumper crops coming out of Asia, as well as South America.

It is imperative that we respond aggressively to this increase in heroin availability and heroin use on the streets of our cities. Our failure to do so will lead to increased health care and criminal justice costs, as well as an incalculable human cost.

I have held, Mr. Chairman, in my arms babies born to drug-addicted mothers. And I know firsthand the devastating impact that heroin abuse has on communities throughout our nation.

President Clinton’s strategy to address the heroin threat is a targeted, comprehensive, and cost-effective way of addressing the problems of trafficking, production, and use and to prevent the spread of this deadly drug throughout our nation.

My office’s quarterly review of national drug trends, a report we call the “Pulse Check,” shows that high purity heroin continues to be a major drug threat in many areas of the country, particularly the Northeast and the South. Reports from New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, California, and Georgia, indicate that heroin is being purchased by younger users, under 30, as well as by those not traditionally seen in inter-city areas, suburban middle-class users.

Data from the Drug Abuse Warning Network, which reports on drug-related activities in our hospitals, shows a sharp increase in heroin emergency room incidents. Between 1992 and 1993, heroin-related episodes increased 31%, from 48000 to 63000 mentions. This continues to be a trend that began in 1990.

In addition, data shows that since the mid-1980’s, there has been a substantial increase in reported admissions to treatment programs where heroin is the primary drug of abuse.

Mr. Chairman, here is the current worldwide heroin situation.

Worldwide opium production has more than doubled in the last decade. Poppy growing areas are expanding in Afghanistan and the new republics of the former Soviet Union.

Heroin addict populations, particularly in Asia, are increasing. The cocaine cartels in Colombia are now shipping heroin into the US.

And in the US, higher purity heroin is being marketed in a smokable form, thus avoiding the stigma associated with the use of needles and the consequences of contracting HIV/AIDS through injection.

Today at least 11 countries produce a total of 3400 metric tons of illicit opium for the international drug markets.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

O ur recommended international heroin strategy has four major goals. First, expanding and intensifying contacts with foreign leaders to mobilize greater international cooperation against the threat of heroin. Second, dismantling the illicit heroin trafficking organizations by prosecuting their leaders and seizing profits and assets. Third, by treating heroin trafficking as a serious national security threat. And, fourth, reducing the supply of heroin entering the US. Our proposed heroin strategy seeks to optimize our limited counternarcotics resources to carefully target those countries and the regions that pose the most direct threat to the domestic health and national security interests of the US. Approximately 80% of the heroin sold in the US comes from Southeast Asia, particularly Burma. Our primary heroin control priority will be to reduce this flow. We will continue to employ a range of activities to address US counternarcotics concerns without undermining other vital US objectives, including efforts to promote political reform and reconciliation and curb human rights violations. Fortunately, the Burmese regime is continuing to hold discussions with Aung San Su Kyi, who has been held under house arrest since 1989. We hope these discussions continue and lead to some accommodation. I have recommended to the President, that the US take the following steps First, to continue a general dialog with appropriate Burmese authorities regarding counternarcotics strategies. Second, to exchange information with appropriate officials to support the use of unilateral counternarcotics operations. Third, to provide in-country counternarcotics training to specialized units on a case-by-case basis, subject to the same safeguards observed in other countries in which the US has a counternarcotics relationship. And, fourth, to continue support for critical United Nation's regional narcotics control efforts that affect Burma. In addition, China and Thailand should be encouraged to exert more narcotics-controlled pressure on Burma by emphasizing the regional threat of the heroin trade, while the US will address increased heroin movement through China and Taiwan. We have also recommended that support to UNDCP's subregional project be increased to reduce opium production and enhance regional cooperation. For example, Laos, with the help of the UN, has developed a comprehensive drug control plan that could serve as a model for other producing countries. This plan seeks to significantly reduce poppy cultivation and drug addiction by the year 2000. In view of Afghanistan's importance as a major opium-source country, the US has established the principle that assistance to major drug-producing areas should be in the context of a plan to reduce opium growing and processing. We will encourage Pakistan to continue a serious effort to reduce production and increase investigative efforts of high-level trafficking. The US policy will continue to encourage Turkey's political will and commitment to improve investigative and prosecutorial capabilities, target well-established drug syndicates, and assist with the technical expertise required to undertake this task. While initiatives included in our international heroin strategy will not require an immediate increase in funding, we have asked agencies and departments to make a realistic appraisal of their counternarcotics resource requirements for fiscal year 1996. In light of the Appropriations Committee's decision last week to cut the President's request for the Department of State's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Matters for fiscal year 1996 by 47% and to reject a proposal to consolidate the ESF and FMF counternarcotics efforts within the State Department, in my view, it is critical that this Committee demonstrate its support for the President's international drug control strategy when the bill comes to the House floor later today or tomorrow. The overwhelming proportion of our resources, programs and activities are directed toward reducing the supply and demand for cocaine in the US, because cocaine remains the principal drug threat to us. However, if the supply and purity level of heroin has risen, so has use. If left unchecked, these conditions can produce another drug use epidemic in the US that will create more health problems, more drug-related crime and staggering social and economic costs. Mr. Chairman, that concludes my summary remarks, and I will be happy to respond to any questions that the Committee might have. [The prepared statement of Dr. Brown appears in the appendix.]

M ANZULLO. Dr. Brown, Congressman Rangel just came in; and what I would like to do is--Charlie why don't you have a seat--is to take his testimony and then--you can just stay right there--and then when Congressman Rangel finishes, then we can just let the questions come.

Congressman Rangel. [--] 12063. Hua Guofeng. "Speech At The Third Session of the Fifth National Peoples Congress (9/7/1980): Part 1: Introduction", in Main Documents of The Third Session of The Fifth national Peoples Congress of the Peoples Republic of China. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1980. Fellow Deputies, This session has been going on for nine days now. Entrusted by the State Council, Comrade Yao Yilin and Comrade Wang Bingqian delivered reports on our national economic plans and our state final accounts and budgets respectively. Comrades Peng Zhen, Jiang Hua, Huang Huoqing, Wu Xinyu and Gu Ming delivered reports or made explanations on the work of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, the work of the Supreme People's Court, the work of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, and several draft laws. I would now like to put forward some ideas mainly concerning the work of the government. With regard to planning and finance, it is generally held that the rate of economic growth and the targets for this year and next proposed in the report on the economic plans are quite appropriate and that they will be conducive to the continuing readjustment of the national economy and to better economic results, while the report on the state finances has explained the 1979 deficit and the projected deficits this year and next, and it has put forward measures to be taken to reduce and eventually eliminate them. All of us believe that it is possible, if we make an effort, gradually to restore the balance between revenues and expenditures. Every endeavour has been made to ensure that both the national economic plans and the budgetary plans for this year and next are practicable. To realize them, however, will still require united efforts of the people, peasants, People's Liberation Army commanders and fighters, intellectuals and cadres of all our nationalities, and all patriotic personages. Since last year, serious natural calamities have occurred, and they are still occurring in some areas, and I hereby extend my deep sympathy to all our elders, brothers and sisters in the afflicted areas and pay my warm tribute to the cadres and masses of the PLA commanders and fighters who are heroically combating these calamities. Together with all our fellow deputies here assembled, I am firmly convinced that the people of our country can overcome the difficulties caused by these calamities as well as other transient difficulties to score brilliant new successes in our march forward. In the discussions of the past few days, you have expressed your appreciation of what has been achieved in the work of the government and in other fields over the past year, while at the same time calling attention to existing problems and offering many valuable criticisms and suggestions. On behalf of the State Council, I sincerely thank you for your trust in us. The State Council and the departments concerned should carefully study your criticisms and suggestions and must try hard to do what needs doing and correct what needs correcting. The last session of the Fifth National People's Congress was held over a year ago. Since then, the focus of all our work has been progressively shifted to socialist modernization. We have continued to deal with the political and social problems left over from the past and have further consolidated and promoted a lively political situation of stability and unity. In spite of the many problems still awaiting solution, the political and social environment for modernization is basically sound. Thanks to joint efforts by the public security, judicial, educational, ideological and cultural departments, the Youth League and society as a whole, better public order has prevailed and there has been reassuring improvement in our moral standards. The government departments at all levels have consequently begun to focus their attention on economic adjustment, and by analysing the new conditions and solving the new problems, they have made real progress in exploring the specific road to socialist modernization in our country. Our economy has taken on a fairly new look in the past year or so as a result of the process of readjustment, restructuring, consolidation and improvement. The major sectors are progressing towards balance. Agricultural production, which has long lagged behind, has now turned for the better in the past two years. The rate of growth in light industry has surpassed that in heavy industry, and the restructuring of the product mix of heavy industry serving agriculture, light industry and the people’s daily needs has made some headway. The scope of capital construction depending on appropriations from the state has been brought under control, and the excessively high rate of accumulation has begun to fall. There has been some improvement in the living standards of the majority of the urban and rural population.

Preliminary structural reforms of the economy have been initiated. The power of the people’s communes, production brigades and production teams to make their own decisions is being secured. The powers of industrial and commercial enterprises for operation and management are being expanded. The practice of combining regulation by planning and regulation by the market has been introduced to a certain extent. Competition between enterprises and combined operations by them in conditions permissible under socialism are being encouraged. The growth of collective economy in cities and towns is being fostered, and legitimate individual economy is permitted to exist and grow within limits in both town and country. A two-level financial system with the central and local authorities apportioning responsibility for revenues and expenditures is being implemented. As a result of all this, the over-centralization of production, circulation and distribution is beginning to change and the entire economy has become more lively. Progress has been made in consolidating enterprises, the leadership of many enterprises has been strengthened, and there have been advances in their democratic management. The technoeconomic indices have been improved. Cases of loss caused by poor operation and management have decreased. Relatively good results have been achieved in creating more wealth for society with the use of less manpower and materials. Many localities, departments and enterprises have improved the training of managerial cadres, technicians and workers and are educating them by various ways in business administration, enterprise management and science and technology. Technological reforms and innovations focused on conserving energy are getting under way in some places. Organization and management have been improved and the technical level of production raised. All this work is still in its initial stages, and we must resolutely carry it forward. The introduction and implementation of the policy of readjustment, restructuring, consolidation and improvement mark the beginning of a radical change in the guiding principles for our country’s economic construction. For a fairly long period in the past, a Left-deviationist tendency prevailed in many aspects of our economic work.

We went against the fundamental thesis of Mao Zedong Thought, divorced ourselves from reality and flouted objective laws, recklessly setting and blindly chasing high targets. As a result, investment in all sectors of heavy industry with the exception of energy and transport was too heavy and capital construction was over-extended. This has not only led to low speed and efficiency, but seriously hampered the growth of energy, transport, agriculture, light industry, commerce, science and technology, culture and education, and the improvement of the people’s living standards. Moreover, it has often gravely affected and even wrought havoc on the environment and the ecological balance. Over-rigid and excessive control inhibited the initiative of the grass-roots administrative offices, the enterprises and the workers, and obstructed the flow between the different links in production and circulation. There were also many serious defects in our methods of investment, in the apportionment of the earnings of industry, in labour management and in the principles of distribution, which actually fostered waste and not economy, lower and not higher quality, the backward and not the advanced and laziness and not diligence. All this served to smother the superiority of the socialist system and even distort the fundamental principles of socialism. In essence, carrying out the policy of readjustment, restructuring, consolidation and improvement means eliminating the influence of Leftdeviationist thinking on our economic work and adopting the principles of Mao Zedong Thought—starting from reality, seeking truth from facts and doing things within the limits of our capabilities—in economic construction, so that economic activity may better conform to economic laws. Practice has proved that the policy of readjustment, restructuring, consolidation and improvement is correct and timely, and led it to obtain the expected results of development. In the past year or so, there has been some improvement in the conditions for scientific research, which yielded a number of important results, and further efforts have been made to popularize science. In education, some progress has been made in the quality of instruction in primary and secondary schools and in universities.

Certain reforms have been initiated in the structure of secondary education, and secondary vocational schools are being restored. The number of TV, correspondence and evening universities has increased. Significant successes have also been scored in culture, health work and physical culture. All this could not have been achieved without the strenuous efforts of comrades working in the fields of science, education, culture, public health and sports. In the past year or so, further progress has been made in the development of socialist democracy and the socialist legal system. Guided by the four fundamental principles of upholding the socialist road, the dictatorship of the proletariat, the leadership of the Party and Marxism-LeninismMao Zedong Thought, cadres and the masses have emancipated their minds, sought truth from facts, dared to air their views and make criticisms, and had the courage to do what they ought to and wanted to do but had hitherto dared not do. Many government organizations have had closer contact with the masses, heeding their criticisms and suggestions and placing themselves under their supervision. The enforcement of the seven laws adopted at the Second Session of the Fifth National People’s Congress is contributing greatly to the full play of the people’s socialist initiative, to combating criminal offences, to the protection of the people’s interests and to the smooth progress of modernization. Economic legislation and economic judicial administration are being introduced step by step to meet the requirements of economic development. The State Council and the departments concerned have already promulgated more than 40 economic statutes, with about two dozen more presently being drafted or being worked on. We are only beginning our work in this field and much remains to be done. Here I wish to say a few words in particular about the question of protecting the democratic rights and economic interests of the minority nationalities and cementing the unity of all our nationalities. Owing to shortcomings and mistakes in our work, and particularly to the serious sabotage of our Party’s and government’s policies on nationalities, religion and other related matters by the two counter-revolutionary cliques headed by Lin Biao and Jiang Qing during the ten chaotic years, the right of many minority nationalities to regional autonomy and other democratic rights were trampled on, their economy and culture damaged and the people’s life impoverished. In order to bring about a radical change in all this the Party and the government are taking a series of effective measures to enable the people in the minority nationality areas to recuperate and to institute genuine guarantees for their political, economic and cultural rights, especially the right to regional autonomy. We are all convinced that through the joint efforts of all our nationalities, we will be able to heal past wounds and bring about an unprecedented consolidation and development of close friendship and unity among the people of all our nationalities in a relatively short period of time. In the past year or so, we have actively developed friendly co-operation and expanded economic, scientific, technological and cultural interchange with many countries, thus promoting friendship between the Chinese people and the people of those countries. We have persisted in opposing hegemonism and safeguarding world peace and have supported the just struggles of the people of various countries, thereby creating favourable internal conditions for our socialist modernization. In view of these developments in the political, economic, scientific, educational and diplomatic fields, we are justified in saying that, thanks to the joint efforts of the people of all nationalities, governments at all levels and personages in different circles, the resolutions adopted at the Second Session of the Fifth National People’s Congress and the principles and policies it laid down either have been, or are being, carried out. Our major task this year and next is, in brief, to continue to build on the present favourable situation and implement the policy of readjustment, restructuring, consolidation and improvement of the economy and, in accordance with the plans put forward by the State Council at the present session, further to advance the cause of modernization on the basis of the principles of sound, long-term planning. This is a complex task with much to be done and many problems to be solved. I would now like to put forward my views on five points of your deliberation:[=]

12064. Hua Guofeng. “Speech At The Third Session of the Fifth National Peoples Congress (9/7/1980): Part 2: Map Out a Long Term Programme”, in Main Documents Of The Third Session Of The Fifth national Peoples Congress of the Peoples Republic of China. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1980. This is a prerequisite to the development of the socialist planned economy. After the founding of the People’s Republic, immediately after the three-year period of economic rehabilitation, we successfully formulated and fulfilled the First Five-Year Plan for the Development of the National Economy. The content of the Second Five-Year Plan was also fairly good, but to our regret it failed to play the role it should have played, as it was frustrated because of the mistakes of being boastful, stirring up a “communist wind” and giving arbitrary directions which were made in 1958, and because of “the struggle against Right opportunism” which began to unfold in 1959. For a few years after 1961, the readjustment of the economy progressed smoothly with marked successes in every field, and rich experiences were gained. However, as this was essentially a period of economic rehabilitation, no new five-year plan for the development of the economy was mapped out. From 1966 onward, our economy as a whole and the work of the State Planning Commissisn itself were sadly disrupted by the “cultural revolution.” Both the collection of information required for planning and the organs in charge of it were seriously impaired, and it became almost impossible to carry on the work. Thus, during the 15 years between 1966-1980, since it was impossible to work out detailed plans, we only produced outlines for the Third, Fourth and Fifth Five-Year Plans. Consequently, over a long period there was no long-term and comprehensive programme combining lofty with clear-set aims, far-sightedness with carefully planned steps and taking past experience into account with foreseeing future developments. Still, by their diligent efforts our workers, peasants, soldiers, intellectuals and cadres overcame a multitude of difficulties, put in a lot of hard work and registered quite a number of remarkable successes. Nevertheless, because we have not been able to escape blindness in one form or another and to achieve proper planning in economic construction, a number of grave and avoidable losses were incurred. Under such circumstances, the socialist economic system could not very well demonstrate its superiority. Without doubt, socialism is by far superior to capitalism, but economic growth is highly unbalanced between different regions of the country with widely differing natural conditions. China is a vast country with rich natural resources, but economic growth is highly unbalanced between different regions of the country with widely differing natural conditions. We have a huge population. Our people are diligent, courageous and intelligent, but their scientific and cultural level is low. We already have a fair-sized economy, which is independent and relatively complete in itself, but the per capita national income is very low, commodity economy is underdeveloped, and technology and management are backward. In mapping out our long-term programme, we must be thorough in summing up experience, liquidate the influence of Left-deviationist thinking as well as other forms of idealist and metaphysical thinking and work strictly in accordance with the objective laws of socialist society. We must proceed from realities and work within the limits of our capabilities. China is a vast country with rich natural resources, but economic growth is highly unbalanced between different regions of the country with widely differing natural conditions. We have a huge population. Our people are diligent, courageous and intelligent, but their scientific and cultural level is low.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
and studies of the current national situation, of the resources, including manpower, that can be utilized and developed in the next ten years, and of the course we should follow, so that our draft outline of the ten-year plan may as far as possible be placed on a scientific and practical basis. We must devote our full attention to improving the living standards of the people. Our fundamental aim in modernizing the country is gradually to raise the level of the material and cultural life of the people on the basis of increased production. The State Council is prepared gradually to improve the material and cultural life of the people, we have to work in many spheres. Some of our work seems to have no direct connection with improving the people's living standards but such work is actually in dispensable to a better life for the people. For instance, the further strengthening of the People's Liberation Army to consolidate the defence of our great motherland and to protect our peaceful construction is an indispensable task. And so is the study of certain basic sciences. All this is not hard to understand. In any case, we must see to it that the final results of the growth of production are manifested in appropriate and genuine improvements in living standards for the entire people. Thus, by studying the outline they can envisage how much our socialist economy will grow and how much their living standards will rise over the next ten years, and thus arrive at an understanding of the connection between the cause of modernization and their own immediate and long-term interests as well as the interests of the part and those of the whole. Then everybody will continue to display the spirit of arduous struggle and devote themselves to the cause heart and soul, knowing that it is their own. We must pay special attention to the use of our intellectual resources and energetically develop our scientific and educational institutions. The level of development of a country hinges largely on the extent of its use of intellectual resources. The modernization of science and technology is the key to the three other modernizations. Scientific research must anticipate the needs of our economic construction and help solve the scientific and technological problems arising in the course of modernizing our country, and particularly the crucial ones. We must take the necessary measures in connection with management, such as the benefits and ideological matters to facilitate the extensive and prompt popularization and application of the results of scientific research. The development of schools of all levels and categories has a direct bearing on the scientific and cultural standards of everyone working for the cause of modernization, and on the knowledge, skills, proficiency, discipline and moral qualities of manual and mental workers in town and country. It is the key to the development of our science and technology. Science is a productive force and so is education, which is indispensable as a means of training and raising the workers' knowledge and skills. We can never effect modernization if they remain illiterate or semi-literate. All levels of government and indeed the whole of society must stress and promote the cause of science and education, and respect our kindergarten, primary and middle school and university teachers and our scientists. We must respect their noble and arduous labour and raise their social status. On September 2, Ye Shengtao and seven other N.P.C. deputies wrote a letter to Renmin Ribao, severely criticizing some of the staff of two hotels in Dalian for their bad behaviour in slighthing some primary school teachers, and called on people of all walks of life to respect primary school teachers. I fully agree with and support this letter. I hope all government personnel will join with the people throughout the country in creating an atmosphere in which all teachers and scientists are held in esteem by all members of society. The neglect of science and education, the failure to regard them as indispensable, is an important aspect of the Left-deviationist thinking of the past. It has cost us dearly and must be rectified at all cost. Therefore, the importance of science and education to the cause of modernization must be duly reflected in the draft outline of the ten-year plan. The State Council is prepared gradually to devote more funds to science and education in the coming decade and hopes that the governments of the provinces, municipalities and autonomous regions will do likewise. We shall strive in a multitude of ways to bring about more and better results in our scientific and educational work, so that in the course of time we may train generation after generation of workers with socialist consciousness, knowledge of science and culture, occupational skills and good health, as well as large numbers of specialists in all fields such as science and technology, social sciences, organization and management, literature and art, political science and so on. The State Council is prepared to consider the draft outline of the ten-year plan. The population problem is one of universal concern. In mapping out our programme, we should plan the size of our population as well as the growth of material production, so that the two can fit in with each other. For a long period in the past, chiefly in the 1960s, we slackened our efforts with regard to family planning. As a result, our population has grown too rapidly and will continue to grow substantially in the coming years. Young people under 30 years of age account for about 65% of the total population, or around 630 million. Some have already reached the age of fertility and the majority of the remainder will do so within the next 10-20 years or so. If population growth is not controlled, there will be a dizzy peak, making it virtually impossible for the economy and all our social institutions to cope. Upon careful study, the State Council deems it necessary to launch a crash programme over the coming 20-30 years calling on each couple, except those in minority nationality areas with sparse populations, to have a single child, so that the rate of population growth may be brought under control as soon as possible.

Our aim is to strive to limit the population to a maximum of 1200 million by the end of this century. It is very common for one couple to have only one child in the developed countries. But for people in our rural areas, it is truly an important matter of transforming social customs and traditions. In our effort to achieve this, we rely chiefly on publicizing and implementing the policies of the Party and government and on ideological and political work, not on compulsion and arbitrary orders. It should be noted that since the early 1970s and in the last few years in particular, our promotion of family planning has achieved notable results both in town and country. Cadres at all levels, especially comrades in the women's organizations and the health and family planning departments at all levels, who are directly engaged in the work, have done a great deal. We should give them full credit. However, we must not shut our eyes to the policies and measures we take in this connection must be appropriate. We must make full use of persuasion and education and guarantee safety in applying birth control techniques. It is our hope that after painstaking publicity and education the whole people, and particularly the young, will be able to see that this is in the nation's interest and will warmly respond to this important call. The mass line is the essential way to map out our policies and measures which we take in this connection must be appropriate. We must make full use of persuasion and education and guarantee safety in applying birth control techniques. It is our hope that after painstaking publicity and education the whole people, and particularly the young, will be able to see that this is in the nation's interest and will warmly respond to this important call. The mass line is the essential way to map out our policies and measures which we take in this connection must be appropriate. We must make full use of persuasion and education and guarantee safety in applying birth control techniques. It is our hope that after painstaking publicity and education the whole people, and particularly the young, will be able to see that this is in the nation's interest and will warmly respond to this important call. and April this year, we invited specialists in all fields, including economists, techno-economists, technologists and natural scientists, to join in the discussion, thereby making full use of our specialists in all fields in drawing up the draft outline of the ten-year plan. This practice must continue in the future. [=]

12065. Hua Guofeng. "Speech At The Third Session of the Fifth National Peoples Congress (9/7/1980): Part 3: Carry Forward The Structural Reform of Economic Management", in Main Documents of The Third Session of The Fifth national Peoples Congress of the Peoples Republic of China. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1980. Our present system of economic management, including the relevant systems of finance, labour and wages, prices and materials control, consists mainly of what we inherited from the practices prevailing under the special historical conditions of the years of revolutionary wars. It has never undergone the reforms needed in the light of the specific course of development of China's socialist construction and in conformity with the scientific and democratic principles of socialism, and consequently more and more problems have piled up. The shortcomings and defects of our system of economic management show themselves mainly as follows: over-concentration of power; excessive and rigid control; denial of appropriate independence to socialist enterprises in their operations; improper use of government authority, both central and local, to take decisions directly and intervene administratively; and failure to distinguish either between the Party and the government or between the government and the enterprises in the sphere of management, thus making it very difficult for the enterprises to establish independent systems of production control and of operation and management. For a considerable period, we regarded as socialist principles certain methods in the system of economic management which hindered or even disrupted the growth of the productive forces. Instead of reforming them, we cherished and clung to them. At the same time, we denied the legitimacy of independent functions and rights of the trade unions. As a result, enterprises ranging from industry, communications and transport, commerce, services, to state farms and the collectively run agriculture which involves the bulk of the population, lacked inducement to develop their production and improve their operations; the enthusiasm, initiative and creativity of the working people were dampened; and the superiority of the socialist system was by no means given full play. We neglected the education of the cadres, staff and workers in production techniques and in operational and managerial know-how on the one hand, and failed to assign people with professional knowledge to important posts on the other, with the result that arbitrary directions were widespread, making it very difficult to raise technical, operational and managerial levels.

During the ten-year upheaval, some systems and policies that had been gathered together through long experience and had proved efficient over the years were disrupted and all but destroyed by Lin Biao and the gang of four. Their ultra-Left line in economic work and their corresponding policies and methods sought to monopolize the economic system, which was already beset by numerous problems. After over three years of consolidation, the general economic situation has markedly improved, but many problems still remain. In a word, the shortcomings and defects in the system of economic management seriously impede the progress of modernization and must be eliminated in a thoroughgoing reform. The general orientation for this reform is to transform over-centralized management by the state (central and local authorities included), extend the decision-making power of the enterprises and the power of their workers and staff to participate in management, transform regulation through planning alone into regulation through planning combined with regulation by the market, and transform management relying mainly on administrative organs and methods into management relying mainly on economic organs as well as on economic and legal methods. The reform in process for the past year is only a small first step in this direction. From now on, we must conserve what has proved effective in the reform, improve it and perfect it and, on the basis of our initial successes, carry it out unswervingly. It must be pointed out, however, that as structural reform is a very complicated matter with many ramifications, we must give it careful thought and make adequate preparations. We should draw up a programme for overall reform, conduct experiments, and put it into effect prudently and step by step. The reform of the economic system is essentially aimed at making the maximum use of the superiority of socialism. Naturally, new problems will inevitably crop up in the process. We should make prompt provision of research and study and be prepared for the problems that will arise. We must not panic or halt or fall back. The personnel, especially the leading personnel, at all levels of government, should further emancipate their minds and carry forward the reform by working enthusiastically with the masses, daring to innovate and acting prudently after investigation and study and on the strength of collective wisdom, and thus bring about fresh progress in socialist modernization.

This reform will help raise economic efficiency, expedite modernization, consolidate and perfect the socialist system and, in short, improve living standards. We are convinced, therefore, that it will win the support of the whole people. [=]

12066. Hua Guofeng. "Speech At The Third Session of the Fifth National Peoples Congress (9/7/1980): Part 4: Eliminate Bureaucracy and Improve Government Work", in Main Documents of The Third Session of The Fifth national Peoples Congress of the Peoples Republic of China. Beijing: Foreign Languages Press, 1980. In restructuring our economic system, we must improve the work of the government at all levels. At present, widespread bureaucracy in our government offices at various levels is a very serious problem. In many of its manifestations bureaucracy is tied up with the irrational economic system and the two reinforce each other; restructuring the economic management system will help to eliminate a good deal of bureaucracy, but bureaucracy in its turn will impede the restructuring of the economic system or even continue to do harm after the reform of the system. The elimination of bureaucracy, therefore, must be carried out together with structural reform of the economy. Bureaucracy hampers not only the restructuring of the economic system and the progress of modernization, but all our other work as well. It has already aroused and continues to arouse strong popular discontent. Unless our administrative structure is thoroughly purged of bureaucracy of all descriptions, the governments at all levels will not be able to build an administrative system of high efficiency and prestige and give full play to the enthusiasm of their personnel and of the masses and consequently to the superiority of the socialist system. So I would like to speak at greater length on how to overcome bureaucracy effectively. Bureaucracy is a social phenomenon with a long history. While the bureaucracy of today and the bureaucracy of the old society have many things in common, the two are nevertheless essentially different. The bureaucracy of the old society served to exacerbate the exploitation and oppression of the working people by the ruling classes and could not possibly be eradicated by the old society itself, while the bureaucracy as exists in our society makes it hard for the socialist system to display its superiority, goes against its interests, and can and must be overcome by our socialist society. Apart from and more important than the surviving influence of the pernicious habits of the old society, the emergence and growth of bureaucracy in our government organizations has its social roots in the fact that our socialist system is still far from perfect and that our understanding of the laws of socialist development is still far from complete. We tried many times in the past to counter the manifestations of bureaucracy, but our efforts did not achieve much. Why? The main reason is that, in the past, we relied chiefly on ideological education, seeing it merely as a vestige of the old society and failing to look for the causes of bureaucracy in the various systems and the ways to overcome it. While the present socialist system is still far from perfect, our government organs are improperly managing almost every aspect of social life by administrative methods, thereby burdening themselves with a complex, back-breaking and unparalleled job. This irrational state of affairs is in fact the crux of the matter. If it remains unchanged, it will not only prevent us from concentrating on eradicating the old-type bureaucracy, but will inevitably produce other kinds of bureaucracy under new conditions. I do not intend to dwell on the evil practices of old-type bureaucracy and the well-known bad work style of the bureaucrats in their dealings with the people. I wish to focus on the serious defects: md faults engendering bureaucracy in our present administrative system. They fall mainly under the following categories.

1. Over-concentration of power. The individual enterprises and production units are not granted the power to engage in economic activity independently, and a lot of vital power is concentrated in the multiple echelons of administration above them. The result is that those higher up become far removed from actual production and enjoy ever greater power, the echelons of administration multiply, and work becomes increasingly difficult. The power which should belong to the enterprises and production units is improperly concentrated in the government departments, that which should belong to the local authorities in the Central authorities, and that which should belong to the government departments in the Party committees. This state of affairs is becoming an increasingly formidable obstacle to the progres of socialist construction. Things are more or less the same in undertakings outside the economic realm. True, a certain degree of centralization of management is necessary in our socialist state, especially in its early stages. In point of fact, an important manifestation of the superiority of socialism is the proper centralization of management in accordance with the plan for developing the economy and the centralized leadership of the government and the Party in co-ordinating the interests of all social sectors. But excessive centralization of power produces the opposite results, which are not unfamiliar to us—those at the lower levels who know how things stand often have to take decisions without the time to get to know the situation. This not only reduces efficiency and dampens the enthusiasm of those at the lower levels, but it also lowers the standard of leadership of functionaries at the upper levels, making mistakes inevitable in their work. They become deeply entangled in trifles which they ought to be rid of and consequently do not have time to study and consider carefully more important matters, so as to tackle them properly. As they are far removed from the complexities of real life, they unavoidably tend to simplify matters, think in absolute terms and find a single solution for diverse problems at the lower levels. This is an important reason for many bureaucratcatic practices in our real life.

2. Confusion with regard to the limits of powers and responsibilities. At all levels of government, from the State Council down to the local administrations, there are no systematic and practicable administrative rules and regulations by which to define or specify the scope and limits of powers and responsibilities and lay down the working procedure of departments, local administrations, units and individuals. This has often resulted in the departments and units having no rules and regulations to go by when there are no precedents to follow. They are not clear about their duties and responsibilities and consequently have no alternative but to report to the higher authorities and seek instructions, with the reports passing from one echelon of authority to another. Hence the odyssey of official papers and the deluge of reports and meetings, the endless disputes over trifles and the dilatory style of work.

3. The incompatibility of the present cadre system with the requirements of socialist construction. The different levels of government haven’t a sound system for selecting, appointing, assessing and training cadres, or for culling out the incompetent and meting out rewards or disciplinary sanctions. The departments and units seldom recruit and employ cadres through advertisement and examination or use them in accordance with their abilities. Instead, cadres are mainly appointed by the organizational and personnel departments. This system has its historical roots and has played a positive role. But it is becoming more and more inadequate to meet the tasks of modernization. There is no practical plan for training cadres, and the system is often out of keeping with the requirements of our work. Regular and strict assessment of cadres is lacking, as are rewards and disciplinary measures. No distinction is made between those who do a good job and those who do a poor one and between those who are qualified and those who are not. Once a person becomes a cadre, he has a lifelong job, an “iron rice bowl.” Even if he proves really incompetent or seriously negligent of his duties, he remains a cadre until he is dismissed. Actually, although this system can prevent unemployment and guarantee a secure life for some people, the cost of achieving these things is too great. If this state of affairs is not thoroughly changed, how will we be able to realize modernization?

4. Overstaffing, overlapping, the proliferation of deputy and nominal posts and low working efficiency. The three phenomena of over-concentration of power, clear-cut responsibility and impropriety of the cadre system inevitably result in overstaffing. And overstaffing, in its turn, leads to a worsening of the maladies of bureaucracy. The fact that there is often duplication in our administrative setup and that the numbers of permanent and provisional organs and of the functionaries they employ exceed all previous records testifies to the gravity of the problem. We must now seriously study and tackle it without delay. Here I must stress that most of our administrative organs have done a lot of work indispensable to socialist construction. All our achievements are inseparable from their efforts. In future, we will still need a powerful state apparatus and a government with full authority. And this government will have to take up all kinds of necessary administrative work which is ultimately in the service of the people. I would also like to stress that most of our government functionaries are hard-working, uncomplaining and devoted to their duty and that many of them are rather proficient and experienced in practical work, often conduct on-the-spot investigations and keep close ties with the masses. In criticizing the bureaucracy in our work, we are mainly referring to the need to find out its causes and improve our system. The present undesirable system often leaves many of our devoted functionaries little room for the full exercise of their abilities or involves them in a lot of fruitless work. The responsibility certainly does not lie with them. It is true that there are some functionaries whose thinking and style of work are not good. But without a change in the system it will be difficult to overcome their shortcomings effectively. The key to the eradication of bureaucracy lies first of all in a thorough eradication of the irrationalities in the system of state administration, the system of office work, the cadre system and the administrative setups. The specific measures to be adopted are as follows:

1. Delegate powers to the enterprises and other units. Under the centralized leadership of the state, the enterprises and other units should have the necessary power to make genuinely independent decisions concerning their management and operations. Experiments to this effect were undertaken in a number of enterprises last year with generally good results. In future, such experiments should be extended step by step to cover more enterprises, and we should continue to expand their decision-making powers. Only a few other units besides enterprises have conducted experiments. It is necessary to sum up their experience and steadily extend our experiments. Once the enterprises and other units have more powers to take their own decisions, the work of many administrative departments will greatly diminish. Some of these departments may be transformed into enterprises or establishments, while others may be amalgamated. Thus, with the large-scale simplification of administration the room for possible bureaucracy will be immensely reduced. Of course, the power to make independent decisions should not be handed to only a few leading members of enterprises and other units. They must also be invested in the appropriate democratization agencies and supervisory organs which are genuinely representative of workers and staff. The delegation of power must be linked up with democratic management. All enterprises and other units should establish congresses or conferences of workers and staff. The congresses or conferences enjoy the right to discuss and decide on important matters within their purview and to elect their leading administrative personnel or make recommendations for their appointment or removal. In day-to-day work, all matters affecting the vital interests of the workers and staff should be handled with the consent and co-operation of the trade unions. The delegation of power should in no case weaken the necessary centralized control. But such centralized control of enterprises should be exercised mainly by using economic methods instead of administrative methods as in the past. But beyond any question, along with democratic management, there must be necessary centralized management and centralized direction within the enterprises, whether in the field of production, technology or economy. This is also true in principle of the different institutions.

(2) The functions and duties of each administrative organ and its subordinate units and individuals should be clearly defined by administrative statutes. This work should be approached simultaneously from two directions. First, each department and unit should arouse the masses to abide by the rules, regulations and procedures, and work so that each person is clear about his specific duty and each job has someone responsible for it. If there are more people than needed, they may leave their posts to receive training or be assigned other jobs. This is now being done by some units and has yielded satisfactory results. Second, the levels of government from the State Council right through to the local authorities should organize specialists to formulate systematic administrative statutes that clearly define the functions and powers of the departments and units and the principles guiding their exercise, as well as the methods for solving certain special problems. When such statutes exist, the routine of reporting and seeking instructions from above can be reduced to a minimum and many things can be settled independently by the related departments and units within the context of their respective powers and working principles. After the functions and powers are specified for each unit and person, a rigorous system for checking up on their performance should be established so that both merits and demerits will be duly recorded, rewards conferred and disciplinary measures taken. Those who seriously neglect their duty should be dealt with according to law.

(3) Efforts should be made to reform the cadre system. After conscientiously summing up historical experience and making thoroughgoing investigations and study, we should work out a viable system for cadres at all levels and of all categories with respect to appointment, examination, assessment, rewards and disciplinary sanctions, training, promotion, transfer, retirement, dismissal, and so on. Ours is a socialist country, so we must try as far as possible to ensure a secure life for all who work and to make proper arrangements for them when they should retire or are relieved of their posts.

(4) We must establish and perfect a system of inspection and supervision. By taking the three measures mentioned above, we will be able not only to remove over-concentration of power, confusion over the limits of powers and responsibilities and the weaknesses of our inspection system, but also eliminate overstaffing. This will greatly lessen the manifestations of bureaucracy. However, bureaucracy is a historical phenomenon, and naturally sustained and relentless efforts are required to combat it. It is necessary to carry out regular and strict inspections and supervision over government organs at all levels and their functionaries. At present, the forms, channels and procedures for popular inspection of and supervision over government functionaries at all levels are still imperfect; in fact, the exercise of supervisory power by the masses is far from easy or universal. This state of affairs must change. In addition to supervision by Party organizations and the Party committees for inspecting discipline at all levels, letters and visits from the masses should be handled in earnest and newspapers and magazines should properly be utilized for exposure and criticism in checking up on and supervising the various levels of government organs and their functionaries. It is necessary to give more support to such activities. Supervision by people's deputies and by government organs at higher levels and exposure by government organs at lower levels exert a powerful influence and should be extensively encouraged. Mass recommendation, appraisal and selection of cadres are now being tried out with good results in some government organs and may also be popularized. In short, governments at all levels must continue to pool the wisdom of the masses and strive to create additional methods of inspection and supervision which are by?th more efficient and easier to carry out. This will facilitate, in accordance with the people's will, the timely commendation, rewarding and promotion of cadres who have distinguished themselves in the cause of socialism on the one hand, and, on the other hand the exposure and correction of the faults and errors of government functionaries and the replacement and recall of bureaucrats who are guilty of serious dereliction of duty. I wish to point out that I have covered neither all the sources of bureaucracy nor all the methods of overcoming it. Moreover, while some of the methods of overcoming bureaucracy mentioned above may be carried out fairly soon, others, and a considerable proportion at that, cannot be carried out at once because it will require a fairly thorough-going and all-round reform of our work system and even of our organizational system, and so adequate preparation is necessary. But since we are determined to strive for reform, we must, in our minds to carry out such reforms. Otherwise our modernization programme will definitely be held back by the aforesaid irrational systems. Of course, bureaucratic habits left over from the old society are related to the level of the productive forces and to the educational and cultural level of the people and cadres. That is why the complete overcoming of bureaucracy in all its manifestations is a protracted and arduous task. But the major bureaucratic maladies and other maladies connected with them can surely be overcome provided that government organs at all levels fully recognize the danger, grasp the four key links—reform of the state's management systems, reform of the administrative work system at the various levels, reform of the cadre system, and improvement of the system of inspection of and supervision over cadres and solve these problems in a planned and systematic way while intensifying education and training. Bureaucracy is by no means an incurable disease under socialism. Socialism will assuredly develop into a vigorous system. At least in China it certainly can and will. This is a requirement of the basic tenets of Marxism and, what is more, with our long revolutionary tradition of the mass line we can rely on the broadest masses. This ensures our eventual success in overcoming bureaucracy.

We should steadily and effectively hand over to the grass-roots units and to the masses the portion of our power that ought to be delegated. They will surely be able to help and supervise our government in carrying out all the necessary reforms so as to enable it to adapt itself to the needs of modernization and build itself up and become a modern socialist government: a fairly streamlined, responsible and efficient government in our history, a government which maintains close links with the masses. [+] in this regard. The Constitution is the fundamental charter of our country and the basic guide for all spheres of government work. The First Session of the Fifth National People’s Congress made some amendments to the Constitution. But we did not have enough time then to sum up comprehensively the experiences and lessons gained since the founding of the People’s Republic, nor did we have enough time to size up and eliminate the influence of certain aspects of Left thinking during the ten years of the Cultural Revolution. As a result, there are quite a number of places in the present Constitution which are inappropriate. Moreover, many of the provisions of what is the fundamental charter of our country are not free from flaws, nor are they as well-defined as they should be. Therefore, the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party has proposed that the present session consider and begin an overall revision of the Constitution, so that it can better reflect the interests and will of the people of all nationalities in the new historical period and better meet the needs of socialist modernization and the democratization of the state. The genuine rule of law is required not only for consolidating and enhancing the stability and unity of our country but also for ensuring the smooth progress of modernization. To this end, we must continue to improve the work of legislation and the administration of justice. We should first formulate laws that are much more complete than those we have now and, in particular, we should devote much of our energy to legislation concerning economic affairs. We, therefore, suggest that the Standing Committee of the National People’s Congress enlist the services of an adequate number of qualified personnel to draw up one by one such important laws as the civil law, the law of civil procedure, the law of minority nationality regionality autonomy, the planning law, the factory law, the labour law, the contract law and the energy law. The State Council shall take an active part in the drafting of the relevant laws and shall institute and successively promulgate rules and decrees, especially administrative regulations governing the terms of reference and responsibilities of different organizations and the reform of the system of personnel placement. The provincial, municipal and autonomous regional people’s congresses and their standing committees should draft and promulgate local statutes in conformity with the principles laid down by law. Only in this way can our cadres and other citizens have laws and regulations to abide by in all spheres of their work and their other activities. As for laws, rules, regulations and decrees already promulgated, all levels of government must see to it that resolute measures are taken to enforce them. In recent months, counties all over the country have had deputies to their people’s congresses directly elected by voters in accordance with the electoral law and have had their leading personnel chosen by these deputies. This is an event of far-reaching significance in the political life of our people, an indicator of the further development of people’s democracy. The governments at different levels must do a conscientious job in this connection. Our cadres, and senior cadres in particular, must set an example in observing discipline and abiding by the law. They must never think that they can flout laws and discipline on account of their authority or past meritorious services. Anyone who does so, comrades, is going to commit grave errors! The greater our cadres’ authority and meritorious services, the greater their political and moral obligation to set an example to the people, their subordinates their children and posterity and to lead the entire people in creating an entire generation imbued with revolutionary spirit. Comrades! We must resolutely do away with all bureaucratic airs and the exercise of “special privileges” and foster a revolutionary spirit of utter devotion to the people. This is our sacred duty to the people and youth of our country. People who concern themselves only with the pursuit of their own private interests or those of their children, relatives and friends at the expense of the interests of the state and the people will eventually be brought to justice according to law and discipline. Our cadres must resolutely fight against the evil practice of tailoring the law to suit one’s selfish ends and against bureaucrats shielding one another in wrongdoing. We must always keep to the principle that “all are equal before the law,” and there must never be any “special citizens” who can violate laws and discipline with impunity. We must see to it that the public security organs, the people’s procuratorates and the people’s courts independently exercise their respective powers in investigation, prosecution and passing judgment, allowing no illegal interference whatsoever by any organs, mass organizations or individuals. Only by so doing can we guard the sanctity of socialist legality and make it a truly powerful revolutionary weapon in the defence of socialist democracy. To ensure the correct and effective implementation of the present reform in our economic and political systems, we must strengthen ideological and political work as well as the necessary party and state supervision. Against the backdrop of the socialist legal system and the communist attitude towards labour among cadres at all levels and the broad masses. We must strive to eradicate the influence of the remnant feudal ideology, and of such nonproletarian ideologies as bourgeois and pettybourgeois thinking. It should also be noted that with the expansion of contacts with foreign countries, the corrosive influence of foreign bourgeois ideas is beginning to tell among certain people and such disgraceful behaviours as worshipping and having blind faith in things foreign and forfeiting national dignity are on the increase. We must be on our guard and oppose this tendency. To eradicate the influence of the ideologies of the exploiting classes and other non-proletarian classes is a major task for us, which is indispensable to the development of socialist democracy not only at present, but for a fairly long period of time to come. [6] departments have paid no heed. What a big loss to the state this is! This again shows the importance of continuing to eliminate the evil influence of the long-prevailing Left-deviationist thinking which despises knowledge and intellectuals. More than 40 years ago, in speaking of the selection and promotion of cadres for economic work, Comrade Mao Zedong said, "Discard this mistaken view and you will see cadres all around you." This remark is well put and is still apposite today. The important task of training and selecting young and middle-aged cadres rests especially on the older generation.

Large numbers of our old cadres braved untold dangers in the prolonged revolutionary struggle and have striven with might and main for the cause of national construction. They have made great contributions and deserve the respect and love of the people as valuable assets of our Party and our country. To reduce the average age of leading cadres means to increase the percentage of younger people in leading groups at different levels so that they gradually become the majority. It does not mean the removal of all older people from leading posts. Besides, age requirements for leading cadres should vary at different levels. Older cadres who are able to carry on their work remain the mainstay of our leadership. But some are now quite old and lack the necessary health and vigour; after all you cannot resist the laws of nature. We might ask these comrades to act as advisers, but it would be too much to ask them to continue to shoulder the heavy tasks at the front line. Thus we should conscientiously make arrangements for large numbers of older and trailer comrades who have made contributions to the state and the people to stay at the second or third line so that they may continue to make contributions in their remaining years while enjoying as before of what is due to them politically and materially. The older cadres have rich experience in judging, selecting and training people. History has entrusted them with the important and glorious duty to actively find and promote outstanding young and middleaged cadres, voluntarily to let the younger and more energetic comrades take their places, and to encourage, support and help them boldly carry on their work. This is a best and most valuable contribution our senior cadres can make to the cause of the four modernizations. We are convinced that they will certainly live up to the eager expectations all our people! The necessary conditions should be created to help large numbers of government functionaries and cadres in all fields of work to study full- or part-time and to acquire and increase the general and specialized knowledge they need to work for the four modernizations. "These include regular specialized schools and training courses for cadres either at their posts or while on special leave. We have both positive and negative experience in this connection. In the early years of the People's Republic, we used varied methods in training cadres of worker, peasant and soldier origin and helped them raise their cultural level and increase their professional knowledge.

This highly important work which had yielded notable results was later regretfully discarded. We should now resume and improve it in order that all such cadres fit for further studies will be able to pursue their studies in various specialties through all possible forms of training, arming themselves for the four modernizations. The leaders and functionaries at different levels of government must study tenaciously and untringly. It is our belief that from them will emerge more and more socialist-minded experts in all trades and professions. In his report to the Second Plenary Session of the Seventh Central Committee of the Party, Comrade Mao Zedong said, "If we know nothing about production and do not master it quickly, if we cannot restore and develop production as speedily as possible and achieve solid successes so that the livelihood of the workers, first of all, and that of the people in general is improved, we shall be unable to maintain our political power, we shall be unable to stand on our feet, we shall fall." After nationwide victory, we accomplished that task with resounding success. In the new circumstances of today, we face a similar task in realizing modernization. It is imperative for us to accomplish it, and we certainly can. Fellow Deputies! All the questions I have just dwelt upon most deeply concern all our people. They have arisen from the new conditions and our understanding of them is still rather superficial. We now invite you, our fellow deputies, to discuss them so as to reach a common and correct understanding. It must be noted that we are merely posing these questions here and that arduous efforts will be needed for their solution. After the conclusion of this session, the State Council and the local governments should proceed from reality and investigate and study problems thoroughly so as to put forward effective and practical guidelines and specific policies and measures to this end. The governments at all levels should, first of all, initiate rigorous reforms in order to overcome bureaucracy and become active organs that can truly lead the cause of modernization and serve the people. Now, as entrusted by the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, I shall explain the changes in the leading personnel of the State Council. In order to strengthen and improve the Party's leadership to meet the needs of socialist modernization, a number of important measures were proposed at the Fifth Plenary Session of the 11th Central Committee of the Party not long ago, measures such as making an effort to appoint to leading posts at all levels those comrades who unservingly carry out the Party's line, who are able to work on their own and who are in the prime of life, measures designed to strengthen collective leadership and put an end to the practice of providing lifelong posts for leading cadres.

The basic spirit underlying these measures is likewise applicable to the strengthening and improvement of government leadership. Learning from historical experience, the Central Committee of the Party has decided that, as a rule, the first secretary of a Party committee should not concurrently be head of a provincial people's government, chairman of an autonomous region, or head of an autonomous prefecture, or of a county or city. This was aimed at preventing the over-concentration of power and the concurrent holding of too many posts by one person, and at truly and clearly separating Party work from government work. Such comrades will thus be able to concentrate their time and energy on solving the Party's major problems, while all levels of government under the State Council will have a complete and efficient administrative system from top to bottom. In line with the above principle, I proposed to the Central Committee that I cease concurrently holding the premiership of the State Council. The Central Committee has taken a decision to this effect. It has also decided that five veteran comrades of our Party who are now Vice-Premiers of the State Council, namely, Comrades Deng Xiaoping, Li Xiannian, Chen Yun, Xu Xiangqian and Wang Zhen, cease concurrently holding vice-premierships of the State Council. Comrade Wang Renzhong, who already holds an important Party post, will also cease concurrently holding his vice-premiership. I now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval. In addition, Comrade Chen Yonggui has asked to be relieved of or while on special leave. We have both positive and negative experience now submit all these requests to this congress for examination. In addition, Comrade Wang Renzhong, who already holds an important Party post, will also cease concurrently holding his vice-premiership. I now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval.

To the Central Committee the Party has decided that, as a rule, the first secretary of a Party committee should not concurrently be head of a provincial people's government, chairman of an autonomous region, or head of an autonomous prefecture, or of a county or city. This was aimed at preventing the over-concentration of power and the concurrent holding of too many posts by one person, and at truly and clearly separating Party work from government work. Such comrades will thus be able to concentrate their time and energy on solving the Party's major problems, while all levels of government under the State Council will have a complete and efficient administrative system from top to bottom. In line with the above principle, I proposed to the Central Committee that I cease concurrently holding the premiership of the State Council. The Central Committee has taken a decision to this effect. It has also decided that five veteran comrades of our Party who are now Vice-Premiers of the State Council, namely, Comrades Deng Xiaoping, Li Xiannian, Chen Yun, Xu Xiangqian and Wang Zhen, cease concurrently holding vice-premierships of the State Council. Comrade Wang Renzhong, who already holds an important Party post, will also cease concurrently holding his vice-premiership. I now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval. In addition, Comrade Chen Yonggui has asked to be relieved of or while on special leave. We have both positive and negative experience now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval. In addition, Comrade Wang Renzhong, who already holds an important Party post, will also cease concurrently holding his vice-premiership. I now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval. In addition, Comrade Wang Renzhong, who already holds an important Party post, will also cease concurrently holding his vice-premiership. I now submit all these requests to this congress for examination and approval.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
Liberation Army is the staunch pillar of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the loyal defender of the socialist motherland and the four modernizations, and it is also fin important force in safeguarding world peace. In the near future, it will not be possible to increase the expenditure on national defence by a big margin. Nevertheless, it is imperative that we should strengthen our defence. The People’s Liberation Army must continue to step up its political and military training and the training of cadres, strengthen its political and ideological work, expedite various kinds of preparations against aggression, carry forward its fine traditions, and consolidate and heighten its combat effectiveness. We must continue to do a good job in building up the militia and in the work of supporting the army and giving preferential treatment to the families of the armymen. The people’s representatives of all circles, governments at all levels and people of all our nationalities must care for and cherish our own army, actively support it and help it fulfil its various tasks. We must make concerted efforts to make our army an impregnable Great Wall. We shall work energetically for the return of Taiwan to the motherland, fulfilling our lofty aim of unifying our homeland at an early date.

The Message to Compatriots in Taiwan issued by the N.P.C. Standing Committee on New Year’s Day 1979 has had a growing influence on the people in Taiwan from the top to the grass roots, and on our overseas compatriots and people of other countries. Over the past year or so patriotic fellow-countrymen in Taiwan and our overseas compatriots have striven for the unification of the motherland. Compatriots on both sides of the straits, in particular, desire to establish postal, transport and trade relations between the mainland and Taiwan at an early date. We are convinced that the unification of the motherland is an irresistible historical trend and that our lofty goal will be attained. There is but one China in the world, and Taiwan is an inseparable part of China—this is the immutable stand consistently taken by the Chinese Government and people, and this is a basic principle governing the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and all other countries. Any argument for “two Chinas” or “one China, one Taiwan” is bound to be unanimously opposed by the Chinese Government and Chinese compatriots at home and abroad. Comrades, Friends! The situation since the smashing of the gang of four proves that a bright future lies ahead for China and its people, a fact that has become more and more obvious. We have been able to win victories primarily because all our patriotic compatriots are closely united under the guidance of the correct line laid down by the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party. The unity of our great People’s Liberation Army, our whole people and the local people’s governments has been, is and will always be the most reliable guarantee for the triumph of our revolutionary cause. All our nationalities will always be closely united in the family of our great motherland and no force whatsoever can undermine our long-tested lofty fraternal feelings. In recent years, the democratic parties and democratic personages without party affiliation have made new and significant contributions to our motherland’s prosperity and progress. They will continue to play an important role in our endeavour for the four modernizations. The slogan “long-term coexistence and mutual supervision” put forward by Comrade Mao Zedong will always be the principle governing the relationship between the Chinese Communist Party and the democratic parties. Patriotic leaders in religious circles have made valuable efforts in leading religious adherents to preserve the freedom of religious beliefs on a patriotic basis. Now that the cause of our motherland is advancing victoriously, we must exert ourselves even harder to consolidate and expand the united front formed by all our socialist working people, all patriots who are in favour of socialism and all who support the reunification of our motherland. We must rally more closely around the Chinese Communist Party and the people’s government, hold aloft the revolutionary banner of Marxism-Leninism and Mao Zedong Thought and unswervingly carry out the lines, principles and policies laid down by the Party and state. Let us work together and strive for greater successes in our socialist modernization! =

12069. Hussain, Zahid. “Afghan Children Dying In camps While World Heeds Others’ Needs”, in Seattle Times, August 30, 1994. p. A12. At Sarshani Refugee Camp, outside Jalalabad, 32 people (mainly children) died in one week. The 300000 people of the camp were new refugees from fighting at Kabul. UNHCR notes it is impossible to meet the needs of the refugee since world interest has now mainly shifted to Rwanda. The new round of fighting is systematically destroying the medical infrastructure and making the educated class refugees.

12070. Hussain, Zahid. “Afghan Children Dying In camps While World Heeds Others’ Needs”, in Seattle Times, August 30, 1994. p. A12. At Sarshani Refugee Camp, outside Jalalabad, 32 people (mainly children) died in one week. The 300000 people of the camp were new refugees from fighting at Kabul. UNHCR notes it is impossible to meet the needs of the refugee since world interest has now mainly shifted to Rwanda. The new round of fighting is systematically destroying the medical infrastructure and making the educated class refugees.

12071. Jasiwicz, Z.; Akimer, Shirin [editor]. “Professional Beliefs and Rituals Among Craftsmen in Central Asia: Genetic and Functional", in Cultural Change and Continuity in Central Asia, Central Asia Research Forum. London: Kegan Paul International, 1991, pp. 171-180. The smithies of northern Afghanistan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan (Tashkent, Samarkand, Bukhara, Khiva, Balkh, Mazare-Sharif) developed their crafts over centuries of interaction with agrarian communities and with nomads. Craftsmen were organized into guilds, exist as ‘non-food-producing’ nomads (such as the low social status Haydariha around Qaysar, in Faryab, Afghanistan, who were subordinated the the Qipchaps in an arrangement reminiscent of domestic slavery), are scattered among other populations in various ways (domestic slavery, craftsmen members of communities working for barter, monetarized craftsmen, craftsmenorganizened in kolkhoz of sovkhoz), and in towns developed certain organizations, ceremonies and beliefs (such as women potters in Tajikistan who produced pottery without a potter’s wheel or kiln for firing). In Central Asia, guilds developed ‘religious-cum-magical’ beliefs, associated with cults of saints, and informed by Islam: the purpose of these beliefs and rituals was to confirm and cement group cohesion. The status of the guilds now in the USSR is unknown, but they were formally abolished. In Afghanistan, the guilds are gradually shedding their traditional practices of meetings and rituals, since the individual craftsmen are too busy.

12072. Keen, David. Refugees: Rationing The Right to Life: The Crisis In Emergency Relief: Part 2: Hunger and Death. Refugee Studies Programme (endorsed by Medecins San Frontieres, OXFAM, Save the Children). London: Zed Books, 1994. pp. 6-15. [Book derived from the symposium entitled ‘Resondo to the New Round of Fighting: Refugees: The Need for New Approaches’, held in Oxford in 3/1991.]. WHO has determined that refugees must have 1900 calories per day to survive; yet everywhere the children of refugees, such as those of the Kurds on the Iraqi border, are stunted and starved. Women, either pregnant or lactating have larger requirements. Populations with poor nutrition often have parasites. While a few refugee populations, such as those in Hong Kong or Thailand have adequate nutrition, more common is the experience of refugees in Sudan or Ethiopia, where nutrition is compromised. Refugees: The Need for New Approaches’, held in Oxford in 3/1991.]

THE MESSAGE TO COMPATRIOTS IN TAIWAN

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Afghanistan
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================
400000), but "at the same time, the establishment of a 'safe haven' for the Kurds within Iraqi territory broke important new ground in offering protection for internally-displaced people." The unnecessary concern about Sudanese "sovereignty" has allowed the central government to use famine as a weapon against rebel regions in the south.

12073. Keen, David. Refugees: Rationing The Right to Life: The Crisis In Emergency Relief: Part 7: An Agenda for Action. Refugee Studies Programme (endorsed by Medecins Sans Frontieres, OXFAM, Save the Children). London: Zed Books, 1992. pp. 69-79. [Book derived from the symposium entitled "Responding to the Nutrition Crisis Among Refugees: The Need for New Approaches", held in Oxford in 3/1991.] A system that ensures the survival of refugees must begin with sufficient resources to assist them and with a clear delegation of responsibility for refugee relief to a specific agency. Refugee needs that are to be met must be actual refugee needs, not some theoretical substitute for their needs; this assessment must also begin before the crisis emerges and requires the creation of an early warning system for such disasters. Relief must be coordinated and evaluated. In addition, rations must be improved, clients need to be consulted on the rations (women, who usually prepare foods, must be given input into ration selection), and the needs of self-settled and domestic refugees must be addressed. Worldwide, economic development and respect for human rights must be cultivated to prevent the creation of new refugee flows.

12074. Klimovich, L. I. Islam, Yego Proskhozhdenie i Sotsial'nya Sushchnost (Islam, Its Origin and Social Content). Moscow: February, 1956. This pamphlet was produced by the all-Union Society for the Dissemination of Political and Scientific Knowledge in 2/1956, with an impression of 138000 copies. In it, it is stated that in the Soviet Union Islam exists as a survival without any social roots. By implication the object of the pamphlet is to help the Communist party to do away with it entirely by showing that it is a negation of scientific theory and a drag on social progress. The pamphlet begins by asserting that Islam, like other religions, was the outcome of historical causes and not miraculous. It explains its origins as follows: Prior to Islam, Arabia was in a very unsettled state owing mainly to tribal rivalries, the competing influences of Judaism and Christianity, and certain social changes. Among the Arabs there developed a tendency to unite. It was headed by the prophet Muhammad, whose ancient god was Allah. It was supported by certain so-called prophets, among whom was Muhammad. They advocated monotheism and were xenophobic. Meeting with opposition, they moved from Mecca to Medina where they eventually headed a new confederation of tribes. The religion they preached was called Islam because it signified submission and loyalty. Having begun in a period of transition when feudal relations were growing, although there were survivals of slave-owning society and also of primitive communal society, Islam, as a religious instrument of social oppression, supported the interests of slave-owners, feudal aristocracy, and merchants. After the Arabs had embarked on conquest, the dogmas of Islam were developed. In the interests of the feudal class Islam adopted the cult of personality. Its origin was ascribed to the miraculous activity of the prophet Muhammad and the Arab feudal Caliphs were called his successors. Thus a religious veneer was given to Islam's historical development. The second part of the pamphlet describes the spread of Islam and the growth and decline of the Caliphate. It seeks to show from an analysis of certain chapters of the Koran how the Arabs made use of Islam to reinforce their conquests. Islam, it says, taught that the Caliph was God's representative on earth. The Sunna and Shari'a bolstered up the privileged position of Muslims. Even after the idea of the divine origin of the Caliphate had been exploded the system was continued in order to serve the ends of the exploiting class. The last part of the pamphlet entitled "The basic antithesis of Islam to science and progress" begins by pointing out the extent to which the legal systems of Islamic countries are dominated by the Koran, Sunna, and Shari'a at the present day. It then examines the basic principles of Islam and draws the following conclusions. The Koran claims to be of supernatural origin but there is no evidence of this. Its account of how the world began shows it to be a hash of myths and legends borrowed from the Arabs, Judaism, and Christianity. The idea of the Koran's infallibility was disseminated in order to prevent any questioning of it. The Koran, the Sunna, and Shari'a condone harsh features of feudal society, such as the unequal status of women and polygamy. Present-day society in Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iraq still has the imprint of feudal survivals hallowed by Islam. Islam diverts attention from the future to the past and induces a fatalistic mood.

In Eastern Europe, the imposition of class society and the resistance of workers with its stories of hell. It defends exploitation and private property. Its discrimination between faithful and unbelievers leads to intolerance which has been exploited by the West as happened in India. Islam's claim to have no class distinctions is lying propaganda which has been made use of in support of pan-Islamism. Islam, beginning as "a social movement, is based on exploitation of man by man, which is why its roots have been eradicated in the Soviet Union." [From: "Part II: Arabs and the Arab World: Islam: 1945-1954", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. pp. 40-41.][c]

12075. Korgun, Victor G.; Eickelman, Dale F. [editor]. "Afghanistan and Iran: The Afghan Revolution: A Failed Revolution", in Russia's Muslim Frontiers. New Directions in Cross-Cultural Analysis. Indian Series in Arab & Islamic Studies. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1993. pp. 101-113. In 4/1978 there was a revolution in Afghanistan that brought a Communist party to power: this coup overthrew the government of Muhammad Daud, which had itself come to power in a coup in 1973 following the growing social and economic crisis of the late 1960s and early 1970s. This crisis had resulted from the failure (much due to corruption) of the large scale economic development projects the monarchy had embraced to establish its legitimacy. Daud had nationalized banks and several trading companies, unbending the economic faction allied to the King, and implemented some modest social reforms; the land reform efforts started early by the regime were never fully implemented. The Peoples Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA), repressed by Daud, prepared for the coup by recruiting among the officer corps. On 4/27/1978, Nur Muhammad Taraki came to power with a program of: land reform, liquidation of feudal and prefeudal relations (for example, Decree 6 of 6/1978 freed 11 million peasants from 25% rents on their landlords and money lenders), democratization of public life, solution of the nationalities question, equality of men and women, and the abolition of illiteracy. These reforms failed since they had no real mass support (the PDPA was entirely urban and had no ties to the villages); the goals were also very unrealistic, hoping to transform Afghan society overnight. So, while the peasants were freed from debts to moneylenders, the failure to create an alternative agricultural credit system forced the peasants back to the moneylenders. Factionalism within the PDPA, with struggles between the Parchem and Khalq factions, also weakened the ability of the regime to implement reforms. Bu 10/1978 there were outbreaks of mass resistance to the PDPA in Qandahar. Hafizullah Amin became PM in 4/1979, and Minister of Defense in 7/1979. In this environment the Soviet military intervened to save the Kabul regime; Brabak Karmal ruled in 1980-1986 with Soviet assistance; his first measures were to moderate the previous policies. The policies were general failures: only 28% of peasants given land under the land reform still had those lands. In 1989, the Soviet forces withdrew. Just as in Eastern Europe, the imposition of revolution from above failed in Afghanistan: modernization is now most likely to begin with a reconstruction of traditional structures as the basis for social and political development.

12076. Lukhtitsky, Pavel. "Part 20: Pamir", in Soviet Tajikistan. Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1954. The first traveler to call Pamir by its proper name and to give a brief description of that country was the Chinese monk Hsuan Tsang who in the seventh century crossed from Badakhshan into Tash-Kurgan, the domain of Tzeban-To. The next one to leave us a description of Pamir was Marco Polo, the Venetian traveler who passed through this country about the year 1270. It was a dreary country that Hsuan Tsang land Marco Polo described, but for all that conqueror after conqueror came to possess it. It was conquered by the Tibetans and the Uighurs. In the thirteenth century Genghis Khan came close up to it, as did Tamerlane in the fourteenth century, and Abubekr-mirza in the fifteenth century. In the sixteenth century Sultan Babur included it in the Grand Mongol Empire he formed. In the latter part of the sixteenth century (1572) the Pamir regions of Vakhân, Shugnan and Kushtan, together with Karategin, fell under the sway of the Emir of Bukhara, Abdurahim, and were governed by his stepson, Shaa-Kirghiz of Darvaz. In the seventeenth century the Jungars invaded Pamir every now and again, but the invaders were exterminated by the Chinese. The native highland people rose in rebellion against the invaders and expelled many of them. In Western Pamir—Vâkhân, Iishkashtîm and Gorân—on the ancient trade route along the Panj, there are the ruins of the castles and forts of the ancient Shâ-Posh peoiple, or black-robed kafirs, who inhabited that region. These people were fire-worshippers and wore black woolen garments. The ruins of the castle of the Shâ-Posh king Zengibo in the kishlak Isor, in Vakhân; the fort Zamir-Otash-parast near the kishlak Ptp; the fort of the legendary Siah-Posh king Kaakhâa below the kishlak Namágtut and others, have not been thoroughly investigated by archeologists to this day, although time has not destroyed their mighty walls. Associated with those castles are many legends about the fire-worshippers, about the conquest of the country by Ali, and about religious wars. After Ferghana was transformed into the Khânate of Kókand, the hâns strove to extend their dominions to the Hindu Kush and Kasghar, and in 1832-34, Madrid-Khan of Kokand subjugated Pamir and occupied the entire territory up to Sârykolt and the right bank of the Panj. In 1869, the western part of Pamir (Badakhshân) was occupied by the troops of the Emir of Afghanistan, Shir-Ali-Khan. At that time the English were already making strenuous efforts to gain possession of Pamir, but in 1876 the Khânate of Kókand was abolished and its territory was annexed to Russia as the Ferghana Region. In that very same year the first Russian exploration expedition was sent to Pamir. Colonels Lebedev and Bonsdorf made surveys of routes and defined heights and astronomical points: Kasterko and Korostovtsev made surveys of Pamir and Aïla. In 1877-1878 the country was explored up to lake Yashil Kûl by the zoologist Severtsev; up to Lake Kara Kûl by the geologist Mushketov; and in Badakhshân by Colonel Matveyev. Later, up to 1891, explorations were made by the astronomer Futýata, by the mining engineer Ivanov, by the topographer Bendersky, by the botanist Regél, by Count Grombchevsky (who reached Kanjut and Kafiristan) and by the geographer Grum-Grzhimalo. In those years Pamir was still an enigmatic country wrapped in mystery and legend. In 1891-1892 detachments under the command of Colonel Ionov annexed Eastern Pamir to Russia, and from that time the region was called the Pamir District, Ferghana Region. Pamir was annexed to Russia as the Ferghana Region. In that very same year the first Russian exploration expedition was sent to Pamir. Colonels Lebedev and Bonsdorf made surveys of routes and defined heights and astronomical points: Kasterko and Korostovtsev made surveys of Pamir and Aïla. In 1877-1878 the country was explored up to lake Yashil Kûl by the zoologist Severtsev; up to Lake Kara Kûl by the geologist Mushketov; and in Badakhshân by Colonel Matveyev. Later, up to 1891, explorations were made by the astronomer Futýata, by the mining engineer Ivanov, by the topographer Bendersky, by the botanist Regél, by Count Grombchevsky (who reached Kanjut and Kafiristan) and by the geographer Grum-Grzhimalo. In those years Pamir was still an enigmatic country wrapped in mystery and legend. In 1891-1892 detachments under the command of Colonel Ionov annexed Eastern Pamir to Russia, and from that time the region was called the Pamir District, Ferghana Region. The district was governed by the commander of the Pamir Detachment, acting in the capacity of Uyezd Chief. The Region of South-Western Pamir, situated along the Panj, was put under the rule of the Emir of Bukhara and was governed by beks. The local rulers and clergy were subordinated to the beks, while the Russian military administration merely exercised general supervision. In 1895 a Russo-British boundary commission established the frontiers between Russia and China, Afghanistan and—beyond the "Afghan corridor"—India. These frontiers have remained unchanged to this day. In that period numerous Russian explorers visited Pamir, but except for a few main routes and separate districts, the region was still entirely unexplored. Utter confusion reigned even as regards its geography. In spite of all the difficulties Russian travellers pushed forward with their explorations and gained more knowledge about the region, but it was the October Revolution that created the possibility of making an extensive and all-round investigation, as a result of which the "blank spaces" were entirely removed from the Soviet map of Pamir. Only the people reared by the October Revolution could convert the perilous mountain tracks into convenient motor roads. In 1940 it was decided to build the Great Pamir Highway from Stalinabad to Horog 567 kms long. The technical difficulties connected with the laying of that road were unprecedented, and the work was estimated to take five years. It was to run over steep creeps, through snowy mountains, across hundreds of dizzying precipices and scores of gigantic, creeping boulder stones in places never before trodden by the foot of man. Without this road the economic development of Darvaz and Badakshân would have been impossible. The cost of transporting a single telegraph pole from Stalinabad to Kalai-Humb by pack-horses was a 1000 rubles! Even school desks had to be transported in parts by aircraft. Every year the fruit crop in Kalai-Humb remained in the district owing to the lack of transport facilities. Enthusiasm ran high for the prospect of a road: "The construction of this road the inhabitants of Darvaz and Pamir came forward with a counterplan: to make this a people's undertaking and to complete it not in five years, but in 120 days! In May 1940 twenty-two thousand collective farmers went out on to the track to help the workers and technical specialists. Six thousand tons of freight—explosives, provisions and building materials—were transported to the scene of operations by aircraft and pack-animals. In 3.5 months 2 million cubic metres of monolithic crags, two million cubic metres of flat rock, and a million cubic metres of boulders were blasted and cleared away. On September 1 the first automobile passed through the Darvaz Gorge, and six days later the builders reported to Stalin that the whole road was open for traffic. The fable told by the Tajik highlanders about the giant Palavon who shifted mountains with his shoulder came true. The road was laid in 110 days! The journey from Stalinabad to Horog became easy and safe, and it takes not a month, but 2-3 days! And this legendary country formerly isolated by wild mountains has become a cultured and flourishing region. Eastern and Western Pamir differ sharply from each other in topography, climate and population. The mountains of Eastern Pamir are smooth, their contours are soft, they have numerous deep hollows with no outflows, and between the mountain chains stretch wide, smooth valleys which had been ploughed down by now vanished glaciers. In these rocky valleys there are scarcely any trees, for in Eastern Pamir there is no point lower than 3600 metres above sea level; here only dry teresken and different varieties of "cushion" plant grow, and only the floodlands of the rivers are enlivened by grass. Many of the valleys are filled with rocky piles of moraine. In those valleys there are numerous lakes formed by melted glaciers. In some places the ice has remained under the soil. The ice does not melt evenly and as a result the ground is covered with hummocks and pits. The only area where no glaciers have been is that of the Muzkol Range. Scarcely divided by watersheds, the East Pamir Mountains are smooth, their contours are rounded. A similar topography is to be found only in Tibet. In these valleys at a height of four kms above sea level and only half a kilometre below the snow-line Kirghiz nomads lived from ancient times, driving their herds from one sparse pasture to another, for not one of them could feed a large herd all the year round. The total number of East-Pamir Kirghiz families fluctuated between 1000-2000. Teits, Kipchaks, Naimans, Kadyrshes, Ottuz-Oguly and other Kirghiz clans were in constant strife over pastures. The local, high-mountain breed of long- maned Kirghiz ponies, extremely unextacting and wiry, helped the nomads to move very quickly—a hundred and more kms a day—and their tents and other baggage were carried not only by horses, but also by asses, camels, and above all by humped and shaggy yaks, which are adapted to the climate and rarefied air. These strong and intelligent animals can obtain their food from under the snow which they kick aside with their hoofs, and they are able to find subsoil water in desert areas and dig for it without the aid of man. Conditions of life in Eastern Pamir are more severe than in the Arctic, where the air is less rarefied. In 1934, at the Bash-Gumbez Pass, a temperature of 51.2C. below zero was recorded. The daily fluctuation of the temperature is extraordinary. On 7/8 1934, the temperature at the Pamir Biological Station at 13:00 hours was 33C., but at 16:00 hours it was 6.4C. below zero. Such sharp changes in temperature crack stones and crumble rocks. In addition to wild sheep, the constant habitants of high mountains, in Eastern Pamir there are also numerous mountain goats, and in the lower valleys there are marmots, hares, martens and foxes. Enormous vultures with a stretch of wing of as much as three metres soar slowly in the air, or sit on rocks, dark and motionless, like statues. The nomad Kirghiz clans always strove to drive their herds from Eastern Pamir to the lower levels—northward, across the Zaali Range to the luxuriant alpine pastures of the Alai Valley; eastward into China, and south-westward, to the upper pastures of Vakhan, Shugnan and Bartang. The rivers which flow from Eastern Pamir to the Panj, breaking up, as it were, the topography of the mountains, gradually deepen their beds and transform them into gorges of increasing depth and steepness. The watershed ridges tower three to four kms over the bottoms of the gorges, and the streams that flow from these waterways, in their turn, cut narrow and deep gorges for themselves, running at right angle to the main courses. The entire topography thus becomes extremely rugged, cut up by innumerable precipices and chasms, some of which have a sheer drop of one and a half kms. The ranges of Western Pamir were created by rivers and are therefore called not tectonic, but orographic. Their ridges are sharp and rugged; their summits—rocky peaks—are covered with snow and hanging glaciers. The rocks in the medium height zone are the haunt of the fierce snow-panthers, which attack goats and sheep.

In the rugged mountains there are also the small Himalaya bears and wolves; there are also vultures and eagles, and falcons which the local inhabitants often tame. Exceptionally plentiful in the mountains of Western Pamir are various breeds of partridges and of mountain turkeys, which the inhabitants make so tame that they follow at the heels of their owners. In the upper reaches of the Western Pamir rivers there are many alpine meadows; lower down juniper-trees appear, sometimes bird, and still lower down there are birar, honeysuckle and currant. Here and there the rocky slopes are enlivened by rhubarb; on the river banks there are thickets of tall Sila buckthorn and small poplars. More and more often plots of land are met with planted with Himalayan gymnnoasperms,barley, beans, peas, rye, millet and flax. Still lower down, in the orchards of the small kishlaks, the first apple, apricot and mulberry trees are growing. Here wheat is already grown. Every narrow valley in Western Pamir is taken up almost entirely by a river which in its onward rush does not leave on its banks the earth it washes away, but carries it down to its estuary and thus constantly deepens its bed. For that reason the inhabitants of these valleys can settle only at the estuaries of these tributaries which heap their silt in conical piles at the exits of the gorges. All the small mountain kishlaks are exceptionally beautiful and picturesque. The settled clans which have inhabited Western Pamir since the days of antiquity have always been known for their industriousness. With extraordinary courage and perseverance they overcame the seventy of nature, dug canals, laid tracks, built bridges across rivers, and won from the rocks every patch of ground fit for cultivation. In their tireless labours they strove only for peace, as every toiler does. Those clans which long inhabited Badakhshan, each in a separate area bordered by mountain chains—Vakhan, Ishkashim, Goran, Shugnan, Rushan, Bartang and Yazgulem—and each speaking its own dialect, collectively called themselves Highland Tajiks, differing from the other Tajiks only with regard to language. The Gorno-Badakhshan Autonomous Region is divided into seven districts: Shugnan, Ishkashim, Rosht-ala, Kushan, Bartang, Murgab and Vanch, which formerly belonged to Daravz and now unite the basins of the rivers Yazgulem and Vanch and the adjacent bank of the Panj up to the river Darai-Pshikhvar. Horog, the administrative centre of the region with a population of several thousand, is situated in the narrow valley at the junction of the rivers Shah-Dara and Hunt, both of which fall into the Panj. The climate of Western Pamir varies considerably, depending upon the height above sea level of any given area, but on the whole it is less severe than that of Eastern Pamir, and in places, in the deep valleys protected from the wind at heights ranging from 1700-2500 meters above sea level, it is relatively warm and beneficial. Fruit-trees—apple, pear and apricot—fruit well in Western Pamir. Mulberry-trees are plentiful, and, as was the case in Zeravshan, Darvaz and larategin, in the past mulberries were one of the staple foods of the highlanders. Since ancient times the Pamir Mountains have been famous for their mineral deposits—gold, pink spinel (the so-called Goran "ruby mines"), mountain crystal, garnet, asbestos and iron ore (mined by primitive methods in Vanch). Many of the deposits were known all over the orient ten centuries ago, but in the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth century they were either abandoned and forgotten, or were so little exploited that they lost practical importance. Soviet expeditions have discovered in Pamir many new deposits of non-ferrous and rare metals, piezoquartz and mica. In 1930 in the upper reaches of Badom-Dara, a tributary of the Shah Dara, above the little river Lyajar-Dara, in the region of Mayakovsky Peak discovered by the writer of these lines in 1931, he, in conjunction with the geologists Yudin and Khabakov, after long and persevering search, found the legendary deposits of lapis lazuli which according to tradition were exploited over a thousand years ago. In Pamir deposits have been discovered of salt, lignite, peat, sulphur, saltpetre, graphite.

The area of the Gorno-Badakhshan Autonomous Region is large—61140 square kms—but valleys account for only a fortieth part of this area, all the rest are mountains. Severe natural conditions permit the development of only that part of this area in which it is possible to build roads and engage in economic construction. That is possible primarily in the valleys and gorges of Western Pamir; Eastern Pamir is suitable for the development of livestock farming and of the mining industry. The whole of North-Western Pamir difficult of access, enveloped by glaciers, and uninhabited because of the severe climate—is still uninhabited. Here on those enormous heights live only a few brave and self-sacrificing workers at the meteorological stations and at the hydroglacial-meteorological station on the Fedchenko Glacier. In Eastern Pamir there are several big high-mountain lakes. The biggest of these is Kara Kul, situated in low desert shores at a height of 3910 meters above sea level and covering an area of 900 sq. kms. The eastern part of the lake is bordered by ice, the remains of a huge glacier. The ice is invisible for it is beneath the soil. That lake is being studied by the staff of a hydro-meteorological station which functions there all the year round. The most interesting of the big lakes in Pamir, however, is undoubtedly Lake Sarez situated at a height of 3400 meters above sea level. It was formed in February 1911 as a result of a gigantic landslide, and at the present time it is 70 kms long. Many other lakes in Tajikistan were formed as a result of landslides, but those occurred in times unknown. The biggest of those lakes are Zor Kul which lies at a height of over 4000 meters above sea level and from which flows the river Pamir, and Yashkil Kul, 40 miles deep, from which flows the broad river Hunt. At one time there was a similar lake on the Vyaz-Dara, which flows into the Shah-Dara. Examples of such lakes in Kukhistan are Iskander Kul and the chain of Marguzor lakes. In 1952 a lake three kms long was formed as a result of an avalanche on the river Hingouj near the Tavil-Dara. Characteristic of the geology of Pamir is the fact that the lakes Zor Kul, Yashkil Kul and Vyaz-Dara sprang out in a chain along the line of fractures which serves as the border-line between Eastern and Western Pamir. Those lakes were formed as a result of earthquakes which occurred from time to time, causing the landslides. The most ancient of these was the Zor Kul landslide, the next in time was the Yashkil Kul landslide, and the most recent was the Sarez landslide. [=]
the gorges, caves and fissures in the rocks served to shelter them from the rain, wind and snow. Before the revolution, the Badakhshan highlanders never had enough rain or other provisions; for several months in the year the poorer section of the population starved, their only food consisting of “attal,a,” a soup made from grasses and peas, with the addition, on rare occasions of a handful of flour. The majority had to be content with bread made from mulberry flour. Only the boys and the local aristocracy were able to buy wheat. In addition to haberdashers, a pottery and cloth from the Afghan and Indian merchants who came here with their caravans. There were no bazaars or shops anywhere in Badakhshan. In Horog there were only shops kept by Afghan merchants. Even before the arrival of Konov’s Russian detachment, the Badakhshan highlanders repeatedly appealed to Russia asking to be joined to her, and when Konov arrived with his forces to Pamir, the local population rendered him vigorous assistance. The following is an excerpt from the report written in 1893 by Captain Vannovsky who led a detachment of soldiers down the Bartang:

“The local inhabitants joyously welcomed the Russians, provided guides and porters, and rendered necessary services; and everywhere they begged to be accepted as Russian subjects.”

The local khans cruelly oppressed the population. In Badakhshan there were castes: the highest caste was the Shana to which the local rulers, the khans, belonged. The net highest was the Seid [Sayed] caste. The Seids were “the servants of the living God;” the Piris and Caliphs, who were regarded as “God’s shadow on earth.” In every village there were also the representatives of the khan; they belonged to the Mir caste. The fourth caste consisted of the Akobyrs, from among whom the Khan’s guard was recruited; and the fifth and lowest-caste, the Ryots or Fokirs, consisted of all the tillers of the soil who laboured on their tiny, stony fields to provide all the higher castes with wheat, barley, millet, peas, mulberries and apricots, while remaining hungry themselves. Yuussuf-Ali-khan sold girls from the lowest caste in the bazaars of Kabul, Chitral and Peshawer. In the kishlaks Viyar and Dishor he sold to some Kirghiz to the natural talent of the Pamir artists. Diverse handicrafts supplied the Badakhshan people with clothing, foot-wear, leather, pottery, knives, sickles, horseshoes, paper made from mulberry-tree root, and other articles needed in the home and in the fields. There were, and are today, skilled smiths, potters, turners and dyers in all the gorges in Gorno-Badakhshan. Before the October Revolution, however, there were no handicrafts developing the gifts of the people of Western Pamir; amidst the hard struggle for existence and frightful oppression, the creative forces of the people were repressed. The hard life of the Tajiks in Badakshan differed in no way from the life of the people in the neighboring khanates—Afghanistan and North-West India. The October Revolution put a sharp dividing line between the life of the Soviet Tajik highlanders of Badakhshan and the life of the peoples of the foreign countries adjacent to Pamir. The first news of the February revolution was received in Horog on 4/3/1917, in a letter to the commander of the Pamir Detachment brought from Osh by courier. The Governor-General instructed the commander of the detachment to appoint a Commissar. A Commissar was appointed, but the Soviet of Soldiers’ Deputies that was set up by the garrison refused to recognize him and informed the local population about the revolution. Next day a Volost Soviet Executive Committee was elected in Shugnan. The Volost Executive Committee proclaimed the abolition of the rule of the Emir of Bukhara and ordered that the vacant lands of the Shah Dara beys be confiscated and transferred to the poor dehans of Rushan and the Hunt Valley. In 9/1917 a new military detachment under the command of Colonel Fenin arrived in Horog. The local ishans and beys at once became his faithful servants. With their assistance an “Emergency Committee” and a “rural Committee” were set up, but between them endless friction arose. Aziz-khon, the Volost ruler, in conjunction with the ishans made a treacherous attempt to establish contact with the Emirs of Bukhara and Afghanistan and to break Shugnan away from Russia. Their letters, however, were intercepted by dehans; the enemies of the people were exposed as traitors, but with Fenin’s assistance they managed to escape to India. Supporting and heading the local clan leaders and the reactionary clergy, Colonel Fenin and his counter-revolutionary officers were the actual rulers of the region for a whole year.
In the autumn of 1918, fearing the Communists, Colonel Fenin and his officers fled to India, where the English intelligence service employed them for the purpose of preparing intervention. After the flight of the military detachment, however, power in Badakhshan passed to the people; the local activists managed to establish contact with Tashkent. In 1/1919, a number of Communist political leaders arrived in Horog and organized the struggle of the poor section of the people against the local reactionaries. A vigorous campaign had launched against the command of Lieutenant Colonel Timofeyev who invaded Horog from the north and seized power in Pamir. In 3/1920 the Basmach bands of Madamin-bek, organized by the English in Ferghana, appeared at Post Pamir which was held by a Whiteguard detachment consisting of former Austrian and German prisoners of war and commanded by an ex-tsarist officer. Religious strife broke out between the Basmachi and the garrison in the course of which the latter was completely wiped out. On learning of this, Timofeyev deemed it wise to follow Fenin and escape with his detachment to India. On 3/26/1920, the inhabitants of Badakhshan celebrated their liberation and elected their representatives to the Soviet governing bodies; but on March 30, an armed detachment of Bukharniks, following the Panj track, appeared in Horog, captured the post and proclaimed Pamir a dominion of the Emir. Reprials began. The local Tajik youth, however, managed to organize, and on 6/27/1920, they captured Pamir Post, disarmed the Emir’s forces and proclaimed Soviet rule in Pamir. On July 14 the People’s Assembly decided to send an armed delegation to the Soviet leaders to request the latter to send a military detachment to Pamir to guard the frontier against the encroachments of the British imperialists. The detachment consisted of young Badakhshaniens succeeded in breaking through the Basmach front, and passing through Eastern Pamir and Alai it arrived in Tashkent and carried out its mission. In 11/1920 the delegation returned to Horog together with a detachment. This detachment, however, had been hurriedly formed without due discrimination and was found to include undesirable elements.

Consequently, in 1921 on the demand of the population it was replaced by a genuine Communist Red Army detachment. With the arrival of that detachment Soviet rule was finally and definitely established in Pamir. In 10/1924, when the new Soviet republics were being formed in Central Asia, Pamir became an Autonomous Region, and in front of it a small wooden platform. The rest of the town consisted of a labyrinth of narrow, crooked alleys with tiny stone-built houses in which cotton cloth was stretched and mutton fat into open wounds. The women did not know the use of scissors, and many of the highlanders had never seen window glass. People with huge goitres wandered about in Vanch and Yazguilem. The equipment for a printing plant, the first to be set up in Horog. On 9/2/1931, the detachment brought with it a small diesel engine which was planted. Party organizers went to the most remote kishlaks and rallied the poor peasantry for the fight against their class enemies, organized assistance of every kind for the population, and disbursed long-term loans to the needy to enable them to improve their husbandry. One after another, crossing difficult passes, horse and camel caravans carrying food and manufactured goods wended their way to Eastern and further on to Western Pamir. The cargoes of wheat of the first caravan carried goods to the value of 60,000 rubles; the value of the second consignment was 400,000 rubles, and that of the third already amounted to 1 million rubles. The first shops and co-operative stores were opened. In 1928 the inhabitants of Horog and Rosht-Kala saw a cinema film for the first time; it was demonstrated by a travelling cinema.

In the following year the inhabitants of Horog went out to welcome an aeroplane that had landed on the bank of the Panj. The five hundred half-boxes of grain were distributed among the people of Badakhshan started the development of silkworm breeding in the region. The State Trading Agency began to buy furs and skins from the trappers. Seed loans granted to the dehkans enabled them to plant cereals even in the most remote gorges. Soviet scientific expeditions penetrated the most inaccessible corners of Pamir, conducted immense cultural work among the inhabitants, healed the sick and gave the people the first scientific information they had ever heard about their extraordinary country. Horog, the administrative centre of the region, the kishlak with two thousand inhabitants situated on the rocky bank of the Hunt and surrounded by wheat, barley, millet land pea fields, and apricot, mulberry and apple orchards, grew into a small town. It had only one street that was really a street, lined with tall poplars and whitewashed houses. In the square outside the building of the regional Executive Committee there was a fir tree, the first in that region unveiled on 6/7/1927, and in front of it a small wooden platform. The Russian Government had launched a vigorous campaign against hunger, organized assistance of every kind for the population, and disbursed long-term loans to the needy to enable them to improve their husbandry. One after another, crossing difficult passes, horse and camel caravans carrying food and manufactured goods wended their way to Eastern and further on to Western Pamir. The cargoes of wheat were unloaded. The detachment brought with it a small diesel engine which was placed. Party organizers went to the most remote kishlaks and rallied the poor peasantry for the fight against their class enemies, organized assistance of every kind for the population, and disbursed long-term loans to the needy to enable them to improve their husbandry. One after another, crossing difficult passes, horse and camel caravans carrying food and manufactured goods wended their way to Eastern and further on to Western Pamir. The cargoes of wheat were unloaded. The detachment brought with it a small diesel engine which was planted. Party organizers went to the most remote kishlaks and rallied the poor peasantry for the fight against their class enemies, organized assistance of every kind for the population, and disbursed long-term loans to the needy to enable them to improve their husbandry.
Afghanistan 30 kms away. Bread, tobacco, domestic utensils, soap, matches, agricultural implements and school books were now plentiful in the Pamir co-operative stores. The first tractor arrived in a dismantled state and was assembled here. There were already over a hundred schools in the region. A women’s college was opened in Horog. The beating of drums of Young Pioneer squads began to be heard. Smuggling was stopped, and so also was opium smoking. Scores of doctors and midwives performed their beneficial functions in newly-built hospitals and dispensaries in Ishkashim, Murgab, Kalai-Valmar, Bartang and Vanch. They restored sight to the blind who came from Afghanistan. Smallpox vanished; malaria declined; there were no new cases of leprosy. Veterinary surgeons and zootechnicians were working even in the most remote pastures.

Everywhere new irrigation canals and firm bridges were built. The narrow mountain tracks were widened with the aid of dynamite and ammonal. Even the most remote mountain kishlaks were supplied with seed, fertilizers, agricultural implements and materials for exterminating pests. In 1932 another six one-and-a-half ton trucks belonging to the Tajik complex expedition arrived in Pamir, and the first motor road through the Pamir began to be laid. In the spring of 1934 four Missiaad Mirshakar which he himself recited in the Hall of Columns in Moscow during the Tajik Literature Decade in 1949. In this Soviet age a man grew up in Pamir capable of telling the whole world about his country in simple, but vivid verse. On the way home from school two girls discuss what they are going to be when they grow up. One says she will be a biologist, the other is determined to be an actress. They will have every opportunity to follow the careers they have chosen. Since 1948 seven hundred and ten middle-school graduates in Badakhshan have gone to big cities to receive a higher education. Talk about friends who have gone to college in Stalinabad, Leninabad, Moscow, Leningrad and Samarkand is heard not only in Horog, but at all the collective farms and in all the kishlaks in Pamir. And everybody wishes they would come back soon as geologists, botanists, doctors and zoologists. This is not 1923, when only thirty people in the whole of Pamir could read and write. Today 96% of the population is literate, and there are two hundred and forty schools attended by thirteen thousand children; over two hundred students attend the theological school in Horog, and the young geographer from Horog, Kurbansho, and historian Iskandarov, are both in Moscow doing postgraduate research work at the Academy of Sciences of the USSR. The main thing is—let them come back to their native kishlaks and gorges soon, for there is lots of work for them to do. Work is waiting for them at the Pamir Botanical Garden and Biological Station at nineteen hospitals and polyclinics, at three malaria dispensaries at several meteorological stations, at the offices of the two regional newspapers and of the district newspapers the Kushani Sufkh, the Kakikali Vanch, the Barakdi Surkh, and others published in the Tajik, Russian and Kirghiz languages.

Work is waiting for them at fifty kishlak tea and reading-rooms and at a hundred and fifty collective-farm libraries, the shelves of which will contain books written by themselves. And at the fifty recreation clubs in Pamir they themselves, the young scientists from Ishkashim, Vakhlan and Barbang, will deliver lectures. At night the people in Horog go to their cinema theatre to see the latest films; and in the fifteen other cinemas scattered over the high mountains the latest films are shown. In the garages in Horog the mechanics are preparing scores of motor trucks for their journeys. At dawn columns will set out in three directions: East, North and West. One column will go to the Roshkhal District; another will go to Rushan and further on to Stalinabad; the third will drive up the narrow gorge of the Hunt, past the International, Orpikindiz and many other collective farms to the heights of Eastern Pamir and still further, through gigantic passes to Osh in the fertile Ferghana Valley. Only recently a kishlak with 2000 inhabitants, Horog, the centre of Gorno-Badakhshan situated at height of 2030 metres above sea level, lives a new and full life. When work was begun to transform the Gorno-Badakhshan region from a food-importing to a food-producing region, when the Bolsheviks decided to develop grain and livestock farming, a bold idea arose—to make fit for cultivation the barren land that lay beyond the agricultural line at heights ranging from 3500-4200 metres above sea level. This work was begun in 1933 by the Pamir Expedition organized by the Central Asia State University in conjunction with the Plant Institute of the Soviet Union.

The expedition was led by the celebrated biologists Professors P. Baranov and I. Raikova. In 1934 a biological station was set up at the Pamir State Farm in Jaushangoz, in the upper reaches of Shah-Dara, 3500 metres above sea level. Its experimental fields occupied five hectares. Six sub-stations were set up in different zones of Pamir. Six kms from Jaushangoz was a lofty terrace at the junction of the Hoti and Shahr-Dara. Six sub-stations were set up which in 1940 was transformed into the Pamir Botanical Garden. Here in the experimental fields, ninety kinds of perennial fodder crops were planted. In the kishlam Porshinov, at a height of over 2000 metres above sea level, seven hundred specimens from the world crop collection were planted. In the marches of Bash-Gumbez, in the Alichur Valley, at a height of 4000 metres above sea level, a geobotanical station was organized, equipped with thermostats, microscopes and a photo-laboratory, for the purpose of studying the high-mountain meadows. On the shore of lake Yashil Kul, at a height of 3600 metres above sea level, an ichthyological and hydro-biological station was set up. At the biological station in Jaushangoz the search began for varieties of grain crops that would yield a crop under the severe high-mountain conditions. In the first year the wheat and rye grains failed to ripen. The barley perished from frost. In Horog the potatoes brought from other parts produced such a miserable tasteless crop that it seemed of no use bothering with this land here. On the other hand, buckwheat grew man-high and ripened quickly; maize came up splendidly too, and even fodder beets, turnips, radish and swedes produced big yields. In Horog, cucumbers grew well. In the fresh water of Yashikul every cast of the net brought up about 50 kilograms of fish—different kinds of carp called osman and marinka—some of them weighing three or four kilograms each. This was proof enough that fish was plentiful in Pamir, enough to supply not only local requirements but also Ferghania. The livestock experts ascertained that if meadow grasses were developed it would be possible considerably to increase the flocks and herds in Pamir. As soon as the field work was finished the first Gorno-Badakhshan Regional Agricultural Exhibition was organized. This was a great event in the life of Pamir. Dehkans came from all the gorges to see the new crops. This marked the beginning of enormous creative agricultural work. Plant-breeding and agrotechnical work was continued in the following years. In Horog turpins reached a weight of 2.5 kilograms, swedes and beets as much as 3 kilograms, Mongolian cabbages four kilograms, and Chinese radishes grew to a length of 20 centimetres. New varieties of potatoes began to produce splendid yields. The most astonishing thing is that in Eastern Pamir the crops strengthened by the operation of ultra-violet rays are not only capable of withstanding 15-19°C of night frost, but also of retaining their leaves. Gymnosperous barley, beets and Chinese cabbages can withstand even 18°C of frost. It was found that in low temperature, plants in Pamir very intensively absorb carbon dioxide, and that micro-organisms which perish in dry soil under Pamir conditions are capable not only of living in the soil, but also of absorbing nitrogen under artificial irrigation.

No longer satisfied by these wonders the Pamir collective farmers actively set to work to cultivate these new crops everywhere. The biological station was transferred to the Murgab District and in 1952 - Stanyukovich was appointed director. Following the advice of the station staff, the Pamir collective farmers made excellent progress, and today the Socialism, Karl Marx and Stalin Collective Farms, as well as many others, are able in July to send to market in Shugnan cucumbers, tomatoes, potatoes, radish and other early vegetables. The talented agronomist Sukhobrus, who was killed in the Great Patriotic War, had lived in Pamir for several years before the war; he did enormous work in improving the local varieties of wheat and barley and shifted the agricultural limit to a higher altitude. In 1939 barley was sown for the first time ever at a height of 4200 metres above sea level—in the Murgab District a crop was harvested from a hundred and twenty hectares. In Badakhshan the "surkhak," "sadefak," and in Ishkashim the "mamadal" and other varieties of wheat, improved and adapted to high-mountain conditions, are now being grown by collective farms which formerly grew only gymnosperous barley. Already in 1947 in Pamir, where in the past the dehkans were glad to get a miserable yield of 2-3 centners per hectare, the average grain yield was fourteen centners per hectare, and in 1948 the advanced collective farms obtained yields that seem incredible in these parts.

Thus the Kirov Collective Farm harvested an average of 28 centners per hectare; the Orjonikidze Collective Farm in Shugnan, in the Hunt Valley, 2450 metres above sea level, harvested an average of 52 centners per hectare; and in 1949 an average of 34 centners per hectare. Some of the collective farmers perform real miracles. Thus in 1948 Karim Gulberdyev of the Kalinin Collective Farm in the Rosh-Kalin District, a veteran well over seventy, obtained from the section he was in charge of 39.2 centners per hectare, and in the following year he obtained 45 centners per hectare. Team leader Muromadov, of the Bolshevik Collective Farm in Bartang, obtained a yield of 42 centners per hectare; and a brigade led by Mirzoyev at the International Collective Farm harvested 38 centners per hectare. Such achievements became possible because here are now seed-growing farms in Pamir; the farmers plant only tested seed, and many collective farms vernalize their seed before sowing. Another reason is that the Pamir grain-growers now possess numerous up-to-date farm implements—ploughs, reapers and threshers—and they have learned to make thorough preparations for the spring field operations. The return the Pamir farmers now get for their labour is such as their fathers and grandfathers could not even dream of. Thus in 1948 the family of Sabzali Chustaliyev, of the Kirov Collective Farm in Shugnan, received over five tons of grain, five tons of potatoes and 15000 rubles in money. In 1949, on the twentieth anniversary of the republic, Sabzali himself was awarded the Order of Lenin for the excellent results he achieved. In 1949 the family of Arabsho Asalshoyev of the Orjonikidze Collective Farm in Shugnan received five tons of grain, two tons of potatoes and 450 kilograms of meat, besides their share of the farm's money income. That is the income of the average collective farm family. In 1950 the whole of the Shugnan District overfulfilled its plan for grain and cocoon deliveries. At their co-operative stores the Pamir collective farmers buy motorcycles, gramophones, sewing machines, radio sets and domestic electrical appliances. There are still some collective farms in Pamir which are regarded as backward, but that is because for the time being it is difficult to reach them along the perilous mountain tracks on the edges of bottomless chasms, because the crags and rocks have not yet been vanished, they have still to be removed, earth has to be put in their place, and the earth has to be irrigated. But ammunitions are blasting roads to these farms too. During the past eight years sixty new canals have been built of a total length of 250 kms. Over 1300 hectares of formerly barren land now get water. The canals are hewn out of the rock. Horog is proud of its new main canal which in some places runs through semi-tunnels cut into the rock. The granite, gneiss and marble walls of narrow ravines are widened out to allow a freer flow for the mountain streams. And during the past twenty years the cultivated area in Pamir has been considerably enlarged. In a beautiful gorge above Horog at a height of 2320 metres above sea level there is the Pamir Botanical Garden. There is only one botanical garden in the world higher than it—the one in Darjeeling, India. Making extensive use of the wild flora and the local varieties of fruit-trees—the result of the plant-breeding done by the highland Tajiks long, long ago—the staff of the Botanical Garden headed by the botanist A. Gursky is providing practical proof of the great possibilities of developing fruit-growing under the severe conditions prevailing in Pamir. The staff have achieved the early ripening of Samarkand apricots and of imported varieties of apple, plum, peach and cherry. In this mountain climate these trees began to fruit 2-3 years after they were planted. In the garden, bird cherry blooms, raspberries, strawberries and other berries ripen, and the tobacco varieties "dubuk," "tazpeuzund" and "samsun" grow excellently. Of twenty varieties of grapes never grown here before three have a yield of eleven kilograms per vine; these are grown by the young fruit-grower Shaker Shamirov. Thousands of seedlings of fruit and other trees raised by the scientific workers have already been transplanted in the collective farms and are thriving there. Thanks to the work of the Botanical Garden scores of new orchards have sprung up at numerous collective farms all over Badakhshan.

The Pamir Botanical Garden is also planting willow-trees on the
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

pebbly river beaches. Seven-year-old willows have reached a height of 7-8 metres and a thickness of 19-20 centimetres. The Regional Afforestation Station is employing similar methods for the afforestation of the upper reaches of the Shah-Dara in Jaushangoz and in the upper reaches of the lill. Already tree planting is going on at scores of Pamir collective farms—in Shugnan Kushan, Vanch and Ishkashim, where as yet the houses in the small kishlaks are surrounded only by fruit-trees. Of great importance for the economy of Afghanistan is the breeding of yaks. Twelve kms off the Eastern Pamir Road on the shore of the light-blue high-mountain lake Bulunkul there is a state yak farm. The fat, shaggy yaks grazing on the shore achieve a weight of 500-600 kilogramms. The yellowish milk of the yak is rich in fat—as much as 10%—and is delicious to The livestock collective farms in Eastern Pamir raise yaks, horses and particularly the Kirghiz fat-tailed sheep, and they are constantly improving the breeds. The Murgab District has become the premier livestock district in the region. The number of commonly-owned livestock in the district averages 80 per collective-farm household, and the number of individually-owned livestock averages twenty per household. During the past eight years the number of large cattle in Pamir increased 8-fold, and the number of sheep and goats increased 34-fold. By the end of the Fifth Five-Year Plan period the number will have increased over and over again. This is guaranteed by socialist emulation in which are engaged 154 collective livestock farms, 27 horse ranches, and 8 camel ranches. Davlyatkadam Asanshoyev, a veteran shepherd at the Kanganovich Collective Farm in the Roshit-Kalin District, out of a flock of 500 fat-tailed sheep reared 130 lambs from every hundred ewes, the average living weight of the lambs being 37.5 kilogramms. Iamchikbek Ihzhamkulov, senior shepherd at the Molotov Collective Farm in the Murgab District, out of a flock of 408 sheep reared 115 lambs from every hundred ewes, the average living weight of the lambs being 32.3 kilogramms. The daily catch of marinka and osman of the fishingbrigades in Murgab, fishing in Yashil Kul, Zor Kul, Karadung, Bulun Kul and other lakes in Pamir is thirty, forty and even fifty centners each. Nobody has any doubt now that there is plenty of fish in the lakes; that there is adequate pasture and grass for hay; that severe frost and wind are now no hindrance to shepherds land herdsmen; that the new breeds of livestock will adapt themselves to the severe high-mountain conditions; that the new varieties of fodder crops: alfalfa, maltot, lentil and various northern grasses will cover many of the bare slopes of the Eastern Pamir Mountains. The new forms and methods of husbandry are successful everywhere in Pamir because the alliance between the scientists and the collective farmers is invincible, because the people of high-mountain Pamir, who with the people of the whole of the Soviet Union are marching towards communism, want to work that way, are working that way, and know how to reach their goal! In the description of Pamir given by the ancient Chinese traveller we read: “Po-Mi-Lo (Pamir) stretches between two snowy mountain ranges and for this reason fruiful cold reigns here and gusty winds blow. Snow falls summer and winter. The soil is impregnated with salt and is thickly covered with small stones. Neither bread grains nor fruit can grow here. Trees and other vegetation are rarely met with. A wilderness spreads all around with no sign of human habitation.” That description now sounds like a fantastic legend. The Pamir is called “the roof of the world.” A more suitable name would be: “The foothills of the sun!”

12079. Lyon, David. “Afghan Victors Put Mercy to Flight: Fanatical Taliban Will Impose Stabillity Through Islamic Justice”, in Manchester Guardian Weekly, October 6, 1996, p. 7. Kabul remains scarred by the fighting when the city fell to the taliban, even as the rotting bodies of Najibullah, his brother and two aides remain hanging in the center of the city. After a rapid capture of Kabul, Taliban forces have not pressed on to initial goals of DOAW were to eliminate illiteracy among women, the elimination of forced marriages, and the banning of brideprice. In 1970, the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA), the traditional role of women in Afghanistan has beenconditioned by the survival of a traditional patriarchy and weak central governments. War, the fundamentalist backlash and a hostile international setting led to the loss of whatever advances had been made by women in Afghanistan: the collapse of the communist regime in Afghanistan and the assumption of mujahideen control, for the foreseeable future, the question of women in Afghanistan.

Afghanistan, in the heart of what some term the “Patriarchy Belt” of Asia, is a strictly patriarchal society, conditioned by tribalism and political fragmentation (Afghanistan is often seen as the prototypical “weak state”), and the ideology (among the Pashtun) of Pashtunwali. Gender segregation and female seclusion exist, but vary from group to group within the complex ethnic mosaic of the country: women are seen as the property of men in many groups, and in such groups their earnings are the earnings of the man. Purdah is characteristic of urbanpopulations and their is a rigid sexual division of labor that confines women to the house. As Tapper notes of the Durranis: “Men do all the work of agriculture and house construction, and tend, shear and butcher animals; they market produce and buy all foodstuffs and other supplies. Women rear young children, cook and clean, process milk, spin and weave... Women's involvement in cooperation outside the household is by contrast very limited. They may act as domesticservants for women in other households, but most often only an incidental consequence of an economic contract between the husbands. In short the women's productive activities all take place within the domestic sphere and the fruits of their labor are destined almost entirely for domestic consumption or use.” Women particularly complain of sickness and restrictions that limit their movement. A typical form of female resistance is extramarital affairs: a form of resistance that does nothing to challenge gender status ranking.

Reforms in the status of women began in 1880 under Abdur Rahman Khan who ended the practice of the longstanding customary law that bound a wife not only to her husband but to his family (resulting in remarriage to her husband's kin on his death); he also allowed women to refuse marriages planned when they were children, and allowed women to sue for alimony. Royal advisor Mahmud Tarzi called for compulsory education of girls, although it was never implemented. In 1902, Habibullah Khan attempted to limit the ruinous brideprice and tried to limit the number of wives to four (he had divorced all but four wives in 1902). In 1924 King Amanullah gave girls the right to choose their husbands; in 1928 he worked to abolish purdah and the veil and by year end 100 women had abandoned the veil in the capital. In 1928, a group of female students were sent to Turkey for higher education and the Association for the Protection of Women's Rights (Anjoman-i Hemayat-i Neswan) was established. A ban on polygamy led to a revolt by Tajik leader Bacha-i Saqqo, which led to the cancelation of most of his reforms (including requiring the veil and recall of the girls from school in Turkey). In 1965, the Peoples Democratic Party of Afghanistan was established; in the same year the Democratic Organization of Afghan Women (DOAW) was also established by six women activists. The initial goals of DOAW were to eliminate illiteracy among women, the elimination of forced marriages, and the banning of brideprice. In 1970, two conservative mullahs protests public evidence of women's liberation such as miniskirts, women teachers and schoolgirls by shooting at women's legs and splashing acid on them (one of the mullahs was Gulbeddin Hekmatyar). In 4/1978, the PDPA came to power and immediately passed several decrees, including Decree No 7 [q.v.] that reformed the marriages of women. Decree 7 and the national program for women's literacy directly led to a surge of refugees into Pakistan and the beginning of the insurgency against the central government. While under the PDPA women held high position, including four of seven regional militia commands, as the civil war dragged on the regime weakened its stand on women's rights in the name of reconciliation. In 1986 DOAW was renamed the All-Afghan Women's Council and was transformed into a social service agency for poor Afghan women. Yet in 1988, article 38 of the constitution granted women equal rights with men.

12081. Mohammed, Jan. Letter: "Human Face of the Taliban", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 6, 1997. p. 2. [Pashawar, Pakistan] Pamela Collett alludes to the isolation and alienation of the Talibam from Afghan society, and particularly Afghan women (June 22). I had an opportunity to see the other side of the coin while recently in Afghanistan.

Returning to the capital Kabul from the province of Logar (a trip which would have been most hazardous for men, women and children before pax Talibanica), I was stopped by a young Talib at an official checkpoint. "Do you see those women and children walking ahead?" He pointed to a group in the distance. "Please give them a lift to Benhsissar [a village on the outskirts of Kabul]. It's up to you, but you will receive a great reward from God if you do so." The Talibam may not be perfect. But they are human, and they have mothers, sisters, cousins and aunts like anyone else. [=]

12083. Organization for Sexual Communism; OSC. Manifesto: The Movie "Rising Sun" Uses Sexual Insecurity to Cultivate Anti-Japanese Hatred. Pamphlet. Seattle, Wash.: Organization for Sexual Communism (OSC), August 11, 1993. At the very beginning of the movie we meet our first two characters. A sexy white woman who has no identity outside of her sexuality and later on her status as murder victim, and her domineering, asshole Japanese boyfriend, who doesn't seem to have any affection for her and only wants to fuck her. This is a good metaphor for the overall portrayal of US-Japanese relations in the movie. The US being dominated by an arrogant Japan, and the US is too stupid to leave the relationship. More importantly here is the image of a white woman in a sexual relation with a Japanese man. This has the same dual nature as all the KKK propaganda about black men stealing white woman. First, whites are supposed to be roused into protecting white women from the horrible fate that surely awaits them at the hands of those bestial, rapacious non-whites (in "Rising Sun" she is strangled to death). Secondly, white men are really afraid that maybe the non-whites are going to rape and dominate them, as non-whites from the movie. The white woman is needed to stand in for the whole non-white race. The viewer is given the strong impression that their relationship is influence on people that they themselves are unaware of. It is not surprising that the murderer wasn't necessarily Japanese, but the woman was still murdered as part of some sort of Japanese corporate plot to blackmail a US Senator. Near the beginning of the film is the sex-strangulation scene. This cleverly directs hatred against the Japanese in the following way: Because people are brought up in a sexually repressive society people develop very deeply ingrained (often not even conscious) feelings of frustration in regard to sex. These feelings of frustration are due to a person inability to achieve full sexual/emotional arousal and release with another person as easily and often as one would like. This frustration finds its extreme form in a tendency towards sexual violence. This violence in a primitive way has developed as a rebellion against the ingrained sexual inhibition. It manifests itself in two forms: sexual sadism and sexual masochism. Sexual sado-masochistic tendencies exist in everyone who grew up in a sexually-repressive atmosphere, although very few people are more than vaguely conscious of this in themselves. This is because if the sexual sado-masochistic part of the personality were to become the dominant one the individual would either destroy themselves or be destroyed by others defending themselves. Thus when the person is still very young they develop a mechanism to repress these sexual sado-masochistic feelings. This mechanism is a sort of emotional pretense which is most obviously manifested in things like politeness and respect. A person can hate someone's guts but still feel obligated to pretend like they like them. This repressive mechanism represses sexual sado-masochism almost completely out of the conscious mind. Fear holds it out of the conscious mind. When you try to bring it into the conscious mind feelings of anxiety, which again in most people will be unconscious, come up and create all sorts of reasons why this sexual-sado masochism cannot exist within you. For this reason the vast majority of the readers of this text, yourself probably included will write this off as a bunch of bunk. Because you are afraid to face what's within you. I'm not afraid of it. we want you to face it because we have confidence that the world will be a better place if we get this all out in the open. This is not small matter. People have very strong feelings about sex and sexual relationships. By manipulating these feelings political propaganda such as "Rising Sun" can have strong influence on people that they themselves are unaware of. It is not necessary for those involved in writing the story or producing the movie to be conscious of the above psychological dynamics in order for them to utilize them in the way described above. In fact they probably are not. They have merely produced a film that corresponds to their world view and feelings based on their own social-economic sliding.

"Rising Sun" Is Anti-Japanese War Propaganda: Japanese are portrayed as authoritarian, rigid and militaristic. It is true that Japanese culture is more authoritarian and rigid than our own, but this movie focuses on and exaggerates this to the exclusion of compassion or empathy with Japanese people. There is a constant stream of comments in the beginning of the movie alternatively criticizing the Japanese and talking about how they're taking over the US This and the above outlined sexual-political propaganda is happening to prepare the US population for war with Japan.

The Collapse of the The East Bloc and the 'New World Order':
Since the collapse of the East Bloc it seems pretty likely economic rivalry between the major powers will replace the ideological confrontation of the Cold War as the central aspect of international relations[,] as it was prior to WWII. “The eastern alliance system cannot survive the collapse of the Soviet Union, and the United States cannot simply retreat into the western hemisphere...” [The Coming War with Japan by George Friedman and Meredith Lebardi p.254] The major aspect of this question in the present world is the three way economic competition between the US, Japan, Germany and their various alliances which are only beginning to be sorted out now. NAFTA and the EC being the clearest examples. This competition was going on quietly behind the scenes all during the cold war, but it was never allowed to become too acute because all three major powers agreed the challenge represented by the East Bloc was more threatening to them all. Now that fear of the East Bloc and its associated political movements in other countries has disappeared we expect the economic competition between the major powers to escalate into military conflict or an eventually war as was the rule up to WWII. The “Cold W2” is best not viewed as a 4-year period of peace but as its title says, but as a 45-year war between eastern and western alliances in which their were numerous, bloody, protracted battles: Korea, Vietnam, Central America, Afghanistan, numerous African conflicts and to a certain extent the Arab-Israeli wars. “Many have argued that war was made obsolete by nuclear weapons. If so, history has not heard of war’s obsolescence. Quite the contrary, the history of the world since 1945 has been a h story of war. What has been most striking is that even though several nuclear powers-the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France, Israel-have all fought wars, not once have nuclear weapons been used. Indeed, the United States and the Soviet Union were each defeated in major wars, and permitted themselves to be defeated without recourse to nuclear weapons. “There is something odd about a weapon that is said to be absolutely powerful, yet is never used as an instrument of statecraft. One is left with one of two suspicions: that nuclear weapons have had almost no impact on it. War has been limited by the mutual interests of the Soviets and the Americans, and where these interests collided, there was war. The constancy of wars against Israel and the willingness of the Syrians and Egyptians to attack Israel even though the face of overwhelming evidence that Israel was nuclear-capable, shows the limits of nuclear weapons and the ubiquity of war.” [ibid;p.340] “The idea that war has ceased to serve a function in the nuclear age simply does not bear up to historical scrutiny. War HAS continued to serve a function in the nuclear age, and one suspects that with the end of the Cold War this function can only increase.” [ibid; p.341]

US Economic, Political and Military Strategy in the Post Cold-War World: “The western alliance system cannot survive the collapse of the Soviet Union, and...the United States cannot simply retreat into the western hemisphere...” [ibid; p.254] With the emphasis in world politics changing from ideological to economic competition, the US “…must convert its massive defense establishment into something productive. The conventional understanding of this is to demobilize the armed forces, store the weapons and the ships, and rebuild a civilian industry. There is another version. “Converting from defense to economic growth does not have to mean abandoning the military. Rather, it can mean utilizing it in a different way, adopting a different national strategy. Domination of the oceans can be used for economic gain. Control of the oceans is control of trade, of the flow of minerals, oil, automobiles, and tape recorders. The price, destination, even the origin of those goods is in the hands of the navy that rules the oceans. “Using military power for economic ends is an old story. The history of Europe’s borders is the history of war for profit. An empire can be quite blatant about it. Nations that wish to trade must pay fees or tariffs or taxes to the protecting force. It can be dressed as “burden sharing,” or dues to an alliance, or contributions to catastrophe, the” or dues to an alliance, or contributions to catastrophe, the “national security” fund. This is how the diplomats frame the reality is unimportant. The power of the US to impose tolls on trade and punish traders that cut into US markets is a starkly real power.” [ibid; pp.255-256] “It is utterly inconceivable that the United States will not use its vast naval power to try to gain economic advantage. The stakes are too high and the power too great for any other outcome.”[ibid., p.256]

‘Culturalism’ As The New Nationalist Ideology:
In the coming international political struggles the government will not try to win our support so much on the basis of ideological reasoning like in the cold war (“democracy” vs. “totalitarianism”), but more on the basis of nationalistic propaganda. Although many other countries are called upon to adopt their ideology in a very racist way (as can be seen in many parts of Europe, especially eastern), the nationalism of the US is more likely to develop on the basis of a kind of culturalism. This is the idea that it is not some kind of racial superiority or sense of pariahship that binds one to one’s own state, but a sense of cultural superiority. On this basis the US ruling class can carry the loyalty of much broader sections of the population, especially blacks and Hispanics. Expect to hear a lot more about the ‘American fee spirit’, ‘American ingenuity’ etc... They will not try to convince us that the US is politically and economically superior to the rest of the world, but that the US is culturally superior to the rest of the world. This has always been an aspect of US ruling-class propaganda but now it will be much increased in order to draw people’s allegiance away from former US allies (Europeancountries, Japan, and to a lesser extent some third world countries), who fall within the category of ‘good guys’ in the old ideology, to prepare people for the coming economic, political and eventually military struggles which will be much more blatantly based on the drive for global US corporate dominance then was evident during the cold war. This is because the US’s main economic competitors’ political systems are very similar to the US’s. In fact, of the major economic powers in the world the US has one of the least democratic political systems. England is less democratic, but France, Japan, Italy, Germany etc. are all more democratic. This new US nationalism, although utilizing racism to build itself up, is not likely to develop in an extremist racial direction. This is because the ruling class, although almost exclusively white, does not want extreme racial antagonisms within the US (the Rodney King riots, and other massive anti-racist riots in Miami and D.C.). Because the US is so racially heterogeneous extreme racism within the US will mainly serve to weaken the US’s ability to compete globally. Thus the ruling class is not likely to try to increase racism in the US and may take some small steps to weaken it. Large steps taken against racism seem very unlikely because racist ideology does justify the large income disparities between rich and poor, since any of the very poor are non-white. To create real racial equality in the US would cost the upper classes a lot of money and social position which their not likely to give up unless the struggle against foreign competitors becomes really desperate. This idea of trying to get the oppressed races of the US on board the anti-Japanese bandwagon is very apparent in the film whose main character, a US hero fighting to keep Stealth bomber technology from falling into the hands of the Japanese, is black. His character is developed as someone sensitive to racism in order to undermine the audience's awareness of the anti-Japanese tone of the film. He is even called a racist in the film in order to present the idea that anyone who sees the anti-Japanese ideology as something detestable is just ignorant of how those sinister Japanese are trying to get their hands on our Stealth bomber technology, and take over our country.

Where Do Your Interests Lay?
The massacre in Bosnia is a picnic compared to what's going to happen when the world’s economic powers drop the pretense and let their fangs show. If you believe that humans cannot live together cooperatively and that your only hope for a better life is to try to accumulate material things at the expense of other and to align one’s self with narrow, sectarian, ruling class, racist, nationalist interests, then all my hatred to you. But if you despise this dog-eat-dog world of pretense and manipulation and believe that their can be no happiness as long as the world is filled with misery and pain and headed for even worse catastrophe, the,” or even to us in the struggle against these future wars of nationalist slaughter which are going to cause ‘so much misery to the world.[This leaflet produced 4/11/1993 by the Organization for Sexual Communism (OSC); PO Box 95473, Seattle, WA 98145-2473. We want to hear you comments, criticisms, questions and suggestions.]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Indochina(Kampuchea,Laos, Vietnam): 983000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: United States, Peoples Republic of China, Canada, Australia, France.

Pakistan: 55000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: Bangladesh. Peoples Republic of China: 183500 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: Hong Kong, Macao, United States, Philippines: 90000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: Malaysia. Tibet: 78000 refugees; Main Countries of Asylum: India, Nepal, Bhutan, Switzerland.

A revolution is an insurrection, an act of violence by death-bed, when it has become even more a fetter on the development of society as a whole and therefore becomes all the more necessary. A revolution is not a dinner party, or writing an essay, or painting a picture, or doing embroidery; it cannot be so refined, so leisurely and gentle, so temperate, kind, courteous, restrained and magnanimous. A revolution is an insurrection, an act of violence by which one class overthrows another. "This expresses in concentrated form a fundamental truth of human history. Since classes first emerged with the development of slavery out of the old primitive communal stage of capitalism, means war-war to suppress the resistance of the new ruling class and reorganize society accordingly. But in doing so it comes directly up against the fact that the old form is enforced by the political domination of the ruling class, and that this ruling class, whose political institutions and ideas correspond to the old mode of production, cannot and will not recognize that its time has past and that its system must be replaced by a higher one. Thus, in such periods the new and rising class assumes the leadership of the resistance of the oppressed masses and carries out in this way the revolutionary overthrow of the old system by a new one which corresponds to the outlook and interests of this rising class and, for the time, to the further development of society. Such has been the actual history of human society and its advance from one epoch to the next. And it is a universal truth that never has the old ruling class willingly stepped aside, but on the contrary it always used the most vicious and desperate means to preserve its dominant position and could be swept aside only by violent revolution.

In short, all forms of governing class-divided society, whatever their outer shell, have always in essence represented the dictatorship-the-political domination backed up by armed force of one class or another, and the forward, upward march of humanity has, since the time classes and states emerged, taken place only through the overthrow of the old state-the-dictatorship of the old ruling class and its replacement by a new state-the-dictatorship of the new ruling class. This fundamental principle certainly applies to the revolution of the present epoch-the-proletarian revolution. The capitalist class, which arose within feudal society and ultimately led the struggle to overthrow it in past centuries, has beyond all doubt outlived its historical usefulness and can only act in this period as an obstacle to further progress-its mode of production suffocates and strangles the development of the productive forces and repeatedly hurts society into ever more paralyzing and destructive crisis. Yet the capitalist class certainly does not recognize or accept this-it not only regularly brings down murderous repression against any serious resistance and systematically terrorizes especially those from whom it most fears rebellion, but it time and again plunges millions of people into war in the attempt to save its system and protect its dominant position. What is the history of the United States of America, if not this? And this has become all the more pronounced with the development of capitalism into its highest and final stage since the turn of this century-imperialism-capitalism which has come to be marked by the domination of monopolies and international finance capital, not only living off the exploitation of the working class in its own country but parasitically sucking the lifeblood out of peoples and whole nations throughout the world. Imperialism is capitalism in decay and on its death-bed, when it has become even more a fetter on the development of the productive forces and society as a whole and therefore becomes all the more violent. Imperialism, even more than the earlier, competitive stage of capitalism, means war-war to suppress the resistance of the colonial peoples and oppressed nations, to enforce imperialist plunder to ensure imperialist superprofits; and war among the imperialists themselves, who have already carved up the world and must repeatedly hurl the entire world into military conflict in the battle to re-divide it. How can reforms or "peaceful change" bring an end to all this? Where or when have they ever done so? Right now, with the imperialist system back in the ditch of severe crisis and once more dragging the world's people to the brink of world war, can anyone seriously believe that there is any way to abolish such terrorizing evils, any way to break the stranglehold of the imperialists on society and the world except through violent revolution? Only the imperialists themselves and their allies and flunkies have an interest in holding and spreading this illusion and those among the people who cling to it will be jolted awake to reality in the coming years!

The revolution of this era, the revolution led by the proletariat, though it will assume different specific forms and proceed through different stages in different countries, depending on the concrete conditions, can and will succeed only through the mobilization of the masses of people to carry out an armed uprising to overthrow the dictatorship of the imperialists (and allied reactionaries) and to establish the dictatorship of the proletariat, the one class which at this stage can reorganize society in every sphere in conformity with the development of the productive forces. This need to violently overthrow and replace one class dictatorship with another is true of the proletarian revolution certainly no less than any other, previous revolution. But the proletarian revolution is, on the other hand, fundamentally different from any previous revolution: it aims not at the replacement of one system of exploitation by another, though higher, system of exploitation, but at the abolition of exploitation in any form; and its historic mission is fulfilled not merely through the overthrow and replacement of one class dictatorship by another, but through the final abolition of all exploitation, with the elimination of class distinctions themselves. All prior transformations of society, though they advanced it from a lower to a higher level and made possible the further development of the productive forces, nevertheless took place on the foundation of relatively backward and more or less slowly changing productive forces. But capitalist society, within which the proletariat emerges as the main productive force itself and the revolution of this epoch is unprecedented in human history and leading it to a whole period of socialism, all during which the proletariat must maintain and continue to transform -society in every sphere, material and ideological, and must transform itself-develop its own class consciousness and scientific outlook in opposition to those of the bourgeoisie and all other classes-in the process. As Marx and Engels expressed it in The Communist Manifesto, the proletarian revolution involves the most radical rupture with all traditional property relations and with all traditional ideas as well. The first step of the proletariat, once having won power, is to take into its hands, through its state and the leadership of its Party, the decisive levers and lifelines of the economy. It quickly expropriates the factories, land, machinery, etc. of the overthrown bourgeoisie, beginning with the largest concentrations of capital, and exercises firm control over finance and trade. On -this basis it is able to move rapidly to rationalize the productive process and begin eliminating the mad anarchy of capitalism with its frenzied chase of a competing handful for profit and such criminal absurdities of capitalism as unemployment. In short, it socializes ownership of the major means of production, and institutes overall planning of the economy in accordance with this, through the proletarian state. And all this constitutes a tremendous leap forward, laying the basis for and opening the way to both tremendous development in the economy and further transformation of society in its economic foundation and its political and ideological superstructure. But this is precisely the beginning, not the end, of socialist transformation. With regard to the many small producers and traders, the intellectuals of various kinds and others-the middle strata of society-the proletariat in power must apply a long-term policy of both unity and struggle, with the aim of transforming their economic position, political stand and ideological outlook through a protracted, step-by-step advance. While the proletariat can and must exercise ruthless dictatorship over the overthrown bourgeoisie and other outright enemies of the revolution and socialize their vast holdings almost in one stroke, it cannot and must not apply this policy to the middle strata. Instead, it must lead and organize them to develop forms of cooperative ownership and collective labor-through which to progress to socialized state ownership-and to take part in the political movements launched by the proletariat and remodel their world outlook in accordance with the socialist revolution and the ultimate advance to communism. Because of all this, and more generally because upon overthrowing capitalism and the bourgeoisie the proletariat will inherit the divisions and inequalities left over from the old society-between mental and manual labor, between the city and the countryside, between mental and manual labor, between the city and the countryside, between men and women, etc.-for all these reasons, it is impossible to make the advance to communism in one leap or in a short period of time. Rather, between-capitalist and communist society there lies a long transition period of socialism, all during which the proletariat must maintain and strengthen its dictatorship and the socialization of ownership of the means of production, strike at, restrict and move toward eliminating the differences and inequalities left over from the old society and transform the thinking of the people according to the scientific principles and outlook of Marxism. Further, communism can only be finally realized on a world scale, and therefore in coming to power in country after country the proletariat will still find itself surrounded by hostile imperialist and reactionary states which will attempt every means to crush, subvert or otherwise destroy the socialist state. Thus the socialist transition period is not a smooth, broad freeway leading directly and quickly to communism, but a tortuous path, full of twists and turns and marked by sharp struggle. Within each socialist country, the remnants of capitalism will continually give rise to a new bourgeoisie that will repeatedly attempt to seize power from the proletariat and restore capitalism; and in so doing it will seek to make use of the contradictions within socialist society to mobilize a social base of more privileged strata and play upon backward sentiments within the working class itself, as well as seeking support from and alliances with imperialist and reactionary states. The experience of the proletarian revolution and the socialist societies, both the historic victories and advances as well as the temporary defeats and setbacks, has shown not only all this but even more specifically that the heart of the new bourgeoisie engendered socialist society lies within the party of the proletariat itself, especially at its leading levels. The contradiction between the party and the masses, the leadership and the led, especially when the proletariat is in power and its party is the central force in exercising political power and economic control, is a concentrated expression of the contradictions left over from the old society. This can be resolved in the interests of the proletariat only by developing the forms of mass struggle and mass organization to draw the millions of working people into the administration of society and the determination of political questions and affairs. As culture and the rest, as capitalism has been accustomed to "run the country," or to put it more accurately, to put the working people into a social and political heaven which has been prepared in accordance with the revolutionary outlook and interests of the proletariat, while involving the intellectuals, and especially party officials, in mass political struggle as well as productive labor and other activities together with the masses and developing mass movements to promote the study of Marxism and the remolding of the world outlook of the people. But inevitably, until the transition to communism is carried through world-wide, there will be repeated attempts to restore capitalism by bourgeois elements, and most dangerously by leading party officials who have betrayed the proletariat and turned their position of leadership into private capital but continue to claim the mantle of Marxism and communism. This emphasizes all the more that the proletariat cannot rest content with the first great steps of seizing power through armed force and then socializing ownership, beginning with the major means of production. It must continue the struggle under these conditions to revolutionize all of society and not only defeat attacks, subversion and pressure from external enemies but actively assist and support the revolutionary movements of the workers and the oppressed peoples and nations throughout the world against imperialism and reaction. Further, as a crucial part of this continuing class struggle within socialist society, the party itself must be continually revolutionized—which means driving out those die-hard party members, especially within its top ranks, who are determined to take the road of capitalist restoration, but more fundamentally it means linking the party as a whole with the masses in the continuing and deepening struggle to transform all of society, including the thinking of the people, and advance along the socialist road toward the historic mission of communism. That the new conquerors and supersedes the old, and that this happens only through repeated and intensifying struggle—this is a basic law governing the development of all things. It is a fundamental truth in the history of human society no less sudden breaks and leaps in the situation, they will be forced more and more to reveal their true nature and to more nakedly rely on the decisive edge of their political domination—their armed dictatorship over and violent suppression of the masses.

Even now, the imperialists use their armed forces and weaponry not only to suppress mass rebellion but to intimidate the masses from rebelling in the first place. But the more social upheaval deepens and spreads, and especially the more that the crucial element of the class-conscious workers becomes a growing force and influence within this, the Achilles heel of the bourgeois armed forces will be further exposed—for, despite its awesome arsenal, it must still rely on its basic military units to occupy territory and put down rebellion, but these units are drawn overwhelmingly from the youth of the proletariat and the oppressed masses generally and are forced, through all kinds of degrading methods of indoctrination and intimidation, to fight against their own interests and their own class brothers and sisters. As the old authority begins to be seriously challenged and to break down, many will come over to join the armed ranks of the revolutionary proletariat. This emphasizes all the more that the proletariat cannot rest content with "normal routine" of life will be disrupted throughout society by political strikes; when big sections of the working class and other struggling masses not only are engaging in large demonstrations, marches and outbreaks of street battles with the police but finally go over to various forms of armed struggle which are organized by the Party into a coordinated uprising and revolutionary warfare, defeating and dismantling the bourgeoisie's armed forces and winning over large numbers of their rank and file soldiers in the process. As yet, of course, the imperialists still are able to maintain the great majority of the people in a state of relatively passive submission and routine subordination to the established order and authority. But as things develop, punctuated by sudden breaks and leaps in the situation, they will be forced more and more to reveal their true nature and to more nakedly rely on the decisive edge of their political domination—their armed dictatorship over and violent suppression of the masses.

In the US the first great step of the proletarian revolution—the seizure of power through the armed overthrow of imperialism and the bourgeois state—remains and demands urgently to be taken. Not only has there been no proletarian revolution in this country, there has before now been no serious attempt at or even preparation for it. This has been due both to the remaining strength and reserves of the imperialists, especially since World War 2, and importantly, if secondarily, to the weaknesses, errors and outright deviations from Marxism on the part of the communist and revolutionary forces. Now, however, we are on the threshold of a period in which there is the real possibility that the objective conditions necessary for revolution may develop—the weakening and desperation of the imperialists and the accompanying unrest and upheaval in society, stirring revolutionary sentiments among the broad masses and driving them to seek a radical way out. And there is a party, the Revolutionary Communist Party, USA which is actively preparing its own ranks and the masses for that day of reckoning. While this country has never seen a revolutionary struggle for power led by the proletariat, it has certainly witnessed revolutionary mass movements shaking the foundation of this country if not yet capable of overtaking it. And today there is not only the profound and deepening economic and political crisis and the imminent danger of world war, but there are, increasingly, minor political shocks that jolt society and awaken growing numbers to political life. These are but tremors before a gigantic earthquake. In all these events the embryo of a revolutionary crisis can be discerned. When, for example, in the thunderous rebellions of Black people and other oppressed peoples that have erupted, the police and then the national guard are unable to enforce "law and order," when even the power of the affluent as culture and the rest, as capitalism has been accustomed to "run the country," or to put it more accurately, to put the working people into a social and political heaven which has been prepared in accordance with the revolutionary outlook and interests of the proletariat, while involving the intellectuals, and especially party officials, in mass political struggle as well as productive labor and other activities together with the masses and developing mass movements to promote the study of Marxism and the remolding of the world outlook of the people. But inevitably, until the transition to communism is carried through world-wide, there will be repeated attempts to restore capitalism by bourgeois elements, and most dangerously by leading party officials who have betrayed the proletariat and turned their position of leadership into private capital but continue to claim the mantle of Marxism and communism. This emphasizes all the more that the proletariat cannot rest content with the first great steps of seizing power through armed force and then socializing ownership, beginning with the major means of production. It must continue the struggle under these conditions to revolutionize all of society and not only defeat attacks, subversion and pressure from external enemies but actively assist and support the revolutionary movements of the workers and the oppressed peoples and nations throughout the world against imperialism and reaction. Further, as a crucial part of this continuing class struggle within socialist society, the party itself must be continually revolutionized—which means driving out those die-hard party members, especially within its top ranks, who are determined to take the road of capitalist restoration, but more fundamentally it means linking the party as a whole with the masses in the continuing and deepening struggle to transform all of society, including the thinking of the people, and advance along the socialist road toward the historic mission of communism. That the new conquerors and supersedes the old, and that this happens only through repeated and intensifying struggle—this is a basic law governing the development of all things. It is a fundamental truth in the history of human society no less sudden breaks and leaps in the situation, they will be forced more and more to reveal their true nature and to more nakedly rely on the decisive edge of their political domination—their armed dictatorship over and violent suppression of the masses.

12087. Sciolino, Elaine. "State Department Becomes Cooler To The New Rulers of Kabul; An Islamic Government Loses Favor in Washington; Discrimination Against Women and Worries About Opium Cause a Chill", in New York Times, October 23, 1996. p. A8. [TXT] The Clinton Administration, after a flirtation with the Taliban rulers of central Afghanistan, has started distancing themselves from the government they had so recently embraced. One 'senior Administration official involved in Afghan policy' characterized this reversal as 'politically correct'. Similarly, Unocal International Energy Ventures had initially seen the Taliban seizure of Kabul as a positive development, but under Administration pressure, the firm has backed away from supporting the new Taliban government.

12088. Shalinsky, Audrey C. "Women's Roles in the Afghanistan Jihad", in International Journal of Middle East Studies, November, 1993. pp. 661-675. This article examines women's ideal roles in the Jihad as explained in taped stories relating tales of the Prophet Muhammad. These tapes were used by the Farghanchi Uzbek refugees to facilitate discussions. Women's changing roles and shifting expectations at the time of Jihad are explored.

12089. Sisterhood Is Global Institute. Religion, Culture and Women's Human Rights in the Muslim World. An International Conference Presented by the Sisterhood Is Global Institute, Co-Sponsored by the Center for the Study of the Global South, 9/9-10/1994, American University, Washington DC. AIMS AND AGENDA: Religion, Culture, and Women's Human Rights in the Muslim World will bring together activists and academicians to identify issues that have priority in Muslim women's struggle for rights and to develop effective strategies to empower women in Muslim countries. The Conference will present to those interested in women's human rights in the Muslim world a unique opportunity to review problems that are specific to Muslim societies, discuss them in detail, and voice their concerns prior to the 1995 UN World Conference on Women in Beijing, China. The Beijing Conference will address key issues relating to obstacles and opportunities in the global development of women's human rights. This Conference will provide a forum for non-governmental women activists from the Muslim world to have significant and effective input in the debates and decisions of the pivotal Beijing Conference. Recommendations formulated by participants, as well as conference documents, will be circulated at Beijing. There will be an exhibition of books, photographs, and art by and about Muslim women throughout the conference. Participants will: (1) Discuss ways to involve Muslim women leaders in interpreting religious texts and international Human Rights Documents. (2) Discuss how to present such interpretations in a way that will encourage governments and legislators to implement changes in order to improve the status of women. (3) Consider methods of interacting with grassroots women by interpreting issues of interest to them using appropriate Islamic and the people are Russians (although Kazakh majority areas may be part of the republic of Kazakhstan must remain a part of Russia: even a majority of the three Baltic Republics, the three Transcaucasian Republics, four Central Asian Republics and Moldova will seek to leave the disintegrating USSR. While the Soviets approached Republic borders with disinterest, the arbitrary and irrelevant Nagorno-Karabagh a case in point, the artificial republic of Kazakhstan must remain a part of Russia: even a majority of the people are Russians (although Kazakh majority areas may be an illusion)." [Rebuilding Russia was first written in 7/1990 and was published in 1991. pp. 3-58. "Time has finally run out for communism". Now it is the time to determine how the transition from Communism can be managed without the destruction of Russia. After seventy years Russia lies in ruins, from the Great Patriotic War, from nuclear disasters (even importing Western nuclear wastes for money), from deforestation, from massive environmental degradation. Russian cities are ruined, health care is neglected, millions lack adequate housing, women have been saddled with backbreaking labor. Millions of Russians cling simply to their 'unlimited drunkenness'. Even the name 'Russia' has been degraded, loosely connected to the imperialism of the USSR. The massive ethnic conflicts that simmer in the Soviet periphery can only be forestalled at the cost of Russian blood: as many as the three Baltic Republics, the three Transcaucasian Republics, four Central Asian Republics and Moldova will seek to leave the disintegrating USSR. While the Soviets approached Republic borders with disinterest, the arbitrary and irrelevant Nagorno-Karabagh a case in point, the artificial republic of Kazakhstan must remain a part of Russia: even a majority of the people are Russians (although Kazakh majority areas may be an illusion)." [Rebuilding Russia was first written in 7/1990 and was published in 1991. pp. 3-58. "Time has finally run out for communism". Now it is the time to determine how the transition from Communism can be managed without the destruction of Russia. After seventy years Russia lies in ruins, from the Great Patriotic War, from nuclear disasters (even importing Western nuclear wastes for money), from deforestation, from massive environmental degradation. Russian cities are ruined, health care is neglected, millions lack adequate housing, women have been saddled with backbreaking labor. Millions of Russians cling simply to their 'unlimited drunkenness'. Even the name 'Russia' has been degraded, loosely connected to the imperialism of the USSR. The massive ethnic conflicts that simmer in the Soviet periphery can only be forestalled at the cost of Russian blood: as many as the three Baltic Republics, the three Transcaucasian Republics, four Central Asian Republics and Moldova will seek to leave the disintegrating USSR. While the Soviets approached Republic borders with disinterest, the arbitrary and irrelevant Nagorno-Karabagh a case in point, the artificial republic of Kazakhstan must remain a part of Russia: even a majority of the people are Russians (although Kazakh majority areas may be an illusion)."

REPORTS AND PAPERS:

12090. Smith, Nancy DeWolf. "Afghanistan’s Chance For Peace: You Do Not Have To Approve of the Behavior of the Taliban To Appreciate Their Opportunity At This Moment In Afghan History", in Wall Street Journal, October 3, 1996, p. A14. [Smith has covered Afghanistan for Radio Free Europe.] The Taliban victory in Afghanistan has brought an orthodox Muslim government to power, allowing the West to hope that the pan-Islamists of Afghanistan may finally be crushed. The triumph of Mullah Mohammad Omar, King of the Believers, represents a great defeat for the USSR, Russia and Iran. The triumph of the Taliban also ends the threat of an Islamic menace to the government of Pakistan. While some are ‘squashmen’ over the killing of Najibullah and the oppression of women, the Taliban represent a meaningful stability. The ‘Taliban have already done their country a favor’ by ending the possibility of any Afghan Tajik link with Tajikistan and Russia. Bad relations with Iran are another happy product of the Taliban triumph, since their only tie is their role in the heroin trade. Far deeper is the permanent hatred of the Sunni Taliban for Shiite Iran. Sooner or later the evil forces of Russia and Iran will mount a new attack on Afghanistan: unless the Taliban have established their power by then, "it will be too late". [TXT]
KGB must be eliminated, and Russian moral restoration can begin with public confession of its crimes by the Communist Party. Overthrowing the Soviet yoke will be a greater challenge that overthrowing the yoke of Tataar.

12092. Steinfield, Peter. Neo-Conservatives: The Men Who Are Changing America’s Politics. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979. The American intellectual elite is 50% Jewish and 50% lives in New York, according to Jewish researcher Charles Kadushin’s study of the American intellectual elite: they are born leaders and at least moderately wealthy. [p. 202] When not actually Jews, they are by definition fiercely Zionist, such as Daniel Patrick Moynihan [p. 119]. Although the term “Zionist” is not included in the index to this book [the author Steinfield is reportedly himself a Zionist], the book focuses on Zionism as the core political ideology of the American elite, which is seen as essentially a Zionist Jewish elite. The identification of the intellectual elite with Jewish publications is the basis for much of this claim that only Jews are intellectuals in any meaningful sense: so having an article published in Commentary (edited by Norman Podhoretz, a noted supporter of Sen. Joseph McCarthy [with Nathan Glazer, Podhoretz saw McCarthy as a champion of civil liberties, pp. 30-31; this judgement is possibly based in the fact that while many of the people targeted by Sen. McCarthy were Jews, the Jews so targeted were anti-Zionist Jews; and that while the list of such Jews to be targeted were provided to Sen. McCarthy by the Anti-Defamation League, the ADL was also able to rehabilitate anti-Zionist Jews if they were willing to renounce their opposition to Zionism)] of the American Jewish Congress or the Public Interest (founded in 1965 by Kristol after being editor of the secretly CIA-financed Encounter and while controlling Basic Books and Freedom House; Kristol would later move the American Enterprise Institute where he would hone his message that “urban mob” [p. 103] The “necessary strength of will” of this Jewish elite is 50% Jewish and 50% lives in New York, unifying source of neo-conservatism [pp. 278-279]. Of course this intense Zionism is rooted in the “lesson… the Jewish intellectuals… learned from the Holocaust” [p. 277], that lesson was that the “brilliance” of Jews would be forever confronted by intense anti-semitism of the type found in Nazi Germany and the United States [p. 278]; the dual threat to Jews of the racially degenerate American anti-semitic masses remains: “the threat to Israel and the shadow of quotas” [p. 279]: in the section “Fear of Anti-Semitism” [pp. 277-279], Neo-Cons are virtually identified as Jewish. Even the “fervently pro-Israel” George McGovern cannot win their support since he would be hesitant to use military force to advance Israeli interests. [p. 51] The overriding concern of Neo-Cons is the “threat to Israel” [p. 68], a threat rooted in the “precarious situation of Israel” [sic: p. 69]; other geopolitical issues such as Angola or Afghanistan are irrelevant since they do not advance the interests of Jews. [p. 69] Thus, the Neo-Con elite (“an ideologically armed and intact elite” of Zionist Jews and their non-Jewish Zionist allies [p. 69]) are confronted with a two front war: resisting “external pressure” from the enemies of Israel [p. 69] (including OPEC [p.68]) and “internal disintegration” of the control of the Jewish elite within the United States. [p. 69] This “Internal disintegration” is a product of the deep racial decline of [White] Middle America into “decadence”, and implicitly argues that only the new Jewish elite can preserve America from this degenerate “urban mob”. [p. 103] The “necessary strength of will” of this Jewish elite [p. 69], and the political legitimacy of this Jewish elite is based in its “willingness to employ American power swiftly and decisively” to protect Israel, since only the security of Israel is an inescapable national interest. [p. 69]

12093. Tapper, Nancy; Akiner, Shirin [editor]. “Women and Power: A Perspective On Marriage Among Durrani Pashtuns of Afghan Turkistan”, in Cultural Change and Continuity in Central Asia. Central Asia Forum. London: Kegan Paul International, 1991, pp. 181-197. Formal constructions of gender relations in the islamic world tend to focus on disabilities suffered by women; in real life, women have considerable informal power. Ortner and Whitehead have argued the central sultural construction of gender is prestige: male prestige is heavily dependant on women in terms of female productive or reproductive labor and on women’s general comportment. Among the Durrani Pashtuns, women come into conflict with their prescribed roles through spirit possession, illicit sexual relations, and by their (rare) open defiance of female subordination and passivity. In each of these ways, women come into direct conflict with the interests of their family in a way that demonstrates the measure of women's power. Formally, women are according lower abilities to 'reason' (that is exercise self-control and discipline needed to make rational decisions), and are therefore excluded from public worship; are excluded from formal decision-making; and, are denied control over economic resources of any kind. At the same time, Durrani recognize the variability among individuals, realizing that a man can be unusually fearless, and some women can be very wise. Among the Durrani, gender distinctions are particularly elaborate around questions of honor and shame: these provide the principle idiom through which social activities are managed. In addition, Durrani society is based in the idea of conflict; beginning with the conflict of Durrani with other ethnic groups, and reaching down to the conflict between individual households. There is also a continuous tension between the rights of women to property recognized by Islam, and the complete lack of women's property rights in Durrani practice; but while women have no property rights, women can threaten the prestige and property or men, gaining a measure of power from this capability. While women's rights and expectations in marriage cannot be articulated in any manner the society finds to be acceptable; at the same time the failure of women to
The reaction of the Taliban regime that recently overran two-thirds of the country, including the capital city of Kabul, has banned women from families to Herat. Conditions in the camps are apparently reasonable, but weather has stemmed the usual daily influx of between five and nine IDP women, and imposed heavy censorship on music, literature and edible oil to Shahidahi and Minaret Two Camps.

Afghanistan, 9/23/1996, demanding equal rights for women and men. The Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. Over the past week, wet, cold snowy weather has stemmed the usual daily influx of between five and nine IDP families to Herat. Conditions in the camps are apparently reasonable, but there is a need for fuel and warm clothing. WFP distributed wheat flour and edible oil to Shahidahi and Minearet Two Camps. Between 19 January and 2 February 687 shelters were completed in Kushki and Rabat Sangi. 144 MT wheat was distributed. ACF will support four mother and child healthcare clinics in 1997. The first of these opened in Bagrami last week. –

Five hundred women demonstrated at Balkh University in Mazar-e-Sharif, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, April 30, 1997. On 21 April, Dutch Development Minister Jan Pronk convened the first meeting of an Afghanistan Support Group -- a group of donor authorities, with the participation of UN representatives, committed to maintaining the momentum and sustaining the consensus reached at the Ashgabad Forum in January this year. This meeting, which was held in Geneva, focused on the relationship between UN political efforts to achieve peace in Afghanistan and its relief and development work. The majority of participants remain eager to bring both aspects of UN activities closer together.

Discussions also took place on progress since Ashgabad. There was widespread support for the ongoing formulation of a Strategic Framework for Assistance to Afghanistan and for efforts to enhance coordination among all those working to assist Afghanistan.

On human rights, all participants agreed to adhere to the principle of non-discrimination and to establish and continue effective dialogue with Taliban authorities and Afghan women.

The next Support Group meeting will take place immediately after a Group of 21 meeting and will include high-level representatives from donor governments, international government organisations, the ICRC, International NGOs and the UN system. –

12099. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Aid Efforts in Jalalabad", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. WFP launched a poultry project for women in New Hadda; around 1400 women will be trained. At the end of the course each woman will be provided with six chickens to start poultry farming.

WHO distributed medical supplies to Laghman Public Health Hospital and clinics in Nagarhar. UNICEF completed social mobilization work in 9 villages in Surkhrod and distributed biscuits to clinics in Rodat and Moafid. The Fund also provided diesel for drilling rigs.

WFP distributed wheat to food-for-work and bakery projects in Kunar, Laghman and Nangarhar.

On 28 January a UN convoy transported 210 MT wheatflour from Jalalabad to replenish food stocks in Kabul. –

12100. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Assistance in Herat", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. "Over the past week, wet, cold snowy weather has stemmed the usual daily influx of between five and nine IDP families to Herat. Conditions in the camps are apparently reasonable, but there is a need for fuel and warm clothing. WFP distributed wheat flour and edible oil to Shahidahi and Minearet Two Camps. Between 19 January and 2 February 687 shelters were completed in Kushki and Rabat Sangi. 144 MT wheat was distributed. The UNOPS Kerat women's poultry training programme is

12096. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "$33.3 million for PEACE", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 213. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, April 10, 1997. UNDP has allocated US$33.3 million to this ambitious new programme to assist women, the poor, the disabled and the disadvantaged in Afghanistan (see Update 211). –

12097. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "ACF Women Return to Work", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 217. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 28, 1997. Action Contre la Faim has obtained written permission to employ female Afghan staff: 70 women went back to work on nutritional programmes in Kabul last week. ACF will support four mother and child healthcare clinics in 1997. The first of these opened in Bagrami last week. –

12098. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Afghanistan Support Group", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 213. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, April 30, 1997. On 21 April, Dutch Development Minister Jan Pronk convened the first meeting of an Afghanistan Support Group -- a group of donor authorities, with the participation of UN representatives, committed to maintaining the momentum and sustaining the consensus reached at the Ashgabad Forum in January this year. This meeting, which was held in Geneva, focused on the relationship between UN political efforts to achieve peace in Afghanistan and its relief and development work. The majority of participants remain eager to bring both aspects of UN activities closer together.

On human rights, all participants agreed to adhere to the principle of non-discrimination and to establish and continue effective dialogue with Taliban authorities and Afghan women.

The next Support Group meeting will take place immediately after a Group of 21 meeting and will include high-level representatives from donor governments, international government organisations, the ICRC, International NGOs and the UN system. –

12099. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "$33.3 million for PEACE", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 213. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, April 10, 1997. UNDP has allocated US$33.3 million to this ambitious new programme to assist women, the poor, the disabled and the disadvantaged in Afghanistan (see Update 211). – ongoing, as are IAM's women's tailoring and embroidery project in the IDP camps. [=]

12101. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “CARE Women Beaten”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 217. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 28, 1997. On 26 May, a CARE minibus transporting five women was stopped by the religious police, the women were taken out and beaten. CARE had previously obtained written permission from the Taliban authorities for these women to work. CARE has suspended its women's programme. [=]

12102. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Demining Update”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 207, March 11, 1997. Mine busting: Thomas Carlsen Weber of Danish Demining and Development Associates is currently investigating the potential for using "mine busters" in Afghanistan. The mine buster, a comparatively simple mechanical device invented by Mr. Carlsen Weber, detonates mines in situ by percussion. The technique, which reduces the need for manual prodding of suspected mines, can make the demining procedure considerably safer. 7 new demining teams: 40 additional deminers will complete training and be ready to work in the field by the end of April. Awareness raising: Over the past week, two mine awareness teams operating in the western region have trained more than 2000 people, about half of them children. Mine awareness curriculum support materials including notebooks, silkscreens, posters and brochures were distributed to participants. [=]

12103. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Demining Update”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 211, April 8, 1997. Jalalabad Explosion: Following the 19 March ammunition store explosion in Jalalabad and the UN Coordinator's letter to the Taliban authorities conveying the UN's concern about the location of such stores in residential neighbourhoods, UNOCHA demining officials have written to the authorities offering advice on ways to store explosives safely.

    Herat: The demining programme is acting on requests to step up activities to clear battlefield areas of mines and unexploded bombs in Herat. The requests came as a result of concern about the large numbers of people who continue to enter the city from Badghis. [=]

12104. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Donations”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 205. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 25, 1997. The Government of Switzerland has contributed US$4,444 towards the 1997 Consolidated Appeal for Afghanistan. The donation will be used to support training of traditional birth attendants under the UNHCHR 1997 Repatriation Programme. The Government of Egypt confirmed its pledge made in Ashgabat to donate US$4500 worth of medical supplies to UN agencies. The UN has been asked to identify specific health-sector needs for Egypt to consider. [=]

12105. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Education Survey”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 221, June 24, 1997. A quick survey of information available in UN field offices paints a bleak picture of the plight of Afghanistan's schoolchildren -- particularly girls. Girls' school attendance has always been low in southern and central regions: now it stands at zero. In the west and around Kabul, where attendance had traditionally been high (in 1996, girls made up 30% of all school children in Herat and 40% in Kabul), female attendance is also zero -- apart from a few girls who go to schools in Herat in the IDP camps. In the north, levels remain unchanged, with girls making up 25% of the school population.

    The ban on women working has impacted negatively on boys' schools in the west, where shortages of teachers are reported. Women teachers in Kabul are said to be being paid to stay at home. There is also reported to be a reduction in numbers of male teachers in Kabul. However, NGOs have managed to continue to employ around 60 women and educate some 5000 girls under different projects in southern and eastern regions. A small number of UN and NGO-run skills and literacy programmes are reaching out to women in the southern and western regions. Training programmes for women in the eastern regions focus exclusively on health -- the one sector in which women are still permitted to work in Taliban-controlled areas.

    The only teacher-training establishment to survive is in the north, where there are reports of severe shortages of textbooks and other materials. The survey, although not exhaustive, highlights the diminished role of women in Afghan society -- both now and in the future. Elsewhere in the world, women have played a very important part in rebuilding countriesence conflicts have been resolved, particularly in local and national reconciliation processes. If the current trend is confirmed and strengthened, their absence from the public sphere and their lack of education will mean that, would they ever be authorized to fulfil such a role, the women of Afghanistan will be poorly equipped to do so. [=]

12106. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Education Workshop", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 216. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 20, 1997. Last week's UN/NGO/Taliban workshop on education revealed that the Taliban are not prepared to change their position on girls' education at present. Nevertheless, there was a frank exchange of views and both sides expressed their intention to continue the dialogue. [=]

12107. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Focus on Women", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 213. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, April 30, 1997. On 24 April, male and female Afghan NGO representatives in Peshawar were briefed on the PEACE initiative, with particular emphasis on ways to involve women. [=]

12108. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Food Crisis Accelerates", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 215, May 13, 1997. Aid workers in Kabul report that people are begging in the streets for bread rather than for money. The continuing shortage of wheat coupled with the plummeting exchange rate is pushing bread prices up out of the reach of many families who survived the winter on bread and tea. Some parents are said to be so desperate that they are trying to give away their children because they cannot afford to feed them.

    Very little wheat is coming into the country from abroad (some comes from Iran and a very small amount from Pakistan) and the next Afghan wheat harvest is not expected until July.

    UN agencies, NGOs and the ICRC have stepped up food relief activities. WFP reports that a US food-for-peace donation of 16220 tonnes of wheat will arrive in Afghanistan within two weeks and a consignment of 21543 tonnes of wheat from Canada is expected to arrive shortly. Additional supplies purchased with cash donations from Australia, ECHO, Finland and the UK are also on their way.

    But aid agencies agree that food handouts are not enough: there is a need to bring wheat to the market at prices people can afford. In response to the authorities' request for help, the UN Special Envoy to Afghanistan has asked Pakistan to facilitate the transport of food to Afghanistan.

    Meanwhile the Kabul authorities have fixed the price for one 110g loaf at Ats 1000: bakers violating this rule will be punished. [=]

12109. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "From the Frontline: Mazar-i-Sharif", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 219, June 12, 1997. Contradictory assessments of the security situation in Mazar-i-Sharif are coming in, with some aid workers saying that conditions are almost back to normal and others recommending that UN international staff members adopt a cautious approach to returning to the city.

    The UN Coordinator and Field Security Officer have asked for a series of meetings with the authorities to discuss the situation and will visit Mazar as soon as these have been arranged.

    A note from the Department of Foreign Affairs instructs foreign aid agencies to dispense with Afghan women employees, despite General Maillik's insistence that he and his supporters would defend women's rights to work and education.

There are also reports that Balkh University has begun segregating some classes, although there are apparently no restrictions on women teaching all-male classes. [ ]

12110. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 199, January 2, 1997. HERAT: On 21 December around 20 women were reportedly arrested in Herat when 150 women demonstrated against the closure of bathhouses for women. In support of the women, most shops remained closed.

MAZAR: Under food-for-training, 8250 tonnes of wheat were distributed to 50 widows and 50 female home-based literacy teachers in Balkh province, where 1638 women are under training.[ ]

12111. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. Speculation continues as to whether or not girls will be able to go back to school after the winter recess ends on 6 March.

On 2 February Mullah Hamdulla Nomani reportedly announced that Kabul University would reopen in March, but only for male students.

The UNHCR Kabul office has written to Mullah Mohamed Qah and protesting the deletion of all references to girls' education in the joint UN/Afghan initiative to rehabilitate schools in Kabul. UNHCR reminded Mullah Mohamed that "No UN assistance can be provided to the education sector unless the benefits go to both boys and girls".

Meanwhile work on the UNCHS Oxfam water project at Logar is to be put on hold after completion of the first phase, pending further developments on the women's rights issue.

Following the attack on an international staff member of IAM in Herat on 22 January, aid agencies have sent a letter to the Governor conveying their concern about the incident. Staff have been advised to avoid walking alone in the town, and international staff are recommended to carry walkie-talkies whenever possible. The UN agencies meeting of 30 January noted the need for security arrangements for local staff. Afghan staff have been asked to provide suggestions for these to be forwarded to heads of agencies in Islamabad.

Herat's women's bath houses remain closed (bath houses are also reportedly now closed to boys under 18). Girls will not be allowed back to school until there is "peace and stability" and a curriculum drawn up by the central shura. Nevertheless, Afghan women continue to walk about Herat, sometimes alone, more often with a male family member. [ ]

12112. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 206, March 5, 1997. NGOs have met with Dr. Paktis, Acting Deputy Minister for Public Health, to discuss concerns about the security of female staff working on women's health-care programmes. Three NGOs have downscaled healthcare activities in Kabul and will reportedly not resume full programming until they receive a letter authorizing local female staff members to travel between their homes and clinics in agency vehicles. Other NGOs are working normally. [ ]

12113. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 207, March 11, 1997. Kabul University opened on 9 March, but only for male students. "In the future if we have enough resources, we will have separate education for women", said Maulavi Hamdullah Numani, acting Minister of Higher and Vocational Education. He explained that women's attendance was conditional on segregation and that they would only be allowed to study "medicine, education, moral and other social subjects". [ ]

12114. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: Education", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 209. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 26, 1997. Boys went back to school in Afghanistan this week, but their sisters remain at home. Female teachers have not been allowed to go back to work, creating a shortage of teaching staff.

Maulavi Sayyed Riasuddin, acting Minister of Education, insists that "It is an obligation in Islam for both boys and girls to go to school," but that schools must be segregated to avoid "corruption". He said that: "The issue has been put to the Islamic scholars and hopefully soon they will reach their decision". He also cited lack of funds and the continuing military conflict as impediments to the opening of girls' schools. [ ]

12115. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: German Caution", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 204. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 18, 1997. A German parliamentary delegation to Afghanistan warned Sunday that the west should be cautious about recognizing them as the legitimate government in Kabul. "We would like the Taliban to not only talk about relaxing their curricula for women, we would also like them to do something about it," said Ulrich Fischer of the Alliance 90/Greens party in the German Parliament. [ ]

12116. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: Herat", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 201. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, January 29, 1997. A UNOPS-approved women's and basic health training course in Giza district could not be implemented due to lack of female trainers. On 22 January, a female international staff of IAM was beaten by member of the Taliban for not wearing the veil. IAM suspended its activities for two days and a UN/NGO meeting was held to decide on a joint strategy and to prepare for future eventualities. The governor subsequently apologized for the incident. [ ]

12117. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: Kabul", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 201. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, January 29, 1997. The Ministry of Public Health granted SCF-US permission to continue with its landmine education project to be carried out in 17 clinics and hospitals. Permission was granted on the basis that segregation between male and female staff is maintained. [ ]

12118. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: Mazar", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 201. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, January 29, 1997. UNOPS completed 60% of a non-formal education programme for 2000 women. [ ]

12119. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: NGO Woman Released", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 205. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 25, 1997. Handicap International, which runs a community-based mine awareness programme in Kandahar, reports that one of its female national staff members has been released from jail. The woman, a physiotherapist, was imprisoned last December for alleged prostitution after visiting a female staff member in the Handicap International office. [ ]

12120. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Gender Issue: Sweden Stands Firm on Girls' Education", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. Issue No. 204. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 18, 1997. During a recent meeting (7 February) between UN Under-Secretary General Yasushi Akashi and Ms Malin Karre, Director of the Department of Global Cooperation, Foreign Affairs of Sweden, Ms Karre reportedly advised that Sweden could not agree with the perspective that it was better to proceed with the education of boys when this in effect meant that girls were denied schooling. [ ]

Ahmad Motawakkil, member of the Taliban Shura Council, is leading a delegation to the US and other western countries. Its goal: international recognition of the Taliban government. However, women's rights issues continue to dominate western attitudes to the regime, and are a major feature in media coverage of the mission. The Taliban have yet to voice concrete plans on women's education and right to work. Mullah Wakil told the London-based Arabic newspaper Al Wasat: “Although it is true that Muslim women and men are equally entitled to education, what is important for us, however, as a movement is the fact that women should adhere to the Muslim dress code. Although Afghan women are entitled to have education, what we are demanding from some women is that they abide by the precepts of Islam and the shari'ah.” "Does this mean that you will allow women to return to their jobs if they adhere to the [Islamic] dress code?" queried the Al Wasati reporter. “In some government circles and hospitals, there is a need for women. We need women to work at our airports because we want them to perform some tasks such as searching female travellers and others. We also need both male and female doctors and nurses.” Abdul Hakeem Mujahid, is quoted in the San Francisco Chronicle as reiterating that women “will be educated”, but for the time it wasn't "safe for females to be out of the house." [=]

12122. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender Issue: UN Education Project Proposal”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 204. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 18, 1997. Mullah Rabbani has informed the UN team leader in Kabul that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Ministry of Education are still discussing the UN's proposal for a joint education projects, and will continue to liaise with the UN on the subject. They will reportedly invite UN agency heads to return to Kabul to discuss possible options. The UN maintains its position that the project must benefit female students as well as males. (=)

12123. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender Issue: Women Must Observe Dress Code”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 205. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 25, 1997. Latest reports from numerous sources in Kabul (including the BBC) indicate that some 60 women have been beaten in the streets. The women had reportedly disobeyed warnings to dress accordingly to strict Islamic prescriptions. (=)

12124. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender Issues: HERAT”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 200, January 14, 1997. Mrs. Kouwein, Bureau of Humanitarian Assistance and members of the Netherlands mission to Herat, visited a female poultry project assisted by UNOPS in the vicinity of Herat city, where she could meet with Afghan women. This project provides poultry training, incubators and financial incentives to widows and other vulnerable women. (=)

12125. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender Issues: JALALABAD”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 200, January 14, 1997. UNOPS received a formal clearance from Mowlawi Ihsanulla Muhsan, Head of Foreign Relations, for UNOPS and one of their international NGO contractors, the Moslem Youth Association for the Rehabilitation of Afghanistan (MYARA), to carry out health and veterinary sub-projects for women. The authorities have also granted written permission to WFP and its implementing partners to hire female monitors for the bakery project, which resumed its activities on 9 January. Thus far, six female staff have been hired to monitor the distribution of bread to female beneficiaries. However, a gathering held on 6 January in Jalalabad, the authorities formally announced the re-opening of the Jalalabad Medical College for male students only, banning female students from the college. (=)

12126. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender Training”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 218, June 3, 1997. UN agencies are currently putting together a gender training programme for all UN staff working to assist Afghanistan. The programme will also be open to NGO staff members who wish to participate. (=)

12127. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender issue: Education”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 208. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 19, 1997. UN and NGO representatives are receiving contradictory information as to whether or not girls will be allowed to go back to school later this month when the new Afghan academic year begins. Attempts to obtain written confirmation either way have been unsuccessful. (=)

12128. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender issue: Female Aid Workers May Travel”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 208. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 19, 1997. The Taliban authorities have given Medecins du Monde and Terre des Hommes written permission for female staff members to travel on agency vehicles -- so long as there are curtains between the driver and passengers and also on the windows. NGOs had asked for such letters because there were concerned about the security of female staff members when travelling to and from work. The authorities have provided an office for women to work in one of the Kabul children's hospitals. (=)

12129. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender issue: Girl Scouts Bring Refugees Gifts”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 208. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 19, 1997. On 24 March, a group of six Japanese girl scouts began distributing “peace packs” containing an assortment of educational items, clothing and other gifts to Afghan refugee children in Pakistan. Over the past year, the Girl Scouts of Japan have collected a total of 13536 peace packs. The project is part of a worldwide joint initiative between UNHCR and the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts which has so far collected a total of more than 260000 peace packs for refugee children in 34 countries. Last year, more than 12000 packs were divided equally between Afghanistan and Pakistan. In Kabul, distributions took place in bombed-out schools where pupils and teachers were in desperate need of all types of educational materials. This year, uncertainty as to whether or not girls will be allowed to return to school in Afghanistan means that it has not yet been decided if some way can be found to distribute packs to children inside Afghanistan. (=)

12130. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Gender issue: Repatriation”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 208. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 19, 1997. Figures received from UNHCR reveal that 803 individuals returned to Afghanistan from Pakistan's North West Frontier Province in the month of January. Last year, a total of 120770 people returned to Afghanistan: some 1.2 million Afghan refugees remain in Pakistan. Repatriation from Iran is even slower: just over 200 people have gone back to Afghanistan this year. Last year, 8367 individuals returned. There are around 1.4 million Afghan refugees in Iran. Refugees cite the country's continuing instability, economic hardship and the absence of education opportunities for girls as reasons for not returning. (=)

12131. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Herat", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 216. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 20, 1997. Herat UNCHS has held several meetings with communities to identify their problems and requirements. A new women's embroidery and knitting project is to be launched in District 8. Work on culvert repair and construction, garbage bin construction and solid waste disposal continued. UNICEF has distributed medical supplies and office equipment to contractors, the Moslem Youth Association for the Rehabilitation of Afghanistan (MYARA), to carry out health and veterinary sub-projects for women. The authorities have also granted written permission to WFP to hire female monitors for the bakery project, which resumed its activities on 9 January. Thus far, six female staff have been hired to monitor the distribution of bread to female beneficiaries. However, a gathering held on 6 January in Jalalabad, the authorities formally announced the re-opening of the Jalalabad Medical College for male students only, banning female students from the college. (=)

Commission on Human Rights has passed a resolution urging all Afghan parties to observe international human rights standards, with a special focus on the rights of women. [=]

12133. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Human Rights", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 218, June 3, 1997. On 30 May, the Advisory Group on Gender Issues in Afghanistan appealed to Member States and the Credentials Committee of the UN to take careful account of the human rights record of the Taliban Islamic Movement when considering the movement’s application for UN recognition.

The Advisory Group is made up of female and male Afghan and foreign nationals working for NGOs and UN agencies implementing programmes in Afghanistan and for Afghan refugees in other countries. [=]

12134. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities: Herat", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 200, January 14, 1997. On 8 and 9 January, a delegation from the Netherlands Government visited Herat province and held talks with Mullah Abdul Razaq, Governor of Herat, and with heads of UN agencies and NGOs on humanitarian issues, including female education. The mission also visited a tile making factory funded by WFP and a shelter programme for street children funded by UNICEF. UNHCHR Herat reports that 19 families arrived from Qala-i-Now, the capital of Badghis province, mainly because of the cold weather and food shortages. WFP distributed 168 tonnes of wheat to WFP assisted projects, including roads rehabilitation, feeding centres and female projects. UNICEF distributed medical supplies to health centres in Herat and Badghis provinces. WHO provided 200 blood bags with 200 sets of transfusion to Herat Regional Blood Bank and 20 litres of developer and WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP started an office management and administration course for 84 people and formed a committee to manage the bakery project. Wheat prices have risen dramatically: shortages in Pakistan have caused the authorities to ban the export of wheat to Afghanistan. A multi-agency technical coordination committee has been formed for the National Immunization Days in April and May. FAO has run orchard management courses for 128 participants in Jalalabad, Logar, Ghazni and Kandahar. A week-long crop improvement training course for participants from all over Afghanistan has taken place in Peshawar.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed 630 MT food aid in northern Afghanistan in early March and provided 534 MT wheatflour to bakeries. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP started an office management and administration course for 84 people and formed a committee to manage the bakery project. Wheat prices have risen dramatically: shortages in Pakistan have caused the authorities to ban the export of wheat to Afghanistan. A multi-agency technical coordination committee has been formed for the National Immunization Days in April and May. FAO has run orchard management courses for 128 participants in Jalalabad, Logar, Ghazni and Kandahar. A week-long crop improvement training course for participants from all over Afghanistan has taken place in Peshawar.

12135. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities: Jalalabad", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 200, January 14, 1997. WFP received 9 convoys of UN and commercial trucks carrying 3174 tonnes of wheat and wheat flour from Peshawar and despatched 500 tonnes of wheat and wheat flour from Jalalabad to Kabul. WHO distributed medical supplies to clinics and hospitals in the eastern region and continued work on its warehouse. UNHCHR completed the rehabilitation of primary schools in Qalai Janan Khan and Mia Omar No.2 girls’ school in Nangarhar and donated 60 blankets to the Orphan Association Centre in Jalalabad. UNOCHA distributed 400 quilts to widows and vulnerable persons in New Hadda camp. [=]

12136. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 208. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 19, 1997. Herat: IDPs arriving in Herat will now find only temporary shelter at Shahidai camp. All families that have arrived in the camp since 20 February are being rehoused: ICRC and the local authorities have this week moved 400 families to Rashwan, with assistance from UNHCHR. UNHCHR received a 12-MT consignment of kerosene from Turkmenistan this week. WFP provided just over 300 MT wheat to 1430 families who have finished water Department work in Musa Qala, Helmand. Health sector activities are ongoing: on 16 March, WHO started a training workshop on basic development needs/quality of life in Gazarah. Jalalabad: WHO distributed 600 kg of medicines to clinics and hospitals in the eastern region. The organization also investigated an outbreak of typhoid in Nizarian, which affected 46 people and killed two and identified the spring from which polluted water was coming. UNOPS completed work on the Parwayne Canal in Alining, Laghman. UNICEF social mobilization teams from Laghman and Jalalabad have started work in villages in Qarghyee district. Alongside its ongoing crop enhancement work, FAO prepared land for planting sweetcorn and surveyed land for vegetable planting.

Kabul: UNHCR, UNICEF and AREA continued to distribute assistance to vulnerable families in District 10. UNICEF completed work on five boreholes and nine handpumps, providing clean drinking water to 4000 people. UNICEF continued EPI activities in 92 fixed locations and cooperated with AVICEN to treat 98 children from the Tarana Maskan Orphanage. A 47-truck convoy carrying wheat flour, edible fat and pulses has arrived from Peshawar. A food-for-work flood protection project in District 6 is providing food for 44 men. UNCHS met with the Chancellor of Kabul University and Ministry of Power to discuss future rehabilitation programmes.

Kandahar: WHO launched a new “healthy village” project at Karte Molim. This will include water supplies, health education and sanitation. The US$96000 project will take six months to complete and will benefit 5000 people. WFP is contributing 27MT wheat. UNHCR has approved five vocational training projects for the disabled. UNHCR has also carried out missions to remote parts of Helmand and Ourzegan with the aim of assisting returnees in these outlying areas. WFP started an office management and administration course for 84 people and formed a committee to manage the bakery project. Wheat prices have risen dramatically: shortages in Pakistan have caused the authorities to ban the export of wheat to Afghanistan. A multi-agency technical coordination committee has been formed for the National Immunization Days in April and May. FAO has run orchard management courses for 128 participants in Jalalabad, Logar, Ghazni and Kandahar. A week-long crop improvement training course for participants from all over Afghanistan has taken place in Peshawar.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed 630 MT food aid in northern Afghanistan in early March and provided 534 MT wheatflour to bakeries. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP trained another group of 15 farmers in land preparation for improved seed cultivation. UNOPS installed two water storage tanks in Mangajik, Jawzan and ran vocational skills and income generation training in Samangan. [=]

12137. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 209. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, March 26, 1997. Faizabad: WHO and a shelter programme for street children funded by UNICEF. UNHCR Herat reports that 19 families arrived from Qala-i-Now, the capital of Badghis province, mainly because of the cold weather and food shortages. WFP distributed 168 tonnes of wheat to WFP assisted projects, including roads rehabilitation, feeding centres and female projects. UNICEF distributed medical supplies to health centres in Herat and Badghis provinces. WHO provided 200 blood bags with 200 sets of transfusion to Herat Regional Blood Bank and 20 litres of developer and WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP started an office management and administration course for 84 people and formed a committee to manage the bakery project. Wheat prices have risen dramatically: shortages in Pakistan have caused the authorities to ban the export of wheat to Afghanistan. A multi-agency technical coordination committee has been formed for the National Immunization Days in April and May. FAO has run orchard management courses for 128 participants in Jalalabad, Logar, Ghazni and Kandahar. A week-long crop improvement training course for participants from all over Afghanistan has taken place in Peshawar.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed 630 MT food aid in northern Afghanistan in early March and provided 534 MT wheatflour to bakeries. WFP has also supplied wheat to food-for-work projects in the provinces of Baghlan, Saripul and Balkh. WFP trained another group of 15 farmers in land preparation for improved seed cultivation. UNOPS installed two water storage tanks in Mangajik, Jawzan and ran vocational skills and income generation training in Samangan. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan

---

Peshawar. UNCHS has signed a contract with the Municipal Road Construction Department to rehabilitate secondary roads and up-grade drainage.

Kandahar: A temporary shortage of milled wheat stalled WFP's bakery project for three days but supplies have been replenished and bakeries are functioning again. Almost 100000 loaves have been baked so far, and bread sales have generated just under 4000 rupees.

FAO is conducting herbicide tests in the district of Dand, and has distributed fruit tree saplings in Helmand, Kandahar, Uruzgon and Zabol. FAO also reported an outbreak of rabies between Grishk and Dilaram.

WHO is training 1800 people to take part in the Mass Immunization Days. UNICEF sent just under half a million polio vaccine doses to Herat, and received more than half a million doses for the southern region.

Mazar-i-Sharif: UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP and Oxfam together provided food and basic household equipment to 82 IDP families in Hairatan. WFP distributed 655MT food to ongoing projects in the north of the country.

FAO ran a series of training workshops on technical guidelines for orchard-management. Workshop participants included representatives from MADERA, ISRA, IRC, MCI and ADA.

UNCHCR, UNICEF, WFP and the local authorities reached agreement on plans for construction of a maternity hospital in Maimana, Faryab province. UNICEF and MSF vaccinated more than 3000 children against measles in IDP settlements in Mazar and Pul-e-Khumri. UNICEF and SCF-US ran a public healthcare workshop for senior health-workers in Jawzan.

A UNICEF mission to Maimana reported that 62 women were generating income through bakery and carpet weaving projects.

An Oxfam-led project to repair irrigation systems in Kilagia, Baghlan province, has been completed, providing water to several thousand hectares of farmland. Oxfam has also completed reconstruction of a school in Khulum town. The school will provide education for 600 girls.

UNCHS planted more 1250 trees of different varieties in Mazar, as well as carrying out road, drainage, waste disposal and water supply projects. UNOPS is providing skills and income-generation training for 45 people in Samangan province. [=]

UNCHS carried out road repairs, among them work on a ring road to the north of Mazar city. Five schools -- two for girls, three for boys -- are being built or rehabilitated. Other activities include well-drilling and the repair and installation of water pumps, in cooperation with beneficiary communities.

A preliminary report on the National immunization Days indicates that 1.96 million children from eight provinces were immunized against polio.

UNCHS has provided health kits and medical equipment to IAM and MSF. UNICEF is also cooperating with the Balkh Rehabilitation Association, an Afghan NGO headed by a female engineer whose projects include water supply activities.

New NGO, Motivation, has arrived in Mazar as an implementing partner of CDAP, the UN's Comprehensive Disabled Afghan's Project. Motivation is to conduct a training workshop for the disabled in Mazar. [=]

Kandahar: WHO has enrolled 22800 beneficiaries for its subsidized bakery project, as a result of a joint UN/local authority registration initiative. It has also approved three hospital feeding projects for 560 patients and staff for a six month period, as well as two income-generating projects benefiting 220 women in Kandahar and Lashkargah. Emergency food supplies will be distributed to some 6400 poor residents of Lashkargah city.

WHO provided 300kg of essential and anti-TB drugs to Mir Wais Hospital in Kandahar. WHO and UNICEF report that the April National Immunization Days exceeded expected targets in Helmand, Kandahar and Uruzgon provinces.

FAO reported an escalating bird problem: in some parts of Kandahar birds have destroyed 30% of the wheat crop.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed a total of 875 tonnes of wheat to the bakery project, wheat-for-training and food-for-work activities.

UNCHS carried out road repairs, among them work on a ring road to the north of Mazar city. Five schools -- two for girls, three for boys -- are being built or rehabilitated. Other activities include well-drilling and the repair and installation of water pumps, in cooperation with beneficiary communities.

A preliminary report on the National immunization Days indicates that 1.96 million children from eight provinces were immunized against polio.

UNCHS has provided health kits and medical equipment to IAM and MSF. UNICEF is also cooperating with the Balkh Rehabilitation Association, an Afghan NGO headed by a female engineer whose projects include water supply activities.

New NGO, Motivation, has arrived in Mazar as an implementing partner of CDAP, the UN's Comprehensive Disabled Afghan's Project. Motivation is to conduct a training workshop for the disabled in Mazar. [=]

12139. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 217. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 28, 1997. Gardez: UNOCHA has this month reopened its office in Gardez. One of the principal aims is to help provide support during the summer repatriation season. So far this year, a total of 7408 people have returned to Afghanistan from Pakistan's North West Frontier Province, but repatriation is likely to pick up over the summer.

UNCHS carried out road repairs, among them work on a ring road to the north of Mazar city. Five schools -- two for girls, three for boys -- are being built or rehabilitated. Other activities include well-drilling and the repair and installation of water pumps, in cooperation with beneficiary communities.

A preliminary report on the National immunization Days indicates that 1.96 million children from eight provinces were immunized against polio.

UNCHS has provided health kits and medical equipment to IAM and MSF. UNICEF is also cooperating with the Balkh Rehabilitation Association, an Afghan NGO headed by a female engineer whose projects include water supply activities.

New NGO, Motivation, has arrived in Mazar as an implementing partner of CDAP, the UN's Comprehensive Disabled Afghan's Project. Motivation is to conduct a training workshop for the disabled in Mazar. [=]

UNCHS has provided health kits and medical equipment to IAM and MSF. UNICEF is also cooperating with the Balkh Rehabilitation Association, an Afghan NGO headed by a female engineer whose projects include water supply activities.

New NGO, Motivation, has arrived in Mazar as an implementing partner of CDAP, the UN's Comprehensive Disabled Afghan's Project. Motivation is to conduct a training workshop for the disabled in Mazar. [=]
WHO plans to rehabilitate Rabia Balkhi, Ibni Sina Emergency, and the Infectious Disease Hospitals. As a first step, it has helped repair the transmission line that provides power to the hospitals. The organization also ran two TB training courses for 24 doctors and 24 nurses.

UNICEF staff visited Logar with representatives from the Ministry of Public Health, AMI, and SCA. The mission met at the AMI hospital in Baraki for discussions on primary healthcare in the province.

UNCHR distributed loans to 100 widows under its revolving fund project.

WFP distributed 253 tonnes of mixed food. A 22-truck convoy brought 454 tonnes of wheat and wheatflour, plus non-food items. WFP expects 25 food convoys to arrive in Kabul over the next month.

UNCHS and the Kabul Municipality have rehabilitated a pump station to irrigate the park in Wazir Akbar Khan Mina. UNCHS is currently involving 160 local workers in neighbourhood upgrading/rehabilitation activities. Including drainage improvements, up-grading of access (e.g. repairing the steps leading up Kabul's many steep hills), and gabion wire weaving.

Kandahar: The recent polio immunization campaign reached 60119 Sentinel village lives in Kandahar.

Reports from other provinces and outlying districts have still to come in.

WFP distributed 404 tonnes of wheat to bakery and food-for-work projects.

UNICEF established two fixed vaccination centres in Nimroz and distributed tarpaulin and high-protein biscuits to primary schools and mother and child healthcare clinics in Jaguri district, Ghazni.

UNDCP has begun meetings in target districts for its anti-poppy initiative. The aim is to provide farmers with incentives to stop growing opium poppies. These include offers of assistance to start growing fruit, vegetables and other crops.

After lengthy negotiations, the UNCHR-supported Grameen Bank micro-credit project has now definitely been closed by the local authorities. [=]

12140. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 224. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, July 15, 1997. Gardez: CARE International has planted apricot, pear, and almond trees in Melan village, with a view to reducing soil erosion as well as providing food and income. CARE is currently working on 10 water-related projects which will benefit over 1000 families in the Melan area. Between 26 June and 11 July, 92 returning refugee families received repatriation cash hand-outs. The cash is provided by UNCHR and channelled through the International Rescue Committee.

Herat: FAO distributed 3 tonnes of chemicals to combat the sunnepust outbreak in Herat and Badghis. Ten hectares of fodder seed were harvested. Threshing and weighing of various trial crops continues. UNCHS this week removed 186 cubic metres of solid waste from Herat city. The programme has made a new agreement with WFP under which WFP provides 887 tonnes of wheat for food-for-work projects. This will enable UNCHS to expand activities such as waste removal. WFP provided 25.4 tonnes of wheat at Minaret Two camp, and gave 10 tonnes of food as food-for-work payment for IDP management staff. WHO ran a five-day training course for 20 participants, who learnt how to identify and treat minor ailments, and how to refer more serious problems to higher authorities. WFP provided food for 365 traditional birth attendants who participated in a WHO training course. Over the past week, WFP has donated 600 tonnes of food to different projects in the region. Communities in Sorkhrud have provided labour and materials to support UNICEF's mine construction work. Work was completed on two handpumps in Sorkhrud. Work is also ongoing on well construction in Quargha. Preparations are underway for the upcoming oral rehydration therapy campaign.

Kabul: WHO distributed 5000 mosquito nets to Health Net International to help prevent and control leishmaniasis. UNICEF and the MoPH chlorinated a further 11500 wells. Work is beginning on analysing data on the psychosocial assessment of children in Kabul. WFP has agreed to give UNCHR 700 tonnes of wheat for projects in the Azro district, Logar. WFP this week distributed 174 tonnes of mixed food and approved three food-for-work projects to be carried out by UNCHS. Mine awareness and clearance activities continue, but the continuing conflict north of the city makes it impossible for clearance teams to operate beyond Shakardar district. The Ministry of Interior and ICRC have asked for Pull-i-Charki jail to be cleared of mines and other unexploded bombs.

Mazar-i-Sharif: The Afghan/Uzbek border is still closed, making it difficult to get supplies into the region, with the result that some essential commodities are becoming scarce and transport is very expensive. UNICEF distributed medicines to Maimana. WHO took 2.5 tonnes of medical, surgical and laboratory supplies to health clinics in Mazar, Aybak and Shibarghan. Tajik and Afghan authorities have met with UNCHR to discuss repatriation of Tajik refugees through Shirkhan Bandar. Repatriation from Tajik refugees currently in Kunduz will begin on 17 July, when a group of 250-300 refugees are expected to return. Repatriation will take place on Tuesdays, Thursday and Saturdays until all those who wish to go home have done so. Consultations about the possibility of returning refugees from Mazar are also taking place. The joint UN/ICRC/NGO relief taskforce estimates that there are 200000 vulnerable people (including increasing numbers of IDPs) in the region. Conditions for IDPs and other vulnerable groups are deteriorating due to the cumulative effects of the fighting, the closure of the Uzbek border and the fact that the harvest was badly affected by the spring floods. MSF reports an increased level of malnutrition, especially children in the former IDP camp in Kamaz, a suburb of Mazar. [=]

12141. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 225. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, July 22, 1997. Gardez: WFP is providing food-for-work to support an Austrian Relief Committee (ARC) project to carry out irrigation work, grafting, and pruning in the Terra Gardens. ARC has some 1500 trees (including acacias and Russian willows) to plant next spring, and around 5000 fruit trees for planting in spring 1999.

A UNCHR mission is surveying areas where returners have already established homes, and looking at others where new returners may settle. UNCHS reports that one refurbished community centre has been handed over to local residents, and building work on more four centres is progressing well.

WFP distributed wheat and sugar to IDPs in Rawza Camp. A further consignment of wheat is expected to arrive this week.

FAO Livestock distributed 127000 doses of anthrax and black quarter vaccines to veterinary field units (VFUs).

FAO Crops distributed maize, fertilizer and black gram in districts where the P.E.A.C.E. initiative has been launched in Farah. FAO also investigated the crop disease situation in Zindahjan, Ghorian and Kohsan districts and discussed control measures with farmers. Melon fly control experiments were carried out in Kushk and Khuja Mula villages.

Jalalabad: FAO activities have focused on improving maize, bean and rice cultivation. WHO has cleaned a total of 1.5 km of ditches so far this month. A further 10 latrines have been constructed (in Reg-Shah Mard Khan) and another 15 are being constructed. Medical supplies were distributed to health clinics and food provided to 32 TB patients.

UNCHR met with representatives from five villages in Kunar and Nangarhar to discuss the needs of returnees. UNICEF installed four hand pumps in Surkh Rud district.

Kabul: UNCHR is looking into the possibility of launching another four revolving fund project cycles in Kabul.

A battlefield clearance team is to clean the interior of Pul-i-Charki jail, in response to requests from IRCR and the acting Ministry of Interior.

WFP is to provide almost 2000 tonnes of food-for-work for three projects that will be carried out with UNCHS: water supply, the recycling of materials from destroyed houses and sanitation improvements.

WFP will also provide 268 tonnes of food-for-work to support WHO in the rehabilitation of hospitals in Kabul.

A convoy bringing 300 tonnes of wheatflour arrived in Kabul this week.

UNCHS has completed repair work on 780 square metres of asphalt road. A variety of UNCHS projects are providing employment opportunities to some 7500 local workers.

UNCHS has supported middle-management training for Ministry of Public Health EPI staff in Ghazni. The organization is carrying out extended immunization activities in 113 fixed and outreach centres.

Radio Shariat continues to broadcast public service announcements on health and hygiene issues.

Mazar-i-Sharif: Two convoys took around 400 refugees from Kunduz province back to Tajikistan. Numbers in each of the three-weekly repatriation exercises will, in future, be restricted to 150 returners, to relieve pressure on the barge that takes them across the Oxus river.

The refugee transit centre at Shir Khan Bandar has now been vacated by the Jumish forces that have occupied it for the past six months, and is once again being used by refugees.

UNCHS and the municipality, this week, inaugurated a public toilet switch to other income generating initiatives, UNDCP has carried out a participatory planning survey of villages in Ghorak, Khakriz and Maiwand and identified priority requests for engineering and agricultural activities.

The ongoing conflict makes mine action activities impossible.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

UNICEF reports that female Afghan staff, who had been prohibited from working following the political changes in May, are now back at work at UNICEF and UNOPS.

UNCHS and the municipality, this week, inaugurated a public toilet in Mazar's central commercial area. The facility is for use by men and women, and access for disabled people has been provided.

UNCHS is also working with the Mazar water laboratory and public health department to ensure that locally made carbonated drinks are safe for consumption.

UNCHS has distributed literacy materials to 50 school classes in Mazar, and taken medical supplies to provincial hospitals and health centres in the north.

FAO Livestock supplied 350 chicks to 34 women. The women, who are participating in a livestock improvement/income generating programme, were also given 720 kg of feed.

UNCHS and the municipality, this week, inaugurated a public toilet in Mazar's central commercial area. The facility is for use by men and women, and access for disabled people has been provided.

UNCHS is also working with the Mazar water laboratory and public health department to ensure that locally made carbonated drinks are safe for consumption.

12142. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 229. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, August 20, 1997. Gardez: The Swedish Committee for Afghanistan, assisted by UNOCHA, has vaccinated 1800 children against measles. The vaccinations were provided by UNICEF via the Norwegian Afghanistan Committee. The MoPH vaccinated a further 400 children.

IRC has now provided technical training for 89 farmers. A further 70 farmers have been trained as community trainers in the field of pest management.

A WFP mission from Kabul monitored WFP-funded projects in the Gardez region, including the Afghan Disabled Society's footwear workshop in which 40 handicapped people produce 30 to 40 pairs of shoes per day. It was agreed that funds generated by the centre should be reinvested to enable trainees to continue to manufacture shoes once their apprenticeship has been completed.

Herat: WFP received 1035 tonnes of wheat from the EU via Turghundi. FAO was given 175 tonnes to exchange for improved wheat and barley seed -- this week 30 tonnes of wheat was traded for 24 tonnes of improved seed. Wheat was also supplied to some 3800 IDPs and to workers involved in UNCHS city sanitation activities.

FAO Livestock has supported veterinary services association in Herat. FAO this week, distributed 10 tonnes of wheat that was no longer suitable for human consumption to poultry farms.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

WHO distributed medical supplies to hospitals and clinics, and is working on a sanitation project for the city.

UNCHS water supply projects are ongoing in Lashkar Gah, Dand and Panjwai. A three-week-long EPI refresher training course for 20 participants has been completed.

UNICEF provided IAW with teaching materials for use in IDP camps and distributed office supplies to EPI units, fortified biscuits to Gosalah Health Clinic, and essential drug kits to IDP camps. Work began on improving 126 wells and 300 dry vault latrines in Enjil District.

Jalalabad: In preparation for launching P.E.A.C.E. programme activities in areas to which refugees are returning from Pakistan, a joint UNCHR, UNDP, FAO (Crops and Livestock), UNOCHA, UNOPS and UNCHS needs assessment mission visited Tezeen district in Sorobi and Azra district in Lagar.

WHO has repaired X-ray machines in Wazir Akbar Khan and Ali Abad hospitals, as well as the Chest Clinic. Two new X-ray machines have been installed in MoPH's radiology institute.

The refugee transit centre at Shirkhan Bandar has now been vacated by the Jumish forces that have occupied it for the past six months, and is once again being used by refugees.

UNCHS and the municipality, this week, inaugurated a public toilet switch to other income generating initiatives, UNDCP has carried out a participatory planning survey of villages in Ghorak, Khakriz and Maiwand and identified priority requests for engineering and agricultural activities.

Under its pilot shelter project, UNCHS has distributed doors and windows to 40 returning families to enable them to rehabilitate war-damaged houses in District 3.

The ongoing conflict makes mine action activities impossible.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

WHO distributed medical supplies to hospitals and clinics, and is working on a sanitation project for the city.

UNCHS water supply projects are ongoing in Lashkar Gah, Dand and Panjwai. A three-week-long EPI refresher training course for 20 participants has been completed.

FAO Livestock has supported veterinary services association in Herat. FAO this week, distributed 10 tonnes of wheat that was no longer suitable for human consumption to poultry farms.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

WHO distributed medical supplies to hospitals and clinics, and is working on a sanitation project for the city.

UNCHS water supply projects are ongoing in Lashkar Gah, Dand and Panjwai. A three-week-long EPI refresher training course for 20 participants has been completed.

FAO Livestock has supported veterinary services association in Herat. FAO this week, distributed 10 tonnes of wheat that was no longer suitable for human consumption to poultry farms.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

WHO distributed medical supplies to hospitals and clinics, and is working on a sanitation project for the city.

UNCHS water supply projects are ongoing in Lashkar Gah, Dand and Panjwai. A three-week-long EPI refresher training course for 20 participants has been completed.

FAO Livestock has supported veterinary services association in Herat. FAO this week, distributed 10 tonnes of wheat that was no longer suitable for human consumption to poultry farms.

UNCHS has surveyed streets in Area 2 and met the mayor to discuss solid waste disposal activities.

WHO distributed medical supplies to hospitals and clinics, and is working on a sanitation project for the city.

UNCHS water supply projects are ongoing in Lashkar Gah, Dand and Panjwai. A three-week-long EPI refresher training course for 20 participants has been completed.

FAO Livestock has supported veterinary services association in Herat. FAO this week, distributed 10 tonnes of wheat that was no longer suitable for human consumption to poultry farms.
training course for 27 participants. GBR activities are to begin in Pakiwi, Arghandab, Shegi, Dand and Kandahar.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed 165 tonnes of food aid to just under 10000 beneficiaries in Balkhi. Recipients included refugees in Sakhi camp and people involved in food-for-seeds projects and other identified as being in need of assistance.

A WFP-supported road rehabilitation project in Dawlatabad district, Balkh is almost complete. Some 950 people have received food in exchange for working on this project.

UNCHS is launching a beekeeping and honey production project as part of its drive to build up income generating capacity.

UNCHCR has so far helped 2500 refugees return to Tajikistan from Kunduz via Shirfkan Bandar. A further 150 people are expected to leave Sakhi Camp and return home via the Shirfkan Bandar route.

UNOPS is working to establish sub-offices in the norther areas, as part of its preparations to launching the P.E.A.C.E. programme here. A base has now been set up in Yakawlang, but efforts to establish a station in Faizabad are being thwarted by transport problems.

WFP is carrying out a rapid assessment of IDPs in Pul-i-Khumri wishing to return to Charakar. The Halo Trust is expected to start mine awareness training for IDPs returning to Charakar, Shomali and Ghorband. [=]

12143. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 207, March 11, 1997. Herat: ICRC has begun distributing food blankets and plastic sheeting to IDPs in Badghis and has sent five trucks from Herat to Qala-i-Nau for further distributions. UNCHR provided 14 school tents for new arrivals at Shahidi Camp and supplies 56000 litres of kerosene to 2800 families in all the camps around Herat except for Rawza Bagh. UNICEF supplied Shahidi with 14 hand pumps and has also distributed medical supplies, high-proteinbiscuits and posters. FAO procured and processed 3MT green gram and 25MT wheat seed in western regions, as well as carrying out irrigation work.

Jalalabad: FAO has distributed just under 1600MT wheat seed in eastern Afghanistan and procured rice, mung bean and maize seed for summer crops. As well as distributing animal vaccines to veterinary clinics, FAO provided eight small motorbikes to different veterinary centres. WHO is to this week run a training workshop for doctors and nurses on clinical treatment of malaria. The organization is to establish a TBA laboratory in Jalalabad public health hospital and will be working with other UN agencies on the complete rehabilitation of the city’s water supply network. There are also plans to rehabilitate drainage ditches and construct improved ventilated pit latrines in some parts of the city. UNCHR handed over three completed school buildings to local Kabul, UNCHS has helped draft water supply/sanitation guidelines for people living in Microraian. 3 have been given a small UNCHR grant to restore electricity to just over 900 homes.

As well as its ongoing work to repair municipal infrastructure in Kabul, UNCHS has helped draft water supply/sanitation guidelines for future programmes. Also involved in the drafting: the water department, CARE, Solidarites, IAM, and OXFAM. UNCHS is soon to begin work on the complete rehabilitation of the city's water supply network. There are also plans to rehabilitate drainage ditches and grant to restore electricity to just over 900 homes.

Jalalabad: FAO has distributed just under 1600MT wheat seed in eastern Afghanistan and procured rice, mung bean and maize seed for summer crops. As well as distributing animal vaccines to veterinary clinics, FAO provided eight small motorbikes to different veterinary centres. WHO is to this week run a training workshop for doctors and nurses on clinical treatment of malaria. The organization is to establish a TBA laboratory in Jalalabad public health hospital and will be working with other UN agencies on the complete rehabilitation of the city’s water supply network. There are also plans to rehabilitate drainage ditches and construct improved ventilated pit latrines in some parts of the city. UNCHR handed over three completed school buildings to local communities, one in Jalalabad city and the other two in Shinwar and Mohamandara. IFCR are currently treating some 10000 patients per month in Afghan Red Crescent clinics in eastern Afghanistan. Around 6000 patients receive health education via the clinics. IFCR and ARSIC have launched a joint winter assistance programme for about 10000 families in remote mountainous areas in Kunar and Nuristan. Beneficiaries receive blankets, food and fuel. The Swedish Committee of Afghanistan is supporting primary schools in four provinces and running a Women's Basic Education Vocational Training programme which trains 12500 women per year, IAM plans to add to its eyecare clinics by opening new clinics in Laghman and Kunar. Sandy Gall has started producing a new wheelchair and aims to distribute the improved model throughout Afghanistan.

Kabul: Radio Shariat has agreed to broadcast twice-daily alerts about UNICEF's EPI programme. UNICEF and AREA are carrying out a joint distribution of assistance to just under 6000 vulnerable families in District 10. UNICEF is also working with the Ministry of Rural Rehabilitation and Development to provide safe drinking water to 2000 people. WFP Peshawar sent 62 trucks with 1400MT wheat flour, edible oil and pulses. Approval has been given to the Muslim Sisters' Association to run a quilt-making project for 1600 widows and for the International Assistance Mission to teach English as a foreign language to 260 students. Medair is to clean the Zoo Canal.

Kandahar: FAO has trained staff in horticulture and pest management and sent them out to pass on their knowledge to local farmers. The WFP bakery project got under way on 6 March and distributed 268MT wheat for the first phase. WHO distributed 400kg essential drugs to Maiwand and Khasuruzgon Health Centres. The organization has identified three doctors and one nurse who will go to Jalalabad to attend a three-month training course on district health practices. [=]
FAO started a course for 21 veterinarians as part of its programme to maintain regular contact with farmers and veterinary field units. FAO has distributed vaccines to pre-empt the seasonal anthrax outbreak and provided eggs to graduates from a previous poultry production course in Dehday and Balkh.

UNOPS is supporting the production of health-related audio-visual materials and videos via SERVE. A film on TB is shortly to be aired on Mazar TV. Another programme on diarrhoea is being produced. Oxfam ran a two-day leadership training workshop for 30 women from Baghlan and Samangan. The women are all members of the Women's Management Group, the workshop was a component of Oxfam's programme to promote good governance at village level. [=]

Herat: ICRC has provided a two-month supply of food to more than 4500 IDPs in Maslorgh and Rawashan camps. Jalalabad: A two-week WHO training course for 11 anaesthetists ended on 8 April. Ten latrines have been built in Reg-i-Shamat Khan district.

WFP has identified 7500 families for addition to the lists of those eligible to benefit from the subsidized bakery project. UNICEF reports that progress has been made on water supply work in the Quarghaye district of Laghman province. Kabul: After consultation with the local authorities, WHO plans to embark on income-generation projects in Shakkardara district.

The installation of two new handpumps and repairs to twelve more will ensure supplies of safe drinking water to 8000 people. A further 4000 will benefit from rehabilitation of the Qalau-i-Bakhtyar piped water system carried out by UNICEF and the Department of Rural Rehabilitation.

UNCHR is working with the Ministry of Repatriation to survey and monitor women's income generation activities aimed at returnees, displaced people and local widows. A quilt-making project, which supports 1600 widows, has now delivered just under 8000 quilts for distribution by UNHCR.

UNHCR is also to support an ASCIANA basic education and vocational training project for street working children. This will assist 250 children in Share Naw and Khaier Khana.

Sandy Gall's Afghanistan Appeal (SGAA) officially opened its new orthotic, prosthetic and physiotherapy centre on 10 May. The new centre merges the two centres previously located in Charikar and Hatabad (Pakistan). Apart from a small liaison office in Peshawar, all SGAA activities are now based in Afghanistan.

ICRC food-for-work programmes in Kabul this week involved 180 workers who gathered up combustible materials and plastic bags for recycling; some 2340 families headed by disabled and handicapped people and 78 ARCS volunteers who helped distribute food.

In rural areas, ICRC is providing food for some of the poorest residents of the Shomali valley in exchange for spraying fruit trees and vineyards with insecticides. Canals and other irrigation channels were cleared in Kabul province under other food-for-work programmes.

Kandahar: UNICEF this week completed work on the Qalat water supply and distributed health kits and drugs to mother and child healthcare clinics in Kandahar, Lashkar Gah and Uruzgan. WHO provided 1 tonne of drugs to the Lashkar Gah hospital.

The Norwegian government has given FAO new storage facilities for community seed growers in Helmand/Grishk. Two similar Rubb-hall structures will be installed in Kandahar soon. FAO distributed fruit tree mother stock and apple rootstocks, monitored nurseries and arranged pruning demonstrations in private orchards.

Mazar-i-Sharif: FAO held a week-long workshop with GAA/EU on horticulture for government employees, NGOs and farmers from Baghlan, Samangan, Balkh, Jozjan and Faryab. UNCHS constructed five municipal garbage bins in Mazar city and experimented with new latrine cleaning technology. UNHCR, UNICEF and the local community in Maimana (Faryab) are to carry out a joint water supply project. UNHCR and the Department of Culture have opened a new public library in Mazar. WFP distributed 467 tonnes of wheat and WHO delivered supplies to medical centres. [=]

12146. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 218, June 3, 1997. Gardez: WFP is supplying cash and wheat to AMRAN in support of a women's programme which involves some 880 women in gem processing, embroidery, carpet weaving and making nylon shopping bags. The women work at home but meet together from time to time to discuss progress.

IRC and FAO activities focusing on seed production, poultry rearing and forestry are ongoing. Herat: FAO distributed 1 tonne of maize seed and 1.5 tonnes of fertiliser in Farah. Chemicals were also provided to combat the sunnpest outbreak in Kushk, Gulran and Kuski-Kona.

UNCHS removed 190 tonnes of solid waste from the city over the past week, with assistance from IDPs. In cooperation with the Municipality, UNCHS produced almost 100 concrete slabs for upgrading culverts and worked with community groups to construct garbage bins. WFP gave wheat, oil and sugar to 286 widows and other vulnerable women working on home-based training projects being carried out by ARCS.

Who distributed malaria medicines to Shindand Hospital and the Herat Malaria Department, and provided reagents for Herat Regional Hospital.

Jalalabad: Wheat and vegetable harvests are in progress, with some of the wheat being kept for seed next year. Two truckloads of agricultural machinery have been sent on to Kandahar and Ghazni, and another two truckloads remained in Jalalabad for use by FAO here. WHO reported that the health situation in the region is "stable". WHO has carried out drainage and sanitation activities and distributes medical supplies to clinics and village health volunteers.

UNHCR has completed work on road repairs in Achin District, Nangahar, benefitting 1000 people and on a water supply network in Spinghar District, benefitting 700 people. At the request of the public health authorities in Laghman, UNICEF visited the Rural Rehabilitation Development Department's health clinic in Laghman. UNICEF has agreed to support the clinic in activities which benefit women and children.

UNICEF also funded and provided technical support for a three-day training course on hand-pump installation and drilling, run by the Rural Rehabilitation Development Department.

A 20000 litre water tanker was delivered to the municipality to provide water to areas of Jalalabad that do not have access to safe drinking water.

Kabul: On 31 May, around 500 local residents joined 1000 municipal workers, 10 UNCHS supervisors and 70 labourers employed by CARE and UNICEF in cleaning rubbish off streets and excavating and repairing ditches and roads in central Kabul.

UNHCR has completed its cash loan distribution to 100 women in District 16 and is currently identifying 100 more women in District 10 who will benefit from the next phase in the scheme. UNHCR's ongoing blanket-making project for 50 returnees and IDPs has so far produced 1500 blankets.

UNICEF supplied oral rehydration therapy kits to Aide Medecine Internationale to enable them to establish rehydration therapy outlets in 10 mother and child health clinics in Kabul. WHO provided training in TB microscopy to 13 lab technicians and ran a course in diphtherial diseases for 20 participants.

WFP received three convoys of wheat and wheat flour over the past week and distributed 970 tonnes of different foodstuffs to projects in the region. In addition, 106 tonnes of wheat were sent to WFP-assisted projects in Ghazni.
Kandahar: UNICEF handed over the Qalat Town Water rehabilitation project to the Kandahar/Qalat municipal authorities on 27 May. The project, which was supported by WFP and UNOCHA, will provide water for 15000 people.

UNICEF also distributed supplies to mothers and child health clinics and hospitals in Helmand, Kandahar, Nimroz and Zabul.

WHO supplied drugs to Maiwand District. Mazar-i-Sharif: UN programmes in Mazar have been temporarily suspended, although efforts are under way to send 126 tonnes of wheat to Tajik refugees in the Sakhi camp.

International NGOs including MSF, Oxfam and Save the Children are working in what they described today as “improving” security situation. [=]

12147. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Humanitarian Activities”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 219, June 12, 1997. Gardez: Between 35 and 40 families are estimated to have returned to Pakistan over the past week. UNHCR had issued each family with a repatriation handout of 5000 Pakistani rupees and 300 kg wheat. UNHCR also helped cover transport costs. Herat: FAO surveyed pests and natural enemies of aphids in Farah, and held demonstrations of powdery mildew of grapes and wheat smut.

Jalalabad: WHO assessed work on drainage ditches in the city and produced about 100 concrete slabs to cover ditches. Twelve latrines were also completed. More than 100 concrete rings for use in wells have been produced in Surkhund and Qarghaie under UNICEF’s water and sanitation programme. The social mobilizer for these districts reports that local committees are to be formed in two more villages in Surkhund.

Wheat and lentils are being harvested and threshed on FAO demonstration plots. FAO also inspected seed production activities in Nangahar and Kunar.

WFP distributed 207 tonnes of wheat to bakeries and supplied 108 tonnes of food to other projects.

Kabul: UNHCR has identified 100 vulnerable women in District 9 who will benefit from its revolving fund project. Staff continue to assess women in Districts 8 and 10; another 100 women from these districts are to join the project.

WFP distributed 1070 tonnes of wheat and wheat flour in Kabul and sent 106 tonnes of wheat to Ghassani.

WHO continued work on the Ibn Sina Infecions Diseases Hospital in Kabul and distributed medical equipment and drugs to hospitals and clinics.

Around 500 municipal and local workers are benefitting under UNCHS/WFP food-for-work schemes. UNCHS worked with local communities and the municipality to repair almost 800 square metres of asphalt road and to upgrade 5 km of secondary road in District 10. Secondary roads were also gravelled in District 16. In addition, UNCHS watered parks in the city and planted saplings.

On 7 June, UN representatives and senior Taliban authorities attended a workshop organized by the Afghan Campaign to Ban Landmines.

Kandahar: WHO has now completed around 45% of the water supply component of the Healthy Village Project and plans to launch its Zaraj water supply project next week.

UNICEF has signed agreements with DACAAR and the RRD to provide 400 wells in Dand.

WFP distributed 49 tonnes of wheat to 162 returnee families and started up two food-for-work projects and two vulnerable groups feeding projects. WFP estimates that it is helping to feed almost 130000 people in the Kandahar area. [=]

12148. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Humanitarian Activities”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 220, June 20, 1997. Gardez: UNHCR is supporting IRC’s income generation programme which includes activities such as tailoring, soap making, embroidery and training in mechanicals. The programme targets returnees, widows and orphans.

SV Holland is funding an IRC initiative to establish three poultry farms in Zormat district, Pakila and Logar.

UNOCHA, with funds from Norwegian Committee for Afghanistan, has been helping construct two primary schools, one in Koli Khil, Zormat, which was completed and handed over to the authorities on 12 June, and one in Rohani Baba. Two deep wells are currently being dug in Rohabi Baba and 60 houses are under construction.

UNOCHA has completed work on repairing the Gardez airstrip, an activity that provided temporary employment to 30 unemployed people.

IRC reports that 55 families returned to Gardez via Khost this week.

Herat: UNHCR and UNICEF have cooperated to provide temporary shelter to four young boys who were deported from Iran. The case is being followed up in Herat and Mashad.

UNHCR distributed fire extinguishers to Shaidai, Rawza, Minarets, and City Centre IDP camps. ICRC is relocating IDPs from Shaida 2 camp to the new Mazlarkh Camp. WFP distributed 177 tonnes of wheat to more than 11000 IDPs at Shaidai Camp.

UNCHS completed its survey of the main drainage system in the city of Herat and in cooperation with the municipality, removed 154 cubic metres of solid waste.

FAO distributed 500kgs of green gram seeds in three districts of Farah, levelled 5 jerib (about 2 hectares) of land at Falhat Farm, and dispatched pesticides to control the sunnest outbreak in the districts of Gulran and Kushik.

Jalalabad: The FAO Crops programme is preparing the final report of its research programme. The organization has selected four sites for maize demonstration plots in three districts in Nangarhar and Kunar and continued to harvest wheat from demonstration plots.

The FAO Livestock programme trained 110 widows in a poultry raising and distributed 400 doses of vaccines to different veterinary clinics in the region. Twelve trained female basic veterinary workers are currently working in Behsoud.

90 trainees from the IDP camps graduated from UNOCHA/WFP - supported carpentry, welding and masonry courses. WHO awarded certificates to the 24 participants in a three-month course on district health practices in Surkhud.

UNICEF reports that the social mobilizer from RRD Jalalabad has surveyed and helped set up a local shura for Gazak village in Surkhud. The shura will assess and prioritize the health and sanitation needs of the village’s 2430 inhabitants.

WFP provided 15 tonnes of mixed food to AGHCO to support its supplementary feeding programme which benefits 500 malnourished under-fives. WFP estimates that its bakery project is providing food for one-third of the population of Jalalabad.

MADEERA embarked on a drainage project in Mohmandara. The project is being supported by WFP which is providing 900 labourers with food for work.

UNOPS is closing its Jalalabad office and transferring staff to focus on areas covered by the P.E.A.C.E. programme.

Kabul: WHO distributed anti-malarial drugs in Sarobi following a joint mission with the Ministry of Public Health to investigate a reported outbreak of malaria and leishmaniasis. Drugs were also distributed to hospitals in the Kabul region.

Radio Shariat has broadcast public service announcements about UNICEF’s extended immunization programme. UNICEF is making arrangements to carry out polio immunization in Azro district, Logar province, which could not be covered by the main campaign because of flooding. UNICEF is also supporting a regional management team of MoPH staff to plan and carry out intensive primary healthcare and mother and child healthcare programmes in Logar.

Girls are now able to take part in sporting activities in the Tahea Orphanage: 64 girls are taking advantage of this possibility. Initial monitoring of the UNHCR microcredit scheme for vulnerable women indicates that 90% of the participants have embarked on animal husbandry activities.
Aschiana and Wetco have both launched vocational training courses for children to promote self sufficiency. The Aschiana programme is targeting children who work on the streets of Kabul while Wetco focuses on orphans.

WFP estimates that it is providing vulnerable people with almost 295000 subsidized loaves of bread each day.

UNCHS continues to provide fuel for 40 municipal trucks which remove solid waste from the city. Under this project, which is run in conjunction with WFP as a food-for-work scheme, almost 3000 cubic metres of waste were removed. UNCHS has also continued work on repairing asphalt roads and upgrading secondary roads in District 10.

12149. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, "Humanitarian Activities", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 221, June 24, 1997. Gardez: MSF has agreed terms with the deputy governor under which it will take over responsibility for running the in-patient department at the Gardez hospital. A UNHCR mission from Jalalabad is currently reviewing the returnee situation in Pakta and Khost.

Herat: WFP lent ICRC 300 tonnes of wheat for distribution to displaced people who have arrived in Herat over the past four months.

UNCHS began constructing a public sewerage pit in District 7 and excavated 125 cubic metres of sludge. The programme also completed construction of a generator house for the Sultan Aghan water supply improvement project.

UNICEF provided fuel for cold chains in Herat, Saghar district in Ghor and Badghis. The organization also distributed essential drugs and furniture to the Shahiadi IDP camp; food and other supplies to the Regional Malnutrition Ward; timber to the Abu Hanifa emergency shelter project; as well as providing nutritional supplies in Farah and medical goods to the Ghor Provincial Hospital.

Jalalabad: UNHCR has identified the need for three quick-impact projects in Laghman: providing safe drinking water to 30 villages, the construction of a road bridge over the Kabul river, and rehabilitation of a road bridge on the main road to Kabul. Some 50 families are reported to have crossed the border from Pakistan at Torkham this week.

Who is providing traditional birth attendance training for 14 course participants. 20 people received village health visitor training in Chardi district, Nangarhar and another 20 are now being trained in Kunar.

Kabul: OMAR is staging a series of exhibitions to promote mine awareness in densely populated parts of the city: so far more than 5000 people have visited exhibitions in five locations.

UNCHR has signed an agreement with MedAir to provide technical and material assistance to help 1000 returning refugee families rebuild their homes. The first area to be targeted will be in the Mohammed Agha district of Logar.

UNCHS has begun to recycle materials from damaged buildings in District 3, making contact with project beneficiaries via district rehabilitation shuras and municipal district offices. Norwegian Church Aid provided US$17000 to help UNCHS carry out emergency sanitation activities over the summer.

A WHO mission to assess mother and child healthcare departments in Kabul visited Rabia Balkhi Hospital and reported that this needs overall rehabilitation and reconstruction.

As part of UNICEF's ongoing water supply programme 1000 wells were chlorinated this week, in association with the MoPH. Two UN convoys brought 500 tonnes of mixed food to Kabul. WFP distributed 378 tonnes of wheat to different food-for-work and food-for-training projects in Laghman: providing safe drinking water to 30 villages, the WFP distributed 383 tonnes of wheat-flour to the bakery project, 224 tonnes of wheat to different food-for-work and food-for-training projects and 4 tonnes of mixed food to hospitals.

A UNHCR team assessed the need to construct a bridge over the Kabul river in the Shahiadi area of Qarghaee, Laghman - an area regarded as one likely to attract a large number of returning refugees. The team also looked into the need to supply safe drinking water in Qarghaee and decided that this should be addressed.

UNCHR also met with representatives from Kach and Selani to discuss reasons why refugees are not returning to these villages. The team was told that problems included shortage of irrigation water, shelter, schools and health facilities.

Kabul: UNCHS started recycling rubble from destroyed houses in areas that had previously been demined. German Agro Action is working on reconstruction as part of the same initiative. The activity is so popular that people are beginning to move into areas that have not been demined, so emergency mine awareness training is being carried out to reduce the risk of their being harmed.

On 25 June UNCHS, with the National Olympic Committee, involved 250 sportsmen in cleaning up the stadium.

Kandahar: UNICEF is running a public awareness campaign encouraging people to collect bags of chlorine to treat their wells.

WFP distributed 529 tonnes of wheat.
Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 223, July 9, 1997. Preliminary work on the joint WFP/FAO food production survey has now been completed for most of the country, and a full report will be prepared shortly.

Herat: WFP distributed 53 tonnes of wheat in Minaret One and just under 6 tonnes of edible oil in Shaidahi. WFP has also provided 30 tonnes of wheat to 286 women and 44 men engaged in skills training programs implemented by ARCS.

UNICEF has supplied material to enable construction of eight slow sand filters in Enjil district. In addition, UNICEF has provided 2000 doses of measles vaccine to MSF to use with refugees along the Turkoman border.

Over the past two weeks, UNCHS has removed 378 cubic metres of solid waste from Herat city, in conjunction with the municipality. A four day training course on clinical management surveillance of diarrhoeal disease was given by WHO to 21 doctors and nine nurses. Meanwhile, medical and surgical supplies continue to be distributed.

FAO harvested and threshed 22 hectares of improved wheat seed, and 20 hectares of improved black gram and distributed 25 MT of green gram seed.

Kandahar: WFP has proceeded with the distribution of wheat to 1066 families in Kandahar and to 624 IDP families, and has completed the construction of four clinics.

UNHCR distributed beans and tenets for shelter in five districts. Some 40 young boys and men participate in the project.

There are many women who need assistance which can best be given through small-scale and low-profile community-based projects. Herat: Some 45 male and female physicians and nurses participated in two WHO training courses on diarrhoeal control. Together with UNICEF and the Ministry of Public Health, WHO is preparing an Oral Rehydration Therapy action plan.

While the construction of garbage bins for various communities continues, UNCHS has removed 250 cubic metres of solid waste from the city.

This week, WFP distributed 177 MT of wheat at the Shaidi IDP camp, and fumigated 400 MT of wheat against insects. FAO harvested and threshed 22 hectares of improved wheat seed, planted 20 hectares of improved black gram and distributed 25 MT of green gram seed.

Jalalabad: WHO has completed two of the 15 latrines in construction, and 282 slabs for the coverage of drainage ditches are now ready to be placed. A survey of the Laghman water supply system has been completed and water samples are being analyzed.

UNHCR has held meetings with local authorities in Azra district, Logar Province and Sorobi district to discuss the repatriation of refugees back to their villages.

Chlorination of wells has been started by UNICEF, two handpumps were installed and four platforms of wells have been completed in Surkrod district.

Apart from harvesting sweet corn and planting maize, FAO continue their trials on fertilizers in Sheshamgh research farm.

Kabul: Despite the tense military situation, the inaugural ceremony of the rehabilitation of war devastated hospitals took place in Kabul on 20 July. It was attended by Dr. Sarar Salem, WHO sanitary engineer, plus representatives of UN agencies, NGOs and government authorities. The project, which will be completed in nine months, will cost US$434739.

A quilt project involving 1600 vulnerable women has been awarded by UNHCR to an Afghan NGO. Some 8000 quilts will be delivered to UNHCR for 1997/98 relief distribution.

WFP distributed 183208 MT of mixed wheat through various WFP assisted projects. As for its bakery projects, WFP will continue to cover an additional 25% beneficiaries.

While UNICEF continues the health campaign against diarrhoeal diseases and cholera detection with the Ministry of Public Health, a round-table session was organized on Radio Shariat to talk about the goals of the Oral Rehydration Therapy campaign.

UNCHS continues its urban rehabilitation activities including the upgrading of public services in four districts, the construction of flood protection walls, and the improvement of the irrigation system.

Around Kabul, FAO has continued wheat harvesting/thrashing and research trials.

Kandahar: WFP has proceeded with the distribution of wheat to 1066 families in Kandahar and to 624 IDP families, and has completed the construction of four clinics.

UNHCR distributed beans and tenets for shelter in five districts. WHO is monitoring village health projects and distributing medical supplies and equipment to four hospitals in the region.

Mazar-i-Sharif: UNHCR reports that on 27 June, 161 Tajik refugees returned to Tajikistan from Mazar region, bringing the total number of returnees to 715 persons since 17 July. Repatriation from Kunduz is currently going on as well.

A four day training course on clinical management surveillance and prevention of diarrhoeal disease was given by WHO to 21 doctors and nine nurses. Meanwhile, medical and surgical supplies continue to be distributed.

As fuel supplies for UN operations have reached a critical stage in Mazar, UNOCHA has utilized 97556 MT of food aid through food-for-work and institutional feeding projects this week.

During a visit to Pul-e-Khumri to distribute medical supplies, UNICEF discovered that hospital equipment as well as two ambulances had been looted. UNICEF is now trying to recover them.

SCF-UK has begun a needs assessment and survey of child labour in Mazar. They are also working with the local media to emphasize the importance of education.

12153. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Humanitarian Activities”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 227, August 5, 1997. Gardez: A UNOCHA As fuel supplies for UN operations have reached a critical stage in Mazar, UNOCHA has utilized 97556 MT of food aid through food-for-work and institutional feeding projects this week.

There are many women who need assistance which can best be given through small-scale and low-profile community-based projects. Herat: Some 45 male and female physicians and nurses participated in two WHO training courses on diarrhoeal control. Together with UNICEF and the Ministry of Public Health, WHO is preparing an Oral Rehydration Therapy action plan.

While the construction of garbage bins for various communities continues, UNCHS has removed 250 cubic metres of solid waste from the city.

This week, WFP distributed 177 MT of wheat at the Shaidi IDP camp, and fumigated 400 MT of wheat against insects. FAO harvested and threshed 22 hectares of improved wheat seed, planted 20 hectares of improved black gram and distributed 25 MT of green gram seed.

Jalalabad: WHO has completed two of the 15 latrines in construction, and 282 slabs for the coverage of drainage ditches are now ready to be placed. A survey of the Laghman water supply system has been completed and water samples are being analyzed.

UNHCR has held meetings with local authorities in Azra district, Logar Province and Sorobi district to discuss the repatriation of refugees back to their villages.

Chlorination of wells has been started by UNICEF, two handpumps were installed and four platforms of wells have been completed in Surkrod district.

Apart from harvesting sweet corn and planting maize, FAO continue their trials on fertilizers in Sheshamgh research farm.

Kabul: Despite the tense military situation, the inaugural ceremony of the rehabilitation of war devastated hospitals took place in Kabul on 20 July. It was attended by Dr. Sarar Salem, WHO sanitary engineer, plus representatives of UN agencies, NGOs and government authorities. The project, which will be completed in nine months, will cost US$434739.

A quilt project involving 1600 vulnerable women has been awarded by UNHCR to an Afghan NGO. Some 8000 quilts will be delivered to UNHCR for 1997/98 relief distribution.

WFP distributed 183208 MT of mixed wheat through various WFP assisted projects. As for its bakery projects, WFP will continue to cover an additional 25% beneficiaries.

While UNICEF continues the health campaign against diarrhoeal diseases and cholera detection with the Ministry of Public Health, a round-table session was organized on Radio Shariat to talk about the goals of the Oral Rehydration Therapy campaign.

UNCHS continues its urban rehabilitation activities including the upgrading of public services in four districts, the construction of flood protection walls, and the improvement of the irrigation system.

Around Kabul, FAO has continued wheat harvesting/thrashing and research trials.

Kandahar: WFP has proceeded with the distribution of wheat to 1066 families in Kandahar and to 624 IDP families, and has completed the construction of four clinics.

UNHCR distributed beans and tenets for shelter in five districts. WHO is monitoring village health projects and distributing medical supplies and equipment to four hospitals in the region.

Mazar-i-Sharif: UNHCR reports that on 27 June, 161 Tajik refugees returned to Tajikistan from Mazar region, bringing the total number of returnees to 715 persons since 17 July. Repatriation from Kunduz is currently going on as well.

A four day training course on clinical management surveillance and prevention of diarrhoeal disease was given by WHO to 21 doctors and nine nurses. Meanwhile, medical and surgical supplies continue to be distributed.

As fuel supplies for UN operations have reached a critical stage in Mazar, UNOCHA has utilized 97556 MT of food aid through food-for-work and institutional feeding projects this week.

During a visit to Pul-e-Khumri to distribute medical supplies, UNICEF discovered that hospital equipment as well as two ambulances had been looted. UNICEF is now trying to recover them.

SCF-UK has begun a needs assessment and survey of child labour in Mazar. They are also working with the local media to emphasize the importance of education.
Herat: During the past week, WFP has distributed 167 MT of food, including 295 MT for IDPs and 100 MT for the FAO food-for-seed projects.

UNICEF distributed medicine and other commodities for the Herat regional hospital and the emergency shelter. They also conducted a teacher training course for the IAF education project in IDP camps.

WHO continued its assistance by providing various medical supplies to the Herat regional hospital, the badghis provincial hospitals and basic health clinics in Karogh and Gozara.

Under the food-for-arrangement, FAO received 26.8 MT of quality seeds. They also reported that 23 MT of foundation seed was harvested.

Jalalabad: WHO, under their healthy city project, has completed the construction of 15 latrines, 105 slabs for drain coverage, and is cleaning the city drains. They also continue to distribute medical supplies and equipment to hospitals in the area.

UNICEF has been active in their ongoing water and sanitation projects, chlorianting 180 wells, casting 81 rings for dug wells and installing a hand pump in Qargaig. They also delivered some accessories and basic equipment for these projects.

WFP used some 481 MT of food through bakery projects, institutional feeding, and food-for-work training projects.

At the Sheeshamgah research farm, FAO planted corn and beans, cultivated germplasm, irrigated sweet corn and mug beans, and weeded rice and Mug beans.

Kabul: UNHCR has signed agreements with a number of NGOs for the rehabilitation of facilities to assist the repatriation of returners from Pakistan. Four clinics, four primary schools and one gravity feed water supply are included in the plans for Azro district, Logar province. It is anticipated that 60000-80000 refugees will return to this district in the next few months.

WHO distributed 1200 booklets on AIDS information to various hospitals and donated X-Ray films to Kabul hospitals. WHO is also assisting the Ministry of Public Health (MoPH) to monitor diarrhoea cases in the central region.

WFP distributed 1060 MT of mixed food to different WFP assisted projects and have received 856 MT of wheat flour.

Through the MoPH, UNICEF has established two mobile teams for the monitoring of diarrhoeal diseases and detecting cholera suspected and positive cases. They handed over 98 million AfS worth of drugs for cholera control including oral rehydration salts to the MoPH. UNICEF has also delivered education kits to NGOs who are able to support education for both boys and girls.

Due to security restrictions, UNCHS has suspended its solid waste disposal and collection programme as the dumping area is situated 15 km north of Kabul. Other UNCHS activities, including the upgrading of public services, are continuing.

Kandahar: Four organized group repatriations, some 140 families, have taken place with the assistance of UNHCR. The local authorities have requested assistance in the provision of education material which has been approved, but the authorities have prevented UNHCR from supplying material to Hazara populated areas in Maleston and Jaghrooz.

WHO has provided training for 16 women in control of diarrhoea and cholera in central Logar province. Training courses on the subjects are ongoing for 18 men. They have also provided construction supplies for the rehabilitation of the Khas Urozhan hospital, Zararan.

UNICEF’s drilling programme for the Dand Water supply system is under way. A shipment of supplies is being delivered for the Lashkar Gah water supply project this week.

FAO staff have conducted further missions to supervise and monitor this year’s crop and plant protection programme. They have also conducted an apricot drying training course in Kabul. 21 personnel from seven NGOs attended the course.

UNCHS has updated the city map and has signed two projects with local authorities for a solid waste disposal scheme and for a base line survey of infrastructure and capacity in Kandahar city.

UNCHS has completed the formation of 220 village development committees and 45 cluster village development committees in Kandahar and Farah provinces.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WHO distributed 400 manuals on guidelines for treatment of malaria for doctors and health worker reaching 140 health centres in the north. 4.2 MT of medical and surgical supplies have been distributed to hospitals in Puli-Khumri, Kunduz, Takhar and Faryab.

UNCHA is transporting 10000 litres of urgently needed fuel for UN activities in the region and an additional 10000 litres will be transported through Turkmenistan and Temez.

During the last week of July, WFP provided 207 MT of food aid for on-going projects, benefiting 12420 persons. The masonry and carpentry project funded by WFP in Aqcha district has seen its first 30 graduates this week.

UNCHS inaugurated the water supply system for District 3 in Mazar. Drinking water is assured for 3000 people through this scheme.

12154. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. “Humanitarian Activities”, in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 228, August 13, 1997. Gardez: UNICEF, in conjunction with the Norwegian Afghanistan Committee (NAC), contributed 10000 doses of measles vaccine to the Swedish Committee for Afghanistan (SCA) which is expected to benefit about 2000 children.

FAO assisted the Danish Committee for Aid to Afghan Refugees (DACAAR) with insecticide for 30 gerbils of apple orchards. Some 18 gerbils of improved variety of different seeds were reaped. Also, threshing machines were loaned to three villages, benefitting about 120 farmers in Pakhta Province.

Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF) provided food for about 36 malnourished children per day in their nutrition centre based in Gardez Hospital.

Herat: WFP received 829.5 MT of food commodities at Toorghundi donated by the European Union. Some 150 MT were distributed this week through their ongoing projects in the area.

UNICEF provided medical supplies to the Herat Regional Hospital, the Afghan Red Crescent Society and Medecins du Monde (MDM). About 165 male and female workers are being trained in Oral Rehydration Therapy (ORT) and health awareness.

Through a food-for-seed scheme, FAO Crop exchanged 37.5 MT of WFP wheat for 30 MT of quality wheat seed.

FAO Livestock distributed 48000 doses of animal vaccines. Incubators, eggs and chicken feed were handed out to support 11 newly trained vet staff in chicken hatcheries.

UNCHS (Habitat) collected 236 cubic metres of solid waste. They are also constructing large and small garbage bins in four districts of the city.

In Guzarah, WHO provided US$6000 as interest free loans to 23 beneficiaries under their basic development needs project.

Jalalabad: This week, WHO conducted 12 new latrines, 117 slabs for the covering of drains, and continued to clean drainage ditches under their Healthy City project. An orientation training course on hygiene and sanitation was attended by 80 mailahs from Jalalabad. WHO also distributed medical supplies and equipment in the eastern region.

UNCHCR completed its prisoners’ training project in the Jalalabad central jail for 40 prisoners. UNCHR also supported the construction of side ditches and latrines. A mission was sent to Paktia and Khost to assess the repatriation flow.

In cooperation with the community, UNICEF constructed seven latrines, casted 60 concrete rings on dug wells, and chlorinated 142 public and private wells.

Among other activities, FAO continue their research to improve crops, irrigated rice trials, weeded maize trials and threshed sweet corn. Kabul: UNHCR, together with WFP and UNCHS, undertook a joint field trip to Azro District of Logar Province in connection with UNHCR’s integrated initiatives for planned voluntary repatriation of refugees from Pakistan.

WFP completed a needs assessment and UNCHS completed a feasibility study for the installation of 70 deepwell handpumps in 16 villages.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Afghanistan

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

In response to cases of diarrhoeal diseases and cholera in Pul-i-alam and Charakh districts, WHO, in collaboration with UNICEF and the Ministry of Public Health (MoPH), distributed medical supplies for the control, prevention and treatment of these diseases to health facilities. UNICEF sent two missions to support health facilities and set up four Oral Rehydration Therapy centres in Logar Province. Emergency drugs have been provided to the MoPH for the control of cholera. In Kabul city, UNICEF delivered education kits to street children.

A total of 414 MT of food commodities were distributed by WFP to the survey of new beneficiaries for its subsidized bread sales in both general and widow bakeries was completed.

Mazar-i-Sharif: Since the beginning of August, WFP distributed 1895 MT of food to 15000 project beneficiaries through food-for-work projects and assistance to vulnerable persons in Balkh Province. WFP, in collaboration with WHO and UNHCR, is funding an emergency ward in Mazar Hospital through a food-for-work project.

UNCHS is installing handpumps and the construction of two deep wells was completed.

With the participation of the Rural Rehabilitation Department (RRD), UNICEF rehabilitated 10 handpump platforms in Mazar town, targeting 1800 habitants. [=] 12155. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities:Kabul", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 216. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 20, 1997. UNHCR is preparing an integrated project proposal for Azeo district in Logar: between 60000 and 80000 refugees currently living in the Peshawar area have reportedly expressed a willingness to return to their homes in Azeo provided infrastructural rehabilitation work is carried out.

UNCHS held a three-day "Do no Harm" workshop with Norwegian Church Aid: 25 representatives of 14 agencies and the Ministry of Planning attended.

UNCHS also continued handpump installation and repair work and completed two boreholes in District 2. UNICEF and AVICEN treated 30 girls and 101 boys at the orphanage and involved 165 boys and girls in handicraft and artistic activities.

WFP distributed 525 tonnes of wheat and 272 tonnes of wheatflour through the bakery project, as well as continuing institutional feeding projects. WFP distributed 4.55 tonnes of wheat via its food-for-seeds project. [=]

12156. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities: Mazar-i-Sharif", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 216. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 20, 1997. UNOPS last week completed weaving and embroidery training programmes in Samanghandistrict of Samanghan province. SCF US now has 96 classes running in the non-formal education project it is carrying out on UNOPS' behalf in Dehdadi, Tokhta and Ali Chopan (Balkh). The scheme has just set up a mobile library in Ali Chopan.

Oxfam's vocational training and production centre in Kaologai (Dushi district, Balkh) has completed a six-month kilim weaving and non-formal education programme for 24 young women.

German Agro-Action distributed 33 tonnes of wheat to village communities in Balkh and Charbolak districts under a food-for-drainage excavation scheme. [=]

12157. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Activities: Mine Action", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 228, August 13, 1997. Afghan Technical Consultants finalised a twelve month contract with the EU for US$2.3 million. The money will fund nine mine clearance teams and three site offices. This much needed injection of funds will ease the mine action programmes' funding crisis. However, US$7.6 million is still required to ensure continuity of the programme beyond September 1997.

The Austrian Government provided US$16000 to support an ICRC eye clinic in Mirwais Hospital in Kandahar. The medical expertise required will be supplied by doctors employed within the mine action programme by the Demining Agency for Afghanistan. UNOCHA has contracted CIET International to conduct a national evaluation of mine awareness in Afghanistan. The evaluation, aims to determine the overall effectiveness of mine awareness in Afghanistan and to make recommendations for future developments in mine awareness.

Statistics recently available have shown that for the first time in many years mine awareness teams of the Organisation of Mine Clearance and Afghan Rehabilitation (OMAR) reached more adult women than men during the month of July 1997.

Mine action teams have completed clearance of the inside of the Puli-Chakhi jail in Kabul. The area surrounding the jail has been surveyed and clearance will proceed following discussion with local authorities. Also in Kabul, clearance of agricultural land, including several irrigation canals, in the villages of Qala-e-Muslim and Gul Bagh were completed allowing residents to return to cultivation of the previously barren areas.

Efficiency measures currently being introduced by the mine action programme include the restructuring of mine field survey teams, combining resources from both the Minefield Clearance Planning Agency and the Mine Dog Detection Centre. The new survey procedures are designed to improve minefield boundary reduction and hence increase speed and safety of clearance. [=]

12158. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Assistance for Afghanistan: Norwegian visit to Kabul", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 228. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, August 6, 1997. Norway's Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Jan Egeland, visited Kabul on 13-14 August. Mr. Egeland, the highest-ranking western official to visit the city since the Taliban took over last September, was accompanied by the head and deputy head of the Humanitarian Affairs Department, an executive officer and the Norwegian Ambassador to Pakistan.

The delegation met with the Kabul authorities to discuss Taliban edicts on gender, and the issues of females' access to education and their right to work. A Norwegian/Taliban commission is to be set up to discuss education programmes for boys and girls in Kabul. Mr. Egeland said Norway was prepared to provide funding for ten schools immediately, if the Taliban could agree that boys and girls would have equal access.

Norway, which has donated nearly US$200 million to Afghanistan over the past 18 years, is currently chair of the Afghan Support Group. The next Support Group meeting is scheduled for October. Mr. Egeland said that he would not recommend donors provide any extra funding unless there was progress towards equality in the coming weeks. [=]

12159. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Assistance for Afghanistan: Pledges and Contributions", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 219, June 12, 1997. The Government of Norway has pledged US$316000 towards UNDCP's drugs demand reduction activities, on condition that the funds are spent on activities that do not discriminate against women or girls. [=]

12160. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Assistance", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 204. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, February 18, 1997. Faizabad: Approval of the launch of the WFP bakery project has been well received and has apparently brought down food prices.

Herat: The Eid holiday disrupted reporting from Herat but UNICEF has distributed furniture to clinics and kerosene to people in emergency accommodation.

Jalalabad: WFP distributed food to Sjadows, ARH and Serve. The Programme also monitored the NADA state farm project in Ninkhangan. The project, which had been suspended, restarted at the end of January. Pulicing, fertilizing, and cultivation are all under way. NADA was given 15MT wheat as an incentive to 300 IDPs and 400 NADA workers. WFP food stocks in Jalalabad stand at just under 590MT.

The MCI bakery project is progressing satisfactorily, with around 2000MT wheat flour having been distributed so far. UNHCR monitored quick impact projects in parts of Ninhharhar, Khost, and Paktia, and held a succession of meetings with local elders. FAO carried out irrigation, weed control, and fertilizer dressing, and observed wheat and legume trials as well as visiting wheat demonstration projects.

103

Kabul: UNHCR is to provide winter relief to 5910 families in District 10. WFP received two convoys of commercial trucks carrying more than 300MT wheat-flour. UNICEF and WHO continued regular health activities over the Eid Period.

Kandahar: UNICEF announced plans this week to carry out a wide-ranging survey, which will include the nutritional status of children, at the end of February. The Fund will also join forces with WHO on a mass polio immunization campaign in April and May, and has asked other agencies to help out by loaning vehicles and providing other support as necessary. UNHCR's Grameen Bank Project has disbursed its first five small-scale loans and has begun receiving repayment. FAO gave out 55MT wheat against the summer crop of maize and mung beans in Grishk. WFP distributed 489MT food to 18 ongoing projects, benefitting some 9000 people. Over this reporting period WFP received 22MT wheat from Quetta: current stocks stand at 585MT. UNHCR reports that the drinking water situation in Zaranj is very bad and requires urgent attention.

Mazar-i-Sharif: A group of 18 future trainers of traditional birth attendants are themselves being trained by Balkh Public Health Department under the auspices of UNHCR. They will, in turn, train 155 women in nine provinces in northern Afghanistan. The Programme, which started on 13 February, will be completed in late April. [—] 12161. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Situation and Operations", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 199, January 2, 1997. HERAT: UNHCR Herat reported a total of 2718 IDP families (15861 persons) residing in different camps in Herat city. The daily influx of IDPs to the camps in Herat is around nine families per day. It also distributed kerosene (funded by the local authorities), kerosene heaters and jerry cans (UNHCR) and soap (MSF) to IDPs in Shahidahi Rawza and transit camps. WFP distributed 237 tonnes of wheat and one tonne of sugar in the western region. UNICEF distributed hospital and emergency health kits to Herat regional hospital and medical supplies to IDPs in Rawza camp.

JALALABAD: WHO organized a meeting of all NGOs and UN agencies working in the health sector to discuss the 1997 work plan for consolidating health activities under a Regional Plan of Action. The Acting Minister of Public Health expressed his appreciation for the excellent contribution of NGOs and UN agencies and expressed concern over the scarcity of reliable information concerning the health sector. He suggested the use of standardized reporting format and the establishment of epidemiological surveillance system. The NGOs requested further support for local authorities. WHO delivered miscellaneous medical items to Laghman provincial hospital and anti TB drugs to Khogyanzan hospital in Nangarhar. After several meetings organized by UNICEF on District Development Pilot Projects, a national committee was formed; its members will undertake a mission to Kamesh district of Nooristan to conduct a base-line survey.

UNOPS completed two irrigation and four water supply projects in Jaji Maidan district of Paktia province; currently it is implementing 38 sub-projects in different districts of eastern region. UNICEF delivered a miscellaneous set of items to clinics in the eastern region. UNHCR completed the construction of three primary schools in Khogyani and Chaparhar district of Nangarhar and two schools in Tani Dish and Ali Sher districts of Paktia.

KANDAHAR: The authorities in Kandahar established a special department to combat drug smuggling in the areas under Talibain control. They declared that some 45 Kg of heroin and 3 Kg of hashish have been seized by the said department in Kandahar. Two training and five food-for-work projects jointly supported by WFP and UNHCR have been completed in Kandahar, Zabad and Helmand provinces. 80 persons were trained in improved traditional masonry in Lashkargah and Kandahar cities and 123 km irrigation system were repaired. A Kishmish Khana (a place of drying raisin) project started in 1995 has been completed and 180 rooms for drying raisins have been constructed in Dand district of Kandahar. 2065 labourers benefitted from the project's food, while 14454 persons (7227 male and 7227 female) benefitted from the distributed food.

MAZAR: UNICEF provided 400 Kg of drugs and medical equipment to the Department of Public Health in Mazar, and 2000 doses of measles vaccines and other EPI supplies to MSF in Takhar and Kunduz. MSF recently reported a suspected epidemic of measles in Burji Sherqat refugee camp with a death toll of 15 children. UNICEF sent EPI supplies to this camp. UNICEF supported the education department in Faryab to repair the Afghan Koot girls school and rehabilitate the Kohi Khana and Arab Khan schools in Maimana district. It also supported the department of education in Balkh to repair the Ayesha Afghan girls school, and financed the training undertaken by the department of education in Balkh for upgrading the skills and capacity of primary school teachers and administrators. Moreover, UNICEF distributed 3250 MT of wheat and other food items to 33 kindergartens in Balkh. In cooperation with Kamaz kindergartens and financial support by UNICEF, Balkh television produced a 1 hour and 40 minutes programme for International Children's Day, which was later broadcast by Baglhan and Sheberghan TV stations. Finally, UNICEF led a joint inter-agency mission to baghlan province to collect data on District Development Pilot Project.

WFP approved the distribution of 100 kg of wheat to each identified IDP family and distributed 257 tonnes of wheat between 18 and 23 December 1996 in several northern provinces. An expanded bakery programme for the northern region is being prepared in consultation with local authorities, UN agencies and NGOs, providing direct food aid to 300000 beneficiaries during the winter. Women operated bakeries will be encouraged. A WFP mission visited Tala-o-Barfac area and recovered 11 trucks loads of wheat, which were off-loaded by unknown commanders. Negotiations are undertaken to recover the remaining wheat. [—] 12162. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Humanitarian Update", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 231, September 2, 1997. GARDEZ: Local authorities cleared the flood debris from the Gardez-Kabul road, and a mine dog group has checked to see that no mines had been washed down onto the road from a nearby anti-tank minefield. The road has now been reopened to traffic.

IRC provided three tonnes of improved seeds, plus fertilizer, to 350 farmers. IRC also procured seeds from farmers. The IRC project has adopted the FAO concept of providing improved seeds in exchange for normal seedcorn.

FAO is supporting IRC's ten fruit tree nurseries in Paktika, and helping train farmers in integrated pest management.

Herat: The suspected cholera outbreak in Badghis seems to have abated, although cases continue to be reported from Shidand. MoPH, UNICEF, WHO, MSF, MDM and Merlin have all been closely involved in dealing with the problem.

WFP, IOM and the DoR have distributed 295 tonnes of food to just under 12000 IDPs in Shaidai One camp. WFP has dispatched 200 tonnes of food to Varan for distribution to people working on the rehabilitation of roads in Farah.

UNICEF has distributed a variety of supplies to EPI centres in Herat, to the Babai Berq clinic in Herat and to hospitals in Herat, Ghor, Badghis and Shindand.

UNCHS finished construction work on 22 garbage bins in District 7. Three community centre latrines were completed and five water supply leakages repaired.

The Mine Action Programme reported the presence of mines along the road between Sang-i-Atesh and Bala Morghab. Survey work has now begun in Ghor province.

Jalalabad: The mine action programme has finished clearing Goundivillage in the Urgun region of Paktika. Residential areas, the cemetery and the mosque are now clear of mines. A total of 71 landmines and 27 other unexploded items were destroyed during the FAO discussed the quality of improved wheat seed with farmers in Behsud and collected information about the flowering dates for rice and maize grown on the research farm at Shee-shambagh. Cabbages are being planted and okra harvested for seed.

The WHO Healthy City project continues to build latrines, clean and reinforce ditches. WHO conducted a workshop on some of the constraints facing EPI work.

UNICEF has continued its water supply work and disposed of 300 cubic metres of solid waste. Messages highlighting the dangers of careless waste and excreta disposal were disseminated around the city, along with posters and leaflets.

WFP distributed 339 tonnes of food in Nangarhar and Kunar. The Jalalabad bakery project is expected to resume this week, providing subsidized bread to 30000 needy families.

UNHCR has completed work on a 30 metre long intake to increase the flow of water to the irrigation canal at Gulsalak in Pech district, Kunar. A 90 metre flood protection wall has been built to protect farmland at Archano, Warana district, Nuristan.

Kabul: WHO held a workshop to make preliminary preparations for a nationwide active polio surveillance system. The organization also delivered more than US$21000 worth of orthopaedic equipment to hospitals.

WFP received three convoys bringing 763 tonnes of wheatflour to Kabul, and distributed 146 tonnes of mixed food via different programmes.

UNICEF reports that cases of cholera in Shranjan (Paktia) and Charkhi (Logar) are under control, as is an outbreak of measles in Gardez. Water chlorination in the west of Kabul is ongoing and there are no more suspected cases of cholera in this area.

UNCHS's liming project, another activity designed to eliminate cholera from the capital, is continuing in Districts 2, 8 and 10.

Solid waste disposal continues at a rate of 672 cubic metres per day.

The Kabul authorities handed over 25 anti-personnel mines for the mine action team to destroy. Voluntary initiatives of this kind are occurring with increasing frequency.

FAO aims to procure 100 tonnes of wheat seed from areas around Kabul under its seed exchange programme.

Kandahar: UNHCR is currently carrying out 75 quick-impact-projects (QIPs). Eight of these focus on vocational training, with a view to becoming income-generating activities for disabled returnees, widows and internally displaced women. Skills covered include calligraphy, carpet weaving and tailoring. Four projects provide 400 returnee families with shelter material. So far this year, 8768 individuals have returned to the region from Saluchistan.

UNCHS is to carry out a variety of canal improvements under the P.E.A.C.E. initiative. Work on building up local committees continues, with a total of 335 villages, 98 clusters and one district having formed committees to participate in the programme.

The Mine Action Programme has trained 29 NGO trainers, enabling them to carry our community awareness training themselves, with no external input.

Wich continues work on rehabilitating Khas Urozgan Hospital and on the Healthy Village programme.

Mazar: The roadbridge linking Afghanistan with Uzbekistan is still sealed, but the Uzbek authorities continue to allow the UN and IRC to transport humanitarian supplies across the river by barge. WFP has so far brought in almost 20000 tonnes of wheat, IRCR 30000 tonnes of wheatflour and UNOCHA 10000 litres of diesel. IRCR also plans to bring in around 100 tonnes of medicines by air over the next 10-12 days.

Just under 2800 refugees have returned to Tajikistan from the Kunduz area.

Who has distributed 1.2 tonnes of medical supplies and equipment to Mazar Public Health Hospital and to Pul-i-Khumri, Kunduz and Takhar. The organization has also distributed health education materials (mostly books and manuals) to schools, government institutions and madrasas throughout the northern region.

UNCHS has finished building work on a kindergarten at Balkh University. Around 800 patients have been treated at the community fora clinics which have been strategically located in different community areas around the city of Mazar. The clinics are staffed by people who are paid by the community and who receive occasional assistance from the MoPH, UNICEF and WHO.

UNCHS continues work on silkworm propagation.

UNCHS provided chairs and fans to the Literacy Department to accompany the convoy and discussed the IDP situation with local authorities.

UNHCR has completed work on a 30 metre long intake to increase the flow of water to the irrigation canal at Gulsalak in Pech district, Kunar. A 90 metre flood protection wall has been built to protect farmland at Archano, Warana district, Nuristan.

Kabul: WHO held a workshop to make preliminary preparations for a nationwide active polio surveillance system. The organization also delivered more than US$21000 worth of orthopaedic equipment to hospitals.

WFP received three convoys bringing 763 tonnes of wheatflour to Kabul, and distributed 146 tonnes of mixed food via different programmes.

UNICEF reports that cases of cholera in Shranjan (Paktia) and Charkhi (Logar) are under control, as is an outbreak of measles in Gardez. Water chlorination in the west of Kabul is ongoing and there are no more suspected cases of cholera in this area.

UNCHS's liming project, another activity designed to eliminate cholera from the capital, is continuing in Districts 2, 8 and 10.

Solid waste disposal continues at a rate of 672 cubic metres per day.

The Kabul authorities handed over 25 anti-personnel mines for the mine action team to destroy. Voluntary initiatives of this kind are occurring with increasing frequency.

FAO aims to procure 100 tonnes of wheat seed from areas around Kabul under its seed exchange programme.

Kandahar: UNHCR is currently carrying out 75 quick-impact-projects (QIPs). Eight of these focus on vocational training, with a view to becoming income-generating activities for disabled returnees, widows and internally displaced women. Skills covered include calligraphy, carpet weaving and tailoring. Four projects provide 400 returnee families with shelter material. So far this year, 8768 individuals have returned to the region from Saluchistan.

UNCHS is to carry out a variety of canal improvements under the P.E.A.C.E. initiative. Work on building up local committees continues, with a total of 335 villages, 98 clusters and one district having formed committees to participate in the programme.

The Mine Action Programme has trained 29 NGO trainers, enabling them to carry our community awareness training themselves, with no external input.

Wich continues work on rehabilitating Khas Urozgan Hospital and on the Healthy Village programme.

Mazar: The roadbridge linking Afghanistan with Uzbekistan is still sealed, but the Uzbek authorities continue to allow the UN and IRC to transport humanitarian supplies across the river by barge. WFP has so far brought in almost 20000 tonnes of wheat, IRCR 30000 tonnes of wheatflour and UNOCHA 10000 litres of diesel. IRCR also plans to bring in around 100 tonnes of medicines by air over the next 10-12 days.

Just under 2800 refugees have returned to Tajikistan from the Kunduz area.

Who has distributed 1.2 tonnes of medical supplies and equipment to Mazar Public Health Hospital and to Pul-i-Khumri, Kunduz and Takhar. The organization has also distributed health education materials (mostly books and manuals) to schools, government institutions and madrasas throughout the northern region.

UNCHS has finished building work on a kindergarten at Balkh University. Around 800 patients have been treated at the community fora clinics which have been strategically located in different community areas around the city of Mazar. The clinics are staffed by people who are paid by the community and who receive occasional assistance from the MoPH, UNICEF and WHO.

UNCHS continues work on silkworm propagation.

UNCHS provided chairs and fans to the Literacy Department to benefit 40 working children. This project is also supported by SCF-UK.

UNCHS and SCF-US installed ten handpumps in Andkhoy.

Oxfam is digging two wells and repairing two culverts in Otaqul village, Nar-e-Shahi district, Balkh -- one of the areas damaged by the spring floods this year.

FAO has bought more than 1000 kg of wheat seeds from farmers. This will be distributed for the next planting season.[=]
FAO-Livestock has started its spring vaccination campaign against anthrax, enterotoxaemia and other diseases in central and eastern Afghanistan.

A WFP-assisted drainage project has rehabilitated 200 hectares of agricultural land in Momandra.

Another WFP-assisted fruit nursery project has distributed 40000 subsidized saplings to farmers in Kunar. By the end of the spring season, the project expects to have distributed 240000 saplings.

A WFP food-for-seed project in Kunar has exchanged 300 tonnes of wheat for 80 tonnes of improved maize, rice and wheat seed.

WFP reports that a Kunar people-oriented reforestation project is providing 70 women with the chance to run income generating nurseries. Kabul: Aschiana, a local NGO supported by UNHCR and Terre des Hommes, has secured funding from ECHO and the Reuters Foundation for its two centres for street children in Shar-i-Nau and Khair Khana. It has also obtained funds to open two new centres in Microrayan. The centres provide boys (5-14) and girls (up to the age of 7) with general and health education, a daily meal and weekly medical check-ups.

UNICEF has embarked on a study of the nature and prevalence of psycho-social trauma among the children of Kabul. Over the past two weeks, water supply activities, carried out in cooperation with the authorities, have provided a further 10000 people with access to safe drinking water.

UNCHS distributed clear plastic and shelter sheeting to 600 families. Solid waste disposal, water supply, flood protection and tree planting programmes continue, as do ongoing discussions with community rehabilitation shurhas in Districts 125 and 7. FAO-Livestock distributed 2000 molasses feed supplement blocks to veterinary field units in the Kabul region. Fifteen veterinarians completed training courses in poultry management. Two refresher courses for vets and para-vets have taken place in Kabul.

Kandahar: FAO is carrying out a pest management training programme for 15 participants. A WFP mission to Helmand reported food security problems in Lashkargah. Further joint-agency investigations will attempt to address the problem. WFP delivered almost 650 tonnes of food over the past week. UNDCP is to send an exploratory mission to Ghorkar province.

Mazar-i-Sharif: WFP distributed 996 tonnes of food between 27 March and 3 April. Beneficiaries included Tajik refugees at Sakhi Camp, food-for-work projects and institutional feeding including bakery projects. WHO delivered 500kg of surgical and medical supplies to health centres around the northern region.

Save the Children USA is running a non-formal education programme for 2000 rural women from Dehdadi, Balkh, Tokhta and Aliqan. UNOPS is running a vocational skills training and income generation course in Samangan for 45 trainees. UNICEF and Oxfam are to carry out a water supply system project in Acqha. UNICEF will carry out another water supply project with Balkh Helpline assistance, a local NGO headed by a female engineer. UNICEF has also established six carpet weaving centres for 24 women in Shorteppa district. [=]

12165. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "ICRC Update: Relief Overview", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 214, May 5, 1997. The ICRC is delighted to take this opportunity to thank the UNDP/UNOCHA coordination team in Islamabad for its kind offer to allocate some space in its weekly bulletin to enable ICRC to provide regular updates on its activities in Afghanistan.

Relief overview: ICRC continues to provide food and non-food assistance to war-stricken civilians throughout the country. Since the beginning of the year, ICRC has distributed 8000 tonnes of food and non-food items in Afghanistan.

In Kabul, 30000 families headed by young widows or disabled people (190000 individuals) continue to benefit from regular nutritional assistance. They have already received stoves, coal and blankets over the winter months.

In Herat, IDPs are currently the main source of concern. ICRC is assisting 2800 IDP families (16800 people) in Shaidai ("transit") and Rawashan camps. In Shaidai alone there are 2143 families, who are now being moved to better accommodation in Maslarqeh Camp. Regular assistance is also being given to 684 families (more than 4000 people) in public buildings.

In Mazar, Pul-i-Khumri and the northern regions, ICRC is currently supporting 3800 displaced families in coordination with UN agencies. [=]

12166. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Mazar-i-Sharif & the Taliban", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 217. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, May 28, 1997. Following this weekend's takeover of Mazar-i-Sharif by supporters of Dormut defensor General Malik, the city is now being patrolled by recently arrived Taliban troops. The UN guesthouse and some offices were entered and looted during the takeover, but staff in Mazar have now succeeded in recovering all the vehicles that had been taken. The new authorities provided security guards to some offices, while others were under the surveillance of patrols. UN and NGO staff movements are currently very restricted, but reports indicate that the city is returning to normal. Nevertheless, when the UN Coordinator expressed his intention to visit the city, he was informed that the airport was closed.

The new authorities have ordered the closure of girls' schools and colleges and forbidden women from working.

First Pakistan, and then Saudi Arabia announced their recognition of the Taliban government in Afghanistan. [=]

12167. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "NGOs Protest Restrictions", in Afghanistan Weekly Update, Issue No. 229. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, August 20, 1997. Four Scandinavian NGOs protested against policies that severely limit aid agencies' from assisting women in Taliban-held parts of Afghanistan. The restrictions, imposed on 16 July, bar Afghan women from working outside the health sector and state that all aid to women and girls be channelled via male blood relatives. The NGOs also objected to Taliban authorities forbidding them to work in areas that are not under Taliban control, such as certain districts in Ghazni that are part of Hazarajat. The Danish Committee for Aid to Afghan Refugees, Norwegian Afghanistan Committee, Norwegian Church Aid and the Swedish Committee for Afghanistan issued a statement on 12 August announcing that if they continued to be prevented from implementing activities in accordance with fundamental humanitarian principles (i.e. that aid should be provided to all people in need, regardless of gender, or political, religious or ethnic affiliation), they would be forced to consider the possibility of reviewing their involvement in assisting vulnerable people in Taliban-controlled areas.

Meanwhile, in Mazar-i-Sharif, Afghan women are only permitted to work for aid agencies that are headed by women. [=] 12168. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "News from Kandahar", in Afghanistan Weekly Update. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. It has apparently been a quiet week in Kandahar. WFP has been asked by local authorities to investigate the possibility of starting tailoring and poultry projects targeting women in Helmand. The Programme distributed 130 MT food via already existing activities.

FAO launched an integrated vegetable seed production project with seven farmers in the Dand district.

UNOPS has approved the desilting of the Fil Koh Reservoir to increase its capacity to supply electricity to Kandahar City. The reservoir currently supplies "limited" power to half the city.

WFP reports the presence of 243 IDP families from Badghis in Helmand. The families all claim they will return as soon as possible. WFP is to carry out a one-month distribution and to monitor the situation.
UNHCR and UNICEF have distributed blankets, tents and plastic sheeting (see also reports from Badghis). [=]

12169. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Orphanage Update", in AfghanistanWeeklyUpdate. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 202, February 4, 1997. UNICEF funds helped AVICEN provide emergency drugs, treat 67 patients, and run a week-long health education project. Orphans continue to undertake carpentry training. UNCHS and Save the Children's rehabilitation of the orphanage play-ground is ongoing. [=]

12170. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Overall Situation", in AfghanistanWeeklyUpdate. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 199, January 2, 1997. Fighting continued between the Taliban and the forces of the Council for Defence of Afghanistan in front-line areas to the north of Kabul city, causing civilian casualties and property destruction. On 26 and 27 December, the Taliban reportedly seized control of Istalif and Qarabagh districts to the north of Kabul, shifting the front-line areas closer to Bagram airbase. Over 200 military persons of the opposition alliance were reportedly arrested by the Taliban in the said areas. On 28 and 31 December, Kabul city was bombed by jet fighters of the Council for Defence of Afghanistan. Several bombs struck Kabul airport, Khair Khana pass and the presidential palace, causing minor damage to the windows and doors of the nearby buildings, including the offices of UNCHS, UNDP and UNOCHA. A large arms depot of the Taliban exploded on 24 December in Khair Khana district, killing nine children of the same family. A man and a youth were paraded by the Taliban police in the streets of Kabul for being accused of homosexual acts. All major roads to Kabul with the exception of the Salang highway are open to traffic.

Sporadic fighting was also reported from Badghis province. Reports from Herat indicate that Mulla Yar Mohammad, Governor of Herat, is being replaced with Mulla Abdul Razaq Akhound. Mulla Yar Mohammad is reported to take over as the new Governor of Ghazni province. A man, accused of killing four persons, was publicly executed at Herat Stadium of Friday 27 December 1996. [=]

12171. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "PEACE initiative", in AfghanistanWeeklyUpdate. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 215, May 13, 1997. Field officers and Islambad-based representatives of UNDP, FAO, UNOPS, and CDAP (the UN's disabled Afghans' programme) met with AADB and ANC members to call for action. A three-day workshop on the UNDP PEACE initiative for Afghanistan. On the agenda: practical ways to implement the programme, plus proposals for a coordinated and effective approach to dealing with the gender issue. Two more workshops are to be held in Kandahar (13-17 May) and Mazar (20-23 May). [=]

12172. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Pledges and Contributions", in AfghanistanWeeklyUpdate. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 206, March 5, 1997. Two months into the year, the 1997 Consolidated Appeal response stands at almost $9 million confirmed contributions by Egypt, Germany, Netherlands, UK, Sweden and USA. Rodda Barnen, The Swedish children's aid agency, has donated $35596 to UNHCR to help cover the costs of a social services counselling project for Afghan refugees in Pakistan. UNICEF reports that it has received pledges from the Italian government ($8340000), ECHO/EU ($570000 for EPI), the Austrian National Committee ($44536), also for EPI, and the Australian National Committee ($100400 for healthcare). [=]

12173. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. "Pledges and Contributions", in AfghanistanWeeklyUpdate. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Issue No. 221, June 24, 1997. The Norwegian Government is to donate US$ 141240 to Save the Children (US) Mine awareness activities in Kabul -- providing these benefit women and girls as well as men and boys. [=]
One of these is a US$35 million community development initiative, funded from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), to be carried out by a range of UN organizations in close cooperation with NGOs, in five pilot areas of Afghanistan. The aim is to help communities get back on their feet by assisting them to come up with ways to combat poverty, provide food, rehabilitate social and economic infrastructures, reduce environmental devastation, and rebuild communities.

Afghanistan is one of the poorest countries in the world today. It ranks as 170 of the 174 countries in the United Nations Index of Human Development, and last in the list of 135 countries in the UNDP Human Development Report, 2017.
Development Index. The recent intensification of the civil conflict has only exacerbated the difficult living conditions of an already impoverished population.

After 17 years of strife, destruction and displacement there is no end in sight to the misery of the people of Afghanistan. The United Nations and its partners in the international community have provided hundreds of millions of dollars of humanitarian assistance to victims of war and drought throughout Afghanistan and neighbouring countries. While many life-saving activities have been carried out and many rehabilitation efforts initiated, the volatility of the situation has precluded any durable reconstruction.

The International Forum is expected to rally international support for a strategy that links urgently-required humanitarian assistance with development and peace-making efforts. Most importantly, the strategy will reinforce the efforts of the Afghans themselves to achieve peace and stability in their country.

For more information, please contact: Madeleine Moulin-Acevedo (+4122) 917 28 56. [=]

12184. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (I) Historical Background. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. In order to understand the present day conditions of Afghan politics, especially regarding gender discrimination, the DHA mission observed how important it was to review these issues in their historical context. The gender issue has been central to the development of modern Afghanistan from the early 1920s, up to the present. This Section provides an overview of the Afghan history and its implications on the status and role of women in Afghanistan. [=]

12185. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (I) Historical Background: Afghanistan's Early History. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. Landlocked Afghanistan is at the crossroads of Central Asia, South Asia, West Asia and the Middle East. Afghanistan as a country emerged in the 18th century. The decay of two mighty Empires, the Safavids, based in Iran and Azerbaijan, and the Moghul based in India, provided for an Afghan chieftain, Ahmad Shah Durrani, a Pushtun, to seize control of lands bordering on Central Asia in 1747. From the mid-18th century an independent Afghan political identity grew among distinct ethnic groups living in the region: the Pushtun, the Tajik, the Uzbeck, the Turkoman and the Hazara, among others. These ethnic groups joined together in establishing Afghanistan as a nation, although Afghanistan does not encompass any of these individual groups. This convergence of ethnically distinct groups shaped Afghan early political structure through a process of conciliation between competitive interests and strengthening of a system of central governance under a Pushtun dynasty.

Pushtuns, also called the Pathans, have played a dominant role throughout Afghan political history. Their main division, the Durrani, provided Afghanistan with the ruling dynasties of Sadozay in the 18th century and Mohammadzay from then until the military coup of 1973. The success of the Afghan political structure is to have built a model of conciliation and central governance, without alienating the components of the Afghan nation. Under the Durrani, ethnicity did not become a major issue beyond the determination of the ruling elite. Moreover, intermarriage among the educated Afghans, the universalist religion of Islam (80% of the Afghans are Sunni Muslims, 20% are Shi’a Muslim, small groups of Afghan Sikh and Hindu exist in the South-East region), and the economic interconnectedness of the regions have contributed over time to soften the notion of ethnicity and contribute to the solidarity of Afghans as a nation.

In terms of structure, Afghan political elites have displayed over the years continuous efforts to strengthen the nation-state through the enforcement of a unified set of laws and the creation of a centralized bureaucracy.

Twice the British troops attempted to extend their domination over Afghanistan, in 1838-1842 and in 1879, to secure the northern border of British India. In both attempts, their military superiority allowed them to reach easily Kabul and install a friendly monarch that would remain open and attentive to the policies of the British Empire. Each time, the monarch supported by foreign troops was rejected by the leaders of the Afghan tribes and met a bloody resistance. Twice, the British troops had to withdraw, not being able to maintain their military presence in Afghanistan. The second attempt allowed, however, the British to retain some control over the Afghan foreign affairs, until the peace treaty of Rawalpindi, signed in 1921, that recognized the full independence of Afghanistan.

To consolidate Afghanistan as a nation-state and to protect the territory against further interferences, Amir Rahman Abdur Khan (1880-1901) established an impressive standing army, although of disproportionate size at the time, considering the meager state income based mainly on an agricultural economy. He further succeeded in integrating rebellious tribes into a single polity, weakening their autonomy by transferring many of the military and administrative functions of the chiefs to the central government.

As the state structure developed and the matters it handled became more complex, the centralization project took over the conciliation process. In the early 20th century, the central government further concentrated power at the expense of a centuries-old traditional system that assigned power to secular rural magnates and religious groups. The ruling urban elite felt the need to keep an edge over the rural elite, to assert its authority over the whole nation. This opportunity was offered by the modernization of the country that would, for most of the 20th century, revolutionize the life of the urban population and leave unaffected most of the countryside. [=]

12186. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (I) Historical Background: Afghanistan's Rapprochement with the Soviet Union. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. With British withdrawal from India in 1947, the dormant issue of Afghanistan's claims over the Pushtun and Baluchi lands across the border, - the so-called Durand Line or tribal belt demarcated in 1893, re-emerged. The issue of "Pushtunistan" became a festering sore in relations between Afghanistan and the newly created Pakistan, inciting the Kabul Government to search for new routes for trade and transportation. Closer relations with the Soviet Union were established at this period of time. In many respects, the Soviet Union and communism offered to the ruling elite, as well as to the growing class of engineers and technical bureaucrats, many attractive features. Although being definitively modernist in terms of economic development, the authoritarian structure of the Soviet model discouraged the emergence of liberal political projects. Moreover, it offered to the new technocrat middle class a key role in building and modernizing Afghanistan. In the context of the cold war, the Soviet Union was keen to extend economic and technical assistance to its neighbor. In 1957, the Soviet Union financed the first Five-Year Economic Development Plan of the Kabul government, with a loan of $100 million. Over the next 15 years, the Soviet credits to Afghanistan amounted to more than $900 million, 60% of which in civil aid, amount that is exceptionally large for the region and the time.

In the same period, the main roads throughout the country were paved, some hydroelectric dams built, irrigation projects launched, education and health services improved or expanded, and some industries developed. Most of these projects and programmes served the reinforcement of the central bureaucracy based in the main cities of Afghanistan: Kabul, Kandahar, Jalalabad, Ghazni, Herat and Mazar-I-Sharif. The rest of the country remained again almost unaffected by these changes. Most of the Afghan people were given only a scanty access to modern education and development. The expanded bureaucracy absorbed the increasing number of urban educated elements, as the state traditionally had undertaken to employ such people. The private sector remained basically underdeveloped. The Afghan government grew, until the mid-1960s under a planned economy as an authoritarian, urban, and secular infrastructure.

In 1959, women were again allowed to unveil after the first
unsuccesful emancipation of the 1920's. Contrarily to the first attempt, this initiative restricted itself to the ruling and educated elite living in the urban areas and did not intend, at least in a first stage, to address the rights of the majority of the Afghan women living in rural areas. The unveiling proceeded smoothly in Kabul because of the number of educated women who already worked as nurses, midwives and teachers. The desire to unveil had become a marked tendency among the educated and urban women of the dynasty. The women of the educated and urban areas, government officials appeared unveiled in public functions, other followed suit. In the same trend, women were given the right to vote in 1961. The urban concentration of this phenomenon drew an increasing number of women from the countryside into the cities by the access to modern education and work opportunities, outnumbering in the late 1970's, their male co-students and colleagues in Kabul. The progress of the modern development in Afghanistan was measured by the emancipation of the Afghan women and the attraction such policies would exert on rural populations. The status of the women embodied the pride of the urban elite and the bitterness of its rural counterpart.

Still, under the pressure of the growing middle class, political reforms were progressing. A new liberal constitution was introduced in 1964 under King Zahir Shah with a system of elected parliamentary democracy. The next decade saw unprecedented liberalization of the political arena. Parties came into the open and a lively, relatively free political press came into being in Kabul. Contrary to the expectations of its proponents, the Afghan political structure became increasingly polarized under the liberalization process. Left-wing circles under the influence of Communist leadership grew in influence among students as fundamentalist Islam ideology attracted a number of young intellectuals from the rural areas and junior officers in the Afghan army. A series of political parties were created. Among them the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA), which would rule the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan, and the Islamic Association from which a series of Islamic parties would spring out under the resistance movement. [–]

12187. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (I) Historical Background: The Fall of the PDPA. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The events of the following months represent the most important period of recent Afghan political history in understanding the present political environment in Afghanistan. For a few weeks, a coalition of the mujahidin forces was governing Afghanistan, before their overriding concern became short-term personal and group gains. This period of intensive policy-making shows a fundamental turning point of the Afghan political structure. At its origins, Afghan political was motivated by a will to consolidate a central and secular bureaucracy. In this very short period, the Afghan political structure took a dramatic turn. Under the rule of the Leadership Council that took over the government functions in Kabul on 28 April 1992, Afghanistan became an Islamic state with an Islamic traditionalist project ruled by a fragmented power structure. The first few decrees issued by the Leadership Council indicate the features of the new Islamic state. It declared Islamic law (Shari'a) to be the law of the land. Among the existing laws, those considered to be contrary to Islamic law were declared null and void. Mohammed Siddiq Chakari, the Minister of information and culture declared in May 1992: "Our people have no need for music". In line with this policy, cinemas were closed. Alcoholic drinks were banned and liquor stocks destroyed. Prayers became compulsory for most of the urban population.

Women having such a prominent role in the previous regime in the eyes of the Islamic groups, their role became the object of special attention from the new policy-makers. Women were instructed to cover their heads, legs and arms and to observe a strict interpretation of Islamic law regarding the hijab (head covering). As these policies were not implemented properly, the Supreme Court of the Islamic State of Afghanistan issued in September 1993 a fatwa declaring that the admixture of women with men in offices, cities and schools was unlawful, as an imitation of the West, and of atheistic orders. The fatwa forbade such mingling and demanded that the government immediately enforce all the commands of Allah, especially concerning the veil, and that it drive women out of offices and close schools for girls.

However, the social and political structure in Kabul was slowly but steadily falling apart. Islamic factions increased their military activities, most of the government administrations were deserted and Kabul, as well as its people, suffered from the worse years of war. The upheaval intensity increased by the fall of Kabul spread in the countryside where factions fought for the control of territory, each group building on its fiefdom. Again, several attempts took place to stabilize the political situation in Kabul but with no major success. When a relative political stability was achieved, the warriors engaged in looting, burglary, kidnaping and rape. During this period, 50% of the population fled and most of the city infrastructure was destroyed in the fighting. The central political structure of Afghanistan, and its modernization project appeared to have been physically wiped out with the fall of Kabul in April 1992. [–]

12188. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (I) Historical Background: The Fall of the PDPA. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. Mohammed Daoud, a Durrani who served as prime minister under King Zahir Shah, overthrew the constitutional monarchy and declared a republic in 1973. The pace of modernization of Afghanistan was preserved, but the liberal political experiment was all but suspended. Free press and most of the political parties vanished. More important was the distance taken by the Daoud Government from the supportive Soviet Union. Contacts were established with Arab and Muslim countries and loans for the new seven-year development plan were secured from Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yemen and Libya. Furthermore, conciliatory discussions took place between Pakistan and Afghanistan on the controversies that separated the two countries. This growing distance from the Soviet Union drew renewed support to the PDPA and allowed it to take over the government in April 1978 in a military coup, called referred as the Saur Revolution, and to establish the Communist-led Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The self-proclaimed mission of the PDPA was to create a modern society by means of social revolution.

The end of the dominance of the Durrans and the take over by the Communists profoundly marked Afghan political life, to an extent that is still visible today. It marked a change of elite, from an aristocratic to a bureaucratic regime. The PDPA was mainly composed of educated bureaucrats. They were already active in the government but left out of any position of power under the Durrani. As part of the middle class, they were a cross-section of Afghan society. However, as Communists, they had alienated themselves from their origins. The Soviet Union became the blueprint for Afghan development and they basically broke with their Afghan past. This break with the past widened the gap between the urban and the rural areas.

Under the PDPA regime, this gap took dramatic proportions. Although the new leaders presented themselves as arising from the "masses", the attempts to impose heavy-handed reforms on the rural population were met with dissent. The passage of power to detribalized outsiders was viewed as intolerable in a closely knit, kinship-based rural society. The instability it generated provided fertile grounds for opposition and the further division of the Afghan political structure. A growing disunity within the PDPA and instability in the countryside are among the elements that brought the Soviet Union to intervene militarily in December 1979. From then on and for the duration of the Soviet military occupation, modernization of Afghanistan became more than a political scheme to retain power, but a military programme. Modern cities became fortified towns, modern services such as education as well as the work of women were used as instruments of propaganda. For many rural Afghans, the achievements in the field of education and gender took a definitive political color under the Soviet occupation. Interestingly, among rural Afghan women met by the DHA mission, the educated Afghan women who used to live in the cities are still commonly referred to as the "Russians".

110
The Islamic groups constituted the backbone of the resistance movement. In Afghanistan, these groups were, and still are, of a fundamentalist nature. As elsewhere in the Muslim world, Islamic fundamentalism aims at providing a response for the rejected people of a state on the road to modernization. The overriding concern of the Afghan Islamists was to defend Islam from atheism which permeated the educated urban population after Afghanistan became dependent economically and politically on the Soviet Union. Secularism appeared as a hidden goal of the leftist intellectuals in power against whom Islamic groups vowed to defend what they saw as the unifying ground of the “real Afghanistan”, its universal Islam. From 1980 to 1992, through the Soviet occupation and its aftermath, the Afghan political structure was characterized by a confrontation along a line that was drawn in the course of the 20th century. The regime in Kabul headed by Babrak Karmal and then Dr. Najibullah, restricted itself to defending military bases, military installations, key cities and communication networks, as the countryside resisted the pacification campaigns undertaken by the Soviet forces. The traditional structure of the countryside suffered heavily during this period. Fighters and military commanders took over the power from traditional landlords, elders’ councils and mullahs. The exodus of more than a third of the population (five million refugees, and one million internally-displaced on a population of 1979 of 15 million), mostly from rural areas, aggravated the disintegration of the traditional Afghan society based on kinship.

Considering the fundamental changes occurring in the Soviet Union with the rise of Mikhail Gorbachev as the general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party in 1985, it became a matter of time before Soviet troops would leave Afghanistan and the Communist-led regime would fall. Several attempts were made before and after the withdrawal of the Soviet troops in February 1989 to establish a coalition of the political forces in Afghanistan with the Najibullah government still in place thanks to the important material support of the Soviet Union. None of these attempts succeeded in bridging the gap created by the programmes of development and 12 years of civil war. As the Islamic militia was approaching Kabul, international pressure for the establishment of an interim government increased. After months of battles and negotiations, 20000 mujahidin entered Kabul on 24 April 1992 under the cover of darkness. In Peshawar on the same day, most of the Islamic groups finally agreed on an interim regime of government to be established in Kabul. [=]

12190. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (II) Background Information on the Taliban Movement, Its Origin and Structure. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. Since their arrival on the Afghan political scene, the Taliban have drawn a lot of attention, especially concerning their policies on women. The DHA mission undertook to understand in details the reasoning and the functioning of the Taliban movement, as discussions took place on cooperation arrangements between the UN agencies and the Taliban authorities. This Section presents a summary of the information gathered on the origins and political structure of the Taliban movement. The next Section, under the points 3.1.2 and 3.2.3, describes the reasoning of the Taliban authorities in terms of women's role in the Afghan society. [-]

12191. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (II) Background Information on the Taliban Movement, Its Origin and Structure: Origins of the Taliban Movement. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. From 1993, the Afghan society entered into a downward spiral of violence, chaos and lawlessness. Kabul, and many of the major cities were the objects of confrontation between the different mujahedin factions and the countryside was divided among the different military commanders. In Kandahar, for example, four factions competed for control of the city. On the roads linking these enclaves, check points were numerous and, according to many inhabitants, civilians passing through were frequently harassed and subject to extortion. Some provinces were spared from these tensions and a slow reconstruction process took place with the support of the international community through operational agencies, such as UN Office for Project Services (UNOPS), under the Afghanistan Rural Rehabilitation Programme (ARRP). In many of these regions, such as the Pakita, Paktika and Ghazni provinces, the legitimacy of the commanders, leaders of the resistance against the occupiers, crumbled for the benefit of the traditional holder of the local authority. In the cities however, tensions remained high and prospects of rehabilitation remained hampered by the rivalries between the different factions.

In November 1994, a new actor appeared on the stage by its take over of Kandahar from the local factions. The city, and soon after the province came under the control of a group of “Taliban” which claimed to restore peace and security through the imposition of a strict Islamic order. This new movement, led by Mullah Mohammed Omar Akhunzada, a 31-year-old religious leader, comprised in its early days not more than 200 members. Most of these were recruited from religious schools (“madrasa”) in neighboring Pakistan (from where their name “Taliban” comes from, meaning “students”).

In the days after the take over, the Taliban established a “shura” (an organ of consultation) of approximately 12 members around their leader, and took office as the rulers of the Kandahar province. Contrary to previous factions which would have consolidated their control over the recently conquered territory and tried to take advantage of these new possessions, the Taliban were evidently motivated by a more ambitious objective. They retained their original goal of restoring peace and further mobilized their resources in pushing on their endeavor for an Islamic order in Afghanistan.

The prominence of the original goal of the Taliban movement over the interest in establishing themselves in the conquered territory diverted the movement, or setting up early on a sound basis for a government. The first Shura in Kandahar was constituted as a revolutionary council: semi-clandestine, highly centralized and hierarchical, its size and membership constantly changing. Such characteristics, particular to young revolutionary movements, proved to be prejudicial for the administration of the territories the Taliban controlled. Moreover, since the Taliban were outsiders, they could not rely on the reminiscence of the traditional local structure, to rule their new provinces. They had to count on their own resources to head the administration of the conquered territory.

It appeared from the beginning that the Taliban had no real capacity to rule a provincial administration. This weakness did not prevent the Taliban from extending their influence since there had been no major administration functioning in most of the territory it gained in its first campaigns. If such administration existed, the unsophisticated character of the Taliban would have been challenged early on and would have probably impaired considerably the ambitions of the movement. In this context, the Taliban appeared more as restructuring a destitute civil society on a common denominator, based on Islam and Pushtun traditions, than the set up of a ruling authority.

The first decrees of the new government reflect the strict implementation of Sharia principles that were learned as principles of government in the Koranic schools. The rigidness in the application of the Islamic law was justified, in the Taliban's perspective, by the debauchery that permeated the Kandahar society in the last days of the mujahidin commanders, including open conduct of homosexuality and the sexual harassment of girls, particularly on their way to schools. The Taliban reacted strongly against these conducts. In the absence of sound and practical alternatives, they decided to close the schools for girls until a proper civil order has been reestablished. The Taliban admitted, in discussions with the DHA mission, that this particular decree was extra-Islamic but considered it justifiable under the circumstances. This decision has had an important impact on the administration of the Taliban in the months to come since it was taken by the original leaders of the movement at a constituting moment of their project in Afghanistan.

In this first stage, the Taliban movement offered to the Afghan population a mixture of tradition and renewal. Tradition in its moral and religious claims and its ability to call for the mobilization of the tribal Pushtun society. Renewal since the leaders of the Taliban are not from the rural elite. They have been students in Koranic schools and fighters during the Soviet occupation. They do not depend on the tribal structure to support their authority. They presented themselves as fundamentalist outsiders, freed from factional interests. They see themselves as a transition force, aiming at shifting the Afghan sense of traditions from tribalism to Islamism.

This absence of an intellectual vision for Afghanistan, beyond this strict application of Sharia principles, is a crucial element in understanding the Taliban movement in its early stage. The Taliban emerged as a response to the chaos and lawlessness under the mujahidin commanders, not because of the absence of a government. There has been no functioning government for years before the emergence of the Taliban. The rise of the Taliban is based on their capacity to restore a minimal security in the territory they control and to disarm the population. They responded to the prevailing lawlessness by providing a textual interpretation of the Koran. In areas where the text is silent, they provide for strict rules, such as the prohibition of flying kites, playing music, or trimming beards. The movement had, and to some extent still has, no capacity to be flexible or amenable on substantive issues. Every substantive question has to be referred to the supreme leader, Mullah Mohammad Omar, to be decided on the basis of the Islamic teachings. This process has, until now, delivered several erratic policies that suggest the prevalence of a rudimentary procedure of interpretation of Sharia.

This centralization of the authority hinders the ability and the willingness of the Taliban members to discuss substantive matters. According to the head of a Kuwaiti NGO supporting education programmes in Afghanistan, one should not insist unnecessarily on policy issues with Taliban representatives since Taliban do not know how to exchange in substantive issues. To pressure them at a policy level, will only beget a harsh response. Practical proposals can always be discussed and may be agreed upon even if they do not entirely follow the tenets of the movement. Taliban prefer ignoring, or pretending to ignore, necessary arrangements that deviate from their policies, such as community-based schools for girls, rather than engaging in a process that will force the movement to engage in a policy-making process. Since such a process includes necessarily the ability of members to have different opinions and competitive interests that will have to be balanced by the leadership. It would bring into question the distinctiveness of the Taliban movement as compared to other factions, and the religious character of its endeavor. [=]

12192. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (II) Background Information on the Taliban Movement, Its Origin and Structure: Political Structure of the Taliban Movement. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. 3 years after its emergence, in early May 1997, the Taliban movement controlled more than 2/3 of the territory, including the capital Kabul. The military capacity required to conquer these areas suggests that the Taliban movement benefited, and still benefits, from substantial military and technical support from foreign countries. According to some analysts, this dependence on foreign support may have triggered a need for the movement to become more cohesive in its mission. From early 1998, the movement appeared as drifting some distance from the political agenda of its supporters and tried to develop its own agenda for Afghanistan. Political visions emerged in the ranks of the Taliban on the future of the Afghan society. Different schools of thought may have collided on substantive issues of governance. However, the military agenda, and its proponents, the military commanders of the Taliban militia, have prevailed over this tendency to develop and question the tenets decided in the aftermath of the take over of Kandahar.

Following the take over of Herat in September 1995, the decisions implemented in Kandahar became Taliban policies. Once again, Taliban ordered women to stay at home and schools for girls were closed. In this process, the Taliban started to see themselves as the rulers of the Afghan Islamic state, at least temporarily. The leadership of the movement was strengthened in April 1996 by the election in Kandahar, in front of thousands of mullahs and religious students, of Mullah Mohammad Omar as the: "Amir Almu'meneen", the Commander of the Believers, and the rural elite. They have been students in Koranic schools and fighters thousands of mullahs and religious students, of Mullah Mohammad Omar as the:"Amir Almu'meneen", the Commander of the Believers, reasserting the hierarchical character of the Taliban decision-making process, and strengthening the religious and dogmatic character, over the political character of the Taliban vision for Afghanistan.

With time and further military successes, the Taliban movement adopted a more stable structure. The original Kandahar Shura of the first companions of Mullah Omar expanded to approximately 30 members by the end of 1995, composed mostly of military commanders of the Taliban militia. This Shura continued to grow with the expansion of the territories under the control of the Taliban movement. The people living in these areas were not represented in the Kandahar Shura. The Shura remains a body of the Taliban movement. Its expansion is explained by the increasing number of Taliban officials running the territories conquered by the militia who, therefore, acquired a status in the consultation process of the movement. By September 1996 when the Taliban took over Kabul, the Kandahar Shura was known to count between 80 and 100 members. The growing size of the Kandahar Shura questioned to a certain extent its usefulness and cohesiveness as an organ of consultation. It is in this context that a second Shura emerged, the Kabul Shura.

The fall of Kabul into the hands of the Taliban forced the movement to reconsider the structure of its decision-making process. The existence of the reminiscence of a government administration in Kabul had to be integrated in the Taliban scheme for temporary governance. Of this administration remained only some buildings and few civil servants. Most of the equipment was looted during the factional wars and many of the government employees, being unpaid, had left their functions.

In the fall of 1996, the Taliban leadership in Kandahar dispatched to Kabul a series of prominent members to take charge of these government functions, each of them referring to his position as acting-head of a department or ministry. However, the absence of a taxation system, the weakness of the infrastructure, and the lack of professional expertise to run the administration has impaired considerably the capacity of the Kabul Shura and its members to act on any policies, besides security and police measures. To a certain extent, it appears that the interest of the Taliban movement in taking charge of the administration and the ministerial functions in Kabul has been dictated by the need to relate with the international community which still regards Kabul as the political capital of Afghanistan, more than any interest in the reminiscence of the administration. The high moments of the activities of the Ministers appear to be limited to the reception of foreign journalists, diplomats, or representatives of an international organization in their almost empty and dysfunctional offices. Apart from the security apparatus, only the ministries that relate with major assistance programmes or public relations seem to be still active, such as public health (hospitals), education (schools), planning (coordination of NGOs), communication and information (spokesperson), and foreign affairs.

On the basis of this high-level presence of Taliban in the city, a new Shura has been created in Kabul, gathering together several times a week the heads of the ministries and some other prominent members of the Taliban movement in Kabul. The composition of this Shura has certainly been carefully managed in its relation with the Kandahar Shura. The leadership of the movement has to be sufficiently represented in Kabul to be a counterpart of the international community, without dislocating the center of power of the movement. The constant turnover of positions at the ministerial level that took place since the inception of this new “government” has been one of the ways to prevent the Kabul Shura to establish a distinct power base in Kabul. Despite these changes of portfolios, the constituting members of the Kabul Shura remain generally the same. The members commute frequently between Kandahar and Kabul, and radio contacts are maintained constantly between the two groups.

The function of the Kabul Shura does not differ from the one in Kandahar. It basically provides for a forum of consultation for the Taliban movement in Kabul. However, it should be noted that the Kabul Shura cannot take substantive decisions on any policy issue without first referring the matter to the Kandahar Shura, and eventually to the attention of Mullah Omar. Some observers argue that members of the Kabul Shura, and their Taliban subordinates in the ministries would like to see the Kabul Shura take a more executive role, motivating their insistence in seeing the UN agencies moving their country office in the Afghan capital from their present locations in Pakistan.

Also, the first Kandahar Shura seems to be losing its momentum. The increasing number of subject matters to be dealt with between the different provinces under Taliban control, and the rise of the Kabuli Shura as a more centered and cohesive process of consultation, has prompted the Taliban leadership to allow the emergence of a third Shura in Kandahar, called the Supreme Shura.

This Supreme Shura groups from six to 10 participants among the most influential members of the Taliban Movement, including some of the participants of the Kabul Shura. In many respects, this consultative body has always existed. It appears as a new embodiment of the nucleus surrounding Mullah Omar that has been forced out of its semi-clandestinity by the increasing burden in policy-making put on the shoulders of the Taliban movement and the increasing political role of the Kabul Shura. It presently deals with military and civil issues alike for the different provinces under Taliban's control and, contrary to the Kabul Shura, its positions are final. Taliban governors in the different cities, including Ghazni, Jalalabad and Herat, are accountable to the Supreme Shura in Kandahar. The overriding authority of the Kandahar Shura puzzles many observers of the political stage in Afghanistan as well as UN officials since its location in Kandahar questions the centrality and continuity of Kabul as the political capital of Afghanistan. According to some of them, a recognition of the supremacy of the Kandahar shuras, as the de facto executive bodies of the government, would have far-reaching political implications on the position of the UN agencies in the present conflict, and on the UN perspective on the future of the Afghan society.

In terms of policies, the evanescence of the Taliban structure and the centralization of its leadership have impeded the movement in the development of sound and flexible policies. The movement appears presently ill-equipped to answer the far-reaching requirements for the reconstruction of Afghanistan in terms of governance and technical programmes. The Taliban argue extensively that the establishment of a sound governmental structure with flexible policies needs to be postponed until the end of the present military campaign. This argument is certainly valid for political movements that demonstrated a capacity for governing the territory they control once peace is restored. This demonstration has not been made by the Taliban yet. They have shown only a limited capacity to rebuild and run an administration, with few exceptions such as the restoration of electricity in some parts of Kabul and Jalalabad.

To the credit of the Taliban movement, the mission observed the sense of order and personal security in the territory under the Taliban control. The mission was told that the checkpoints manned by undisciplined fighters have disappeared, and with them the harassment and the extortion of the civilian population. According to the UNHCR in Afghanistan, the return of one million refugees in these areas is an important sign of the benefits which this new regime has brought to these regions, in addition to the Taliban policy of return of the farm land to the original owners.

However, security remains a military issue. The restoration of a minimal order is not protective of a capacity to govern the regions once the hostilities have ended. The Taliban need to demonstrate a will to engage in a sustainable process of governance that requires flexibility and conciliatory skills, even for a government in a strict Islamic state. Moreover, it requires a political structure that can relate with the international community and engage in cooperation and dialogue on issues of international concern, such as gender discrimination, poppy cultivation, or the protection of the Afghan cultural heritage. Until now, some of the policies it has decreed, such as the closing of schools for girls, and the stubbornness of the authorities in applying them, reflect serious impediments in this regard. Other steps taken, such as the authorization for female health workers to resume their activities in a segregated environment, show an openness for a practical dialogue.

In this context, the evaluation of the Taliban capacity to govern is vital for the UN system. The conflicting views on the Taliban capacity to govern and will to cooperate has, until now, created significant gaps in the UN response to gender discrimination, for example between the UNICEF and WHO approaches. These gaps will be examined next, in Section III of the report. The DHA mission attempted to evaluate the Taliban will and ability to cooperate in engaging the Taliban leadership in a dialogue on cooperation with the UN agencies. This attempt is described and analyzed in Section IV. [1]

12193. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (III) Analytical Framework of the UN Responses
to the Taliban Regime. Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: Historical Background of the UN Response: Early UN Perception of the Taliban Policies. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. Undoubtedly, the arrival of the Taliban on the Afghan political stage created new constraints for the UN agencies in Afghanistan. The agencies’ representatives dealing with the Taliban authorities realized early on that the Taliban had only rudimentary knowledge of technical matters linked to their previous guerrilla warfare and how difficult it would be to argue constructively with these interlocutors. Moreover, the semi-clandestine political structure of the Taliban made the dialogue difficult. The Taliban interlocutors of the UN were not in a position to take substantial decisions pertaining to the work of the UN in Afghanistan.

From 1994 to the take over of Herat in September 1995, these constraints had a limited impact on the work of the agencies in Afghanistan. On the contrary, some agencies active in the countryside under the control of the Taliban were pleased with the new authorities. The Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the UN Office for Project Services (UNOPS), which were engaged in the rural rehabilitation programmes, were impressed by the capacity of the Taliban to restore a minimal order and guarantee the security of the agencies in these areas. Under the previous regime of factions, the different groups exerted considerable pressure on the agencies active in the areas under their control.Expensive military escorts were indispensable and the numerous checkpoints scattered along the road, as well as the number of undisciplined fighters wandering in the countryside, complicated the work of these agencies.

The stringent policies regarding women and access to schools did not raise much interest at first from these operational agencies, and later on from the UN system. The rural areas under the Taliban control until September 1995 were among the most conservative regions of Afghanistan. The policies of the Taliban were in line with these traditions and with the modus operandi of the local rural population under the factions. For example, because of the prevailing insecurity under the mujahidin commanders and the lack of resources, education was extremely limited and concentrated on boys, who will provide a living for their future family. Girls’ education was seen as secondary, and presented serious threats to the security of the girls over a certain age who had to travel sometimes significant distances on unsafe roads to attend their classes.

Furthermore, the gap between the UN understanding of women’s status and that of the Taliban was so large that discussion became extremely difficult. The Taliban were generally unaware that a different perspective on the role of women prevailed at an international level, and that they had to relate with it. The experience of the British NGO Merlin in Kandahar is illustrative. A few weeks after the take over of Kandahar by the Taliban, Merlin was one of the first NGOs to send a female expatriate to the area. At the outset, it agreed to the Taliban’s conditions, including that this expatriate should wear the traditional “burqa” (a full veil covering the women from head to toe with an embroidered grill covering their eyes) in the presence of men, including male expatriates. Later, a mission of foreign diplomats visited Kandahar. A member of this mission was an unveiled woman. Following exposure to this women (unveiled in the presence of men), and a request by the UN in Kandahar, the Governor of Kandahar agreed in writing to exempt female expatriates from wearing the “burqa”. This policy regarding the female expatriates is still in force today.

The FAO and UNOPS experience with the Taliban in this period was one of cohabitation and mutual observation. The Taliban did not have the capacity to interact with the professionals of the agencies on the substance of their work, except from the standpoint of some of the Taliban’s own experience as farmers or stock-breeders. Taliban representatives were regularly informed of the work and of the agendas of the agencies. Some of the members of the movement participated in training sessions offered to the local peasants, such as training for the maintenance of orchards. Other agencies, such as the World Food Program (WFP) and UNICEF, did not consider the recent decisions on the gender issue as constituting a definite precedent. The regime was young and unexperienced. In general, the Taliban movement was considered to be an unusual offspring of the various factions that was, in their view, hardly sustainable.

The UN perception of the movement started to change when, in September 1995, the Taliban militia reached the outskirts of Kabul and took over Herat. The fall of Herat to the Taliban appeared, to many observers, as a turning point of the military campaign undertaken by the Taliban. The Taliban controlled a region that was, until then, predominantly Pushtun, calling into question the analysis that the movement has been basically a rural Pushtun phenomenon. The stringent policies of the Taliban were applied as well in Herat with the same strength. Women were not allowed to work, except in the health services and under specific conditions, and schools for girls were closed.

The first organization to react to the new policies was Save-the-Children UK (SCF-UK). SCF-UK opened an office in Herat in 1994. Its activities focused on the education and health sector, with a strong emphasis on training. The Taliban policies on gender forced most of these programmes to be suspended. Many of the beneficiaries were Afghan women, as well as most of the trainers. Moreover, the continuous obligation of the Taliban Governor to meet with the SCF-UK representative in Herat, who was a woman, blocked any form of substantive dialogue with the Taliban local authorities. A mission of SCF came from abroad to try to unlock the situation in early 1996, without success. Consequently, SCF-UK, supported by SCF-US and the International SCF Alliance, decided, on 6 March 1996, to suspend their education and non-emergency programmes in the regions where girls or women were denied access to education, or where the employment of women had been prohibited by the regional authorities.

This policy of SCF-UK challenged openly the prevailing modus operandi of the UN system which, until then, avoided entering into a confrontation with the Taliban authorities. The conditionality of international assistance, which requests policy changes from the Taliban as a precondition for the assistance programme, was seen by most of the agencies as a disproportionate and potentially counterproductive strategy. Furthermore, the attention of the UN agencies was centered on Kabul, still under the Rabbani’s regime, where educated women still had access to employment, and schools, to the extent they still existed, were accepting girls. After protest from Afghanistan women’s groups and other NGOs, UNICEF decided to stop school education programmes in some Taliban areas because girls had been expelled.

The reality of the life of women in Kabul and in other non-Taliban areas was not ideal either. It was reported to the mission that unhindered criminal activities, including abduction of young girls, rape and forced marriages of young girls with local commanders presented a constant threat to women. According to UN staff, even in areas where women had access to schools and employment, the overall lack of security and disregard for human rights by the factions’ members could have justified the conditionality of UN assistance.

In discussions with the DHA mission, women living in the regions under the NIMA still express their serious concerns for their security, which prevent many of them from exercising their access to schools and employment. With regard to the imposition of the “burqa”, the mission observed that, roughly, 90% of women in Mazar-I-Sharif wear the “burqa”, even though, under NIMA rules, there are not forced to, suggesting they do so of their own volition. The few women without burqa were seen in the surroundings of the university of Balkh and in UN offices. Otherwise, on the streets and in the market, the vast majority of Afghan women wore the traditional garment.

Despite the efforts of several NGOs, and certain members of the staff of the UN agencies, the prevailing modus operandi regarding the Taliban policies generally prevailed. The argument of most of the agencies in the field and at headquarters was that the Taliban was not a sustainable movement. One simply needed to be patient, rather than engage in an ambiguous precedent in conditioning the UN programmes of assistance. [1] to the Taliban Regime, Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: Historical Background of the UN Response: The Search for a United Front on Gender. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The take over of Kabul in September 1996 forced the UN system to completely reconsider its approach toward the Taliban. For many observers, the fall of Kabul on 27 September took the international community by surprise. According to many UN staff, no one expected to see Kabul taken so rapidly, leaving the agencies without the time to consult on the UN's response to Taliban policies.

Moreover, Kabul has always been the symbol of modernity in Afghanistan. A cosmopolitan city where women had their role in the administration of the government. Many of the UN expatriates when questioned about the Afghan situation, related mainly with the Kabul reality, particularly regarding women. Educated women in Kabul participated fully in the work of some agencies and constituted a substantial part of their secretarial, health and training staff. The shock of the fall of Kabul overran the traditional pragmatic approach of the agencies engaged in the Taliban rural areas, since for the first time, an important number of UN female staff were directly affected.

The UN system realized that it had to respond to this affront. Not only did this policy of gender discrimination seems to maintain itself, it now compromised the ability of the UN system to employ women. Furthermore, the UN agencies were in a difficult position, having to pay their female workers at home, and employ new male staff in the positions left vacant. The UN system needed to vigorously denounce these new rules to prevent the Taliban policies in Kabul from becoming a fait accompli regarding the employment practices of the UN agencies. Still today, one of the basic constraints in moving the UN agencies country directors’ office from Pakistan to Kabul, apart from the security conditions, is the policy of the Taliban excluding women from the workforce.

Donors in Islamabad, and New York, met urgently in early October 1996 to request the UN system to take a strong position on the gender policies of the Taliban. The response of the UN system was rapid and strong. On 4 October, the High Commissioner for Human Rights, Josué Ayala-Lasso appealed to the leader of the Taliban to ensure the respect for the basic rights of all Afghans, particularly women (See Annex 05). On October 7, the Secretary-General, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, stated his dismay toward these policies which he considered contrary to fundamental humanitarian principles. He requested the UN agencies to respond in an appropriate and concerted manner to these policies (See Annex 06).

In a matter of a week, the conditionality of assistance that was previously applied to the NGO approach, entered the realm of the UN system. On 10 October, WFP Executive Director Catherine Bertini announced that, in view of recent events in Afghanistan, humanitarian operations there could be threatened and must be reassessed. She added that “the decision by the Taliban movement to ban women from working outside the home, as well as to ban education for girls, poses serious consequences for WFP’s activities in Afghanistan” (See Annex 07). In the following weeks, WFP decided to impose a temporary and partial suspension of deliveries of food to the country. This suspension has targeted non-emergency food assistance, in particular food-for-work programmes, and programmes where the equality of access between men and women was not guaranteed. UNICEF followed suit in extending in November its suspension to the rehabilitation of schools considering the inequality of access under the Taliban regime (See Annex 08). Other agencies such as the UNHCR reserved their position until further consultations with the field on the implementation of a gender-sensitive approach. WHO, through its office in Islamabad, dissented from this assertive trend by pleading for a more pragmatic approach to the gender issue in Afghanistan. This awakening of the UN system to the policies of the Taliban was abrupt and left the UN staff in Afghanistan confused. It appeared inconsistent with the previous positions. Some of the senior UN staff in the field, in Afghanistan and Islamabad, among WFP, UNICEF, UNHabitat, FAO and UNOPS, explained that they were not consulted prior to this reversal of policies, and had few hints on how to implement these concerns on Afghan women’s education and employment.

Furthermore, similar restrictions on women’s access to schools and employment had already been implemented in regions under the mujahedin commanders, apart from Kabul, Herat, or Mazar-i-Sharif. These restrictions went beyond the Taliban/NIMA front line and affected each province, although they were not equally implemented. For example, under the previous regime, the Governor of Jalalabad ordered in November 1994 all international agencies to stop hiring their Afghan female workers (See Annex 09). According to the UN staff in Jalalabad, one UN agency discharged its only female staff member in Jalalabad (as well as Medicins-Sans-Frontieres), and the other agencies refrained from hiring any Afghan female workers from then on. No specific instructions were given at the time on how the UN agencies should respond to these constraints.

The lack of common operational guidelines and the different strategic approaches among the agencies dealing with gender discrimination prompted the emergence of distinct schools of thought and triggered passionate debates between the agencies in the field. Some of the NGOs, SCF-US and Oxfam for example, played a significant role in feeding this debate and arguing for an intransigent stand with the Taliban authorities. Despite the attempt at the IFCA in Ashkhabad to anchor this debate into a process of consultation, an inflammatory discourse seems to embrace the gender issue, with the use of antagonistic language in the media. One might consider the extent to which such a discourse is propitious to the elaboration of a common operational approach.

Since these policies have been in force in half the country for more than 18 months, in Kandahar for more than 2 years, and in some locations even before the Taliban, it allows us now to document the social and economic consequences of these policies and to draw a common strategy to orient, on that basis, the agencies, and to set priorities for the UN response to gender discrimination in Afghanistan. This proposal is further discussed in Section V. Meanwhile, we will consider in more detail the assumptions underlying these different approaches and the actions that were taken on their basis. [=] ambush convoys of aid agencies. The DRS set up an alternative power structure composed of elders and respected individuals in the communities to act as the recipient authorities of the humanitarian assistance provided by the agencies. These DRS were, nevertheless, not sustainable beyond their role as counterpart in the agencies’ scheme.

Contrary to the DRS experiment, the PEACE initiative aimed at directing the assistance directly to the communities’ entities, in existing projects or by creating new programs. It plans to resume certain programmes in terms of neighborhood infrastructure, and was able to assist in providing, for example, sewage rehabilitation and garbage removal. As incentives, Habitat provided the funding for larger tasks such as the pavement of the street. In addition, community centers flourished providing vocational training and primary health care to the neighborhood population.

12196. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (III) Analytical Framework of the UN Responses to the Taliban Regime, Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: Illustrations of the Different UN Approaches: Illustration of the ‘Principle-Centered’ Approach. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. As we saw, the “Principle-Centered” approach gained momentum at the fall of Kabul in September 1996, particularly among UNICEF and WFP. Already, UNICEF applied this approach to its assistance programmes to schools in areas under the control of the Taliban prior to the fall of Kabul. It implies the conditionality of certain programmes of assistance as an incitement to bring about policy changes. This conditionality has been reasserted in a UN press release of 1 April 1997. In terms of education, the request of UNICEF concerns the access of girls to schools where these schools existed and used to provide education to female students. UNICEF demonstrated a willingness to assist other types of schools, such as home-schooling, in areas where schools did not exist, or did not provide access to girls prior to the arrival of the Taliban. In terms of curriculum, UNICEF requested the same curriculum for both boys and girls, in accordance with the international standards, before allowing programmes of assistance to resume.

It should be mentioned that, while not a scientific sampling, among the 45 Afghan women met by the DHA mission in Afghanistan, a vast majority of them disapproved the conditionality of assistance in the field of education. They see the education of boys and girls alike as essential for the emancipation of women in the Afghan society. Furthermore, many of them, as mothers, did not like to see their boys, in addition to their girls, suffer from a position of the Taliban authorities.

At WFP, the first reaction after the fall of Kabul to suspend non-emergency food programmes had a major impact on the population concerned, according to a WFP staff member. This first decision was followed in December by a series of assessments to determine which programme could be resumed. In January 1997, WFP issued policy guidelines defining the criteria under which assistance could be resumed. These criteria aim at assisting vulnerable populations such as ‘widows and IDPs, and institutions that can guarantee the equality of access for men and women. However, WFP saw its efforts to exert pressure on the Taliban weakened by the increased food assistance of other organizations, such as the ICRC, that took over some of its programmes.

From early on, the UNHCR tried to maintain its contact with the Taliban and develop a form of dialogue. Recently, it succeeded in convincing the Ministry of Repatriation to allow the Afghan female staff of the UNHCR to resume their professional activities in the framework of a “loan to the widows” project. According to UNHCR staff, the project required several weeks of negotiation with the Ministry of Repatriation to arrange for seven female UNHCR staff and seven female staff of the Ministry to work in returnees settlements. Two more women were allowed to work in the offices of the Ministry of Repatriation for the project.

WHO succeeded in ensuring the access of female health staff to their employment. Here again, several weeks were required to convince Taliban authorities of the tremendous consequences of forbidding female employment in the health sector. According to WHO staff, the perspective of having Afghan women treated by unrelated Afghan men triggered the Taliban opening for the continued employment of Afghan female staff. The segregation of the staff in the hospital still caused major problems in the delivery of health services as nurses are hindered in contacting male physicians on professional issues. Moreover, the closing of the medical and nursing classes to female student questions the sustainability of the Taliban policies.

UNICEF and UNHCR recently extended assistance to schools for boys and girls in IDP camps near Herat. In March 1997, the Taliban Governor of Herat requested assistance for schools in IDP camps in his province. After negotiations of the terms of this assistance and consultations in Islamabad, UNICEF and UNHCR engaged themselves in providing basic assistance to these schools. Still in Herat, UNHCR and several NGOs succeeded in resuming vocational training programmes for women, but keeping a low profile on them. According to the International Assistance Mission (IAM) in Herat, authorizations have been obtained from the Taliban underlying the health aspects of the programmes and the fact that women will only work and study with other women.

WFP in Jalalabad entered into negotiations with the Taliban to obtain the necessary authorizations from the authorities to allow six women to resume their work as monitors of the WFP bakery project in Jalalabad.

Other experiments have failed. For example, the attempt by UNDP to propose to the Taliban authorities the rehabilitation of 20 schools, from which 10 would be devoted to boys’ education, and 10 to girls’ education. The Taliban authorities responded positively to this initiative regarding the rehabilitation of schools, but did not commit themselves regarding the allocation of the new schools.

Another example of a failed experiment is the attempt of UNOPS in Herat to continue to employ women to monitor their programmes. As these women were not authorized to come to the unsegregated office, they were given walkie-talkie by UNOPS to operate from their home. Security incidents (the stealing of the equipment) and pressure of the Taliban stopped the initiative of UNOPS.
"Principle-Centered" approach, the "Tip-Toe" approach, and the "Community Empowerment" approach. Each of these approaches is based on a distinct driving assumption about the Taliban authorities and constitutes an argument on its own on how to deal with this new regime. For each approach, we present the plan of action observed by the DHA mission and an analysis of the potential benefits and possible shortcomings. The purpose of this analysis is to allow us to take some distance with the different arguments, to judge the validity and the potential shortcomings of their assumptions, and eventually find a common approach that may answer the concerns of all the agencies. It should be underlined that these approaches do not belong to specific agencies, although some are, at this stage, identified with some of them. Subsection 3.4 will illustrate in details these three approaches through the different UN agencies' responses to gender discrimination in Afghanistan. [+]

12199. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (III) Analytical Framework of the UN Responses to the Taliban Regime, Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: The UN Responses to Gender Discrimination in Afghanistan: Applicable International Legal Standards, UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. We undertake in this Section a case study of the UN responses to gender discrimination in Afghanistan. For the sake of clarity, we will briefly address the applicable legal standards, both international and Islamic, and a short review of the context of the gender issues in Afghanistan. Afghanistan, as a founding member of the UN, has ratified a great number of international human rights instruments, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the Convention on the elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. These instruments provide for the principle of equality between men and women, and for special protection of women against discriminatory rules and treatment. The first and foremost instrument of this series is the UN Charter that refers to the principle of equality in its preamble "to reaffirm faith in human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women". The Universal Declaration of Human Rights affirms the principle of the inadmissibility of discrimination and proclaims that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights and that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth therein, without distinction of any kind, including distinction based on sex. The International Covenants on Human Rights proclaims the obligation of the States to ensure the equal rights of men and women to enjoy all economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights. According to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, discrimination against women violates the principles of equality of rights and respect for human dignity. It is an obstacle to the participation of women, on equal terms with men, in the political, social, economic and cultural life of their countries. It hampers the growth of the prosperity of society and the family and makes more difficult the full development of the potentialities of women in the service of their countries. As a party to these international instruments, it is required of all Afghan authorities to uphold the standards as laid down, and that the Afghan authorities are answerable if those standards are not observed. In legal terms, the extent to which the Taliban are subject to international obligations has been questioned since only the Government of Afghanistan should be the holder of the rights and the debtor of the obligations contracted by the State of Afghanistan. Different UN bodies, such as the UN Security Council, the UN Secretary-General and the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights have considered over the past year the Taliban as a facto authority in Afghanistan. It appears, furthermore, that the Taliban interest in being recognized as the government of Afghanistan by the international community and entering in cooperation with foreign entities, has presented numerous opportunities to underline the international obligations incumbent to this position. [+]

12200. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (III) Analytical Framework of the UN Responses to the Taliban Regime, Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: The UN Responses to Gender Discrimination in Afghanistan: Taliban Policies and the Re-Islamization of Afghan Society. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. As we saw in Section I, the emergence of Islamic fundamentalism and the spread of Taliban movements in early 1990s challenged the modern secularization of public life in Afghanistan. The declared aim of these re-Islamization movements, known by various names throughout Afghan history and from which the Taliban emerged, is to reestablish Shari'a as the sole source of all aspects of law, both public and private. Some observers argue that these movements can be seen as a reaction to the western attempts at secularization of Afghan urban society, particularly Kabul, which is blamed by many Afghans for the political frustration of the rural population and the following disorganization of society and civil war. Others see this re-Islamization as being politically motivated by the interests of a non-urban elite to establish a legitimate basis of power, in the margin of the Afghan modern project. This basis of power is provided by the Afghan family, as the single most important institution in the society, in which the role of women is paramount. According to a renowned ethnologist on Afghanistan, personal honor and family honor, as codes of conduct of the Afghan family, rest on the behavior of female family members. Already the Pashtunwali, the tribal code of the Pashtuns, imposes serious constraints on the emancipation of women, and restricts their access to the public sphere. It was reported to the DHA mission, for instance, that the Pakistani Refugee Administration and the UNHCR encountered difficulties in attracting girls to the schools for Afghan refugees in Peshawar. With only 20% of girls attending schools at one point, it was decided to provide incentives in the form of food to families who sent girls to primary schools. Despite these incentives, female attendance rate increased only marginally with Afghan families continuing to resist education for female family members. Beyond tribal codes, the religious movements in general, the Taliban in particular, insist on their own strict interpretation of the Shari'a to maintain the purity of women. Separate spaces for men and women to preserve modesty and decency are seen as essential. Interactions between the sexes outside the group of acceptable male guardians including father, brother or son, are strictly forbidden. While conceding that men and women have equal rights to seek religious knowledge, the need for women's education lie solely in receiving the instruction necessary for the proper performance of religious duties (basic literacy). The thought, implied by modern education, of preparing for work outside the home is, in this context, inconceivable. To some extent, maintaining secular schools for girls, even when separate and taught by female teachers, are seen as the site of possible moral corruption. In their take over of Kabul in April 1992, the Islamic groups asserted their visions on the re-Islamization of Afghanistan. As described in Section I, previous un-Islamic laws were declared void. The tenets of a strict interpretation of the Shari'a were promulgated by the new government of the Islamic State of Afghanistan, including the confinement of women to their home and the imposition of the veil. These tenets were loosely implemented in the fragmented political environment of the time. Some argue that the strict implementation of the Shari'a principles derived not so much of a distinct interpretation of Shari'a under the Taliban, but simply from the consistence of this group in its re-Islamization mission, and its control over a greater part of Afghanistan. The Taliban, like many other Afghan Islamic groups before them, do not recognize the former legal documents, including the UN conventions ratified by past governments, declaring them as foreign to Islamic society. Contrary to previous groups, they are strictly imposing their precepts without any interest in relating with the existing practices or substantially integrate the international community. Their decrees emphasize religious conduct and obligations which are harshly enforced by their religious police. From early on, the movement closed the doors of education and employment to women despite the traumatic repercussions felt in Kabul, and in the world. This exclusion of women has considerably affected numerous government and international programmes, considered in many respects as sinful by the Taliban by the admixture of men and women and the modern ideas they conveyed. Some modifications were made in the health sector where women are allowed to work as long as they abide by Islamic conventions by observing the dress code, work in segregated spaces and travel with escorts. When schools reopened after the winter vacations in March 1997, only boys were accepted at the Kabul University and headmasters were directed not to register girls at schools.

In a meeting with the DHA mission, the Acting Minister of Education, Sayyed Ghaysuddin Aghar, argued that access to education for girls would be reestablished once security conditions would allow girls to go to their classes, and schools can offer an appropriate Islamic education in terms of segregated classes and curriculum. He explained that the Taliban favor education for girls, as provided for in the Shari'a. However, this education should be based and undertaken in accordance with Islamic principles and objectives. The representative of the Taliban movement in Islamabad, Muhammad Masoom Afghani, confirmed that the Shari'a-based opportunities will be the only ones offered to women, depending on security conditions and the availability of resources. [±]

12201. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (III) Analytical Framework of the UN Responses to the Taliban Regime, Particularly Regarding Gender Discrimination: The UN Responses to Gender Discrimination in Afghanistan: The Gender Issue in an Afghan Islamic Perspective. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The vast majority of the Afghan people, men and women alike, recognize and accept Islam as the foundation of the Afghan way of life and of the Afghan legal system. Many interpretations have been developed over the years on the precepts of the Islamic law (Shari'a). The religious nature of Shari'a makes it difficult for Muslims to appear critical to that law, so interpretation is the only available way to make the law progress through time and situations. These interpretations of the legal sources, the Qur'an and the Sunna, are numerous and constitute the basis for several schools of thought.

In the past, no central Afghan religious authority was given exclusive rights to interpret religious precepts. Afghans with different interpretations of the Shari'a coexisted contentedly. The war brought to the forefront groups that based the legitimacy on strict interpretations of the Shari'a. As a consequence, the traditional Afghan tolerance and openness to various interpretations was strained. Religious conservatives claimed the right to decide who was “a good Muslim”. These conservatives confronted those who argued that the principle of equality between men and women was central to Islamic tenets. They generally held that if women are permitted to move freely in the public arena, sexual anarchy will result and society will fall into ruin.

In general, Shari'a is concerned with guaranteeing certain minimum rights for women and not with achieving complete legal equality between men and women. In this context, Islamic scholars argue that Shari'a should be understood in its historic and cultural environment. In a historical perspective (Shari'a law has over 1200 years of legal interpretation), some scholars argue that Shari'a has had, and for a very long time, a positive impact on the rights of the women. From its beginning in the seventh century, Shari'a guaranteed all Muslim women an independent legal personality, including the capacity to hold and dispose of property in their own right, a specific share of inheritance, access to education (provided it is conducted in a segregated manner) and some participation in public life. In the family sphere, Shari'a restricted polygamy and guaranteed the wife's right to maintenance. It provided also the right for a judicial divorce, under specific conditions. These achievements may not appear impressive in a modern perspective, but they represent very significant improvements of the women's condition of the time. However, when compared to other contemporary legal systems, or judged by the international standards, Shari'a offers limited guarantees for women in the 20th century. Gender segregation and the requirement of the veil, as a general rule, diminish the practical value of the women's rights under Shari'a and restrain the women's ability to achieve economic independence and to secure access to education.

Islamic scholars did not yet invest the efforts required to elaborate a regime of protection of women's rights that would favorably compare with international standards. Furthermore, a space for these interpretations has not been created yet in the modern discourse on human rights. On the contrary, movements toward equality and emancipation of women have been linked throughout the Muslim world with efforts of secularization of Muslim societies, challenging not so much the different interpretations of Shari'a, but the centrality of its role in Muslim life. To some extent, this inability of Islamic scholars to generate a competitive regime of protection for women has created an unstable gap between the two sets of standards. This gap has, in turn, allowed opponents and proponents of the two models of society to argue extensively on the role and status of women in the service of larger political interests. The resulting politicization of women's issues has become highly sensitive and potentially volatile in the Afghan context, because of the centrality of women in the traditional Afghan concepts of family and honor. [±]

12202. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (IV) Perspectives for Cooperation and Dialogue Between the UN Agencies and the Afghan Authorities: Comments on the Taliban's Proposal. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. In our view, the Taliban proposal, which was endorsed by the Kabul Shura on 1 May 1997, represents a significant breakthrough in the dialogue between the UN system and the Taliban authorities. It sets a written basis for discussions on cooperation and dialogue. It may allow a variety of issues and operational agendas to be addressed in a privileged environment in which Taliban officials could be advised on the development of sound policies in terms of governance and in terms of applicable international standards. Furthermore, it demonstrates at the highest echelon of the Taliban movement an interest in engaging in a form of practical dialogue with the UN agencies. In this context, we believe the UN system should devote significant attention in responding to this proposal in a constructive manner.

On the other hand, the DHA mission observed that the Taliban's will to engage in cooperation is far from being the central issue in promoting a new relationship with the movement. Its limited capacity to engage in substantial processes of policy-making, or in the implementation of governmental programmes remains the main obstacle to a meaningful cooperation. To illustrate this point, one might consider the experience of the UNHCR in the last months of 1996 when the agency tried to convince the Taliban authorities to declare an amnesty in favor of the returnees. The intervention was made in order to promote the return of hundreds of thousands of refugees living in neighboring Pakistan and Iran. The Taliban were very receptive to the idea and all the echelons consulted in Kabul agreed with the request. The UNHCR prepared a draft of an amnesty, to be used as an example to help the authorities in this process. This draft was translated into Pushtu and circulated among the relevant authorities, and the UNHCR officials remained available for further discussions. Unfortunately, the amnesty never came. It appears that even if the Taliban had been willing to decree an amnesty, this policy would have remained meaningless since the central authorities hardly control the local judiciary system.

In this context, the implementation of an agreement with the Taliban seems far more complicated that the process to reach an agreement. The present structure of the movement, described in Section II, and the absence of a functional administration preclude the movement from undertaking substantial reforms or actions at a national level. Even if some of the civil servants that could take the necessary actions to implement an agreement with the UN system are still in place, many are not yet entrusted with the authority to undertake substantial action in the name of the government. Therefore, whatever is the will of the present Taliban authorities, one should not expect major achievements from a cooperation arrangement with the Taliban in their present state.

The question remains to determine if the development of cooperation arrangements with the Taliban are worth the efforts. In our view, the UN system has no real choice. It has to invest reasonable efforts into promoting a substantive dialogue with the Taliban simply to manage the existing gap between their vision of Afghan society, and the international standards to be respected. Furthermore, one should acknowledge the Taliban’s impact on the political landscape of Afghanistan, restructuring Afghan society on Islamic tenets and modeling a new society of Afghanistan. Secretary of the Commander of the Believers and spokesperson of the Taliban movement in Kandahar, Mr. Alfredo Witschi-Cestari, head of UNOCHA, on 28 April, who has been preparing a response in consultation with the UN agencies and DHA headquarters. (The English translation of the proposal is attached in Annex 04, the original in Pushtu is with UNOCHA in Islamabad).

Several features are worth being underlined in this proposal. First, as stated in the proposal, the Taliban movement is interested in establishing a platform for a permanent dialogue at a professional level with the UN agencies on the elaboration of projects and programmes of assistance. In addition, this technical platform could be used to promote an understanding of the needs of the Afghan population, men and women. In this respect, the Taliban leadership has proposed to the UN system that women expatriates participate in the technical consultations in identifying the priorities of the UN programmes of assistance regarding women's needs in Afghanistan (point 3.4 of the proposal).

Finally, the Taliban leadership is interested in using such a platform for discussions on the legal status of UN staff in Afghanistan, as well as exchange of views on the Afghan and international legal standards applicable to programmes of assistance in Afghanistan. [=]

12203. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (IV) Perspectives for Cooperation and Dialogue Between the UN Agencies and the Afghan Authorities: General Discussions on Cooperation Arrangements with the Afghan Authorities. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. In the terms of reference of the DHA mission, the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs asked the mission to propose a practical framework for the elaboration of a common understanding of the UN humanitarian mandate in Afghanistan, in cooperation with the Afghan authorities.

The mission engaged in discussions with the Afghan authorities in Kabul, Kandahar and Mazar-i-Sharif on the different ways to enhance the cooperation between the UN agencies and the Afghan authorities. The authorities of the National Islamic Movement of Afghanistan (NIMA) based in Mazar-i-Sharif welcomed the initiative of the DHA but considered the present framework of contact and relationship as adequate. Their concerns were more oriented toward the implementation of programmes than the development of an understanding on the UN objectives on which they basically concur. They would like, on the other hand, to see some of the UN funding for assistance channeled through the authorities to assist them in maintaining the services to the population.

The authorities of the Islamic State of Afghanistan based in Kabul, as well as the leadership of the Taliban movement based in Kandahar, expressed their interest in developing a framework for the elaboration of a common understanding between the Taliban and the UN agencies on the UN programmes of assistance and rehabilitation in the region they control. Already, this interest had been conveyed to the country directors of the UN agencies active in Afghanistan in the course of a workshop on UN programmes organized by UNOCHA (the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance) the first week of April 1997. In the course of this workshop which attracted prominent members of the Taliban, such as the Governor of Kandahar, Mullah Mohammad Hasan, open discussions took place on the opportunities and constraints of the UN work in Afghanistan. In the same trend, discussions between Taliban representatives and UNOCHA, in the first months of 1997, addressed in particular the need to establish a process of technical consultation between the UN system and the Taliban authorities in the areas under their control.

12204. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: (IV) Perspectives for Cooperation and Dialogue Between the UN Agencies and the Afghan Authorities: Taliban's Proposal for the Establishment of a ‘Joint Technical Committee’ with the UN Agencies. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The Supreme Shura in Kandahar decided on 27 April to present a proposal to the DHA mission for the establishment of a “Joint Technical Committee” on international assistance to Afghanistan. This proposal was handed over to the mission by Mullah Yakub Ahmad Muttla, Secretary of the Commander of the Believers and spokesperson of the Taliban movement in Kandahar. The proposal was transmitted to Mr. Alfredo Witschi-Cestari, head of UNOCHA, on 28 April, who has been preparing a response in consultation with the UN agencies and DHA headquarters. (The English translation of the proposal is attached in Annex 04, the original in Pushtu is with UNOCHA in Islamabad).

Several features are worth being underlined in this proposal. First, as stated in the proposal, the Taliban movement is interested in establishing a platform for a permanent dialogue at a professional level with the UN agencies on the elaboration of projects and programmes of assistance. In addition, this technical platform could be used to promote an understanding of the needs of the Afghan population, men and women. In this respect, the Taliban leadership has proposed to the UN system that women expatriates participate in the technical consultations in identifying the priorities of the UN programmes of assistance regarding women's needs in Afghanistan (point 3.4 of the proposal).

Finally, the Taliban leadership is interested in using such a platform for discussions on the legal status of UN staff in Afghanistan, as well as exchange of views on the Afghan and international legal standards applicable to programmes of assistance in Afghanistan. [=]
Recommendations. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. From the analysis of the DHA mission, three main set of recommendations for the promotion of a common and sustainable approach can be underlined:

1. To reassert the principles of the UN and, on that basis, to identify practical arrangements for the engagement of the UN agencies in Afghanistan.

   Practical recommendations:
   - Under the leadership of the Humanitarian Coordinator, UN agencies should review their present policies and develop a common response to issues of common concern, such as gender discrimination in Afghanistan.
   - Under the leadership of the Humanitarian Coordinator, UN agencies should agree on a set of practical and realistic objectives on which a common strategy and position could be built.
   - Under the supervision of the Humanitarian Coordinator, a UN team composed of male and female expatriates should undertake an assessment of the situation of Afghan women throughout Afghanistan, and elaborate a set of practical objectives for UN agencies to sensitize the authorities on the implications of their policies, and to improve the conditions of Afghan women.
   - Regarding gender, efforts should be made to employ an increasing number of expatriate women to elaborate and support practical arrangements regarding programs of assistance to women in Afghanistan, and employment of Afghan women in UN operations.
   2. To engage in a dialogue with the authorities and to better understand their functioning.

   Practical recommendations:
   - UN agencies country representatives and UN policy makers should further develop and strengthen their contacts with the Taliban authorities, particularly in Kandahar.
   - Appropriate time and resources should be devoted to assess and analyze the political developments in Afghanistan on an on-going basis.
   - To commit the resources and the expertise required to have a significant impact on the situation of the Afghan population.
   - Donors and head of agencies should support the elaboration of practical objectives and encourage the development of a common strategy for the implementation of these objectives.

   Close attention should be paid to providing for tangible and observable results for the concerned Afghan men, women and children in the framework of this engagement.

Finally, under the leadership of the Humanitarian Coordinator, the UN agencies should respond constructively to the proposal of the Taliban on the establishment of a “Joint technical committee” and invest the time and resources required to strengthen and develop the technical relationship with the Taliban authorities in the planning and the implementation of their programs. [=]

12207. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: Acknowledgment. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The DHA mission wishes to express its appreciation to all those who supported its work in the field and at headquarters. The DHA mission is thankful for the availability and openness of the UN agencies country directors and staff who kindly shared their views with the team.

The team is particularly grateful for the assistance provided by the UN Office for Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan, especially Mr. Alfredo Witschi-Cestari, Humanitarian Coordinator and UNDP Resident Representative, who provided the team with a constant support and sound advice in the undertaking of its mission. Special thanks go to Ms. Brigitte Neubacher, Assistant to the Humanitarian Coordinator in Islamabad, Angela Kearney, UNOCHA representative and her staff in Kabul, Mr. Dave Edwards from UNOCHA in Kandahar, and other UNOCHA staff in Herat and Mazar-I-Sharif.

Finally, the mission is particularly appreciative of the efforts of Mr. Muntaz Akhunzada, UNDP staff in Jalalabad and translator for the mission, for his kind and discerning assistance throughout the mission. [=]

The emergence of the Taliban Movement, now in control of most of the territory of Afghanistan, entailed challenges for the UN and non-governmental organizations. Among these are Taliban policies of gender discrimination in employment and education, as well as security of UN personnel and premises.

Scarcity of information about the Taliban Movement within the UN system and factors leading to its emergence affected how the UN agencies related with the Taliban authorities. A two-person mission from the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) traveled in Afghanistan for four weeks to assess the relationship of the UN agencies with the public authorities of Afghanistan and to identify opportunities and constraints of programmes of assistance to Afghanistan in the new environment.

Within the UN agencies and NGOs, there appeared multiple approaches of dealing with the Taliban based on differing assumptions about their organization and capacity. These approaches can be broadly categorized into three groups:

1. The “Principle-Centered” approach: making assistance conditional on change of policies that are in conflict with the UN charter and internationally recognized norms and principles.
2. The “Tip-Toe” approach: attempting pragmatic experiments on the ground hoping for the development of a practical arrangement with the Taliban authorities.
3. The “Community-Empowerment” approach: developing community capacity to act as counterparts to the UN agencies, in the margin of the authorities wherever possible.

With respect to the Taliban, the key issues are their willingness and ability to work cooperatively with the UN. They have demonstrated their willingness by forwarding to the DHA mission, a proposal for the establishment of a joint technical committee. They have proposed this committee to be a consultative body of professionals from the UN and the Islamic State of Afghanistan, to discuss regularly and in a privileged environment, programmes of assistance to Afghanistan, including the applicable international norms and principles. Significantly, the Taliban has invited expatriate women from the UN to participate in the proposed committee.

On the question of the ability of the Taliban to engage constructively with the UN, the mission has reservations. The mission observed a lack of capacity within the Movement to deal with issues of civil administration and the military campaign consistently having priority over these issues.

The DHA mission believes that a common consistent approach for the UN system in Afghanistan can only be developed on the basis of a clear understanding of the historical background and political implications of the Afghan policies regarding gender, and of the benefits and shortcomings of prevailing UN strategies.

A UN common approach should remain strong on principles, open to experimentation with the authorities on the basis of these principles, and supportive of the local communities. The readiness of the UN agencies to recognize the value of the different approaches and to integrate their positive elements in the agencies’ perspective will determine the ability of the UN system to elaborate a common approach.

The main recommendations of the DHA mission are:

- Time and resources should be devoted to assess and analyze the political development in Afghanistan on an ongoing basis.
- UN agencies should agree on a set of practical and realistic objectives on which a common strategy and position could be built regarding gender discrimination.
- UN agencies’ country representatives and UN policy makers should further develop and strengthen their contacts with the Taliban authority, particularly in Kandahar.

- A UN team should undertake an assessment of the situation of women in Afghanistan and elaborate a set of practical objectives for UN agencies to sensitize the authorities on the implications of their policies, and to improve the conditions of Afghan women.

- UN agencies should respond in a constructive manner to the proposal of the Taliban authorities for the establishment of “Joint technical committees” between professionals of the UN system and the Taliban authorities. [=]

12209. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: Introduction. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. Following a series of consultations at the International Forum on Assistance to Afghanistan (IFAA) held in Ashkhabad in January 1997 with UN agencies and national and international NGOs active in Afghanistan, the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, Mr. Yasushi Akashi, dispatched to the region a mission to study the constraints recently encountered by the UN agencies in the implementation of their humanitarian programmes in Afghanistan.

This report represents the observations and recommendations of the DHA mission. The purpose of the report is to provide policy makers of UN agencies with information on the prevailing constraints under which agencies are operating in Afghanistan. It addresses more specifically the constraints encountered in the Taliban controlled areas regarding the Taliban’s policies of gender discrimination, and offers a practical analytical framework for the various UN responses to these constraints.

The need for such a study arose from the discussions between UN agencies in Ashkhabad in which differences of approaches emerged on issues of UN concern in Afghanistan. The DHA mission observed that these various approaches were based on distinct sets of assumptions concerning the political structure of the Afghan authorities which needed to be further examined.

Beyond its commitment to the various issues such as gender, the environment and drug control, the dynamic of the UN engagement in Afghanistan relies on a continuum linking the objectives of the UN Charter and internationally recognized human rights, to the practices of the agencies under the constraints of the field. This dynamic is based on the ability of the UN system to elaborate a common understanding of the opportunities and constraints of UN work in Afghanistan. An understanding that supports the efforts of the agencies in the field while remaining in line with the guiding principles of the UN Organization.

The elaboration of such an understanding in Afghanistan appears, nevertheless, as an arduous process. The balancing exercise of combining principles and practical approaches in the Afghan context has been increasingly complicated and frustrating. Moreover, the DHA mission observed that the scarcity of background information at headquarters level on the changing Afghan political environment, and on the constraints it exerts on the UN agencies, has impaired the capacity of the UN system to respond in a practical manner to current issues of concern, such as gender discrimination in Afghanistan. These issues are being dealt within an abstract, and sometimes doctrinal environment, centered on the principles and leaving the agencies without the necessary operational guidelines to orient their response. As a consequence, conflicting agendas have emerged among UN agencies on how to implement the mandate of the UN organization on these specific issues.

The DHA mission hopes that its report will contribute positively to the elaboration of a common approach by the UN agencies in Afghanistan, particularly regarding the UN response to gender discrimination in that country. It encourages UN agencies and humanitarian organizations active in Afghanistan to further exchange their views concerning the Afghan situation, as well as the situation of women in Afghanistan, for the benefit of their operations and of their beneficiaries. [=]

12210. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Report of the DHA Mission to Afghanistan: Methodology. UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, Policy and Analysis Division, March 30-May 15, 1997. The DHA mission was composed of Claude Bruderlein, Policy Advisor at the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) in New York, and Adeel Ahmed, research assistant and Associate Humanitarian Affairs Officer at the Policy and Analysis Division of the DHA. The mission spent four weeks in the region, from 30 March to 2 May 1997, during which it traveled extensively throughout the country. The team met with more than 100 interlocutors from a large spectrum of authorities and organizations, including the UN Office for Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan, UN agencies and programs involved in Afghanistan, non-governmental organizations, both national and international, and representatives of the authorities of the National Islamic Movement of Afghanistan (NIMA) and of the Islamic State of Afghanistan (ISA). (A list of interlocutors is attached in Annex 01).

The objectives of the mission were to review the framework of dialogue and negotiation with the authorities of Afghanistan and to suggest a series of measures aimed at developing and improving the cooperation between the Afghan authorities and the UN agencies involved in Afghanistan, especially regarding the concerns of the UN system on gender discrimination in that country. (The terms of reference of the DHA mission are attached in Annex 02).

This report assumes no prior knowledge concerning Afghanistan nor of the UN response to the Afghan situation. As mentioned, the mission noticed the lack of background information, or the presence of contradictory information, among UN agencies and non-governmental organizations concerning Afghan recent history, particularly regarding the situation of the Afghan women. In an effort to promote a common understanding of the Afghan political environment and the situation of women, the mission felt the need to review briefly the history of Afghanistan from authoritative sources (see Annex 03) and introduces the main points of this preparatory review in Section I of the report.

Similarly, Section II of the report presents an analysis of the Taliban political structure in the Taliban-controlled areas from the observation of the mission during the numerous meetings which took place with a series of representatives of the Taliban movement. Since the Taliban movement, at the time of mission, controlled over 75% of the territory, the mission believed its origins and structure should be better understood in connection with any practical approach dealing with issues of concern in these areas. Section III introduces an analytical framework of the UN response to the recent developments in the Afghan situation and applies this framework for the UN response to the UN policies against gender discrimination of the Taliban movement. Comments on the Taliban proposal for the establishment of a joint technical committee on the cooperation with the UN (see Annex 04) are presented in Section IV. Section V draws the main conclusions and recommendations of the mission. [=]

(165) The representative of the United States said that the Conference should be the occasion for a constructive, practical reaffirmation of the shared commitment to peaceful co-operation. To a large extent, this expectation had been fulfilled, and a large degree of consensus had emerged. There was agreement on such important population matters as the necessity for viewing family programmes within a development framework and the unacceptability of government coercion in any form in connection with population programmes. He welcomed the Conference’s affirmation that abortion was not to be considered or promoted as an acceptable element of population control programmes.

(166) Commenting on that part of recommendation 3 which called for an increase of earnings from exports of commodities, he hoped that, under market conditions, returns to exporters would be enhanced. He questioned, however, the idea that countries should join in co-operative efforts to maintain prices at artificial levels. In his Government's view, the reduction of barriers to trade remained the best way to increase income. With reference to the call for increased international lending and official capital flows, he noted that the problem had both governmental and private dimensions. Governments could not be bound to a particular form or quantity of official assistance. Nor could Governments dictate the policies of private lending institutions. What all delegations could do was to promote, in their respective countries, conditions that would invite lending and create incentives for domestic and foreign investment in the form of loans and equity capital.

(167) He noted that the recommendations contained numerous references to international conventions or agreements. Some of these commanded universal support, others did not. Yet the attempt was made to imply that the entire international community supported all these instruments, some of which were quite controversial. The United States reserved its position with respect to all the international agreements mentioned, in keeping with its acceptance or non-acceptance of them. In particular, he referred to the Charter on Economic Rights and Duties of States, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. (168) Proceeding, the United States representative said that international efforts in support of population programmes had been among the most successful examples of international co-operation. In the developing countries in the last 30 years, total fertility rates had fallen on average more than halfway toward a goal of population stability: related social indicators had improved, human life expectancy had dramatically increased; caloric intake per capita had improved, literacy rates had significantly increased, disease had diminished and health care improved. Per capita income had grown substantially. The absolute numbers of people had nevertheless increased, and their need was still very great. Some nations had not shared equally in these improvements and much remained to be done. The World Population Plan of Action had provided a solid foundation for co-operative contributions to this enormous human progress. The Conference had further strengthened and adapted that foundation - a heartening achievement. Unfortunately, these significant achievements had been overshadowed by successful efforts on the part of a number of countries to introduce extraneous and divisive political issues into the deliberations. Those efforts were prejudicial to the entire system of peaceful, non-political international cooperation.

(169) The United States representative said that the founders of the United Nations, with the experience of the Second World War still fresh in their minds, had understood the tragically destructive potential of the divisions and divisions persisting among the peoples and nations. In structuring the United Nations system, they had sought to shelter international efforts to promote progress from political contention. They had established a number of organizations and agencies from which political contention would be banished. In that way they had displayed an understanding not only of the care needed to preserve the fragile structures of co-operation, but of the contribution such co-operation could make to the foundations of peace. Those who truly understood the meaning of the ideal of the United Nations knew that, above all, its purpose was to preserve the hope for peace.

(170) Those who sought to politicize the non-political fora of international co-operation were the enemies of this hope. Because it was hoped that they cherished, even as they cherished the truth of human dignity and freedom, the Government and people of the United States were committed to resist the destruction of this hope. Because of this commitment, the United States opposed recommendations 5 and 34 contained in the text (E/CONF.76/S.5) submitted to the Conference by the Preparatory Committee. The sponsors of both these recommendations had violated the principles of the founders of the United Nations. They had refused to respect the distinction between fora suitable for the discussion of divisive political issues, and those, such as the Conference, where such discussion was not suitable. Those who sought most strenuously to divert the efforts of the Conference to an inappropriate discussion of disarmament had refused to sit down in good faith at the negotiating table to achieve real reductions in arms through verifiable arms reduction agreements. The peoples of the world, particularly those in developing countries, were unlikely to benefit if efforts to promote development, social progress and the alleviation of human suffering were held hostage to the divisive passions of an intransigent minority.

(171) The United States delegation accordingly strongly protested against the shadow of divisiveness and confrontation that the actions of some nations had cast over the work of the Conference and over similar efforts throughout the United Nations system. It appealed to all nations represented, and to all people everywhere, committed to the original ideals of the United Nations to join the United States efforts to avert the eclipse of co-operation and hope which the cynical manipulation of some, and the misguided passions of others, were threatening to bring upon all.

(172) The representative of the Holy See stated that his delegation believed that it had benefited from its participation in the Conference and hoped that it had made a contribution to the work of the Conference. None the less, the Holy See regretted that it could not participate in the consensus on the recommendations produced by the Conference. The discussions had produced an improvement over the World Population Plan of Action. The recommendations contained some valuable proposals with regard to development, the important role of the family, migration and aging. In the light of its understanding of the nature of the human person, the sacredness of life, marriage and sexuality, the Holy See could not, however, agree with or give approval to those sections that asserted for individuals, including unmarried adolescents, the prerogatives that belonged to married couples in regard to sexual intimacy and parenthood. Secondly, the recommendations endorsed and encouraged methods of family planning that the Catholic Church considered morally unacceptable. In fidelity to its own responsibilities, the Holy See could not endorse proposals that were contradictory to its belief and teaching.

(173) The Holy See participated in the many activities of the United Nations in the hope of eliciting an ethical consensus on many of the issues before the United Nations bodies - a consensus arising from a universal concern for the dignity and rights of the human person, men and women, and many other human and societal values. At the same time, the Holy See must preserve coherence and consistency in its moral commitment and teaching.

(174) Whereas Members of the United Nations often conditioned their approval of United Nations resolutions and declarations on the right of national sovereignty, such a conditional approval was not possible for the Holy See.

(175) While agreeing with many of the positive conclusions reached, the Holy See regretted that it was unable to associate itself with the consensus.

(176) The representative of Sweden stated that the Swedish delegation welcomed the adoption of the recommendations and was especially satisfied with the emphasis on the situation of women and on their role in development.

(177) While fully associating her delegation with the adoption of the recommendations, the representative of Sweden wished to place on record its view that the recommendations in one important respect did not meet its expectations. Little consideration had been given during the Conference to the very serious problem of illegal abortions. Her delegation regretted that an amendment to delete the word illegal" qualifying abortions had been adopted in recommendation 13(e). Reports showed that induced abortion was one of the most common methods of birth control in the world. Abortions were carried out in practically all societies, and high abortion rates existed both in developing and in industrialized countries. Abortions took place more or less irrespective of socio-economic conditions, medical facilities, official religion and - as a matter of fact - also of national abortion legislation. Abortion was often more widespread in countries where abortion and contraception were restricted than in countries where abortion was legal and contraceptives were freely available. Millions of women were seriously hurt - many even died - every year as a result of illegal abortions under unsafe medical conditions. The Conference had chosen not to recognize the plight of all these women and had thereby postponed an effective solution to this pressing problem. PreventIOn of unwanted pregnancies must always be a primary goal. Through family planning, it was possible to create a first line of defense against abortions. Hundreds of millions still, however, lacked access to safe forms of contraception. This was why illegal abortions in many countries constituted such a serious health hazard. In her opinion, all women should have access to legal and safe abortions.

(178) In a note addressed to the President and delivered after the meeting, the representative of Saudi Arabia stated that, having been unable to attend the final meeting at which the recommendations and the final report of the Conference were adopted, the delegation of Saudi Arabia, while associating itself with the recommendations adopted by the Conference, wished to record that had it been present, it would have reserved its position with respect to paragraphs 14, 15 and 16 and recommendations 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 of the text proposed by the Main Committee.

(179) At the 12th (closing) plenary meeting on 8/14/1984, the draft text of a "Mexico City Declaration on Population and Development" (E/CONF.76/L.4) was submitted by the following States represented on the General Committee: Austria, Bangladesh, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burundi, Cameroon, China, Cuba, France, Ghana, Hungary, India, Iraq, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, Mexico, Netherlands, Pakistan, Peru, Senegal, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Sweden, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, united Republic of Tanzania, and Zambia.

(180) The representative of Bangladesh proposed that the Conference should adopt the draft Declaration by acclamation. The proposal was seconded by the representative of the Netherlands, as Vice-President/co-ordination, and by the representatives of Brazil, India, and Senegal and supported by the representatives of Hungary (on behalf of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe), Sweden (on behalf of the Andean and other countries), Bulgaria (on behalf of a number of socialist countries); Zambia (on behalf of the African countries) and Paraguay (on behalf of the Latin American countries). The draft Declaration was adopted by acclamation. (For the text of the Declaration as adopted see chapter I above.)

(181) The representative of the Holy See stated that although he did not agree entirely with the contents of the Declaration he had not wished to stand in the way of its adoption by acclamation.

(182) The representatives of Bulgaria, speaking on behalf of the delegations of Afghanistan, Angola, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Viet Nam, Poland, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic stated that these delegations attached great importance to the Conference as a broad international forum for the consideration of important problems whose solution would promote the achievement of further progress in raising standards of living and towards a more just and rational process of world development. They considered, on the basis of the position of fundamental importance reflected also in the documents of the Conference that the determinants of demographic trends were socio-economic changes. Such changes were necessary for the purpose of freeing many developing countries from the social consequences of their colonial past and eliminating any remaining dependence on important monopolies pursuing a neo-colonialist policy. The economic crisis of the capitalist economy, which most severely affected the developing countries, their enormous foreign debt, unequal terms of trade, rising interest rates and other political and economic actions taken by certain developed capitalist countries, were causing a deterioration in living conditions in the developing countries.

(183) These delegations considered that national and international policies ensuring fairness and harmony in the global process of development constituted the main requirement for a positive change towards demographic trends that would promote well-balanced socio-economic development on both the global and the national levels. There was an important relationship, therefore, between the establishment of a New International Economic Order and population development.

(184) In the opinion of these delegations, the prevention of nuclear war and the adoption of concrete measures for arms reduction and disarmament were an indispensable condition for the successful solution of the problems of development and population everywhere, including the developing countries. This idea was reflected in the Conference's recommendations concerning the fulfilment of the World Population Plan of Action. These delegations shared the deep concern felt by the vast majority of nations about the arms race pursued by aggressive forces, which diverted enormous material and intellectual resources to non-productive purposes, while much of the world's population suffered hunger and disease and remained deprived of basic education and medical care.

(185) As the experience of the socialist countries showed, a decisive role in the acceleration of socio-economic development and the consolidation of economic independence was played by the State sector and planned economic management.

(186) The solution of population problems would be facilitated by implementing demographic policy within the framework of a socio-economic policy specifically aimed at improving living and working conditions for all sections of the population. The shaping and implementation of demographic policy was the sovereign right of every State, acting independently, without any external pressure, through measures taking account of specific conditions, receiving broad public support, observing humane principles and maintaining respect for fundamental human rights and human dignity. The nature and form of aid in carrying out population policies must be determined solely by the States interested in such aid and must not be tied to their acceptance of any prior conditions.

(187) These delegations supported the progressive provisions of the World Population Plan of Action and the recommendations and Declaration of the Conference, whose implementation could be ensured only if the world's peoples lived in peace and security; they expressed confidence that the results of the Conference would bring about broader international co-operation. [=] interpretation of Islam, have barred girls and women teachers from the classroom and ruled that women may not work.

“... The exclusion of girls and women from the public sphere has disastrous consequences for the entire nation, as well as being an affront to basic human rights,” said UNICEF Executive Director Carol Bellamy. “Not only are they shut out of educational opportunities, but they are denied the right to contribute to their families’ welfare and the country’s economy.”

The Taliban have used the implausible argument that there are not sufficient funds to provide for girls’ education. But according to Ms. Bellamy, the real economic issue is that the exclusion of girls from schools and women from the workforce is seriously undermining the economic and social development prospects of Afghanistan.

“... Afghanistan is a nation of widows,” she said. “Women are not only vital members of the workforce but are frequently the only breadwinners of the family. If they cannot earn a living, they will not be able to feed their children. The consequences will be catastrophic.”

There are an estimated 30000 widows in Kabul alone. A small proportion of them work in the health sector, the only employment permitted by the Taliban. The remainder have lost the right to work and many have been forced on to the streets to beg.

Other Taliban rulings also place considerable additional financial burdens on women. For example, the ‘burqa,’ -- the head-to-toe covering with an embroidered grill over the face that all women are required to wear in public -- costs the equivalent of $10 or two months’ salary. Forced by the cost to share the garments, women are even further restricted to their homes.

In recent weeks, humanitarian organizations have expressed cautious optimism at an apparent softening of the Taliban position on girls’ education. Last month, at a meeting in Kabul between the Minister of Education and UN representatives, an agreement was reached to allow girls up to nine years old to attend school. Days later, however, the Minister reversed his position, leaving girls and women teachers excluded from schools.

Kabul University also re-opened at the end of March without women teachers or female students. When the university was closed in September after the Taliban takeover of the city, women made up 4000 of the university’s 10000-strong student body.

In November 1995, UNICEF suspended its assistance to education programmes in those parts of Afghanistan where girls were excluded from schools. In the meantime, UNICEF has continued to negotiate with local authorities on resuming educational opportunities for girls.

“... UNICEF is committed to the principle of non-discrimination and considers education one of the most fundamental rights of every human being, boy or girl,” said Ms. Bellamy. The right of every child to education is laid down in the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which has been ratified by 190 nations, including Afghanistan.

The Taliban maintain that there is no all-out policy barring girls from schools. They promise that, once the military situation has stabilized and they have been recognized as a legitimate power base, a segregated educational structure with a limited curriculum will be put in place for girls. Clearly this is still not acceptable, and would constitute a further violation of the Convention.

Recent reports confirm that there has been no softening of the Taliban position on women. Taxi drivers are punished for carrying women who are incorrectly dressed and Kabul residents have been forced on to the streets to beg. Clearly this is still not acceptable, and would constitute a further violation of the Convention.

“... Together with many Islamic scholars, and UN agencies, and countries that have some influence with the Taliban, we must keep the pressure up until each and every girl and woman has her basic human rights restored,” said Ms. Bellamy. [+]
Morocco, 327.
Pakistan, 600.
Saudi Arabia, 52.
Somalia, 1100.
South Yemen, 100.
Sudan (births only in hospital and medical institutions), 607.
Syria, 280.
Tunisia (community data from rural areas only), 1000.
Turkey, 207.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Algeria

14000. ------. "Algeria Says It has Killed 21 Muslim Fundamentalists [reports search operations killed 20, as well as one who had slit the throat of two sisters; government reports 20000 insurgents have been killed in 36 months; armed militants number 3000-4000]", in Seattle Times, March 19, 1995. p. A18. [TXT]

14003. ------. "French Officials Crack Down On Muslim Fundamentalists", in Seattle Times, October 29, 1994. p. A8. A national policy of repression of Muslims will begin in France: the goal is to destroy Muslim fundamentalism as a political, social and cultural force among Muslims in France: Christian and Jewish fundamentalists will not be affected by the new policy and will enjoy the traditional French freedom of religion. Muslim scarves worn by girls will be banned in French schools, as Minister of Education Francois Bayrou notes to 'end Muslim repression of women'. The Ministry of Education has expelled 25 Muslim girls under this new policy. Osman Sahin, imam of a mosque in Sochaux, reportedly with links to pro-Algerian Germany-based AFDI deported to his native Turkey. There are 5 million Muslims in France: 5-10% express sympathy for fundamentalist views. [TXT]

14004. ------. "Gunmen in Algiers [kill one French diplomatic worker and kidnapp three, including a woman]", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, October 31, 1992. p. 5. [TXT]

14005. ------. "Interview: Susan George", in Multinational Monitor, March 1982. "Famines do occur; they are organized by the grain trade." - Berthold Brecht

Food is the most basic commodity in the world--literally a matter of life or death. Like other commodities, however, food is controlled by a number of giant multinationals, such as Cargill, Continental Grain, Unilever, Nestle, General Mills, General Food and Quaker Oats. These companies, by their producing and marketing techniques, as well as their pricing policies, have an enormous effect on the ability of poor people the world over to eke out a living. In How the Other Half Dies: The Real Reasons for World Hunger, first published in the US in 1977, Susan George put forth the thesis that hunger and starvation in the third world are caused by the international agribusiness corporations and their allies: multilateral lending institutions like the World Bank, Western governments, and local third world elites. "Hunger is not a scourge," she wrote, "but a scandal." She depicted the multinational food industry as a Midas gone dreadfully wrong. "Agribusiness is capable of destroying everything it touches: local employment patterns, local foodcrop contract farming--letting local farmers own the land and buy the goods they grow is really just naked violence." What role are agribusiness companies currently playing in the global food industry?

The companies are transforming the food systems of other countries in order to fit the needs of predominant countries, particularly the United States, whether to serve as markets for Western goods or as suppliers of agricultural raw materials for the food systems of the West.

Can you give a specific example?

Take the area of animal feeds. There's a huge thrust, which I think is very important, to bias the diet of third world countries toward a much more meat-based diet, because in this way you sell much more soya and corn, and you can sell more processed animal feed. There have been any number of projects geared to chicken promotion, which involves feeding the chickens processed feeds and is a very dependency-creating industry because you're perpetually hooked up to a kind of a diet not based on your local available foodstuffs. You create a demand which depends on imports. In Algeria, an extreme case, 85% of all of the basic foodstuffs of the country are imports. Nonetheless, the government is encouraging a much more meat-based diet, including chicken and beef, and it is destroying the local olive oil industry by importing soya oil. The olive oil industry in Algeria is just dying. It's a very decentralized industry, with each farmer having seven or eight olive trees and little mills dotted around the countryside. The man who's in charge of the national olive oil industry was practically crying when I talked to him. He said, "If they'd just raise the price of soya oil by a few centimes--it's been the same price for 20 years--I could renovate 500 mills a year."

What was the staple diet of Algeria before the entry of agribusiness companies?

It was couscous, based on wheat and sometimes barley. Couscous is like many local foods, it is prepared communally, by women working together on a porch, rolling it out; it is a sort of social activity. But now, that's too much work and too time-consuming, so you get instant couscous or you get something else: bread. It's taking over the world. Bread's a wonderful capitalist food in the sense that it can be consumed separately; you don't have to get together at lunch to eat it like rice or the various other communal dishes that take time to cook. Brazil is another classic example. There large amounts of agricultural land were converted over the last 15 years from black beans and corn production to soybean production. The Brazilian government got scared around 1975, 1976 when people rioted because they couldn't buy beans. About 200000 people voted in municipal elections for black beans instead of a candidate: they just wrote "black beans" on the ballots. The government began to get worried, and instituted a rule requiring soy producers to devote 10-15% of their land to black beans.

What multinational companies are involved in that transformation process in Brazil?

Oh, they're all there. Continental, Archer-Daniels, Cargill, Central Soya.

How would a multinational go about changing the production bias in a country like Brazil?

Well, the multinational doesn't change it by itself. What changes it is the prices, the relative prices that are being offered for these different crops. Farmers convert because the export crop is lucrative, and because the government's been calling for exports and the incentive to produce is higher. Also the World Bank contributes to making very efficient transportation networks to get the soya beans to the processing plants and to the ports. In some cases, there are private corridors, road and rail networks, devoted entirely to the transportation, processing and efficient handling of soybeans. So, when you get all the infrastructure, the price incentives and the government credits, it's stupid not to produce it, from the farmer's point of view.

Why have agribusiness corporations increasingly opted for contract farming--letting local farmers own the land and buying the goods these farmers produce--rather than directly controlling the land and production?

It is less efficient to have direct control of your land through ownership. Land is the first thing to be nationalized under political pressure, and it involves a number of fiscal problems and taxes that corporations don't want to get into. Perhaps most importantly, they don't want to be burdened with plantations producing a raw material that costs them more to use than another raw material purchased on the open market. With contract farming, they have much greater flexibility. Now the world markets are so integrated that a company like Unilever is able to purchase any kind of oil from any source and make exactly the same kinds of soaps or margarine--it doesn't matter to them, the technology is exactly the same. Because soy oil from the US at some point could be much cheaper than even palm oil produced on a Unilever estate with low-paid workers, it's quite possible that Unilever could be more interested in the soy oil than the palm oil.

What is the relationship between the large landowners and the rural poor in developing countries?

Anybody in this country who thinks that class struggle is something that was invented by an unmentionable 19th century economist should go to Bangladesh. While I was there recently, I was talking with some people who are doing wonderful work, on a $40000 a Europeans, however, refused to invite the infante terrible of the Arab Belhadj, leaders of the Islamic Salvation Front, were returned to prison in desert tent, camels at the ready, hoping to get a last minute reprieve. The International, November 16-30, 1994. p. 2. Shaikh Abbasi Madani and Ali garbage collection in six zionist-occupied West Bank towns and the Gaza Liberation Organization, Yassir Arafat, was there. Arafat is in charge of Islam. In this they have truly found each other. [=] is considered a troublemaker. Even the putative leader of the Palestine The European Union and the Muslim regimes share a common aversion to arrogance, the European Union invited Jordan, which is not on the countries, it would like to have a secure environment. The client regimes years ago - the fifteen member EU foreign ministers met their counter Husain of Jordan, the PLO's Arafat and even Kemalist Turkey are not Spain - the last Muslim post in Europe that was wiped out five hundred years ago - the fifteen member EU foreign ministers met their counter parts from eleven countries of the southern rim and the Palestinian Authority to sign a series of agreements. With characteristic European arrogance, the European Union invited Jordan, which is not on the Mediterranean coast, but barred Libya which is, because the latter's ruler is considered a troublemaker. Even the putative leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Yassir Arafat, was there. Arafat is in charge of garbage collection in six zionist-occupied West Bank towns and the Gaza Strip. Colonel Mu'ammar Qaddafi must have blown hot and cold in his desert tent, camels at the ready, hoping to get a last minute reprieve. The Europeans however, refused to invite the infante terrible of the Arab world while tiny Malta, Cyprus and Israel were all there. Life is full of cruel ironies. The European Union is even denying the facts of geography when it suits its convenience. Those invited to Barcelona included the representatives of Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Israel, Jordan, Cyprus, Egypt, Tunisia, Morocco, Mauritania, Malta and the Palestinian Authority. All fifteen members of the EU were of course also there. From the outset it was clear that the Europeans would dictate the agenda. They want the vast export markets of the Muslim countries for their manufactured goods but do not want their people in Europe. The non-European Mediterranean rim has some two hundred million people. With the exception of Turkey and Israel, the rest are still considered largely agricultural, non-industrialized countries.

The European surpluses in manufactured goods can now be dumped on these markets. The new alliance will achieve several objectives. First, in a highly competitive world, the Europeans will secure captive markets for their goods for the next century. It will also help elbow out such other competitors as the Japanese and Koreans who have secured a niche for their products in the oil-rich (now not-so-rich) Middle East. In the sixties and seventies, millions of migrant workers from the Mediterranean rim countries were allowed to enter Europe to work in low-paid jobs as the post-second world war reconstruction boom materialized. The boom is over and the Europeans want to get rid of these workers now. The blatantly racist tone of political discourse in most of these countries - France, Germany and Britain - is evidence of this phenomenon. While the Europeans would like to get rid of the migrant workers and their families, they would still like to exploit the cheap labor in countries from where they originated. Hence the new mantra of promoting trade instead of aid. While nobody would take issue with promoting trade since aid is a euphemism for economic bondage, the Europeans plan to set up industries in these countries to make their products competitive internationally. This is a mirror-image of the Japanese strategy in Southeast Asia or the North American Free Trade Agreement. The two North American giants have started moving their manufacturing industry to Mexico and further south in Latin America because of cheap labor there. The economic agenda for the Mediterranean rim was pushed under the guise of creating a free trade zone for manufactured goods by the year 2010. If anyone get the idea that this would be patterned on the European Union member States' relations, it would be mistaken. There was no agreement under which they would fight 'terrorism' and 'religious extremism'. These are euphemisms for crushing the Islamic movements struggling to overthrow oppressive regimes in the Middle East. This was also evident in the manner in which Algeria was welcomed. The North African State had just had an election in which the junta's candidate - Lamine Zeroual - claimed to have won a massive victory. Such resounding 'victories' are the norm in Middle Eastern dictatorships.

The 11/27-28 conference set in motion the creation of a regional security accord which was similar in nature to the agreement reached with former eastern bloc countries in the conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Under the guise of fighting 'terrorism', the European Union and Middle Eastern tyrannies will now jointly fight Islamic activists. France has been leading the crusade within its borders against Islamic activists sympathetic to the Islamic Salvation Front of Algeria. A number of its supporters have been arrested or deliberately killed in police encounters. Other regimes, too, are fed with serious opposition from the Islamic movement. Husni Mubarak of Egypt, king Husain of Jordan, the PLO's Arafat and even Kemalist Turkey are not immune from what the west contemptuously calls the 'virus of fundamentalism'. If the European Union is going to invest in these countries, it would like to have a secure environment. The client regimes are to be protected against a popular Islamic challenge under such ruses. The European Union and the Muslim regimes share a common aversion to Islam. In this they have truly found each other. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Bida on 11/5/1994. They refused to call off the armed resistance until the army returned to the barracks and handed over power to the elected representatives of the people. Madani and Belhadj were moved from jail to house arrest on 9/12/1994 in anticipation that they might strike a deal with the junta. General Llammme Zerouali announced in a radio and television broadcast on 11/1/1994 that presidential elections will be held in 1995. Junta spokesmen later indicated that the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) which had gained a massive majority in the first round of elections on 12/26/1991, would not be allowed to take part. The western-backed junta is trying to promote a "third force," but such a force simply does not exist. The Algerian junta closed two papers, the French-language daily El-Ouma and the Arabic weekly Al Wa'ah al-Akhmar, on 11/7/1994, charging them with spreading "subversion" for reporting activities not authorized by the regime. At least 130 civilians were killed by the the junta in the first week of 11/1994, the first such large-scale casualties admitted by it. Observers believe that more than 30,000 people have been killed by the junta over the last three years. Prime minister Tansu Ciller became the first head of a Muslim government to visit Israel on 11/3/1994. Ciller paid rich tribute to the zionist State, saying she wanted close relations with it. Her visit was criticized by some newspapers and opposition groups in Turkey. From there, Ciller went to Cairo on 11/6/1994 for a meeting with Egyptian president Husni Mubarak. France expelled the Imam of Matz Mosque on 11/6/1994 and sent him on a plane to Algeria. Imam Naha Zahar Eddine was popular with the people and critical of recent French attacks on Muslim girls' hijab. France of course is a democracy where people criticizing government policy are liable to be deported! Imam Naha was the third Imam to be deported.

Spain and Italy have urged the European Union to pay more attention to the countries of the southern Mediterranean rim where a number of regimes are about to collapse under the pressure of the Islamic movement. The two countries fear that should the regimes in Algeria and Egypt, for instance, fail to the Islamic movement, it would lead to the exodus of hundreds of thousands of people into their countries and exacerbate an already fragile situation where immigrants are reviled and abused. Jordan's parliament on 11/6/1994 approved by 55 to 23 the treaty with Israel that had been signed on 10/25/1994. The Islamic Action Front was among the groups which opposed the treaty. [–]

14010. -------. "Slaughtering of Sheep Protested," in Seattle Times, April 16, 1997, p. A11. Brigitte Bardot denounced Muslims for slaughtering sheep, women and children, monks and tourists. She accused Algerian Muslims, noting: "They've slit the throats of women, and children, of our monks, our officials, our tourists and our sheep. They'll slit our throats one day and we'll deserve it." She describes Muslim practices as "torture, signs of the most atrocious pagan sacrifices", and condemns the "invasion of France by an overpopulation of foreigners, notably Muslims". [TXT]

14011. -------. USSR: Uzbekistan: Part 18: At Home and Abroad. Moscow, RFSSR: Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, 1968. Uzbekistan's economic, cultural and friendly contacts with other countries are growing year by year. The Republic takes an active part in rendering scientific and technical assistance to 67 countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America. 55 delegations from 80 countries and over 10,000 tourists have visited Uzbekistan during the last two years. During the same period about 2000 Uzbekks visited foreign countries as members of delegations, and to render assistance to the developing countries. Besides that, 4000 people from Uzbekistan went abroad as tourists. At the end of 1966 Uzbekistan was exporting its products to 80 countries, whereas in 1958 to only 32. Most of these countries are in Asia and Africa. Demand for goods from Uzbekistan is growing in Japan, Britain, France, Federal Germany and Italy. Since 1963 the Republic has taken part in 47 international fairs and exhibitions. She is also displaying goods at EXPO 67 in Montreal. Tashkent has developed into a big cultural centre. During the last two years it has received 36 musical and dance companies from 17 countries. Uzbek performers have also made concert tours of 25 countries, their appearance everywhere being attended with success. The Uzbek Society of Friendship and Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries maintains contacts with 96 countries. The United Nations has sponsored 18 international seminars in Uzbekistan during the last four years. Those taking part studied the methods of Uzbek irrigation and land improvement specialists, live-stock breeders, cotton-growers and other workers in industry and agriculture. A number of international exhibition committees have given high awards to Uzbek-manufactured machines. For example the "OK-100" loom was awarded a gold medal at the 1965 International Exhibition in France, and Mr. Shah, Indian Minister of Industry, wrote to Tashkent to express his admiration over the high qualities of the machines manufactured in Uzbekistan. Mr. Kaplan, director of a spinning-mill in Mistok, Czechoslovakia, wrote: "Your machines work perfectly. They have helped us to achieve the highest results in the country." A well-known Algerian journalist Henri Alleg wrote after he had visited Uzbekistan: "More than 5 years have passed. The bright banner of socialism is flying over free Uzbekistan. Once an impoverished, backward colony, it has become one of the advanced countries of the world. When I was flying over the fields of Uzbekistan that only yesterday were a barren desert and which today are turned into a flourishing, country by the will and labor of the Soviet people, I felt as if I had taken a look into the future of my Algeria. . . ." Tashkent has become place for holding important international conferences. It was at the Afro-Asian Solidarity Conference of 1958 that the "spirit of Tashkent" was born. The Declaration signed by the Indian and Pakistani leaders in the Uzbek capital in 1965 prevented adangerous military conflict that was threatening the 600-million population of Hindustan. The international significance of the Tashkent Declaration extends beyond the limits of Indo-Pakistani relations. The Tashkent talks clearly illustrated the difference between socialist foreign policy and the actions of some Western countries in fanning dangerous conflicts in Asia. As an African newspaper wrote, during the Tashkent Conference the Soviet Union demonstrated to the whole world that she strove with all her heart for peace on earth. [–] becomes the inconsequential third term, the catalyst for a final rebellion. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [=]

14013. Bangash, Zafar. “Focus: Pretoria Islamic Conference Takes Bold Steps Towards a More Confident Future”, in Crescent International, May 15, 1996, p. 3. The largest conference ever held in South Africa, indeed anywhere in Africa, surpassed the wildest expectations of the organizers. The 30/27/1996 conference was attended by representatives from about 100 countries and 100,000 people over three days and heard live on radio by another three hundred and fifty thousand people in Johannesburg and Cape Town through the courtesy of Radio Az-Zaahir and Radio 786. Another great feature was the participation of a large number of sisters at the conference. This has been a very significant development in the history of the Muslim community in South Africa. Initially, only a handful of guest speakers from overseas were anticipated. As the date of the conference approached, the list grew, and ultimately, more than two dozen guests from overseas had joined. These included such internationally renowned speakers as Doctor Kalim Siddiqi (who unfortunately passed away on 4/18/1996 in Pretoria); Imam Muhammad al-Asi and Imam Abdul Alim Musa, both from Washington DC; Doctor Yaqub Zaki; Imam Muhammad al-Asi; the concept of Jihad in Islam (Imam al-Asi); the Global Islamic Movement and the New World Order (Imam Abdul Alim Musa); the Role of Muslims in the Islamic Movement (Sister Bahiya Ali); The Muslim Parliament of Great Britain (Jahangir Muhammad); Creating a New Civilization of Islam (Doctor Kalim Siddiqi); and, Awakening the Muslim mind (Advocate Abubakr Mohamed). Other topics discussed were Bosnia--drawing the proper lessons (Iqbal Siddiqui); the Struggle in Algeria (Imam Al-Asi); Partial Islamic movements—the era of Political Parties (Doctor Kalim Siddiqi); Creating a global Islamic movement: the role of the Muslim media (Zafar Bagash); The Arabian Peninsula: the crucial center or a distant frontier? (Doctor Yaqub Zaki); Islam in South Africa (Doctor Rashid Salooji); The role of Islam and ulama (Saadullah Khan); The Islamic Movement in Malaysia (Muhammad Sabu); fifty years of the United Nations (Doctor Yaqub Zaki); The growth of Islam in North America (Imam Abdul Alim Musa); Islam in the Electronic Age (Mufti Barkatullah); Western strategies for controlling Islam (Jahangir Muhammad); How to achieve Muslim Unity? (Sheikh Thafier Najjar): The role of Muslim media (Abdullah Osman); and, The clash of civilizations (Zafar Bangash).

A number of local speakers also addressed the conference including Zakariya Aboobaker Chankie, A S Gani, Abdul Rehman Zwane, Farida Muhammad, Imam Ahmed Cissieu, Mualana Mukaddam, Mualana Abdul Raouf Soofie, Sheik Akhbar Samad Nana and Ebrahim Chomba. On the final day of the conference, the Organizing Committee turned itself into a Commission to explain the role of Muslims in Southern Africa and to come up with proposals, in two years, about it. The Commission will consult Muslims throughout the region before submitting its report. Doctor Kalim Siddiqi delivered the concluding address on the final day of the conference. He paid tribute to the conference organizers as well as the participants for their efforts. He said that now he saw the realization of twenty-five years of his work before his eyes. Doctor Kalim had nearly collapsed from exhaustion the night before after delivering a powerful speech in the evening. There was much concern for his health among the conference participants. Little did they realize that these would be the last appearances this valiant son of Islam would make anywhere. Once the conference had officially ended, a number of interviews were recorded on camera with Doctor Kalim Siddiqi and the other guests. These were done in professional studios. In fact, the entire conference proceedings were also recorded on camera with professional equipment. There were a total of eight interviews recorded. The last two were in front of live audience. These were enormously successful. Doctor Kalim and the other participants were in great form. The interviews and panel discussions came exceptionally well. These interviews as well as the conference proceedings will be available from "Crescent International" shortly. One final point about the conference. The Muslims of South Africa have invested heavily in preparing their children--boys and girls--for Qur’anic recitation. It was a moving sight to see young children recite the qiraat in such a melodious way. These innocent souls brought tears to the eyes of many participants. It was indeed a wonderful sight. And their parents are truly fortunate to have made such great efforts. The conference tapes can be obtained from the "Crescent International" offices around the world. Please see details in the forthcoming issues. [=] widespread stereotyped prejudice in the west toward "all things Islam and Muslim in this world." Such insensitivity had carried over into the main UN human rights forum as well. Musa delivered the unusually stinging attack three day before the 53-member body opened its annual session in Geneva on 3/18/1996. As usual, the west trained its guns on its favorite bogeymen - China, Iran, Iraq, Sudan and Cuba - confirming what the outgoing chairman had said, Madelaine Albright, American ambassador to the UN, blasted Cuba as a "bad actor" and included her own country in the list of human rights offenders. As in other UN declarations, the embargoed lady could not see at her feet in the US where far more people are killed daily than anywhere else in the world. "We see double standards again and again," said Musa. "The word is...that if you want to abuse human rights make sure that you are the best of friends of the big powers that matter, then you can get away with it," he added. Ample proof of this western hypocrisy was evident in the US State department annual report for 1995 released on 3/6/1996. While it lists the usual "bad guys," it also includes Egypt, Israel, Turkey and Algeria for instance. But far be it for the US to bring up the question of Egyptian, Algerian or Turkish human rights abuses at the UN human rights forum in Geneva. The case of Israel is even more illustrative. The State department mildly criticized Israel's brutal policy of collective punishments and suppression in the West Bank. Yet Washington provides more than $6 billion in military, economic and other aid to the zionist State. After the recent series of bombings, US president Bill Clinton personally visited the zionist State to offer sympathy and condolences as well as $100 million to augment Israel's brutal policy against the Palestinians. This includes the policy of collective punishments such as blowing up houses which the State department's annual report had criticized.

John Shattuk, the US State department point man for human rights, when asked during a press conference in Washington on 3/13/1996 about the contradiction in US words and deeds, pretended not to have heard the question at all. When the questioner repeated as to how the State department report criticized collective punishments by Islam on the one hand and Washington financed such a policy on the other by millions of dollars in handouts, Shattuk mumbled that a new situation had emerged in Israel! Even with its hypocrisy exposed, Geraldine Ferraro, head of the US delegation and a one-time vice presidential candidate, submitted a draft resolution expressing concern about human rights abuses in Cuba and Sudan but not in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Israel or Turkey. America's other allies - Kuwait and India - also got away with murder and free. It would be unthinkable for anyone to bring up the subject of US, British or French human rights abuses. The US has targeted Muslims living within its borders in a vicious way. Shaikh Omar Abdel Rahman and a number of other Muslims have been sentenced to life terms in an FBI/Mossad engineered conspiracy. These Muslims are the victims of a zionist-instigated witchhunt worldwide. France and Britain, too, both western countries, have launched vicious campaigns against Muslims. In France, Algerian Muslims are being persecuted. Some have been executed in fake encounters with the police. The Algerians' only crime is that they are committed Muslims and refuse to support the fascist junta in power in Algeria. The junta is backed by France and most of the western countries. Naturally, the human rights of Muslims in Algeria do not matter. Nigeria, on the other hand, is different. It is also ruled by a military junta but that is not why the West African State is ostracized. The real reason is that the Christian minority has not been able to grab total control as in Ethiopia or Uganda, for instance. The presence of Christian minorities in Muslim countries - in Nigeria, Sudan and Egypt - is the latest weapon to be used against Muslims. The Egyptian regime can brutalize its Muslim majority and the west eagerly supports such a policy but if something were to happen to the spoiled Coptic minority, may God help Egypt.

Russia, too, received only a mild wrist slap for its slaughter of Muslims in Chechenya. As for Russia's and the west's Serbian allies, there was little to worry about for the crimes they have perpetrated against humanity because their victims are Muslims. And Muslims, as far as the west is concerned, do not matter. This is also, unfortunately, the view of most Muslim regimes which take pride in their subservience to the west. Amnesty International, the London-based human rights body, announced on the eve of the conference that it will call on the UN commission to take action "as a priority" on five areas: China, Colombia, Indonesia/East Timor, Nigeria and Turkey. "These countries with abysmal human rights records blatantly continue to escape scrutiny by the Commission," the group said in a statement issued on 3/14/1996. "Often their peers shy away from action because of their own perceived economic, military and political interests," it added. Indonesia was rightly hauled on the carpet for East Timor but not for its genocidal policy in Indonesia. Americans have been roundly condemned for the state sanctioned torture and murder of the Irianese-dominated Jakarta regime. The reason again is that the Achenean are Muslims while the Timorese are Christians. The Committee to Protest Journalists (CPJ) also issued its list of jailed journalists for 1995 on the eve of the conference. Its 3/14/1996 release said that at least 182 journalists were in jail in 22 countries at the end of last year, a record number and up from 173 the year before. For the secondconsecutive year, Kemalist Turkey which had just refused to allow the Refah Party to come to power because of the latter's mildly Islamic program, held more reporters in jail, 51, than any other country in the world. The reason, according to the CPJ, was that Ankara sought to suppress independent reporting on its conflict with the Kurds. Ethiopia, another US client, was next with 31 journalists in jail, followed by China with 20, and Kuwait with 18, the report said. Of these, only China was singled out for criticism at the UN forum. The message from all this, as Musa Bin Hitam pointed out, is that it is alright to have a terrible human rights record so long as you are the west's favorite client. It is also for this reason that Hindu India can get away with murder in Kashmir and still bask in the glory of proclaiming itself the largest democracy in the world. A more appropriate description would be, "the largest hypocrisy in the world."
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Scientific Research (Dar Al-Abhath al-Ilmiyya) publishing and cultural group: one publication ("The Muslim Brotherhood in the Balance") attacked the Muslim Brotherhood as fascist and Muslim. Only in 1945 would the first non-Jewish members enter the group. New recruits spent at least a year being groomed for membership in study groups, before they were admitted into the secret Iskra network of cells.

(3) New Dawn, established in the 1940s by Ahmad Saqiq Saad, Yusuf Darwish and Raymond Dewayk, had its roots in anti-fascist activism in the 1930s. A legal reformist group, the New Dawn worked with leftist members of the Wafd, by organizing the Youth Group for Popular Culture and the Society for Spreading Modern Culture, by publishing Al-Fajr Al-Jahid and the worker's newspaper Al-Damir, and by associating with the Workers Committee for National Liberation (WCNL). The group exerted influence through the intellectual quality of its publications, and reached unionists through its activities with the Workers Committee (formed in 1945), which in turn spread its message through in the Shubra al-Khayma Plant and the Mahalla al-Kubra Plant. In 7/1946, the name of the group was changed to the Popular Vanguard for Liberation, then to the Workers Vanguard, and then to Popular Democracy. The party tried to recruit working class women but was never successful in that effort.

(4) Peoples Liberation, a short-lived atheistic-Trotskyste group led by Marcel Israel, an Egyptian Jew with Italian citizenship, that left little trace.

In 1946, Egypt entered a new political era: nationalist demands were now widespread, and the end of martial law and censorship in 8/1945 created the environment for new activism. Student protests and strikes in 1946, both of which saw significant Communist participation, escalated into confrontations with the British, which led to the British decision to withdraw. The regime of Sidiqi Pasha, however, decided to move against the left, closing down seven organizations (House of Scientific Research, Committee to Spread Modern Culture, Union of University Graduates, Popular University, Twentieth Century Publishing House, League of Women Graduates from the University & High Institutes, Center for Popular Culture), and banningseven newspapers (Al-Wafd al-Misri, the central Waldist organ; Al-Bath, Waldist daily; Al-Damir, radical trade union paper; Umdurman, radical Sudanese magazine; Al-Talia, Union of University Graduates magazine; Al-Fajr al-Jadid, radical cultural weekly; Al-Yaara and Al-Jabha, two trade union weeklies). Claiming evidence of a mass ploy, in 7/1946 Sidiqi staged mass arrests of leftist leaders. Sidiqi would resign in 12/1946 when he failed to obtain British agreement to withdraw from Egypt. [TXT]

14017. Bouatta, Cherifa; Moghadam, Valentine M. [editor]. Gender and National Identity: Women and Politics in Muslim Societies: Part 2: Feminine Militancy: Moudjahidates During and After the Algerian War. United Nations University, World Institute for Development Economics Research (UNU/WIDER). London: Zed Books, 1994. pp. 18-39. The officially sanctioned discourse that has development on the role of female Moudjahidates during the war of independence against the French in Algeria is a discourse developed by men: the history is told in a masculine voice and the role and contributions of women remain little known. Women were involved in the war in many ways: Moudjahidates were nurses and soldiers, fledgates couriers planted bombs in the cities and carried money, messages and weapons. Women searched for imprisoned husbands and sons and collected intelligence doing so. On 12/11/1961, women staged a mass protest to repudiate colonial propaganda that argued that the rebellion had few adherents, winning the insurgency considerable legitimacy in international public opinion. Franz Fanon saw the participation of women in the revolution as signifying the breakdown of the patriarchal system in Algeria, yet immediately after the revolution women were confined to activism within the UNFA (Union Nationale des Femmes Algeriennes) which was a unit of the FLN. The role assigned to the UNFA was insignificant: it was restricted to opening sewing classes and advocating the decisions of the FLN. This trend culminates in the Family Code of 7/1984, based on Islamic Law, which institutionalized the patriarchal domination of women. Significantly, Moudjahidates define the new post-revolutionary domination of women as a new colonization and envision the necessity of a new struggle to deconstruct women.

14018. Boumediene, Latifa. "Martyrdom Haunts Algerian Intellectuals and Artists", in Al-Jadid, November 1995. p. 19. The continuing violence in Algeria has claimed 30000 lives in the last seven years. Many of those who have died were journalist, intellectuals, civil servants, magistrates and women. Much of the intellectual class has left the country, and alienation characterizes many of those who have remained. A large number of artists and intellectuals fled the country into exile after the assassination of playwright Abdelkader Alloula and actor and head of the Algerian National Theater Azzedine Mahjoudi. The 'Masrah El-Kalaa and its director Ziani Cherif Ayad, Algerian's foremost theatrical group have also left Algeria and settled in France. [–]

14019. Cherifiat-Merabine, Doria; Moghadam, Valentine M. [editor]. Gender and National Identity: Women and Politics in Muslim Societies: Part 3: Algeria At a Crossroads: National Liberation, Islamization and Women. United Nations University, World Institute for Development Economics Research (UNU/WIDER). London: Zed Books, 1994. pp. 40-62. The Revolution in Algeria was a watershed in the social history of the people of Algeria, differing from earlier tribal based rebellions by engaging the loyalties of the entire people, including the mass participation of women in every aspect of the struggle. In the wake of the revolution, the question of the meaning of the role of women in the revolution must be considered: were women merely used by the revolution: this question is complicated by the resurgence of Islam. Islam, for example, discounts the role of the Moudjahidates, since the role of female soldiers in the revolution inherently undercuts the paradigm of traditional Islamic women. Yet millions of Algerian women... played a key role in the revolution, transcending the traditional family-centric role of Algerian women that was rooted in Islamic patriarchy and was reinforced by the colonial fantasy of the orientalist exoticism of Muslim women. The symbol of the liberated woman in the rhetoric of revolution was that of the "Muslim woman", which meant not a religious woman but rather a woman fighter for the decolonized Algeria. Many women were heroines: many were sentenced to death and were saved only by the strength of their families and the power of the people. The women fought for freedom, while many others fought for their lives. The struggle was not just a fight for freedom, but also for the right to vote and to be heard. Some women took up arms, while others organized protests and demonstrations. The struggle was not just a struggle for women, but also for the Algerian people as a whole.

Ironically, the triumph of the revolution led to the immediate flight by women into employment as domestic workers, due to the pressing need to earn a living to support their families yet without any changes in the labor market that would allow them more opportunity. The ideological delegitimization of the Moudjahidates included both the argument that only in Islam could women have true freedom and the concurrent argument (advanced by the Islamic Salvation Front) that feminists are the "hawks of neo-colonialism", seeking to restore Western domination of Algeria. Yet for the ISF, the question of women's voting is a diffused one, torn between arguing that voting is inappropriately given to women as an expression of political power, even as the existing of pro-ISF votes by "Muslim sisters" would help contribute to the foundation of the Islamic state. Similarly, Muslim women activists, often university educated, focused on socio-educational activities, the maintenance of the "purity of civilization" in the future Islamic Algeria.

"Feminism and Religion: Fundamental Oppression: South Asia", in Bangladesh Constitution were the tribal or the Harijan. What better way to prove strength, manliness, than by showing that women are under your control? Rape is not a simple but political issue of women's rights get converted into a major defend passages in the Koran about female modesty as communal riots are reversed. Since then the government has been supporting the growth of Islamic institutions by linking up with Islam-based political parties whose objective is to make Bangladesh into an Islamic state. Similarly, the recent communal riots in India have shattered the illusion of the secular character of the State, which is increasingly being identified with majority-Hindu fundamentalism.

A point often made about fundamentalism is that it is a positive rejection of Western culture. The Iranian revolution showed how Islam could play a revolutionary role in overthrowing the Shah and American imperialism. Women took an active part in the struggle and the chador became a symbol of resistance. However, today the Islamic Republic of Iran has surrendered the other side of the veil, reminding us of the duality of the veil in Algeria as it moved from resistance to control. Iranian women have been increasingly pushed into the roles of only wives and mothers. Also, the age of marriage has been reduced to thirteen years.

When Khomeini sent messages of reassurance to women from Paris, he said: "women would have everything to gain" (in the society he envisioned) because not only does Shism not exclude women from social life, but it elevates them to a platform where they belong--a higher platform. It took women a short time to realize the hidden implication of this--if women can be elevated to a higher platform they can also be pushed to a lower one--a higher platform does not mean equality.

And this is the crux of fundamentalist rhetoric--a call for a return to culture and tradition is almost always a call first addressed to women. It is interesting that when Western dress was rejected no one said that men should stop wearing suits and ties. Women have throughout history been projected as the guardians of culture--national, regional, or communal. When this culture is itself a culture against women, the implications for women are frightening. Fundamentalism makes selective use of religion and picks out only those elements which suit it.

In India's secular constitution, while a common criminal code exists for everyone on the issues of marriage, property, etc., separate personal laws exist for Muslims, Christians, and Hindus. The stereotypic conception of India as a nation torn by two homogeneous nations, the Hindus and the Muslims, is a modern phenomenon. Beginning in the late nineteenth century, the educated middle and lower middle classes were faced with increasing unemployment; Indians were forced to compete with each other for scarce resources. The frustration, sense of deprivation, and a constant fear of loss of identity and status created an atmosphere of violence and brutality. Religious questions such as the protection of cows or music before a mosque became crucial issues because they came to symbolically represent the preservation of middle-class identity. In addition, fundamentalism became an important instrument of colonial policy in the effort to thwart the rising nationalistic movement. Nationalists themselves identified nationalism with the revival of Hinduism. Nationalist literature defined Hindus as heroes, Muslims as foreigners and as oppressive, lecherous tyrants. This movement affected women, too. While earlier both Hindu and Muslim women attacked the system of purdah (veil), Muslim women began to defend passages in the Koran about female modesty as communal divisions intensified.

But the assertion of fundamentalism has a far deeper and more insidious implication for women. As we've seen, fundamentalist consciousness arises in situations of insecurity and fear of the loss of identity. External symbols become crucial for the redefinition of communal identities, and here we find one essential component of this identity--whether it is national-, religious-, or caste-based--is the assertion of control over their women. The imagery of communal riots is full of sexual stereotypes, as in an article from the Times of India: "They captured beautiful Hindu women, forcibly converted them and utilized them as temporary partners of life. Hindu women were threatened, molested, and compelled to run half naked for shelter to forests..."

In the communal image, a Muslim is a man of low morals and uncontrolled lust who is ready to seduce, abduct, and assault Hindu women. The Hindus are on the other hand 'mild' and docile. These stereotypes have often been transferred to other communities without much change--the stereotype of the Muslim now exists for the Sikh, or the tribal or the Harijan. What better way to prove strength, manliness, and power than by showing that women are under your control? Rape is an expression of this same principle--raping the other man's woman is a way to humiliate him and show access to his property.

In the Hindu, Sikh, and Muslim fundamentals in India today, control over women is a central theme. As far as women are concerned then it becomes difficult to talk of a majority or minority community. Both are repressive for women.

14021. Clancy-Smith, Julia; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 14: The Modern Arab World: The House of Zainab: Female Authority and Saintly Succession. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 254-274. The Rahmaniyya zawiya (sufi lodge) in Al-Hamli, Algeria, gained thousands of followers by the 1890s, spiritual clients of its shaikh Sidi Muhammad ibn Abi al-Qasim and later of his daughter Lalla Zainab. The town emerged as a significant regional pilgrimage center; its facilities included a library, mosque, children's school (kuttub), sufi meeting rooms, and lodgings for older students attending te madrasa. By 1897, the center's holdings were estimated at F2.5 million, during a period of the general impoverishment of Muslim Algerians. On 6/2/1897, Sidi Muhammad ibn Abi al-Qasim died; his death brought a fierce struggle for spiritual and administrative control of the zawiya and from 1897-1904, until her death, Lalla Zainab directed the activities of the zawiya.

In North Africa, the Tijaniyya and Rahmaniyya sufis allowed women a role in institutionalized collective activities; by the late nineteenth-century, there were many female members in the Rahmaniyya; in 1880s, Louis Rinn estimates the female membership at 4000. In 1913, one oasis in the Trout region had three female Rahmaniyya members for every male member. Membership in the tariqas gave women power and was a source of pride. Women had held leadership roles in the Rahmaniyya order in the Jurjura Mountains in the Kabylia, at least temporarily. The widow of the deceased shaikh, Lalla Khadjia, resolved a bitter succession dispute, after leading herself from 1336-1842, using her daughter Lalla Fatima would be a popular leader of resistance to the French conquest. Lalla Zeinab was regarded before and after her death as a pious, learned woman and a saint; much of her legitimacy came from her own actions and activities rather than her descent. There is little detail about her life however, and most information available comes from her political opponents. Zainab was singled out by her father as being learned, and her vow of celibacy, simplicity of manners and devotion to the needy added to her popular veneration. When her father died, she successfully pushed aside the successor designated by her father, her cousin Muhammad ibn al-Hajj Muhammad, due to his impurity and her rejection of the letter appointing him her father's successor. The struggle between the two was never framed as a gender issue by Rahmaniyya members, but rather was seen in terms of who could be the stronger leader, especially against the French. Since the French authorities supported Muhammad ibn al-Hajj Muhammad, who they believed would be a weak leader, they were stunned and defiantly maneuvered by Lalla Zeinab's canny use of the French courts; her combination of French legal procedures, Islamic law and her own formidable rhetorical abilities defeated all her male opponents, including the French administration. Today, almost a century after her death, Lalla Zeinab remains a popular leader in the region. The apparent uniqueness of the life of Lalla Zeinab among North African women may be merely a product of the lack of research.

The psychological abuse of women from religious extremism and pornography were two types of violence against women that had not received enough attention, the Commission on the Status of Women was told this afternoon, as it concluded its general discussions on the priority themes of the Fourth World Conference on Women. The representative of Algeria said that the tenets of religious extremism psychologically abused women by mandating the separation of the sexes. Women were also made scapegoats for society's ills. Such violence must be condemned as a violation of the basic rights of women, she said. Similarly, the harmful effects of pornographic, degrading and violent materials had been of great concern for women in New Zealand, the representative of that country said. As a result, laws were written to restrict the availability of pornographic materials likely to harm women and reduce the visibility of images that they found offensive and demeaning. Addressing the situation of women in areas of conflict, the observer of Palestine said that the situation of women in the Israeli-occupied territories had not improved, despite the peace process. However, Palestinians were working to rebuild their communities through training, agricultural cooperatives, income-generating projects and psychological counselling. Palestinian women were preparing to help set up national institutions, as well as centres for information and education, she added. The representative of Liberia said that, as a result of her country's civil war, women there had begun to take part in politics and help with humanitarian activities. The Government now realized the importance of women's votes, she asserted. Turning to women migrant workers -- some of whom had fled from armed conflicts -- the representative of the Philippines said that the plight of migrant women living in large cities in western industrialized countries deserved more attention. They should have mobility and access to transport in order to pursue employment opportunities and career prospects, she added. The representative of the Philippines said that the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should lead in addressing the problems women migrant workers faced. She called on all countries to sign the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. The representatives of Kenya, Spain, Tanzania, Cyprus, Pakistan and India, as well as the World Federation of Ukrainian Women's Organizations also made statements. Pakistan and India spoke in exercise of their right of reply. The Commission will meet again at 10 a.m. Wednesday, 16 March, to take up draft resolutions on: the condition of women under apartheid; the status of women in the United Nations Secretariat; the mainstreaming of women's issues in development policies; and the situation of women in the occupied territories had not improved, despite the peace process.

The representative of the Netherlands said that the plight of migrant women living in large cities in western industrialized countries deserved more attention. They should have mobility and access to transport in order to pursue employment opportunities and career prospects, she added. The representative of the Philippines said that the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should lead in addressing the problems women migrant workers faced. She called on all countries to sign the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. The representatives of Kenya, Spain, Tanzania, Cyprus, Pakistan and India, as well as the World Federation of Ukrainian Women's Organizations also made statements. Pakistan and India spoke in exercise of their right of reply. The Commission will meet again at 10 a.m. Wednesday, 16 March, to take up draft resolutions on: the condition of women under apartheid; the status of women in the United Nations Secretariat; the mainstreaming of women's issues in development policies; and the situation of women in the United Nations Secretariat; the mainstreaming of women's issues in development policies; and the situation of women in the occupied territories had not improved, despite the peace process.

The representative of the Philippines said that the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should lead in addressing the problems women migrant workers faced. She called on all countries to sign the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. The representatives of Kenya, Spain, Tanzania, Cyprus, Pakistan and India, as well as the World Federation of Ukrainian Women's Organizations also made statements. Pakistan and India spoke in exercise of their right of reply. The Commission will meet again at 10 a.m. Wednesday, 16 March, to take up draft resolutions on: the condition of women under apartheid; the status of women in the United Nations Secretariat; the mainstreaming of women's issues in development policies; and the situation of women in the occupied territories had not improved, despite the peace process.

The representative of the Philippines said that the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should lead in addressing the problems women migrant workers faced. She called on all countries to sign the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. The representatives of Kenya, Spain, Tanzania, Cyprus, Pakistan and India, as well as the World Federation of Ukrainian Women's Organizations also made statements. Pakistan and India spoke in exercise of their right of reply. The Commission will meet again at 10 a.m. Wednesday, 16 March, to take up draft resolutions on: the condition of women under apartheid; the status of women in the United Nations Secretariat; the mainstreaming of women's issues in development policies; and the situation of women in the occupied territories had not improved, despite the peace process. discrimination that kept women from inheriting property, and to ensure their access to acquisition and ownership of property. She reviewed some of the Kenyan Government’s steps to protect the rights of women in the workplace, such as ensuring the right to equal pay, promotion, leave with full pay, adequate housing and medical attention. She supported the adoption of legislation to protect women from violence.

FAMATTA R. OSODE (Liberia) said the contributions of Liberian women had been disrupted by the civil war in her country. Liberian law stated that all Liberians were equal. However, there was no equality between the sexes. Some women had been able to overcome prejudices and stereotypes, but there was no room for complacency. Equality would come only when the distribution of wealth and purchasing power was improved. Most women were unaware of job possibilities and, due to the war, development strategies were relegated to the background. In addition, the war had brought refugees and displaced persons, food and water shortages, disease, including acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), and an increased use of drugs. Peace was now the highest priority to her Government, she continued. Peace promoted social justice, forged unity and allowed the restructuring of the country. If its young people were not rehabilitated, they could be left to a life of crime and poverty. In the past, Liberian women had not shown an interest in politics, but during the war their sense of responsibility to others had changed that situation. During the war, many women chose to remain in the country to help with humanitarian activities. The Government had also come to realize the importance of the women’s vote. Finally, she would appreciate assistance for Liberian women to attend the World Conference and other meetings.

FOUZIA BOUMAIZA (Algeria) said that although equal pay for equal work was now accepted and prescribed by law, work-related gender disparities were still common, as was discrimination in the workplace. For example, it was rare that teachers encouraged sending young girls into science fields, the army, foreign affairs or finance. As a result, women were promoted faster than their colleagues and women were relegated to assistant positions. It should be noted that the concept used to measure the inequality of pay in the Secretary-General’s report on equality of pay was not satisfactory. Violence to women was a violation of the basic rights of women, she said. The Commission should remain seized of the issue until the 1995 World Conference. Women had become the scapegoat for all the ills of society. She supported measures aimed at eradicating violence against women, such as education and social communication. Moral and psychological violence were two types of violence that had not received enough attention and were often attributable to the tenets of religious extremism and separation of the sexes. Such violence must be condemned, she said.

ANA SANDERATS (Spain) said that in 1983, a Government body had been set up to develop specific policies for women. The Government had implemented the First Plan for Equal Opportunity. Even so, real equality had not yet been achieved in terms of access to employment, equal wages, and decision-making posts. Last year, the Second Equal Opportunity Plan was carried out, in an attempt to achieve real equality. The Plan would try to ensure the full employment of women by addressing that discrimination in employment should stop and emphasizing the training of women. The Plan also examined the problems of women in the cultural field, in order to combat negative stereotypes, she said. It would try to ensure access for women to high-level jobs in the political sphere and promote efforts to achieve 40% representation for women in legislatures and other positions of power. She called for solidarity between women in the advanced and the developing countries, which would help reduce the destruction of jobs and the tendency towards migration.

NARCISA L. ESCALER (Philippines) called for close attention from the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) to the gravity of the problem facing women migrant workers. There was a continuing trend towards international migration of women workers, mostly from developing to industrialized countries. It was a process also known as the feminization of overseas contract labour. Many of those women, who took low-rung jobs in service sectors, were vulnerable to economic and sexual exploitation. They faced rape, beating, violence through mutilation and death. The contributions they made to industrial economies were hardly recognized. All countries should sign the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, she said. The Philippines did so last December. She said she would submit a resolution that would deal with the problem more concretely, provide positive action to address it and enhance the issue at the World Conference.

PATRICK RATA (New Zealand) said that New Zealand supported the consensus adoption by the General Assembly of a Declaration on the Elimination of Violence Against Women and the appointment of a Special Rapporteur on violence. New Zealand had taken several measures to prevent violence against women, including the establishment of a Crime Prevention Unit in the Prime Minister’s Department. It had also provided shelter for women and children escaping from domestic violence, adopted laws to protect victims of family violence and increased jail terms for serious offenses against women. For example, rape sentences had been raised from 14-20 years. He said that pornography had been of great concern for New Zealand women and the country had written restrictions on pornographic materials. The Films, Videos and Publications Classification Act was passed last year to ban harmful materials. It was specific on how violent and degrading material was to be treated and provided greater restrictions on the availability of videos and printed publications. The purpose was to reduce the visibility of images that women found offensive and demeaning. The new law would punish possession of of offending materials, which was designed to curb the circulation of such materials in the underground markets.

TERESA FOEGELBERG (Netherlands) said that the goals of closing the gap between women’s and men’s pay deserved comprehensive policy-making, which would include: establishing effective legislation; making more information available to women about comparative pay; equal wages in similar jobs; and changing the gender-based division of labour and the stereotyped choices of men and women in vocational training. Progress on that issue depended on women’s economic self-reliance, enabling them to decide more freely about their own lives and destiny. Support to the urban poor in developing countries was a central part of her country’s development cooperation policies, she continued. As the problems facing women in development were interlinked, an integrated approach to policy-making was needed which would address the phenomenon of mass migration and mobility and public transport. The situation of migrant women, particularly those living in large cities in western industrialized countries, needed to be given more attention. Mobility was often a prerequisite of employment possibilities. Further, she said the major themes of the agenda of1995 Social Summit should be analysed for their approach to gender. That would ensure that the contribution of women would be taken into account in the Summit.

OLEKUMBAINE (United Republic of Tanzania) said that current economic relations between the developing countries and the international monetary institutions had hurt women. Debt servicing and structural adjustment programmes had led to government cuts in social services and education. She reviewed some of the measures her country had taken to improve the situation of women. For example, it had set up a Women’s Development Fund to improve their conditions through income generation and implemented plans to reduce poverty. Local laws in Tanzania had been revised to set aside 25% of local government posts to women and members of their families, she said. The Philippines did the same thing, but during the war their sense of responsibility to others had changed that situation. During the war, many women chose to remain in the country to help with humanitarian activities. The Government had also come to realize the importance of the women’s vote. Finally, she would appreciate assistance for Liberian women to attend the World Conference and other meetings.
COUNTRIES,

KAHDIJA ABU-ALI, observer of Palestine, said that the Secretary-General’s report on peace and violence against women stated that the situation of Palestinian women had not improved, despite the peace process. Unemployment in the Gaza Strip had reached 50%, 130,000 workers had lost their means or their income, and per capita income had fallen to $200, below the poverty level. More than 100,000 people died or disappeared for eight years. Women who fled from their homes and displaced persons had increased, as had the percentage of women as head of family. Girls had dropped out of school to search for work. Equal pay could not be discussed in the face of such difficulties. Further, ecological problems had been caused by the exaggerated exploitation of Israeli occupiers and settlers, posing a direct danger to the population, she continued. Diseases, especially measles, had spread in refugee camps, and a majority of children suffered from anaemia. In addition, 50% of the population lacked health services, as there were only 1.9 beds per 1,000 persons. In Israel, there were six beds per 1,000. Children had been exposed to poisonous gas, prison, beatings and shootings. Psychological pressures caused fear and anxiety, and violence to women had increased in 80% of the families. The cruelty of occupation affected the family as a whole, with women suffering most. The Palestinians had worked to rebuild their communities, she said. They had initiated training, agricultural cooperatives, income-generating projects and psychological counselling. Peace should not be made up of slogans designed to acquire political gains. Palestinian women were preparing to contribute to the setting up of national institutions. They were training to attain positions in research, development, planning and policy. They had set up centres for information and education. Support from the international community was needed to build a new society based on equality, peace and justice, she said.

EHNMINA JANJUA (Pakistan) said the question of States that were the major source of violence against women and policy-makers that were responsible for such systematic policy needed to be addressed. There had been horrendous acts of violence against women in Bosnia, in India-occupied Kashmir and in some conflict zones in Africa, whose perpetrators were the States themselves. The deliberate and systematic targeting of women in situations of armed conflict was a grave development that demanded action. In order to stop ongoing atrocities and to prevent such occurrences in the future, she said offending States should be prevailed upon to provide immediate and unrestricted access to human rights groups to investigate any reports of violence against women. Upon verification of such violence by those groups, there should be an immediate activation of the international human rights machinery, with the offending State being required to give an official account of its actions. The State functionaries found responsible for the acts of violence should be prosecuted for war crimes. Swift and resolute action by the international community was needed to stop State-sponsored violence against women.

ERATO KOZAKOU-MARCOULLIS (Cyprus) said that her country was writing new laws to curb violence against women. A bill entitled “Prevention of Violence in the Family and Protection of Victims” was before the House of Representatives. As for violence in armed conflict, she said that women and children were too often the victims of inhumane acts and degrading treatment. Almost 45 years since the adoption of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, grave violations of human rights continued in such forms as “ethnic cleansing”. Cyprus itself had suffered from abhorrent practices against its civilian population, particularly against women and children, as a result of foreign aggression and military occupation. She welcomed the programme of action adopted at the World Conference on Human Rights to express dismay at the massive violations of human rights, especially in the form of genocide, ethnic cleansing and systematic rape of women in war situations, which led to the mass exodus of refugees and displaced persons. Violence against women should be eliminated. The Beijing Conference would be a unique opportunity for undertaking specific commitments and actions to stop it.

S.K. GUHA, Joint Secretary, Department of Women and Child Development of India, said that the Indian Parliament was enacting Constitutional Amendments to reserve one-third of all posts for women in local rural and urban areas. There was a nation-wide legal literacy campaign through non-governmental organizations to educate and make women, particularly poor women, aware of their legal rights including those enshrined under the labour laws. Coupled with legal awareness, the nation-wide process of democratic decentralization, with women in the vanguard, would make equal remuneration more and more a reality. Real empowerment of women could only take place through mobilization and employment and income generation, he said. There was a large amount of skills training mobilization and employment creation schemes aimed at wage employment, as well as self-employment. If violence against women was to be eliminated, it was important to alter the unequal power equations between men and women that supported such violence, he said. It was the ideology of patriarchy that had to be challenged and dismantled. The other sector that contributed to violence was the culture of silence. Women were forever reluctant to discuss violence or bring it to the fore. That was particularly true for domestic violence. It was therefore necessary to extricate family violence from within the private sphere and bring it to the public sphere for redress. The continued portrayal of violence and stereotyped images of women needed to be addressed and confronted. Gender sensitization of the enforcement agencies and legal literacy were two of the most important interventions, he said. In India, a National Commission for Women was a statutory body with wide powers aimed at overseeing the working of various safeguards for women. All policy proposals affecting women had to be compulsorily referred to the Commission for its views before adoption. There was a system of continuously reviewing and reforming laws relating to women, so as to make them more focused. For instance, legislative amendments relating to certain forms of violence against women shifted the burden of proof to the accused. He also responded to the statement by Pakistan, saying it was an attempt to intervene in the internal affairs of India. He said that the position of women in Pakistan was backward, quoting from a Pakistani newspaper as support for his views.

OLGA STAWNYCHY, of the World Federation of Ukrainian Women’s Organizations, appealed to the world community to inform their Governments on the concern of Ukrainian women regarding the effects of environmental disasters, such as the Chernobyl accident.

There should be measures to stop the spread of nuclear facilities, she said. [...]

In 1997, the fundamentalist Islamic Salvation Front won 188 seats in Algeria’s first multi-party parliamentary elections. The second runoff ballot, scheduled for 1/1997, was canceled after President Chahdi Ben Jaddid was forced to resign by a group of military and civilian officials who formed a new State Council.

Remembering Djamila Bouhired, the legendary heroine of the war of liberation, Akila Guared, also a veteran of that struggle, is touched. We are in the Aula Portico of the Sociology faculty at La Sapienza University in Rome. Guared, president of the Association to Defend and Promote the Women’s Organizations, appealed to the world community to inform their Governments on the concern of Ukrainian women regarding the effects of environmental disasters, such as the Chernobyl accident. There should be measures to stop the spread of nuclear facilities, she said. [...]
the new military-political troika in power. The task is burdensome. No other nation in the vast Muslim world has had to marry as schizophrenically as Algeria. In the space of one generation Algeria has been confronted with faith and liberation, emancipation and tradition, Boumedienne-style socialism and the Right, mosques and intellectual salons. No other Arab women have paid more dearly for this schizophrenism than the Algerians. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=]

That’s the point! respond the feminists. They contest above all the notion of a single truth, an Islamic one, by which the FIS would interpret the complex reality of all Algerians. Equality between the sexes, recalls Sharifa Bouatta, for the Roman audience, is a point in the Constitution that has no use in the single creed of Islam, nor in the patriarchal family. There is a woman, Oum El Moudhir, of the Islamic Association Al-Irshad oual Isalh ready to supply the necessary theory. She states, “For thirty years, we were tossed around by a political system that was imposed against our will. But we were not confused: God ordained us to take control of what was theirs. In liberation and in family. A true Algerian wife could delegate her vote to her husband because she wants to scrupulously attend to the word of God.” [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=]

A few days after the march of the 10000, the Algerian streets were once again host to a crowd of women. Veiled, heavily veiled even, the Islamic faithful, as they are called by the westernized Algerian women, marched to defend the right to elections, and the politics of the Islamic front, in the name of democracy. The Islamic militants, required to be submissive to men, are in the majority. Mixed in together are women wearing blue jeans, creating an immediate image of the two spirits of Algeria. These are same spirits which, after having dozed for years in the memory of the liberation struggle, now demand to be its exclusive representatives. For Islamic society, as is each and every orthodox Muslim’s dream, it is the return to Medina, the holy city where Mohammed dreamed of building a state based on religious obligations made real. The other side, the lay society that separates Church and State, finds its base in rights determined by popular referendum, as with all democracies. The socially determined weakness for Muslim women and the legislation about Algerian women is the point of contention between them. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=] intellectuals of the Arab diaspora who dream of models of feminine liberation in the mythical figures of early Islam. In the warrior-wife of Mohammed, in the tribal chief who, before converting, opposed armies and the lucid arguments advanced by the successors of the Prophet. One can perceive in this mediation ground a break that points towards feminine thought. For good or ill, women, women’s liberation, and Islam are discussed. Which of them might play a part in the future battle of Algiers? This permission to draw on International Journalists (ANAA), Dakar; Association des Juristes démocrates, Dakar; Association de Solidarity & Friendship Among the People, Algiers; Association nationale pour l’alphabetisation et la formation des adultes (ANAAA), Dakar; Egyptian United Nations Association, Cairo; Mauritian-Palestine Friendship Society, Port Louis; Organization of African Trade Union Unity, Accra; Palestine Committee for NGOs, Tunis; Pan African Women’s Association, Luanda; Sudanese Women Union, Khartoum; Supreme Islamic Council of Sienna Leone, Freetown; Union of Journalists of Sierra Leone, Freetown; Zimbabwe Pakistani Friendship, Harare. [=]

14030. DS. “Algeria: New East and North Africa: Algeria: Introduction”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February1995. pp. 1143-1154. groups steadily intensified their campaign to overthrow the Government. Guerrillas mounted daily attacks on security personnel and established strongholds in certain Algerian neighborhoods and other parts of the country. Militant Islamist groups with more radical agendas than the FIS have steadily become more active in the insurgency. A climate of fear and intimidation deepened as extremists assassinated dozens of political figures, journalists, academics, and thousands of other civilians, as well as over 78 foreigners. Reprisals by the regime’s forces have grown bloodier. The Government estimated that 10000 people had been killed by the end of 1993. The figure for 1994 has not been officially released but most sources estimate that it will be twice as high. The State’s security apparatus includes the police, the gendarmerie, and the army, all of which are involved in efforts to repress the Islamist insurgency and combat terrorism. They were responsible for numerous human rights abuses. Civil strife has devastated the economy, aggravating the longstanding problems of unemployment, inflation, housing shortages, scarcity of foreign exchange, and the legacy of years of inefficient state planning. Economic pressures and an inability to make service payments on its foreign debt prompted the Government in April to sign an agreement with the International Monetary Fund and to begin implementing market reforms. Nonetheless, conditions for ordinary Algerian only worsened in 1994. Respect for human rights and the rule of law continued to deteriorate in an increasingly tense environment. Abuses by all sides multiplied. Using emergency law powers, the Government continued to detain, in many cases without due process hundreds of people suspected of Islamist activities or sympathies. Special antiterrorist courts, created under the state of emergency handed down death sentences in trials which were unfair according to international standards. There is convincing evidence that the security forces carried out hundreds of extrajudicial killings, mostly in retaliation for previous attacks by armed groups, and often tortured otherwise abused detainees. The Government continued to restrict the freedoms of assembly, religion, and the press and to discriminate against women.
Domestic violence against women remains a serious problem. Armed groups, many of which claim to have Islamist objectives, also committed escalating abuses and atrocities. Terrorists, often disguised in uniforms of the security forces, killed hundreds of civilians. Some armed groups carried out a campaign of violent intimidation aimed at closing down schools and other public institutions. As law and order broke down, anti-Islamist vigilante groups engaged in reprisal killings of Islamists and their sympathizers. [ ]

14032. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 3: Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The cancellation of National Assembly elections and assumption of power by the High State Committee (HSC) in 1992 effectively denied citizens the right to change their government. Constitutional provisions approved by the National Assembly in 1989 that afford Algerians the right to change their government have been effectively suspended. National elections in 12/1991 resulted in a decisive victory for the FIS— 188 of the 430 assembly seats went to the FIS; 15 went to the governing National Liberation Front (FLN) and reflected strong popular discontent with the Government. In 1/1992, President Bendjedid resigned under pressure from the army, election results were cancelled; and a 5-member executive committee, the BC, was named to serve until 12/1993 when Bendjedid's term of office was to end. The BC pledged to respect this mandate and said it will step down before 1/31/1994. However, the Government has postponed resumption of the electoral process until it considers conditions, including the security situation, to be stable enough to allow a resumption. Until such time, a transition government will be responsible for governing the country. The Government has not offered a definitive timetable for new elections but has said repeatedly that 2-3 years would be needed before elections could resume. Two levels of local government exist: 1541 local districts elect municipal councils to 4-year terms, and 48 provinces elect provincial councils to 5-year terms to work in consultation with provincial governors appointed by the Ministry. In local and regional elections in 6/1990, the FIS won control of 853 municipal and 32 provincial councils. But in 1992 and 1993, under Article 8 of the State of emergency Declaration, the Government replaced most elected local councils—including all 895 FIS-controlled councils as well as some FLN, Hamas, and Rally for Culture & Democracy (RCD) councils—with government-appointed executive committees. Very few women are active in government, there are presently no women among the 26 Cabinet ministers. Fewer than than 1% of the candidates for assembly seats in the 1991 election were women, a reflection of strong social pressures against women's participation in politics and government. The Berbers, an important indigenous minority group, participate freely and actively in the political process. Two important Kabyle-based political parties exist, including the FFS, which came in second to the FIS in the number of seats won in the 12/1991 election, and the RCD. Furthermore, Berbers hold a number of influential positions within the Government and the army. Algerian Tuaregs (a people of Berber origin) do not play as important a role in the national-level political process, due in large part to their small numbers (estimated in the tens of thousands) and their nomadic nature. Systemic or government-sanctioned barriers to political participation, however, do not exist against any minority groups. [ ]

14034. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Women's rights are restricted by Islamic law and custom. Women's rights to work, live independently, and generally function outside the traditional Muslim social norm have come under attack from Islamist leaders and conservative elements of society. Revisions in 1984 to Algeria's Family Code effectively restricted women's rights. Under the Family Code, much of which is based on Shari'a law, women, regardless of their age, employment, or civil status, remain like minors under the legal guardianship of a husband or father. Although the Family Code allows husbands to have four wives (a rare occurrence in Algeria), it requires the husband to disclose his marital status and intent to both his present and future spouses. If he fails to tell the truth, any of his wives may file a suit in court against him for fraud or divorce. The Code awards 4 months of alimony to the woman regardless of the husband's means and the circumstances of the divorce, although under the Code the wife may receive a significant settlement in cash or property after divorce if so stipulated in the marriage contract. Because the Code forbids Algerian women from marrying non-Muslims, women engaged to non-Muslim men can be subjected to harassment, reportedly including confiscation of their passports by authorities. In March women's rights advocates commemorated International Women's Day by calling on the Government to protect women's rights and to change the Family Code. With the growing influence of highly traditional Islamist views and norms among the Algerian population, protest women regard themselves as increasingly under pressure from proponents of the implementation of Islamic law. Conservative societal and family pressures as well as support or fear of political Islam, have compelled many Algerian women to wear Islamic dress, including the hijab headcovering with ankle-length overdress Many other women, however, continue to wear Western dress despite what they feel is continuous harassment and pressure to dress more traditionally. Roughly 10-15% of the work force are women, most of whom work in urban areas. Many of these women are trained and employed in the fields of medicine, education, and the media; some women serve in the armed forces. Some orthodox Islamists have blamed high national unemployment (21% according to official figures) on female participation in the workplace and argue that women should not work outside the home. However, some moderate Islamist leaders have publicly defended the right of women to work. Girls represent just under 50% of students enrolled in primary and secondary schools and 35% of students enrolled in universities. The extent of violence against women is unclear. National studies on this problem do not exist, but the Central Hospital in Algiers alone reported more than 4,600 cases of abuse against women requiring medical treatment in 1991 and 1992. Women's rights advocates assert that such violence is not rare, particularly in the context of family conflicts (i.e., wife and sister beating) in more conservative, male-dominated families. Such abuse, however, is increasingly unacceptable to middle-class Algerians. Violence against women is seldom discussed publicly, although several independent journals published articles on the subject during 1993. Women who are beaten by their husbands may file criminal charges or sue for divorce, but such legal actions are rare, and civil courts are far more likely to rule in favor of men, according to women's rights advocates. Cases of rape and incest continue to be underreported to police and to doctors, due to the social stigma attached in Algeria to victims of such crimes. The Government is committed in principle to combating violence against women, but, given the higher priority it places on other political and security problems, it devoted few resources and little attention to this issue in 1993. [–]

14035. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government is committed in principle to protecting children's human rights and welfare. several children's advocacy groups exist, including the Association for Children's Rights and the National Association for the Defense of Children's Rights. Governments at the regional level offer social and sanitary services for children, but financial resources for such services are severely limited. Furthermore, according to local observers neither the Penal Code nor the Family Code offers sufficient legal protection to children. Although most larger hospitals treat at least several dozen cases of child abuse every year, many more such cases go unreported Some schools, according to news accounts, still use corporal punishment, and disciplinary beatings of children by parents are said to be common. [–]

14036. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The minimum employment age is 16 years. Work inspectors, who report to the Ministry of Labor, are responsible for enforcing the minimum employment age by periodic or unannounced inspection visits to the workplace. The minimum age is enforced in the state sector, the country's largest employment sector. It is not effectively enforced in the agricultural or small private sectors, but violations are not widespread. However, many children under 16 are driven by economic necessity into informal employment, such as street vending. Legislation on acceptable working hours does not make a distinction between young workers and the regular work force. [–]

14037. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (b) Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Although the Constitution and legislation adopted in 1989 provide for the rights of assembly and association, freedom of peaceful assembly is sharply curtailed under the state of emergency. Article 7 of the State of Emergency Declaration allows the Government to close all places of entertainment, halls, and assembly places, as well as ban all demonstrations likely to disturb peace and threaten public order." In 1993 the authorities generally allowed meetings, assemblies, and marches to occur, provided they were consistent with the regime's security policies. Permits were granted for a national march against violence in March (in which antigovernment placards were carried), for public assemblies held in June by Algerian economic associations (which were critical of the Government's economic policies), for an assembly held by the Algerian Journalists' Association (which was critical of the Government's handling of the press), and for a gathering to mark the commemoration of President Bourdais's 1992 assassination (at which the Government's handling of the investigation of the assassination was criticized). Permits were also granted to the Front for Socialist Forces (FFS), a political party stridently critical of the Government's policies, to hold public assemblies in June and October. In April Berber cultural groups demonstrated throughout Kabylie without having obtained a permit to do so; most of the demonstrations were allowed to take place, although at least one group of marchers was dispersed with tear gas. According to the 1989 Political Associations Law, membership in political organizations is permitted for all Algerians except judges, army and security service personnel, and members of the Constitutional Council. All nongovernmental associations must be approved by the Interior Ministry. Most political groups operate openly, although the FIS was banned in 3/1992. These range from political parties—there were over 50 parties, including some centrist Islamic parties such as Hamas, active in 1993, to specialized groups such as human rights and women's rights groups. [–]

14038. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Freedom to travel within Algeria and abroad and to emigrate is provided for by law and is generally respected in practice, although minor children are not allowed to travel abroad without their father's permission. A curfew imposed in 12/1992, and modified in 5/1993, prohibits people from traveling within Algiers and surrounding provinces between 11:30 p.m. and 4 a.m. Gendarmerie checkpoints in the cities and countryside routinely stop vehicles to inspect identification papers and vehicle registrations and occasionally search for signs of terrorist activity or evidence of black marketeering. There are some administrative restrictions on foreign travel related to mandatory military service and the obligation to repay state education scholarships. The Constitution provides for the right of political asylum. Based on data compiled by the Government, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimates that approximately 165000 Sahrawi refugees live in camps in southwestern Algeria. Of these, some 80000 are considered by the UNHCR to be in vulnerable groups and thus in need of aid. Sahrawi refugees in southwestern Algeria are supported by both the Government and the UNHCR. Another estimated 50000 displaced Tuaregs from Mali and Niger live in settlements in southern Algeria. [–]

14039. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Part 02: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including: Freedom From: (a) Political and Extrajudicial Killing", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There is credible evidence that security forces committed politically-motivated extrajudicial killings. Despite President Zeroual's assurances to the contrary, there was no evidence that the authorities investigated such killings. The National Observatory for Human Rights (ONDH), a government body, maintained that it provided the Ministry of Justice with information on 12 cases of suspected extrajudicial killings. In September a group of Islamists sent an open letter to President Zeroual citing 36 cases of summary executions in 1994. The Government maintains that the security forces resort to lethal force only in the context of armed clashes with terrorists. Nonetheless, security forces are believed to have carried out hundreds of extrajudicial killings, mostly in retaliation for previous attacks by armed groups. Many victims were reportedly killed by security forces wearing civilian clothes or covering their heads with hoods. The security forces reportedly killed victims during curfew hours, at or near the victims' homes, or in the presence of the victims' family and friends. The bodies of some victims were reportedly discovered clothed in pajamas, indicating that they had been killed after they were taken from their homes. Security forces allegedly killed other persons after they were taken into police custody. Security forces in Algiers reportedly killed in reprisal against the killing of nine students and their teacher from the El Oued area-Dahab Omar, Derouiche Abdel Bassat, Rahal Abderrazak, Mahaddha Salah, Aouniet Andelkader, Djedrad Abdelkader, Arhouma Saad, Maataallah Abdelbaki, Nazli Abdelkamel, and Kouider Messaoud, who were arrested on March 12. The police maintained that the men were arrested to verify their military service status. On April 13, the police informed a relative of one detainee that the 10 men had been released on April 8, but that they were immediately killed by unknown "terrorists" after release. The Government has not provided an adequate explanation of the deaths. On March 19, the body of Kouider Melal was found in the street near his home in El Ataf, Ouedfodada, alongside the bodies of three men from the same district. Melal had been previously seen in police custody 2 weeks before his death. In addition to reports of extrajudicial killings outside detention facilities, Islamists and human rights activists accused the security forces of causing the unlawful deaths of many detainees who succumbed to torture while in custody. Armed groups, most notably the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), killed hundreds of persons, including members of the security forces and ordinary citizens. Terrorists attacked civilians whom they regarded as instruments of the State or whose lifestyles they considered in conflict with Islamic values. Victims included politicians, teachers, tax collectors, hairdressers and beauticians entertainers, veterans of the war of independence, government-appointed Islamic preachers, lawyers and magistrates who work with the Special Courts, women who refused to veil themselves, industrialists, journalists, intellectuals, and foreigners. Many victims had their throats cut or their bodies mutilated after death. Often the victims' severed heads would be discovered in one location and the bodies in another. According to a February press account, suspected terrorists kidnapped and killed a 14-year-old boy from Medea purportedly because he had befriended several police officers. His body was found hanging from a street sign. His head was found in a nearby town. Armed groups killed at least 18 Algerian journalists and 10 lawyers. In early November, gunmen forced two reporters from their homes and shot and decapitated them. One of the victims worked for the state television company the other for a state owned newspaper. Throughout the year the GIA issued death threats to journalists, foreigners, and others. Many journalists fled abroad because of threats to their lives. In October independent newspapers suspended publication for 3 days to protest the killings of journalists.

Armed groups killed the national secretary for the country's major labor union, the Union Generale des Travailleurs Algériens (UGTA); the president and vice president of Islah Wa El-Irchad, the largest private charitable organization; the rector of the Houari Boumediene University of Science and Technology; the president of the Algerian League for Human Rights; the chairman of the Agronomy Institute at the University of Blida; a professor of economics at the University of Oran; the director of the School of Fine Arts in Algeria, a famous playwright Vactor, the director of the National Institute of Islamic Studies; in Batna a popular singer, a leading sports personality, and the husband of the Government's former spokeswoman. In 1993, the GIA announced that foreign residents should depart Algeria or face death. Since then, terrorist groups have killed at least 90 foreigners, including more than 78 in 1994. Foreign victims included members of the clergy, business People, diplomats, and longtime residents of Algeria. Victims were citizens of a number of European and other foreign countries, although French citizens were the primary targets. In addition to targeted killings, terrorist groups also resorted to indiscriminate violence. In June two grenades were thrown at demonstrators at an Algiers march organized by the Movement for Berber Culture, an anti-Islamic group. The grenades and the return fire from the police wounded 64 persons; 2 died later. Armed Islamist groups used car bombs on numerous occasions, killing many passersby. In July, five French Embassy personnel were killed by terrorists attempting to place a car bomb inside an Embassy residential compound. Armed anti-Islamist groups such as the Organization of Young Free Algerians (OJAL) widely suspected as a front for elements of the regime's security forces carried out reprisals against terrorist groups. Such groups are reportedly active in the Berber region of Kabylie. In March anti-Islamists likely killed two veiled high school students at a bus stop in an Algiers secondary school. Armed men in reprisal for the killing a month earlier of a 17-year-old high school girl who declined to wear a head scarf. In April the OJAL issued a threat to kill 20 women wearing a head scarf or 20 bearded men for every woman killed by Islamic terrorists for not wearing a head scarf. There were many reports of reprisals by vigilante groups for the deaths of military personnel. Vigilantes may have killed 9 persons whose bodies were found on a street near an Algiers bread shop on April 12. The killings may have been committed in revenge for the murder a day earlier of an army colonel near the same bread shop. In September an anti-Islamist group killed as many as 90 people in Annaba, apparently in retaliation for the earlier terrorist murder of a gendarmerie captain and his daughter. The Government has failed to condemn the violence by anti-Islamist groups. [-]

14040. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Algeria: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (b) Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, in Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Using emergency laws, the Government sharply curtailed freedom of assembly, although the 1989 Constitution provides for the rights of assembly and association. Citizens and organizations must obtain a permit from the local Governor's office before staging demonstrations. Such permits are generally granted, after referral to the Ministry of Interior, for demonstrations against Islamist terrorism or in favor of the Government. The regime does not require legal opposition parties to obtain permits to hold internal meetings. The regime allowed Berber organizations to hold demonstrations as long as they took place in the Berber Kabylie region. However, it denied permission for 2 rallies sponsored by the The Berber Rights Movement (MBC) in the Algiers area. Nevertheless, the MBC demonstrated repeatedly in Kabylie for the teaching of their language in elementary and secondary schools. Interior must approve all nongovernmental associations. The Government regards all associations as illegal unless they are licensed. It may deny a license to or dissolve any group reported as a threat to the existing political order. In 1992 the regime dissolved the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) as a political party as well as Islamic social and charitable groups associated with the FIS. Membership in the FIS is illegal. However, the Government itself has continued to meet periodically with detained FIS leaders Abbad Medani and Ali Belhadj. According to a 1989 law, all citizens may join political organizations, except judges, army and security service personnel, and member of the Constitutional Council. Most political groups, except the FIS which was banned in 3/1992, operate openly. There were over 56 parties, including some centrist Islamic parties such as Hamas, active in 1994. Other associations include specialized groups such as human rights and women's rights groups, social welfare groups, and regionally based cultural organizations. [-]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

electoral process in 1992 effectively denied citizens the right to change their government. Power remains in the hands of the military leadership and former ruling party officials. Despite President Zerouals halting attempt to consult with legal political parties and informal contacts with imprisoned leaders, there is no democratic process. In a national speech on November 1, Zeroual declared that the political dialog had failed and announced his intention to hold presidential elections in 1995 regardless. The FIS as well as the other major opposition parties dismissed the promise of elections. Few women are active in government, a reflection of strong social pressures against women participating in politics. One woman served in the Cabinet until her resignation in October, one woman served as governor of the province of Annaba and fewer than 1% of the candidates for Assembly seats in the 1991 election were women. The Berbers, an important indigenous minority group, participate freely and actively in the political process. Berbers hold influential positions in the Government and the army. The Tuaregs, a people of Berber origin, do not play as important a role in the national political process, due in large part to their small numbers, estimated in the tens of thousands, and their nomadic existence. Systemic or government-sanctioned barriers to political participation, however, do not exist against any minority group.

Nonetheless, social pressure against women pursuing a career is strong. In 1994 Islamists increased their pressure on women to adopt Islamic fundamentalist views and norms. In March terrorist groups posted notices threatening to kill any woman who does not cover her head with a scarf. In one case, terrorists killed a 17-year-old woman, reportedly because she declared to adopt Islamic dress (see Section 1.a.). Also in March, suspected terrorists killed a woman in Souala, reportedly because she refused to leave her job outside the home. Women's rights advocates assert that spousal violence is common, although there are no reliable studies on the problem. Nonetheless, the central hospital in Algiers reported that in 1991-1992, it treated more than 4600 cases of abused women. Battered women may file criminal charges or sue for divorce, but women's rights advocates maintain that legal actions are rare because the courts are generally lenient with abusive husbands. [-]

14044. Donadey, Anne. Polyphonie And Palimpsestic Discourse In The Works Of Assia Djebar And Leila Sebbar. Northwestern University. Dissertation. 223pp. AAC 9327185. [Advisor: Lionnet, Francoise] This dissertation foregrounds discursive strategies of empowerment with regard to language, colonization and female subjugation. I analyze two contemporary, post-colonial fictional responses to French colonialism in Algeria in order to reformulate the relationship between violence and desire in the colonial context. The novels under consideration, written by two women at the crossroads between Algeria and France, participate in both European and Maghrebian cultures. As cultural metisses, Assia Djebar and Leila Sebbar weave Arabic and Western intertexts in their fiction. Their writings become palimpsests: both writers inscribe their own texts over a number of previous writings which resurface as a trace. Their novels are polyphonic, dialogical texts in which different voices reverberate and conflate in sometimes violent arabesques. This dissertation explores different areas (historical discourse, literary and pictorial intertexts) in which Djebar and Sebbar deconstruct Western production in order to reappropriate it for their own purposes. Both writers reconstruct a history through the gaps of the Other's discourse (be it the colonizer's or the patriarchal tradition's). Djebar uses fiction to destabilize French archival reports on Algerian colonialization, rewriting them fictionally from an Algerian point of view. Sebbar's treatment of the Algerian war links that war to the rise of anti-Maghrebian violence in France in the past two decades. I then analyze the complex system of epigraphs framing Djebar's novels—an element which has no counterpart in Sebbar's fiction— to reveal how she manipulates her written and pictorial intertexts by decentering and recontextualizing them. Finally, I explore how Sebbar and Djebar come to terms with and deconstruct the violence of the Orientalist literary and pictorial tradition, repeating it in a subversive manner at the same time as they acknowledge their fascination for Orientalist representations of Arab women. As women at the crossroads between two cultures (whose relationship has historically been marked by violent encounters), both writers reclaim a possible utopian territory in their fiction by deterritorializing their intertexts in order to reterritorialize writing. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.]

---

14045. Dufrancatel, Christiane; Peoples Translation Service =

[On 11/1/1954, Algerians began an open revolt against French colonial rule in a protracted struggle ending in 1962, when Algeria gained its independence. The war, which united urban and peasant Moslems, has been a symbol and example for national liberation struggle throughout the world. Women's participation in this struggle has become a widely discussed subject, many feminists have wondered what happened to those Algerian women who had fought side by side with men. In the Winter 1980 edition of Les revoltes logiques, a French quarterly, Christiane Dufrancatel takes a fresh look at Algerian women's roles during the war for independence.]

There are detailed accounts depicting the participation of Algerian women in the liberation war. Two films, Battle of Algiers and Algeria in Flames show many women actively fighting with the FLN (National Liberation Front). Yet almost 20 years later little is said about Algerian women. Today, women hold no leadership positions in the government. Many women are illiterate, work without pay in their homes, are forced into marriage, and still wear veils. The nebulous phrases "failure of the revolution" or "to be expected in an Islamic country" are unsatisfactory explanations for such a phenomenon. One wonders where these active political women are today? Women fighting for national liberation in other countries apprehensively regard Algerian women as examples of what could happen to them if they do not safeguard their specific demands as women.

[=]

I interviewed Mohamed Harbi, a high-ranking Algerian government official under the Ben Bella regime (1963-1965). Ousted by a military coup in 1965, Ben Bella and many of his supporters spent years in jail. Harbi, among the jailed, was freed in 1971 and now lives in exile.

Mohamed Harbi provides some startling insights into the relationship of the FLN to Algerian women and to foreign journalists. The Algerian revolution, Harbi reveals, was a model. It opened the way for "progressive trickery," corresponding to the need to create a popular image to the outside. The theme of the participation/liberation of women was exploited for the benefit of foreigners in order to solicit international support for the resistance. It was also used to foment French opposition in France. In this vein, El Moudjahid on 5/25/59 states: "The Algerian woman is already free, because she participates in the liberation of her country, of which she is its soul, its heart, and its claim to glory." And again, on 5/31/60, "In the National Liberation Army all sectors are open to women." Ultimately though, the intent of the FLN was to preserve Algerian islamic culture and social structures against the onslaught of French modernization. El Moudjahid published an article entitled "Colonialism and Islam" which stated, "The French, who moreover are Christian or Jewish, have dared to deliberately attack the Koran and to impose by the sword France's secular laws on the Moslems of Algeria."

In addition, they have attacked the most sacred aspect of the Koran, of which she is its soul, its heart, and its claim to glory." And again, on 5/31/60, "In the National Liberation Army all sectors are open to women." Ultimately though, the intent of the FLN was to preserve Algerian islamic culture and social structures against the onslaught of French modernization. El Moudjahid published an article entitled "Colonialism and Islam" which stated, "The French, who moreover are Christian or Jewish, have dared to deliberately attack the Koran and to impose by the sword France's secular laws on the Moslems of Algeria."

In addition, they have attacked the most sacred aspect of the Koran, of which she is its soul, its heart, and its claim to glory." And again, on 5/31/60, "In the National Liberation Army all sectors are open to women." Ultimately though, the intent of the FLN was to preserve Algerian islamic culture and social structures against the onslaught of French modernization. El Moudjahid published an article entitled "Colonialism and Islam" which stated, "The French, who moreover are Christian or Jewish, have dared to deliberately attack the Koran and to impose by the sword France's secular laws on the Moslems of Algeria."

For the most part, the women fighters were forced to leave the resistance at the end of 1957 and the beginning of 1958. Those who remained performed only traditional tasks. They taught them to march in parades, and they would show them off in film documentaries. Then they dispersed them. Their political role and participation ended. "Women who had political aspirations or who wanted equality with men had a lot more difficulty. Their behavior and their desire for equality were considered a sign of loose morals."

Obviously there were some heroines. But they had special status, their participation was short-lived and for the most part they became known in prison."

On the women's part there was atrendousoumsunderstanding. Undeniably, the women believed they would be equaloneindependence came. The context lent itself to this belief. But at the same time, they put themselves completely in the hands of the leadership. They were in a position of marginal sub-proletarians vis-a-vis the Supreme Savior. They were waiting to be emancipated."

Claiming that there is a massive assertive force of women in the struggle for liberation is used as a purely verbal retort to colonialism. Propaganda is intensified through the use of the word. In the 1950's and 60's we read, because she is already free the Algerian woman will always be opposed to colonialist barbarism. It is no longer struggle which liberates, it is because the woman is liberated that she struggles.

I focused my research on the uncritical if not eager acceptance of FLN propaganda by leftist journalists. But what prompted me to delve into the relationship of the resistance movement and the progressive media to Algerian women were reports by leftist French press on the Saharan struggle for independence.

Since 1976, the Polisario Front has been fighting for the Saharan Republic's independence. At the time the Spanish colonizers decided to leave the country, they offered to split it up between neighboring Morocco and Mauritania, a move fiercely opposed by the nearly one million Saharans living in this desert land. Like media stories decades earlier, the French reports give a glowing account of the developing role of women in the Sahara. "A new Saharan women is being born" reads the caption beneath a photo showing a group of women participating in literacy classes. The Saharan woman, unlike other Maghreb (North African) women, is emancipated."

The special correspondent of the French Socialist Party daily, Le Matin, went to search the refugee camps of the Sahara for the "soul" of the Saharan resistance. The resulting article, quite favorable to the Saharan cause, sings the praises of the good place of women in national liberation struggles—despite the underlying bias in his language. "Through the struggle for liberation, we have become one man" says of the Saharans. Women are a profitable theme for propaganda arguments; women even become the symbol for the struggle. A Polisario Front poster places a woman in the front row: her body enveloped in her heavy garments, her face uncovered, holding a gun and books in her arms. Behind her, eclipsed by her figure, stands a man also holding a gun. Superimposed on this image is the drawing of a long-range gun whose target is on the heart of the woman. This type of image is not new. It is repeated with subtle variations in numerous appeals for the support of liberation struggles. The words, the slogans and the political arguments which one finds in propaganda reappear woven into journalistic discourse.

For all its pretensions to reportage on the Saharan cause, what this article really informs us of is the complicity which unites left journalist and political leaders. The journalist does not see, but believes and wants to make us believe what the political leaders think we want to believe: that the Saharan woman is emancipated even before the liberation struggle. We read that, "she is not veiled," "polygamy does not exist," "women who want to marry do so without their parents' intervention." Whether a journalist writes what s/he truly finds inside these movements is never known. Is it necessary for traditional society to be free from any accusation of the oppression of women even before the liberation struggle? In this case, reality is of little importance and can always be changed.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

lesbian rights while there were women who were just trying to survive... [Note: it is hard to tell whether the NGO Forum had an anti-Islamic focus or whether it was just the US news coverage that emphasized the anti-Islamic elements of the NGO Forum.][TXT]

14047. Fargues, Philippe; Giddens, Bryce [trans]; Stork, Joe [trans]. "Gender, Population, Environment: From Demographic Explosion to Social Rupture: Present Population Structures Already Carry In Their Consequences An End to Rapid Population Growth in the Most Populous Arab Countries", in Middle East Report, September-October 1994, pp. 6-10. The present population crisis in Arab countries is not the product of the population structure (in the Maghrib, for example, the number of children reaching school age has stopped growing), rather population pressures are the product of a higher rate of social demands by these children and their parents: so smaller cohort of children in relative terms in producing a larger number of children seeing education in absolute terms. In addition, education is now more readily available, and the education levels of women and young people in society is overtaking that of men. Birth rates started falling (a 10% fall in Egypt in 1986-1991): this will be felt in schools six years later, and in the housing markets in 2010; similarly, such turnovers will come in Syria in 2020 and Tunisia in 2005. The number of entrants into the job market at ages 20-24 will rise 30% in Tunisia before stability is reached, 50% in Algeria, Egypt and Morocco, but 120-150% in Syria: if women participate in wage earning employment at the same rate as men, the growth will be 70% in Tunisia and 300% in Syria. Throughout the region, changes of status in women is resulting in smaller families (except among refugee Palestinians supported by UNRWA): the most powerful engine for transformation has been the surge in education for women. As more women receive educations, they will enter the wage workforce: the present low levels of women's participation in the workforce (5% in the Arabian peninsula to 25% in Tunisia, compares with the world average of 50%) is directly related to the fertility rate of women in the Arab women: as more educated women enter the workforce, fertility will decline. At the same time, the diffusion of education is undermining the traditional authority of older generations, even if housing shortages will maintain the patriarchal family for a time. By 2030, literacy will be universal in Arab societies, and long before that the diffusion of education will recast gender relations and have significant political impacts.

14048. Fetni, Hocine. Law And Development In The Third World: A Case Study Of Algeria. University Of Pennsylvania. Dissertation. 287pp. AAC 9235138. [Adviser: Evan, William E.] The purpose of this dissertation is to analyze the relationship between law and development in developing countries, with Algeria as a case study. In this regard, law serves as both an independent and a dependent variable. Specifically, the Boumediene era is studied. The making of laws and the process of implementing them are investigated by using two specific categories of Algerian law, family law and agrarian reform law. The first type of law serves as an illustration of law following social change, and the second of law leading to social change. The effectiveness of legal reform is determined by the appropriate choice between an incremental approach and a rapid approach to societal change, depending on whether the aspect of society to be altered is emotionally charged. To investigate the aforementioned relationship between law and development, two surveys were conducted in eastern Algeria. The first one aimed at discovering changes in attitudes of individuals in three-generation families toward family law, depending on occupation and residence. A modernity scale was used to measure the respondents' answers, denoting whether the responses were traditional or modern. The second survey, conducted among participants chosen by occupation and residence, was utilized to evaluate the use of agrarian reform laws as an instrument of social change and their impact on the Algerian society. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,][TXT]

14049. Geesey, Patricia A. Writing The Decolonized Self: Autobiographical Narrative From The Maghreb. The Ohio State University. Dissertation. 404pp. AAC 9201662. [Adviser: Bjornson, Richard] Since 1950, autobiographical fiction has been the preferred genre for many North African writers of French expression. Assia Djebar's and Abdelkebir Khatibi's autobiographical narratives distinguish themselves from the earlier examples of the genre in that they consciously challenge the notion that autobiographical discourse can communicate an authentic self-portrait of the decolonized writer. La Memoire tautoue (1971) and L'Amour, la fantasia (1985) illustrate that, while self-writing remains an integral tool in an intellectual "autodecolonization" process, it also offers bilingual writers new possibilities for an exploration of the subject's relationship to the languages that have shaped the evolution of the "self." Khatibi has used self-writing as a means of autodecolonization through the deconstruction of the paradigms that characterize earlier Maghrebian French-language autobiographies. His "autobiographie d'un decolonise" explores his plural identity as well as his internalized alterity. Through the autobiographical act, Djebar and Khatibi retracted their "coming to writing" in the French language, leading them to a greater appreciation of how both the mother tongue and the "other" tongue affect the emergence of the self. In the case of Djebar, her autobiographical project highlights her belief in the inescapable necessity for an Algerian woman to use the "adversary tongue" (i.e., French) to "veil" her innermost self. She warns that the intrusion of the foreign tongue upon the self reenacts on a metaphorical plane the 1830 French invasion of Algeria. The autobiographical act in the other tongue effectively reopens the wounds suffered as a result of colonization, thereby becoming an "auto-autopsy" instead of an autobiography. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,][TXT] act breaches the UN Charter and conflicts with the aims of Third World development. What the United States is doing through the United Nations is an act against the spirit and the letter of the Charter. In addition to halting development, the human services we provide to our people, such as education, teaching, and industry, will be also harmed, and they are actually harmed as a result of the economic blockade. The best evidence is that public health and the health of children in particular are exposed to the dangers of malnutrition, and a shortage of education and teaching. The United States and its Western allies are responsible, and every party that yielded to pressure and personal interests and participated in this campaign is also morally and ethically responsible for the damage inflicted on us. However, we cannot surrender, out of self-defense, to such damage. In fact, we have to resist. Comprehensive resistance should begin to minimize the effects of the damage through self-reliance, maximizing agricultural production, and providing for needs through local resources. The United States and its allies and every party that responded to that are responsible for the damage inflicted on our national economy and the life of our people. The reaction will be resistance rather than surrender. Large-scale agricultural development will minimize the damage. Through determination, effort, and persistence, we will succeed.

[Nahl] What are the prospects for development at this stage, and has Iraq halted its development plan under the pressure of the crisis?

[Hammadi] Development at this stage is development of self-defense. This means provision of food and other basic needs on the civilian side of the issue, and meeting the needs of defense and the Armed Forces, on the military side, in the best way possible. Therefore, all development efforts at this stage have been readjusted and reorganized on this basis. Undoubtedly, this does not mean halting the long-term development process, which is not directly linked with the goals I have mentioned. This is an exceptional situation, but we are obliged to deal with it. There are many differences between this development plan and the other plans under ordinary circumstances.

[Nahl] Numerous measures have been taken to activate the agricultural sector, since it is at the core of Iraq's ability to hold fast at the current stage. How do you assess the agricultural sector's response to the measures that have been adopted, especially for the next winter season? Can we say that there is a possibility for achieving a certain level of self-sufficiency in basic, strategic crops?

[Hammadi] All signs indicate that there is a large-scale response to the current development efforts in the agricultural sector. There have been two reasons for this success. The first is that financial incentives for increasing production have been provided, such as increasing the prices of basic crops. Other financial incentives include reducing the prices of seeds, fertilizer, and everything related to agricultural mechanization. In addition, administrative restrictions curbing the petty traders' ability to increase production have been removed. We have taken major steps in this field within a short period of time. Moreover, there is the national enthusiasm factor, which is very important, because it is related to the morale of the peasants and all those who work in agriculture. We make use of both individual and national incentives, because we believe that both factors should be made available to achieve the highest increase in production. All signs so far indicate that there is a large-scale response among workers in the agricultural sector. Therefore, we expect a great response and success in the achievement of the aspirated objectives. The core of these objectives is the achievement of self-sufficiency in cereals as a minimum requirement. Some say we are going beyond this objective, and that agriculture will expand not with regard to cereals only, but also other products. All this is possible and will be clear within the next period. However, what we are sure of now is that there is a large-scale and voluntary response by the peasants to increase the cultivated area and, consequently, production. I will not discuss here the measures that have been adopted, since they are known and have been declared. These measures are numerous and are aimed at achieving these objectives. These measures cover prices, ways of using the state-owned lands, and the lifting of the administrative and legal restrictions on the agricultural sector. I must remark here that we are trying to encourage creativity among agricultural specialists in the invention of new methods and production techniques to help replace imported materials with local ones. For example, good progress has been achieved in the field making new fodder for livestock using basic materials based on non-cereal local products not needed for human consumption. We are about to develop an alternative to this basic material. There have been numerous suggestions, some of which will be useful for achieving such purposes.

[Nahl] Some say that in the next season, Iraq will be able to export an agricultural surplus. What do you think?

[Hammadi] This is possible. If this takes place, we will not export before the end of the crisis. Iraq will maintain every human foodstuff to defend itself. It is possible that production may exceed local needs.

[Nahl] There have been reports on offers by industrial and commercial companies to supply Iraq with medicines and foodstuffs through a third party. How true are these reports?

[Hammadi] This is not true. As far as intentions are concerned, I am sure that most companies and commercial individual and collective establishments are willing to break the embargo and to continue profitable businesses. However, these establishments are currently subject to pressure by their governments, which are also subject to pressure by the United States and its Western allies. As for intentions, yes, there are strong intentions, but I think the implementation of these wishes is not possible for the reasons I mentioned. We are working on the basis of self-reliance only. Our plan takes into consideration no materials from abroad.

[Nahl] Leader President Saddam Hussein has repeatedly proposed the establishment of an international fund to help developing countries that were hurt by increasing oil prices. He also put forward initiatives concerning high inflation rates in the capitalist countries, and other issues. Are current circumstances appropriate for such initiatives? And what was the response to them?

[Hammadi] When the president makes proposals, he means that Iraq must certainly be a main contributor, he does not mean that others should implement the proposals while Iraq stays aloof. Therefore, I naturally believe that the president wants his proposals to be implemented when Iraq is experiencing a normal situation, not the current extraordinary situation. I expect that after the crisis has been resolved, Iraq will play a more active role in consolidating the various Arab countries, increasing their capital and facilitating their activity. The oil-producing countries will increase their financial assistance to poor Arab countries with a view to achieving radical transformation in the process of Arab wealth distribution. The poor Arab countries have rights to the oil wealth, which is centered in certain Arab countries merely by geographic coincidence. After the unification of Kuwait and Iraq, the latter's financial capability has increased, and out of its principles, Iraq is expected to play a more active role in this regard.

[Nahl] Iraq put forward a positive and humanitarian initiative when it proposed supplying the needy developing countries with free Iraqi oil. How many requests have you received? And how can this proposal be implemented to the advantage of the developing world?

[Hammadi] Here, there is also a difference between the desire and the realization of this desire. I strongly believe that perhaps all Third World countries, and even other countries not belonging to the Third World, would have liked to benefit from this initiative if they had the freedom to do so. The Third World countries and world nations in general believe that Iraq is serious in its offer, and it means what it says. All world nations are willing to benefit from the initiative, but they are unable to because of the current circumstances. Immediately after the initiative was made, the United States said through its administration officials that the oil embargo includes this free oil, which meant that no country could benefit and ensure the safe arrival of Iraqi oil or any other Iraqi product.

[Nahl] The Saudi regime has taken measures to punish the fraternal Arab countries that opposed the US invasion of the Arab lands. Particularly, it cut off oil to these countries. How do you view this? And are there any Iraqi measures to provide urgent assistance to these countries?

[Hammadi] First, this is an old and regrettable story. Whenever a political dispute emerges between an Arab government and another, each government tries to punish the citizens of the other, cut off human and... popular bonds, and abrogate earlier agreements. This has had very negative effects on inter-Arab relations and has significantly hindered Arab interaction. Such conduct shows weak or lacking pan-Arab feelings and reflects a primitive, uncivilized spirit. The Saudi Government’s measures against Jordan and Yemen are a concrete example on this. Iraq is now going all-out to lessen the economic and financial burden on Jordan and Yemen as a result of the Saudi position. It approved cooperation with both countries for the purpose of returning private property from the cutoff of Saudi oil. I think that the measures taken are successful and can solve the problem. We are also trying to take other measures to ease the damage resulting from such actions against Jordan, Yemen, and any other Arab country in a similar position.

[Nahi] French-Iraqi relations were strongly shaken when the French Government got carried away and followed the US position. Will this have any impact on the distinguished French-Iraqi ties? Will it also affect the status of French companies?

[Hammadi] France and Iraq are bound by strong ties which have been formed throughout a long period of time. We have made it clear time and again to the French side that we are eager to maintain these ties and promote them, and that we are ready to strengthen these relations in the future. This position has taken shape following the termination of the war with Iran, and through many measures. The re-scheduling agreement which we signed with France was better than any similar agreements which were concluded with other countries. Moreover, we encouraged the activity of French companies in Iraq, and all pending economic problems between the two countries were resolved. Things got out of hand, however, and all this has come to a halt as a result of France’s contribution to the economic embargo against Iraq. Many French quarters wished this had not happened. Here, I would like to note that the positions of France during this crisis have been far from identical with those of the United States. We have always been concerned to make France understand that this is not in its interest in the region, and it has been proven that the status France has in Iraq and the Arab countries following the independence of Algeria, and since the age of President de Gaulle, has turned out to reflect a sound policy which deserves to be heeded. Here, I would like to point out that the French position has recently shown some moderation represented in the proposals of the French president, which he declared in his speech to the General Assembly. We have explained to the French side that these proposals are worthy of attention and development. At any rate, and regardless of what has taken place, we are eager to maintain ties with France, but it depends on the French side to confirm this.

[Nahi] The position taken by some official Soviet sides at international forums has revealed an unmistakable change which runs counter to the existing ties of friendship between Iraq and the USSR. To what extent does this reflect on the nature and magnitude of cooperation between Iraq and the USSR, which has been characterized throughout previous decades by stability and mutual trust?

[Hammadi] In the case of the USSR, it is well known that Iraq and the USSR are bound by a long-term friendship agreement. The radical change that has overtaken Soviet policy toward the Western camp, especially the United States, has led the USSR to take positions identical to those of the United States in relation to the Security Council resolutions. It is clear that this position is not in harmony with the spirit of the Iraq-USSR friendship agreement. I can say that in this regard we have shown patience and tolerance, and have been eager to explain to the USSR that these positions harm relations between the two countries and are incompatible with the spirit of the friendship agreement. To tell the truth, I would say that the USSR, for its part, has expressed its eagerness to maintain friendly relations with Iraq. However, it depends on the USSR in the next stage whether it is eager to maintain relations with us or whether it has other considerations.

[Nahi] How accurate is it to say that this is the era of American hegemony of the world?

[Hammadi] It is still early days. The emergence of other powers to counterbalance the United States is not a farfetched possibility. Monopoly and tyranny cannot reign forever.

[Nahi] Would you name some of these powers?

[Hammadi] Western Europe, for one, can act as a new center of gravity, and so can Japan. The same goes for Arab countries pursuing unity and liberation.

[Nahi] Iraq is said to be seeking a deal to swap oil for foodstuffs and medicines via Iran. How accurate is the report?

[Hammadi] No, such contacts are taking place. It is absolutely groundless. The contacts under way between Iraq and Iran are on the POWs and normalization of ties and to seal the end of the war that, for all intents and purposes, halted on 8/8/1988.

[Nahi] Incidentally, what is the latest on the POWs?

[Hammadi] Yesterday the Iraqi delegate traveled to Iran and communicated to the Iraqis that we initiated the prisoner release on the strength of numerous promises by them that the prisoner swap would be full and comprehensive. We kept our part of the deal, having set free all the Iranian prisoners. The Iranians released a corresponding number. Given that Iraqi prisoners outnumber the Iranians, the Iranians unjustifiably halted the releases. It is not true that there are Iranian prisoners left in Iraq. We are now seeking, through dialogue, to let the Iranian side honor their promises they gave relevant to the prisoners.

[Nahi] Are you optimistic all these crises, above all the blockade, will come to an end?

[Hammadi] A blockade cannot last forever—nothing does. But I cannot pin it to a time frame. It is hard to predict, but certainly it will take some time yet. It may be days or weeks before the blockade ends. This will happen when those who initiated the embargo come to the realization that it is doing them more harm than good. [Reprinted from Fred Moore (compiler), Iraq Speaks: Documents On The Gulf Crisis. Palo Alto, Calif., N.D.] [=]

14052. Hedges, Chris. "Close-Up: US Troops Face Another Danger: The Mujahideen; Many of These 3000-4000 Islamic Extremists Are Veterns of the War In Afghanistan", in Seattle Times, December 3, 1995. p. A3. The hundreds of mujahideen who went to Bosnia to prevent the genocide of the Muslims there are now described as the greatest enemy of the US forces that will be deployed there. Many of the men are described as seeking the overthrow of what they see as the anti-Islamic governments of Egypt, Algeria, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen. UN forces have been involved in several confrontations with the Mujahideen. The Mujahideen acted as shock troops for the Bosnian army, willingly accepting heavy casualties in frontal attacks on otherwise unassailable Serbian positions. One Mujahideen observer that US troops will be no better than UN troops, bringing drugs and prostitution to Bosnia, as UN peacekeepers have done in so many places. Although there are reports of Mujahideen harassing Christians, there is no single report of a confirmed killing of a civilian by a Mujahideen. Znenica, which is a Mujahideen center, has several Iranian and Egyptian Islamic charities, such as Human Relief International, outlawed in Egypt. [TXT]

Sometimes national liberation struggles can reinforce women's oppression rather than challenge it, according to Marie-Aimee Helie-Lucas. She documents how the propaganda surrounding the formation of a newly independent socialist Algeria blinded women to the rising power of the Islamic State. Although Algerian socialism was supposed to be combined with Islamic religion, she feels that the socialist label was a fraud intended to silence those who feared the Islamic state. 'Because it was a socialist state, one could not oppose the politics of the state without opposing socialism; because the people were in power, one could not criticize the regime without being anti-people. This rhetoric, as stupid as it appears when one has stepped out of it, has proven to work successfully in silencing the left in most of the Eastern European women have lived in myth, talking about myth. Women were equal to men in the Constitution, but only as long as the Constitution was in conformity with Islamic religion. Later developments taught us what this stipulation meant.

I’ll now give two concrete examples of the policy of the state against women, and how nationalism, socialism, and religion entwined to work against women.

The first example is the birth policy of Algeria. At the time of independence, Algeria was still under the old natalist French law of 1920, which forbade not only the use but also any knowledge of contraception. This law, like many others, could not be replaced immediately, so it was temporarily continued. Obviously, we women hoped that after independence came we would have access to some means of contraception. But many men died during the liberation struggle, and the policy of the State was clearly to replace them. Having children was encouraged as a main accomplishment for women and a duty to the nation. Nevertheless, it would have been very difficult to have us accept, without protest, such a blunt policy.

But fortunately, if I may say so—the United States was, at that very time, trying to enforce a brutal policy of birth control in the “Third World.” The policy culminated in an attempt to pressure governments to adopt the US world plan, called “fertility target,” at the World Conference on Population in Bucharest. As the champion of the liberation of Africa, as the champion of socialism, Algeria was not to allow such policy. We still know that population policies are not the way to development. Could we, as women, disapprove of that? Could we, as socialists, not support the international policy of our government? Indeed, we did not protest when the natalist law was not changed.

Although we managed to get statements from the highest Islamic authorities that contraception was not forbidden by religion, nothing was to change for a whole decade. This is proof that people in power use religion only when it suits them. At that time, they strengthened their control over people by dictating their private lives in all possible respects, including the bearing of children.

The anti-imperialist stand that they took on birth policy also perfectly suited the needs of their internal policies: women had to pay a high price for it. In about 10 years, the average number of children per woman was 7.9: pregnancies ranged from 14 upwards; we do not know about legal abortions, nor about maternal death. The population growth reached 3.5%, one of the highest at the time in the world.

To make a long story short, 10 years were enough to turn a socialist bureaucracy into a more conventional bourgeoisie, owning means of production. The Algerian ruling class felt threatened by the growth of the lumpen masses, and suddenly reversed its policies: birth control was legalized, contraception clinics were opened and their number increased rapidly, and therapeutic abortion was legalized. Population growth came down to 3.2% within a few years. In 1981, taxation penalized large families. In both cases women had no say. They are the producers of goods which the State controls.

The second example is the use of religion. Although the constitution guarantees equality to all citizens, it was stated shortly after independence that we should have a family code more in accordance with Islamic values. Three projects were drafted, one under Ben Bella, the first president of Algeria, two under Boumediene, the second president. All were circulated in small circles: all legalized the inferiority of women, submitting them to the authority of men who were their legal tutors (fathers, brothers, husbands—or elder sons). In 5/1984, a family code was finally passed, without warning or discussion, which reproduced the Fourth Project that women had challenged in 1981, except for a clause on permission to work. This law was highly unfavorable to women’s economy, but had to be given into marriage; they had no right to divorce, no right to work without permission of the male tutor., restricted rights to inheritance, etc. All this was said to be Koranic, so that no argument should be made against it.

It is now a legal fact that women have lost many rights which were once guaranteed by the Constitution, on the grounds that these rights were anti-Islamic. Supporters of religion will tell you that religion stands for equality among all human beings; Muslims also have this language, and see no contradiction with the inequalities that Muslim law enforces with respect to women. With little sense of humor, they also claim that Islam asks that each believer be fair to his women (polygamy and repudiation are now legal in socialist Algeria); if each man were a true believer, women would be well treated and would not need to seek formal equality.

This erosion of women’s rights is evidence of the takeover by rightist Muslims in the male population, who are known in Algeria as Muslim Brothers and in other countries as Fundamentalists. The rise of religious elements challenging the State in Algeria and channeling the discontent of the population is not an isolated phenomenon; it occurs in most Muslim countries at present. One of the most striking elements of their philosophy is nationalism, entangled with a “going back to traditions,” a search for roots of identity, a rejection of all the evils of Western imperialism. One of the commonalities of these fundamentalist tendencies in Muslim countries is the growing oppression of women.

New enforcement of Muslim laws has toughened the situation for women in many countries and communities—not only in Algeria, but in Egypt, in Pakistan, in India, in Sudan. Not to speak of the unspeakable situation of Iranian women. In Algeria the number of mosques has increased to the extent that each block has a huge room for prayer, each school or university has at least one. The improvised mosques gather huge numbers of young men and teenager boys, who rule their female fans according to the prescriptions of their leaders, we have recently discovered that Fundamentalists train young leaders in several countries and that huge amounts of money are involved in such trainings. For instance, young Pakistani men might be trained in Iran with Saudi Arabian money, Sudanese might be trained in Pakistan with Egyptian money. We hope to encourage research on such matters.

We also found out that both in the Arab world and in South Asia, Ministers of Justice meet and attempt to unify family codes in a way which is even more restrictive to women. There is no doubt about the international dimension of this attempt to use religion as a unification device in the present world situation.

Further Reading: Woman in the Muslim Unconscious, by Fatta A. Sabbah, Pergamon Press, New York, 1984. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 1443, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface; US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=] the Algerian population. They have been condemned as terrorists and totalitarians who want to take Algeria back to the Middle Ages. But it is wrong to see Islamic fundamentalism merely as a movement which wants to oppress women or which kills innocent civilians to achieve that end. It is also wrong to say that the FIS and other Islamic groups are fighters against Western domination who should be supported uncritically. In the past decade, the FIS and groups like Hamas in Palestine have grown rapidly because they have put themselves forward as unyielding fighters against foreign domination of the Middle East and North Africa. Middle Class; The FIS's core is a section of the middle class students, Islamic clergy, and landowners-who aspire to advance their careers and standing in Algerian society. The middle class is always torn in two directions. On the one hand, because of its small size, it must mobilize the oppressed to fight its battles. On the other hand, it does not seek to overturn capitalism nor to support workers' struggles. Therefore, it upholds many of the old prejudices of the existing society. The FIS has mobilized millions behind a vision of a society ruled by Islamic law which promises a better life for the oppressed masses. But this vision also means forcing women to wear the veil. It is anti-gay and hostile to democracy and trade union rights. The FIS has grown at the expense of other political alternatives in Algeria have shown they can't deliver to the mass of the population. Thirty years ago, the French were kicked out of Algeria by a popular movement which fought a bitter war against the colonial power. The new, secular National Liberation Front (FLN) government held out the promise of a better life and dignity for a nation which had been occupied and brutalized by French imperialism for 130 years. But because the Algerian nationalists followed a program of accommodating with world capitalism, they failed miserably to live up to the promise of independence. Increasing Bitterness; Increasing bitterness in the face of declining living standards and undemocratic rule created a space for the FIS to grow simply because they opposed the government and put forward some alternative. It is the political bankruptcy of nationalism that allowed the Islamists to win support for a program that, in many ways, is backward and reactionary. The FIS can no more deliver liberation to the masses than the FLN. The example of Iran shows this clearly. The conquest of power by Islamists in 1979 has not improved the lives of ordinary Iranians. Understanding this allows a better assessment of Islamic fundamentalism than the media's diatribes or the blanket condemnation adopted by much of the left in the West. Socialists will often fight on the same side as the Islamists-against US imperialism in the Middle East or against anti-Muslim racism in countries like France or the US. Socialists should denounce the coup in Algeria and insist that Algerian people have the right to choose whatever government they want. But at the same time, socialists oppose the Islamists' use of individual terrorism and their attacks on women, gays, members of other religious groups or national minorities. To win liberation in North Africa and the Middle East, requires the mobilization of the masses of ordinary people to fight against imperialism. But it also means fighting for a society in which women can do as they wish and in which nobody is oppressed because of their national origin or language. In other words, those who support the FIS today must be won to the ideas and politics of revolutionary socialism. [-]

14055. Huxley, Christine. "Arab Governments Wake Up To AIDS Threat", in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. pp. 24-25. WHO reports only a very small number of AIDS cases in the Middle East, but there is a general awareness that AIDS could become a major regional problem. The reported 366, even if it up 87% from 196 in 5/1988, is certainly an understatement. Nevertheless, Qatar has 21 in a population of only 257000; Sudan with 88 is at the edge of the African AIDS belt, Israel (with close ties to the US) has 76 reported cases, and Morocco and Algeria, both significant tourism destinations, have high rates. While Arab countries initially thought AIDS was a disease of Gays and drug addicts and that their societies would remain exempt, and the fact that the first Arab cases were related to blood transfusions (the high number of cases in Qatar and UAE is related to blood imports; in Iran, testing of the 3198 hemophiliacs has found 450 with HIV; the 1 case in Kuwait is of a hemophiliac child), Arab governments have now recognized that AIDS could become a problem. Only Tunisia has publicly recommended condoms for recreational sex among students. In many countries, the threat of AIDS is being seen as a continuation of imperialism: one underground source in EWgypt reported Israel had set AIDS infected prostitutes to Egypt. Dubai has banned the entry of Ugandan women; Iraq requires AIDS testing of all citizens who return from abroad. All countries of the region are screen blood at blood banks, although poorer states such as Sudan, Yemen and Tunisia have not been able to afford such equipment. The continuing emphasis on screening foreigners in the region could be an imminent explosion in domestic AIDS cases. [AIDS cases reported to WHO and in local media, as of 4/1989 total: Algeria 13, Bahrain 0, Cyprus 7, Djibouti 1, Egypt 6, Iran 5, Iraq 0, Israel 76, Jordan 4, Kuwait 1, Lebanon 11, Libya 0, Morocco 22, North Yemen 0, Pakistan 6, Qatar 21, Saudi Arabia 18, Somalia 0, South Yemen 0, Sudan 88, Syria 5, Tunisia 36, Turkey 18, UAE 22; total 366.] [TXT]

14056. Iraqi Communist Party. "Events of the Week: Women and Peace Week", in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al- Shaab). December 30, 1959, p. 4. "A "Women and Peace" week, sponsored by the League for the Defense of Women's Rights was inaugurated on Sunday, 12/20/1959. The week was commenced by the Minister of Municipalities Dr. Nazihah al-Dulaimi who delivered a lecture on "women and her role in safeguarding peace. "The lecture emphasized the particular interest of women in peace since the mother alone "can appreciate the value of the child since his birth and exerts all efforts to bring him up." The minister stressed on the campaigns that can be launched by women for the backing of the cause of world peace. The meeting also unanimously approved a cable to be sent to the UN denouncing the intention of France to carry out her atomic tests in the Algerian Sahara which would mean "devastation for the fraternal Algerian people and all the peoples of Africa. "The cable demanded that this test should be halted. [+]" }

14057. Iraqi Communist Party. Editorial: "Editorials from the Arabic Edition: Our Absolute Support to the Revolution of the Brotherly Algerian People Is a Reflection of the Soundness of Our National Liberated Line (11/1/1959)", in Iraqi Review (Weekly English Supplement to Ittihad Al-Shaab), December 7, 1959, p. 8. All the Arab peoples are now engaged in direct or indirect battles against imperialism, reaction and agents. However it is the Algerian people who have been engaged for the last five years in the fiercest of these battles, hundreds of thousands of Algerians have been mown down by the fire of the imperialists. The battle of the Algerian people will be immortalized as one of important battles in modern history. The Arab peoples, held together with the Algerian people by the bond of common history, language, interests and land as well as the common struggle against imperialism have stood solidly on the side of the Algerian people. Should there seem any discrepancy in practical stand of each people, it is only due to the difference in the possibilities made available by the circumstances of each people. Thus our people were unable under the oppressive regime of Nuri es-Said to provide Algeria with the aid they desired. As regards the governments, their attitudes with respect to the revolution in Algeria vary according to the nature of their systems and attitude towards imperialism. The more the government adhered to a democratic anti-imperialist line the greater will its support to Algeria be. This is illustrated by the difference in the attitude between the old and the new attitudes of Nasser. Hence it is not surprising that es-Said Government should satisfy itself of offering ID, 200000 while it spent a quarter of a million on banquets and entertainments during the Development Week. Nor is it surprising that the present Iraqi government should make unmatched generous aids to Algeria, take firm measures with France and ask the other Arab countries to do the same. Similarly, it is not surprising that Nasser, before his recent drift to the side of the imperialists, should support the Agrarian Revolution or that he should now compromise with imperialism at the expense of Algeria, and against the interests of the Egyptian and Syrian peoples and against the 7/14/1958 Republic. The attitude taken towards the Algerian cause is the best measure of the essence of all movements, forces, elements and governments. We take pride in the wise and honest stand of our government from the Algerian and Arab Liberation Movement. This stand is honest because our government does not seek rewards or provinces; it is sound because it is hostile to imperialism as a whole including the French. Let us then proceed in supporting Algeria morally, materially and politically and continue in fighting the common enemies: namely, imperialism, reaction and the agents; let us continue to safeguard and consolidate our republican standing in support of the Algerian cause right to the end. Many greeting to the revolutionary heroes of Algeria: to the workers, peasants, artisans, intellectuals and merchants, men and women young and old; greetings to all those who are participating in this battle against the imperialistarmy, their American bases, North Atlantic organization and all their agents. [–]

14058. Jacobs, Milton. "Isolation of a 1000-Year Old Saharan Trading Town", in American Anthropologist, April 1967. pp. 220-222. The arguments in Leonard Kassad's review of and the monograph itself by Briggs and Guede, No More For Ever: A Saharan Jewish Town (1964), includes numerous generalizations about the uniqueness of features of Ghardaian Jewish life that are untrue. The work is uncritical and valueless. The features of Ghardaian society that are asserted as unique include aspects of marriage, childbirth and midwives, status of women, magic, religion, food and dress, yet these same social characteristics are widely found throughout Jewish populations of Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria, as well as among the Arabs and Berbers of North Africa. The authors are correct when they state that Ghardaian Jews are not a "typical" Jewish society only if they are comparing the lives of Ghardaian Jews to the life of American Jews: the Ghardaian Jews are simply typical of the Jewish and non-Jewish peoples of the region in which they live.

14059. Kaplan, Roger. "Algeria Stumbles Toward Democracy", in Wall Street Journal, December 3, 1996. p. A22. [Kaplan is a New York Post editorial writer and director publications at Freedom House.] Algeria "has emerged as a key test of whether secular and democratic institutions can prevail" in the face of Muslim fundamentalism. The recent referendum has legitimized the government that came to power in a coup that overturned the first free elections in the name of a Western backed military dictatorship. The 50000 people who have died in the civil war that followed the coup may not seem auspicious, but the destruction of popular Muslim movements in Algeria is the real path to a model of Middle East democracy that can be built by pro-Western security forces. However, no matter how serious the human rights abuses in Algeria, anything justifies the prevention the emergence of an Islamic-government in Algeria. For example, Kaplan asserts that Islamic law allows rape [/sic]. The destruction of Islam in Algeria by the authoritarian forces of the government "may yet offer the world cause for optimism": [TXT] 14060. Krislov, Samuel. Representative Bureaucracy, Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall Inc., 1974. The question of representative bureaucracy is tied in with the questions of compensatory justice for minorities, quotas, and affirmative action. While bureaucracy was grown steadily albeit against general reluctance in the United States, the question of the relationship of bureaucracy to the broader society has become one of growing importance: namely, should the socio-economic composition of the bureaucracy have any relation to the broader society. The term 'representative bureaucracy' was coined by J. Donald Kingsley in 1944 in England; he feared the British bureaucracy was so wedded to Conservative policies that it would sabotage any Labor program, seeing the composition of the bureaucracy as over-representing classes associated with the traditional elites, and including few of the classes ruled by these elites. The question of representative bureaucracy emerged in the United States as part of the broader civil rights movement, and embraced the demands of Blacks, Hispanics and women for a great role in the great state bureaucracies; these demands superceded the ideology promulgated by Israeli Zangwill that the United States was a perfect 'melting pot' for ethnicity. While bureaucracies were not an immediately apparent venue for the question of representativeness, the position of bureaucracies in modern mass, multi-ethnic societies in tandem with the 'organizational revolution' (modern management, computers, accounting) led bureaucracies to be seen as a necessary focus for representation. However, the American electoral system which principally reinforces the social position of the wealth, who tend to dominate the electoral process, and that of superior ethnic groups ("academic' Jews over inferior' Blacks (rabidly suspicious' Blacks) as in the New York City educational system.

How Bureaucracies Can Never Be Fully Representative (pp. 42-62): Bureaucracies cannot be representative because of differences in skill levels within the population, immutable 'attributes' such as gender or height (although the consistent use of women or Jews as American diplomats in Muslim countries seems to those societies as an 'absurdity or insult', although it is merely a product of 'majority sentiment' in the United States [sic: Zionism? Feminism?]), interests and personality structure [caste?](so Jewish-Americans become diplomats, Greek-Americans become restaurant owners and candy makers, German-Americans beer brewers, Irish-Americans become policemen, and Blacks postal clerks (Krislov notes that postal clerks are the lowest grade people in the American bureaucracy, p. 49)), or broader purposes (whether nepotism or Affirmative Action').

How Bureaucracies Can (and Should) Be Representative (pp. 63-81): Bureaucracy, due to their size and range of activities can be more representative than most branches of government. In addition, there is some social good that can come from greater representation in bureaucracies. As long as skills or aspirations are similar, bureaucracies can readily span ethnic, religious and cultural differences in a population. In several areas, bureaucracies can be more representative that elected offices, as with age groups, and gender (even if women are under-represented in higher bureaucratic posts).

Some Patterns of Bureaucratic Representativeness and Misrepresentativeness (pp. 82-103): The question of bureaucratic representation has been resolved in different manners in difference societies. (1) In India, to redress caste grievances, the government has tried to create a preference for scheduled castes comprising 64.5 million people in the lowest castes. Constitutional and legal methods were used to redress the rigid caste lines built on social acceptance and social habit. (2) In the 1950s, quotas for Harijans were unsuccessful, but in the 1960s, as cohorts of educated Harijans entered the workforce, more started to enter the civil service, albeit at the price of creating significant resentment among other castes. However, against the general background of bureaucratic ineffectiveness in the post-colonial Indian government, the impact of quotas for the scheduled castes is unclear. (2) In Malaya, the problem of ethnic competition between Malays and Chinese led to the partition of Malaysia and Singapore in 1963. (3) Linguistic conflicts in Belgium and Canada, representing the most obvious element of separate cultures and nationalities: in neither country has the problem been resolved. (4) Confessional boundaries in Lebanon has led to the careful and precise division of offices in the national government along confessional (ethno-religious) lines. Maronites have the Presidency, a Sunni is prime Minister, and the President of the Chamber of Deputies is a Shiite. However, since the 1943 census provided the basis for the division of power, further census have not been undertaking since it is feared that the new data would destabilize the equilibrium of the government. However, the division of positions within the bureaucracy along ethnic lines has marginalized the bureaucracy, as the best minds enter business, as has long been traditional in Lebanon. (5) In Israel, Krislov sees the only ethnic problem as the integration of new, immigrant Jewish populations (Iraqi Jews, Yemeni Jews, Moroccan Jews, Algerian Jews) within the 'Jewish state' though state control of MAPAM, Histadrut and the Kibbutzim. Oddly, Krislov ignores the question and existence of Oriental Jewish dissidents like the Black Panthers.

The American Bureaucracy As a Representational Service: The American bureaucracy has a mixed record in being representative.
Russians have sought to create women astronauts where the US has not, the FBI and diplomatic corps remain WASPy. Beginning in the late 1960s, there was a concerted effort to increase the number of Blacks, women, veterans and handicapped in the civil service. The Nixon Administration would see the greatest relative increase in Hispanics in the federal civil service. The successes in making the bureaucracy more representative has been impressive at the grossest level, but remains suspect. An important next step is to provide representation in the workplace. The government must be in elected office, not in the bureaucracy. [Kristlov is Prof. of Political Science at University of Minnesota; he is a member of the American Political Science Association council and editor of Law and Society Review; in 1972-1973 he was the recipient of the Ford Foundation Faculty Fellowship.]

14061. LCOME: Power, Jane. “Building a Network: Labor Education Conference Looks at Middle East Unions”, in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter 1990. WASHINGTON, D.C. - American unionists took another step towards building a network of activists concerned for Middle East workers at a conference of the independent Workers Education Local 189 held here in November 18. The meeting focused on teaching US workers about the conditions of their Middle East counterparts. It began with participants examining the current situation in the different countries in the region: Making the presentation on Israel’s Jewish workers was Bernie Bellush, assistant editor of the Jewish Forward. He described Histadrut’s consistent rejection of opportunities to put Palestinian workers on an equal footing with Jews. When jobs were scarce, Bellush noted, the Israeli labor federation shut Palestinians Out. Over the years, said Bellush, Histadrut has become an employer, controlling 28% of Israeli industry, and a state within a state, providing social services such as the country’s main health insurance system and running the biggest bank and women’s organization. “It’s impossible,” asserted Bellush, “for the Histadrut to be all these things and a true labor organization, too.”

Now, said Bellush, the Histadrut should decide what it wants to be and give up the rest. It must support the independent West Bank and Gaza unions, not condone repression of all unions there. It should campaign for negotiations leading to peace in exchange for land-specifically, to a politically independent Palestinian state. Occupation, he concluded, is economically, morally, psychologically and politically destroying Israeli workers. Samir Miari, a Palestinian from Nazareth and an Israeli who testified before the Knesset’s subcommittee that traced Israel’s discrimination against Palestinian workers from the early Zionist goal of “the conquest of labor” (a 100% Jewish labor force), Israeli laws have provided ample excuses, he noted, for excluding or limiting Palestinian Israeli workers as “security risks” or “non-local.” Today, said Miari, Histadrut employs over 23% of the labor force, second only to the government. Just five of the 168 executive board members are Palestinians, he said. Histadrut’s influence extends to the 189 workers’ branches in private workplaces with 50 or more workers where a majority of the workers vote to unionize. The “socialist prosecutor can ban leftists from leadership, and union leaders are normally close to the government. Although Arab governments try to control labor movements and every union must be sanctioned by the government, unions do function. It is in the union leaders’ own interest to defend private employment against privatization. They are also subject to pressure from their members. Since strikes are illegal, and therefore “wildcat,” they formally condemn them, but at the same time press the government to grant the workers’ demands. Pripstein recounted two recent examples of the Egyptian government’s reaction to labor actions. When 100 train engineers were imprisoned for striking, a court ruled that because President Hosni Mubarak had signed the International Declaration of Human Rights, the imprisonment was illegal. In less than a month, Mubarak, in turn, repudiated the ruling. The government also recently arrested, beat and tortured 52 intellectuals who had formed a solidarity committee for 600 Helwan Steel Plant workers who had been imprisoned, beaten and tortured for staging a Sit-in. Noting that Arab unionists would welcome the solidary of US workers, she commented that any AFL-CIO support for Arab workers against their governments would, however, be somewhat suspect in view of the US federation’s consistent support of Israeli government interests. (Jane Power is a writer living and working in Washington, D.C.) [–]
Q. [Dr. Mohammed Muslih]: What is the relative institutional space to be allocated to government and society? The present government of Sudan is transitional, ultimately it plans to withdraw from many of the areas it now operates in, as social development allows it to do so. The Islamic model of government is that of limited government. The sharia is itself a limitation on government. Because of sharia, Sudan is privatizing: Sudan has rejected the IMF model of privatization and instead has adopted one that does not damage society in the manner of IMF dictated privatizations. The ‘optimum model is one where most functions are privatized’.

Q. [Dr. Abdelwahab Hechiche]: Will the Persian Gulf War allow the West to recover its pre-eminence or will it encourage Islamic movements? Turabi: Saddam Hussein is not a Islamist and his government was a brutal one, with terrible abuses of human rights. It was his lack of popularity in the Islamic world that explains why Muslims did not rally to support Iraq. However, Hussein and ‘even’ Qaddafi represent a national response to the West, which does create some sympathy for them (even if their governance is not Islamic or to be admired). So, many Muslims saw the war not as one to restore the monarchy of Kuwait, but rather believed that the war was fought for oil or to advance Israeli expansionist plans. All saudis believed that the only motive of the Americans was to control the oil: King Fahd himself told me that he did not invite the Americans, but felt that if he did not invite them that they would come anyway, and in that circumstance he would lose his throne. However, between the war and the collapse of the USSR has led to a tremendous growth in the Islamic movement among both the masses and intellectuals (whether nationalists or Marxists). Interestingly enough, it was the experience of colonialism that awakened the desire for Islamization in Sudan; now with the domination of Saudi Arabia by ARAMCO and with the foreign military presence, the Saudi people are belatedly experiencing colonialism.

Q. [Dr. Richard Cottam]: In Iran after the revolution there was an extreme polarization between Islamists and secularists, with an erosion of support for the government by the majority over time; can this tendency be avoided? Turabi: Some polarization in societies along political lines is ‘very natural’ and new phenomena give rise to anxiety; Palestinian nationalist cause. Ultimately, the unity of the Islamic world will have a major role in resolving the question of Palestine. The Muslim world is changing, and Islamic movements are growing everywhere; even Arafat finds himself outlawed by an Islamic movement. In time the Palestinian problem will become more Islamic.

Q. [Dr. Richard Herrmann]: Is the change in direction in the Muslim world toward Islamization inevitable? Turabi: ‘I said it was ‘almost inevitable’ since I don’t believe in historical determinism. However, the process of Islamization seems to be a strong and widespread trend; military attacks alone cannot change this trend, but could convert it from a peaceful path to a ‘radical and aggressive’ path.’

Q. [Dr. Robert Kramer]: If there is no slavery then why is the word ‘abid’ [slave] widely used in Khartoum? Is the civil war not the product of hold the country for 10 years, 5 years, 3 years, 2 years, God knows how long; nobody can predict. The Soviet Union collapsed in a fraction of the time that people gave it; people thought it would take 50 years. Once the change was launched, it took two years for the whole edifice to collapse’.

Turabi. Wise Monograph 1. Tampa, Fla.: World & Islam Studies Enterprise, May 10, 1992, pp. 13-31. Hasan al-Turabi begins with the unitarian principle and the heart of Islam; very early (forty years after the beginning of Islam), secularism ‘afflicted Muslims’, and the Islamic paradigm of the government as the organizer of popular consensus and decisionmaking was usurped by jurists. Secularism and de-Islamization of Muslim society began in non-Arab Muslim countries primarily under the Turks, with its power extending as a part of Western Imperialism. The replacement of sharia started the revival of Islam, but early efforts (Iraq, Syria and Egypt) were politicized and tried to engage in westernized politics: electioneering, standing for elections, and lobbying for Islamic reforms. Such movements were suppressed, even as more traditional groups such as Jamaat Islami and likwan Muslumun (itself having the traditional elitist form of a sheikh with followers) refused to join the governments. New Islamic movements have become populist, even after starting from elitist roots, in Iran, Sudan, and recently, in Algeria; built from the grassroots, such movements have been inherently democratic. Initially many people were unimpressed by the new Islamic populism, since, like all reform movements, it begins with criticism of the existing order; the climate for reformist movements was also poisoned by the general failure of hollow and contentless movements such as Arab Socialism.

Islamic government would be minimal government; the range of the law is limited, because so much of what in the West is reserved for the law is embodied in Islamic societies in moral norms, and the Islamic way of life; many areas of normative Islamic life are and should be beyond the reach of the law. Prophet Mohammed strongly criticized people who did not attend prayer, but he never did anything to force them to go to pray; like moral injunctions about how men and women should dress, dress and prayer are matters on which the law is and should be silent. Society, and not the state, is the primary institution in Islam. One reason for this is that sharia limits the power of government; absolutism in the Islamic world followed the growth of secularism, and is itself a rejection of the limits on governmental power that the ‘higher law’ of sharia demands. Similarly, the Quran speaks very little about government, rather such powers that are assigned in the West to the government are held by the community of the people: ‘...[the Quran] entrusts authority to the people and not to the government’. Parenthetically, it is this central role of consensus that makes the Western notion of ‘political parties’ irrelevant; such parties have, notably, frequently been absent even in the West. Unfortunately for the creation of a modern Islamic system in Sudan, there is no contemporary model. Sudanese reformers were aware that party politics in Sudan would be contaminated by the tendency of people to vote for religious, ethnic and political dynasties; every attempt at basing a government in party politics has had a very short life expectancy in Sudan, typically 3-4 years. The historical reason for such failure in Sudan has many elements: corruption, public opinion is not developed, no significant press, excessive respect for traditional authority, and the chaotic remnants of colonialism (arbitrary borders creating a patchwork of tribes, sects, ethnic groups, trade unions, etc.). Sudanese also rejected military dictatorship. Sudan tried dictatorship but the ethnic complexity led to its failure: ‘You cannot hold the Sudan with an iron fist, it would resist.’ So Sudan has started a democratizing process, beginning with local elections, then regional elections are planned, and finally national elections will be held. At the same time, the new Sudanese parliament has rejected parties and caucuses, creating a system termed ‘government by convention’, without central leadership. So, ‘the important thing is the process; the question is not one of flaunting democracy, but it is the democratizing process’. Sudanese also see the boundaries of the state as colonial relic, and many ethnic groups extend far beyond the formal borders; it is this transmission of ideas through ethnic groups that are partitioned by colonial borders that is sometimes described in the West as ‘the revolution being exported’. Muslims wish peace in an international order based on equality: ‘Those who enjoy an advantage should see that Islam constitutes a opposed to the voice of Islam, would be heard. At the time when this 14064. Merari, Arzu. “Role of the Satanic Verses in the Western Onslaught on Islam”, in Crescent International, April 16-30, 1996. p. B. 2/1989. Pakistan: six dead and more than one hundred injured. Kashmir: three dead, 40 wounded. India: 93 dead, 200 injured. The deaths of protesters against Salman Rushdie and his book, The Satanic Verses, in the Indian subcontinent proceeded the now historic fatwa of the late Imam Khomeini, passing death sentence on the apostate. Those opposed to the book in the west were accused alternately of paranoia and abuse of freedom of expression. Perhaps more significant was the western reaction, especially its united stand against Islam, over the last seven years as the world has witnessed the birth of the so-called ‘New World Order’ and seen Islamophobia spill bloodily onto the soil of Europe. Before the fatwa there were two types of social and political discourses which determined western perceptions and indeed influence even the Muslim view of how the world functioned. Aside from the Islamic Revolution in Iran, all political debate revolved around the east/west, communist/capitalist dialectic. In art, literature, culture and all else that supposedly concerns the “educated” classes, more diluted forms of debate between political correctness and its opponents, for instance, dictated the way people should view the world. Each side accused the other of promoting censorship, limiting free speech and so on. An example is the politically-correct notion that all things that create stereotypes of people of color should be banned; similarly, a more conventional rightwing view, although one shared by marxist States as well, was that literature promoting homosexuality should not see the light of day. In the days preceding the fatwa, Muslims became the new boogeymen of both camps. Abuse of the freedom of expression, or at best failure to satisfy the criteria of being blasphemed against, were charges that had always been directed at Muslims. While the liberal literati had always promoted the myth of accessibility to any cultural group aspiring to it, the Rushdie affair exposed the bankruptcy of these claims. Everyone has a right to an opinion, as part of the Rushdie defense stated, unless you are a Muslim. Nearly 200 protesters died before the fatwa was issued on 2/14/1989, yet the abuse of their right to protest has never been a case for concern to those who defend Rushdie. Those who died were martyrs of Islam, but they were also martyrs to the ideal of freedom of expression - more so than a well-paid and well-protected writer in London.

Only a couple of years after the Sypcatcher affair, when Peter Wright's book was banned in the UK, the British government issued several statements including its initial support for Rushdie. “Europe is resolved to stand firm to preserve freedom of expression, human rights and non-intervention in other countries' affairs.” In the wake of Bosnia these words are more poignant. The process of demonization that had always been the lot of non-Europeans in western culture and politics, was now dramatically speeded up in the case of Muslims. Intellectually we had no case, despite satisfying different categories of thought. Politically we were to shut up, or ship out. Television coverage of the London rally against Rushdie translated British demonstrators swearing in Urdu at “anti-fascist” demonstrators from Women Against Fundamentalism (WAF), but did not translate the same abuse from WAF. The favored genre of an oppressed Muslim-girl plays and television dramas became much more popular with programs like Shalom, Salaam about the romance and marriage of a Jewish boy and Muslim girl got astounding ratings. The message and the choice was simple - Muslims could only have a legitimate voice if their identity was malleable. Integration into and the acceptance of values established in western polemic whether form a liberal or rightwing perspective would ensure “Muslim” voices as opposed to the voice of Islam, would be heard. At the time when this "choice" was criticized. Shabir Akhtar, a Muslim writer, pointed out in the Guardian that the next time there were gas chambers in Europe, Muslims would be their fuel. Muslims were accused of paranoia yet few had realized how soon this would come to pass in Bosnia. The Rushdie affair shaped a whole culture’s consciousness about Muslims. Those who argued for intervention in Bosnia from Europe, be they Claire Short, MP (Lbor) or Margaret Thatcher, did so on the grounds of preserving that integrated Muslim idea - a Muslim who could be contained without any of the old polemic, or the "New World Order." Both politicians and many others were specific when they said that they wanted to prevent not the bloodshed of innocents by the Serbs or Croats, but the rise of "Islamic fundamentalism" in Europe.

There were a few dissenting voices in 1989 that castigated both the left and right for their stigmatization of Muslims. David Cooie in the New Statesman & Society asked for tolerance from the liberal establishment at least. He asked them to see that Muslims were aggrieved and that unlike them, Muslims did not have the same access to literature and culture, hence unable to appreciate the subtleties of the dilemma or indeed understand how wrong they were. He asked for Muslims to be given greater access to speech. In other words, if Muslims could only write they would be racist to stigmatize them for being "illiterate." This and the accusation of paranoia left some Muslims still hoping for understanding and tolerance of Islam from the west. If we tackle racism, we tackle Islamophobia, they argued. One of the many lessons of Bosnia is that we must now understand that ethnicity is not the only or even the main factor in the onslaught against Muslims - Islam is. The Rushdie affair has become the yardstick by which to measure a Muslim’s acceptability within a western framework. God or country first? The Rushdie affair has also become the stick with which Muslims are beaten whenever they are faced with oppression. If Muslims are oppressed, the western psyche is now accustomed to accepting it with little unease. After all are Muslims not the ones who want to kill Salman Rushdie? Seven years after the fatwa, half a million Muslims have been slaughtered only in Europe for being just that - European Muslims. Palestine, Kashmir, Chechnya, Algeria, Egypt - the list is endless, as are the numbers massacred and maimed for expressing their opinions. Not one of them received the sympathy that the apostate got. Seven years later, millions of Muslims have been murdered, but Rushdie lives. [-]

14065. Merini, Rafika. The Subversion Of The Culture Of Voyeurism In The Works Of Leila Sebbar And Assia Djebar: A Socio-literary Study. State University Of New York At Binghamton. Dissertation. 250pp. AAC 9300986. The main contribution of this dissertation is to assess the inhibitionMaghrebiancharacters and writers (Assia Djebar and Leila Sebbar in this case) acquire which becomes self-censorship as they witness the voyeur turning them into "sex objects of consumption" and become defensive, adopting the attitude that whatever the "evil eye" cannot see will be better protected (this "evil eye" often appears to belong to a male and/or a Westerner in Djebar's and Sebbar's writings). Nevertheless, they vigorously denounce, symbolically and otherwise, the victimization of women by voyeurism and reductionism. I argue that they do so by subverting voyeurism, re-writing and/or co-opting it in order to forge their own identities. I define this process as one of "reverse voyeurism" and I show the double oppression and double reductionism to which major Maghrebian female characters in search of self-realization find themselves subjected because of their "inferior status" of Third World citizens struggling as ex-colonial subjects, and as women. Due to the nature of the material covered and of the issues discussed, a socio-literary approach to these works was adopted as it appears best suited to a comprehensive exploration of these realities. As this study testifies, Maghrebian female characters learn to use their femininity to their advantage with the help of reverse voyeurism as they seek and achieve the ultimate subversion of the culture of voyeurism that surrounds them. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts,] [-]

14066. Millard, Betty. Women on Guard: How The Women of the World Fight For Peace: Part 12: How The Words of Freedom Were Carried Home. New York: New Century Publisher, February 1952. ALL THE DELEGATES to the Conference of the Women of Asia went back to their homes enriched and strengthened by the bonds created there. In Paris, Jeannette Vermeersch, one of the delegates and a powerful and beloved leader of the French women, stood up in the French Parliament of which she is a member, and denounced the war in Viet-Nam. When one of the government deputies attacked her for embracing the Viet-Nam delegate on the rostrum of the Conference at Peking, she cried proudly: "Yes, I embraced my Viet-Namese sister! With all my heart! I embraced her in the name of all the women of France who hate your war against her." The government supporters banged their desks and shouted in anger at the very words "Viet-Namese sister" --such is the fear of reactionaries everywhere of the united forces of the women of the world. In Algeria the return of Baya Allaouchiche, a Moslem delegate, produced a sensation. Thousands of women flocked to hear her speak wherever she went, and crowded up to kiss the Chinese flags she brought. Sometimes they trudged miles to her next speaking-place, in order to savor again the words of freedom. The men began to regret the Moslem ban on mixed meetings and forgot their prejudice against listening to a mere woman; in every village, they insisted that she speak to them, too. In Oran, Algeria, where the dockers were on strike against unloading American arms, the dockers’ wives were so inspired after hearing about the heroism of the Chinese women in their fight for liberation that they outdid their husbands. Whereas the latter just stayed home during the strike, the women one morning swept down the hill to the harbor and formed cordons around the piers, tying themselves together with their veils. When the police and strikebreakers attacked, these formerly silent and submissive Moslem women hiked up their long white burnooses and resisted energetically, shouting, "We want peace! Send us bread, not guns!" That evening, the union headquarters were piled high with veils abandoned in the fray. And from then on, the men, following the women’s example, actively picketed. [=]

14067. Moghadam, Valentine M.; Moghadam, Valentine M. [editor]. Gender and National Identity: Women and Politics in Muslim Societies: Part 1: Introduction and Overview. United Nations University, World Institute for Development Economics Research (UNU/WIDER).London: Zed Books, 1994. pp. 1-17. [This book was a product of Round Table on Women & Identity Politics, held in Helsinki, 10/1990, focusing on Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Iran, and the Palestinian Intifadah.] The relationship between nationalism and the ‘woman question’ in Islamic societies is a central issue but has been rarely discussed. It is clear that movements for national liberation and revolutionary states have not always improved the status of women: in both the Algerian and Iranian revolutions women played a major role and yet were discouraged, if not barred, from assuming any power in the post-revolutionary governments. In many nations in the 19th and 20th centuries, modernization and women’s rights were seen to be complementary, but in recent decades, feminism and nationalism have come to see each other with suspicion, especially as nationalism [or at least the new nationalisms] is increasing seen as counter-productive and as burdening women with the requirement of high fertility. In Algeria, despite the active role of at least 10000 women in the revolution, the needs of the post-revolutionary government to restore Arabic as the national language, Islam as the national religion and men as the heads of households relegated women back to the family. As Algerian writer Assia Djebar noted: “Women in general...are conscious of the fact that the Muslim man, however revolutionary he may be within his own union or party or in discharging his civic responsibilities, all too often clings in his domestic life to the old ways.” Despite this, feminism is widespread in the Islamic world, and is increasingly associated with leftist political parties. However, in Iran, many former women socialists and communists have shifted entirely to feminism, blaming the shift on the betrayal of women by the left after the revolution. As gender relations become more prominent in socio-political transformations, the ‘woman question’ has become more important in revolutionary discourse and the programs of revolutionary states.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

n. 10, September 1, 1983. pp. 3-4. [Translated from a personal testimony submitted to Connexions this year.]

Badra is an Algerian lesbian currently living in France. Like many women, she has a difficult choice to make—to remain in her country bound by the restrictions accorded to women, or to become a refugee of sorts in a society that allows more options.

Up until the age of 15, I though of myself as asexual. I liked tenderness, was very affectionate and emotional, but despite a large family (eight brothers and sisters), I lived a very solitary life in the company of books. Around the time I turned 15, I began to attract quite a lot of attention from boys, but I wasn't drawn to them at all. But I did so want tenderness, and I began to suffer from this contradiction for wanting love, but absolutely refusing the love that boys offered me. My feelings for women were of passionate friendship, but I knew nothing of homosexuality. Naively, I told myself that I was someone who liked love, but not sex. I battled with this for many years, holding back the pressing desire that I had for women's caresses. I learned from my readings that it was indeed possible to have a relationship with a woman that was not only affectionate but also sexual. I wanted this love, but I did not dare express my desire openly; I was too afraid of being singled out or marked.

I lived with my secret until the day I decided that I had to show my feelings, that I had to stop lying to myself. I had tried loving men, but it was no good. I had even tried forcing myself, but I was too unhappy. So I left Algeria, thinking that in a more open society I would finally be able to express my desires freely. And I did have homosexual relationships abroad, but something wasn't quite right. I wanted to connect my desire for women with the struggle for the liberation of Algerian women, especially since these were the women for whom I had felt my first emotions.

Back in Algeria, I tried to make this connection by beginning a dialogue with my younger sister, for I sensed her budding homosexuality. Alas, we both fell in love with the same woman, and this abruptly ended our relationship. It was especially painful, since homosexuals who recognize themselves as such are few and far between in our country. To fail to find a common ground between us is to condemn ourselves to a solitary struggle, with all the wrenching and despairing moments that that entails.

Five years later, my situation is still the same, without the satisfaction of having lived a full relationship with an Algerian woman. For so few accept to go all the way. They marry under social pressure and fall into traditional roles. I myself got married, but it didn't last long; I felt incapable of living a normal marital life. I had to leave Algeria again. I suffered too much from having to hide my homosexuality. Perhaps I lacked courage. But I was alone, and I didn't have the strength to take on that task by myself. But I still dream of my ideal, which is to have a relationship with an Algerian woman in Algeria, for the struggle for a women's liberation movement needs all our energies. Perhaps one day.

[Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [x]

Dear sisters, we need your help. We have a big problem in France. It is about divorced couples from different countries and their children. There are about 2000 children kidnapped by their fathers and taken back to their father's country, mostly to Algeria. Very often the mothers cannot see or visit their children any more, even if they have the legal right to keep them. Negotiations have been settled successfully between France and several countries: Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, and the situation is much better there. But with Algeria, we are at a dead end. Negotiations between the two governments were halted one year ago. We tried to force them to renegotiate with an operation called "a boat to Algiers" in 7/1984. 30 mothers (French, Belgian, German and Scottish) were going to sail to Algiers with journalists, radios, and so on, with some of our Collective to support them. It was a great project. Unfortunately, the French government succeeded in putting a stop to it, assuring the Collective that negotiations would get on again very soon.

Since then practically nothing has happened and the mothers are desperate. Some of them can visit their children in Algeria in the father's family. Some of them cannot even see them. But none of the children has been allowed to leave Algeria to visit the mother's family.

Five mothers decided to act by staging a sit-in at the French Embassy in Algiers on 6/17/1985. Since then, they are occupying the French Embassy where they are tolerated. Two mediators (one French, one Algerian) were designated in July by the governments and negotiations are on again, but are going very slowly.

We know that the five mothers will not give up until they are satisfied. They are aware that this is their only chance, not only for themselves, but also for all the mothers who are in the same predicament. They are fighting, above all, for the children's rights to have a mother and a father, and to have normal relations with both parents, both countries, both cultures.

We need support. You can help us by sending telegrams of solidarity to the two governments: Laurent Fabius, 1er Ministre, Hotel Matignon, Paris and President Chaddi, Algiers. You can also send money to support the mothers to: Collectif de Solidarite aux mere d'enfants enlevés, MFPF, 4 Square Saint Irene, 75011 Paris. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [x]

For the first time since independence in 1962, Algerian women took to the streets in protest of the government proposed Family Law. In 1982 a group of women emerged, expressing feminist positions and demanding human rights for women.

The proposed law would have denied Algerian women their civil rights by requiring women to be legally represented by male family members in matters relating to divorce and the right to work. Because of their protest, the Family Law was suspended for a time at least.

Many women have been arrested for their ideas and opinions. The exact number is not known. A group of lawyers is investigating these cases. Among those arrested are Fattouma Ouzagane, Louiza Hannoun and Leila Soudid. They have not violated any law. They were arrested in 12/1983, but this was not revealed until 3/1984, when the international press began writing about their case, they were transferred to other prisons.

After an international campaign was mounted for the release of these women, they and others were freed from prison. The Committee for the Liberation of Algerian Detaienees says that the international campaign was the significant factor in their release. In this sense it was a great success. Nevertheless, the Committee is also stressing that the political situation has not changed substantially; more people are being arrested, and some form of the Family Law, which denies women their rights, will most likely be approved in the near future.

Contact: Committee for the Liberation of Algerian Detaienees, C/o Marie-Aimee Helie-Lucas, 251 Badnuluiweg, 2509 LS, The Hague, The Netherlands. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][x]

But the economic deterioration had some even more fundamental reasons cogently explained by Sevet Plotzker in Yedioth Ahronot already orb/19/1994. His views carry all the more conviction since he is a zealous Reaganist on economic issues. Let me quote him selectively. “The gap between imports and exports has widened. The exports from Israel were growing in 1994 at a very slow pace: by less than 7%. But the imports continue to grow at a very rapid pace, twice the rate of growth of the exports. The [Israeli] foreign debt might increase this year by about one third of its present size, that is by about $2 billion”. This turned out to be an underestimate. Reports dating from December show that the Israeli trade deficit grew in 1994 by $3 billion. “The gap between consumption and growth is also growing. Private consumption might grow this year by 10%, but the domestic product by 4.5% to 5% only. How is this possible? Very simple: the Israelis save this year much less than they saved last year. The rate of private savings is declining sharply”. Naturally, Plotzker blames Rabin for failing to resist the 1994 strikes of teachers, nurses, doctors and academics after proclaiming solemnly that he would never yield to their demands. In Plotzker’s view all these strikes resulted in wage hikes which Israeli economy could ill afford. As noted by all commentators, in the course of 1994 the Israelis discovered how easy it was to change Rabin’s positions under resolute pressures by various Israeli lobbyists, in stark contrast with his tough resolve in foreign affairs.

Perhaps the most important economic factor discussed by Plotzker in some detail is the formidable rise of costs of housing during Rabin’s term of office. “In the spring of 1992, on the eve of the elections, the Shamir government was involved in the construction of 60,000 apartments, directly or through subsidizing measures, promises of acquisition, benefits to speed up construction and the like”. (Actually, only a fraction of those apartments was constructed in the Territories.) “In its devotion to free enterprise, Rabin’s government did not like this involvement. Confronted with the sharp decline in [Jewish] immigration, many unsold apartments in development areas and heavy government commitments to buy them from the contractors, Rabin’s government decided immediately to stop all public construction for the sake of returning to free play of the market forces. The result: while in 1991 the Housing Ministry initiated construction of 62,000 apartments, the corresponding figure in 1993 was 4700 apartments only. A decline of 93%. “At first it seemed that this policy bore fruit. The prices of apartments stopped rising. Budgetary allocations for public housing were diverted to construction of new roads or highway junctions and to the reduction of budgetary deficit... But when the experts looked at those data, they were immediately concerned about who and how will supply the annual demand for 50,000 apartments. They knew that the private sector could supply only half that amount. But they were reassured by the Finance Ministry that owing to the market mechanisms everything will turn out O.K. Yet in 1/1993, the building prices started to rise again... Had the government carried out emergency plans prepared in advance, it could perhaps have prevented the misfortune. It could facilitate private housing projects, sell much government land, break local contractors’ monopolies and if all that would not have sufficed, initiate direct government construction projects. Experts, officials and committees less devoted than Rabin to the sacred free market, had suggested a whole basket of solutions, but for more than one year hardly anything was done. The rapid rise of apartment prices started in wealthier neighborhoods of Tel Aviv but in the end extended to poorest towns. In 1993, the apartment prices in Israel increased by 26%, this year they will rise by another 30%. In two years’ time, they are going to rise by at least 56%. People tend to recall such things when they vote”. Indeed, in 12/1994 the increase in apartment prices during the Rabin’s government term of office was estimated at about 58%.

Let me add that like all economic correspondents of the Hebrew press, Plotzker staunchly supports Rabin’s government on the count of peace process. Moreover, Plotzker is afraid of what he calls “Likud’s populism”, i.e. its penchant - much more pronounced than that of Labor - for advocacy of programs calculated to raise the people’s standard of living. As many commentators have noted, Rabin admires the
women in the middle east and north africa
algeria
www.referencecorp.net/downloads

conservative wing of the American Republican party, especially its economic views. Yet Rabin's views on economy are not often denounced by the Israeli leftists, because they are too afraid to hurt the "peace process" by the mere fact of criticizing Rabin.

Contrary to what Plotzker had observed earlier, the perceived deterioration of the economy led to the downfall of consumption. Let me quote some data of Gideon Eshet (Yediot Achronot, December 2) on this topic: "The pessimistic scenarios get reinforced by the data of the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics. They indicate that the decline in private consumption between July 1 and October 1 was catastrophic. The sales of such goods as the cars, refrigerators and washing machines declined by a monstrous amount of 43%. The sales in the supermarkets declined by 33%. To all appearances, the public is already tightening their belts. A staunch supporter of the "peace process", Eshet quotes the view of a majority of Israeli professors of economy to the effect that "Israel is in an economic slump". He tries hard to dispove this estimate, but has to admit that it is widely held.

It is true that all this must be seen in proportion. In the last years Israel has become one of the richer countries of the world, with the average income of its citizens (but of course not of those subjects in the Territories!) much higher than of the surrounding Arab countries. Let me report the World Bank data about the 1992 GNP per capita in some Middle Eastern countries, quoted by Avraham Tal (Haaretz, November 11). While in Israel the GNP per capita amounted to $13220, the corresponding figures for Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia were respectively $640, $1120 and $7510. (The GNP per capita in the West Bank is roughly estimated as about half of the Jordanian one and in the Gaza Strip as not even its quarter.) Nevertheless, like in other rich states, the Israelis want their standard of living to go on improving, and are blaming their government when it does not improve. The more promises of improvement they hear - as they did from Rabin and Peres - the more infuriated they subsequently became.

Incidentally, as Tal observes, the reported contrasts between GNP per capita figures in Israel and the Arab countries prevent any meaningful trade between the former and the bulk of the latter. The only Arab countries with comparable GNP per capita to Israel (and only if one discounts their migrant workers and non-citizens) are Gulf oil states, such as Qatar and Oman. It can be supposed that their relations with Israel are not unrelated to their GNP per capita levels. As Tal points out, this fact turns Peres' visions, as uttered, e.g. at the Casablanca Conference, into a sheer phantasmagory. With the exception of the few "Peace Now" fanatics and their likes, the Israelis already realize that no Peres-style media event can improve their economy. This realization cannot but express itself in the government's popularity ratings.

But the decline of Rabin's government popularity has also another reason. Rabin's party, Labor, is rapidly going to pieces. The phenomenon is already widely acknowledged by leading Laborites. A former secretary-general of the party and present Industry and Trade minister, Micha Harish said (Haaretz, November 11) at a session of the party's executive committee convened to discuss the plans for 1995, that "the Labor party is now in a state of clinical death", and therefore there is will make a big mistake. Rabin reached the end of his political career. A former speedier implementation of the Oslo Agreement. He says that it is yet too early to publish an obituary of Mr. Labor Party, but most of the stuff, including the titles and the interviews with the bereft relatives can be expected to end his political career in the same way as Teddy Kollek.

The decline of Rabin's government popularity has also another reason. Rabin's party, Labor, is rapidly going to pieces. The phenomenon is already widely acknowledged by leading Laborites. A former secretary-general of the party and present Industry and Trade minister, Micha Harish said (Haaretz, November 11) at a session of the party's executive committee convened to discuss the plans for 1995, that "the Labor party is now in a state of clinical death", and therefore there is will make a big mistake. Rabin reached the end of his political career.

The phenomenon is already widely acknowledged by leading Laborites. A former secretary-general of the party and present Industry and Trade minister, Micha Harish said (Haaretz, November 11) at a session of the party's executive committee convened to discuss the plans for 1995, that "the Labor party is now in a state of clinical death", and therefore there is will make a big mistake. Rabin reached the end of his political career.
revolutionary Histadrut elections the voters threw away the old bureaucrats who ruled that institution since the 1920s. The third stage may take place already in the next elections. It looks very likely that Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres will bear the costs of the coming change. Which means that whatever they will not accomplish during their present term of office, they will not accomplish at all.

"All indications show that the average Israeli voter is more and more dissatisfied with the old, leading generation. The same can be said about other issues. Celebrations are intended to convince us that we have peace. In reality, we have none. We are stuck with more terrorism than before, and it is not clear whether the government has any plan to do anything about it or about anything else..."

"In the third place, Rabin does not really have the situation under his control. This contrasts with the carefully built image of him as an authoritarian Prime Minister feared by everybody. To corroborate this image, he sent a TV message from Seoul to his rebellious ministers that, in South Korea, the ministers automatically resign at the end of each year. But the image does not work any more. The ministers are still afraid of him, but not as much as they once were. They see too many weak moments of Rabin. They sense that he has reached the endpoint of his life in politics, and are accordingly more and more concerned about their own interests. But Rabin does not really have the situation under his control also because he began too many things without completing them. He began the peace process, he began the debate about the Land of Israel, he began the supposedly radical change in the economy, taxation and health (in the middle of which he lost the Histadrut). When he was elected he boasted: 'I will lead everything'. Now he should confess: 'I am stuck with everything'."

According to Markus, "the fourth and the main reason of Rabin's fatigue' is that he decides everything. "Rabin functions as the Prime Minister, Defense minister, head of the Labor [party] and the one who has usurped all the powers of other ministers, without leaving them with any room for action of their own. He behaves as if he were a king or an emperor, except that the Israeli regime has no place for a king or an emperor. The result is that he doesn't look like a king or an emperor, but like a very tired, confused and weak man". To remedy this state of affairs, Markus advises Rabin that "he has only one way to extricate himself from his present sorry predicament. No matter how rude the very saying of it may sound, he should return to the pattern of two coequal leaders of the government; concretely to share power with Shimon Peres. Instead of his attempts to neutralize Peres and restrict his powers, Rabin should reach an understanding with him, resting on a concept of shared and equal leadership". This is in my view a counsel of despair. Even if Rabin and Peres get over their long-standing virulent mutual hatred, it remains the fact that Peres is much less popular than Rabin. If Rabin's current popularity ratings oscillate between 37-42% (compared to Netanyahu's 45-49%), those of Peres oscillate between 9-15%. "Otherwise", concludes Markus, "Rabin alone will not be able to make all too many decisions in all too many sectors of administration. Together, Rabin and Peres may be able to make these decisions; without Peres, Rabin's government's days cannot but be numbered."

In another article (Haaretz, December 16) Markus upbriads Rabin for renouncing views he first proclaimed as unchangeable. Let me talk about a specific example which Markus discusses. For more than two years after coming to power in 1992, Rabin used to announce that "as long as I am Prime Minister no tax will be imposed on profits from stockmarket". In 10/1994 Rabin was persuaded by his Finance minister, Beiga Shohat that such a tax was necessary. The requisite law was duly passed by the Knesset by the end of November. However, during his mid-December tour of Japan and South Korea Rabin was accompanied by a delegation of Israeli businessmen. Referring to one of periodic crashes in the value of stocks which had just then taken place, the businessmen succeeded in persuading Rabin to announce that the implementation of the tax "would be suspended" without consulting Shohat, in a TV interview from Tokyo. Shohat had to wait two days to be able to talk to the Prime Minister for no more than (as Markus says) 7 minutes. He in turn persuaded Rabin to announce that "the tax would not be suspended but there would be consultations whether to impose it or not": at the time of this writing everyone was at loss what it all might have meant. In the first place, it was a flagrant breach of the law which stipulates that neither the Prime Minister nor even the government in corporte has the right to "suspend" a law duly passed by the Knesset. On the contrary they are bound by their oath of office to execute it faithfully. In the second place, as Markus rightly notes, "this is the way in which decisions are being taken by the Rabin government". Markus himself had opposed this change to the benchmark of policy that Rabin supports the immediate implementation of the law in question as a point of principle. Otherwise, he feels the government can lose the remainder of its credibility in economic affairs. [=]

14074. Shahak, Israel. Political Situation In Israel At the End of 1994: Part 3 of 4. Shahak Report 148. Israel, December 30, 1994. Similar views have been voiced by Uzi Benziman (Haaretz, November 20) whom I am going to report more selectively. He points out that on a number of issues the Rabin government ministers have issued mutually contradictory statements. The examples are: (1) whether Israel encourages or discourages visits of foreign dignitaries to Yasser Arafat in Gaza, (2) whether the settlement of Netzarim is necessary or unnecessary, and (3) a host of economic decisions. In the case of Netzarim, the Foreign minister could contradict himself, perhaps on Rabin's orders, within two days time. This reflects in Benzinam's view a deeper contradiction: Rabin announces on every possible occasion that "his policies are intended to bring about the maximum amount of segregation between the two peoples", the Jews and the Palestinians. "At the same time, his actual policies of promoting the Jewish settlement only "encourage friction between them". In another article (Haaretz, December 18) Benziman says that Rabin's conduct in such matters "can only make his supporters want to cry".

Reuven Padatzur (Haaretz, December 18) recounts the story of Rabin's confrontation with massively dismissed workers from the "Israel Weapons Industries". Himself responsible for those dismissals, but perhaps surprised by the strength of the workers' protest, Rabin announced that "much of the weapons used now by Hizbollah against the Israeli army were produced by the 'Israel Military Industries'. It sounded as if the workers themselves had have sold those weapons". Incidentally, military censorship did not allow anyone to inquire how and when those weapons had reached Hizbollah. Padatzur scornfully advises Rabin to "conduct a policy instead of merely insulting the workers", and reminds him that he still hesitates whether to implement the long-standing decision to privatize the "Israel Weapon Industries".

Finally, Rabin's obsession with what can be only described as the idea of an anti-Islamic crusade, to be led by Israel, certainly doesn't add to his popularity. Nahum Barnea (Yediot Ahronot, December 16), who accompanied Rabin to Japan and South Korea, reports that "latey, he does not make a speech without uttering, whether after five or after fifteen minutes, his favorite phrase: 'the dirty wave of Islamic fundamentalism'. The speech then must include the sentence: 'I tell you again and again that I describe it as Khumeinism without Khumeini'. Rabin has repeated the last sentence so often that the [Hebrew press] correspondents are by now referring to it by the acronym "KKW". I heard Rabin's every speech from Oslo to Seoul and the KWK indeed figured in all of them". Barnea admits that "Israel derives great benefits from the anti-Islamic campaign it initiated. Its most important advantage is that it lets Israel please the American public. Even in the U.S. Congress some dare to say that Israel lost its former value as a major American strategic asset. To that, the anti-Islamic campaign provides an answer! The evil Iran will replace the Soviet 'evil empire' which regrettably disappeared. Israel will become the western vanguard in the war against the Islamic enemy". In this context it is worth recalling that the Commander of the Planning Department of the Israeli General Staff, general Uzi Dayan, said that "it is quite possible that Israel may yet have to decide to take armed action against Iran already in 1995" (Yediot Ahronot, December 30). Although this report does not deal with Israeli foreign policies, the quote has its place in it, because Rabin and his government have tried hard to convince the Israelis that at the end of the "peace process" there will be peace rather than a war at a scale which even the Shamir government never contemplated.

On purpose, I am quoting mainly Haaretz's articles because this paper has been the firmest in supporting Rabin and because it represents the voice of the Israeli elite. Other papers have attacked Rabin and his policies more than Haaretz. Not a few of their commentators have pointed out that the mistakes of the present Rabin government resemble those of his first government, in 1974-1977. Let me now quote two attacks of December 16 and 17, which were published in Davar and the editorial of December 18. This latter says that "great differences between the avowed and actually implemented policies are a constant feature of Labor governments. The best present example is the contrast between the declarations that the settlements will not be any more expanded and the enormous amounts of money poured into their expansion. The facile way of justifying it is by referring to the natural increase of the settlers' population. But when the Israeli Arabs demand more money to house their naturally increasing population, the argument somehow does not work. Rabin's budgets could show that Shamir's priorities had been really changed because the funds were channeled to Israel, much of it to reward his faithful supporters. But the settlers know how to exploit Rabin's weakness and always end up by getting more money. In an effort to save his government from the consequences of soaring costs of housing, Rabin accepted the recommendation of [general-director of Prime Minister's office] Sheves, to build as many multi-floor buildings as possible. But he never applied this recommendation to the settlements. Had he so insisted, he could allow the settlers no construction other than adding storries to the already built houses, and he certainly could prevent the continuous expansion of the settlements' land". The editorial's conclusion is that "constant displays of Rabin's affinity for the settlers prompts the informed observers, not only in Jerusalem but also in Washington, to start counting the months until the day when power may pass from Rabin to Netanyahu".

Motty Basuk (Davar, December 30) says that "the big lie of the Labor-Meretz government burst out a few days ago". The lie was that the government, while pretending to freeze the settlements "helped them financially more than ever the Shamir government had ever done". Basuk rebuts the feeble excuses of Rabin's spokesman that the enlargement of Efrat was due to its location within "Greater Jerusalem". He says that "settlements have been enlarged everywhere in the West Bank, even in the most provocative spots. Jewish settlements are being established not only in the town of Hebron but also in Tel-Rumeida neighborhood", a den of Kahanists. As Basuk informs, the Kahanist leader Baruch Marzel "boasted about the enlargement of their neighborhood on TV".

For a long time, the Hebrew press was hardly interested in covering this policy. Interestingly, Basuk attributes it to the fact that during Shamir's term of office the Hebrew press got used to rely on two sources of information: the government's public hearings and the reports about the Israeli settlements in the West Bank: to the published reports of the teams of "Peace Now" observers who monitored the actual construction there, and to the leaks from the U.S. Consulate General in Jerusalem, "whose officials could be frequently seen watching the developments on the ground". According to Basuk, "Peace Now" discontinued its monitoring work after Rabin came to power, whereas the U.S. Consulate General in Jerusalem officials "could at first be seen there less and less, and in the end not at all". In my view it means that the first stage occurred after Rabin's meeting with Bush in 9/1992, whereas the second after Clinton assumed presidency. As for Rabin, I interpret his policy in the Territories not as a manifestation of weakness, but as a dictate of his ideology. Still, Rabin tries to accomplish his aims by deception, in society where questions can be asked and are asked. This is why his deceptions are bound to be short-lived.

A host of similar anti-Rabin statements can be quoted from all Hebrew papers, with only few voices raised in Rabin's defense. Still, the problems responsible for Rabin's present plight can be diagnosed as deeper than his personal failures, his mismanagement of economy and even his reliance on deception in his "peace process". An attempt to tackle such deeper problems, in my view mistaken, was undertaken by Ian Lustig (Yediot Ahronot, December 20). Lustig openly acknowledges what all other Hebrew press correspondents quoted in this report do not even mention: that any genuine decision to withdraw from the West Bank is bound to lead to a deep crisis in Israeli Jewish society. “If any Israeli government ever decides to withdraw from the West Bank, it will have to overcome a serious internal crisis in Israel. This would not be a merely governmental crisis, but a crisis of the entire [Israeli] regime, as it will by necessity involve a deep cleavage within the Israeli Jewish nation. As a consequence, an Israeli government will have to fear a rebellion and terror from the Jews even more than it now fears Arab terrorism.” Such a crisis would be much graver than that which usually occurs during the formation of a government coalition. The crisis could have been avoided, had the Israeli government decided to withdraw from the Territories before Likud came to power in 1977. However, since then the Likud governments succeeded, at least to some extent, to turn the West Bank into an inseparable part of the State of Israel in the consciousness of Israeli Jews. Had they fully succeeded in it, Israeli could not, or at least hardly could give up its rule over the West Bank. However, since their success was only partial, the Rabin government will be able to withdraw from the West Bank if it so decides. A crisis it would then have to cope with, would be deep and in my view no longer avoidable”. By using the expression “if any Israeli government ever decides to withdraw from the West Bank”, Lustig obliquely admits that the Israeli government has not so decided.

Lustig advises Rabin, that in the event he decides to withdraw from the West Bank “he learns how to cope with the attendant crisis from the experience of two states which experienced similar crises: the British government, when it wanted to withdraw from Ireland in 1913-1914, and France when it wanted to withdraw from Algeria in the 1950s”. Let me skip Lustig’s analysis of the Irish conflict and proceed straight to the Algerian one. “The European settlers, resentful of De Gaulle’s plans to separate Algeria from France, were involved in several attempts to overthrow his regime and to assassinate him. But De Gaulle didn’t panic and refused to give in... The Algerian settlers were politically unsophisticated and internally divided. Owing partly to those factors, De Gaulle was able to convince the French public that they were plain thugs and fascists willing to kill French soldiers for the sake of their narrow interests and unrealizable dreams”. Lustig concludes that “if any Israeli government tries to reduce the short-range risks of the withdrawal from the Territories, it will only beg disasters in a more distant future... If Israel creates a Palestinian entity comprised of many areas separated spatially from each other, this entity will lack any legitimacy, which in turn will paralyze it from keeping its agreements with Israel. If Rabin’s government wants to increase the probability of any permanent solution, it must be begenerous to the Palestinians in the interim stage. True, such generosity means the risk of growth of domestic instability within Israel, just as in De Gaulle’s case. But only by taking such risks can it reach a stabler and more all-embracing solution. If Rabin’s government opts for the total withdrawal from the Territories as a solution, it will find itself in a much better position than the government of De Gaulle was. The settlers in Algeria were convinced that if France surrenders its authority over it, they will lose absolutely everything. The Jewish settlers in the West Bank know that by moving a short distance away they will return to a society of their own, in which life is likely to be even more pleasant for them. The majority of the Jewish settlers in Sinai found it true in 1982. Moreover, in France the army, or at least its major components, firmly opposed any withdrawal from Algeria. By contrast, the Israeli army would be united behind the government and any policy it adopts. Thus, Rabin’s government can take greater risks in its endeavors to solve the conflict with the Palestinians than it has taken.”

Lustig’s analysis is in my view mistaken on a number of points, including one important point of principle. First, majority of Jewish settlers in the West Bank were not settled by “the Likud governments” but by the national unity government in 1984-1990 in which Rabin as Defense minister was solely responsible for the Territories and thereby for the settling. Peres, as the Prime Minister from 1984-1986 and Finance minister from 1988-1990, was hardly any less responsible. Every analysis which attempts to put all the blame for settling on Likud, rather than on the Israeli Jewish consensus which includes also Labor and Meretz, is in my view vitiated. In the case of a person as well-informed as Lustig undoubtedly is, I wonder whether an error of that magnitude can be due to oversight alone. After all, the customary and undeniably true claim of secular settlers is “it is the Labor who sent us here”. That claim does carry not a little weight in Israeli Jewish society. It could be neutralized by an honest acknowledgment of mistaken policy. But Rabin has acknowledged nothing of the sort. [=] which was from the start intended to rely on deceiving their two respective peoples.

It can be predicted that the collapse of the Rabin government is impending. Together with that government, the entire Labor movement can be now expected to collapse, at least in the form it existed since the 1920s. That moment, however, will also mark the end of a relative consensus within Israeli Jewish society which persisted since 1927, with its high point during the six years of the “national unity” government [1984-1990]. In place of that consensus, the two segments of that society have already become openly hostile toward each other. As more detailed polls document it, those two segments are pretty closely coextensive with two Israeli Jewish voting blocs, the one comprised of Labor and the parties to its left, and the other of Likud, the extreme right-wing and the religious parties.

Perhaps the greatest error of Rabin, Peres and most of their followers was that they ignored the entire religious and quasi-religious influence upon the majority within the right-wing segment. Only very few Hebrew press commentators have grasped the importance of the religious factor in the looming crisis. Let me conclude this report by quoting the one who did grasp it, the Davar co-editor Yoram Peri (December 30). Peri first notes that Likud and Labor have in the last years contained groups of people with quite similar views on a number of issues. Then he goes on: "Together with various new groups emerging in Israeli society, one powerful force can be located only at the ultra-conservative and ultra-reactionary pole of the political spectrum. This force is embodied in the religious parties. Whenever security issues are not involved, the deepest cleavage in the Israeli Jewish society is the one dividing religious and secular Jews. It would be most difficult to bridge an abyss separating them. The two camps on the two sides of that abyss are worlds apart, with hardly anything in common. Yet both sides are stalemated. We recently heard the religious Knesset members vilifying the Supreme Court. To their liberal colleagues their arguments sounded like: 'How could you do that?"

Peri is referring to streams of abuse of the Supreme Court voiced lately by the religious parties. The abuse became most ferocious after the recent ruling of the Court to the effect that homosexual couples are entitled to the same benefits as granted by employers to heterosexual couples. In the course of that vilification religious parties and individual politicians, including some reputed to be "moderate", said expressly that the State of Israel should not only discriminate against but also persecute all homosexuals and lesbians in order to preserve its "Jewish character". A state's failure to do so, and especially that state's official recognition of their equality can be construed as sure proof of that state's repudiation of its Jewish character. The Haredi parties, including Rabin's favorite Shas party, went farther still, quoting the Biblical and Talmudic definition of homosexuality as "an abomination in the sight of the Lord", and on its basis appealing for death penalty by stoning for any homosexual act. Since the secular segment in the Israeli Jewish society has in the last 10-15 years been "westernized" enough to support equality for homosexuals, a majority of politicians from secular parties are in this respect no different. At the same time, the programmatic opposition of the religious to any "westernization" prompted them to be on this issue particularly extremist. Hence the verbally violent character of the confrontation on this issue. But other recent confrontations were hardly less verbally violent.

It is significant that while all the secular right-wing parties, including even the transfer-mongering "Moledet" party, supported the peace with Jordan, all the religious parties opposed it. Why? Because it implied the denial of the Jewish right to the territory bestowed by God to two and half of Israelite tribes, i.e Reuven, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasses. Hence in the opinion of religious Jewish parties the treaty "denied Judaism". It is even more significant that on the really substantial issues involving the "peace process", such as the status of Jewish settlements, all religious parties have staunchly supported the settlers. Rabin and Peres do not seem to understand that no "peace process", especially the one they have been programming, could possibly be carried out without confronting the Jewish religious parties head on. Their failure to realize it portends their undoing. [-]

14076. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 83: The Beginnings of Palestinian Feminism: Part 1. Israel, August 23, 1991. As everywhere, the beginnings of feminism in Palestine assume at first the form of a spontaneous protest against subjugation of women by men and against gender inequalities in general. As everywhere, it begins when a select group of women feel secure enough to break the time-honored pattern of women's silent acquiescence to their miseries, and start organizing for the sake of voicing grievances befalling all women as women. Unlike elsewhere, however, the status of women vis-à-vis the men, and the conditions of female existence in general, differ in the Arab cultural tradition markedly from those prevailing in the Western civilization, even prior to the feminist reawakening of the 1960s. This background difference needs to be first described. The direct impetus to the still germinal Palestinian feminist organizing was provided by the custom of murdering women by the closest of their kin in retaliation for their "profaning family honor" by their real or imagined premarital or extramarital sexual contacts. Such murders, usually preceded by public brutalities against their victims, have been too deeply ingrained in the Arab cultural tradition to be effectively deterred by the prosecution of their perpetrators by the Israeli authorities. Consequently, the instances of such murders have been far from rare, and they continue to recur. One has to understand, however, that "redeeming family honor" by murder constitutes only the most extreme form of parental, sibling and marital control over women from puberty age until old age, which in the Arab cultural tradition tends to surpass anything encounterable in even the most religiously strict subcultures of the modern West. Throughout adolescence, boys and girls live in strict separation, allowing for hardly any incidental encounter. Schoolgirls are often pressed by their parents to drop out from school early, especially prior to their puberty. Marriages are usually prearranged, so that the bride usually sees her groom for the first time in her life only shortly before the actual ceremony. After the marriage, many Arab women would appear in public with their faces covered by a veil, so as to be "protected" from men's glares. Actually, the custom of wearing the veils, rather limited to most tradition-bound urbanites of lower classes, and not practiced in the countryside, was already on the wane, before it recently became, for reasons to be explained below, enforced more strictly again. Anyway, women, veiled or not, appear in public rather infrequently. As can be seen by any casual observer, the crowds on the Arab street, in the shops, at political demonstrations, and in the places of entertainment tend to be exclusively male. Division of labor by gender is enforced strictly from early childhood. A graphic description of this aspect of an Arab woman's experience, as recorded by Yossi Elgazi in Haaretz of July 17 ("Family Executuors"), was provided by a young Palestinian feminist using the cover name of Souad. "My family is a Muslim family in the north of the country. My parents, both of whom are educated people, ran our home in a clearly patriarchal way. From the time I can remember myself, I was angered by the fact that because I was born a girl, I had to help my mother clean the house, cook and iron. I hated the fact that upon returning from school, I had to help my mother with the household and could not go out to play in the neighborhood or do my homework. Sometimes, I had to do my homework in the middle of the night. The whole division of roles in our home really made me angry. The role of the women in our home was to serve the men. I had to fix meals for my father and brothers, iron their clothes, make their beds, prepare coffee for them and entertain their guests. My brothers, who are about the same age as me, did not have to do these things." Far from being peculiar for one particular family, this description depicts a cultural pattern extending across the Arab world. The impact of the Israeli rule upon this cultural universe needs an analysis much more profound and comprehensive than any that have appeared thus far. Two points, however, can be made at once, with absolute safety. The first is that women began to tell even harder, as a result of protracted absences of many of the menfolk from home, due either to their incarceration or employment on locations remote from their homes, deep inside Israel or abroad. The second fact is that the Israeli secret police ("Shabak") quickly learned to turn the women's fear of illicit sex to its advantage. A fairly accurate description of how it works was provided by a founding member of the first Palestinian feminist organization, Al-Fanar ("Searchlight"), Mannar Hassan. As again recorded by Elgazi (reference above), Hassan said: "The interrogators and prison authorities use sexual violence against Palestinian women prisoners from the Territories in order to force them to confess. They threaten them by things that touch their places of misbehavior. In a short, they exploit prejudices rooted in our society in order to apply pressure on women and stop them from being politically active. And they actually succeed in doing so. Once released from prison, women, particularly if they are young and single, are pressed into leaving school or university, or even the area [of their residence], and they coop themselves up at home. They cease taking part in any kind of public and political activity. Some of the women prisoners are even subjected to beatings following their release." But Ms. Hassan does not confine herself to the subject of the secret police's immediate goal of extracting confessions from its vulnerable female prisoners and to the subsequent treatment of the already released women back at home as somehow "tainted." She also points her accusing finger at "higher" government policies. Concretely, "she accuses the authorities of being lenient when it comes to men who kill women to 'preserve family honor'. She speaks of cases in which police officers transfer girls 'who are in some way suspect' to the head of the clan, thereby signing their death warrant. Likewise, there are government prosecutors who reveal their 'empathy for murderers' motives' and sometimes attenuate the charge from murder into manslaughter. And there are even cases in which the murderers are pardoned by the President. The authorities want to maintain good relations with our traditional leadership, even if it comes at the expense of women's lives.... The establishment is interested in perpetuating our social backwardness." (The source of this quote is again Elgazi, reference above.)

Al-Fanar is too recent a creation to expand its activities beyond a quite modest scope. It does publish a newsletter, and it did organize its first public demonstration in Nazareth which was attended by about 40 women joined on the spot by a handful of casual passersby. The flyer circulated at that demonstration, as quoted by Rolly Rosen in Kol Ha'ir of June 28 ("The war of liberation of Palestinian women"), is reproduced in its entirety in an appendix below. The particularly gruesome story referred to in the flyer was committed in the vicinity of Nazareth. The figure of about 40 "family honor" murders yearly, as cited in the flyer, refers to the Israeli Arab population alone. Nobody knows how many such murders are being committed each year in Occupied Territories, but a figure much higher than 40 can be assumed rather safely. Unfortunately, Al-Fanar as an organization does not have a sufficient access to the Occupied Territories and therefore it operates exclusively within the Israeli community. No corresponding movement in the Occupied Territories has arisen as yet. Worse still, the "family honor" murder issue is shrouded there in complete silence. It is never mentioned in the press or at public assemblies. The same is the case of the Palestinian diaspora press. In the process, Al-Fanar won for itself some friends and many enemies. The Hebrew media coverage of its activities has been scanty but sympathetic. The reactions of Arabic language press appearing in Israel have been more diversified. Two most prominent papers, the Communist-affiliated daily Al-Ithad and the non-party weekly A-Sinara, offered the women their support. (But the Communist boasts of having provided initiative in Al-Fanar's formation seem baseless.) A-Sinara did even more. It opened its pages (strictly speaking one page each week) to individual women for voicing their grievances against their male kinfolk. A-Sinara initiative virtually opened the floodgates. Stories, usually anonymous but rich in detail, of incest, sexual molestation, all varieties of violence against women continue to pour forth, creating shock waves in Arab society where talking about such matters in public is devoid of all precedents. Some Arabic language papers, however, aligned themselves against Al-Fanar. A case in point is Al-Arabi, the paper edited by Muhammad Wattad. In the past, Wattad was for a time a Knesset member from Mapam party, from which he defected to the Communist-dominated Knesset faction of the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality. Not reelected in 1988, he subsequently became increasingly chummy with Muslim fundamentalists. Consequently, Al-Arabi uses rather traditionalist arguments to attack Al-Fanar. Among such arguments, the one reiterated over and over ad nauseam is that the Al-Fanar women encourage sexual licentiousness, "free love," etc. At the extremes of Muslim fundamentalist opinion, such arguments can be twisted into a really sinister form of racism.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Algeria
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
160

14077. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 83: The Beginnings of Palestinian Feminism: Part 2. Israel, August 23, 1991. Some left-wing attacks on Al-Fanar assumed a more vicious form. There were hints that Al-Fanar women had consciously or unconsciously acted in Israel's best interests, or even that their initiative had been blueprinted by Shabak. One episode in this left-wing assault on Al-Fanar was downright comic. A tiny ultrarevolutionary organization of Trotskite provenience with a predominantly Jewish membership, "Derekh Hanitzotz" ("The way of the spark"), came out with a truly ultrarevolutionary solution: to petition the Muslim religious authorities (i.e. the Israeli government appointees) to issue a Fatwa (an authoritative religious ruling) in condemnation of the "family honor" murders. Predictably, the Muslim religious authorities have not even bothered to answer Derekh Hanitzotz's petition. It is difficult to take the left's arguments against Al-Fanar at their face value. It would rather be more advisable to probe a little into the unverbalized emotions and calculations behind those arguments. Thinly disguised deference of many on the Arab left to nationalism, religious traditionalism, clan and family solidarities and plain sexism is certainly part of the answer. National consensus remains a cherished goal, especially in view of the still widely believed myth that the Palestinian cause provides an inspiration capable of uniting all the Arabs from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf. Hostility towards the sheier fatwa, that has generalized to imply a wholesale rejection of the Western culture, including its modernizing and emancipatory contents. Some may prefer to keep silence about the more repressive native traditions out of reluctance to "launder dirty linen in public", for fear of thus reinforcing anti-Arab racism and attacks on Arab politics at a time when Arab self-esteem and reputation in the eyes of others are anyway at their lowest depths, not just in Israel, but in the West as a whole. One consideration behind left-wing anti-feminism, however erroneous, is at least rational. The Israeli militant left, both Jewish and Arab, has always been under considerable, even if unacknowledged, influence of Sartre's and Fanon's doctrine that nations struggling for liberation from colonialism need to guard their native traditions as the shields protecting them from the one-by-one cooptation by the colonizers, and thereby from the abandonment of the leaderless masses to their fate.

This is not the place to discuss the merits and demerits of this doctrine in any depth, although it is difficult to refrain from the observation that the strategy advocated by Sartre and Fanon exacts a terrifying price, never spelled out by the two authors too clearly, of arresting social change in a colonized society. More germane for this discussion, however, is the fact that the Sartre-Fanon doctrine does not apply to the Israeli case, for the simple reason that Jewish racism precludes the threat of individual cooptation. All colonialisms have been racist, at least in the sense that they all denied political rights to peoples they colonized. Most of them nevertheless encouraged the cooptation of at least the moneyed and/or educated elites from within the colonized nations. Jewish racism, however, is too rigid to do the same. An Arab has no way to assimilate into Israeli Jewish society. What Israel has encouraged, was a mere collaboration with its police or other authorities. The services of collaborators have been rewarded by money and all kinds of privileges, but never by social acceptance. Given this situation, the Palestinians do no need to enforce national solidarity, but they don't need to guard all and sundy native traditions as a bulwark against the allures of individual acculturation into Jewish society. An adherence to the Sartre-Fanon doctrine becomes under such conditions an excuse for bowing to the native traditions for other reasons, never spelled out to clearly. Given so much hostility from so many different corners against Al-Fanar, has the tiny organization managed to have any noteworthy impact at all? In their talk with Rolli Rosen (reference as above), Mannar Hassan and her colleagues assessed that impact in most modest terms possible. To Rosen's question "What did you hope the [Nazareth] demonstration would accomplish?", Ms. Hassan replied "Not much. We simply wanted to do some consciousness raising, and to initiate discussion. We wanted... that at the very least people would begin thinking about it." It now transpires that such initial expectations of the Palestinian feminists were rather too modest. In at least two respects the impact of their appeal to Palestinian society has proved to be more substantial than anticipated.

In the first place, the "family honor" murders and other incidents of violence against women, previously as a rule kept by the Palestinian community under wraps, now tend to be at once reported to the Israeli police, even if anonymously. In the second place, the male Arab left groups are now reported to be envious of Al-Fanar's successes in reaching the clientele they themselves have never been able to reach. To all appearances, their envy can be interpreted as a sign of budding respect. Yet Al-Fanar has still completely failed to penetrate the "Green line" and extend its influence onto the Occupied Territories. The conditions of women there have, if anything, undergone a further aggravation of late. This holds particularly true for the Gaza Strip, as a direct consequence of Hamas' and other Muslim fundamentalists' rise to communal power. The ghastly situation of the Gaza Strip women is described in another article by Rolli Rosen, in Kol Ha'ir of June 14 ("What could be worse than being a refugee in Gaza?"). Along with other sources, Rosen makes it transparently clear what really happened. At the beginning stages of the Intifada, inevitable political activation of women indeed contributed mightily to their personal emancipation from the men's tutelage. The prediction of Frantz Fanon, that the liberation of the Third World's women will be eventually won, not under the impact of the Euro-American civilization and not through modernizing efforts of benevolent but the sheier fatwa, their involvement in national liberation struggles, then seemed vindicated. Unfortunately, the sequel of events prove Fanon sorely wrong. The gradual discreditiation of the PLO paved the way to the gradual takeover of Intifada leadership by Hamas. As soon as they gained influence, the Muslim fundamentalists began to insist on "showing women their place". The veil wearing was a custom, increasingly deferred to more in breach than in observance, and devoid of any political meaning. Once in control over the steering wheels of communal power in Gaza, Hamas began to enforce veil wearing as a symbol of women's solidarity with the struggle against the Israeli occupation and of remembrance of the Intifada's fallen. Women were implored to wear it, gently or urgently, and those who refused to comply were referred to the youthful masked-face Hamas militants for a "special treatment" their style. In the end, in the entire Strip hardly a woman can be seen today without veil.

But the women's lot worsened in other respects as well. To begin with, at some intermediate stage of the Intifada, women found themselves hard-pressed by their fathers and husbands to desist from any further political activity. The motive of the pressure was the fear of women's arrest and their being "tainted" by interrogations, in line with the logic described above by Mannar Hassan. For men, such a "taint" would hurt their "family honor"; but some single women proved all too compliant with the pressures, out of fear that, while "tainted", they would find it impossible to find husbands. Other factors of the deterioration of women's condition at the later stages of the Intifada are more demographic in nature. Reduced to dire poverty, "parents press their daughters to marry early, as this means one mouth in the family less to feed. And indeed, girls now often get married at 14 or 15." The fact that constant curfews induced many schoolgirls to drop out of school has also contributed to the early marriage trend. "But it is also much cheaper nowadays to get married. Accordingly, some men can afford to take a younger and cheaper bride and wife. And many get divorced soon after marriage, while still young, because what comes easy, goes easy." (The first quote is from Rosen's anonymous informant, the second from Rosen herself.) In the West Bank, where Hamas has less of a clout, the misery of women may be not quite as ghostly as in Gaza. But significantly, women themselves seem to aggravate their own misery not a little, by sheer force of their self-concepts and role perceptions. As Elgazi (reference above) reports it, "a poll of 185 Palestinian women from East Jerusalem, carried out by Nadira Shahouf-Kabourkian, a sociology lecturer at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and Bethlehem University, revealed that 81% believe that wife beating is a legitimate way of dealing with family problems, 73% claimed to believe that violence can contribute to family life, 57% agreed that a woman who does not obey her husband deserves to be beaten, and most of them blamed themselves for the beatings. Ms. Hassan disputed the validity of these findings. But even if the just quoted statistics are biased, there can be little doubt that all too many Arab women internalize their own subjugation deeply. It may well be that Al-Fanar will yet find the deepest vindication of its existence, and its deepest challenge, in contending with such attitudes of the women themselves, no less than in struggling against male superstitions about, prejudices against, and domination over women. [=] 14078. Shahak, Israel. Shahak Report 83: The Beginnings of Palestinian Feminism: Part 3: Nazareth Demonstration Flyer: An-Fanar: Palestinian Feminist Organization: Stop Burying Girls Alive: No More Obscurantism. Israel, August 23, 1991. Yet another despicable crime has been committed in the Palestinian community. A young girl was robbed of her life, which was sacrificed to the social terror exercised on a daily basis against women and which is known as "family honor." The murder victim was in the flower of youth when her executioners dragged her to the altar. And those executioners were her flesh and blood: her father and brothers, the very ones who should have been closest to her, who should have provided her with love and protection. Instead, they tied her up and set her on fire, and the flames enveloped her body and her pleas. Approximately 40 girls and women are murdered every year in our society through the despicable crime known as “preserving the family’s honor,” and this is done in view and earshot of all the “enlightened” and “progressive” persons, including individuals, parties, without anyone giving the matter the slightest consideration. The time has come for us to raise a hue and cry in condemning this atrocious crime, and to root out both it, and the social legitimacy extended to it, from Palestinian society. Because as long as it continues to exist, we will only perpetuate our social backwardness, closing the door to any possibility of real national liberation. We appeal to the Follow-Up Committee and all the parties, institutions and organizations to join their voices to ours in condemning this despicable crime and in banishing it and those who carry it out and sympathize with it from Palestinian society. Stop Burying Girls Alive: No More Obscurantism: Yes to Liberating Society from Social Terror. Al-Fanar, The Palestinian Feminist Organization P.O.B. 9105 Haifa [*]

14079. Sloymovics, Susan. "Power, Mass Media and the Middle East: Cartoon Commentary: Algerian and Moroccan Caricatures From The Gulf War," in Middle East Report, January-February 1993. pp. 21-24. Political cartoons have become very popular and widespread in the Arab world. In the Persian Gulf War media, Algerian and Moroccan political cartoons were very critical of the absence of any independent news gathering about the war. The Algerian press has only recently become free at all, in 1988, but that window closed in 8/92. During the Gulf War, Algeria had both a free press and many illegal satellite dishes pulling down international television programming. In Morocco, censorship and tight state control continues to characterize the press: however, during the Gulf War, the press in Morocco was relatively free (even if television was tightly controlled). A USIA study found that all countries allied with the US had tight press censorship during the war (except Morocco), while countries that opposed the war had a free press. Political cartoons heavily criticized television news coverage, being able to freeze and criticize the ephemeral images of television, and create images that capture contradictions that escape television imagery (such as that of the irony of American women soldiers fighting to defend a Saudi Arabia in which women have no rights).

14080. Studer, John. "Former Algerian President Ben Bella Backs Curtis," in Militant (Socialist Workers Party), October 16, 1995. p. 4. Dear Curtis, I have the honor of asking you to grant parole to Mr. Mark Curtis," Ahmed Ben Bella, leader of the workers and farmers government formed in Algeria following a revolution in 1962, wrote to the Iowa State Board of Parole on 9/22/1995. Ben Bella is 79 years old. He spent 10 years in prison under French colonial rule. When the workers and farmers government was overthrown in 1965, he was thrown back in prison for the next 15 years. Ben Bella also wrote directly to Curtis offering his continuing solidarity and support and wrote to the Mark Curtis Defense Committee, saying, "Count on my help, even though modest. Be brave, in friendship, Ben Bella." Ben Bella is one of hundreds of political activists, unionists and supporters of democratic rights who have written to the Iowa Board of Parole in the last two months urging that Mark Curtis be freed on parole. Curtis was a member of the United Food and Commercial Workers union who was beaten by Des Moines police and framed up on charges of rape and burglary in 1988 while participating in a public campaign to defend 17 co-workers from El Salvador and Mexico seized in an immigration raid at his plant. He is a long-time political activist and member of the Socialist Workers Party. "Speaking as a member of the Canadian working public who has been made familiar with the case of Mark Curtis," wrote Tim Better, a miner from Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, serving time in a frame-up for his union activism while on strike. "I fail to see the justice or the anticipated rehabilitation by the handling of his or any other case in this manner." Unionists from many other countries also have written the board. "Curtis is a trade union fighter and a socialist not a rapist," wrote Vassilis Paparis, a member of the Garment, Textile and Leather Workers Union in Athens, Greece. "He has served more than the average prison term for the crimes he has unjustly been convicted of. Keeping him longer in jail only shows the political nature of this case."

“Our workplace club has followed, for some years now, the case of Mark Curtis,” wrote Bert Jagerby, club chairman of the Swedish Foodworkers Union at the Trygg-Hansa Brewery in Stockholm. “Whatever the discussion about the legality, or otherwise, of Mark’s conviction, the fact is that Mark Curtis now fills all of Iowa’s requirements for conditional release, on parole. The only reason we can now see for any more delay, in Mark’s release, is due to his political and union activities, as all other requirements have been met.” “Our Union Federation of Postal and Telecommunications Workers asks you respectfully to grant Mark Curtis the right to freedom on parole,” wrote AnnickCoupe, secretary general of the French federation. “We have followed the evolution of this case for several years and we are convinced that Mark Curtis is the victim of a judicial frame-up for his political ideas.” A number of political leaders in France have also added their organizations’ voices to the call for Curtis’ freedom. "Under the laws of Iowa, he meets, to our knowledge, the conditions to be ‘free on parole.' This is why in the name of the rights of man, we ask you to grant to Mark Curtis the right to this freedom on parole," wrote Roland Wlos in a letter on behalf of the Committee in Defense of the Freedoms and the Rights of Man in France and in the World. Patrick Baudouin, president of the International Federation of Human Rights, wrote that the organization has been "particularly attentive to the developments in the international campaign to win freedom on parole for Mark Curtis.” He explains that they continue to support the request that Curtis be granted parole as soon as possible.

"I am urging you to grant parole to Mark Curtis without further delay," wrote Dion Martin, regional organizer of the National Distribution Union in the Central Region of New Zealand. "It is becoming obvious to international observers like myself that this delay amounts to nothing short of political persecution." “Having studied the facts of the case I am convinced of the innocence of Mark Curtis and believe that justice demands his immediate release,” wrote Maurice Quinlivan, coordinator of London Saorise, an international organization fighting for the release of political prisoners. “I do hope you will look favorably on my plea and grant Mark Curtis immediate parole.” Activists in Iowa and across the US also continue to send letters to the board. "I have followed Mark Curtis’ case for over a year now," wrote Juan Estrada, vice-president of United Food and Commercial Workers Local 1149 in Perry, Iowa, and president of the Perry League of United Latin American Citizens. “I became interested in his case when I saw how he was beaten by the cops and when I learned that he was a union activist in a meat packing plant and had spoken out in defense of the rights of immigrant workers at a meeting in protest of a raid by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. “He has certainly been kept in jail and denied parole as punishment for his political views,” Estrada continued. “Any nonpolitical person with a similar record in prison would have been paroled by now. Please! Do the right thing now. Parole Mark Curtis.” Roxanne Gould, an activist in the fight for justice against the police murder of Kimberly Frazier in Sioux City, Iowa, wrote, "Obviously, Mark Curtis has been seen as a threat for some time by those entities who support the status quo, such as the FBI, for his political activities around the civil war in El Salvador, the management at Swift's meatpacking plant, and the Des Moines Police Department for his socialist beliefs and activities, particularly around immigrants' rights." On 9/22/1995 Richard Trujillo, vice-president of Amalgamated Transit Union Local 265 in San Jose, California, forwarded a petition signed by 48 delegates and guests who attended the 51st international convention of the union in Las Vegas, Nevada. "The case of union brother Mark Curtis has prompted our interest and serious concern. We respectfully submit, brother Curtis should be paroled immediately. He has definitely earned it.,” the petition stated. The defense committee is continuing to gather letters to present to the board until 10/17/1995, when the parole board is planning to meet and decide whether to grant Curtis a hearing this year. Letters can be
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Algeria
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

addressed to the Iowa State Board of Parole and sent to the Mark Curtis Defense Committee, P.O. Box 1048, Des Moines, Iowa 50311, for delivery. [=]

14081. UN. Press Release: Advisory Panel On 1995 Fourth World Conference On Women To Meet in Geneva Under Auspices Of Secretary-General. UN, April 29, 1994. A draft platform of action and advocacy strategies for next year's Fourth World Conference on Women will be discussed in Geneva on Thursday, 5 May, by an advisory panel of eminent persons convened by Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. The Fourth World Conference on Women, scheduled from 9-4-14/1995 in Beijing, has as its subtitle “Action for Equality, Development and Peace”. During a session of the Conference’s preparatory body – the Commission on the Status of Women – in March, the Commission asked the Secretary-General to prepare a draft platform of action for consideration by the Commission at its next session early next year. Participants The eminent persons expected to participate in the panel are as follows: (1) Victoria F. Chitepo, of Zimbabwe, member of the Commonwealth Observer Mission to South Africa; (2) Dane Ann Hércules, of New Zealand, international consultant; (3) Idriss Jazairy, of Algeria, Executive Director of the Agency for Cooperation & Research in Development; (4) Justice A.R. Jiagge, retired Justice of the Superior Courts of Judicature, Ghana; (5) Jacek Kuron, of Poland, former human rights activist and former government Minister; (6) Roberta Lajous, of Mexico, Executive Director, Dialogue with Society, General Coordination of Campaign of the Partido Revolucionario Institucional; (7) Jack Lang, French Deputy from Loir and Cher; (8) General Olusegun Obasanjo, of Nigeria, Chairman, Africa Leadership Forum; (9) Barbara Simons, of Germany, member of the European Parliament; (10) Princess Basma Bint Talal, of Jordan, Chairperson, National Committee for Women; (11) Muhammad Yunus, of Bangladesh, Managing Director, Grameen Bank; and (12) Queen Fabiola of Belgium. [=]

14082. UN Commission on the Status of Women. Eight Draft Resolutions Introduced In Commission On Status Of Women: Texts on Development, Centre for Human Rights, Violence and Discrimination Against Women, Middle East, Palestine, South Africa, Status in UN Secretariat. WOM/750. Thirty-eighth Session 16 March 1994. 14th Meeting (AM): Eight draft resolutions that would have either the Economic and Social Council or the Commission on the Status of Women recommend actions that Governments, the international community and the United Nations system could take to advance the status of women and enhance their human rights were introduced in the Commission this morning. The draft texts were introduced under agenda items on programming and coordination matters related to the United Nations system; the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies, and the priority themes of the 1995 World Conference on Women. Under the priority themes for the Conference -- equality, development and peace -- the representative of Algeria, on behalf of the “Group of 77” developing countries and China, would have the Commission call upon Governments, intergovernmental organizations, and international institutions to promote measures to stimulate the economies of developing countries and the full integration of women in the development process. It would also call upon them to support the efforts of those countries to reduce the negative effects of the external debt burden, structural adjustment policies and adverse terms of trade, in order to integrate women into mainstream development. Another text, introduced by the representative of the Netherlands and concerned with implementation of the Nairobi Strategies, would have the Commission request the Secretary- General to direct the preparation of an annual joint workplan on women’s rights for the Centre for Human Rights and the Division for the Advancement of Women. The Commission would also encourage the Centre to explore the organization of training in women’s human rights and convening an expert group on gender-based human rights violations. The Commission would call upon all Governments and the international community to take steps to implement the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women and promote its understanding, according to a draft text on the elimination of violence against women, also introduced by the representative of the Netherlands. Another draft resolution, introduced by the representative of Finland, would have the Economic and Social Council again urge all States that had not done so to sign the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Under the terms of the draft, the Commission’s thirty-ninth session would examine the feasibility of introducing the right of petition through the preparation of an optional protocol on the Convention. A draft resolution on women and children in South Africa, introduced by the representative of Algeria, would have the Economic and Social Council demand the immediate and unconditional release of the remaining political prisoners and detainees and request the international community to provide material and human resources to South African women towards the establishment of special programmes and projects for their advancement. The representative of the United States introduced a draft resolution on the Middle East peace process, by which the Commission would urge the international community to include women in the peace process. Another text, on Palestinian women, introduced by the representative of Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77 and China, would call on Israel to facilitate the return of all refugees and displaced Palestinian women to their homes and properties in the occupied Palestinian territory. It would also urge the international community to intensify its efforts to assist financially Palestinian women in creating projects responding to their needs. A draft resolution, introduced by the representative of Australia, on women in the United Nations Secretariat would urge the Secretary-General to meet targets for advancing women to decision-making positions. Concerning the draft rules of procedure of the World Conference, the Commission decided this morning to discuss that in detail at its thirty-ninth session. The Commission will meet again at 10 a.m. Thursday, 17 March, to hear the introduction of all outstanding draft resolutions.

Commission Work Programme: The Commission on the Status of Women met this morning for preliminary discussions on draft provisional rules of the Fourth World Conference on Women: Action for Equality, Development and Peace (Beijing, 9/4-15/1995). It was then expected to hear the introduction of draft resolutions on: programming and coordination matters related to the United Nations and United Nations system; the monitoring of the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women; and on the Priority themes. (For details of this session, see Press Release WOM/734 issued 4 March.)

Preparations for Fourth World Conference on Women: A note from the Secretariat contains draft provisional rules of procedure of the Conference (document E/CN.6/1994/L.3), which lists the rules regarding elections of officers, representation and credentials, the running of the Conference, its decision-making and voting procedures. Programming Matters Related to United Nations System: A draft resolution on improvement of the status of women in the Secretariat (document E/CN.6/1994/L.8) would have the Economic and Social Council strongly urge the Secretary-General to make further use of the opportunity offered by the United Nations reorganization process to promote more women into senior-level positions. It would urge him to accord greater priority to recruiting and promoting women in posts subject to geographical distribution, particularly in senior policy-level and decision-making posts in United Nations system where the representation of women was considerably below average. The Secretary-General would also be urged to implement fully the plan of action for 1993 and 1994 to improve the status of women in the Secretariat by 1995. It would have the Economic and Social Council urge him to examine work practices in the United Nations system and consider such issues as flexible working hours, child-care arrangements, career break schemes and access to training, in order to remove direct and indirect discrimination against staff with family responsibilities.

Monitoring Implementation of Nairobi Strategies: Under the terms of a draft resolution on women and children in the process of the elimination of apartheid and the establishment of a democratic South Africa (document E/CN.6/1994/L.6), the Economic and Social Council, alarmed that politically motivated violence in that country continued to rise, would demand the immediate and unconditional release of the remaining political prisoners and detainees. The Council would also request the international community to provide financial, material and human resources to South African women towards the establishment of special programmes and projects geared to women's integration and advancement. Further, the Council would call upon the Secretary-General to monitor and report on the incidents of political and domestic violence directed against women and children in South Africa. By the text of a draft resolution on a process of a joint workshop on women's rights for the Centre for Human Rights and the Division for the Advancement of Women. The Commission would also encourage the Centre to explore the organization of training in women's human rights and convening an expert group on gender-based human rights violations. A draft on the elimination of violence against women (document E/CN.6/1994/L.10) would have the Commission call upon all Governments, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to take all possible steps to fully implement the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, to disseminate information on it and promote its understanding. It would also request the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, to publicize the Rapporteur's work and disseminate the Rapporteur's findings and conclusions. A draft resolution on the Convention of the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (document E/CN.6/1994/L.12) would have the Economic and Social Council, noting with concern that the Convention was still one of the human rights instruments with a large number of reservations, once again urge all States that had not yet done so to become parties to the Convention, encourage States to consider limiting the extent of their reservations and review those reservations with a view to withdrawing them. The Commission would examine, at its thirty-ninth session, the feasibility of introducing the right of petition through the preparation of an optional protocol on the Convention. By a draft text on Palestinian women (document E/CN.6/1994/L.13) the Commission would call upon Israel to facilitate immediately the return of all refugees and displaced Palestinian women to their homes and properties in the occupied Palestinian territory. It would also urge Member States, international financial organizations of the United Nations system, non-governmental organizations and other relevant institutions to intensify their efforts to provide financial assistance to Palestinian women for the creation of projects responding to their needs, especially during the transitional period. Further, it would request the Secretary-General to review the situation, assist the women by all available means and report to the Commission at its thirty-ninth session on the progress made in the implementation of the resolution.

Priority Themes: A draft resolution on women and development (document E/CN.6/1994/L.11), sponsored by Algeria, on behalf of the "Group of 77" developing countries and China, would have the Commission recommend that Governments create and strengthen national machineries for advancing women and ensure their participation in the political, economic, and social planning processes. It would also recommend that Governments, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and international donor agencies further develop gender-oriented research in all development. By its terms, the Commission would urge Governments to: foster women's full and equal participation in the elaboration, planning, execution and evaluation of development policies and projects, so they can be agents and beneficiaries of development; include gender perspectives in all guidelines for economic and social policies; ensure access of women to income-generating activities as a means to stimulating economic independence; and identify quantitative and qualitative targets in education and employment in order to fully integrate women in development. The draft resolution would also call upon Governments, intergovernmental organizations, and international and other relevant institutions to promote measures to stimulate the economies of developing countries and the full integration of women in the development process, and provide financial services on the basis of equal opportunity for women and men. It would also call upon them to support the efforts of the developing countries to reduce the negative effects of the external debt burden, structural adjustment policies and adverse terms of trade, in order to integrate women in mainstream development.

Preparations for Fourth World Conference on Women: The Commission decided that substantive discussions of the Conference draft rules would take place at Commission's thirty-ninth session in 1995. IRENE FREUDENSHUSS-REICHL (Austria) said she wanted to know whether the rules had been inspired by those of similar Conferences. GERTRUDE MONGELLA, the Secretary-General of the Fourth World Conference on Women, said that the draft rules had been inspired by the rules of the Nairobi Conference and other similar forums, such as the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED). The secretariat of the Conference had examined other rules of procedure before drafting the current proposals. KRISTEN TIMOTHY, the Deputy Director and Coordinator for the World Conference, said that the rules were state-of-the-art and represented current thinking on rules of procedure. Introduction of Draft Texts: ANNE MOORES (Australia) introduced the draft resolution on programming and coordination matters related to the United Nations system. She said Japan had joined the nations sponsoring it. FAWZIA BOUMAIZA (Algeria) introduced the draft resolution on the women and children in the process of elimination of apartheid and the establishment of a democratic South Africa. MARIE COLTON (United States) introduced the draft text on the integration of women into the Middle East peace process. JOKE SWIEBEL (Netherlands) introduced the draft resolutions on mainstreaming women's human rights and on the elimination of violence against women. RAILI LAHNALAMPI (Finland) introduced the draft resolution on the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. HOCINE SAHRAOUI (Algeria), on behalf of the Group of 77 and China, introduced the draft resolution on the situation of Palestinian women and the draft text on women and development, as orally amended. [=] 14083. UN; Center for Human Rights; World Campaign for Human Rights, "Part 12: Action in the United Nations", In Contemporary Forms of Slavery, Fact Sheet 14, Geneva, Switzerland: UN Center for Human Rights, June 1991. The Working Group on Current Forms of Slavery (In 1990, the members of the Working Group were: Fatma Zohra Ksentini (Algeria) (chairperson/rapporteur), Ion Diaconu (Romania), Asbjorn Eide (Norway), Waleed M. Sadi (Jordan), Suescun Monroe (Colombia) has the general responsibility in the United Nations for the study of slavery in all its aspects. Meeting for the first time in 1975 as the Working Group on Slavery, the group was renamed in 1988. The Working Group consists of five independent experts chosen on the basis of fair geographical representation from the membership of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. The group meets for one week each year and reports to the Sub-Commission. In addition to monitoring the application of the slavery conventions and making a review of the situation in different parts of the world, the group selects a theme for special attention each year. In 1989, the theme was prevention of the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, and in 1990, eradication of the exploitation of child...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Algeria

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

labour and debt bondage. The 1991 theme is the prevention of the traffic in persons and exploitation of the prostitution of others. Programmes of national and international action to deal with the problems raised by the first two themes have been drafted by the Working Group, which expects to receive reactions to its proposals from governments and a wide range of organizations. In 1992, the Working Group expects to evaluate its study of the three themes and to take up the idea of an international pledging conference to help put an end to the exploitation of child labour. [-]

14084. UN; World Conference on Women; World Conference on Women-Advisory Panel. Advisory Panel On 1995 Fourth World Conference On Women To Meetin Geneva Under Auspices Of Secretary-General. UN, April 29, 1994. A draft platform of action and advocacy arrangements for next year's Fourth World Conference on Women will be discussed in Geneva on Thursday, 5 May, by an advisory panel of eminent persons convened by Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. The Fourth World Conference on Women, scheduled from 9/4-15/1995 in Beijing, has as its subtitle "Action for Equality, Development and Peace". During a session of the Conference's preparatory body - the Commission on the Status of Women - in March, the Commission asked the Secretary-General to prepare a draft platform of action for consideration by the Commission at its next session early next year.

Participants The eminent persons expected to participate in the panel are as follows: (1) Victoria F. Chitepo, of Zimbabwe, member of the Commonwealth Observer Mission to South Africa; (2) Dame Ann Hercus, of New Zealand, international consultant; (3) Idriss Jazairy, of Algeria, Executive Director of the Agency for Cooperation and Research in Development; (4) Justice A.R. Jiagge, retired Justice of the Superior Courts of Judicature, Ghana; (5) Jacek Kuron, of Poland, former human rights activist and former government Minister; (6) Roberta Lajous, of Mexico, Executive Director, Dialogue with Society, General Coordination or Campaign of the Partido Revolucionario Institucional; (7) Jack Lang, French Deputy from Loir and Cher; (8) General Olusegun Obasanjo, of Nigeria, Chairman, Africa Leadership Forum; (9) Barbara Simons, of Germany, member of the European Parliament; (10) Princess Basma Bint Talal, of Jordan, Chairperson, National Committee for Women; (11) Muhammad Yunus, of Bangladesh, Managing Director, Grameen Bank; and (12) Queen Fabiola of Belgium. [-]

14085. Vergano, Elisabeth Lucie. Poétique, Politique Et Culture Dans Les Romans De Leila Sebbar. University Of Texas At Austin. Dissertation. 247pp. AAC 9212657. [Advisor: Sherzer, Dina] This study presents a reading of three novels (Sherazade, Les Carnets de Sherazade, and Le Chinois vert d'Afrique) written by Leila Sebbar, an author whose works belong to Maghrebian literature written in French. Sebbar focuses the subject of her works on the North African immigrants living in France and particularly the "Beur" generation, the children of these immigrants, raised in France and belonging to French as well as Arabic culture. The novels discussed present the quest of Sherazade, a 17 year old Algerian girl (in Sherazade, Les Carnets de Sherazade, and Mohammed, a 12 year old boy of Algerian and Vietnamese nationality (in Le Chinois vert d'Afrique), for their respective identities and pasts. The introduction discusses Sebbar's upbringing in Algeria and her subsequent career as a writer interested above all in the destiny of women living in Arab communities within France. It also explores the sociological context of Sebbar's fiction: the rise of Maghrebian populations in France. Chapter one deals with the problems of physical and psychological differentiation and biculturalism which contribute to the distance between the protagonists and the surrounding French community as well as within their own families. The second chapter concerns the role and impact of imagery (Orientalist paintings and photographs of wars in Algeria and the Middle East) in the protagonists' search for their Arabic roots. Chapter three focuses in the role of "intertextuality" in the narratives: texts by Rimbaud, Chateaubriand, Loti are important keys with which Sherazade unlocks her Arabic cultural heritage. The fourth chapter emphasizes the traditions and customs of the North African community in the cities and the countryside of an emerging French society which Sebbar shows in her fiction to be increasingly "colored" by the diversity of its ethnic population. Chapter five studies the function of fictional techniques (the impact of imagery, the recurrence of certain themes, modes of characterization, etc.) that Sebbar uses to represent French and Arab immigrant communities and their interrelationship. The conclusion assesses Sebbar's originality as a writer fascinated by the ethnic diversity of contemporary French society. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [-]

14086. Wakin, Daniel J. "Population Conference Shift Focus To Youth; Panel Works On Abortion Language In Draft Of Action Program". In Seattle Times, September 9, 1994. p. A2. After developing a compromise position on abortion (a compromise backed by the US, EU, Iran, Pakistan and Nordic states), the UN Population Conference is now focusing on the questions of contraception and teenage sex. The draft sets a target of $17 billion in worldwide spending by 2000 on basic health care for women and children, family planning and AIDS prevention; this would rise to $22 billion in 2015. Libya, Iran, Algeria, Indonesia and Central African Republic called for deletion of the references to 'individuals' since extramarital sex is proscribed in Islam. Alexander Sanger, president of Planned Parenthood of New York City accused the Vatican of hijacking meetings to advance its minority opinion on abortion.

14087. Wilson, Amrit. Women and the Eritrean Revolution: The Challenge Road: Part 04: Behind the Enemy Lines. Trenton, N.J.: Red Sea Press, 1991. pp. 62-96. The Eritrean revolutionary experience was very different than that suggested by Franz Fanon based on the Algerian revolution against French settler colonialism. While he argued that the revolution would spread from the rural areas to the urban areas, in Eritrea, the rural and urban insurgencies grew in tandem, but under direction from rural areas. Asmara was not in any sense a modern city, or even a modern settler colonial city: it was rather a segregated Italian core, surrounded by clusters of Eritrean villagers that supplied labor. The Eritrean economy had been looted by the British before 1952, and again by the Ethiopian occupation army. While rural areas were subjected to aerials, massacres, torture, deforestation, destruction of whole villages, and progressive impoverishment, the cities swelled with multinational lumpenproletarian masses, who lacked political identity. In 1975, in a major rampage through Asmara, the Ethiopian army started massacring Eritreans. Many Eritrean members of the Ethiopian army defected directly into the EPLA. During this period, the EPLF never focused on urban warfare, instead building deep networks of cells in the rural areas; many of the recruits were women (while the rebellion of women against patriarchy under the Italians just led to new kinds of exploitation, rebellion of women against patriarchy and imperialism led them into a leadership role in the EPLF). [TXT]

14088. World Federation of Trade Unions. Xlíh Session of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions: Part 1: General Resolution On The First Item on the Agenda. Peking: General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions, June 9, 1991. The General Council, which is holding its 11th session in Peking, notes that since the 4th World Trade Union Congress the forces of socialism and world peace have increased considerably and have won unprecedented successes. This progress, as well as the upsurge and the successes of the anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist struggle, and the strength of the movement for demands in the capitalist countries, create objective conditions that favour the reinforcement of the united struggle of the workers to force the imperialists to enter into serious negotiations and to accept disarmament and peaceful co-existence, so as to eliminate the menace of a world atomic war. Hostile to this progress, the imperialists, faced with the worsening of the general crisis of their system, pay lip-service to peace, yet are multiplying their acts of provocation and continuation. Chions for war. By sending a military plane over Soviet territory and later cynically boasting that this was their deliberate
General Council as well as the workers of the whole world condemn these American provocations against the Soviet Union as a grave danger to peace and to the interests of the working class and the peoples in all countries. The workers will understand better than ever the imperative need to increase their vigilance in the face of the aggressive policy pursued, notably in West Germany and Japan, by the ruling circles of the United States and other western powers. Thanks to the strength of the peace forces in the world, thanks to the peace policy of the socialist camp and the many steps taken by the Soviet Union, it has become really possible to avoid the menace of an atomic war that would prove devastating, to impose on the imperialists disarmament and the use of the enormous resources that are at present being wasted on the arms race for the economic, social and cultural progress of all the peoples. But it is necessary to make the situation clear to the workers so that they should have no illusions about the willingness of the imperialists to accept disarmament. All workers must be convinced that only by the untiring, ever-stronger and more united struggles of the peoples throughout the world, and by the isolation of imperialism, which is the source of war and aggression, can the imperialist war policy be thwarted.

The General Council warmly welcomes the new proposals put forward by the Soviet Union on 6/2/1960, developing and giving details of its plan for universal and complete disarmament and thus offering further proof of its tireless efforts in the service of peace, despite the provocations by United States leaders. These proposals concern in particular the banning and destruction, under international control, of all means of delivering nuclear weapons to their targets, linked with the elimination of all military bases on foreign soil, as well as the banning of atomic, chemical and bacteriological weapons, the dissolution of armed forces and elimination of military budgets. The General Council recommends the trade unions to make these proposals widely known to the workers, so that the latter will actively support them. The General Council considers that under these conditions the preservation and consolidation of peace remains among the fundamental aims of the struggle of the international trade union movement. Thus, it considers that it is essential to unmask imperialist manoeuvres and to work constantly for common action:

1. for the relaxation of international tension and peaceful co-existence;
2. for universal and complete disarmament;
3. for the elimination of military bases on foreign soil;
4. for a cessation of nuclear tests and a ban on nuclear arms;
5. for national liberation and independence of the peoples;
6. for democracy;
7. against the rebirth of German militarism and for its liquidation by the signing of a peace treaty with the two German states;
8. for the transformation of West Berlin into a free, demilitarised city;

Conscious of the close bonds that link the struggle for the relaxation in international tension to the anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist struggle for independence, the General Council salutes and supports’ the heroic fight of the Algerian people for independence. It calls upon all workers and trade unions to strengthen their active solidarity in favour of the struggle of their Algerian brothers, and to demand that the French Government stop the colonial war in Algeria. It greets and warmly supports the struggle of the people of Turkey and the popular uprising in South Korea that led to the downfall of Syngman Rhee; the struggle of the Korean people, which continues, will force the withdrawal of the American armed forces and the peaceful unification of the country.

The General Council gives its entire support to the powerful movement of the workers and people of Japan for the abrogation of the Japanese-US treaty of military alliance, against the rebirth of militarism and for the liquidation of military bases. It expresses its warm solidarity with the workers and trade unions of Venezuela, Argentina, and Chile, and particularly with the people of Cuba, who are courageously and [united in] defending the economic and social conquests of the popular democratic revolution and the national sovereignty of their country. After examining the economic situation in the capitalist countries, the General Council notes that its essential characteristics are the progressive militarisation of the economy, increased monopoly concentration, and a considerable speed-up of work and automation to the sole profit of the monopolies. A certain recovery followed the crisis of 1958—1959. It has proved incapable of re-absorbing unemployment, which in some countries has become chronic, and in general has remained at a high level, particularly in certain important branches of industry. The capitalist monopolies and the governments in their service are attacking simultaneously the purchasing power of wages, trade union and democratic rights. Thousands of trade union leaders have been arrested and imprisoned. Tens of thousands of strikers have been victims of police repression and employment losses, thanks to the peace policy of the socialist camp.

The workers and the people in certain countries, such as the Union of South Africa, are suffering from savage racist repression. The General Council draws attention to the fact that this anti-trade union offensive is accompanied by the adoption of new laws which attempt to legalise the violation of fundamental rights, among them the right to strike, inscribed in the Charter of the Workers’ Trade Union Rights, adopted by the WFTU in 1954. [=]

14089. World Federation of Trade Unions. Xth Session of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions: June 9, 1991. The deepening of the general crisis in the capitalist world contrasts increasingly sharply with the unprecedented economic, social, scientific and cultural developments of all the socialist countries, where the peoples have become the masters of their own fate. These developments, which free the productive forces of society, permit a continuous and remarkable increase in purchasing power, an improvement in working conditions, social advantages and in the general living standards of the mass of the people in these countries. The workers of the world appreciate the full importance of the most recent measures of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union, announcing the generalisation of the 7- and 6-hour working day and the gradual suppression between now and 1965 of income tax for workers, as well as the extension of the role and rights of the trade union organisations in the socialist countries. The General Council sends its warm congratulations to the workers, men and women, of the socialist countries, particularly the workers of the Soviet Union and China, for their remarkable successes in the economic and social field. Thanks to their creative enthusiasm the socialist system is from year to year winning victories of far-reaching importance which are also victories for the entire working class of the world and for the cause of peace. [=]

14090. World Federation of Trade Unions. Xth Session of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions: June 9, 1991. The General Council greets the millions of workers and trade unions in the capitalist countries who are carrying on exceptionally strong united struggles for wages, shorter working hours and the defense of trade union rights. The strike movement, which has reached an extent rarely known since the last world war, has been remarkable in Argentina, Japan, the United States, France, Italy, Belgium and other countries. It shows the sharpening of the class struggle in the present period, the desire for unity and the remarkable militancy of the working class. This development gives a categoric refutation to the "theories" of class collaboration which the monopolies and certain trade union leaders spread continuously among the workers, trying to divert them from their struggles. The workers must denounce and reject all attempts to win over the trade union movement to positions of close collaboration, increasing their common actions for: (1) the reduction of working hours without loss of pay; (2) a general increase in wages; (3) the right to work, the defense of employment and assistance to the unemployed; (4) the creation, protection and widening of the social security system; (5) the defense of trade union rights and democratic liberties; (6) the limitation of the power of the monopolies.

These demands should permit fresh progress in united action.

The General Council recommends all workers and trade unions to intensify their action for trade union rights and democratic liberties, and for the liberation of all imprisoned trade unionists. To help bring about on the international level the indispensable common front of workers and and multilateral contacts among individual unions, national trade unions to continue and multiply exchanges of delegations and bilateral social demands. The General Council calls on all workers and trade unions to denounce the stubborn refusal of the ICFTU leadership to reply to the many proposals made to it over a period of nearly ten years by the Union Committee for Solidarity with the Workers and People of Algeria. The exchanges of trade union delegations between capitalist and socialist countries and also among capitalist countries, the bilateral and multilateral contacts, trade union organisations are seeking the best methods of taking sexual difference into account can identify this muting of the Third World. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the anti-colonial/nationalist discourses in the Muslim Third World. By exploring the pretexts and manoeuvres of those opposed to unity. As a result of the inequalities are also taking a similar Orientalist masculine authority position. The trope of the veiled woman is also employed by the...
Bahrain

16000. ------. "Women Have Been Arrested and Held In Communicado in Bahrain [Amnesty International reports]", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 28, 1996, p. 4. [TXT]

16001. DS. "Bahrain: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994, Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government has often stated its commitment to the protection of children's human rights and welfare within the courts social and religious framework. The Government honor this commitment through enforcement of its civil and criminal laws and an extensive social welfare network. The status of children is shaped by tradition and religion to a greater extent than by civil law. Public discussion of child abuse is rare, and the preference of the authorities has always been to leave such matters within the purview of the family or religious groups. The authorities actively enforce the laws against prostitution, including child prostitution and procuring. They deal harshly with violators. In some cases, the authorities reportedly return children arrested for prostitution and other crimes to their families rather than prosecute them, especially for first offenses. The regular courts hear juvenile cases. Some legal experts have called on the Government to establish a juvenile court, but other citizens insist that the protection of children is a religious, not a secular, function and oppose greater government involvement. Independent and quasi-governmental organizations play an active part in protecting children by providing counseling, legal assistance and advice and in some cases, shelter and financial support to distressed children and families. [=]

16002. DS. "Bahrain: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: People With Disabilities", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994, Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The law protects the rights of people with disabilities, and a variety of governmental, quasi-governmental, and religious institutions are mandated to support and protect disabled persons. The Regional (Arabian Gulf) Center for the Treatment of the Blind is headquartered in Bahrain, and a similar center for the education of deaf children was established in 1994. Society tends to view people with disabilities as special cases in need of protection rather than as fully functioning members of society. Nonetheless, the law requires the Government to provide vocational training for disabled persons wishing to work. The Labor Law of 1976 also requires that any employer employing over 100 employee encase at least 2% of its employees from the Government's list of disabled workers. The Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs works actively to place people with disabilities in public sector jobs, such as in the public telephone exchanges. The Government's housing regulations require that access be provided to disabled persons. Most large public buildings (including the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Defense, the University, and schools) are equipped with ramps and other aids which make them accessible to disabled persons. [=]

compulsory labor is legally prohibited, and the Labor Ministry is charged with enforcing the law. The Ministry enforces the labor laws with periodic inspections and routinely fines violators. New provision to the Labor Law passed in 11/1993 stiffened the maximum fines and mandated imprisonment for certain violations. The press often performs an ombudsman function on labor problems, reporting instances in which private sector employers have violated foreign workers from developing nations. Bahrain's Labor Law stipulates that any Bahraini found guilty of illegally sponsoring foreign workers may be sentenced to 6 months in prison for each worker. However, the Government's efforts to deport illegitimately sponsored workers make the foreign workers reluctant to bring cases of abuse to the courts. The intense fear of deportation almost certainly allows some sponsors to impose abusive conditions, which approach inequality of wages and denial of opportunity for advancement. While both Shi'a and Sunni women have the right to initiate a divorce, religious courts may refuse the request. Although local religious courts may grant a divorce to Shi'a women in routine cases, occasionally Shi'a women seeking divorce under unusual circumstances must travel outside of Bahrain, as the Ja'afari sect courts in Bahrain are said to lack a scholar of sufficient rank to issue rulings in controversial cases. Women of either sect may own and inherit property and may represent themselves in all public and legal matters. In the absence of a direct male, Shi'a women may inherit all property; in contrast, Sunni women—in the absence of a direct male heir—inherit only a portion, with the balance being divided among uncles and male cousins of the deceased. In the event of divorce, the courts routinely grant Shi'a and Sunni women custody of daughters under the age of 9 and sons under age 7. In all circumstances except incapacity, the father, regardless of custody, retains the right to make certain legal decisions for his children, such as guardianship of any property belonging to the child until the child reaches legal age. A non-Bahraini woman automatically loses custody of her children if she divorces their Bahraini father. Women may obtain passports and leave the country without the permission of a male head of the household. Bahraini women are free to wear the clothing of their choice (a large percentage wear Western dress outside the home), to work outside the home, and drive a car without an escort. As the Bahraini economy has developed, women have increasingly taken jobs previously reserved for men. Women constitute over 20% of the Bahraini work force. The Government has encouraged the hiring of women, enacted special laws to promote female entry into the work force, and is a leading employer of women. Bahrain's Labor Law does not recognize the concept of equal pay for equal work, and women are generally paid less than men. Except for a few exempted professions, women are prohibited from working at night. Generally, women work outside the home during the years between secondary school or university and marriage. Women make up the majority of students at Bahrain's universities. There are women's organizations which seek to improve the status of women under both civil and Islamic law. Increasingly women have expressed the view that, despite growing female participation in the work force, women in Bahrain are not significantly advancing their rights and that much of their lack of progress is due to the influence of Islamic religious traditionalists, especially in the government-run school system and in the Shari'a courts. Other women, however, desire a return to more traditional religious values and support calls for a return to Islamic patterns of social behavior. Violence against women is known to occur, but knowledge of incidents is usually kept within the family in this traditional society. In general, there is virtually no public attention to, or discussion of, violence against women and no government policies to address it. Women's groups and health care professionals state that spousal abuse is relatively common, particularly in poorer communities.
There are very few known instances of Bahraini women seeking legal redress for violence, and anecdotal evidence suggests that the courts are not receptive to such cases. Cases of foreign women working as domestic servants being beaten and sexually abused have been reported to local embassies and the police. Most victims are too intimidated to sue their employers. Those who do, however, appear to be received sympathetically in the courts. In December a Bahraini court sentenced a Bahraini in the private sector to 10 years in prison terms after their extreme neglect led to the death of an expatriate domestic worker. Anecdotal evidence from other embassies and local contacts indicate that other serious abuses occur but are infrequently reported. [=]

16007. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Bahrain: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The minimum age compensation package because of home leave and holiday pay was published in the press In addition, the Labor Department of the US Government has always stated its commitment to the protection of children's human rights and welfare within the social and religious framework of this traditional society. The Government honors this commitment through enforcement of its civil and criminal laws and an extensive social welfare network. The status of children in Bahraini society is dictated by tradition and religion to a greater extent than by civil law. Public discussion of child abuse is rare, and the preference of the authorities has always been to leave such matters within the purview of the family or religious groups. In 1993, however, the government-controlled press featured commentaries decrying “growing” trends of child prostitution, abuse, and begging. Bahraini authorities actively enforce the laws against prostitution, including child prostitution, procuring, and pimping. Violators are dealt with harshly and can be imprisoned or deported if non-Bahraini. In some cases, authorities reportedly will return Bahraini children arrested for prostitution and other crimes to their families rather than actively prosecute them, especially for first offenses. In January a local women’s society held a seminar on the legal rights of children in which some participants called for greater governmental protection of children, including the establishment of a separate juvenile court. Juvenile cases currently are heard in the regular courts 1 day a week. Other Bahrainis, however, insist that the protection of children is a religious, not a secular, function and would oppose greater governmental interference in this traditional sphere. Independent and quasi-governmental organizations such as the Bahraini Society for the Protection of Children and the Mother & Child Welfare Society play an active part in the protection of children by providing counseling, legal assistance and advice, and, in some cases shelter and financial support to distressed children and families. [=]

16008. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Bahrain: Part 21: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (d) Minimum Age for Employment of Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government of Bahrain has often stated its commitment to the protection of children's human rights and welfare within the social and religious framework of this traditional society. The Government honors this commitment through enforcement of its civil and criminal laws and an extensive social welfare network. The status of children in Bahraini society is dictated by tradition and religion to a greater extent than by civil law. Public discussion of child abuse is rare, and the preference of the authorities has always been to leave such matters within the purview of the family or religious groups. In 1993, however, the government-controlled press featured commentaries decrying “growing” trends of child prostitution, abuse, and begging. Bahraini authorities actively enforce the laws against prostitution, including child prostitution, procuring, and pimping. Violators are dealt with harshly and can be imprisoned or deported if non-Bahraini. In some cases, authorities reportedly will return Bahraini children arrested for prostitution and other crimes to their families rather than actively prosecute them, especially for first offenses. In January a local women’s society held a seminar on the legal rights of children in which some participants called for greater governmental protection of children, including the establishment of a separate juvenile court. Juvenile cases currently are heard in the regular courts 1 day a week. Other Bahrainis, however, insist that the protection of children is a religious, not a secular, function and would oppose greater governmental interference in this traditional sphere. Independent and quasi-governmental organizations such as the Bahraini Society for the Protection of Children and the Mother & Child Welfare Society play an active part in the protection of children by providing counseling, legal assistance and advice, and, in some cases shelter and financial support to distressed children and families. [=]

16009. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Bahrain: Part 22: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Workers Rights: (e) Acceptable Conditions of Work", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The minimum wage scales, set by government decree, exist for public sector employees and generally afford a decent standard of living for workers and their families. The current minimum wage for the public sector in Bahrain is $236.50 (91 Bahraini dinars) a month. Wages for workers in the private sector are determined on a contract basis. For foreign workers, employers consider benefits such as annual repatriation and housing and education bonuses part of the salary. Bahrain's Labor Law, enforced by the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs, mandates acceptable conditions of work for all adult workers, including adequate standards regarding hours of work (maximum 48 hours per week) and occupational safety and health. The Fourth High Court (labor) has jurisdiction over cases involving alleged violations of the Labor Law. Complaints brought before the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs that cannot be settled through arbitration must, by law, be referred to the Court within 15 days. In practice, most employers prefer to settle such disputes through arbitration, particularly since the Court and Labor Law are generally considered to favor the worker/employee. Under Bahraini Labor Law, workers have the right to remove themselves from dangerous work situations without jeopardy to their continued employment. In February the Government strengthened the Labor Law by Amiri decree, announcing that significant fines and jail sentences would be imposed upon private sector employers who fail to pay legal wages. This law applies equally to employers of Bahrainis and expatriates and is intended to reduce abuses against foreign workers who in the past have sometimes been denied legal salaries. In 1993, after consulting with the GCBW and the Majlis Al-Shura, the Ministry of Labor & Social Affairs submitted a further package of 29 amendments to the Labor Law to the Government for consideration. These changes were proposed in part, to bring Bahrain's labor laws into greater conformity with international norms. The law provides equal protection to Bahraini and foreign workers. However, all foreign workers are required to be sponsored by Bahrainis or Bahrain-based institutions and companies. Subject to sanctions for wrongful dismissal, sponsors are able to cancel the residence permit of any person under their sponsorship and thereby prevent them from obtaining entry or residence visas from another sponsor. Foreign workers, particularly those from developing countries, are often unwilling to report abuses or fear of losing residence rights and having to return to their native countries. Although instances of foreign workers being denied their guaranteed holidays days off, and vacations without compensation are periodically reported in the local press, government attempts to address individual abuses in these and other cases are often hampered by the workers' unwillingness to make a formal complaint. In September a senior Ministry of Labor official publicly invited a group of expatriate contract employees to lodge official charges against their Bahraini company after their letter protesting 13-hour workdays, 6 days a week, with no break, no overtime or compensatory time off was published in the press. In addition, the Labor Law specifically favors Bahrainis, followed by Arab expatriates, over all other foreign workers in the areas of hiring and firing. Because employers include housing and other allowances in their salary scales, Asian workers are legally paid lower regular wages than their Bahraini counterparts, although they sometimes receive the same or greater total compensation package because of home leave and holiday pay allowances. Western expatriates and Bahraini workers are paid comparable wages, with total compensation packages often significantly greater for the former. Women are prohibited from performing night work, except in certain exempted fields. Women are entitled to 60 days of paid maternity leave nursing periods during the day and up to 1 year of unpaid maternity leave. However women are generally paid less than men. [=] began bombing Iraq, a black and oily rain began to fall in southern Iran. Three days later, the Department of Energy issued a memo to all "DOE contractors and facilities" ordering an end to public discussion of environmental impacts of the war. If asked, wrote DOE information officer John Belluardo, government scientists should say that "catastrophic predictions in some recent news reports are exaggerated." Scientists at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) were also ordered to close their mouths. "If we are not seen to suddenly become military secrets. In the weeks that followed, calls went out to academics and private research firms under contract to the government, asking them to remain silent. A gag order on the state of the gulf environment was in effect. An eerie attitude of detachment has descended on White House officials, of which the gag order is just a symptom. Since the end of Desert Storm, the White House has acted as if it were eager to get past the gulf war, as if looking too long and hard would reveal a flaw in its reasoning and perhaps take some of the gloss off the military victory. But while the White House wishes the war had ended six months ago, when the bombing stopped, for the people and the environment of the gulf, it still continues.

16010. Greenpeace USA; Carothers, Andre. "After Desert Storm--The Deluge", in Greenpeace Magazine (USA), October0December 1991. ON JANUARY 22, SIX DAYS AFTER THE United States and its allies

IN JUNE, WHILE THE OIL FIRES RAGED AND Kuwait City choked on soot, the White House began to distance itself from the implications of Desert Storm. EPA Chief William Reilly returned from the gulf with what he called "encouraging news." "Testifying on June 11 before Congress, Reilly offered a sanguine analysis, declaring that, after a brief EPA study, "we do not see the acute effects of pollution we had feared." The statement seems premature at best. As of late July, according to Kuwaiti officials, only about 240 of 732 fires had been extinguished. While the Kuwaiti ambassador to the United States, Saud Al-Sabah, and the chairman of the Kuwait-owned Santa Fe Corp. declared in mid-July that they had set the "goal" of extinguishing all the fires by 3/1992, most observers are more persuaded by Reid Adair, head of one of the four major fire fighting companies in Kuwait, who told Congress the week of Reilly's return that "the real work hasn't started." Characterizing the Saudi fire fighting support as a "Mickey Mouse operation," Adair said that, without more help, "we're talking five days" before the fires are all out. An investigation conducted by Friends of the Earth (FOE) the same month also suggested that much work remained to be done. FOE found that many of the well heads are completely destroyed and that oil is gushing from ruptured piping below the surface. These fires may require more sophisticated methods to put them out, such as drilling lateral "relief" wells, a time-consuming and complicated procedure. The breached well casings are also creating rivers and lakes of oil, some aflame, presenting firefighters with the harrowing prospect of having to navigate burning, mine laden barriers in order to approach the wells. "It looks like the hard part is just beginning," says Richard Golob, an international expert on oil pollution and publisher of Golob's Oil Pollution Bulletin. "Some individual wells may take weeks or months to bring under control." "Two months into what may be a 20- to 60-month campaign to extinguish the blazes, a government official tells us it is not as bad as we had feared?" says Brent Blackwelder, vice president of Friends of the Earth. "Statements like that don't inspire confidence in the White House's judgment, or its sincerity." The administration's rosy view of environmental consequences started long ago. The environmental impact assessment that the administration relied on publicly since December, a model crafted by Richard Small of Pacific-Sierra Research Corporation, has been proven wrong on nearly all its predictions. Small's worst-case scenario called for 1.6 million gallons of oil burning in the gulf. Current estimates put the daily oil burned at two to four times that. Small's model estimated some 16,000 tons of sooty smoke released each day. The World Meteorological Organization pegs the daily soot release at more than 40,000 tons, and other estimates suggest that up to 100,000 tons of smoke may be lofting into the sky each day. Finally, Small's estimate of the maximum height of the smoke plume was less than 4,000 feet. By March, FOE had put the height of the plume at over 16,000 feet. In June, the National Science Foundation reported the plume rising to higher than 20,000 feet.

But through all this, Small's reputation has remained intact, while FOE and nuclear winter experts Richard Turco and Carl Sagan have been painted as alarmist. "They are consistently wrong on nearly all counts, and we are deemed unprofessional?" says James George, former Canadian ambassador to Kuwait and head of the FOE expedition. "It just doesn't make sense." In addition to dismissing global effects, the White House gave the environment immediately downwind from the oil fires the all clear. This conclusion has been roundly criticized. "People come for a week or two and do some sampling and say the situation is under control," says John Belluardo. "In reality, the environmental destruction is far worse than anyone thought. They have been painting the picture of a clean-up operation, and the reality is far worse..." FOE's Executive Director, James Huber, told The Washington Post. "It's not a clean-up operation, it's not a benign assessment of their country's plight." According to Huber, a US government official told him that the EPA will "soon be eating its words." The US government's blithe dismissal of the health effects of the smoke and the possibility that it might have global climatic consequences. The cable noted that without better data, "predictions should be considered as little more than guesswork." The cable also mentioned a consideration thus far ignored by US government spokesmen: As the fires are extinguished, the reduced heat will cause the toxic smoke plume to stay closer to the ground, further affecting the health of Saudis, Kuwaitis and American servicemen still in the gulf. Other discrepancies cast further doubt on the sincerity of Reilly's reassurances. According to the minutes of a meeting convened by the World Meteorological Organization in April, the EPA found one part per million (ppm) of sulfur dioxide in air samples taken at the US Embassy in Kuwait, and up to 20 ppm in the air downwind from the fires. (Sulfur dioxide levels in American urban areas, by contrast, hover around .01 ppm.) But the public report released that month declared that their sampling "did not reveal the existence of high concentrations of sulfur dioxide near the burning oil wells or in population areas in the path of the oil well emissions." The same month, a French mobile lab found "very high levels of sulfur dioxide and black smoke, either near the wells or in town [during] unfavourable weather conditions."

According to the French report from the Central Laboratory of the Police Prefecture in Paris, "it may be feared that peak values of both pollutants will be associated with increased morbidity and mortality due to bronchopulmonary diseases." As for the more obscure toxins that one finds in polluted air, the only report available thus far comes from the laboratory of the National Toxics Campaign, an environmental watchdog group based in Boston. By equipping a rotating military unit with some simple collectors and teaching the soldiers how to use them, the lab was able to obtain air samples from Jubail, Saudi Arabia, some 175 miles downwind from the oil fires. At this distance, the lab found five toxic hydrocarbon compounds. One chemical, 1,4-dichlorobenzene, appeared in concentrations twice the maximum level considered safe by the state of Massachusetts. The health effects of these pollutants, as well as the soot, may not appear for years. The US government's blithe dismissal of local health impacts seems disingenuous at best. Brad Hurley, editor of the Global Environmental Change Report, says that while publicly cooperative, some Kuwaiti officials are privately furious about the EPA's benign assessments of their country's plight. According to Hurley, a US government official told him that the EPA will "soon be eating its words." Regardless of its validity, the notion that things aren't as bad as they might be has taken hold in the media. The public relations strategy in cases such as these is an open secret: paint the rosiest picture possible, and if flaws are discovered in the tableau, admit them later, after the "spin" is firmly in motion. The tactic is very successful. The collective brow-wiping and the unspoken corollary that "someone" was wrong about this persists, despite the fact that no one ever suggested we should be seeing global effects within months of the end of the war. "They say it is not as bad as anticipated," says FOE's James George. "Anticipated by whom?" Perhaps the most frustrating aspect of the Bush administration's post-war stonewalling is the curious lack of support for clean up, independent feet. Observers are horrified at the lackadaisical attitude of the regional governments and their American patrons, particularly in the early days of the oil spill, but also today, as the oil fires continue to rage out of control. "They are not treating this as the ecological disaster that it is, " says Richard Golob. "Much could have been done to save the gulf..."
environment, and much still could be done, but it is just not happening. Unless the coalition members join together to assist Saudi Arabia and Kuwait in responding to this crisis, our military victory will become an overwhelming environmental defeat."

Since January, the United States has confounded the difficulties of determining what may occur here by prohibiting government employees from discussing the situation. Satellite photos of the oil fires were not released until April after the official embargo on public disclosure was lifted. The Union of Concerned Scientists. A US atmospheric observation station on Hawaii's Mauna Loa Volcano detected an unusual amount of soot in early February, but EPA press officer John Kasper refused to let the environmentalists see it. It was finally released three months later under pressure from the Sierra Club. Also in April, a government researcher declined to present a computer simulation of the oil fires at a conference in Vienna, arguing that she was not sure what the rules of the gag order were. The next month, other DOE researchers were prohibited from discussing the fires without clearance from their superiors. And in May, the EPA refused to allow reporters to talk directly to air assessment researchers in Kuwait.

At least six major scientific investigations of the atmospheric impact of the oil fires had been put under the gag order, says Lara Gundel of DOE's Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory. Yet no one in government will admit to having issued the order. John Belluardo, the author of the DOE memo, initially admitted to Scientific American reporter John Horgan—and then later denied—that the order had come from the White House. At a meeting in Paris, NOAA director John Knauss told Horgan that the gag order "came down from as high a level as you can imagine." Knauss appeared surprised, according to Horgan, that the gag order lasted the war itself. Why the secrecy? There are several theories. First of all, the timing of the "spikes" of soot collected at Mauna Loa confirms that it was allied bombing, rather than Iraq's destruction of the oil fields, that first sent sooty smoke into the atmosphere. While it pales in comparison to Saddam Hussein's savage act of environmental vandalism, the notion that the global plume of soot was launched by allied forces may not sit well with the White House. Several observers have charged that allied bombing was responsible for a significant portion of the oil spill as well. Second, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia have little interest in stirring up debate on the wisdom of a military campaign that was conducted on their behalf. Kuwait in particular is worried that its brightest have lost faith in the country and may leave, prompting officials to paint the most benign picture possible of the country's environmental woes. This affords Washington the convenient excuse that, since the crisis is located in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, the two countries have the final say over what is said about their plight (and there is no free press in either country to interfere with spin control). And as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia are for the moment beholden to the US, there is little to stop the three countries from collaborating to shape the story as they please. Any reporting on the wretched state of the gulf environment will only speed the reappraisal of the wisdom of Desert Storm that is already taking place around the world. Few observers outside this country are as enamored as most Americans are with the success of this military campaign. Baghdad's electric and water infrastructure is destroyed; promoting disease and malnutrition among the city's poorest. Between20000-30000 cubic meters of raw sewage are pouring into the Tigris River each day. A Harvard study reported in May that 55000 Iraqi children had already died as a result of the "indirect effects" of the allied bombing and predicted 170000 more children will die by the end of the year. According to a Greenpeace report, between 63000-99000 Iraqi civilians were killed by the bombing, and nearly nine of every 10 deaths in Iraq occurred after the bombing ended. It is hardly the sort of victory that any civilized country should exult in. By late July, the gag order had lifted somewhat, no thanks to the mainstream press. Only two major dailies in North America have even mentioned the gag order. And initially The Washington Post simply reported the cursory findings of the interagency report in April, without referring to the gag order or to the fact that it was prohibited from conducting any follow up interviews with the researchers. But Scientific American's revelations, along with columns by Tom Wicker and Jack Anderson as well as other public discussions of the gag order probably forced the White House to loosen its grip on the information flow. In the aftermath, many scientists paint the restrictions as not unduly harsh. "[The restrictions] assured that thorough work was done," said Russell Schnell of NOAA's research center in Boulder, Colorado. "Scientists should be sure of what they are saying." But the atmosphere of secrecy and retribution persists. "I am still getting the runaround," says John Horgan of Scientific American. Some researchers have suggested that the climate of secrecy under a gag order is likely to be a pervasive feature of the scientific work following this disaster. The scientific data is restricted. "It is hard to get anyone to say anything publicly," says Brent Blackwelder of Friends of the Earth. "People will lose their jobs." Lara Gundel agrees: "These scientists are walking on eggshells, perhaps out of fear of loss of research funding. They have begun effective self-censorship."

As for what happens next, few can say with certainty, although that does not dissuade some from trying. Science, unfortunately, is a creature of politics, whether through the influence of funders (in this and most cases, the US government) or the inclinations of the researchers themselves. DOE's client, Richard Small, calls himself a conservative. McKracken and others at DOE's Livermore Laboratory argue that greenhouse and nuclear winter skeptics, who tend to dismiss speculation about global impacts of regional atmospheric events. Many environmentalists, for their part, demonstrate an overdose of precautionary alarm, raising the possibility of dire worst-case atmospheric scenarios in the absence of what the scientific community holds as concrete evidence. In questions of child rearing and the airline industry, such prudence is considered understandable, even desirable. But in the case of the gulf war, their caution has been cast as near treason by the media and the White House. We are thus presented with the bizarre tableau of environmentalists being forced to defend themselves by arguing with government scientists over whether the catastrophe is global or merely hemispheric. It is worth noting, in this regard, that the bulk of environmentalists have been proven far more accurate in their predictions than the US government. The largest single factor in assessing the long-term environmental impact of the oil fires is the uncertainty. There is no baseline data on what levels of contaminants already existed in the region. Almost all the regional diagnostic equipment was either destroyed or stolen by the Iraqi army. As of April, only 25 of the 450 employees at the Kuwaiti Environment Protection Department were at their posts. As of July, there was no data on particulates in the air 10 microns in diameter or smaller, the most dangerous particulates in terms of lung damage. "Nobody has ever been exposed to something like this before," Dr. Morton Lippman, an authority on the health effects of air pollution at New York University Medical School, told The Washington Post. "There is no precedent for it." Likewise, no one has ever experienced having ten percent of the world's daily oil consumption burning in one spot. "There is basically no literature on this problem," says Joel Levine of NASA's Ames Research Center. The gulf war has become, in the words of Michael Renner of the Worldwatch Institute, "a massive unplanned experiment in the atmosphere." While few scientists support the notion of a causal link, it is hard to ignore the fact that since the war, the weather throughout Asia has been unusually severe. And although most scientists are skeptical that enough oil fire plume will reach the stratosphere to have a global impact. NOAA scientists have detected soot from the gulf above Wyoming at nearly 35000 feet, roughly where the stratosphere begins (something the first two government gulf studies insisted would not occur). If a link between the oil fires and the weather anomalies does exist, it is certainly not going to be discovered if no one looks for it and if access to the scientific data is restricted. Adam Trombly of the Aspen Institute for Advanced Studies, a member of the FOE expedition, insists that global effects are likely. "Why do people think the Himalayan snows are being darkened by the plume?" asks Trombly. "How do you think that relatively heavy particulates are being carried to Wyoming and beyond? The sooner the international community wakes up to the realities associated with this phenomenon, the better."

Every war will surprise you, said General Dwight Eisenhower. The gulf war is no exception. For the first time, the potential impact of war on the environment was raised in advance of the actual battle. The wisdom of Desert Storm can in part be judged by how well these factors were considered. The White House knew as early as November, three months before Desert Storm began, that Hussein had wired the well heads with explosives. The president opted for war, despite the potential impact (based in part on the environmental assessment, which was deeply flawed) and over the objections of nearly half the US Congress and several of the president's senior advisors. Now, in the aftermath, the White House is considering the environmental disaster calls for an organized international fire fighting and clean up campaign, yet the US demurs, letting ill-equipped Kuwait and Saudi Arabia take the lead. A public health disaster as a result of the oil fires looms in Kuwait, yet the administration muzzles its scientists, manipulates the facts and gives the gulf environment a relatively clean bill of health. Where a measure of scientific caution would be warranted on the fires' potential impact on the regional and global environment, the White House issues broad denials. Where full disclosure is called for, the White House issues gag orders. Six months after the Persian Gulf War, a reappraisal is just beginning. The myriad justifications for war--human rights, military and political--are being questioned. That the US would have been better off tightening its oil belt, perhaps by ratcheting up the fuel efficiency of the US car fleet a notch, is without question. Whether Kuwait and its inhabitants would have emerged less scathed had the United States stopped short of war is still debatable. But it is appearing more and more likely.

OCEANS OF OIL: International environmental catastrophes are hard to hide, even for the US government. Despite the cover-up, there is enough information to support the contention of Salim Jawed Al-Arrayed, Bahrain's minister of health, that "We are grappling with the biggest environmental crisis in modern times." As of July 30, what we know for sure is this: Up to 1 billion barrels of oil have been released, according to Richard Golob. If a conservative one percent of this amount was spilled on the ground and not burned, says Golob, then some 10 million barrels are streaming across the desert floor. Another 6-8 million barrels have been spilled into Persian Gulf waters, making Saddam Hussein largely responsible for the two largest oil spills in history. Roughly 3-6 million barrels of oil a day are going up in flames inside an area the size of the greater New York metropolitan area. The plume represents roughly 10% of the oil the world burns in a single day, but it is burning far less cleanly, and therefore releasing a greater amount of toxic particulates. The pollution released in a single day in June was 10 times that released in a day by all the industries in the United States, according to the Worldwatch Institute. Between 5-10 million tons of sulfur dioxide will be released in a year by the fires, more than the combined output of France, Germany and the United Kingdom. Food crops will be devastated in some areas. "You can write off this year's crops [in southern Iraq and western Iran]," says Robert Pellew of the World Conservation Monitoring Center. "We are now talking about working to save those of 1992." Livestock are dying because their lungs are blackened with soot. Hospitals, or what remains of them in Kuwait, are full of patients with respiratory illnesses of several kinds. According to a survey conducted by the Kuwait Environmental Action Team, nearly nine of every 10 residents in seven communities near the oil fires believe that the fire has affected their health. The contents of the plume, which include carcinogens and other poisons, are swept into the sky and return to the earth in raindrops, contaminating water supplies, soil and crops. "The whole region is in for a bath of carcinogenic, mutagenic and possibly teratogenic chemicals," says Peter Montague of Greenpeace and the Environmental Research Foundation. In August, the MV Greenpeace set sail for the Persian Gulf to conduct its own investigation of the environmental situation. [1] staged a sit-in and 30,000 people took to the streets of Mulhaila al Jabra where the factory is located. It was ended only by intervention by paramilitary police. In 1989, after the Minister of Manpower had agreed to meet with strikers, Egyptian police broke into the Helwan steel plant where they were sitting-in and killed one worker and beat and detained hundreds of others. They were accused by the Minister of Interior with "communist agitation which we will never allow." The ILO COE noted in its 1989 report that "in its previous observations… the Egyptian government’s approach to the settlement of disputes… enabling one of the parties to the dispute, namely the employer, to resort to compulsory conciliation and arbitration, was liable to result in a restriction on the right to strike." It also noted that a section of a 1976 labor law "empowers a criminal tribunal, at the request of the Public Prosecutor, to dissolve the executive committee of a trade union organisation that has provoked work stoppages or deliberate absenteeism in a public service or utility." According to the Egyptian Constitution, half of Egypt's parliament is supposed to be made up of workers and peasants, but according to Jihan Alaily, writing in the 1989, an additional law was passed stipulating that foreign workers could only change jobs after having worked three years on their current job or else they must have been legally in Kuwait for more than 10 years.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, in her 1990 report, noted that "strikes are not prohibited… they are never resorted to, disputes being settled in accordance with conciliation procedures established by the Labor Code." Foreign workers, the bulk of the Kuwaiti labor force, were permitted to join unions as non-voting members after five year's residence and could not hold elective office. According to Kuwaiti law any new union had to have at least 100 members, 15 of whom were Kuwaiti. Foreign workers who were deemed to be troublemakers or labor agitators were summarily deported, and a non-Kuwaiti could not remain in Kuwait without employer sponsorship. In 1989, an additional law was passed stipulating that foreign workers could only change jobs after having worked three years on their current job or else they must have been legally in Kuwait for more than 10 years. Foreign workers were destined to remain in that status, no matter how many years they lived in the country nor were their children allowed to become citizens. Well before the Iraqi invasion, the prospects for work on the Gulf had diminished due to declining oil prices, a process in which Kuwait was a major player. As a consequence, foreign workers had already begun returning home in the past few years leading to a rise of unemployment and a diminished economy in the poorer Arab states. The estimated $150-250 billion that Kuwait's ruling Al-Sabah family has and still has invested in Europe, Britain and the United States produced a greater financial return than the sales of its oil, and was the factor that enabled Kuwait to cut its price per barrel as low as $11 before the war, well below the agreed OPEC price of $18. It was suggested in such mainstream publications as the Washington Post, that this was done as part of a joint attempt with the CIA to destabilize the Iraqi economy which was already struggling to recover from its eight-year war with Iran. A relatively small, but nevertheless important portion of the Al-Sabah's income went to the PLO and to hospitals and schools in the West Bank and Gaza. Since the PLO and the Palestinians appeared to side with Saddam Hussein in his conflict with the US, these funds have stopped coming. In neighboring Saudi Arabia there is not even a pretense of labor rights. James Baker's State Department, in its annual report in 1989, noted that "government decrees prohibit the formation of labor unions and strike activity… Collective bargaining is not recognized." That is a mild way of describing the killing of workers at ARAMCO who tried to start a union. Strikes did occur in the immediate post World War II period, in 1945 and 1947. At that point King Ibn Saud took time out from his embrace with the United States to ban trade unionism outright.

SAUDI ARABIA: "FORCED LABOR": Two and a half million of Saudia Arabia's 12 million population are foreign workers. The same State Dept. report describes situations in which their work amounts to forced labor "especially in remote areas where workers are unable to leave their place of work." It also cited reports "that female workers (all foreign) are sometimes prevented from leaving the homes of their employers and forced to work 12-16 hours per day, seven days a week." As in Kuwait, foreign workers are prohibited from seeking employment with anyone but their sponsor, and if fired, are officially obliged to leave the country on the date determined by their employer. Foreigners who have worked in Saudi Arabia for decades and who have no country to which they can return are often dismissed and forced to leave, or to retire and face the same fate. Particularly notorious has been the Saudi's treatment of domestic servants, many of whom come from the Philippines or Sri Lanka and there are frequent reports of their being subjected to overwork and sexual and physical abuse. The Saudi government's position is that the relationship between Saudis and their house servants is a "private family matter." Again, as in Kuwait and many of the other Gulf states, workers from certain countries are paid less than workers from other countries even though they have equal seniority and are doing the same job.

GULF WAR CATASTROPHIC FOR YEMENIS: The present crisis has been catastrophic for the large Yemini population that made up a large part of the Saudi workforce for many years. As a result of their country’s and their own perceived sympathy with Saddam Hussein they were deported in mass following the Iraqi invasion, further crippling Yemen’s already battered economy. In Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, unions are illegal as are strikes. The notion of collective bargaining is completely foreign as are most of the workers, who come from Egypt and Yemen. Occupied in Pakistan, they are effectively discouraged elsewhere.

SYRIA: FOREIGNERS NEEDS NOT APPLY: Non-Arab foreign workers are prohibited from joining or forming trade unions of their own unless they have been living in Syria for one year and only if there are reciprocal rights with the worker's nation or origin. There are also allegations that foreign workers do not receive the same pay as Syrian workers to which they are legally entitled. On the other side is Iraq which imported millions of workers, mostly from Egypt and Pakistan. When the surviving Iraqis came the home and found foreigners in their jobs, their resentment led to widespread abuse and physical attacks, particularly on the Egyptians. In the first eight months of 1989, the bodies of 1100 Egyptian workers were sent to Egypt and with them, plane loads of Egyptian workers, whose reports in the press on their ill treatment aroused the anger of the Egyptian people and accounts, to a large extent, for their initial antipathy to Saddam Hussein. Despite this, an estimated one million Egyptian workers were said to be in Iraq when the US launched its attack. At the bottom of the economic spectrum is Yemen, formerly divided into the Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen. There is no democracy in its heavily government-dominated union structure. Yemenis look for work in Saudi Arabia to the north and Oman to the East. As noted, the demonstrations of support for Iraq within Yemen and the refusal of its government to be bribed into joining the US coalition, led the Saudis to punish their neighbor by sending its workers, many of whom had lived and worked there for years, back home. [-]

16012. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. "Part 07: The Profession's Composition and Activities: The Bahraini Bar Society", in Lawyers and Human Rights. The UN Basic Principles On The Role of Lawyers In the Arab World, The Legal Profession in the State of Bahrain. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, February 1992. The BBS is financed by private subscription and other non-governmental sources. The Minister of Social Affairs has the power to veto proposed donations to the Society. There are now approximately 200 lawyers in Bahrain, of whom only about 100 are members of the BBS. Women account for approximately 10% of the total number of lawyers, but their numbers have been growing continuously in recent years. [Interview with Bahraini lawyers. Names withheld.] The government does not appoint representatives to the officially recognized committees dealing with lawyers’ affairs. Generally, the government treats lawyers who are members of the Bar Society with suspicion. One reason for this is that the Bar Society has shown more independence than other registered associations in its dealings with the government. For example, in December 1981 the government announced that it had discovered a plot to overthrow the regime. Some 73 people were detained. In the aftermath of the announcement the government urged all societies to issue statements condemning the plot. Many complied, and statements supporting the government flooded the newspapers. The board of the Bar Society discussed the issue and unanimously decided not to issue a statement, supportive or otherwise. One of the reasons for this decision was that it was the view of the Society that lawyers have the duty to defend detainees, and therefore should not condemn them beforehand. The objectives of the Bar Society make no reference to the issues of human rights, due process, or the rule of law; such matters apparently fall within the broad definition of “political activities” precluded by the Law of Societies. If the Bar Society intends, for instance, to stage a public rally, the names of speakers and the subject of the rally must be submitted to the Minister of the Interior who has the right to grant or withhold his approval without giving any reason. A denial of approval from the minister cannot be challenged in the courts. To some extent the Bar Society avoids those issues, exercising a degree of self-censorship so that it does not find itself in confrontation with the government. A Bahraini lawyer told the Lawyers Committee: “I have never heard of nor attended any public rally or even a meeting organized by the Society in which an issue relating to human or fundamental rights was discussed.” Indeed, no collective effort organized by the lawyers or the Bar Society for the promotion of human rights seems to exist. Individual lawyers do take on cases involving human rights violations, but many have suffered government persecution for fulfilling duties connected with the defense. In 1989 the general assembly of the BBS challenged the new Law of Societies Law No. 21/1989, bringing a case to contest it in accordance with the country’s procedural laws. The main objections were that the law prohibits societies from “dealing with politics,” without providing a definition of what constitutes “politics,” and that it does not allow them to participate in any public activity without the written permission of the Minister, making the violation of this restriction an offense punishable by law. One Bahraini lawyer explained the situation this way: “The BBS did not accept the new law, although other societies did. It raised a petition before the Superior Civil Court challenging it. The court has held two or three hearings in which the requirements of the petition were completed, yet to date no decision has been made by the court. In the meantime, the government offered [a compromise] through a third party acting as a broker that the BBS accept the law and, in exchange, the government would issue standing permission for it to attend meetings held by any regional or international organizations whose names were forwarded to the government at the time of the agreement... I believe that an agreement has been reached along those lines, although it is not been declared publicly. Meanwhile the case is still pending before the court. [-]

16013. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. “Part 10: Assessment: The Bahraini Legal Profession and the UN Basic Principles On The Role of Lawyers: Openness of the Profession”, in Lawyers and Human Rights. The UN Basic Principles On The Role of Lawyers In the Arab World, The Legal Profession in the State of Bahrain. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, February 1992. The Bahraini Legal Profession Statute contains no provisions prohibiting discrimination against applicants based on sex, race, color, religion, or political or other convictions, as required by the UN Principles. [Article 10.] A Bahraini lawyer explained the situation as follows: “There is no discrimination among lawyers based on the law itself, but in practice lawyers who are politically active or are members of opposition groups are not usually hired by companies... Some of the companies do not want to deal with a lawyer who may be arrested at any time, and many companies are government-owned... and therefore have government representatives on their boards of directors. These representatives will not allow a lawyer belonging to or suspected of being a member of the opposition to be selected for the company, for which this mobilization of power is considered politically suspect simply for seeking to carry out his or her professional duties through the Bar Society with serious professional and economic consequences. The law also fails to include any reference to special measures that would ensure the right of representatives of minority groups to join the legal profession. [Provided for in Article 11 of the Basic Principle.] This is of special importance in Bahrain because of the existence of a Shiite majority and a non-national population which are discriminated against both by law and in practice. The ruling Sunni minority traditionally has dominated the judiciary, and the legislative powers in the country. There is no law school in Bahrain. All those who want to study law have to seek opportunities for higher education abroad. Individuals born in Bahrain but whose parents are not Bahraini nationals are not allowed to seek higher education abroad, although they may be the best students in the high schools. Even if they manage to obtain a temporary passport and have the opportunity to study abroad at their own expense, they are not allowed to join the legal profession because they are not considered Bahraini nationals, regardless of how long their parents have been living in the country. The fact that the Minister appoints the advisory committee responsible for admissions to the Bar, the recommendations of which are not binding on him, casts doubt on the impartiality of decisions made regarding admission to the BBS. Although the law makes the admission decisions subject to appeal to the High Court of Appeal, it does not provide sufficient guarantees against bias since that court, like the Ministry of Justice, has always been presided over by a member of the ruling family, and has little actual independence from the executive branch of the government.

16016. Workers League; Workers League-Special National Congress; American Trotskyist Movement; Workers League Political Committee; North, David. War in the Persian Gulf: Perspectives and Tasks of the Fourth International: Report To The Workers League Special National Congress. Detroit, Mich.: Workers League; American Trotskyist Movement; Workers League Political Committee; Workers League-Special National Congress, August 30, 1990. This Special Congress of the Workers League is being held in the midst of a crisis that clearly marks a crucial political turning point in the affairs of world imperialism and the international class struggle. The purpose of this congress is to define the attitude of the Workers League to the events in the Persian Gulf, critically review the perspectives of the Workers League and the International Committee of the Fourth International in the light of the most recent developments, and, on this basis, specify the tasks which now confront the party as the political vanguard of the working class. First of all, let us briefly review the events which have taken place during the course of this month. It is crucial that we understand the political significance of these developments, for the situation in the Persian Gulf—like every great international crisis—has, as Trotsky once noted, "its positive side, in that it puts to a test all the various traditional values and formulas, laying bare the rottenness of those that served to mask 'peacetime' contradictions." [Writings of Leon Trotsky (1938-1939) (New York: Pathfinder Press, p. 52.) The "traditional values and formulas" of the postwar epoch were grounded on two monstrous falsehoods which served to retard the development of revolutionary consciousness in the working class. The first was that Stalinism represented socialism and the second was that imperialism was perpetually compatible with peace and democracy. The first of these illusions was shattered by the events of the autumn of 1989. The second is now being destroyed by the still-unfolding events of the summer of 1990. Iraqi troops invaded Kuwait on August 2nd. Within a few days, the United States began transforming Saudi Arabia into a staging ground for a massive military armada. The speed of the military buildup is without any precedent; and—except for, at least to this point, the absence of the draft—involves a mobilization of air, sea and land forces of world war dimensions. It is a fact of enormous political significance that the United States has brought to the brink of a major war as the result of decisions taken by a handful of people working, apparently, without any constitutional restraints upon them. Even from the standpoint of the formal precepts of bourgeois democracy, the United States has been accused of the pretense that this is some sort of democratic government where the country represents the interests and will of the people. Allow me to quote the New York Times of August 19th: "In only 15 days while Congress was scattered on summer recess and much of official Washington was on vacation, senior officials in the Bush administration have committed the United States to its broadest and most hazardous military adventure since the Vietnam war... The administration has been reluctant to disclose the full extent of its military commitment, the Pentagon's officials are declining to tope out exactly how much armor or how many troops it is sending or intends to send, or to say how long it expects they will be there or to make public assessments of the short- or long-term risks to American personnel or prestige... How long the forces will be in place at worst is something the Bush Administration has deliberately kept vague... The decision which put in motion the most rapid military buildup in American history was effectively made by President Bush and a small circle of advisers in a weekend at Camp David shortly after Iraq invaded Kuwait on August 2. Most Congressional leaders were informed of the operation after it was ordered. Only one influential lawmaker, chairman Sam Nunn, the Georgian who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, appears to have been consulted in advance. So far no member of Congress has proposed hearings to discuss the ramifications of the actions. In keeping with Mr. Bush's demonstrated penchant for making decisions in secret, some officials said the White House has kept Congress, citizens and foreign leaders alike in the dark about the ultimate scope of its operations. The pivotal decisions have been made by Mr. Bush and a handful of his top advisers, including the National Security Adviser, Brent Scowcroft, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney, Secretary of State James Baker and the Army General Colin Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff." As you know, Mr. Bush was once the director of the Central Intelligence Agency and it's fair to say that the United States government has now been converted into a massive cover operation. The coverage of military operations in the Gulf is limited by a degree of censorship—which the bourgeois press has not attempted to challenge—that goes beyond anything that existed even during World War II. Decisions have been made which could cost the lives of tens and even hundreds of thousands of Iraqis and Arabs and thousands and perhaps tens of thousands of American youth. But absolutely nothing has been said to the American people about the implications of these decisions or what the decisions actually are. Bush, in between tours of the golf course and joy rides on his speed boat, pontificates about resisting aggression and defending small nations. These hypocritical platitudes come from a regime which only seven months before invaded tiny Panama, killed thousands of defenseless civilians, reduced large portions of the country's capital to rubble, ousted its government, arrested and imprisoned its president and installed its own stooge regime. The war which is being threatened by the United States against Iraq is a war of an imperialist bandit against a poor and historically oppressed country. The Bush administration is preparing a war of plunder, aimed at securing control over the crucial oil reserves of the Middle East and, on that basis, strengthening its position in the affairs of world imperialism. Were the United States to win this war, it would mean the bNtal subjugation of Iraq and potentially the entire Arab region to a form of colonial exploitation even more brutal than that which existed in the pre-World War I heyday of imperialism. While the United States is acting as the military spearhead of the attack, Iraq is confronting a coordinated assault by every imperialist power on the planet. In this sordid operation, the "United Nations" has proved itself to be nothing more than an imperialist brothel, whose delegates—including those of the Soviet Union and China—are nothing more than political pimps employed to obtain satisfaction for the needs of the world bourgeoisie.
This international imperialist gangup against Iraq is an expression of the historical essence of the Persian Gulf crisis. It marks the beginning of a new imperialist redivision of the world. The end of the postwar era means the end of the postcolonial era as well. As it proclaims the “failure of socialism,” the imperialist bourgeoisie is, in deeds if not yet in words, proclaiming the “failure of independence” as well. The deepening crisis confronting all the major imperialists powers compels them to secure control over strategic resources and markets. Former colonial subjects that had achieved a degree of political independence must be resubjugated. In its brutal assault against Iraq, imperialism is giving notice that it intends to restore the type of unrestrained domination of the backward countries that existed prior to World War II. Despite their misgivings over America’s rapid military deployment, its uncertain aims and unpredictable consequences, the cynical imperialist strategists of the “Old World” welcome the opportunity which Bush has provided to restore colonial-style domination. The American intervention is perceived as the beginning of a new repartitioning of the globe. That is why every imperialist state is so anxious to participate in the modem-day crusade against the Iraqi infidel. Even the flabbiest old scoundrels are pulling in their potbellies and attempting to suit up in imperial uniforms which circumstances had obliged them to consign to the storage closet for decades. The Spanish bourgeoisie, wondering if perhaps Morocco and Sierra Leone might once again wind up on the auction block, informs the world that it is once again ready for imperialist exploits by announcing the dispatch of a few ships to the Gulf. The Belgian ruling class, which has never reconciled itself to the loss of the Congo, also has announced its desire to participate in the enforcement of the blockade. The Dutch imperialists, who not long ago terrorized tens of millions of Indonesians, are also eager to stand fast against “aggression” in the Gulf. Even Switzerland, in the first significant change in its foreign policy in about 500 years, has renounced “neutrality” in order to hang on to the Kuwaiti gold deposited in the vaults of its banks. Of far greater significance for the future course of events is the decision of Germany and Japan to participate in the imperialist campaign against Iraq. Both countries have seized the opportunity to announce that they will revise the postwar constitutions which have until now prohibited the dispatch of troops beyond their borders.

All the major imperialist states and even the bourgeois regimes in the backward and dependent countries do not wish to be left behind in the new rush for spheres of influence. Each national bourgeoisie intends to review and reintroduce territorial claims which one might have thought had been relegated to the diplomatic archives. The Turkish president offered this interesting explanation for the speed with which he acceded to America’s request that he cut off the Iraqi oil pipeline that passes through his country. Mr. Ozal said that Turkey does not want to be left out of a future “peace conference” that might be convened to redraw the borders of Iraq in the aftermath of war! While Ozal in Turkey and Assad un Syria may be content to munch on the morsels of Iraqi territory that the Americans, in the event of a successful war, might be prepared to throw their way, the big imperialist powers have voracious appetites—for far bigger than even that of the hefty Mr. Ozal—that cannot be satisfied so easily. The Germans and the Japanese cannot be certain that the American forces now deployed against Iraq might not in the future be used against them. It cannot but cause the Germans and Japanese disquiet when they ponder that the American occupation of the Persian Gulf will place their oil lifeline in the hands of their most dangerous economic rival. In the last war, it was precisely the lack of oil reserves which doomed the Axis to defeat. It is impossible to believe that the German and Japanese bourgeoisie have not pondered this bitter lesson and drawn certain conclusions. If war should come again, the same fate must be avoided. How long can it be before the German and Japanese imperialists begin to create the military forces they require to secure their strategic interests? Germany may agree to recognize, for the time being, American hegemony in the Persian Gulf. But in return it will expect, and at some point even demand, US recognition of German interests in Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union (e.g., oil in Romania and Baku) and North Africa Japan, for its part, may decide that it is necessary to demand a “free hand” in China and East Asia, not to mention Eastern Siberia.

Thus, even as the imperialists put on a display of anti-Iraqi solidarity, the ground is being prepared for the future struggle between them. In fact, although the immediate object of US aggression is Iraq, there can be no doubt that the actions of the Bush administration are quite consciously aimed at strengthening the position of the American bourgeoisie in the ongoing and evenmore bitter struggle with its imperialist rivals. So great are the economic significances of the Persian Gulf that control over this region must have a profound influence on the global balance of power. Eight countries in the Persian Gulf region—Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates and Oman—are the source of more than half of the world’s proven oil reserves. Intensive exploration aimed at discovering new sources of oil have failed to identify regions that could displace or even seriously challenge the Gulf as the world’s major supplier. According to a report by the US Geological Survey: “Clearly discoveries are on a downward trend from a high in the 1950s of some 35 billion barrels per year to a present day total of 10-15 billion barrels of new oil per year. Production of about 20 billion barrels per day has now out-paced discovery by a factor of two. The reality is that the Middle East increasingly will monopolize world petroleum supplies... most of the world’s conventional oil resources lie within the narrow confines of the Middle East and so does the production capacity. The economies of the western world rest on the daily production from the Middle East and indeed even the amount of oil transiting the Straits of Hormuz daily, some 7 to 8 billion is about two times the surplus producing capacity found outside the Middle East.” Much has been made of the fact that the United States consumes far less Persian Gulf oil than Japan and Western Europe, and it is thereby suggested that the Bush administration is acting to defend world, rather than purely national interests. It is, of course true, that the United States imports less than 10 percent of its oil from the Gulf, while Western Europe imports about 25 percent and Japan about 60 percent. However, these figures do not give a true picture of problems that are anticipated by oil industry analysts. It is now widely expected that the so called oil glut which kept oil prices depressed throughout the 1980s will have dissipated by the mid-1990s (and these projections predate the present crisis). As consumption begins to outstrip production, the price picture will change and, as one oil analyst warned, “the US would have to compete with other importing nations on the world market. Even if it used its Strategic Petroleum Reserve, the US might still face another massive price crisis.”

Aside from oil, the Gulf region has already become an area of growing trade and general economic competition between the United States and Japan. During the past 20 years, the United States has seen its once dominant position in Saudi Arabia steadily undermined. “Whereas the United States once overwhelmingly dominated Saudi markets,” two Persian Gulf specialists wrote recently, “and the US Army Corps of Engineers and US companies dominated Saudi construction, the construction business has now largely been forfeited to Japanese, Korean, other Asian, and some European companies. (These, in turn, increasingly all rely on low-cost labor from Southeast and South Asia.) Today, the United States and Japan are roughly neck-and-neck in the Saudi market, in which both are most heavily involved.... “As trade becomes a major issue of contention between the US and Japanese governments (and as economic power increasingly supplants military power as the determinant of world influence), competition for market share in the wealthier non-Western markets could become a key issue. At the moment, both the United States and Japan seem to be focusing mainly on bilateral issues, but competition in third markets is a possible future irritant.... Japan has not, so far, attempted a full-court press in the Gulf market, but given the fact that the Gulf is one region with which Japan runs a trade deficit, can such a campaign be ruled out in the future?”

Only political simpletons who have faith in the altruism of American imperialism will believe that the Bush administration’s actions in the Persian Gulf are unrelated to such longer-range economic considerations. Confronted with a steady deterioration in its competitive world position vis-a-vis its principal imperialist rivals, the temptation of the American bourgeoisie to stem the economic tide and even turn it in its
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Bahrain

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

own favor through the use of military power must be very great. While the military buildup of the United States has been justified as a necessary response to the invasion of Kuwait, it is obvious that the Iraqi action merely provided a long-awaited pretext for the implementation of strategic plans that the last three American governments have been working on for more than a decade. Indeed, as the first statement of the Workers League Political Committee in the crisis stressed, the United States has been planning for years to see how it could use its military preparations for the occupation of the Persian Gulf. A former State Department official, John Ausland, has boasted in an article which appeared in the French press that he personally participated in decades-old planning for military action in the Gulf. These preparations," he wrote in Liberation of August 25th, "began at the end of the 1960s after Harold Wilson's Great Britain informed the United States that it could no longer maintain the same level of military presence east of Suez."

Britain’s retreat, according to Ausland, led immediately to the creation of "what has become over the years the gigantic logistical base on Diego Garcia in the middle of the Indian Ocean."

Since the early 1980s the US Middle Eastern Force has been operating locally from facilities it leased from Bahrain. AWACS surveillance aircraft have been based in Saudi Arabia. According to information provided by a Marine Corps general in testimony before congress last year, billions of dollars have been spent over the past 10 years to upgrade military facilities in the Azores, Morocco, and on the island of Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean. Substantial improvements have also been made to port and airfield access facilities in Kenya, Somalia, Djibouti, Oman, and Pakistan so that they might be ready for use in the event of a Persian Gulf emergency. The United States had also prepositioned in the region substantial stores of fuel, ammunition and other requirements to maintain large combat forces in the Gulf. In addition, the United States developed special water purification and distribution equipment, communications packages, and off-loading equipment tailored for use in the Gulf region. The sealift capability of the US was more than tripled between 1981-1987. Finally, there have been extensive desert training exercises for US military forces. However, the realization of these plans and preparations would not have been possible without the decisive contribution which has been made by the Gorbachev regime to the imperialist ambitions of the United States. The critical turning point in the development of this crisis came when Shevardnadze signed the communique with State Secretary Baker which gave the US a free hand in the Gulf. The Soviet bureaucracy no longer averts to the oppression of the Egyptian nation or pretend to bargain on their behalf with imperialism. The venal pettybourgeois parasites that constitute the personnel of the Soviet regime are proud to serve as the accomplices and cheerleaders of the imperialist warmongers. In exchange for American credits, not to mention a few dollar-denominated bribes, the Kremlin officials offer the United States a free hand in dealing with the Arab people. In fact, the middle class parasites in the Soviet bureaucracy and lumpen-intelligentsia—obsessed with their dreams of restoring capitalism and converting themselves into a new bourgeoisie—display less resistance to American imperialism than would a genuine bourgeois class conscious of its own national interests. To the extent that theol pre-1917 Russian bourgeoisie was striving to strengthen the position of his national capitalism in the affairs of world imperialism, he recognized the necessity of dismembering the old Ottoman Empire constitutes just one of the many sordid chapters in the history of the British Empire. Even as the British imperialists were compelled to retreat from their former possessions in the aftermath of World War II, they still sought to preserve Kuwait as an important base of operations in the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean. Allow me to quote a document which was written by a British diplomat in Baghdad in June 1947. In order to maintain British influence in the region, he proposed that the imperialists create what he referred to as police stations in the area. This of ficial, Douglas Busk, wrote the following in 1947: "It seems to me that our strategic and security interests throughout the world will be best safeguarded by the establishment of suitable spots of police stations fully equipped to deal with the settlement of boundaries that have never been defined. Five of the twenty-one boundaries in the Gulf fit that category .... all of Oman’s boundaries remain undefined except possibly part of its boundary with the UAE. Similarly Saudi Arabia’s boundary with South Yemen has yet to be defined..." The manner in which the shekdom of Kuwait emerged out of Britain’s imperialist diplomacy and its participation in the dismemberment of the old Ottoman Empire constitutes just one of the many sordid chapters in the history of the British Empire. Even as the British imperialists were compelled to retreat from their former possessions in the aftermath of World War II, they still sought to preserve Kuwait as an important base of operations in the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean. Allow me to quote a document which was written by a British diplomat in Baghdad in June 1947. In order to maintain British influence in the region, he proposed that the imperialists create what he referred to as police stations in the area. This of ficial, Douglas Busk, wrote the following in 1947: "It seems to me that our strategic and security interests throughout the world will be best safeguarded by the establishment of suitable spots of police stations fully equipped to deal..."
with emergencies within a large radius. Kuwait is one such spot from which Iraq, south Persia, Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf could be controlled. It will be well worth while to go to consider Middle East trouble and expense to establish and man a police station there. I should start now to establish a new base in Kuwait where we can reasonably count on security of tenure for a great many years."

We have no interest in defending this Kuwait state. Our opposition to the Iraqi regime is not a step of any sort toward national independence and the completion of the unresolved tasks of the democratic revolution. Through its annexation of Kuwait, the Iraqi bourgeoisie seeks merely to strengthen its own position vis-a-vis its imperialist masters and its bourgeois rivals in the region. It seeks not the destruction of the imperialist order but the renegotiation of its terms.

(a) The action taken by the Iraqi bourgeoisie is not a step of any sort toward national independence and the completion of the unresolved tasks of the democratic revolution. Through its annexation of Kuwait, the Iraqi bourgeoisie seeks merely to strengthen its own position vis-a-vis its imperialist masters and its bourgeois rivals in the region. It seeks not the destruction of the imperialist order but the renegotiation of its terms.

(b) To speak of the "progressive" character of the annexation of Kuwait without considering the class nature of the regime which has carried it out is, in the light of the vast experience accumulated by the international working class over the last half-century, to indulge in self-deception and the deception of the working class in the Middle East. The Arabian Peninsula consists of political scoundrels whose Pan-Arabist phrases merely conceal their own venal and provincial ambitions. The Ba'athists sing hymns to Arab unity while ruthlessly subordinating that fictional goal to the material interests of the national bourgeoisie within the imperialist-drawn state borders defended by their regime. Thus, it is not accidental that there exist no more bitter enemies than the Ba'athist Assad and the Ba'athist Hussein.

(c) Again and again, such "progressive" actions as the invasion of Kuwait have been followed by the most treacherous deals with imperialism. For example, Sadat's 1973 victories in the war against Israel paved the way to the Camp David deal. There is no reason to believe that Saddam Hussein would have proceeded any differently if his annexation of Kuwait had not been challenged.

(d) The fact that the United States has decided to utilize the Iraqi annexation of Kuwait as a pretext for its long-planned assault in the Persian Gulf does not mean that we are required to support the actions of the regime. We unconditionally support Iraq against US imperialism; we do not believe that the Iraqi invasion and the subsequent annexation can lead to the resolution of the outstanding problems of democratic development. The economic and cultural development of the Arab masses requires not merely the elimination of "imperialist enclaves" but the entire capitalist nation-state system throughout the Middle East. We seek not the reshuffling of borders but their elimination. That can be achieved only by the revolutionary proletariat on the basis of a socialist program.

(f) It is understandable that comrades should feel inclined to welcome the chaising of the Emir out of Kuwait. But sympathy must not be translated into any sort of defense of the policies of the Iraqi bourgeoisie. If we support the annexationist policy of the Iraqi bourgeoisie, our claim to uphold the independence of the working class is reduced to a mere pretense. Our independence is grounded on a historical perspective which attributes to the working class a progressive revolutionary role that no other social force can play. Therefore, we fight for the unification of the Arab masses not through the medium of any of the existing regimes, but through the building of the world party of socialist revolution and the overthrow of these reactionary bourgeois regimes.

(g) There may be a superficial similarity between the political aspirations and methods of Saddam Hussein and those of Bismarck. But what was achieved by Bismarck in the 19th century on the basis of wars and annexations could be achieved in the 20th. Moreover, the task of our epoch is the creation of new viable national states but the fraternal unification of all nationalities into a worldwide socialist federation that raises mankind to a higher economic and cultural level. As Trotsky said, "The national problem merges everywhere with the social. Only the conquest of power by the world proletariat can assure a real and lasting freedom of development for all nations of our planet" (Writings of Leon Trotsky (1933-34), p. 306).

Finally, for the sake of the clarity of our historical conception, we are obliged to observe that the reference to Chiang Kai-shek suggests a revolutionary policy in 1926 consisted of supporting the reactionary leader of the national bourgeoisie. In fact, that was the line of Stalin, who insisted upon the subordination of the Chinese Communist Party and the working class to Chiang's Northern Expedition and thereby to the bourgeois Kuomintang. Trotsky, however, referred to the Northern Expedition under the leadership of Chiang as "an expedition against the proletariat." In another article, he said that "The Northern Expedition only served to strengthen the bourgeoisie and weaken the workers." Trotsky maintained that the Northern Expedition could have yielded positive results for the workers only if the Communist Party had intervened with its independent program among the masses, in opposition to the policies of Chiang Kai-shek. At any rate, an attempt to provide political support to the annexation of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein by citing the anti-war lord campaigns of Chiang Kai-shek is an academic and sterile exercise. A loose analogy is not a substitute for historically concrete analysis.

At the present time, it cannot be stated with certainty how this crisis will develop over the next few days and weeks. In this situation we must bear in mind Trotsky's adage: the more concrete a prognosis, the more conditional it is. Events are moving very quickly and any number of outcomes are possible. Within the upper echelons of the bourgeoisie a debate is raging over the advisability of resorting to war. Last week's selloff on Wall Street is an indication of the nervousness within the ruling class over the political and economic implications of a full-scale military clash. For all the war propaganda in the media, the more astute sections of the bourgeoisie are reluctant to base all their calculations on the highly dubious premise that all the high-tech weaponry will work flawlessly and produce complete victory within a few days, if not hours. Indeed, unless the bourgeoisie, or at least those in Bush's entourage, has completely lost its head, it must seriously doubt that the aims of the United States can be achieved on the basis of a single and massive strike against Iraq. The very launching of war changes the objective situation and raises new and even unforeseen problems that may well prove to be greater and more dangerous than those which the military actions were intended to resolve. The precise mathematical calculations of the Pentagon technicians would be the first casualties of war, for, as old Clausewitz noted long ago, war produces "an interplay of possibilities, probabilities, good luck and bad that weaves its way throughout the length and breadth of

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Bahrain

Bahrain

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
of the tapestry. In the whole range of human activities, war most closely resembles a game of cards.

But the massive buildup of military forces has a logic of its own; and there is reason to doubt that even an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait would avenge a military strike by the United States. It is less and less likely that a return to what the Financial Times, the leading organ of the British bourgeoisie, calls the status quo ante, is acceptable to the United States. Its goal is to assure a major American victory in the Persian Gulf region, which is incompatible with the existence of an Iraqi military force in its present form. Significantly, yesterday's New York Times declared that "The U.N. Resolutions don't go far enough. There's a need for broader objectives — reducing the risks of future Iraqi aggression and preventing hostile control of gulf oil. To these ends, Iraq would have to agree to destroy its chemical and nuclear-weapons facilities and accept credible international inspection. This would be accompanied by border guarantees and an international force to monitor frontiers." The Wall Street Journal has gone even further. It states explicitly that the "optimum" aim of American policy should be the military conquest of Baghdad and the installation of a "MacArthur regency." Barring a complete capitulation by Saddam Hussein—entailing not only a complete withdrawal from Kuwait but also major political concessions on matters relating to Iraq's internal security (the size of its army, its weaponry, etc.)—it is not likely that the far-reaching aim of the United States to establish its undisputed military and political domination of the region can be achieved without war. However, we need not engage in too much conjecture over the course of events in the coming weeks and months. It is far more important to recognize that whatever the immediate outcome of this crisis, the political situation on a world scale has been transformed. If this particular crisis does not lead to war, another crisis not too far in the future will. We must grasp that the change in the world situation will pose the greatest political challenges to all the sections of the International Committee and the Workers League. For the revolutionary p/9, a war crisis is a great political test. It reveals the real political character of all tendencies in the workers' movement, the true value of their program and perspective, and the caliber of their cadre. It exposes who has prepared for struggle and who has not.

The crisis has already provided the most powerful verification of the scientific content of the perspective upon which the Workers League and the International Committee have based their work. The events of the past month did not come as a surprise to either the Workers League or our international co-thinkers. We anticipated and prepared for the crisis which has now erupted. Throughout the past year, in the face of a campaign of unprecedented virulence against Marxism, the International Committee has insisted that the breakdown of the Stalinist regimes in Eastern Europe represented a crisis of the entire imperialist system and postwar order through which the global interests of all capitalist states were maintained for nearly a half-century. We stated that the events in Eastern Europe, arising out of the pressure of the world economy on the obsolete nation-state system, was part of a general collapse of the international equilibrium which had regulated the affairs of imperialism. A new equilibrium, we warned, could not be achieved without passing through a protracted period of political and social convulsions. Permit me to refer to a number of statements that have appeared in the press and internal documents of the Workers League and the ICFL.

(a) In the statement of the Political Committee on the US invasion of Panama, issued December 22, 1989, the Workers League stated: "The attack on Panama shows the increasing resort of US imperialism to military force. It is the third time in little more than four weeks — following the dispatch of Delta Force commandos to San Salvador and the mobilization of the US Air Force to block the Philippines coup— that US military forces have intervened in the affairs of another country. Far from a sign of strength, the resort to military force is the expression of the weakness and crisis of American capitalism. With its financial system in a shambles, facing escalating trade and budget deficits, and hammered by the competition of more efficient imperialist rivals, especially Japan and West Germany, imperialism is seeking to assert by force what it no longer has the economic resources to sustain .... The US is thus flexing its muscles, not merely to chase out Noriega, but to send a warning to its principal rivals in Europe and Asia that while in decline economically, the United States still possesses decisive military advantages. "This combination of economic weakness and military power is an explosive mixture. But in the long run, the first factor is far more decisive, and the increasing recklessness in the use of American military power means that inevitably, US imperialism is headed for a monumental debacle.... The US invasion is yet another expression of the increasingly incendiary nature of world politics. The tendency to resolve local disputes through armed intervention towards a more general military configuration. The return to gunboat diplomacy signals a violent eruption by American imperialism on a global scale.... The collapse of the Warsaw Pact and the abandonment of any pretense of anti-imperialism by the Soviet Union have made US imperialism even less likely to show restraint in its actions.

(b) On 1/6/1990, in a political report to the membership of the Workers League, the following was stated "The postwar settlement was aimed at resolving the very contradictions which led to the bloodiest war in history, a war which nearly brought about the end of capitalism and now, 45 years later, it turns out that all those contradictions are still there, all those fault lines still exist and once again world imperialism is preparing inexorably for a new confrontation between the major imperialist powers. What could be more explosive than the combination of America's declining world position and its still considerable military power. Nations and states and classes don't go peacefully into the 'Good Night.' America is not going to accept the loss of its world position. It views this as the American century, no matter what defeats and setbacks it has suffered.... Taken within a world historical framework, the breakdown of the Eastern European regimes and the postwar order in general means the reassertion, on a far higher level, of all the basic contradictions of imperialism. Far from entering into a new and triumphant period of capitalist ascendancy, imperialism stands on the brink of a new bloody epoch of wars and revolution. The new equilibrium that will be necessary for capitalism will only be worked out after a period of profound struggles and eruptions of all sorts, of wars and revolutions. In other words, contradictions have been set into motion that cannot be peacefully resolved. So this is the question confronting the working class, that it must resolve this crisis on a progressive basis or it will be resolved by capitalism on an extremely reactionary one."

(c) In the opening report to the 14th National Congress of the Workers League on 2/17/90, it was stated: "But the pressure of the world economy, which has had such a devastating effect upon the nationally-isolated economies of Eastern Europe, is having a no less shattering impact upon the political and economic relations of the major imperialistpowers. The old capitalist equilibrium that prevailed during the postwar era, which depended upon the hegemonic role of American imperialism, has now been shattered; and a new equilibrium cannot be reestablished without a violent restructuring of political and economic relations among the major imperialism powers.... Now, the breakup of that equilibrium opens the Pandora's Box of economic and political rivalries that produced within the space of 25 years, between 1914 and 1939, the eruption of two world wars which proved to be the greatest and most te democratic rebellions in history."

(d) At the 10th Plenum of the ICFL, on 5/6/1990, the following point was made: "The political map is being redrawn as dramatically as it was in the period after 1914. The question is: how is it going to be redrawn and who's going to do the redrawing? Is it going to be redrawn on a capitalist basis, that is, through wars and bloody annexations, which is what the future will hold, or is it going to be redrawn by the working class through the abolition of national boundaries and the establishment of a worldwide socialist federation."

(e) On the next day, this point was expanded upon: "The question is: will the imperialists be able to work out a new and stable equilibrium peacefully? Clearly, the old equilibrium which was established after World War II on the basis of the global supremacy of US imperialism is utterly unviable. This supremacy has been deteriorating over an extended period, but the framework of the Cold War still endowed it with a certain legitimacy. The United States-Soviet antagonism provided the means for suppressing the interimperialist rivalries. If there exists any possibility of working out a new interimperialist status quo ‘peacefully’, it first of all depends on the willingness of the United States to accept a new relationship which, in one way or another, given the changes in the relationships economically between the major capitalist powers, would represent a diminution of its world position. The question is: should we expect such a dignified retreat on the part of American imperialism? The evidence so far strongly suggests that we should not. (I) The political resolution of the Workers League, initially adopted in February and amended in April, summarized the objective situation as follows: “The Stalinist regimes in Eastern Europe were an essential part of the political framework established at the end of World War II by imperialism, with the collaboration of Stalinism, to suppress the proletarian revolution. Their collapse expresses not only the crisis of Stalinism. It is the most advanced expression of the general crisis of world imperialism, and signals the disintegration of the postwar order. In Eastern Europe, the chain of the imperialist world order has broken at its weakest link. The underlying economic crisis of world capitalism is as profound and sweeping as those which forced the redrawing of the map of Europe and other parts of the world in the aftermath of World War I and the October 1917 Revolution, and again in the aftermath of World War II. Previously sacrosanct political divisions and state borders are crumbling first in Eastern Europe. But this is only the prelude to a convulsive period of wars and revolutions that will remake the map of the world. The issue which confronts the working class is whether these changes will be imposed from above, by the imperialist ruling classes, by means of nuclear war and fascist barbarism, or from below, by the working class, by means of world socialist revolution. World events are once again moving at a blinding speed, and the vastly accelerated tempo is itself the mark of an revolutionary period.” It is indisputable that the political analysis of the party has been vindicated by the course of events. But the vindication of our analysis is, more fundamentally, the vindication of the Marxist method and the entire principled foundation of the Fourth International. I will not repeat the points which have already been made in the editorial of the current issue of the Fourth International, but no other movement except that founded by Leon Trotsky can provide answers to the historic problems which confront the working class. Fifty years after his assassination, the program of world socialist revolution has acquired a life-and-death significance for the working class. All the alternatives to Marxism—the reactionary national socialist panacea of the Stalinists, the piddling reformism of the social democrats and trade union bureaucrats, the bourgeois nationalists in the backward countries, not to mention the apologies provided for all the above by Pableite opportunism—have provenutterly bankrupt. In confronting the present crisis, we base our work on all the essential principles of Marxism and the historical experiences of the working class embodied in the program of the Fourth International. In defining our attitude to this war, we have no need to seek programmatic innovations. Our work must be based on the principles of revolutionary defeatism elaborated by the great founders of our movement. We tell the working class that its principal enemy is the American ruling class and its government; that it must oppose the war drive of the American bourgeoisie with all its might; and that if war should nevertheless break out, the working class should continue to oppose the war and develop its independent class struggle in opposition to all appeals for patriotic sacrifice. Its attitude should be, “Not a man and not a penny for this imperialist war.” We must, as advised by Trotsky, utilize transitional demands to aid the independent mobilization of the working class and break it from the influence of the pro-imperialist bureaucracies that dominate the workers’ movement. Ata time when it is obvious to every serious worker that war is welcomed by the rapacious defense contractors who feared that the end of the Cold War might depress their profits, the Workers League must energetically call for workers’ control of the war industries, the confiscation of war profits, and the expropriation and nationalization of the war industries and their transformation into means of socially useful production. The Workers League must build its own program on the independent political mobilization of the working class and the youth against imperialism. There is no effective struggle against war except one that proceeds from the essential Marxist-precept that war is the inevitable outcome of the contradictions of the imperialist system. We do not fight war with moral appealstothebourgeoisie. We do not approach war as if it was a ghastly mistake. We recognize that war arises inevitably out of imperialism and, therefore, to fight war means to fight for the international unity of the working class and the overthrow of capitalism. Within this political framework, the demand for the formation of a Labor Party, based on a revolutionary program, assumes the greatest practical significance. Despite what Clif Slaughter attempted to tell us in 1983 following the US invasion of Grenada, revolutionary opposition to imperialism is reduced to empty phrases if it leaves out the essential issue of fighting to break the American working class from the domination of the bourgeois parties. The drive to war must accelerate the economic crisis of American capitalism and intensify the exploitation of the working class. We have often stressed that it is not possible for the bourgeoisie to maintain a policy of “guns and butter” as it did during the Vietnam era. The economic conditions which exist today are the opposite of those which prevailed in 1985 when President Johnson initiated the massive escalation of troop levels in Vietnam. In that period the United States was not troubled by trade deficits, and its dollar, convertible into gold at the price of $35 per ounce, functioned as the world reserve currency, that is, the bulk of world trade was calculated and paid for in dollars. Such was the apparent economic strength of the United States that Johnson and his advisers believed that the war in Vietnam would not interfere with the “war on poverty” proclaimed as the goal of the administration’s domestic policy. But what is the situation today? The United States is the largest debtor country in the world; the dollar, now worth less than one-third its value in 1971 against the major currencies, is plunging on the world markets; and the trade and budget deficits have reached astronomical proportions, even before the enormous expenditures required to finance the US military operations in the Persian Gulf. What is coming is not a war on poverty but a war on the working class. From the very start, the United States must place the full burden of militarism on the back of the working class. The financial credits required by the American bourgeoisie to pay for its military adventures must be raised on the international credit markets, which, in turn, will demand drastic reductions in the increasingly miserable living standards of the working class. Therefore, the preparation for war and its actual outbreak must produce an enormous intensification of the level of class struggle in the United States. Efforts will be made, of course, to suppress its expression. One can be certain that among the first victims of war will be the democratic rights of the working class and all those who oppose American imperialism. But no amount of police repression can contain the mass discontent that is suffering caused by war will produce. It will inevitably break through the surface; and the Workers League—while taking the necessary measures to strengthen its political security and anticipating the likelihood of attacks on its legal rights—must systematically prepare for that inevitable development. The historical experience of the 20th century has demonstrated the profound connection between imperialist war and social revolution. Lenin’s call to turn the imperialist war into a civil war was not some sort of agitational appeal, but a programmatic formula based on a scientific analysis of the organic tendencies of capitalism development. Imperialist war, as Lenin explained again and again, is the outcome of objective social contradictions whose development, accelerated and intensified by war itself, inevitably leads to a revolutionary crisis. However, the development of a revolutionary crisis into a social revolution is not simply an objective process. It requires the intervention of those subjective forces which are actively seeking to utilize the possibilities created by the revolutionary crisis to achieve the conquest of power by the working class. The revolutionary party represents that essential subjective force. In appraising the political situation and our historic tasks, we recall the words written by Lenin in 1915: “The experience of the war, like the experience of any crisis in history, of any great calamity and any sudden turn in human life, stuns and breaks some people, but enlightens and tempers others. Taken by and large this is a law governing the history of the world as an essential objective principle of politics, the number and strength of the second kind of people have—with the exception of individual cases of the decline and fall of one state or another—proved greater than those of the former kind.... Will this situation last long; how much more acute will it become? Will it lead to revolution? This is something we do not know, and nobody can know. The answer can be provided only by the experience gained during the development of revolutionary sentiment and the transition to revolutionary action by the advanced class, the proletariat. There can be no talk in this connection about 'illusions' or their repudiation, since no socialist has ever guaranteed that this war (and not the next one), that today's revolutionary situation (and not tomorrow's) will produce a revolution. What we are discussing is the indisputable and fundamental duty of all socialists—that of revealing to the masses the existence of a revolutionary situation, explaining its scope and depth, arousing the proletariat's revolutionary consciousness and revolutionary determination, helping it to go over to revolutionary action, and forming, for that purpose, organizations suited to the revolutionary situation.”

Every comrade must recognize that enormous tasks confront this party. A war changes everything; all the relations between classes, the relation between the party and the working class and the relations within the party itself. The greatest danger we face is complacency and fatalism and the continuation of forms of work and routines that have acquired the force of habit. It is not easy to change methods of work which have been rooted in objective political conditions which are quite different from those which we now confront. We must fight against all methods of work which are based on the unstated assumption that somehow or other things will continue to go on as they have gone on in the past, that the present crisis and the increasingly explosive conditions within world imperialism will not produce social eruptions that quite suddenly change the relationship of the party to broad masses of workers and which pose directly to the party the task of leading tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of workers in struggle. We have stressed repeatedly during the past year that the objective relationship between the party and the working class has changed. All the practical experiences of the party during the past year have tended to confirm that. A vast gulf has opened up between the masses and their official leadership and that gulf will grow far wider as the impact of the war crisis is felt by broad masses of workers. We must mobilize the growing discontent of the working class; we must tirelessly fight for its independence; we must above all turn people of this fact. While Iraq has occupied our attention in recent years, we must above all turn people of this fact. While Iraq has occupied our attention in recent years, we must never forget that in the long run Iran remains America's most formidable enemy in the Middle East. Shiite fundamentalist groups sponsored by Iran have been wreaking havoc and unrest throughout the region for decades. These groups prolonged the agony of the civil war in Lebanon, and are currently fomenting unrest in Israel, Algeria, Tunisia and Egypt in addition to Bahrain. Bahrain is a particular target of Iranian political aggression because of Iranian claims to the island as part of its historic dominion of Persia and because of Bahrain's indigenous Shiite majority (even though the vast majority of Bahraini Shiites are loyal to their country). Also, Bahrain's unswerving support of the US aroused the ire of the late Ayatollah Khomeini and those Shiites in Bahrain loyal to him. The Al-Khalifa regime is not a model for pluralism judged by American standards, but in recent years the country has taken tremendous strides in the area of human rights, especially women's rights. In Bahrain women hold numerous positions of authority. For instance, the Bahraini social services and telecommunications agencies are both headed by women. There is some discrimination in societal status and the job market, and economic hardship has given some in Bahraini reason to protest. However, blacks in the South suffered far worse discrimination in this country only 40 years ago, and while we have made progress on the race issue, who can say that racism is not once again recall, speeds up enormously the political development. Those great tasks which only yesterday seemed long years, if not decades away, can loom up directly before us in the next two or three years, and even sooner. Programs which are based on habitual peacetime conditions will inevitably remain dangling in midair. On the other hand, the Fourth International's program of transitional demands, which seemed so 'unreal' to nearsighted politicians, will reveal its full and dazzling potential only when the masses are mobilized in the process of the mobilization of the masses for the conquest of state power.”

Our program today is the most realistic of all programs in the world. No other movement has understood, has analyzed, has anticipated developments as this party has. It is the power and strength of that analysis which provides the deepest insight into the real relationship of class forces. The work which we are carrying out is not based on the clever insights of a few individuals. It expresses the growing comprehension of the working class as a whole of its historical tasks and such a development of consciousness reflects the very advanced stage of social contradictions. We are not making predictions or offering guarantees; but we have no doubt that the period immediately before us will open up possibilities which only a short time ago would have appeared almost inconceivable. Can this party and the other sections of the International Committee become mass parties in the period immediately ahead? Is it possible that in a year's time we will be holding meetings of ourW by hundreds and thousands of people? I believe that is certainly the case. That is the direction of objective developments. We must base ourselves not on what we perceive to be our organizational limitations but on a scientific analysis of the objective situation. Our task is to mobilize the working class for the conquest of power. Our perspective has already demonstrated the power of the Mancist method and now we must act on this perspective to transform the forms of our work, to develop our activities broadly throughout the working class, to change in practice the relationship between our party and the growing emergent movement of the working class and in that way the provide the revolutionary answer to imperialist war.[=] still a problem here? Who are we, then, to lecture other countries on racial equality? Sheik Isa Al-Khalifa is one of the most accessible heads of state in the world. At least once a week he holds an open court where any person in Bahrain can have a cup of coffee and discuss whatever may be on his or her mind. I can’t even imagine walking into the White House and having a cup of joe with Bill. The American press has always been quick to judge our allies when their system of government does not fit neatly into some rigid egalitarian template, while at the same time giving our totalitarian enemies on the left a free ride. (Witness recent calls to lift the US embargo against Castro's 18000. ------. “Cave Woman” is Identified Taken Home [Marie Louise Brigitta Henriz, 47, identified as Swede and was returned at the expense of the Cyprus government via Cyprus Airways”, in Seattle Times, August 20, 1995, p. A25. [TXT]

18002. ------. “The Economy: Turkey to Enter into Customs Union with the European Union”, in Week in Germany, March 10, 1995, p. 5. The European Union and Turkey moved a step closer together this week as officials signed an agreement on customs union that will provide nearly unrestricted access to each other’s markets beginning in 1996. The agreement signed on 3/6/95 will reduce or eliminate tariffs on goods traded by EU countries and Turkey, bringing Turkey closer to the EU membership it has sought for years. Officials from both countries welcomed this accord. German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel said that it was an event “of both economic and political significance,” and Turkish Prime Minister Tansu Ciller spoke of a “turning point in Turkey’s integration into Europe.” The agreement on customs union became possible after Greece dropped its longstanding objections in exchange for a pledge of negotiations on membership for Cyprus later in the decade. Greece had blocked customs union and had successfully vetoed European financial assistance since Turkey occupied part of Cyprus in 1974. Turkey now stands to receive financial assistance totaling 700 million Ecu (about $900 million) over a period of several years. Although signed, it is by no means clear that the agreement will actually go into effect, since it requires approval from the European Parliament, the Strasbourg-based EU legislative body. The parliament has said that it will withhold approval if Turkey’s human rights record does not improve. Kinkel referred to the still uncertain status of the agreement when he called it a “pledge of confidence.” Turkey must now move quickly to institute constitutional reforms and review its treatment of the Kurdish minority, he said. Some European Parliament members displayed much less confidence. Claudia Roth, a Green deputy in the European Parliament said that “the yes to customs union means that human rights have once again fallen victim to economic interests.” Germany’s National Association of Chambers of Commerce (Deutscher Industrie- und Handelstag, or DIHT), on the other hand, pointed to the economic benefits of the agreement, including low wages, the relatively high skills Turkish workers and accessibility of central Asian markets through Turkey. The agreement will particularly benefit the sectors vehicle assembly, foodstuffs and metalworking, according to the DIHT. [TXT]

18003. ------. “Wedding Bells in West Bank; Palestinians May Offer Women who wished to open small businesses. Other financial benefits of the agreement, including low wages, the relatively high skills Turkish workers and accessibility of central Asian markets through Turkey. The agreement will particularly benefit the sectors vehicle assembly, foodstuffs and metalworking, according to the DIHT. [TXT] 18004. ------. “Woman Found in Cyprus Cave Will Move To Island Convent”, in Seattle Times, May 28, 1995. p. A6. [TXT] Mysterious foreign woman found semi-conscious in a cave has been moved to a women’s right to divorce and remarry was a basic human right, she said. Other financial benefits of the agreement, including low wages, the relatively high skills Turkish workers and accessibility of central Asian markets through Turkey. The agreement will particularly benefit the sectors vehicle assembly, foodstuffs and metalworking, according to the DIHT. [TXT] 18005. Commission on the Status of Women. Impact Of Mass Media On Women’s Lives Must Be Addressed At World Conference, Say Speakers To Commission On Status Of Women; Holy See Calls for ‘Media Ethnic’ To Promote Women’s Dignity; Overcome Impact of Broadcasting Violence, Pornography: Part 3: Statements. Thirty-eighth Session 9 March 1994 6th Meeting (PM),Commission on the Status of Women. WOM/742. MARY PURCELL, of the International Federation of University Women, commended the Conference secretariat on the new language of the platform for action and its emphasis on the education of young girls. Girls faced discrimination early in life in health, nutrition and human rights. More than 2 million children died each year in parts of Asia from malnutrition and other effects mainly because they were born female. She described a number of problems girls faced in their youth, which followed her to adulthood and were inherited by her own daughters. Women should have equal access to the benefits of society. The status of the girl was the bedrock for achieving equality for women. Therefore, their status must be given special attention. GUSTAVO ALBIN (Mexico) said the platform of action must accelerate implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies. National efforts were critical to ensuring broad dissemination of the objectives of the Conference and, towards that end, the work done by the Department of Public Information (DPI) was particularly important. Bodies of the United Nations system must coordinate their approaches to the preparatory process. A regional preparatory meeting would be held in Argentina in September for the countries of the Latin American and Caribbean region. The logo approved for the 1975 World Conference in Mexico should be used for the Beijing Conference, as it was well-known. The motto of the Conference should remain “Action for Equality, Development and Peace”, as it took account of the broader issues to be tackled by participants. The platform for action should, if possible, contain quantifiable measures for action, so that implementation could be monitored. The platform should be elaborated in easily understandable language. SHARON SHENHAV (Israel) said her country’s declaration of independence had granted full equality to women in 1948. The Equal Rights Law of 1951 had further strengthened that equality. Since then, a series of labour laws had been passed to ensure practical equality. Despite such forward-looking legislation, women had not achieved equality. Women suffered from violence in the family, often finding that the most dangerous place for them was in the home, where they could be brutalized by their father, brother, husband or boyfriend. In response, Israeli non-governmental organizations had sought methods for empowering women, she continued. It was discovered that despite the laws, women earned less than men. Recent legislation required that women be appointed to top directorships of government corporations. Women’s organizations were running courses to train women on how to be a director. The goal was for women to be appointed to 50 per cent of all directorships. In order to boost the economic power of women, the Ministry of Trade and Industry had agreed to provide loan guarantees to women who wished to open small businesses. Other financial benefits of the agreement, including low wages, the relatively high skills Turkish workers and accessibility of central Asian markets through Turkey. The agreement will particularly benefit the sectors vehicle assembly, foodstuffs and metalworking, according to the DIHT. [TXT] of the family in establishing a base for equality, development and peace for women, she said. It should ask international agencies, governments, non-governmental organizations and the media to support a positive family environment. The media had a crucial role to play. They could hurt values by broadcasting violence, pornography, inciting moral relativism in relationships, glorifying violence and degrading women. The platform for action should ask for an ethic in the media that would include a commitment to promoting the dignity of women. Refugee women should be given priority in the international agenda and given secure environments, with security measures commensurate with their increased vulnerability, she said. Women living in extreme poverty must be given attention. To change their lot, political will was necessary to satisfy the rights of the poor, specifically their right to equal access to the resources needed to live dignified lives. The World Conference should lead to fundamental equality, which would be the basis of the right of all to share in the process of full development.

SHEILA FINESTONE, Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and Status of Women of Canada, said that the platform for action had the potential to set a course for real and sustained progress towards women's equality. Energies should be focused on developing a concrete and action-oriented document that contained targets, deadlines and priorities needed to speed up achievement of women's equality. Since measures needed to achieve equality had been identified, it was necessary to determine what was critical and to concentrate efforts on what could be achieved in the time available, she continued. The challenge facing the Commission from now until the end of the World Conference was to use the platform for action as a strategic document to further women's equality by providing Member States, United Nations organizations and non-governmental organizations with the tools to put commitments into effect. She called for monitoring mechanisms to ensure that activities for women's equality were implemented. In that regard, she said that each specialized agency of the United Nations should identify one priority area to which they would dedicate their resources for the next five years. Reviewing the activities of Canada in preparation for the Conference, she said that the Canadian Preparatory Committee would contribute to the platform for action. Some of the members of the Canadian Preparatory Committee were representatives chosen by the Beijing Coordinating Committee, a non-governmental organization representing women's groups from the national and regional levels in Canada. To achieve equality, women's rights must be recognized as human rights. The Conference should work to curb violence against women, which was a violation of the human rights of women. Also vital was equality in the economic and peace processes, but much remained to be done in those areas. She expressed the hope that the Conference would start a process whose results and achievements could be monitored and measured.

PATRICK RATA (New Zealand) described preparations in his country for the Conference. In addition to preparations in New Zealand, a number of its non-governmental organizations had attended the Asia-Pacific preparatory meeting held last year. The small size and lack of resources hampered the participation of many small Pacific nations in international events. In response, New Zealand and Australia would provide the bulk of the funding for upcoming regional preparatory meeting to be held in Jakarta. He welcomed the wording of the draft platform for action, which highlighted the positive contributions made by women, rather than focusing only on their difficulties. The statement of mission rightly addressed such factors as the participation of women in national life and the protection of human rights. The call for a concerted effort among different members of the international community was important, as without cooperation among them, progress would be unlikely text on the global framework should bring out more clearly the effect of global information networks – the “CNN phenomenon”. It would be important not to simply draft a “shopping list” or reiterate the 372 paragraphs of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies.

ERATO KOZAKOU-MARCOULLIS (Cyprus) said that efforts to achieve equality for women should be redoubled, so that men and women would enter the twenty-first century as equals in the family, at work and in the political and economic spheres. In her country, an intergovernmental body had been set up to prepare a national report, to be presented to the regional Conference scheduled for October in Vienna and, later to the World Conference in Beijing. International Women's Day was marked in her country with a peaceful protest against the 20-year occupation, she said. The protest was intended to bring down the wall separating the country's two ethnic communities. The message delivered that day was that there should be a solution to the conflict that would restore the rights of all Cypriots, unite the country, provide the return of refugees to their homes and ascertain the fate of the missing.

EMILIA CASTRO DE BARISH (Costa Rica) said the First Lady of Costa Rica would participate in the group of experts meeting in May to prepare for the Conference. The status of women worldwide continued to deteriorate, particularly in developing countries. An enormous commitment was required to implement the Forward-looking Strategies. Women must be provided with health care throughout their lives and access to information on acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) must be provided to them. In the area of human rights, there were enormous gaps between legislation protecting women and the reality of that protection. Substantial discussion on violence against women was needed, as such violence had shown an alarming increase and had spread to situations of armed conflict. Unfortunately the rape of young girls was not seen in terms of the need to protect women. She went on to describe recent legislative initiatives in Costa Rica to guarantee equality. Laws covered such subjects as the portrayal of women in advertising and labour practices, she said. Centres had been set up to protect battered women and provide them with legal assistance. Sexual harassment in the workplace was cause for dismissal. A national committee for the Conference had been established. Also, women were taking a leading role in managing and developing the environment.

JOKE SWIEBEL (Netherlands) said drafting the platform for action's section on finance would have to wait until the strategic objectives and actions to be taken were formulated in greater detail. However, brainstorming on institutional arrangements should commence. The best national mechanisms had clear mandates, political support at the highest level, adequate resources and professional staff. Ideally, such machinery cooperated with non-governmental organizations, while taking account of their independent role with respect to government bodies. The machinery should be developed in accordance with the political structure of the country concerned. In order to transfer those experiences concerning national machinery to the international level, she said it would be valuable to strengthen the mandate of the Commission on the Status of Women by elaborating its monitoring function in a practical manner. The time constraints faced by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women must be resolved and its work should be conducted at the Centre for Human Rights, as that would facilitate coordination among treaty bodies. That position, mandate and resources of the Division for the Advancement of Women must be reconsidered. In order to tackle those matters, an expert group meeting should be convened.

THEHEREZA MACHADO QUINTELLA (Brazil) said that her country was forming a national committee to coordinate Brazil's preparations for Beijing. It would hold seminars and workshops to mobilize public opinion all over the country. The language of the platform for action should be sharpened and strengthened, she continued. Among the issues to be addressed was how the outcomes of the World Conference would be monitored. The platform should give more emphasis on the deteriorating economic and social conditions in the developing countries and how they affected women more than men. The Conference should be a chance to stress the need to develop new political, economic and social structures with a gender perspective. The systems that had determined the world's political, economic and social life must be re-examined. There should be no additions to the areas of critical concern, because a longer document would diminish its impact. The measures envisaged to achieve equality for women must be effectively implemented.

IMELDA M. NICOLAS (Philippines) said the draft platform of action provided a sound basis on which to build. The section on the global framework should refer to the need to eliminate the adverse effects of economic restructuring on women. National machineries should play a critical role in policy planning. The text on poverty should address the plight of migrant women. Many Filipino women took jobs in other countries under exploitative conditions, both economic and sexual. States should be invited to sign and ratify the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. Migrant women should be dealt with under the text on violence against women. Issues pertaining to women should be viewed in a global context. Political and economic problems must be addressed in an integrated manner. The Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against women in development held last year in Minsk had recommended guaranteeing constitutional equality for women, as well as their right to work, she continued. It also recommended that countries undertaking the transition to a market economy should promote entrepreneurship among women. Other recommendations included developing State policies to raise the status of women, studying the dynamics of women's participation in the decision-making process, and reducing the workload of working parents. It also called for promoting new types of family relations based on equality of the sexes.

INGEBORD BREINES, of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), said that education should be a critical area in its own right in the platform for action for Beijing. The importance of women's access to education should be underlined. Special attention should be paid to educating poor women in rural areas, marginalized urban areas and refugee and migrant women.
She said there was a need to stress that media images of women should be deo of stereotypes. To get more women into the media, scholarships and training for women to study the media should be increased. Action should be taken to change the mentality towards women. Both genders within the United Nations system should be given the possibility of reconciling family and work responsibilities, she added.

DOROTHY WART, of the International Women's Medical Association, said greater attention must be paid to women's health.
Women must have equal access to all health services, as stated in the Forward-looking Strategies, and have access to information on family planning. Many Governments had not implemented these mandates, thus denying women their basic rights. Governments might provide the services, but what good were they if women had to walk for two days or wait months or years for treatment? she asked. All departments of health should have knowledge of diseases affecting women and should keep statistics on the utilization of health services. Women in the United States had less access to diagnostic procedures than men. Women were aware of the injustices and should be part of policy formulation.

BERHANE RAS-WORK, of the Inter-African Committee on Traditional Practices Affecting the Health of Women and Children, said that dowry deaths, wife battering, early girl marriages and female-genital mutilation were violence against women and they violated the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. The Convention on the Rights of the Child also stipulated the need for measures against practices that hurt the health of children. Although 100 million women were affected by the practice of female-genital mutilation, there was no outcry. If a hundred men were treated similarly, there would be more concern. Her organization was making efforts to stop the practice of mutilations and the early marriage of girls and was staging several workshops on those practices. She expressed the hope that mutilation would find its appropriate place in the platform for action. It should be universally recognized and identified as violence against women. All parts of the world should take steps to eliminate it. [=]

(51) A total of 48 non-governmental organizations participated in the Symposium. The other Seminar participants and the delegation of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People attended as observers.

(52) Following the panel presentations described in Part I, which the Symposium shared with the Seminar, three workshops specifically related to NGO activities were established to consider the following topics: Developing solidarity activities by Israeli and other organizations with: (a) Palestinian women: Ms. Zahira Kamal (Palestinian) Ms. Hanna Knaz (Israel); (b) Physicians, health workers, health services; Dr. Ahmad Yaziji (Palestinian) Dr. Rachama Marton (Israel); (c) Educational institutions; students: Mr. Albert Aghazarain (Palestinian).

(53) The NGOs participating in the Symposium adopted a Declaration and elected an Asian Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine. [-]

18007. DPR. "Part 02: Declaration Adopted By The Fourth Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine", in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (54) We, the non-governmental organizations gathered at the United Nations Asian Regional Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, representing millions of people concerned with a peaceful solution of that question, believe that the situation has acquired great urgency following the Gulf war. We totally uphold the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. We recognize and uphold the historic proclamation of the State of Palestine made on 11/15/1988. We recognize the proclamation as the expression of the continuous struggle of the heroic Palestinian people culminating in the intifadah. We unconditionally affirm the rights of self-determination, statehood and return of the Palestinian people as guaranteed by the Charter of the United Nations and all relevant United Nations resolutions. We call on all Governments of Asia and the Pacific region which have not already done so, to recognize the State of Palestine in unequivocal terms and without delay.

(55) We are motivated by the genuine desire to establish a durable and just peace in the Middle East on the basis of international legitimacy as provided by all relevant United Nations resolutions, and mutual recognition of the right of both the Palestinian and Israeli people, to self-determination and the right to live in sovereign independent States along side each other.

(56) We draw attention to the peace process initiated by the Palestine National Council (PNC) in compliance with all relevant United Nations resolutions. We note and welcome the resolutions of the PNC to the effect that any international peace conference be based on the implementation of all United Nations resolutions and the right of the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. We fully support the objectives of the Palestine Liberation Organization in the peace process, and therefore urge all Governments to follow suit.

(57) We note with utmost concern the continuous systematic policy of violating the rights of the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territories conducted by the Israeli occupation authorities. We deplore and denounce the continuation of the Israeli occupation of all Palestinian and Arab territories including East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon, and Israel’s brutal measures against the Palestinians, including the current policy designed to dismember the West Bank by restricting movement of Palestinian individuals and goods through the City of Jerusalem. We condemn the conditions of Palestinian prisoners in the administrative detention camps and the use of torture and brutality during their interrogation, including women and children. Furthermore, we condemn the Israeli Government’s policy of the systematic expulsion of Palestinians from the national homeland as a clear violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention, and affirm the United Nations Security Council’s adoption of resolution 726 (1992) which strongly condemns the decision of Israel to resume the deportation of Palestinians. Therefore, we call upon all Israeli authorities to permit the return of all deportees to their homeland.

(58) We observe with great concern the illegal colonization by Israel of the occupied Palestinian territory. We demand the immediate cessation of the construction and expansion of all Israeli settlements in occupied Palestine, which undermine the current peace process.

(59) We draw attention to the fact that Jewish immigration poses a great threat to the Palestinian survival on their land and is an obstacle to the resolution of the Palestinian problem due to the ensuing demographic changes. This is especially true while Palestinians continue to be denied their right of return. We call upon new immigrants to Israel and all Israelis to refuse to settle in the occupied Palestinian territories. We also call upon the international community to mobilize in all ways for the return of the Palestinians to their homeland, thus contributing to the efforts for a just settlement of the question of Palestine.

(60) We call upon the States to recognize the right to self-determination of the Palestinian people as they have done in the case of Israel. We also call upon the United States to apply pressure upon Israel to comply with all relevant United Nations resolutions.

(61) We oppose the massive and unconditional aid to Israel provided by the United States and other States which underwrite the continuing occupation. We call upon all Governments to condition all aid, loans and guarantees to Israel on the cessation of Israeli settlement construction and expansion in the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories, including East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon. We call on all Governments and the United Nations Security Council to institute sanctions against Israeli occupation.

(62) We unaniormously recognize and support the intifadah as a national liberation struggle for the achievement of the State of Palestine and the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

(63) We condemn the American and Israeli endeavours to bypass the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, in the current peace talks. We call upon the American administration to re-establish dialogue with the PLO. We insist that Palestinians, as do all other peoples, have full right to choose their own political representatives in any peace process. We call for direct participation of the PLO and the effective participation of the United Nations in the peace process.

(64) The issue of the status of Jerusalem should not be excluded from negotiations, nor should Palestinian residents of that city be excluded from participation in the negotiations currently under way.

(65) We consider it most urgent that the United Nations provide immediate and sustained protection for the Palestinians under occupation, and that the Security Council establish in East Jerusalem an authority responsible for the monitoring of human rights violations in contravention of the Fourth Geneva Convention. We urge the Security Council to take all necessary measures to facilitate the exercise by the Palestinians of their inalienable rights. We call for the establishment of a United Nations force to protect the Palestinian people and to stop Israel’s attempts at uprooting and destroying it.

(66) We observe that Palestinians in Israel are subjected to a policy of legal and political discrimination and demand that Israel apply the principles of justice and equality to Palestinian Israelis in accordance with their status as a national minority in Israel. We condemn the Israeli policy of continued confiscations of Palestinian lands and destruction of Palestinian homes for the purpose of settlements of immigrants inside Israel.

(67) We express our strongest protest against the action of the Israeli Government in preventing the distinguished experts, Mr. Omar Abdel-Razeq of Al-Najah University from attending this Seminar and Symposium.

(68) We call upon all NGOs to establish contacts with and extend support to fellow NGOs in occupied Palestine, especially those related to human rights, women, health, labour, children and education. Furthermore, we call upon all Asian NGOs to monitor the relationships among Asian governmental and private institutions and Israeli governmental and private institutions. We urge NGOs to publicize these linkages and to take collective action against them including organizing boycotts of Israeli products regardless of the exporting or intermediary country.

(69) We request all Asian Governments to support the important role of NGOs in Asia in mobilizing public opinion and to extend financial and other assistance to these organizations so that they can more effectively support the struggle of the Palestinian people.

(70) We warmly thank the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People for convening this Asian Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine. We greatly appreciate the presence of the Committee delegation and its guidance at this meeting. We wish to convey our deep appreciation to His Excellency Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations for his message which was read by Mr. Ronald I. Spiers, Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs and Secretariat Services, whose presence in our meeting was most highly appreciated. We thank the DPR and all others of the United Nations Secretariat including the interpreters who so valuably contributed to our deliberations. We express our heartfelt appreciation to the Government of Cyprus for being our gracious host and for all the excellent facilities so generously provided. We particularly wish to express our gratitude to the Acting President of the Republic of Cyprus, His Excellency Dr. Vassos Lyssarides for his presence in our meeting. We extend similar appreciation to Her Excellency Mrs. Androulla Vassiliou, the First Lady of the Republic of Cyprus, for her highly inspiring message. In addition, we extend our appreciation to His Excellency Mr. George Iacovou, the Honourable Minister for Foreign Affairs of Cyprus for addressing the Opening Session of the meeting. We also wish to express or appreciation to His Excellency President Yasser Arafat for his message. [=]

18008. DPR. “Part 03: Declaration Adopted By The Fourth Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Annex To The Declaration”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (71) We request all Asian Governments to support the important role of NGOs in Asia in mobilizing public opinion and to extend financial and other assistance to these organizations so that they can more effectively support the struggle of the Palestinian people.

(72) Pressure should be brought to bear on the Government of Israel to comply fully with the principles of international law and, in particular, to apply the international legal provisions concerning armed conflicts and the situation of peoples subjected to occupation and which call for the protection of women and children, such as the Geneva Convention, relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 1949.

(73) The requisite measures should be taken to prevent the occupation authorities from imposing collective punishments, such as curfews, suspension of water and electricity supplies, the demolition of houses and the closure of schools, universities, hospitals and socio-cultural institutions, since these are highly detrimental to women and children.

(74) The ability of women to achieve self-reliance, improve their social situation and increase their participation in economic activity should be developed through support from governmental, non-governmental and international organizations for the development programmes and activities in which Palestinian women are engaged.

(75) Assistance should be extended to Palestinian women in order to help them to establish women's development centres that will cater for the welfare of children and provide the education and vocational training needed for the implementation of production projects.

(76) Palestinian women should be given an opportunity to attend seminars and training courses on matters concerning equality of rights, political participation and decision-making. [=]

18100. DPR. “Part 05: Workshop Report: 2: Developing Solidarity Activities By Israeli and Other Organizations With Palestinian Women: Soheer Mahmoud and Hanna Knaaz”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (77) The basic idea is to establish a general hospital for the Gaza Strip, the urgent need for which arises because of the great shortage of health care and hard infrastructure in the Strip and because of deteriorating health conditions in Gaza and the Strip. If we compare it with neighbouring areas, we see that it is insufficient and cannot meet the growing need for health care. (78) The objective is to achieve the minimum level of health services in the Strip, and it is for that reason that we put forward our previous proposal to establish a general hospital. The reasons are as follows:

(a) Health and medical factors: (i) In recent years the number of hospitals has remained constant, i.e. fewer than before the occupation. The same goes for the number of hospital beds, although the population has grown to many times its previous size; (ii) The number of doctors and nurses, by comparison with the Gulf States or Egypt, is very high; this strength should be utilized to enhance medical care; (iii) A large number of patients are transferred to Israeli hospitals, so the establishment of a hospital would reduce the physical and material burden imposed on patients (some 15 patients are transferred to CT in Israel, at a cost per patient of $700); (iv) Services should be in public hands; (v) The Strip does not provide specialized care in many areas such as neurosurgery and internal medicine, despite the very great abilities of Palestinians who built up the health infrastructure in the Gulf;
many families are prevented from returning home; (v) UNRWA has to transfer its patients to private hospitals; the establishment of a general hospital would increase services for refugees; (vi) The two nursing schools in Gaza would be important sources of trained manpower for the new hospital;

(b) (i) Most of Gaza’s population is under the age of 15, meaning that medical needs will multiply in years to come as these young people marry; (ii) The living conditions of refugees require more extensive health care; (iii) Citizens’ economic conditions, caused by the large population and high unemployment; (iv) A reduction of the financial burden on patients transferred to Israel; (v) Provision of new employment for nurses and doctors;

(c) The political factor: we must begin to build up the infrastructure destroyed by the occupation. With your support and resources, we shall be able to do so. [=]

18011. DPR. “Part 06: Opening Statements: Statement on behalf of The Asian NGOs”, in Sixth United Nations Asian Seminar On The Question of Palestine. (Twenty-Ninth UN Seminar). Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (10) Mr. Syed Farid Alatas, reading out a statement by Mr. Ali Alatas, Chairman of the Asian Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (ACCP), emphasized that the Asian region had much to contribute to worldwide NGO endeavours with regard to the question of Palestine. The occupation of Palestinian and Arab territories was more than just a political phenomenon, it also had economic and cultural dimensions. Israeli laws made Palestinians second-class citizens. Such laws granted to Israeli Jews nationality rights which were denied to the Arabs. At the same time, Israel benefited from Palestinian wage labour. Lack of economic development in the West Bank and Gaza pushed the Palestinian labour force to seek employment within Israel itself. He said that Asian non-governmental organizations should oppose the frequent torture and sexual harassment of Palestinian women by Israeli soldiers in the occupied territory. They should make the world aware of the torture and imprisonment of children by Israeli authorities in the occupied territory, as well as of the tear-gas-induced, intra-uterine fetal deaths. He outlined that Asian NGOs must play a role in getting the press to project true images of the Palestinians and their plight. Documentaries and films on life in Israel and the occupied territory must be made available in the Asian countries. He said the Asian NGOs called for effective international economic and political sanctions on Israel to pressure the Israeli Administration into complying with the Fourth Geneva Convention and accepting all the relevant Security Council resolutions. He appealed to the Security Council to establish a United Nations presence in the occupied territory to protect the Palestinian people. For its part, the ACCP would publish a bulletin containing news on Palestine and on the activities of various Asian NGOs, in order to counter insufficient or one-sided coverage of issues pertaining to the question of Palestine. He also suggested that the ACCP be divided into sub-regional committees, in order to plan more activities. [=

18012. DPR. “Part 06: Workshop Report: 2: Developing Solidarity Activities By Israeli and Other Organizations With Palestinian Physicians and Health Workers: Dr. Rachuma Marton”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (79) Dr. Marton thanked the participants and the Chair for both inviting her and making the Conference successful. She said that the level of medicine in the areas under occupation was equivalent to that which prevailed in Israel in 1950. There was a great shortage of treatment for many diseases such as cancer, surgery, etc.

(80) The General Union of Israeli-Palestinian Doctors was convinced that the population of the areas under occupation was entitled to establish its own health institutions in complete freedom. The occupation was the only reason for the poor conditions in the Strip. The association represented by the General Union of Israeli-Palestinian Doctors was founded in 1981 and consisted of Israeli and Palestinian doctors who conducted activities in the fields of information, education and medicine in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The doctors of the Union distributed medicines to patients in villages and camps where there are no doctors or clinics. The Union had published dozens of reports on the medical situation in the areas under occupation. In 1990, it treated 62 citizens and prisoners, and a higher number in 1991.

(81) Visits to and treatment of prisoners were extremely difficult to arrange, as they required the military officer’s permission. The Union had also helped to secure the release of some prisoners.

(82) There were other ways in which the Union demonstrated its devotion to Palestinian citizens, e.g. by demonstrating against the closure of clinics, etc.

(83) Dr. Marton reported that she was about to establish a fund for the treatment of children whose families were unable to pay for treatment such as heart operations or rehabilitation. The Union had carried out a study on rehabilitation in the areas under occupation, but the occupation authorities were not interested in supporting such a project.

(84) In conclusion, Dr. Marton said that she wished to share something which she always said to herself: namely there were people who paid dearly because of their attendance - such as Dr. Ahmad al-Yazili - so solidarity is not equal. [=

18013. DPR. “Part 07: Workshop Report: 2: Developing Solidarity Activities By Israeli and Other Organizations With Palestinian Physicians and Health Workers: Ibrahim al-Hafi”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (85) A look at different aspects of the Palestinian people’s suffering showed how difficult the issue was and how difficult it was to solve. However, that did not mean we should not begin to solve some aspects of the issue in the hope eventually of achieving a complete solution. The workers’ movement suffered more than others from the imposition of the occupation. We call on non-governmental organizations to bring pressure to bear on the Israeli Government and to support the peace process.

The unemployment rate in the occupied territories is as high as 40%. With their green identity cards, Palestinian workers cannot enter Israel.

The work permits issued by the Military Governor are another of the many forms of discrimination against the workers’ and trade union movement. Mass arrests of workers’ cadres and imprisonment in the Ansar 3 camp.

Prevention of the establishment of production projects. High and exorbitant taxes on production projects.

Suppression and persecution of trade union work. [=

(87) Some of the colleges in the outskirts have been opened since 1989 and Al Najah University is open on a month-to-month basis.

(88) The authorities have also disrupted classes and educational activities outside University’s campuses. The Israeli authorities use terms like “cells of illegal education” gives a true picture of their hostile reaction towards giving education to the Palestinians. We are also informed that student leaders have been expelled and some are under consideration for expulsion.

(89) The workshop took a position to express the strongest protest and to condemn the action of the Israeli Government in preventing a scolar from Al Najah University, Mr. Omar Raze, from attending this Asian Seminar and Symposium. [–]

18015. DPR. “Part 09: Asian Coordinating Committee for NGOs On The Question of Palestine”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. (90) The participants in the Symposium elected the Asian Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine until the next Asian NGO Symposium. Mr. Zafar Bakhhtwari was elected its Chairman. It consisted of the following organizations: (1) ASIAN COMMITTEE FOR SOLIDARITY WITH THE ARAB PEOPLE; H. No. 20 Street 25 F-8-2, Islamabad, Pakistan. (2) UNMYoung MALAYSIA; 75-2 Jalan Thambapillai, Brickfields, 50470 Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. (3) INDO-ARAB SOCIETY; 4 Akbar Road, New Delhi 110011, India. (4) PALESTINE HUMAN RIGHTS CAMPAIGN IN NEW ZEALAND; P.O. Box 29-168, Christchurch, New Zealand. (5) NATIONAL INSTITUTION FOR SOCIAL CARE AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING, P.O. Box 135-621 Beirut, Lebanon. (6) CHINESE INTERNATIONAL STUDIES INSTITUTE: Beijing, China. Fax: 086-1-550961. (7) UNIVERSITY GRADUATES UNION OF HEBRON: Amman Branch, P.O. Box 2347, Amman, Jordan. (8) COMMITTEE OF SOLIDARITY WITH ARAB PEOPLE; Akamas Street, 8 Nicosia, Cyprus. Another three seats were reserved to be filled by the Asian Coordinating Committee at a later stage. [–]

18016. DPR. “Part 10: Annex 1: Motion of Thanks”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. The participants in the United Nations Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, being held from 1-20-24/1992 in Nicosia, Republic of Cyprus, express their profound thanks to the Government and people of Cyprus for generously providing a venue for this meeting and for the excellent arrangements made, which greatly contributed to its success. The participants wish also to convey their sincere gratitude and appreciation to H.E. Mr. George Iacovou, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Cyprus, for his statement of warm support for the Palestinian cause and our Seminar and NGO Symposium. The participants wish to express their appreciation also to H.E. Mr. Tassos Panayides, Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, for their contribution to the Seminar and the NGO Symposium. The meeting was honoured to be addressed by Madam Androula Vasiliiou, wife of the President of the Republic of Cyprus. The participants take this opportunity to convey their sincere appreciation to the Government and people of Cyprus, for their consistent support for the exercise by the Palestinian people of its inalienable rights and for the active role they have played in advancing the cause of peace and justice in the Middle East on the basis of the Charter and the resolutions of the United Nations. [–]

18017. DPR. “Part 11: Annex 2: List of Participants”, in Report of the Fourth United Nations Asian Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine. Held in Nicosia, Cyprus, January 20-24, 1992. New York: Division of Palestine Rights, 1992. Experts: Mr. Radwan ABU-AYYASH (Palestinian); Mr. Albert AGHAZARIAN (Palestinian); Mr. Muhammad AMERAH (Jordan); Mr. Moshe AMIRAV (Israel); Mr. Don BETZ (United States); Ms. Yael DAYAN (Israel); Mr. Omran EL-SHAFIE (Egypt); Mr. Muhammad HALAJ (Palestinian); Mr. HE Yafei (China); Dr. Vassos LYSSARIDES (Cyprus); Mr. Ian S. LUSTICK (United States); Mr. Ron MACINTYRE (New Zealand); Mr. Hashim MAHAMEED (Israel); Mr. Mattiyahu PELED (Israel); Mr. A.H. RIzAVI (India); Mr. Yezid SAYIGH (Palestinian); Mr. Ryoo TATEYAMA (Japan); Dr. Ahmad YASJI (Palestinian).

Resource persons: Mr. Albert AGHAZARIAN (Palestinian); Ms. Hanna KNAA (Israel); Ms. Soheer MAHMUD (Palestinian); Dr. Ruchama MARTON (Israel); Dr. Ahmad YAZJI (Palestinian). [–]

18018. DPR. “Part 12: Annex 2: Delegation of the Committee on the miscarriages. In addition, the conditions in the detention camps had left thousands of Palestinians with deteriorating physical and psychological problems. He said that the only solution to that health hardship was the end of the occupation and the transfer of authority to the Palestinian people in a Palestinian State. [=]

18021. De Laroche, Robert; Labat, Jean-Michel. The Secret Life of Cats: In The Cat's Footsteps; Companion on the Final Voyage; Bastet-The Divine Mother. Hauppage, N.Y.: Barrons Educational Service, 1995. pp. 17-21, 26-31, 32-39. The earliest known cat remains have been found at Jericho, Palestine and date from 6700 BC. Cats were also found in Harappa sites in the Indus valley civilization dating to 2000 BC. Cat remains from 5000 BC have been found in Cyprus; an ivory statue of a cat has been found at Lachisch, Palestine from 1700 BC; a terracotta cat’s head has been found for the same period at the Minoan site of Palaikastro on Crete.

The ancient Egyptian cat is apparently derived from the Felis libyca, or ‘gloved cat’, which is still found in Egypt, rather than the Felis ornata, which is still found wild in Iran and Pakistan; alternately, the modern cat could be derived from Felis chaos, which still remains wild in Egypt. One tradition argues that cats were domesticated in the Third and Fourth Dynasties (C. 2600 BC). The earliest evidence of cat dates from the Fifth Dynasty (c. 2500); the effigy of a cat wearing a collar which was found in the tomb of Ti’at Saqqarah. The cut of the cat-goddess Bastet emerged in the Twelfth Dynasty (c. 2000 BC). The cat became important in the era of the New Empire and the Eighteenth Dynasty (c. 1500). In this period trained cats were used to catch birds (in tomb pictures), tombs are decorated with portrayals of house cats. In the Nineteenth and Twentieth Dynasties the Great Cat is portrayed in the Book of the Dead. The earliest cat sarcophagus dates from the Eighteenth century and was found in Saqqarah: it contains the body of cat belonging to a high priest of Memphis. The rise of the Bast cult accelerated with the designation of Bubastis (Tell Bastra) as his capital by Pharaoh Sheshank from all over Europe, as well as volunteers. The Arabs accuse Britain of fighting against European influence; to them it is a ‘new aggression of the West against the East’ and they regard it on a par with British Imperialism or the Italian war in Abyssinia. There is a certain amount of truth in both claims, because undoubtedly much of the outside criticism of Zionism comes from anti-Semitism and support for Zionism out of sympathy with Jewish victims of Nazi and other oppression in Europe. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the majority of Zionists regard the Arabs in the same way as other colonisers have regarded other ‘native inhabitants’, and it is hardly an answer for the Israeli authorities to claim co-operation from certain Arab tribes, such as the Druses, who have always been on unfriendly terms with other Arabs and inclined towards their enemies. Similar tactics were pursued by the British in India. There is not the slightest question of Jewish superiority in any claims they may make, as for example in the case of the British withdrawal enabled them to bring in thousands of Jewish DP’s and also munitions from all over Europe, as well as volunteers. The Arabs accuse Britain of betraying their interests in withdrawing at the particular time it did (had it withdrawn in 1936, for instance, the Jews could have been militarily defeated by them, since at that time they had no possibility of calling in large-scale immigration from Europe, importing arms from countries like Czechoslovakia, nor had they the thousands of British-trained troops from the war.) On the other hand, the Zionists generally have portrayed Britain as aiding the Arabs on the grounds of the association with Abdullah of Transjordan, and there is a left-wing picture (which is now accepted as truth by all Zionists) of Bevin forcing through pro-Arab policy against the Cabinet’s wish, and being able to call the war off any time he chose. Bevin’s ability to control the Arab States’ policy in regard to Palestine (but not in regard to Egypt or the Sudan!) may he doubted. It is more certain that Britain has played a diplomatic game of keeping in with both sides: influencing the Arab country, by the military missions under Glubb, etc., and relying on the pro-British sentiments of Weizmann and the Social-Democrats on the Jewish side. An alternative theory is pointed out by many: namely, that Britain and America—who are agreed on policy in every country in the world—may be not so much at loggerhead over this one small country as may be imagined. Americ ostensibly and loudly backs the Jewish side and calls on their support in the case of war. This is convenient for whoever may be President (having to placate the New York Jewish vote) and in addition, American influence among European Jewish circles can be considered. On the other hand, Britain ostensibly backs the Arabs—she has ‘traditional friendships’ among the Arab countries, and calls on their support in the case of war. The Jewish vote in this country does not count very highly, and in any case is not generally pro-Zionist. Thus, whoever wins is an ally against Russia for Britain—or America! It cannot be doubted that Palestine may be an important focal point of another war, since Russia has seen the weakness of the Arab countries, and that even such a small body as Palestine Jewry can resist them all, and if it had not been restrained, might not have toppled them all over. Her striking point in a war might well be the oil fields of Iran and with only “Glubb’s Girls” to stop them might soon be in Cairo. The Israeli leaders are well aware of their importance to world politics, and disinclined to give way over hating their territory, to please the Arabs.

Arab refugees: Meanwhile, the most pressing of all post-war problems has received very little notice—namely the displacement of thousands of Arabs from their homes. These thousands became refugees not because of “misleading Arab propaganda” as the Israel Government claims, but because they feared terrorists’ attacks such as that of the Jewish Fascists on Deir Yassin, when a village which had actually not co-operated with and even resisted Arab terrorists, was massacred by Jewish terrorists. As the thousands of Jewish immigrants come in, the Israeli Government can only accommodate them in the deserted Arab cities, and in such towns as Jaffa, transform it completely from an all Arab city to a Jewish city. Before very long, there will simply be nowhere for them to go back to, and having gone, the Israeli Government does not particularly want them back, however it condemned the methods which drove them away. It is futile and unreasonable to blame the Jewish immigrants for this problem of Arab homelessness; they have themselves certainly nowhere else to go, and are naturally bitter at the cynical ease with which Great Powers who deny the great open spaces under their control to settlers, declare that they ought not to go to Palestine but elsewhere. They cannot be expected to stay behind barbed wire and bars until their death, as has been apparently the view of the British Government in its great Cyprus concentration camp experiment (which still goes on). They are no more likely to consider Arab claims than the thousands of Europeans who swarmed to build up America considered the Indians. In spite of all the bunk about peace by settlement and negotiations between the Powers, under the United Nations delusion, the fact is that conflict is in these circumstances inevitable, and victory will certainly go to the strongest side. The Powers are not really interested in any other solution, but are doing their best to use the Palestine struggle as one of the many pawns in the cold war.

No easy solution: As internationalists we ought not to delude ourselves into any other facile solution, but rather to look for hopes that in the future some measure of international co-operation will come about, not between governments or political leaders, but from the people from below, and in the meantime to expose such delusions as those spread by the leaders of all sides in any war. But the major deduction to be drawn from the Palestine conflict is the utter degeneration of Soviet Russia into Czarism, a fact known to anybody with the least perception who witnesses the flight of so many Jews from Europe, but one concealed not least by the Zionist parties who welcome Russian UNO support, and who have in any case a certain vested interest in anti-Semitism. There can be no denying the fact that if conditions were normal and decent in Rumania, Poland, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and the other countries behind the Iron Curtain, there would be no ‘DP problem’: the fact of open and silent pogroms in those countries causes the great exodus from Eastern Europe to the overladen DP camps of Germany and Italy, and the great frights of human cargo leaving the Danubian ports. The Communists may deny responsibility for this, but the fact remains that all opposition to Stalin has been stamped out in those countries and if Stalin so wished, anti-Semitism could not last a minute. It has not been tolerated in Russia for many years because of its identification with and exploitation by the ‘White’ Czarists, but now that Red Czarism is so firmly in the saddle, it is used throughout the Great Russian Empire of Eastern Europe to divide and rule. [Publisher’s note To simplify the subtitle to this volume all articles were attributed to Freedom, whereas some appeared in Freedom’s predecessors: Spain & the World (1936-1939) and War Commentary (1939-1945), both published by Freedom Press and forming part of the Centenary Series.]

18024. Pantazi-Haliassou, Ioanna. Marital Satisfaction And The Domain Of Household Labor In Cypriot Parent And Childless Couples. University Of Maryland College Park. Dissertation. 171pp. AAC 9327479. [Advisor: Brown, Robert] The U.S. literature has consistently reported a decline in marital satisfaction and changes in a number of household labor variables following the arrival of the first child. However, few studies have directly addressed the relationship between the domain of household labor and marital satisfaction. Furthermore, most studies have looked at these variables independently of one another and have not paid sufficient attention to their relative importance in predicting marital satisfaction. This study focused on Cypriot parent and childless couples, a population on which no data on the transition to parenthood, marital satisfaction, and household labor are available. First, parents were compared to childless subjects on division of household labor, satisfaction with the division of labor, and consensus around desired division of labor. Arguments and negative feelings regarding division of labor were also explored. Surprisingly, in contrast to the U.S. literature, parents did not differ from childless subjects on the above variables, except that mothers performed a significantly larger proportion of the household labor than childless women. Second, the impact of these household labor variables on marital satisfaction was examined. Consensus between spouses around desired division of labor was a powerful predictor of mothers’ marital satisfaction accounting for 42% of the criterion variance. Possible explanations included the pervasiveness of household labor in mothers’ lives, mothers’ limited physical and emotional resources, and a need for a sense of togetherness during early motherhood. Satisfaction with division of labor was a significant predictor of only childless women’s marital satisfaction. Childless women (in contrast to mothers) who were dissatisfied with the division of labor may have not perceived the situation as unstable and situation specific, which are relationship-enhancing attributions. Arguments and negative feelings regarding the division of labor accounted for a significant proportion of marital satisfaction for all four subgroups. The above findings were interpreted in light of the U.S. literature, the limited information on Cypriot and Greek couples available, and the author’s personal knowledge of the Cypriot society. Limitations/suggestions for future research and the study’s potential implications were discussed. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.]

Ethiopia: 850000 refugees.

East Timor: 200000 refugees.

Kampuchea: 4 million refugees.

Kosovo: 200000 refugees.

Laos: 1 million refugees.

Lebanon: 1 million refugees.

[Source: Worldwatch Institute, 1983.] [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Cyprus

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

18028. Van Boven, Theo. "Right to Reparation of Victims of Gross Violations of Human Rights: Theo van Boven Refutes Tokyo's Comments: Some Considerations and Factors: Problems and Obstacles, Nationally and Globally", in Peoples Korea, August 5, 1995. p. 8. Limited scope of national laws (refusal on the part of the State to acknowledge responsibility; the operation of amnesty laws; the restrictive attitude of the courts; incapability of groups or individual victims to present and pursue their claims; insufficient economic and financial resources). Large numbers of victims are deprived of any remedial or reparational rights and perspectives. Political convenience and inconvenience as well as the tendency to turn away from the past and to address the future. The application of statutes of limitation; how far should one look into the past for repairing injustices? Responsibility of non-state actors exercising power (for instance the self-proclaimed Serbian republics in Bosnia-Herzegovenia and in Croatia and the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus); what is the role of international law in such cases? [=]

18029. Wockner, Rex. "World Briefs: Cyprus [charges of homosexuality dropped against popular Archimandrite Pangratios Meracis]; in Just Out (Portland), May 17, 1996. p. 5. [TXT]

18030. Women Overcoming Violence. "Resolution By Women From Countries At War: The Following Statement, Signed By Women From Cyprus, Turkey, Serbia, Croatia, Israel, Palestine, South Africa, Russia, And Morocco Was Endorsed By The Conference On Women Overcoming Violence Held In Bangkok, Thailand In 11/1992", in Women In Black Newsletter, Spring 1993. A Resolution By Women from Countries at War

We are women from countries with conflicting interests and countries at war, who have seen bloodshed, the loss of life, and the loss of dignity as a result of racism, sexism, antagonism, and militarism. These have given rise to internal strife, military intervention, or foreign occupation.

We demand that our voice be heard as a condemnation against violence as a means of resolving any problems in a state or between states. We demand an immediate end to the war and violence between opposing sides within our countries and the immediate withdrawal of foreign occupying forces from our countries.

We, victims of violence and war, demand that all differences be resolved through peaceful negotiations, and that every measure be taken for enhancing the quality of life. We shall not support efforts that do not respect human rights or that use violence against people (men or women), whether in their own countries or against other countries. [Chaya Shalom, a Woman in Black from Jerusalem, attended from Israel.] [=]

18031. Zhou Qingchang; She Duanzhi. "Women Ambassadors On Women: Part 02: Myrna Y. Kleopas of Cyprus", in Beijing Review, September 11-17, 1995. pp. 21-22. Myrna Y. Kleopas of Cyprus: Lawyer-Turned Diplomat: Myrna Kleopas, a career diplomat, talks in a fast, tense, and concise manner. She exudes precision, logic and strong will. Before entering the foreign service, she was a lawyer in Famagusta, eastern Cyprus. She lost her job in 1974, when the Turkish forces occupied 37% of Cyprus, including Famagusta.

To support her family, she had to find a new job. At the time the best jobs available were in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "I thought this job suited my ambition and wish to help Cyprus," she recalls. She stayed on and became a permanent member of the ministry. She came to Beijing in November 1993, her first post as ambassador and also the first woman ambassador of her country.

On women's status in Cyprus, Kleopas says, "From a legal point of view, we have achieved quite a lot. Our constitution and laws guarantee equality between the sexes in all fields."

An official report to be submitted to the conference sets out the various measures taken to protect women's interests. The National Machinery for the Advancement of Women, founded in 1988 and reformed in 1994, deals with all matters concerning women, focusing on the elimination of legal discrimination against women and the promotion of of real equality between men and women. This organization operates under the auspices of the Minister of Justice and Public Order, which makes it powerful and effective.

Legal equality, however, is not enough, Kleopas notes. “The attitude of the society and men toward women needs to be changed,” she says, adding, “We need equality in practice.”

The absence of women in decision-making bodies bears witness to the practical inequality of men and women, she reflects. “We have only one woman minister and two women in the House of Representatives,” she explains.

“The decision-making process is very important because it’s there that decisions are made to affect our lives and I think it’s unfair because half of the population is excluded,” she commented.

“We are absent not because we are lesser people, less intelligent, or less hard-working, but because of the attitude of the society,” she adds.

She describes Cyprus as being in a transition from a traditional to a modern society with regard to women. “We have achieved quite a lot in ensuring equal pay for men and women, particularly in the public sector,” she says.

“My philosophy is that every human being should be given the opportunity to develop fully and equally his or her potential,” she emphasizes.

“All human beings are born with potential and this potential should be left to be developed freely,” she adds.

Kleopas says on average Cypriot women do not have many children. “This usually happens when the society becomes rich,” she explains.

“As a woman, I always feel compelled to work harder than my male colleagues in order to prove myself,” she says. “It was my choice, and I like it.”

Brought up in a family with no brothers, she says she was taught to be tough and strong like a man. At the same time, she was reared in a traditional setting to be a mother and wife. “I've always worked, but I have a good relationship with my children,” she says.

“Equality means allowing every individual to develop his or her potential and no impediments on the way because of his or her sex,” she says.

Speaking of which jobs are more suitable for women, she says, “You can't deny your nature, but you can't impose restrictions on your nature as well. It's up to the individual to decide.

Kleopas does not agree with extreme feminism. “Extremity in anything is bad. The Greek philosophers thought about the golden mean,” she says. But she was quick to add, “Maybe sometimes you have to be extreme in order to make people listen to you. Because women have been suppressed for so long, not every one has the opportunity to advance herself. That's why we need the conference and the (women's) movement, and governments need to pay more attention to women.”

"Men still want to hold on to their advantages. Power is sweet, and they don't want to share it with us,” she pointed out.

The woman ambassador does not agree with the view that women should go back to home to take care of children and family. "It's not fair to women,” she says. "But if a woman decides so, that's her free choice and why not? Bringing up our children is a most worthy job,” she adds.

"Who says women's role should be in the house only? Let them decide, but you have to give them opportunities to be able to decide freely,” she emphasizes.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

20000. -------. "Aside: Pop Conference", in Wall Street Journal, September 16, 1994. p. A12. Third World delegates were presenting a very different agenda at the UN Population Conference than one would think in light of the coverage by the Western Media. While the Western Media focused on abortion and empowerment of women, Third World delegates were interested in other issues: arguing poverty not population was the major problem in the Third World; criticizing First World support for failed megaprojects and their accompanying corruption; and (as noted by M.S. Swaminathan of India) Western economic policies that slow economic growth in the Third World by preventing their products from entering First World markets. Kenyan delegate Daniel Mbekar simply thought the First Worlders were obsessed with sexual rights and abortion. [TXT]

20003. -------. "Cairo Court: Professor Must Divorce; Writings Insult Islam, Wife [Nasr Abu Zeid found unfit to be married to Muslim woman; Zeid and his wife of four years Ibtihal Younis teach at Leiden University in Netherlands]", in Seattle Times, August 5, 1996. p. A7. [TXT]

20005. -------. "Egypt Convicts Arab From Israel of Spying", in Seattle Times, September 1, 1997. p. A6. The Egyptian State Security Court sentences Azam Azam to 15 years for intelligence collection on Egyptian intelligence. Prosecutors allege he was recruited as a spy by two Israeli women, Zahra Yousef Kreis andMohia Ahmed Shawahna, after he was seduced by Kreis. Azam is a Druze from Galilee, PM Netanyahu demanded that the trial be ended and charges against Azam be dismissed. [TXT]

20006. -------. "Egypt Court Backs Female Circumcision", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 6, 1997. p. 5. A Cairo court has overturned the law that bans female circumcision being performed in clinics and hospitals. The ban was implemented in 1996 by the Ministry of Health. The court found the ban to be contrary to Islam. A recent study found 97% of Egyptian girls undergo the operation, usually at ten or less.

20007. -------. "Egyptian Court Forces Professor to Divorce for Writings on Islam", in New York Times, August 6, 1996. p. A4. An Egyptian court supported Islamic fundamentalists in their insistence that a university professor and his professor wife must obtain a divorce, due to his writings, which many believe are anti-Islamic. His critics argue that Abu Zeid's writings have made him an apostate. Mohammed Moneib, secretary of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, stated the court ruling was a major blow to Egypt.

20008. -------. "Even in Qana Massacre, the UN Tries to Blame Muslims for Being There!", in Crescent International, September 1-15, 1996. p. 6. In a new report which takes Israel to task for the Qana and other massacres in southern Lebanon in 1996, Amnesty International somehow contrives to blame Hizbullah as well, while another report (The Copts of Egypt edited by Saad Eddin Ibrahim) on Egyptian Copts by the London-based Minority Rights Group devotes space to the discussion of unrelated issues such as female circumcision, which is often broached to give Islam a bad name. Both reports betray a powerful need, perhaps unconscious, to find fault with the Muslim side in any relationship or conflict, even when Muslims are the victims, as in Qana. By contrast, no attempt is made to equate victim and aggressor, when the alleged victim is Christian, Jew or otherwise non-Muslim, and the presumed aggressor is Muslim, as rights reports on southern Sudan or the Indonesian province of East Timor show. The Amnesty report on Qana, published on 7/24/1996, comes down hard on Israel, concluding that the Israeli attack on the UN compound, in which over 100 civilians died, was deliberate and that the UN inquiry into the killings was cursory. A UN report on the same attack would only go as far as saying that it was "unlikely" that the Israelis shelled Qana by mistake. But the UN investigators did not blame Hizbullah fighters for provoking the Israeli attack on the compound while the Amnesty report obliquely does so in obscene disregard of the facts. The Amnesty report condemns the fighters for firing mortars at Israeli troops from close to the Qana compound, saying that they must have realized the danger to civilians sheltering nearby. The UN investigators were convinced the shelling had nothing to do with the alleged firing at Israeli troops near the compound. Their report was watered down because UN secretary general, Boutros Ghali did not want to offend the US at a time when he was seeking a second term as UN chief.

Amnesty report itself established that the attack on the Qana compound was deliberate and not the result of an attempt to fire back at the Hizbullah fighters nearby. To criticize Hizbullah in connection with the massacres is unnecessary and an affront to the memory of the civilian martyrs Amnesty claims to champion. It also confines a degree of credence to Israel's and US president Bill Clinton's position that the shelling of the compound was accidental. But that is not all. The Amnesty report also criticizes Hizbullah for firing rockets into northern Israel, accusing it of violating international law. In fact, even international law, with all its flaws, grants the right of self-defense against external aggression. Lebanon is an independent country recognized by the UN, and Israel's occupation of the south is illegal and defies a host of UN resolutions, including resolution 425 of 4/1978, calling for unconditional withdrawal by Israeli troops. Amnesty is also monstrously wrong to equate the shelling of northern Israel by Hizbullah, using almost harmless katusha rockets, with the murderous bombardment of southern Lebanon by an occupying army, using tanks, warplanes and state of the art weaponry. A similar anti-Muslim bias is revealed in a balfing report on Egypt's Coptic minority, by the London-based Minority Rights Group. Although the report is only 30 pages long (hardly enough space for an overview of Coptic history and an analysis of the place of the Coptic minority in modern Egyptian society) it manages to discuss at length totally irrelevant issues. For example, no less than a fifteenth of the report is devoted to a section called Women's and Girls' Rights, which include expansions on the marriage laws. It is a dull overview which is too cursory to explain what one critic of the report called the Copts: "ambiguous and complex place in modern Egyptian society." Predictably, the publishers suggest in the blurb on the back of the report that the Coptic way of life is today under threat from "Islamic fundamentalism," discussing no other sources of threat. In the words of a recent article in the Middle East International, "both the Coptic and the Muslim ways of life in Egypt...are under threat from western cultural penetration."

The report ends with a number of recommendations, one of which also illustrates its anti-Islamic thrust. The recommendation calls on the State to provide protection for Egyptian Muslims who want to convert to Christianity, an absurd proposal which is unrelated to the condition of the traditional Coptic minority. This failure of "human rights" groups to resist their deeply-seated cultural bias against Islam and Muslims should, perhaps, not come as a surprise. The groups are after all a product of the Western tradition which publicly equates the victims of mass murder in Bosnia and Chechnya, to take only two examples, with the perpetrators of the genocide. [↩]

20009. -------. "Fighting In Hebron Escalates After An Israeli Woman Passed Out Leaflets Depicting the Prophet Muhammad As a Pig [Egypt's top clerics states that insulting the prophet is punishable by death]", in Wall Street Journal, July 2, 1997. p. A1. [TXT]
20010. "First Anniversary of a Mutiny", in Iraqi Review-Weekly English Supplement to Ithihad Al-Shaab, April 30, 1960. p. 10. The "Valley of Two Springs" is the happy description of the town of Mosul, but Nature and politics seem lately to have conspired to make the last two springs Mosul has witnessed a time of tragedy for the city inhabitants.

Last 3/8/1959 saw the rise and fall of Shawaff which cost the people of Mosul many innocent lives. In response to the call of the National Government they rose bare-handed to capture arms and put a speedy end to the Nasser inspired "Shawaff Republic." They considered it their duty to safeguard the Iraqi Republic and defend the honor of the city. Their deeds and sacrifices won nation-wide sympathy and admiration. A delegation of the people came to Baghdad after the suppression of the mutiny had been popularly acclaimed. They met the Premier and he expressed to them his deep appreciation of their courageous acts.

As spring comes north again to Mosul after a winter of mourning the sons of the city who risked their lives in responding to the call of the National Government to suppress the Shawaff mutiny, are being tried by martial courts for having suppressed the mutiny. The charges brought against them carry the death penalty. Such is the terrible irony of events.

Even before Colonel Abdul Wahab al Shawaff declared his "republic" and ran up the flag of the United Arab Republic over his headquarters, these brave patriots had come to Baghdad to express the anxiety of the people of Mosul about the sinister activities going on in their city. A few days before the mutiny they submitted a note to the authorities in Baghdad in which they demanded the purge of the state apparatus, the arrest of conspiratorial elements and an end to the suspicious contacts being made across the Syrian border. They also asked the authorities to take the necessary measures to protect the citizen from the evil forces at work.

These warnings were of no avail. The delegation was politely listened but no measure at all were taken. The Iraqi people sensed what was going on in Mosul, for they have learned from bitter experience that the forces of reaction will never cease their efforts to bring down the Iraqi Republic, so when the peace rally was declared to be held in Mosul (on the Friday before the mutiny) tens of thousands of people thronged to the city from all over Iraq to show their support for the people of Mosul and to serve as a warning to the plotting elements. The trains carrying people to the peace rally were stopped several times on the way and there was a long interruption before they passed through the long tunnel leading to Mosul. It was learned later on that explosives had been placed on the railway line and at the mouth of the tunnel. It was intended that everybody in the train should be killed and this be the signal for the start of the mutiny. But the bombs were discovered in time and were removed. The rally took place and more than a hundred thousand people attended.

There was a chill however in the atmosphere of the city. Shops were closed and few people were in the streets apart from those watching the peace delegation coming from the railway station. Troops were posted to the strategic points in the city. But the plotters had to wait for the delegation to go home before they could start.

The following day an armed but small demonstration of fanatics attacked houses and burned down cafes. This was to provide the necessary provocation. The people of Mosul demonstrated against the local authorities encouragement of the armed bands terrorizing the city. That day, 3/7/1959, as darkness fell in the warm spring weather, Shawaff struck.

Democrats were "invited" to meet the military commander Colonel Al-Shawaff in connection with that day's demonstrations. As they entered the stone castle which was Shawaff's headquarters, they were told that they were under arrest. Patriotic officers and soldiers were arrested in the early hours of the next morning. The next day Shawaff installed a broadcasting station sent from the UAR and declared himself the "leader." He raised the flag of the UAR on his headquarters and called upon the people of Iraq to finish with the "madman ruling Iraq" and to support "Shawaff's Republic."

Meanwhile Radio Damascus made no secret of its stand and broadcast all Shawaff's proclamations, while Nasser hovered expectantly in Syria. But to the shock and disappointment of Nasser all his calculations proved wrong. "Shawaff's Republic" lived for one day only, though they controlled the army units in Mosul and Kirkuk. The Iraqi Premier Abdul Karim Qassim called on the people to kill Shawaff and put down his mutiny and the people of Mosul responded heroically to the call. Bare-handed, together with soldiers, they attacked the arms depots and captured the arms with which they stormed the stone castle, just after two planes from Baghdad had bombarded it. Soldiers from the engineering unit climbed the castle from the back in time to save the Mosul democrats just when their names were being called for execution.

Kamel Kazanch, the prominent Iraqi lawyer and democrat, was murdered just before the castle was stormed. Shawaff was killed as he was running to the military hospital to nurse his wounds caused by the bombing. The back of the mutiny was broken.

The Iraqi peasants from the villages surrounding Mosul played an important part in defending the city from the bedouin hordes of the Shammar, whose Sheikh Ahmed Agil al-Yawar ordered them to support Shawaff and sack the city. "We shall have their money and their women - a town girl and a house." But they could not even enter the city, and had to flee to Syria. When the storm ended and the dust settled, the people of Mosul hoped that their peace would not be disturbed again. But the summer came and their hopes were disappointed and as the spring comes north again the sons of Mosul are being tried for having responded to the call of the national government and defended the Iraqi Republic.

Spring to most people means happiness and joy and a renewal of life but for the people of Mosul this year there hangs the shadow of death over the valley of two springs. [=]

In Hebron, Israeli soldiers near the Ibrahim Mosque reported that they were shot at. After investigations, the army said bombs had been thrown at the patrol. No casualties were reported.

Israel Radio reported that five "wanted" Palestinians escaped to Egypt. [=]

In Nablus, Ragheb Ziyad Aja, 17, died when soldiers shot him in the chest. His body was laid to rest with scores of Palestinians attending the funeral despite the military closure which was imposed on the area. Two other youths were shot and injured in the incidents.

In Gaza, Raed Yusuf Zurob, 17, from Rafah, died and another youth was injured when soldiers shot at allegedly masked youths from the military wing of Islamic Jihad. The two were reportedly writing graffiti on the walls.

In Gaza, hundreds of Gazan children staged a sit-in protest against the killing of children by Israeli troops. In the town of Qabata, gunfire was aimed at an Israeli military encampment.

In Jerusalem, a homemade bomb was discovered and dismantled before exploding.

5/25/93: In the town of Qabata, in the Jenin district, activists fired at a military post. No casualties were reported.

In the Strip, Israeli sources said five "wanted" people and three others who "aided" them were arrested. Weapons were allegedly found with the arrested. Army sources reported that 50 "wanted" people were arrested and 25 others escaped to Egypt since the military siege was imposed on the occupied territories two months ago. Palestinians noted that in just one month - 4/27/93 to 5/27/93 - "16 "wanted" youths were killed by the army.

Curfews were imposed on the city and refugee camp of Khan Yunis and the village of Bani Suhailah in the Strip.

In the town of Qalqiya, in the West Bank, fierce clashes were reported between soldiers and Palestinian civilians. Several houses were raided by the military following the incidents.

Attacks with stones and empty bottles were carried out against military patrols in Tulkarm, Ramallah, Hebron, and the Ramallah village of Ein Arik.

In Nablus, merchants closed their stores to mourn the killing of a youth the day before.

5/26/93: At least two Palestinians were shot and injured by soldiers in the Gaza Strip. Curfew was imposed on the city and Khan Yunis refugee camp, where the army continued searching for "wanted" people.

In Jerusalem, Israeli sources noted that a Fatah cell was arrested. Cell members are charged with tossing Molotovs at the house of former Israeli Minister Ariel Sharon in the Old City.

Also in Jerusalem, Israeli explosive experts dismantled a bomb.

[=]

20014. -------. "Miscellaneous: Feminists Are not Humorless", in Week in Germany, March 19, 1993, p. 6. A blow against the prejudicial notion that feminists are humorless has been struck in Dortmund (North Rhein-Westphalia), where an international women's film festival dedicated to the "subversive power of laughter" began on 3/17/93. The festival, which is taking place for the fourth time, gathers some 90 films and videos that demonstrate, according to the festival organizers, that women can laugh not only about men but also about themselves. Filmmakers from numerous European countries as well as China, Mexico and Egypt, are participants in the festival. [=]

An anonymous important fundamentalist leader in Imbaba, an impoverished section of Cairo, said that the conference may provoke attacks by operatives from other groups willing to die for Islam, because the conference is considered an insult to traditional beliefs. Subjects expected to be covered at the conference concern abortion, family planning and teenage sexuality. Also, the leader said that the conference is an assault against Islam and a policy that is being forced upon people by the United States.

The leader stressed the importance of fundamentalist groups not to carry out any attacks, but meanwhile government officials have been cracking down on fundamentalist groups, in a series of police arrests and mass raids. [TXT]

20018. -------. "New Language of Political Discourse in the West", in Crescent International, February 16-29/1996. p. 6. In western political discourse, an entirely new vocabulary has been developed in which words assume meanings entirely divorced from their regular usage. This Orwellian language is most commonly used in the US, Britain and France. Other western powers are also not above resorting to this devious technique. Such vocabulary is used at appropriate times to evoke the right responses among the largely apathetic masses in the west. Two of the most commonly-used (abused?) terms are the "peace process" and "terrorism." Of the two, the first is much older. This has been applied specifically to the process going on between the zionist State of Israel and the Arab regimes. Naturally, nobody can be against peace. Thus, the process that will bring about peace also cannot be such a bad thing. But what kind of peace is being offered? Clearly, the "peace process" is supposed to bring peace to Israel but not to the victims of Zionism. Israeli troops can even invade another country - Lebanon, for instance - in the name of peace. Lebanese villages are bombarded by Israeli planes and artillery almost daily but far be it for the western mouthpieces to refer to this as "State terrorism.” The "peace process" of the American conception is also now applied to the Balkans where the Bosnian Muslims have been forced to accept the occupation and partition of their country by the Serbs. No such "peace process" was initiated when Iraq occupied Kuwait in 8/1990. Instead, Iraq was ordered to immediately pull its troops out of Kuwait, failing which a horrible war was unleashed against the Iraqi people. Is the occupation of Palestine by the zionists, Bosnia by the Serbs and Kuwait by the Iraqis so very different? Why, then such different prescriptions? The answer lies in what the interests of the US and the west demand. Let us consider the term "international terrorism." According to the dictionary definition, the word terrorism means the use of force or threats to demoralize, intimidate or subjugate, especially for political purposes. Most often, such threats are used against civilians. "International terrorism" means using it on a worldwide scale.

The behavior of Israel and the US would immediately make both of them the greatest terrorist States in the world. Not only do they resort to threats but they also feel no compunction in killing innocent civilians in order to force regimes to alter their policies to suit US/Zionist interests. Israel’s bombardment of Lebanese villages is justified on the pretext that they harbor members of the Islamic resistance who attack Israeli military targets in South Lebanon. Is resistance to foreign occupation a crime? Is the occupation of others’ land justified under any law - western or others? If Iraq could be bombed back into the Stone Age because of its invasion and occupation of Kuwait, why is the Israeli occupation of South Lebanon and Palestine not condemned? The tiny Christian minority in South Sudan is backed by western governments and churches in carrying out attacks against the government of Sudan. Such attacks are naturally never condemned. In 4/1986, US planes bombed Tripoli in Libya, killing more than 100 civilians including the 18-month-old adopted daughter of colonel Muammar Qaddafi. The reason was the bombing of a discotheque in Berlin, allegedly by Libyan agents, in which one American soldier was killed. Information subsequently released by the Bonn ministry of justice completely ruled out Libyan involvement. When asked how he felt about the death of a child, then US president Ronald Reagan gave the flippant reply: "I did not see the adoption papers." Such callous disregard of human life is typical of American rulers. Instead, American television stations reported that the bombing of Libya was "playing well in Peoria," a small town in Illinois. The viewers were expected to believe that "approval" of a small rural community in the middle of nowhere was all that was needed to justify mass murder! The Mujahideen-e Khalq Organization (MKO), a terrorist outfit, offers another example of how western States behave. The MKO openly advocates the violent overthrow of the legitimately-established government in Iran. In pursuit of this aim, it has bombed civilian targets such as passenger buses, trains, mosques and crowded shopping malls. Thousands of innocent civilians have been the victims of its vicious campaign. The MKO, based in Baghdad, the Iraqi capital, has publicly admitted to carrying out such attacks.

Anyone linked with Iraq is denounced by the US but not the MKO terrorists. US lawmakers are staunch supporters of the MKO as are British parliamentarians. These people cry hoarse if an operation is carried out against the zionist occupiers of Palestine but applaud every terrorist act of the MKO. The US even surpassed its own criminal record when the congress approved, in 11/1995, an additional $20 million for a CIA covert program to destabilize the government of Iran. The CIA is well-known for its criminal activities worldwide. Here was public admission by members of the congress to destabilize and, therefore, help overthrow a legitimate government in another part of the world. Can one imagine the outcry in the west if a Muslim country were to propose the destabilization of the US by supporting a campaign of bombings and assassinations? A number of other words and expressions are similarly used to convey a specific political meaning. Here is a sample. Moderate: This refers to any regime or ruler who is subservient to the US and the west in general. These are usually the most oppressive regimes in the world. Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia fall under this category. Stability: This term is used to prevent the removal, even though western-style elections, of a pro-western government. Thus, the destabilization of the popularly-elected government in Iran is supported by the US but the removal of the Algerian junta is opposed. Similarly, demand for the removal of the House of Saud in the Arabian Peninsula is opposed under the pretext that it would lead to “instability.” Democracy: This is another favorite word but its application is limited to those governments which are not in the good books of the west. There are no demands for democracy in Bahrain, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia or Algeria. Nigeria and Mayanmar (Burma), on the other hand, must show respect for democracy. Minority Rights: The western countries do not respect the rights of minorities in their midst but insist that countries around the world (meaning Muslim), must respect the rights of theirs, especially Christians. There are no longer any Jewish minorities in the world now that the Soviet Union has disintegrated and all the Russian Jews have flooded into Palestine. Christian minorities in Nigeria and Sudan are talked about often as being “oppressed.” The Coptic minority in Egypt, which controls important sectors of the Egyptian society, is mentioned but only in the context of denigrating the Islamic movement. While the rights of the majority in Egypt are never mentioned because they oppose the oppressive regime of Husni Mubarak, the Coptic minority’s interests must be protected! Freedom of Expression: This refers to the west’s right to abuse Islam but not the right of the Muslims to defend themselves. Even in the value-free societies of the west, there are limits on freedom of speech. This applies specifically to restricting any discussion of the inordinate influence the Jewish minority wields in these societies. In the politically-correct environment, one must not even refer to a woman as chairperson but “chairwoman.” Such sensitivity is strikingly missing when referring to Muslims. In fact, “terrorism” and Muslims have become interchangeable words. [-]

20019. ------. “News in Brief: Africa: Shaikh of Al-Azhar Upholds Divorce of Nasr Abu Zeid”, in Crescent International, September 1-15, 1996. p. 2. Mohamed Sayyed Tantawi, the shaikh of Al-Azhar, said on 8/22/1996 that an Egyptian court was right to divorce university professor Nasr Abu Zeid on grounds of apostasy. The only way back for Abu Zeid was to renounce his writings in public, shaiikh Tantawi told the London-based Saudi Arabic newspaper al-Hayat. Abu Zeid and his wife, fellow academic Ibtihal Younis, have fled to the Netherlands. [-]

20020. ------. “Population: Children, Burden or Blessing?”, in Middle East, June 1, 1993. pp. 23-25. Egypt's 55 million population will double in 28 years and the country's resources are already stretched to the maximum. Yet tradition, religion and ignorance are resistant to controlling the coming explosion. The status symbol of a large family still holds sway in the Arab world. Improved health care has lowered infant mortality, adding to the problem. The Mufti of Egypt has ruled birth control and family planning as acceptable but many fundamentalists disagree, and family planning personnel have been murdered. The International Planned Parenthood Federation has a policy of encouraging sheikhs to promote the idea of economic and social security for women to the forefront of the debate. The world population of 5.7 billion is seen growing to 8-12 billion in 2050 depending on the population strategy adopted. Nafis Sadik, head of the UN Population Fund (UNFPA) states: “Women are at its center and their empowerment is its key”. The UN proposed program includes: counteracting social and family pressures and lack of reproductive choices; to persuade men to assume more parental responsibility; to combat a widespread preference for male children; to make abortion legally available; and open the doors of education and employment to poor and subjugated women. Many Third World delegates see the thrust of the conference as blaming the Third World for the environmental excesses of the First World.

20022. ------. “The Politics of Population”, in Seattle Times, September 1, 1994. pp. A1, A14-A15. Next week almost all the nations of the world will meet in Cairo at the UN Population Conference to develop a new world population policy. Women’s groups have lobbied hard to bring the idea of economic, social and environmental security for women to the forefront of the debate. The world population of 5.7 billion is seen growing to 8-12 billion in 2050 depending on the population strategy adopted. Nafis Sadik, head of the UN Population Fund (UNFPA) states: “Women are at its center and their empowerment is its key”. The UN proposed program includes: counteracting social and family pressures and lack of reproductive choices; to persuade men to assume more parental responsibility; to combat a widespread preference for male children; to make abortion legally available; and open the doors of education and employment to poor and subjugated women. Many Third World delegates see the thrust of the conference as blaming the Third World for the environmental excesses of the First World.

20028. ------. “The Virgin in Cairo [actress Vivian Acosta won the prize for best performance in the Seventh International Experimental Theater Festival of Cairo with the monologue La Virgen Triste (The Sad Virgin)]; she went on to tour Spain, which was organized by the Latin American Center for Theatrical Creation & Research (CELCIT)”, in Granma International (Havana), February 28, 1996. p. 11. [TXT]

20029. ------. “US Presses For Abortion Language In UN Plan”, in Daily World (Aberdeen), April 7, 1994. p. B3. The Clinton Administration is pushing the UN to include explicit support for abortion in a draft UN document that seeks to outline a plan for stabilizing world population. The 20-year draft plan has come under fire by anti-abortion and Roman Catholic groups. The document will be presented for adoption at the UN International Conference on Population & Development in Cairo, 9/1994. The draft calls for stabilizing world population at 7.8 billion in 2050; the present rate of population growth would lead to a population of 12.5 billion

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
in 2050. [TXT]

20030. --------. "United States Senate OKs Palestinian Aid, Trims Help For Ex-Soviets", in Seattle Times, July 16, 1994. p. A4. The United States senate has approved an aid plan that include: $80 million for Palestinians; $539 million for former Soviet states ($61 million below Administration request); $150 million for Ukraine, $75 million for Armenia, and $50 million for Georgia; Israel will receive $2.1 billion; $802 million for Sub-Saharan Africa, $359 million for Eastern Europe and $450 million for international family planning assistance. Two amendments required $30 million of aid to former Soviet states to be used for police training and FBI assistance in crime fighting in the states. An additional amendment would terminate aid to Russia if all Russian troops are not withdrawn from the Baltics, or an agreement for withdrawal, is not concluded by 8/31/1995. [TXT]

20031. --------. "Vatican May Alter Condom Stance", in Seattle Times, September 3, 1994. p. A5. Vatican delegates to the UN Population Conference may not object to the use of condoms to prevent the spread of AIDS. The Vatican has opposed use of condoms for birth control. One diplomatic source speculated that the Vatican wants to focus its energy on its opposition to abortion. [TXT]

20032. --------. "World Watch: ILO Combats Worldwide Child Labor", in UFW Action, September-October 1996. p. 24. ILO estimates that there are more than 73 million children, more than 13% of all children aged 10-14, involved in child labor. There is no count of girls employed in domestic work fulltime, but with such an addition, the number of child laborers would be in the hundreds of millions. Labor organizations, such as AFL-CIO, argue for use of trade agreements such as GATT and the Caribbean Basin Initiative to regulate child labor. The AFL-CIO and National Consumers League support legislation to restrict import of products made with child labor and support the RUGMARK labeling program to certify that carpets made in India were not made with child labor. ILO is planning to increase its technical support to a number of countries to bring national laws on child labor into line with international standards through its International Program on the Elimination of Child Labor (IPEC); the countries to be assisted include: Bolivia, Cameroon, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, and Venezuela. [TXT]

20033. --------. Editorial: "New Path To Stability Is World Goal In Cairo; The New Policy Is Based on the Simple, But Compelling Notion That a Healthy, Educated Woman Is More Likely To have Fewer Children", in Seattle Times, September 6, 1994. p. B4. The Clinton Administration's activism at the Cairo UN Population Conference is the paradigm of its approach to the world issues. The new policy would 'place women at the center'. However, without 'new foreign aid dollars from legislators back home, consensus in Cairo will be little more than a wish meaning, but hollow gesture to millions of women and families around the world.'

20034. --------. Editorial: "Land Mines Great Killers of the Innocent; The UN Estimates That Up To 110 Million Mines in 64 Countries Could Explode At A Miststep", in National Catholic Reporter, February 16, 1996. p. 40. An estimated 3-6 million landmines threaten UN peacekeepers in Bosnia: Bosnia has the second largest number of mines in place, led only by Cambodia with 10 million mines in place (142 per square miles). There are some 500 victims of landmines per week worldwide, and up to 110 million landmines may be in place worldwide. The International Campaign to Ban Landmines estimates that even if not one more landmine were to be emplaced, the mines in place would continue to maim for decades. Mines are now produced and exported by 56 countries: major exporters include China and Russia, with production rising in countries such as Iran, Egypt, Pakistan and Singapore. Mines are cheap and deadly, and very often profitable. Mines cost $3-30, but cost $300-1000 to remove: some $70 million per year is being spent to remove approximately 100000 mines, as governments and rebels emplace several million more mines each year. While a temporary ban forbids

US exports, the Pentagon is lobbying for increased exports and is a heavy user of landmines. Pope John Paul II condemned landmines for their 'veritable slaughter' of children on World Peace day, but political leaders such as Pres. Clinton, long silent on this issue, must lead. [TXT]

20035. --------. Press Release: Stop the UN's Killer Population Conference. S.L.: August 24, 1994. The one-worldists who run the United Nations are preparing for a mass in the final international population conference: the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), which is formally titled, is to set the stage for an intensified campaign to drastically reduce population levels, especially in the developing sector. The Cairo conference is also designed to further consolidate the United Nations' emergence as a global government, a new Roman imperium that will rule with savage brutality over the shards of former nation-states, and reduce their living standards to the level of animals. The ICPD is based on the same contempt for human life that drove Hitler's extermination camps. Its fundamental premise, namely, that the world has a finite "carrying capacity" (an idea first developed by eighteenth-century Venetian Giammaria Ortes and popularized by Great Britain's Thomas Malthus) which can support only a limited number of people, has absolutely no scientific basis. Yet the implementation of this fraud means that billions of people must die to meet the ICPD's population goals. The Cairo conference draft document seeks to destroy the institution of the family, the foundation of human society, under the guise of sexual freedom and "women's empowerment." It aims to slash population growth rates to zero over the next decades through the rampant spread of abortion, sterilization, and euthanasia. And it proposes to meet the developing sector's desperate need for economic development by cynically foisting the hoax of "sustainable development"--an economic model whose sole purpose is to suppress the industrial and agricultural development necessary for supporting life. Pope John Paul II has stated publicly that he has "grave concerns" about the Cairo draft document, and has warned that "what is at stake" at the conference "is the very future of humanity." The pontiff has charged that "certain basic ethical principles," including respect for the rights of the unborn and the importance of the family, are "contradicted" by the proposals put forth in the program that has been drafted by the UN bureaucracy, and that the conference's Malthusian premises jeopardize the "very future of humanity." "There is reason to fear," he has said, "that [the draft document] could cause a moral decline resulting in a serious setback for humanity, one in which man himself would be the first victim." The African Academy of Sciences has also challenged the draft document for the Cairo event, asserting that, "For Africa, population remains an important resource for development, without which the continent's national resources will remain latent and unexplored." For certain parts of Africa, infertility, overpopulation, "is a major problem." From the United States, economist Lyndon H. LaRouche, who has repeatedly demonstrated in such locations as the book, [There Are No Limits To Growth], that Malthusianism is a fraud implementation of this fraud means that billions of people must die to allowed to occur. As Pope John Paul II rightly stressed, the Cairo draft document represents a direct threat to the continued existence of mankind. All individuals and institutions who uphold the principle of the sacredness of human life must rally to shut down the ICPI. The Egyptian government, which is hosting the conference, must be convinced to withdraw its invitation. What humanity desperately needs at this critical juncture is an ecumenical alliance which will defend human life, which is under assault from all sides, and which will help to institute the kinds of economic and social policies required to support increasing numbers of people at an improving standard of living. An international conference on the dignity of man, that would bring together people of goodwill who wish to fight for a better future for humanity, would provide an excellent starting point for reversing the culture of death which has gripped our institutions. The serpent's head of neo-Malthusianism and "free market" economics must be crushed once and for all. Instead, we must build societies based on the principle that man is made in the image of God, and that each child born into this world is a gift, whose unlimited potential for good must be nurtured. It must be recognized that the starvation, illness, conflict, and despair that are all too common in our world are not the consequence of "overpopulation," as the neo-Malthusians behind Cairo would have us believe. Nor are they inevitable. They stem in large part from deliberate decisions made by people—not some depersonalized, disembodied "market forces." For example, the structural adjustment policies of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank have wreaked havoc, especially in the Third World and the former Soviet sphere, destroying the basis for productive activity, and thereby creating an apparent "overpopulation" crisis. The orgy of speculation which has dominated the world economy over the past two decades and brought it to the brink of total collapse was not the work of an "invisible hand," but the conscious policy of international financial networks. In reality, despite endless amounts of propaganda to the contrary, there is no "overpopulation" problem. The history of man's development has depended on both increases in his numbers, and increases in his power over nature. Those who propose to reduce the world's population by billions are actually proposing to send humanity back to the Stone Age. The world actually faces a massive depopulation crisis in the immediate future, as the direct result of the anti-natalist campaigns of the last twenty years. This holds as true for many countries in Africa, which are supposedly the most overpopulated, but where, in fact, population density is far smaller than in Europe, as it does for the industrialized countries and the former Soviet sphere, where the lack of children has created a demographic imbalance that is driving the growing international euthanasia movement.

New World Empire: The Cairo event must be stopped not simply because of its anti-family, anti-population orientation. It must also be stopped because it is part and parcel of a larger gameplan to make the United Nations the centerpiece of a new world empire. Lyndon LaRouche has situated the Cairo meeting in the context of a shift in overall UN policy that began in 1982. "[W]e are actually moving into a phase where we can say that there is (virtually) a United Nations World Empire," said LaRouche. "We now have a United Nations which is moving closer and closer to what people like Bertrand Russell and H.G. Wells and so forth ... wanted back in the beginning ... a United Nations world dictatorship." Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the UN and a prime mover behind the Cairo population conference, typifies the type of individual set to administer this brave new world. He comes from a wealthy Egyptian family, whose intimate ties with British imperialism extend back to his grandfather, Boutros Pasha, who signed the Anglo-Egyptian treaty of 1899 which formally established British rule over Egypt and Sudan. Culling the 'Human Herd': Under this UN dictatorship, the nation-state will disappear, and the world will be turned into one large "game park," in which "park rangers"—in the person of UN blue helmets—will cull out the "undesirable" and "excess" populations from the "human herd." This is the real content of the UN's "family planning for all" crusade that is supposed to be endorsed at Cairo. The UN has already put this plan into action in select areas of the world, such as Bosnia, where UN forces—and Boutros-Ghali himself—have been bitterly denounced because of the genocidal destruction of the Bosnian people.
one-half; and infant mortality was cut nearly in half. In Bangladesh, where half of program funding for family planning and maternal and child health, the average number of births per mother has dropped from 7.0 to 4.2 since 1970, and infant deaths dropped from 200 87/1000 between 1970-1993. A new project in India’s largest state is working with indigenous nongovernmental organizations using social marketing techniques to reduce fertility by doubling the use of modern contraception over a ten-year period. In the Philippines, contraceptive prevalence has increased from 20% to 25% between 1988 and 1993, and delivery of child survival services has increased dramatically, with immunization rates increasing from 65% in 1989 to 90% in 1993. USAID assistance in Egypt has contributed to a 26% decline in total fertility rates, from 5.3 in 1979 to 3.9 in 1992. USAID and other donor assistance has supported an even more dramatic 53% decline in Egyptian infant mortality rates from 1983 to 1992. In Jordan, a national birth spacing plan, developed by the National Population Commission with USAID funding, was recently approved by the government. USAID assistance has reached the grassroots level and is helping 270 pharmacies to provide family planning devices to couples in their neighborhoods. USAID, as the principal donor supporting family planning activities in Morocco, has contributed to a 32% decline in the total fertility rate, from 5.9 in 1979 to 4.2 in 1992. Over the same time frame, the infant mortality rate declined from an estimated 89 deaths per 1000 live births to 57, and contraceptive prevalence has increased from approximately 19% to 41.5%. USAID was one of the principal donors to alert Yemen to its impending population crisis and to encourage it to develop and implement a population strategy and action plan. [–]

20038. AID. Congressional Presentation, FY 1995; Part 099: Asia and Near East: FY1995 Sustainable Development Request: Introduction: Building Democracy. District of Columbia: AID, February 28, 1994. The burgeoning populations in the Asia and Near East region are placing greater demands on the governments. The demands are for increased government accountability and transparency, greater citizen participation in national and local development, increased respect for the rule of law and human rights, especially among women and minority groups, and regular elections to enforce accountability. USAID's democracy program seeks to promote and strengthen democratic institutions and processes in the region. Programs supporting fiscal decentralization in the Philippines have resulted in internal revenue allotments to local governments increasing seven-fold from 1989-1993 and Private Voluntary Organization (PVO) representation on local government planning boards. In Mongolia, Nepal, Bangladesh, and Cambodia, political institutions including political parties, parliamentary staff, and the legal staff, have received training in how to function in support of operational democracy. Innovative programs in clinical legal services and mediation and arbitration have been supported, as well as traditional electoral assistance. A number of the region's countries have had their first successful (i.e. relatively peaceful and honest) democratic elections in recent years; USAID has provided electoral assistance to several. USAID institutional support to increase the capacity of the parliaments in Yemen, Egypt, Jordan, Tunisia and Lebanon is resulting in their becoming a focal point for political reform. Assistance to enhance the capacity of trade unions has enabled them to participate effectively in the formulation of national policies and to represent worker’s interests. [–]

USAID assistance is crucial to support Egypt's moderating role in the Middle East and to help Egypt confront political and economic problems which could endanger its stability. Assistance supports the historic Camp David peace accord between Egypt and Israel.

USAID SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT GOALS AND MISSION STRATEGIC OBJECTIVES (MSOs):

1) Broad-Based Economic Growth: Improved Macroeconomic Performance. USAID policy reform programs promote macro-economic stability and structural change in the agriculture, trade, fiscal, and the financial sectors which are essential to sustain broad-based growth, along with privatization to encourage investment. Institutional and price reforms in infrastructure and social sectors assist the Government of Egypt's cost recovery and sustainability efforts, reduce its budget deficit, and provide a base for increased production and growth. USAID expects investment as a percentage of gross domestic product (GDP) to increase from 26% in 1992 to 33% in 1997, while the fiscal deficit will decline from 20% to 3.5% during the same period. Through regional programs, Egypt participates in activities which promote economic, scientific and technical collaboration. Increased Private Investment and Trade. USAID has targeted specific policy reforms and projects which encourage and support increased private investment and trade within a market-oriented framework. USAID will contribute to diversifying the number of financial market instruments from 4-6, deepening and broadening the stock exchange from LE 600 million to LE 6 billion ($1 equals approximately LE 3.38), increasing the number and types of financial intermediaries, and privatizing 23 commercial banks. The number of micro, small and medium enterprises receiving otherwise inaccessible credit will increase from the current level of 22,500 to at least 80,000 by 1997. The new lending institutions set up to provide this credit will achieve financial self-sustainability within two years of the first credit extension. By 1997, 56 state-owned enterprises will be privatized (from a base of zero in 1992), with a total book value of at least $560 million. The International Executive Service Corps of retired American volunteers will have benefited 1,250 Syrian clients by 1997 (from a 1992 base of 800). In addition, the Commodity Import Program will encourage trade by increasing access to US goods and technology. Increased Production, Productivity and Incomes in the Agriculture Sector. USAID efforts will increase agriculture production and incomes, in part by liberalizing product and input markets. For example, the private sector will market 100% of all fertilizer by 1997, from a baseline of zero in 1990. Sector policy reform will continue improving incentives for production and marketing. Cropping pattern restrictions will be reduced to zero. All remaining price and marketing controls will be removed. USAID will also contribute to the development and adoption of improved technologies in production, processing and marketing for agriculture products, and will increase the efficiency of irrigation water use. Improved economic incentives and provision of technologies will increase the yields of the major agricultural commodities by an additional 5%-15% by 1997, continuing the substantial productivity increases realized since 1989.

Improved Maternal and Child Health. USAID emphasizes improved access to higher quality preventive services for maternal and child health. USAID is placing special importance on improved pre-natal and peri-natal care as well as combating acute respiratory infections and other infectious diseases. USAID efforts will contribute to a drop in the infant mortality rate from 61.5 (1990) to 37 (1997), and a decrease in the child mortality rate from 24.8 to 17. The maternal mortality ratio will drop from 184 (1992) to 130 (1997). USAID is also trying to improve the sustainability of the health care system through its efforts on health financing. For example, the percentage of Egyptians covered by health insurance schemes will rise from 16% in 1993 to 35% in 1997.

3) Building Democracy: Democracy and Participation. USAID's governance and democracy strategy recognizes the central importance of strengthened democratic systems to sustainable development. The strategy emphasizes support to Egypt's legislature, judiciary, and professional and community organizations to enable these institutions to become more responsible participants in governance. As USAID's current strategy evolves, assistance will be provided to the legislature and judiciary to strengthen their capacities to administer the legal functions of governance. USAID is still working on the formulation of its strategic objective and has not yet established performance indicators and targets.

4) Protecting the Environment: Adoption of Water and Air

==============================================================================
Protection Practices. The strategy focuses on the adoption of air and water pollution prevention practices directly through project assistance and indirectly through pricing reforms which reduce the demand for commodities or services injurious to the environment. For example, USAID has targeted annual increases in the price of electricity to reach 100% of long-run marginal cost (LRMC) by 1997. USAID has also targeted increases in the price of water of 30% per annum and an annual percentage increase of 60% in the wastewater tariffs in selected cities. Infrastructure projects increase access to potable water and sanitation services in urban areas and other projects address energy conservation and other measures that lead to clean air. USAID will avert the number of metric tons (MT) of pollutants entering the Nile and Lake Maryut from 81,000 MT in 1993 to 265,000 MT in 1997. USAID is still collecting and identifying air quality data and will then set targets for achievement. Egypt benefits from regional activities which address the problem of desertification and water issues in the region.

USAID MISSION RESULTS:

1. Broad-Based Economic Growth: Improved Macroeconomic Performance. Multi-donor economic policy reform, with major support from USAID, has helped the Government of Egypt (GOE) unify exchange rates, liberalize interest rates, reduce tariffs, eliminate most non-tariff barriers to trade, cut the budget deficit from about 20% of gross national product (GNP) to 4.7% of GNP, reduce inflation, and build up substantial international resources. Increased Private Investment and Trade. USAID funding in power has resulted in the installation and rehabilitation of over 400 of Egypt's total generating capacity and the reduction of subsidies. USAID financed equipment and technology has also resulted in reliable telephone service to over 7 million people in Cairo and Alexandria. Economic infrastructure of this type is essential to private investment and trade. The number of micro, small and medium enterprises accessing credit for the first time grew from 600 in 1990 to 22,500 in 1994 as a result of two new private sector foundations, one commercial bank, and a new private credit guarantee corporation. Three state-owned enterprises have actually been sold with more than 20 brought onto the market for sale over 1993–1994. Over 750 private Egyptian firms have been exported more than 1000 different commodities from 1400 US manufacturers and suppliers from 46 states valued in total at approximately $1 billion since 1986. Increased Production, Productivity and Incomes in the Agriculture Sector. USAID efforts in agriculture have resulted in increased yields of between 30%-40% between 1986-1992 for cereal grains, and replacement of 19,000 irrigation structures reducing water loss for 2 million farmers. Improved Maternal and Child Health. USAID assistance has helped reduce the infant mortality rate by approximately 50% from 1977, saving 80,000 lives each year.

2. Utilizing Population Growth: Increased Level and Effective Use of Contraceptive Methods. Almost 50% of Egyptian couples are now using contraceptives and the total fertility rate has fallen to 3.9 births per woman from a level of 5.3 births in 1980.

3. Building Democracy: Democracy and Participation. Earlier USAID efforts in local governance and participation provided over 16,000 grants to rural village and urban areas. These grants financed the construction of water, wastewater, road improvements, and renovated schools and clinics in 26 governorates. The basic services provided under these activities benefited over 45 million people. As USAID's democracy strategy is implemented, it will focus on promoting greater transparency and accountability in government and increased participation. Initial efforts will focus on improving the efficiency of Egypt's judicial and legal institutions and improving the impartial delivery of legal and judicial services.

4. Protecting the Environment: Adoption of Water and Air Protection Practices. USAID assistance is rehabilitating and expanding urban water and wastewater systems in Cairo and other major cities, directly benefiting 22 million people. USAID-financed industrial energy conservation activities are protecting air quality by reducing toxic emissions.

OTHER FY 1995 USAID-MANAGED ACTIVITIES:

OTHER DONORS: In 1993, the United States, with about 42% of bilateral contributions, was the largest bilateral donor. Other leading donors are the World Bank, IMF, Japan, Italy, Germany, France, and the Abu Dhabi Fund.

FY 1995 PROMOTING PEACE REQUEST: The Administration requests $816.7 million in Promoting Peace funds, of which $815 million is to promote Egypt's long-term economic growth and $1.7 million is support from regionally funded activities which benefit Egypt. Sustainable Development funds of $4,029 million from regionally funded activities will support GOE's broad-based economic growth ($630,000); population ($3.299 million); and environment ($100,000). [USAID/Cairo Mission Director: Henry Bassford.] [ ]

20040. AID. Statement of the Administrator to the Congress of the United States; Congressional Presentation Fiscal Year 1994: Part 12: AID Program Summary; FY 1994 Budget: Special Assistance Initiatives. District of Columbia: AID, April 1993. The Special Assistance Initiatives (SAI) program first requested in FY 1990 provides funding for the US contribution to the Philippines Multilateral Assistance Initiative (MAI) and for support of the democratic evolution in Eastern Europe. For FY 1994, AID is requesting a total of $448,951,000 -- $40, million for the MAI and $408,951,000 for Eastern Europe. The FY 1993 appropriation included $40, million for the MAI and $400, million for Eastern Europe.

1. Central and Eastern European Program: As noted above, the need for continued support for the transition to democracy and market economies in this region remains a key foreign assistance priority for FY 1994. Environmental degradation continues to undermine the quality of life in the region, and economic adjustments continue to place increasing numbers of people in need of social assistance. Finally, the Yugoslav war and related sanctions are creating suffering, not only in the former republics of Yugoslavia, but also in neighboring countries. US assistance to date has played an important part in the transitions taking place. In the Czech Republic, for example, US-financed investment advisors have helped the government garner $1.5 billion in US investment commitments over the past year. In Poland, the Polish-American Enterprise Fund and other programs have facilitated the rapid growth of the private sector, which now accounts for over one-half of Poland's GDP. Assistance to democratic parties in Albania helped them level the playing field for the 3/1992 elections. Fertilizer shipped to Albania both increased yields, thus reducing needed food imports, and helped develop a network of private agricultural input dealers. The $408,951,000 SAI request for Eastern Europe for FY 1994 will be used principally for democratic strengthening, economic restructuring, and quality of life activities.

2. Multilateral Assistance Initiative for the Philippines: The $40, million requested for the FY 1994 US contribution to the multi-donor Multilateral Assistance Initiative will permit continued support for economic and policy reform objectives aimed at stimulating market-based growth and supporting infrastructure growth.

3. Humanitarian Aid to the New Independent States (Former Soviet Union): For FY 1994, $703,820,000 is requested for humanitarian and technical assistance for the New Independent States. The FY 1993 appropriation was $417, million. Two revolutions have shaken the former republics of Yugoslavia, but also in neighboring countries. US assistance to date has played an important part in the transitions taking place. In the Czech Republic, for example, US-financed investment advisors have helped the government garner $1.5 billion in US investment commitments over the past year. In Poland, the Polish-American Enterprise Fund and other programs have facilitated the rapid growth of the private sector, which now accounts for over one-half of Poland's GDP. Assistance to democratic parties in Albania helped them level the playing field for the 3/1992 elections. Fertilizer shipped to Albania both increased yields, thus reducing needed food imports, and helped develop a network of private agricultural input dealers. The $408,951,000 SAI request for Eastern Europe for FY 1994 will be used principally for democratic strengthening, economic restructuring, and quality of life activities.

4. Cross-cutting Initiatives: (a) Economic Restructuring. AID will continue to help NIS countries implement policies needed to create market-based financial stability. Technical assistance in fiscal and financial sector reform is improving tax administration and developing comprehensive economic policy reform; training of bankers will be expanded to help develop financial and monetary payments systems necessary for market economies. (b) Private Sector Development. Structural priorities include ending massive subsidies to state enterprises, converting defense industry to civilian purposes, promoting small businesses to empower a middle class and provide employment, and supporting agribusiness development. AID’s technical assistance has supported a major privatization program in Russia. In policy development, experts are reinforcing NIS privatization strategies, supporting development of securities and commodity exchanges, and of legal and regulatory systems. Market-oriented, economy-wide policies will be promoted through business centers and training. US agribusiness associations will work with NIS partners to support private agribusiness and increase food production. (c) Democratic Institution Building. AID is helping NIS governments transform their legal frameworks to systems based upon the rule of law, free and fair elections, an independent media and competent local governments. Training and technical assistance are being provided in political party development, training of lawyers and judges, drafting of laws and constitutions, and improved management and administrative skills for local government officials. Independent media centers will improve access to information and modern technology for print, radio and television journalists.

(4) Sector Initiatives. (a) Energy. Dramatic improvements are needed in the efficiency of production and consumption, energy sector policies, and in the operational safety of nuclear power plants. Needed improvements in fire and operational safety procedures have been identified at nuclear power plants in Ukraine and Russia; and, through the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and Department of Energy, advisers will improve emergency response capabilities, operational controls and regulatory systems. New technologies will promote more efficient gas, oil and coal production and delivery systems. Ongoing pricing, policy and institutional reform helps develop market-driven approaches to supply and demand. (b) Environment. Through policy dialogue, as well as partnerships between local and US NGOs and business, AID is seeking to promote price-sensitive use of natural resources and enhance environmental quality. A joint US-World Bank review of environmental policy reform and investment priorities in Russia will facilitate a planned $200 million IBRD environmental loan. Advisers are developing recommendations to reduce constraints to privatization from environmental liabilities, and experts are assisting economic, environmental and natural resources ministries and legislatures to improve environmental management. (c) Housing. AID is providing critical technical assistance to help create a private market for housing. With AID’s assistance, local governments in Russia and Kazakhstan are reducing housing subsidies while developing targeted support programs for the needy. US-funded pilot projects for privatized management and maintenance of public housing are under way in Russia and a demonstration project for a private mortgage banking system in Russia is planned. Placement of advisers in additional municipalities in NIS will expand current efforts to develop market-based rent and utility pricing and privatization of management and construction. An officer resettlement initiative will facilitate the resettlement of Russian officers returning to Russia. (d) Health. The NIS needs modern medical technology, restoration of its pharmaceutical production capacity, population assistance and rationalization of health care financing. Vaccine production facilities are being improved through training and technical assistance from FDA. Private US manufacturers are reviewing vaccine facilities for potential investment. Twenty hospital partnerships between US and NIS health care institutions are improving clinical programs and management systems. Expanded efforts are planned to improve health financing systems and to develop a women’s health initiative, with a focus on family planning. (e) Emergency and Humanitarian Assistance. The living standards of the peoples of NIS have plummeted rapidly and will improve only gradually. However, ensuring protection of those groups which are the hardest hit by economic contraction, political instability, and fraying basic social services is in our political and humanitarian interest. While continuing to respond to emergency supply needs, AID will increase its emphasis on building NIS early warning systems and emergency response capabilities through indigenous humanitarian organizations and local governments. (f) Exchanges and Training. AID’s programs offer NIS citizens the opportunity for exposure to US culture, business systems, management principles, free-market economics and democratic principles, as well as training for specific skill needs. Networks of US business groups, nongovernmental organizations and NIS counterparts are exchanging information and visits. An expanded exchanges and training project will bring several thousand NIS citizens to the US for a wide range of activities such as secondary school exchanges, sister universities, academic training, short-term small-tree technical training, and private business meetings.

(5) Economic Support Fund (ESF) The FY 1994 request level for ESF is $2,582, million compared to the FY 1993 appropriated level of $2,670, million (excluding the separate appropriation of $19,704,000 for the International Fund for Ireland). ESF is allocated for a number of purposes: base rights or access rights agreements and other broader foreign policy concerns, such as peacekeeping and support for democratization. AID manages ESF under the foreign policy guidance of the State Department and, to the maximum extent feasible, the use of ESF conforms to the basic policy directions underlying development assistance. ESF finances commodity import programs and balance of payments and economic stabilization programs, the latter frequently in a multidonor context. Major ESF programs continue in Israel, Egypt, Central America and Turkey. ESF assistance to Latin America has supported growth-oriented policies in Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua and funds for the Andean Counterdrug Initiative. Much of ESF is projectized within the framework of sustainable development where stronger links to policy performance are beginning to pay some dividends in countries such as Egypt. Some ESF for Latin America, Eastern Europe, the New Independent States and the Asia also supports sustainable development objectives. Projects in support of our democracy program have been closely coordinated with the State Department, resulting in successful efforts to achieve democratic objectives within an overall framework of sustainable development.

(6) P.L. 480 Food for Peace As noted earlier, although the P.L. 480 Food for Peace program is administered by the Agency, funding is appropriated under the Agriculture Act and therefore is not included in the AID program request. Food assistance responds to an immediate critical need, is a valuable and major component of AID resources directed toward sustainable development, and helps the US economy through export of US agricultural products to countries who will become greater farming partners. Under the FY 1990 revision of the Agricultural Development and Trade Act, AID is charged with implementing the revised Title II and Title III grant Food for Peace programs which are directed toward achieving food security. In addition, AID supports (a) the Farmer-to-Farmer program, a people-to-people technical assistance program implemented through private voluntary organizations (PVOs) and cooperative development organizations (COCOs) to bring American farming and agribusiness expertise to NIS farmers, and (b) a program to provide cash support to PVOs and COCOs for food assistance related activities. AID chairs the Food Aid Consultative Group with PVO participation. Title II provides grant food aid for emergency programs, for regular programs sponsored by PVOs and for the World Food Program (WFP). The US provided over 750,000 metric tons of Title II for emergencies in 1992 and over 1.2 million metric tons for regular programs through PVOs and WFP. Budget authority requested for Title II in FY 1994 is $831,870,000, an increase of almost $22, million over the FY 1993 appropriation level of $810, million. The new Title III grant program entails planning, resource allocation and implementation processes much like those for other multi-year AID-managed development programs. Per the Act, these programs must contribute to improved food security. AID also seeks to integrate Title III programs into AID country strategies and to measure developmental results. Under this program food assistance is provided through governments of least developed countries which meet specific eligibility criteria established in the FY 1990 legislation. The FY 1994 budget authority request is $283,594,000, which includes both commodity and transport costs; the FY 1993 appropriation was $335,594,000. [—]

This article discusses death in a bedouin community in Egypt. Its dress, language, songs, religious aspects, social implications and women's roles.

20042. Abu-Lughod, Lila; Altorki, Soraya [editor]; El-Solt, Camilla Fawzi [editor]. Arab Women in the Field: Studying Your Own Society: Part 7: Fieldwork of a Dutiful Daughter. Modern Arab Studies. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 139-162. In 1983 the author returned to the Awlad Ali Bedouin community in the Egyptian Western Desert where she had done fieldwork for her dissertation five years earlier. Both being a woman and an Arab immediately raised two questions that created distance from her informants: her lack of children in the five intervening years, and her conspicuous lack of conventional forms of Muslim piety, especially prayer. Her initial contact was mixed: her poor arabic and anomalous status as a young single woman was balanced by her sound Muslim and Arab lineage (the fact her father was Jordanian was seen as especially good, since Bedouin perceived all non-African Arabs as being essentially Bedouin). This 'non-Arabian' status was valuable since the Awlad Ali Bedouin are distrustful of the government, which is encroaching on their traditional status; outsider anthropologists are often seen as police spies, foreign anthropologists are perceived as CIA agents.

20043. Abzug, Bella; Womens Caucus. Press Release: Women’s Caucus at ICPD in Cairo. New York: Womens Caucus, August 23, 1994. Dear Women's Caucus member. In your responses to our last mailing following PrepCom III, it has been wonderful to hear how so many of you are maintaining the energy and power of the Women's Caucus agenda in your respective countries: disseminating information; organizing local, national and regional meetings; cultivating the media to spread our message; and in some cases securing representation on your delegation to Cairo.

WOMEN'S CAUCUS PRE-CAIRO: Enclosed please find the key document we will use for our advocacy work in Cairo, "Women's Caucus Recommendations on Bracketed Text in the Draft Programme of Action of the ICPD."

It was prepared in close collaboration with the Writing Analysis Group of the Women's Caucus, comprised of Caucus task force chairs, key chapter monitors and major reproductive rights networks. The Writing Analysis Group has worked very hard, during the interim period between PrepCom III and Cairo, to prepare careful amendments with rationales to all bracketed text in the document, including Chapter II "Principles" and Chapter XIII "National Action" which were widely distributed to delegates at the Informal Consultations described below. Please use this document now, in your discussions with your government representatives who will be going to Cairo. We would appreciate hearing their reactions to our recommendations. A few weeks ago, three consecutive Informal Consultations were convened by governments (see parentheses) at the United Nations in New York, to discuss issues that were not thoroughly deliberated upon at PrepCom III: Preamble and Principles (Canada) on 13 July; Goals (Indonesia & India) on 14 July; and Financial Resources (Netherlands) on 15 July. The Chair of each of the informal (Ruth Archibald, Amb. Nicolas Biegman and Amb. Nugroho Wisnumurti, respectively) reminded delegates that the consultations were meant to stimulate discussion and not act as negotiating sessions; hence they would not have the power to add or delete brackets in the document. A brief overview of each session follows: Preamble & Principles: Ruth Archibald led the discussion on the Preamble and each of the 16 Principles in Chapter II. Most delegates expressed concern about the high number of Principles, suggesting a reordering of Principles without any new additions. Some Southern delegates emphasized that the Principles should better recognize the integral linkage between population and development and stressed the importance of the right to development. Discussions revealed that the issue of national sovereignty was "the formulation and implementation of population policies" in Principle 4 will be one of the key principles for negotiations in Cairo. A number of delegates (i.e. Egypt, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan and US) supported the Women's Caucus amendments to the chapeau, Principle 3 and Principle 6. Delegates called for tightening the text of Chapter I's "Preamble" so that it clearly states their collective commitment to implement the Programme of Action and is not simply an executive summary of the document.

Goals: Ambassador Wisnumurti led the discussion on the goals of education, especially for girls; infant, child and maternal mortality reduction, and universal access to reproductive health services, including family planning. Dr. Nafis Sadik defended the necessity for the proposed population goals, because the Programme of Action would be sporadic and scattered. Some delegates expressed apprehension over the attainability of global goals and called for the adoption of "realistic" attainable goals. Although roughly 60 countries were represented, only 10 delegates took the floor.

Resources: Ambassador Biegman opened the floor for discussion on the following areas: (1) estimates quoted in Chapter XIII of the document; (2) the 20/20 proposal urging governments "to devote at least 20% of public sector expenditures to the social sectors as well as 20% of official development assistance, stressing, in particular, poverty eradication within the context of sustainable development"; (3) the proposal that "up to two-thirds of the costs will continue to be met by the countries themselves and up to one-third from external sources" to implement the Programme of Action; and (4) recognizing the specific needs of countries with economies in transition. A few delegates (i.e. Canada, Sweden and US) supported the Women's Caucus amendments to para 13.15 which articulated our concern that the estimates in Chapter XIII are based on incomplete and imprecise data which must be improved on an urgent basis at national and international levels. While these calculations currently put most infrastructure costs in the family planning estimates, it is recognized that all financial, infrastructural, and human resources must be equitably used for the several reproductive and sexual health services.

WOMEN'S CAUCUS PROGRAMME IN CAIRO, 9/4-13/1994: An orientation session to the Women's Caucus process is scheduled for Sunday, 9/4/1994 from 1:45 - 2:30 pm in the NGO Forum Room 3, following a general orientation for NGOs from 1 - 1:45 pm. This session will initiate newcomers into the Women's Caucus process, and update old-timers. During the orientation, we plan to form regional groups (Africa, Asia, Caribbean and Pacific, Europe, Latin America, Middle East, North America) in order to: (1) Allow for greater interaction between experienced Women's Caucus members and newcomers; (2) Nominate a Women's Caucus chair from each of the seven regions for the seven daily Caucus meetings; (3) Nominate Women's Caucus Lobby Contacts within each of the government voting blocs and key sub-regions (G-77, EU, CANZ, CARICOM, Nordic); (4) Cluster into one of the Women's Caucus Task Forces organized by Chapters in the Document and the ICPD agenda, to monitor floor discussions and coordinate advocacy efforts on the bracketed text in each chapter. It will be very important to get women NGOs on government delegations to take on these assignments, due to limited security passes for NGOs to access the official conference center. (5) Call for volunteers for a Women's Caucus post-Cairo Task Force to collect ideas out of the rich array of NGO Forum panels and workshops in preparation for the last session of the Women's Caucus at ICPD. (see below) After meeting in regional groups, we hope to reconvene as a full Women's Caucus to announce the respective regional decisions and gear up for our first Women's Caucus meeting on Monday, 5 September at 9 am. The Women's Caucus will convene daily from 9 - 10 am in the NGO Forum Room 3. The strength and momentum of the Caucus depends on your active participation. We have a heavy agenda and collectively we can build support to remove the brackets on language which supports women's perspectives on population and development, as well as continue our struggle for sexual and reproductive rights and health which is at the core of our agenda. One of the main purposes of the daily Caucus will be to brief people on the government process. Many NGOs will focus on activities in the NGO Forum to network, strategize and build an agenda for the future, while a smaller number of accredited NGOs will have access to the government/negotiations in the conference center. Our strategy, therefore, is to divide work and maximize power for our common advocacy work. Our sisters who are on government delegations will, no doubt, be key allies in carrying the Women's Caucus concerns onto the floor. In collaboration with IPPF, Women's Caucus representatives (lobby contacts, chapter monitors, regional chairs etc.) will meet with NGOs on government delegations daily from 1 - 1:30 pm in the government Conference Center. At the suggestion of many PrepCom III Women's Caucus members, we have scheduled an NGO-Delegate Dialogue for Thursday, September 8 at 6:30 pm in the NGO Forum Room. I would like to describe what I have accepted an invitation from the Women's Caucus to engage in an open dialogue on our critical concerns and how to hold the world's governments accountable to them. This session on reproductive rights and implementing the ICPD will give us an opportunity to openly and directly engage key delegates on how they plan to implement the ICPD outcomes and decisions. For your information, attached is the provisional timetable for the work of the ICPD and general information for ICPD participants prepared by the ICPD Secretariat. Please take careful note of the process for NGO registration. The NGO Planning Committee for the ICPD has done a terrific job in preparing an NGO Forum Programme Guide, scheduling a tremendous array of NGO activities, which each of you should be receiving shortly.

WOMEN'S CAUCUS POST-CAIRO: The last session of the Women's Caucus at ICPD will be Tuesday, 9/13/1994. It will be an important session to take stock of our achievements through the ICPD process and to share strategies and plans as we continue our work throughthe upcoming International Conference processes on Women (Beijing, 9/1995) and Social Development (Copenhagen, 3/1995). For your information, Diane Dillon-Ridgley, Brownie Ledbetter and I will be staying at the Semiramis Intercontinental Hotel, in Cairo, with the US government delegation.SusanDavis, Anita Nayar and the rest of the WEDO team will be staying at the Dar El Defaa El Gawy (tel. 202-2506905).

See you soon at the Women's Caucus in Cairo. Till then, I remain, Yours in sisterhood, Bella S. Abzug. [=] 20044. Aleis, Fady. "Arafat visits Tulkarm, Qalqilya: Redeployment in northern West Bank completed", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 3. As part of the Palestinian-Israeli interim agreement, the Israeli Army concluded the withdrawal of their forces from the twin cities of Ramallah and Al Bireh, Wednesday, December 27. Ramallah became the sixth town to be evacuated by the Israeli Army. This move completes the liberation of the cities in the northern West Bank. Following the Israeli departure, some 1200 Palestinian police entered Ramallah and took up previous Israeli army positions. Streets, commercial districts and graffiti were cleaned and decorations were put up to welcome the arrival of the Palestinian police. Thousands of Palestinians paraded and danced on the streets expressing their joy at the occasion following 28 years of bitter occupation. Firecrackers were heard throughout the city and speeches were given by prominent figures. Crowds of Palestinians jumped the fences of the former Israeli military compound to visit the isolation cells where many of them had been detained at one time or another. Some of the cells measured four feet by four feet. On December 30, more than 70000 Palestinians crowded into the former Israeli military compound to welcome the President, Yasser Arafat. At 11:10 am, two Egyptian military helicopters landed on the roof of the compound. Palestinian scouts circled the area and played the Palestinian National Anthem. President Arafat left the helicopter, head for the stage above the compound and gave a speech. He welcomed Palestinians in the liberated cities and declared that "Ramallah and Al Bireh are now liberated." He spoke about Palestinian prisoners and declared "I promise you that all Palestinian prisoners will be released and first and foremost amongst them should be Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas and Abeer Al Waheidi, the woman prisoner charged with participating in killing a settler." During his speech, he called on all the Palestinians in exile to come and participate in building the country. He finished his speech at 12 pm. Ziad Al Louzy, a Presidential guard in Force 17, was jailed for three years during the Intifada and expressed his feelings saying, "This is a dream that we are all living in reality. I'm originally from Ramallah. God only knows my happiness at seeing the Israelis vanish from this city."

I approached an old man who was shedding tears while watching the helicopter land, when I asked why he was crying, he replied, "I'm seventy years old. I have spent over 6 years in Israeli jails and 2 years in Jordanian prisons as well. I prayed for this day and now it's happening before my eyes." A chain of Palestinian women were singing and taking part in Palestinian traditional dances in the heart of the compound. I asked one of them to describe how she felt. "There are no feelings to express during a universal wedding," she said. "Today is a Palestinian national day. I have sacrificed a son in the name of Palestine, now he lies peacefully in his grave." Ahmed Al Nabati, a lieutenant in the Palestinian police, said: "Over 1200 Palestinian police have arrived in Ramallah. Nine hundred of whom are Gazans and the rest are from Ramallah. We are here to keep order; no one is above the law. People here are very hospitable. Supermarkets and restaurants are offering free drinks and sandwiches to police and soldiers. This is a sign of their joy to see the Palestinian police. Our first task consisted of removing all the cement blocks that closed streets leading to and from Ramallah which will ease the flow of traffic." After President Arafat left the stage, he met prominent personalities and officials and then convened the weekly cabinet meeting inside the compound. Later that night, he visited the house of Abeer Al Waheidi in Ramallah and assured her family that he was confident of her release. [=] 20045. Amnesty International. Press Release: Amnesty International Calls World Conference "Summit Of Missed Opportunities": Part 1: Summary. London: Amnesty International, June 28, 1993. Amnesty International's Secretary General has denounced the World Conference on Human Rights as "a summit of missed opportunities". In his statement he said "there has been no reprieve for the victims, as governments fine-tuned their official declarations and reaffirmed the 50 year-old core values of universality, indivisibility, and interdependence." The complete statement by the secretary general is attached. [=] 20046. Amnesty International; Sane, Pierre. Press Release: Amnesty International Calls World Conference "Summit Of Missed Opportunities": Part 2: Summary Comments at the Conclusion of the World Conference on Human Rights: Summit of Missed Opportunities. London: Amnesty International, June 28, 1993. First, I would like to point out that as the conference is coming to an end, many of the governments have continued to kill, torture and persecute political opponents. 4400 known prisoners of conscience in 60 countries languish in jails. Amnesty International groups have been working for 11000 individuals in 80 countries. 25 appeals for Urgent Action to save lives, stop torture and the death penalty have been issued. Thousands of appeal letters were sent to Brazil, Central African Republic, China, Colombia, Cote d'Ivoire, Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, Guatemala, India, Kuwait, Latvia, Malawi, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Turkmenistan, USA, Uzbekistan, and Yugoslavia. At least 20 people have died under torture. Over 40 people have "disappeared". More than 100 death sentences have been passed. Every four hours a prisoner has been executed in one of the 106 countries which continue to use the death penalty. Gross violations have continued unabated in many other countries around the world. [=] 20047. Amnesty International; Sane, Pierre. Press Release: Amnesty International Calls World Conference "Summit Of Missed Opportunities": Part 3: Summary Comments at the Conclusion of the World Conference on Human Rights: These Are The Facts-All These Violations Took Place During The Last Two Years. London: Amnesty International, June 28, 1993. There has been no reprieve for the victims, as governments fine-tuned their official declarations and reaffirmed the 50 year-old core values of universality, indivisibility, and interdependence.

Secondly, analyzing the Declaration of Principles which governments attending the world conference have agreed to, Amnesty International welcomes:

1. That women's rights have now been put in the mainstream of the UN human rights machinery and that their rights have been reaffirmed as being "inalienable, integral, and an indivisible part of universal human rights." This is tribute to the struggle that human rights activists and women's organizations throughout the world have been waging for decades.

2. The priority accorded to the rights of the child and the call for universal ratification by 1995 of the Convention of the Rights of the Child. Children constitute certainly the group under highest risk in times of increased pauperization and armed conflicts.

3. That the rights of indigenous peoples has been reaffirmed. However, it seems that nothing very new has been recommended.

Amnesty International regrets however:

1. That no radically new principles have been articulated to address the enormous challenges of today's world and to move the Universal Declaration of Human Rights from a "common standard of achievement" to an "obligation under international law". The text does not even state that human rights violations are an obstacle to development.

2. The references to national and regional particularities that may weaken universality.

3. That states are being "encouraged" to ratify international treaties instead of being "urged" to do so (for instance, the Convention Against Torture).

Amnesty International utterly rejects:

1. The descending phraseology regarding the NGOs whose courageous work keeps the human rights issue on the international agenda, and without whom the UN system of human rights monitoring and protection would collapse.

2. The potentially dangerous reference to the rights of the media guaranteed only under national law and not under international standards of freedom of expression.

Thirdly, looking now into the Action Plan issued by the world conference which of course will be the yardstick against which we NGOs will measure the extent to which the world's governments will live up to their proclamations, we note that:

1. The High Commissioner is referred to the General Assembly of the UN for further study. This is another missed opportunity to attach to the Vienna Declaration a political initiative that would have made this conference a landmark.

2. The International Court is referred back to the International Law Commission which is "encouraged" to continue its efforts. This is another proof of the lack of clear political support and an attempt to reintroduce the so-called national and regional "particularities" through the back door.

3. The resources of the UN Centre are to be increased within the existing and future regular budgets. When we know how strained the UN budget is at the moment and how stretched its operations are, this recommendation turns any Action Plan into mere wishful thinking.

Clearly Amnesty International has to look beyond Vienna and work more forcefully for the emergence and build up of a strong global human rights movement that will constitute one of the major guarantees of human rights protection and promotion in the future. The seeds of such a movement were planted in Vienna. [ = ]

20049. Arab Womens Solidarity Association of North America; Arab Womens Solidarity Association; AWSA. Arab Womens Solidarity Association of North America (AWSA), Brochure. Seattle, Wash.: Arab Womens Solidarity Association [Post Office Box 95760, Seattle, WA 98145; (206)-782-5236 or (206)-322-1360]. N.D. [1994?] "Arab Women are well aware of the international dimension of oppression. Our feminism is global, and includes international, national, family and personal issues." -- Nawal El-Saadawi, AWSA President.

In 1982, 120 Arab women established the Arab Womens Solidarity Association (AWSA) in Cairo, Egypt, to promote women's rights in Arab countries and to encourage Arab women to work together in their respective countries, as well as internationally. Since then, the association has grown to include 3000 women and men worldwide. In 1985, AWSA obtained consultative status as an international, non-profit, NGO with the UN Economic & Social Council.

AWSA North America was established in Seattle, Washington, in 3/1994, under the guidance of Nawal El-Saadawi. This branch of AWSA was formed to respond to the issues facing Arab-American women, and to create solidarity among Arab women in North America, the Arab region and internationally.

AWSA encourages Arab women's active participation in social, economic, cultural and political life. Because women's rights are directly connected to human rights AWSA works to address many forms of discrimination and oppression. Through educational and informational activities, we promote an understanding of Arab and Arab-American women's experience in order to pave the way for cultural understanding and cooperation with other groups committed to human rights, equality and justice.

Current activities: (1) Networking with other Arab-American and women's organizations in North America. (2) Organizing a local reading/lecture series by and about Middle Eastern women. (3) Studying specific issues affecting women of Arab origin living in North America. (4) Meeting with other American ethnic women facing similar issues. (5) Re-issuing AWSA's magazine 'Moon' in Arabic and English language. (6) Establishing a quarterly, international newsletter to connect all AWSA branches. (7) Sending delegates to the International Conference on Population & Development in Cairo, Egypt, 9/1994. (8) Organizing the AWSA workshop for the UN Fourth International Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing, China in 9/1995.

Other issues and tasks will evolve out of our efforts. Life is always reflected in change and growth. We invite you to join us. We ask all our friends, women and men, to give this new branch of AWSA as much support as possible. [ = ]

20050. Avakian, Bob. "Communism and Religion: Part 1(a): Islam: Introduction", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), July 20, 1997. Let's apply dialectical materialism to examine certain aspects of Islam and its Holy Book, the Qur'an (Koran), historically and in the present-day world In A History of God, Karen Armstrong discusses the rise of the Islamic religion, at the time of its founder Muhammad, at the beginning of the seventh century. She links this with significant changes in the circumstances and "fortunes" of the Meccan tribe of Quraysh, of which Muhammad was a member—specifically, a rapid and dramatic change from a nomadic life in the Arabian steppes to becoming very successful in trade in the area of Mecca (in what is now Saudi Arabia). Along with this, there were corresponding ideological changes. Armstrong characterizes it this way: "their drastically altered lifestyle meant that the old tribal values had been superseded by a rampant and ruthless capitalism" actually this was a pre-capitalist mercantilism but nevertheless Armstrong's point is important. And she goes on to say: "People felt obscurely disoriented and lost. Muhammad knew that the
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

207

Quraysh were on a dangerous course and needed to find an ideology that would help them adjust to their new conditions. At this time," she adds, "any political solution tended to be of a religious nature." Islam at that time, as Muhammad was first forging it, had many different influences, including the influences of the other major monotheistic religions, Judaism and Christianity, which both had adherents in that region. Out of all this, Muhammad developed a new religion that fused elements of these monotheistic religions and religious traditions with traditions from the Bedouin tribes of Arabia. But Islam was a new synthesis, adapted to the changing conditions in Arabia at the time of Muhammad; and this religion, as it was evolved by Muhammad, was able to unite Arabs across and beyond tribal divisions. This was an important factor. The changing conditions brought forth both the need and the possibility to unite Arabs across and beyond tribal divisions. This was one of the great strengths of the new religion of Islam that Muhammad synthesized out of different trends and influences.

Now, when I say he forged this new synthesis out of these different traditions in the context of changing conditions, I don't necessarily mean that Muhammad sat there and consciously said, 'I'll borrow a little bit from Judaism...I'll take a little from Christianity. I'll make Christ one of the main prophets...and so on'(although he did incorporate significant parts of the whole tradition of Abraham and Moses). Muhammad claimed to be receiving this from god (Allah), via the archangel Gabriel. And Muhammad apparently spoke much of what became the Qur'an while in a trance-like state. Obviously, I'm not in a position to know whether, or to what degree, he was sincere, to what degree he actually got himself into a trance-like state and had all kinds of hallucinations and other things—this is quite likely since it seems he was frequently fasting—and to what degree he coldly calculated it. It is clearly the case, as I will show a little bit later, that there are parts of the Qur'an that he coldly calculated, yet it is quite possible that, in an overall and basic way, Muhammad actually believed that he was receiving the divine word from Allah. But the point here is that's important, in terms of situating this materially and historically, geographic as well as the social conditions in which Muhammad lived (which comes through in the emphasis on shady trees and water flowing, and so on) but it also reflects, more importantly, the patriarchal and generally the oppressive and exploitative social relations of that age end society. This is why, in the Qur'an's vision of paradise, there are not only going to be shady trees and rivers flowing underground, but there are going to be all kinds of seductive "dark-eyed maidens," as well as young boys, who will serve the faithful in paradise.

Now what does this vision of paradise tell us about those Muhammad envisioned as the faithful, who would be rewarded this way in paradise, and what does it tell us about the social relations and the underlying mode of production that Muhammad was, in fact, expressing, whether in a trance-like state or otherwise, when he brought forward this religion? What is being expressed here is not the vision, or the will, of someeternal,transcendental, all-knowing, all-seeing, all-powerful god (Allah) but instead is the vision of a human being reflecting the natural and social conditions, including relations of patriarchal oppression, in which he lives. And this comes through in ways that get a lot funkier and even more down on the ground. There is, as I referred to earlier, some cold calculation on Muhammad's part that is incorporated in the Qur'an; besides the general and very frequently repeated references to heaven with the "dark-eyed maidens" wailing on the faithful, and so on, there are even references in the Qur'an that are much more personal and clearly a matter of personal calculation by Muhammad. This comes out very sharply, for example, in one chapter (sure of the Qur'an called (in English translation), "Prohibition" (or "The Forbidding"). This is very interesting. You have to remember, when you read the Qur'an, that it's not supposed to be Muhammad speaking as such. It's Allah speaking, through the archangel Gabriel. And at one point Allah feels moved to scold Muhammad for being too lenient with his wives. As recorded by Muhammad, Allah tells Muhammad—this is a very intimate and personal reference—right here in the Qur'an—Allah tells Muhammad that he (Muhammad) has been doing too much to please his wives. What was Allah taking about? Well, you see, Muhammad's wives were mad at him because he kept on sleeping with a slave woman that he had promised he was going to cut loose, and obviously his wives had been complaining about this, so here it is, right in the Qur'an, Allah starts scolding Muhammad for having been too lenient with his wives about all this. And, as relayed by Muhammad, Allah warns Muhammad’s wives that there are plenty more where they came from: “It may well be if he divorce you, his Lord will give him in your place better wives than yourselves!” In effect, what has happened is that Muhammad says, my wives are out of line, so I need a verse in the Qur'an telling them they’d better watch out or I’ll get better, or I won’t get better. And of course Muhammad believed, or convinced himself, that he got this word from Allah, but the least that can be said is that this is very convenient for Muhammad! Now, in passages like this in the Qur’an, what comes through is not only a general expression of certain patriarchal social relations, but a direct (and rather crude) voicing of Muhammad’s personal interests in enforcing, in his own family-sexual relations, these oppressive patriarchal relations. Muhammad even manages to enlist Allah to warn his wives that they’d better quit bugging him about sleeping with this slave mistresses that he’s got.

Now, moving from the origins of Islam and how the Qur’an reflects the world—including the economic and social relations—in which Muhammad lived, about 1400 years ago, we can say that, in terms of the role of Islam in the world today, generally speaking, in the societies where Islam is the dominant religion there has not been any kind of thoroughgoing bourgeois-democratic revolution, and society has not been thoroughly transformed in correspondence with the bourgeois mode of production. At the same time, in many of these societies, with the further penetration of imperialism, there is a tendency for a kind of “hybrid” to develop in which Islam in various ways upholds the old traditions, corresponding to pre-capitalist relations, but attempts to adapt or “interpret” these in accordance with certain changes in productive forces and corresponding production relations. (And, to a large degree, the differences in the “interpretation” and practice of Islam in different societies, as with Christianity and religion in general, reflects differences in the prevailing production and social relations in those societies, including the degree of imperialist penetration and corresponding transformation of economic relations and conditions).

You can see this, for example, in Iran During the 1960s and 1970s, while remaining a semi-feudal as well as semicolonial country, Iran underwent certain partial but significant economic and social transformations associated with the “modernization” program of the Shah, under the direction of US imperialism. Now, when the Shah was overthrown—and reaction against the effects of this “modernization” had a lot to do with the upheaval that resulted in the overthrow of the Shah—the “Islamic Republic” that replaced the Shah in power has not attempted to do away with the technology, etc., associated with the Shah’s “modernization” and generally with imperialist penetration and domination of the economy of Iran, but instead has attempted to make use of this technology. Actually, there is an analogy here with the Christian Fascists in the US and similar forces in other imperialist countries. The Islamic fundamentalists aren’t going around literally trying to impose all the economic and technological conditions of the time of Muhammad, any more than the Christian Fascists are trying to remake society on the basis of the economic and technological conditions that existed at the time of Jesus or of Moses or Abraham. They’re not saying, “throw out all advanced technology.” They use very advanced technology. And the Islamic fundamentalists in Iran are even going forward on the basis of some changes that were made under the Shah—certain partial changes in the economic base of society. They’re not trying to reverse all that, but what they are attempting to do is to graft into the superstructure, and also somewhat into the production and social relations, elements of the old tradition. So it becomes kind of a “hybrid”: the society overall remains a semi-colonial, semi-feudal society, but it has these peculiar features where the superstructure is to a significant degree dominated by forces who are seeking to impose aspects of culture and custom and social relations that run counter to “modernization” while at the same time, in a fundamental sense, these forces are compelled to act in accordance with the underlying production relations of semicolonial, semi-feudal society and to actually facilitate the further domination and penetration of imperialism in their country. Now, in a certain way, there is an analogy between the role of Islam today in Iran and any other countries, and the initial development of Islam under the circumstances Muhammad faced (which I briefly summarized). The analogy, or the similarity, lies in the massive upheaval and dislocation in society—and in today’s world the massive uprooting and urbanization (or we could describe this as the “shantytown-ization”) of masses of (former) peasants—and the appeal of Islamic fundamentalism in the face of these changes. In today’s world, all the things that got better, or got worse, of traditional life, and dislocation is associated—objectively and to a significant degree in popular consciousness—with Western imperialism and its penetration and domination of the country. In other words, a lot of this upheaval—the uprooting and dislocation of masses of peasants, who are being forced in the millions into the cities, or into miserable shantytown conditions, and are being to a significant degree wrenched out of the formal economy—these changes are objectively very much related to and a product of the operation of imperialism, particularly Western imperialism. And, to a significant degree, in the minds of the masses these changes are associated with this imperialist penetration and domination. Again, the example of the “Islamic Revolution” in Iran is very instructive in this regard, not only now but also in the original upheavals in 1978 and 1979 which led ultimately to the triumph of Khomeini and the forces associated with him as the rulers of the country—forces that are outwardly and in certain secondary aspects in opposition to “modernization” associated with imperialism but are fundamentally dependent upon and subordinate to imperialism and the international accumulation and rule of capital. You could see in the initial outpourings of the Iranian revolution that one of the main bases for the “Islamic Revolution” in general, and more specifically one of the main bases for the Khomeini forces, were these masses of recently dislocated and uprooted peasants who had been crowded into the rings of shantytowns around the cities.

Now, it is important to keep in mind that, in the revolutionary upsurge in Iran in this period, and particularly before the Islamic fundamentalists grouped around Khomeini consolidated their hold on government, there were many different forces in the field, including Maoists and other non-religious revolutionary forces as well as some Islamic forces who played a positive role in the revolutionary struggle, and who opposed the imposition of reactionary, theocratic rule by Khomeini & Co. Reactionary Islamic fundamentalism was not the only force in the field—it was not even the only Islamic trend in the field—although unfortunately, it did win out in the short run and did turn the revolutionary upsurge into its opposite, into the consolidation of power by reactionary forces whose ideology and program represents the oppression and exploitation of the masses and ultimately the domination of imperialism. At the same time, it is also important to understand that dislocated peasants who were crowded into the impoverished shantytowns were not the only significant force who were affected by the Shah’s “modernizations” and more generally by imperialist domination in Iran and its continuing “penetration” and “transformation” of aspects of Iranian society. There were also significant groups within the middle strata, including the urban middle strata, of Islamic society who were affected by this. These forces also made up an important part of the social base for the ouster of the Shah, and some of them became a social base for the eventual consolidation of power by the Khomeini forces and their “Islamic revolution”. One very key aspect and indication of its actual counterrevolutionary nature is that this “Islamic revolution” in Iran did not really mobilize and definitely did not fully unleash the peasant masses who remain in the countryside. This “Islamic Revolution” had (and has) no program for carrying out an agrarian Revolution in the countryside as a pivotal part of an overall revolution. And here we can see, very dramatically, the need for a real revolution—a New Democratic Revolution as the direct prelude to the socialist revolution—which still cries out to be made in Iran, and which MLM forces there are working to bring about—a revolution led by the proletariat, which is capable of and does in fact win the masses away from the Islamic fundamentalists. [6]

20052. Avakian, Bob. "Communism and Religion: Part 1(c): Islam: Islamic Fundamentalism and the proletarian Revolution", in Revolutionary Worker (RCP), July 20, 1997. Islamic fundamentalism is a significant phenomenon as an ideological expression in the world today, but more than that as a political movement which is obviously gaining in influence and in organized strength, not only in the "Middle East," but in other parts of the world and even to a certain degree in the US. As with every other major social phenomenon, we have to get a deep and all-around understanding of Islamic fundamentalism as an ideological and a political trend and as a material force. We have to understand more deeply its attraction, particularly among those dislocated masses in the urban slums and shantytowns of many countries in the "Middle East" and some other parts of the Third World. In this connection, third: it is important to speak to a point that is touched on in "The End of a Stage—The Beginning of a New Stage." [Revolution Magazine, Fall 1990.] In "End/Beginning" there is a discussion of "the demise of communism"—in particular, the end of the Soviet Union as a counterfeiter "communist" state (a revisionist state) and the break-up of the Soviet bloc—and how strategically this does not represent a defeat but a positive factor for us, how it represents revisionism becoming more openly bourgeois, and how this in turn provides more of "an uncontested field" for us forgedene Marxist-Leninist-Maoists, in upholding the banner of communism and rallying the masses to that banner. Now, in reviewing this more recently and thinking about it in various aspects in light of developments since then, including the growing strength of this whole phenomenon of Islamic fundamentalism, it strikes me that there was a secondary tendency in "End/Beginning" to underestimate the complexity of the situation with the "demise" of Soviet revisionism.

As Lenin emphasized, at one point when he was arguing against "infantile idealism" and dogmatism, the world would be very simple and the revolution would be very easy if it just consisted of two opposing armies: one lines up on one side of the battlefield and says "we're for socialism," while the other one lines up on the opposite side of the battlefield and says "we are for imperialism," and they square off, and that's it. But, as Lenin was emphasizing, making revolution is always much more complex than that—there is always more than one army in the field (at least in the political sense), even within the broad camp of opposition to the ruling system—there are always many different banners being raised and rallying forces (and even the communist forces are themselves not "pure" but consist of many contradictory things). This is a principle that has important implications and application in a number of different ways but here I'm focusing on how it applies to this phenomenon of the "demise of communism" and its consequences. And in fact one of the main things giving impetus to this growth of Islamic fundamentalism as a trend end to its influence and material force is precisely the changes in the Soviet Union (changes which have led to the collapse of the Soviet Union and its bloc), as well as what happened in China with the coup and the restoration of capitalism in the mid 1970s. So we have to continue to return to this reality and deepen our grasp of it, and be able to explain it to the masses as well as act on it in a deeper way. We have to recognize the strategically favorable situation, and maximize our advances in this situation, but in order to do this we have to take full account of and deal with the complexities of the situation. It should be noted—and this is a very important point—that the growth of this Islamic fundamentalist trend is particularly among masses of people who have to be won to, and even have to be major forces in, the proletarian revolution—or the revolution lead by the proletariat. In the case of Third World countries the revolution generally involves going through the stage of new democracy as a prelude to the socialist stage, but nevertheless in world-historical terms is part of the proletarian revolution. So, in an important aspect, there is a very profound and intense contention going on between us and these Islamic fundamentalist forces. These forces may, in certain contexts and to a certain limited extent, oppose imperialist domination, or aspects of this, but in the final analysis, where they pursue their own program and resist the program of the proletariat, they can only end up serving the rule of imperialism and the all-around exploitation and oppression of the masses of people.

In strategic terms, it is a question of winning these masses to one banner or the other—one that represents their fundamental interests or one that runs counter to those interests even if it opposes certain secondary aspects of the established order. These are masses of people, numbering in the hundreds of millions, that the ruling classes may consider, or declare, to be marginalized, but they are hardly marginal to the process of proletarian revolution and the transition from the bourgeois epoch to the communist epoch And for that matter they're hardly marginal to the overall process of imperialist accumulation. The growth of this Islamic fundamentalist trend is very pronounced precisely among these masses particularly those people, in countries where Islam is a major religion, who have been uprooted and then migrate into the urban slums, or shantytowns, and who have not been integrated in any kind of articulated way into the formal economy. Not only were many of these masses a base of support for Khomeini, during the course of the Iranian revolution at the end of 1970s and the beginning of the 1980s; but, if you look at Turkey, Pakistan, Egypt and a number of other places—places where, generally speaking, Islam is a major religious and ideological expression—these strata of uprooted and shanty-ized masses are a major base right now for the growth of these Islamic fundamentalist movements. This is not something that we, that is, the international proletariat and the international communist movement, can allow to happen—we cannot let the Islamic fundamentalist forces have the banner of opposition to imperialism and oppression. As I have said, with their outlook and program these forces can only end up serving imperialist rule and the all around oppression and exploitation of the masses, while we represent the only ideology and program that stands for thoroughly defeating and uprooting imperialism and all oppression and exploitation. Now, we can't just say we cannot let this happen—we have to change things through our work and struggle. But, from a strategic standpoint, we cannot allow these Islamic fundamentalist forces to rally these masses under their banner, because what that banner represents is actually against the fundamental interests of the masses. Again, going back to what Lenin emphasized, we can't just say, "Not that banner, this banner," line up on this part of the battlefield, not that part of the battlefield, be for socialism, not for Islamic fundamentalism." As Lenin stressed, we have to recognize and deal with the complexity of the situation, and in particular the complexity of every situation that involves real revolutionary transformation. We have to recognize the various "shadings" and variations within things, including the fact that there are differences—including in some cases very significant differences—between various Islamic forces and their political roles. Not all such forces are the same as the fundamentalists, and even some fundamentalists may, at certain times and under certain conditions, be opposed to certain aspects of imperialist domination and to certain forms of the oppression of the people, even though in the final analysis such forces, particularly when they have the initiative and in the lead of things—and more especially where they actually head governments can only end up oppressing the people and serving imperialist domination.

The point is that we have to win the masses to our banner, through carrying out our line and program and in that context carrying out ideological struggle for MLM in opposition to religious fundamentalism, to all religious ideology, and to philosophical idealism generally. And, in order to do this in the most correct and powerful way, we have to understand this phenomenon. We have to understand deeply and in all-round way why Islamic fundamentalists (and some other, similar trends) are gaining in influence and in organized strength now among important sections of the masses. This is a very important part a new complication (if you want to put it that way), of the terrain we have to work on—of the objective and subjective factors we have to confront and transform This is a real challenge for the MLM forces worldwide, represented in a concentrated way by the Revolutionary Internationalist Movement (RIM), and for our Party in carrying out our internationalist responsibilities and contributing to the work and development of the RIM in the fullest way that we can. [TO BE CONTINUED] =*

20053. Badran, Margot. "Institutionalization of Middle East Women's Zahiya Dughan called for the creation of a new discipline of Arab women's studies in Arab universities at the Awha Conference (also alternative called the Arab Feminists' Conference) in 1994. Two decade later, women's studies emerged as a discipline in the United States and the Middle East. However, the study of women in the Middle East remains a marginal area of study within the Middle East Studies Association (MESA). In the United States, the emergence of women's studies followed the emergence of Black Studies; MESA itself was only organized in 1966. While the National Womens Studies Association (NWSA) in the United States was founded in 1977, three years earlier in 1974 the Institute for Womens Studies in the Arab World had been established in Beirut, and the Women Development Center has been established at Al-Azhar University in Cairo. From 1973-1975, 35 papers of women's studies were presented at MESA; in 1976-1983 there were less papers presented (although with 9 in 1981); in 1984 there were 37 papers, in 1985 nineteen, and in 1986 thirty papers. In its first decade, NWSA papers focused on Western women. The first dissertations on women's studies were published on Egypt in 1965 (University of London), on Arab women's journalism and Arab women's education in 1966 (Ain Sams University, Cairo University), and on Aaran feminism in 1966 (Dropsie College). The 1970s and 1980s saw numerous additional dissertations on women in Western societies and in the Middle East; journal articles became on womens studies in the Middle East became more numerous by the end of the 1970s. The first womens studies courses started appearing in the United States by the 1970s, with the first women's studies programs appearing in the 1980s. In the 1980s, the first courses in women in the Middle East started being taught; the first director of a women studies program with a Middle East specialization was Sondra Hale, at California State University-Long Beach in 1980-1982. Womens studies, as well as Middle East studies, were heavily funded by the federal government and foundations, such as the Ford Foundation, in the 1970s and 1980s. The future of womens study within Middle East studies depends on womens studies being accorded its appropriate role in the Middle East studies curriculum. [TXT]

20054. Baron, Beth; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor].
Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 15: The Modern Arab World: The Making and Breaking of Marital Bonds: Modern Egypt. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 275-291. The ancient doctrine of the 'aliveness' ('both living and female') of the earth or nature, termed hylozoism, has been embraced by ecofeminists (Starhawk notes: 'this Earth is alive and we are part of her being'; Riane Eisler sees hylozoism as part of her ethos of the prehistoric society); ecofeminists oppose this aliveness model to the mechanistic model of the scientific-industrial era which is seen as the enemy of this aliveness. Starhawk argues that hylozoism inherently leads to political activism, and notes that anyone who questions this doctrine is exercising a form of 'cultural imperialism [that] is itself a form of racism'; despite the fact that such cosmological formulations, for example, as that embodied in the ancient Egyptian Memphite Theology, was the basis for a 'highly oppressive pharaonic hierarchy'. Biehl notes that the immanent goddes of ecofeminists is part of a cyclical model of the universe, which both supports the return of divinely sanctioned social orders and which inevitably forecloses the possibility or any real social or political development. 'Loose and simplistic metaphors like 'aliveness' and
'divine immortality' are an inadequate basis for the creation of a meaningful ecological ethic for our era. At the same time, ecofeminists ignore the thought of Darwin in particular, and dialectical and development thinking in general: these methods provide the principle basis for criticizing the mechanistic world order in a meaningful manner.
Finally, the aliveness metaphor, and the historical revisionism that is used by ecofeminists to provide a historical context for their ideologies, are merely historically incorrect.

document of the 'aliveness' ('both living and female') of the earth or nature, termed hylozoism, has been embraced by ecofeminists (Starhawk notes: 'this Earth is alive and we are part of her being'; Riane Eisler sees hylozoism as part of her ethos of the prehistoric society); ecofeminists oppose this aliveness model to the mechanistic model of the scientific-industrial era which is seen as the enemy of this aliveness. Starhawk argues that hylozoism inherently leads to political activism, and notes that anyone who questions this doctrine is exercising a form of 'cultural imperialism [that] is itself a form of racism'; despite the fact that such cosmological formulations, for example, as that embodied in the ancient Egyptian Memphite Theology, was the basis for a 'highly oppressive pharaonic hierarchy'. Biehl notes that the immanent goddes of ecofeminists is part of a cyclical model of the universe, which both supports the return of divinely sanctioned social orders and which inevitably forecloses the possibility or any real social or political development. 'Loose and simplistic metaphors like 'aliveness' and
'divine immortality' are an inadequate basis for the creation of a meaningful ecological ethic for our era. At the same time, ecofeminists ignore the thought of Darwin in particular, and dialectical and development thinking in general: these methods provide the principle basis for criticizing the mechanistic world order in a meaningful manner.
Finally, the aliveness metaphor, and the historical revisionism that is used by ecofeminists to provide a historical context for their ideologies, are merely historically incorrect.
Europe as a 'long period of patriarchal class rule, a long dark age'. In fact, Neolithic cultures were relatively peaceful, matrilineal and matrilocal, however, pervasive evidence of human sacrifice seems to contradict the belief that Neolithic cultures can be characterized by women's virtues of 'caring' and 'nurturing'. Gimbutas' assertion that the fat female figurines that are characteristic of the Neolithic are consistently goddesses is questionable (ironically, ecofeminists who cite Gimbutas as a source for the pervasiveness of the earth goddess cult overlook her characterization that the figurines are of air or water goddesses; this is contrasted by Gimbutas to the Indo-European cult of the earth mother goddess); while it is true that there was a goddess cult at Catal Huyuk, for example, there is no reason to believe in an immutable and consistent goddess cult throughout Europe for millennia. In some cultures, the figurines are always found in trash heaps, which perhaps indicates that they were fertility fetishes carried to ensure pregnancy, and were discarded after they had yielded a pregnancy.

The ecofeminist celebration of Minoan Crete is even more problematic. Ecofeminists assert a 'sensuous, free, peaceful, gender-equal, nature-loving society, complete with priestesses, goddesses and perhaps even a queen' on the basis of almost no archeological evidence. The only reason for believing in a queen is the fact that the original Victorian excavator labeled one room the 'Queen's Megaron' simply because a stone chair was lower than others, and his Victorian imagination saw the lower height of the chair as befitting a woman. Newer work sees the Knossos complex as not a palace but rather as a temple complex, on the model of the priestly corporations or Egypt and Mesopotamia; new archeological evidence indicates that human, especially child sacrifice, has an integral part of the Minoan cult (which may well have included goddess worship).

The question posed by ecofeminism is not whether the Neolithic was relatively peaceful, or whether a goddess was worshipped (the epiphenomena that ecofeminism tends to focus on), but rather what the meaning of these facts is for social formation in early society. Many ecofeminists (such as Lynn White, Riane Eisler, and Charlene Spretnak) believe that worship of a goddess rather than a god will in itself and of itself will transform social reality. However, the weakness of goddess worship as a force transforming societies should be apparent from the common worship of goddesses by particentric societies: such historical instances illustrate the weakness of goddess-worship as a force in organizing a society along non-hierarchical, gender-equal, and peaceful line.

Ecofeminists also address the emergence of patriarchy and hierarchy in society by arguing that the Kurgan culture invaders from the Pontic-Volga-steppe invaded Neolithic Europe and subjugated the society of the peaceful goddess-worshippers. Although supported by some theorists (Joseph Campbell, Ashley Montagu), the archeological evidence is thin, the argument begs the question of how the Kurgan culture developed hierarchy, and ignores the question of how hierarchical-patriarchal societies emerged worldwide. The 'ecofeminist reduction of the origin of hierarchy solely to invasion...is simplistic'.

Similarly, theorists such as Ynestra King argues that the fundamental oppression is of women, and that the prototype of domination was of men over women; this is extended to argue that only patriarchal societies are warlike. However, these theories are not supported by historical or ethnographic studies. Ironically, many ecofeminists accept the role of hierarchies of priestesses in Neolithic societies, although there is no evidence that domination by priestesses is any better than domination by priests. Finally, it is clear that the social power of men is more exercised by domination of other men, and the freeing of women form the domination of men will not necessarily lead to more egalitarian society. Statism, capitalism and racism emerged for reasons other than structure, the frequent social contacts among Communists made it easy for women as feeble and depressed. He notes the preference for progressive books, refers to the formation of the League of Arab Writers in 1954 and of the League of Egyptian Writers in 1956, and notes the latter's support of Nasser. He says that in the Sudan, Saudi Arabia, and the Yemen, which tended to imitate classical literature, more is being written about present-day life. Describes the increase in periodicals, noting especially four new journals in Lebanon in 1955. Comments on the aversion of the League of Egyptian Writers to American periodicals which some would like to see banned. Records the increasing interest shown by Arabs in Soviet literature and the increase in literary and cultural exchanges between the Soviet Union and the Arab East. [From: "Part II: Arabs and the Arab World: Social Structure: 1955-1958", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. p. 31].

20059. Botman, Selma. "A Portrait of the Communist Movement", in The Rise of Egyptian Communism, 1939-1970. Contemporary Issues of the Middle East. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 17-32. The activists who participated in study groups and antifascist circles of the 1930s emerged as in the 1940s as dissidents seeking to establish concrete political organizations; however, the creation of Marxist organizations took place without any Marxist political tradition. Communists were mainly from Upper Egypt, Cairo and Alexandria: Cairo would gradually become the center of Communist activism. Most Communists were of bourgeois and petty-bourgeois, being mainly middle class. Most recruits to the Communist movement started their activism as students and/or below age age 25; in recruiting such people the Leftists had to compete with the Muslim Brotherhood and Young Egypt. In the 1940s, middle and upper class feminists (sometimes the wives and sisters of male Marxists), mostly Jewish women, also started joining and creating Communist organizations: rejecting Huda Shaarawi's Feminist Union and Fatma Nimit Rashid's Feminist Party, in 1944-1945 they set up the League of Women Students & Graduates from the University & Egyptian Institutes. The League of Women Students & Graduates was shut down in 7/1946 by Sidqi Pasha. Jews in Egypt (most holding foreign passports) in the 1940s numbered some 75000-80000 of 0.04-0.05% of the population; 45-50% of Egyptian Jews lived in Cairo and 35-40% in Alexandria. About 1% of Jews, 500-700 were Communists, but in the small Egyptian Left, this gave them a very disproportionate role; this role would diminish after WWII.

20060. Botman, Selma. "Unification and Division in the Communist Movement1947-1954", in The Rise of Egyptian Communism, 1939-1970. Contemporary Issues of the Middle East. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 69-114. As nationalism grew in strength in Egypt, the disunity of the left became a greater problem. At the end of 5/1947, EMNL and Iskra joined forced in the Democratic Movement for National Liberation (DMNL) (also Hadeto, an acronym from the Arabic): this organization would be the most important Communist organization in Egypt in the later 1940s and 1950s. In 5/1947, DMNL had 1700 members (800 from EMNL, the rest from Iskra and the Peoples Liberation movement). DMNL was organized on the basis of cells, financed by subscriptions from members. However, despite the cell structure, the frequent social contacts among Communists made it easy for the police to identify and arrest them. DMNL published internal handwritten or typed bulletins, as well as clandestine newspapers: al-Qaida (The Base), al-Kifah (The Struggle), al-Talia (The Vanguard), and Saut al-Fallahin (Voice of the Peasants); main legal publications were al-Ahwar (The Masses), and later al-Malayin (The Millions), and Al-Wajib (The Duty), as well as the Voice of the Students to educate and politicize students. DMNL was successful in recruiting labor leaders and... workers, and were especially successful in recruiting workers in textiles, transportation, telecommunications, hotels, shipping, tobacco and military men (although the Free Officers were more successful). A key strike effort by the DMNL and unions was the failed effort to protest the plan of the Misr Spinning & Weaving Co. to layoff workers as it automated; while the strike failed, the strike did radicalize workers in other industrial sectors. Efforts to recruit among the peasants were hampered by breakdowns in security in rural areas: especially as the DMNL started to break down into factions, efforts in the countryside failed. In 1950-1952, DMNL operated through several fronts in legal organizing efforts: for example, the Movement of Peace Supporters, formed in 1950, as a branch of the World Peace Council (the broad-based group drew together Jews, members of the Muslim Brotherhood, Wald, women and artists).

In 1946, the DMNL started to factionalize, as dissatisfaction with the pace of progress, personality clashes, unfulfilled political programs, ideological differences and police strikes created divisions in the group. These problems created splits within the group since there was no internal dialogue. The DMNL split into the DMNL-Revolutionary Workers, DMNL-Communist, Toward a Communist Party, Vanguard of the Egyptian Communist Party (none of which had much lasting impact), and the Voice of the Opposion (created by Sidney and Odette Solomon, adopted an ultra-left position, remained restricted to former DMNL intellectuals, and created a permanent split in the Egyptian left).

In 1947, the British referred the Palestine question to the UN: when Russia endorsed the creation of Israel (believing the state would weaken the British Empire and be a Marxist state), the Egyptian left also endorsed the partition of Palestine. As early as the mid-1940s, Marcel Israel had created the Jewish League to Combat Zionism; merging with Iskra, the group produced a pamphlet 'Against Zionism' (the League was dissolved in 1947 by PM Nuqrasri, who had strong ties to Jewish Zionist business interests). Endorsing the partition plan of DMNL led to Jewish-Egyptian conflicts within DMNL, with Sd Suleyman Rifai demanding the expulsion of Henri Curiel and Hillel Schwartz. With the majority of Egyptians backing the right of the Palestinians to all of Palestine, the DMNL choose to stand for Zionism: when police raids decimated the Left, it had little popular support.

In 1945, the Egyptian Communist Party was established from Egyptian students that had traveled to Europe for their education: its initial members were numerous Jews, as well as Fuad Mursi, Ismail Sabri Abd Allah, and Mustafa Safwan. Well established by 1948, the group worked to consolidate other Egyptian Communist groups: many factions of the old DMNL merged into the new party. By contrast with the loose organization of the DMNL, ECP had an 'iron' organization. In the early 1950s, ECP established ties with Madi Al-Fatat (then called the Socialist Party), with the Nationalist Party of Fathi Radwan, and with intellectuals such as Ihsan Abd al-Qadus (then editor of the newspaper Roz al-Yusuf). Such united front efforts never yielded much due to conflicting programs of the groups. [Text] 20062. Chaitkin, Anton. Press Release: Rockefeller and Mass Murder: International Conference on Population & Development. S.L., August 24, 1994. The Rockefeller Foundation is the prime sponsor of public relations for the United Nations' drastic depopulation program, which the world is invited to accept at the UN's scheduled September conference in Cairo, Egypt. Evidence in the possession of a growing number of researchers in America, England, and Germany demonstrates that the Foundation and its corporate, medical, and political associates organized the racial mass murder program of Nazi Germany. These globalists, who sold Fascism as a conduit for British Empire geopolitics, were not stopped after World War II. The United Nations alliance of the old Nazi rightwing with the New Age leftwing poses an even graver danger to the world today than the same grouping did in 1941. Oil monopolist John D. Rockefeller created the family-run Rockefeller Foundation in 1909. By 1929 he had placed $300 million worth of the family's controlling interest of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey (later called 'Exxon') to the account of the Foundation. The Foundation's money created the medical specialty known as Psychiatric Genetics. For the new experimental field, the Foundation reorganized medical teaching in Germany, creating and thenceforth continuously directing the 'Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Psychiatry' and the 'Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Anthropology, Eugenics and Human Heredity.' The Rockefellers' chief executive of these institutions was the fascist Swiss psychiatrist Ernst Rudin, assisted by his proteges Otmar Verschuer and Franz J. Kalimann. In 1932, the British-led ' Eugenics' movement designated the Rockefellers' Dr. Rudin as the president of the worldwide Eugenics Federation. The movement called for the killing or sterilization of people whose heredity made them a public burden.

The Racial Laws: A few months later, Hitler took over Germany and the Rockefeller-Rudin apparatus became a section of the Nazi state. The regime appointed Rudin head of the Racial Hygiene Society. Rudin and his staff, as part of the Task Force of Heredity Experts chaired by SS chief Heinrich Himmler, drew up the sterilization law. Described as an American Model law, it was adopted in 1933 and proudly printed in the 1938 Eugenical News (USA) with Hitler’s signature. The Rockefeller group drew up other race laws, also based on existing Virginia statutes. Otmar Verschuer and his assistant Josef Mengele together wrote reports for special courts which enforced Rudin’s racial purity law against cohabitation of Aryans and non-Aryans. The “T4” unit of the Hitler Chancery, based on psychiatrists led by Rudin and his staff, cooperated in creating and then spreading films to sell eugenics to German citizens. The public reacted antagonistically: Hitler had to withdraw a tear-jerker right-to-die film from the movie theaters. The proper groundwork had not yet been laid. Under the Nazis, the German chemical company I.G. Farben and Rockefeller’s Standard Oil of New Jersey were effectively a single firm, merged in hundreds of cartel arrangements. I.G. Farben was led up until 1937 by the Warburg family, Rockefeller’s partner in banking and in the design of Nazi German eugenics. Following the German invasion of Poland in 1939, Standard Oil pledged to keep the merger with I.G. Farben going even if the US entered the war. This was exposed in 1942 by Sen. Harry Truman’s investigating committee, and President Roosevelt took hundreds of legal measures during the war to stop the Standard-I.G. Farben cartel from supplying the enemy war machine. In 1940-1941, I.G. Farben built a gigantic factory at Auschwitz in Poland, to utilize the Standard Oil/I.G. Farben patents with concentration camp slave labor to make gasoline from coal. The SS was assigned to guard the Jewish and other inmates and select for killing those who were unfit for IG Farben slave labor. Standard-Germany president Emil Heßertestified after the war that Standard Oil funds helped pay for SS guards at Auschwitz. In 1940, six months after the notorious Standard-I.G. meeting, European Rockefeller Foundation official Daniel O’Brien wrote to the Foundation’s chief medical officer Alan Gregg that “it would be unfortunate if it was chosen to stop research which has no relation to war issues”--so the Foundation continued financing Nazi “psychiatric research” during the war. In 1936, Rockefeller’s Dr. Franz Kallmann interrupted his study of hereditary degeneracy and emigrated to America because he was half-Jewish. Kallmann went to New York and established the Medical Genetics Department of the New York State Psychiatric Institute. The Scottish Rite of Freemasonry published Kallman’s study of over 1000 cases of schizophrenia, which tried to prove its hereditary basis. In the book, Kallmann thanked his long-time boss and mentor Rudin. Kallmann’s book, published in 1938 in the USA and Nazi Germany, was used by the T4 unit as a rationalization to begin in 1939 the murder of mental patients and various “defective” people, perhaps most of them children. Gas and lethal injections were used to kill 250,000 under this program, in which the staffs for a broader murder program were desensitized and trained.

Dr. Mengele: In 1934, Otmar Verschuer’s assistant Josef Mengele was made medical commandant of Auschwitz. As wartime director of Rockefeller’s Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Anthropology, Eugenics and Human Heredity in Berlin, Verschuer secured funds for Mengele’s experiments at Auschwitz from the German Research Council. Verschuer wrote a progress report to the Council: “My co-researcher in this research is my assistant the anthropologist and physician Mengele. He is serving as Hauptsturmfuhrer and camp doctor in the concentration camp Auschwitz.... With the permission of the Reichsfuehrer SS Himmler, anthropological research is being undertaken on the various racial groups in the concentration camps and blood samples will be sent to my laboratory for investigation.” Mengele prowled the railroad lines leading into Auschwitz, looking for twins—a favorite subject of psychiatric geneticists. On arrival at Mengele’s experimental station, twins filled out “a detailed questionnaire from the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute.” There were daily drawings of blood for Verschuer’s “specific protein” research. Needles were injected into eyes for work on eye color. There were experimental blood transfusions and infections. Organs and limbs were removed, sometimes without anesthetics. Sex changes were attempted. Females were sterilized, males castrated. Thousands were murdered and their organs, eyeballs, heads, and limbs were sent to Verschuer and the Rockefeller group at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute. In 1946, Verschuer wrote to the Bureau of Human Heredity in London, asking for help in continuing his "scientific research."

Facelift: In 1947, the Bureau of Human Heredity moved from London to Copenhagen. The new Danish building for this was built with Rockefeller money. The first International Congress in Human Genetics following World War II was held at this Danish institute in 1956. By that time, Verschuer was a member of the American Eugenics Society, then indistinguishable from Rockefeller’s Population Council. Dr. Kallmann, in his book, published in 1934, in his demography, in his demographics, that is really what Dr. Kallmann created the American Society of Human Genetics, which organized the “Human Genome Project”–a current $3 billion physical and culturalism effort. Kallmann was a director of the American Eugenics Society in 1952 and from 1954-1965. In the 1950s, the Rockefellers reorganized the US eugenics movement in their own family offices, with spinoff population-control and abortion groups. The Eugenics Society changed its name to the Society for the Study of Social Biology, its current name. The Rockefeller Foundation had long financed the eugenics movement in England, apparently repaying Britain for the fact that British capital and an Englishman-partner had started old John D. Rockefeller out in his Oil Trust. In the 1960s, the Eugenics Society of England adopted what they called Crypto-eugenics, stating in their official reports that they would do eugenics through means and instruments not labeled as eugenics. With support from the Rockefellers, the Eugenics Society (England) set up a sub-committee called the International Planned Parenthood Federation, which for 12 years had no other address than the Eugenics Society. This, then, is the private, international apparatus which has set the world up for a global holocaust, under the UN flag. [+]
My daughter and I were talking about Haiti a few months ago, and I was telling her about her mother and I had gone to Haiti once many years ago, shortly after we married and about what sadness and hope I had seen there at the same time and what had happened since then. And she said to me, I know all that, Dad, because I've seen aerial photographs from space. And if you look at the island, you can see where the Dominican Republic ends and where Haiti begins. And there couldn't be all that environmental destruction without all those other problems you talked about. It was a stunning thing—from the perspective of an American schoolchild—that sort of wraps all this up.

I say that to make this point: We have to be disciplined in saying well, all right, how much time and how much money and how much energy have we got; and we have to order our priorities. But we cannot be naive enough to think that it is so easy to isolate one of these issues as opposed to another, that there is some silver bullet that solves the future of the world. If you look at the rate at which natural resources are disappearing and you look at the rate at which the gap between rich and poor is growing, if you look at the fact that the world's population has doubled since 74 nations met in Rome only 40 years ago, it is clear that we need a comprehensive approach to the world's future. We put it under the buzzword of sustainable development. I guess, but there is no way that we can approach tomorrow unless we are at least mindful of our common responsibilities in all these areas. During the nine days of the upcoming Cairo conference, more than 2 million people will enter our world—more than 2 million new babies will be born into a world in which already one-third of our children are hungry, two of every five people on Earth lack basic sanitation, and large parts of the world exist with only one doctor for every 35000-40000 people. Reversing these realities will require innovation and commitment and a determination to do what can be done over a long period of time—while all of us around the world are busy with our own business within our own borders. It will require us to be willing to think anew about the relationship of human development to what is going on in all of these nations; to cast aside a lot of our ideas from the past—when it was always tempting to believe that there was one single thing we could do—some silver bullet—that would make everything all right. [=]

2006A. Clinton, Bill. "Sustainable Development: Advancing a Vision Of Sustainable Development: President Clinton: Address to the National Academy of Sciences, Washington, DC, 6/24/1994: Part 2: Principles For a Shared Prosperity", in US Department of State Dispatch, July 18, 1994. To bring about shared prosperity, as Professor Homer Dixon has written, the nations of the world simply must move forward on many fronts at one time. Reducing population growth without providing economic opportunity won't work. Without education, it's hard to imagine how basic health care will ever take hold. Ignored, these challenges will continue to divide people from one another. We simply have to solve these problems together—the problems together, and together as the people of the world. I'm really proud of the fact that the G-7 has agreed to address some of these issues in a serious way this week in Naples. We're going to talk about what we can do within the G-7 to promote not just growth but more jobs—because a lot of the wealthy countries are finding they can't create jobs even when they grow their economy. And then, when they can't do that, they lose the constituency at home to engage the rest of the world. We're going to talk about how we build an economic infrastructure for the 21st century. What's this new world trade organization that we create with GATT going to look like? What should the World Bank and the IMF do? We're also going to talk about how we can help economies in transition, such as the states of the former Soviet Union, and what we can do with the economies that are not in transition—or, if anything, are going the wrong way—to address our common responsibilities. This is quite a unique thing, really, for the world's advanced nations. And we're quite pleased that with all the economic problems that exist in many of these countries they are willing to have a serious look at where we should spend the 10-20 years from now—far beyond the election prospects of the world leaders who will be there. As we head for the Cairo conference, I think that same approach has to guide us. The policies we promote must be based on enduring values—promoting stronger families, having more responsibility on individual citizens, respecting human rights, deepening the bonds of community. Here at home and around the globe, that's where the future lies, beginning with our families. When they're whole and they function, families nurture and care for us. They provide role models. They communicate values and enable people to live together in peace and work together for common objectives. Therefore, that is the most important thing we can do. Since the beginning of this administration, we have worked to promote policies that would permit families to grow in strength at home and abroad. I reversed the so-called Mexico City policy because I thought that doctors and medical workers around the world should be able to really work on family planning and provide a full range of family-planning information. Since then, we have increased by about 50%-at-a very tough budget time—the Agency for International Development's budget for international family-planning and support services. To bolster families here at home, we passed a big increase in the earned income tax credit to help keep 1 million working families off welfare, out of poverty, and in the work force. We increased Head Start availability and nutrition programs to hundreds of thousands of children, cracked down on delinquent child-support payments, and increased immunization funds so that we can increase by literally more than a million the number of children who are immunized. We're working to reduce out-ofwedlock and teen births. Through the Family and Medical Leave Act, we're working to make it possible for people to be successful workers and successful parents—a big issue everywhere in the world now, when more and more parents must work. Any society which forces people to choose is doomed to failure. If people have no option but to work and we all need people to continue to bear children, then surely all of our parents must be successful workers and our workers must be able to succeed as parents. Our population policy is rooted in the idea that the family should be at the center of all of our objectives. Therefore, there must be support for the concept of responsibility—of parents to their children, of men and women to one another, and of our current generation to future generations. Progress brings freedom; freedom requires more disciplined responsibility. We must teach our young people to choose wisely, and tell them that their choices must include abstinence. Our policy always has been rooted in the ethical principles of compassion and justice and respect for human rights. We have supported every individual's dignity and worth. And we will continue to oppose and condemn all forms of coercion in family planning. [=]

2006B. Clinton, Bill. "Sustainable Development: Advancing a Vision Of Sustainable Development: President Clinton: Address to the National Academy of Sciences, Washington, DC, 6/24/1994: Part 3: Translating Principles Into Reality", in US Department of State Dispatch, July 18, 1994. Helping to translate these principles into reality is the charge that the Vice President will take to Cairo in September. No one is better suited to this task than he. He has shown his commitment to these long-term challenges, and he had been thinking in large ways about them long before they were politically unpopular or even the source of much current discussion. In Cairo, we'll join the international community in pursuing a new plan of action to attack the population problem as part of the larger issue of sustainable development. At the top of our agenda will be active support for efforts to invest in the women of the world. Over the long run, maybe the most important thing that the Cairo policy will call for is for every nation make an effort to educate its children on an equal basis, to increase in the earned income tax credit to help keep 1 million working families off welfare, out of poverty, and in the work force. We increased Head Start availability and nutrition programs to hundreds of thousands of children, cracked down on delinquent child-support payments, and increased immunization funds so that we can increase by literally more than a million the number of children who are immunized. We're working to reduce out-ofwedlock and teen births. Through the Family and Medical Leave Act, we're working to make it possible for people to be successful workers and successful parents—a big issue everywhere in the world now, when more and more parents must work. Any society which forces people to choose is doomed to failure. If people have no option but to work and we all need people to continue to bear children, then surely all of our parents must be successful workers and our workers must be able to succeed as parents. Our population policy is rooted in the idea that the family should be at the center of all of our objectives. Therefore, there must be support for the concept of responsibility—of parents to their children, of men and women to one another, and of our current generation to future generations. Progress brings freedom; freedom requires more disciplined responsibility. We must teach our young people to choose wisely, and tell them that their choices must include abstinence. Our policy always has been rooted in the ethical principles of compassion and justice and respect for human rights. We have supported every individual's dignity and worth. And we will continue to oppose and condemn all forms of coercion in family planning. [=]
Contrary to some assertions, we do not support abortion as a method of family planning. We respect, however, the diversity of national laws—except we do oppose coercion whenever it exists. Our own policy in the United States is that this should be a matter of personal choice, not public dictation. And, as I have said many times, abortion should be safe, legal, and rare. In other countries where it does exist, we believe safety is an important issue. And if you look at the mortality figures, it is hard to turn away from that issue. We also believe that providing women with the means to prevent unwanted pregnancy will do more than anything else to reduce abortion. Finally, let me say, we must take to Cairo the same basic commitment to provide health care for every citizen of the world that we have brought to the public debate here in America. I must say that there is less disagreement among the representatives of the 174 countries going to Cairo than there is among the 35 members of Congress. Maybe we can bring the spirit back home. Experience shows that investing in maternal health, prenatal services, and preventive care for children not only saves lives, it eventually gives people the confidence they need from knowing that their children will survive. And that changes all kinds of attitudes that affect the way children are raised. Every country has committed itself to improving the health of women and children. And every one that has really done that has seen a decline in population growth and a rise in prosperity. The Cairo conference, therefore, can do a great deal to advance our vision of sustainable development and stabilized population growth and to help us fulfill a vision of a world of intact families in which every member is cherished, a world that has the wisdom and the strength to tackle challenges head on instead of talking about them and using words to divide people so they don't really address the challenges, a world that will lead to equal opportunity and shared prosperity. When President Roosevelt died in 194, there was a typed manuscript of his last speech, which was found with just a single sentence written in his own hand. This was the last sentence of the last speech that Franklin Roosevelt had written—one that he never got to give. His handwritten sentence said, "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith." In the face of so many seemingly intractable problems, it is certainly tempting to let those doubts take control. But I think those of you here tonight believe as I do that we can, instead, search for and find solutions that will help generations yet to come. President Roosevelt governed at a time when doubt was a luxury the American people clearly did not afford. I say to you, tonight, doubt is a luxury the world can no longer afford. I commend you for your compassion and your commitment. I urge you to turn this faith into action and to help me to do my job to do the same. [=]

20066. Cockburn, Alexander. "The Greed Factor Behind US Population Policy", in Seattle Times, September 9, 1994, p. B4. The US official line of 'empowering women' through its population policy, vigorously advanced at the UN Population Conference in Cairo, is a thin lie. An AID report on US population policy for Haiti makes clear that the only rationale underlying US population policy for the Third World is simply to keep inferior races from breeding. The US goal for Haiti, embodied in a secret 6/1993 AID document, envisions 200,000 new 'acceptors' of contraceptives', and 23 sterilization clinics, termed 'voluntary surgical contraception' facilities. There is no mention at all of women's health issues, which is the public smoke screen for this policy: indeed, the document rejects the value of any medical examinations of women 'targeted' for sterilization of contraceptives. The Brooklyn based Haitian women's group, Women of Koalisyon, has issued a report detailing abuses of women by AID funded clinics in Haiti. Abuses include: offers of food for sterilization; promises that irreversible sterilization is easily reversible; promises that sterilization prevents AIDS; misrepresentation of Norplant (5-year implants) as free of side-effects; and then refusal to remove Norplant implants. Notably, the cynicism of the Clinton Administration policy echoes that of Henry Kissinger in his National Security Study Memorandum 200 in 1974, which read in part: that the US should 'help minimize charges of imperialist motivation behind its support of population activities by repeatedly asserting that such support derives from a concern with the right of the individual to determine freely and responsibly the number and spacing of children'. Kissinger forthrightly asserted in this study that the reason for slowing population growth in the Third World was to ensure US access to their natural resources. By 1977, Reimert Ravenholt, director of AID's population program, stated that the goal of AID was the sterilize one-quarter of the world's women. In India, AID tactics included requirement of 100% sterilization of a village in return for a new well, or cash rewards for 75% sterilization rates. Sterilization of Third World women has become the central goal of US population policy, which would ensure US access to Third World natural resources under the guise of empowering women. [TXT]

20067. Coordinating Committee for the US Network for Cairo 1994; US Network for Cairo 1994. US Network for Cairo 1994: August Update: Part 1: On To Cairo. New York: US Network for Cairo 1994, August 1994. The Network's last pre-Cairo event, a half-day briefing on last minute issues of concern to folks planning on traveling to Cairo will be held here in D.C. on Thursday, August 18, 1994 at 2:00 p.m. (Call for location.) Speakers will include Jim Lawrence, Executive Director, Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration, US Department of State; Mary Beth Powers, Executive Director, NGO Forum; and Sally Ethelston, Director Media Relations, Population Action International. Briefing will cover security arrangements, logistics, the NGO Forum, and information for Cairo visitors. The Environmental and Religious Interest Groups are planning regular caucuses in Cairo. Contact the interest group directly for information.

At the State Department's "First Tuesday" briefing on August 2nd, current information on logistics for Cairo were reviewed (see enclosures). The Official US Delegation has been announced (copy enclosed). The delegation will hold a briefing with US NGOs at 2:00 p.m. every day at the NGO Forum. The first briefing will be held in the Multi Media Center (see enclosed description). Revised advisories for travelers and other background information was distributed by State Department representatives (copies enclosed). Latest word on representation leads us to believe that "international NGOs" will be allotted 5 non-transferable passes to the official Conference Center while "National NGOs" will be allocated 2 non-transferable passes. Access to the NGO Forum will be unlimited, but does require registration and payment of the $50 registration fee. Network Scholarship Awards: The US Network for Cairo '94 Administrative Committee recommended and the Coordinating Committee approved disbursement of over $10000 in scholarship money to individuals representing the following organizations: Sisterlove, Inc.; Project Azuka, Inc.; Georgia Women Preventing AIDS Campaign; Action for Youth C.C.; Tam Cam Project; National Women and HIV/AIDS Project; Boston Women's Health Book Collective; The Gathering Place; Women of All Red Nations; One with Creation; Anoka United Methodist Church/Board for Global Ministries; African American Future Society; Committee on Women, Population and the Environment; and the International Council of Ethelston, Director Media Relations, Population Action International. The Environmental and Religious Interest Groups are planning regular caucuses in Cairo. Contact the interest group directly for information.

The Environment and Religious Interest Groups are planning regular caucuses in Cairo. Contact the interest group directly for information.

At the State Department's "First Tuesday" briefing on August 2nd, current information on logistics for Cairo were reviewed (see enclosures). The Official US Delegation has been announced (copy enclosed). The delegation will hold a briefing with US NGOs at 2:00 p.m. every day at the NGO Forum. The first briefing will be held in the Multimedia Center (see enclosed description). Revised advisories for travelers and other background information was distributed by State Department representatives (copies enclosed). Latest word on representation leads us to believe that "international NGOs" will be allotted 5 non-transferable passes to the official Conference Center while "National NGOs" will be allocated 2 non-transferable passes. Access to the NGO Forum will be unlimited, but does require registration and payment of the $50 registration fee. Network Scholarship Awards: The US Network for Cairo '94 Administrative Committee recommended and the Coordinating Committee approved disbursement of over $10000 in scholarship money to individuals representing the following organizations: Sisterlove, Inc.; Project Azuka, Inc.; Georgia Women Preventing AIDS Campaign; Action for Youth C.C.; Tam Cam Project; National Women and HIV/AIDS Project; Boston Women's Health Book Collective; The Gathering Place; Women of All Red Nations; One with Creation; Anoka United Methodist Church/Board for Global Ministries; African American Future Society; Committee on Women, Population and the Environment; and the International Council of

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
New York, NY 10017, (fax: 212-297-5250) (please see earlier notes regarding potential restrictions on the number of representatives)

(2) For the latest on the ICPD and related Administration activities call the new State Department Population Hotline at 202-663-3070. The NGO Planning Committee for the ICPD requests that NGOs planning to attend the ICPD make travel reservations and complete and return their NGO Forum registrations (see enclosed forms) as soon as possible.

(3) Network “interest groups” are available. The purpose of these groups is to facilitate communication among individuals and organizations concerned about specific issues. Interest groups may advocate a particular viewpoint. However, interest group views and positions can not be ascribed to the Network. The following individuals are organizing interest groups. Please contact them for further information.

(4) Religious Interest Group, Douglas Hunt, Church Center for Sustainable Communities/United Church of Christ, 1820 Sanford Road, Wheaton MD 20902-4008, phone & fax: 301-593-4724. Next meeting is June 20th, 2:00 p.m. (a) ZPG, 1400 Sixteenth ST, NW - Suite 320, Washington DC 20036.

(5) Men's Roles and Responsibilities, Nick Danforth, Association for Voluntary Surgical Contraception, 79 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016 (212) 561-8000.

(6) People Sustaining People: a group of people of color who are working to influence US and international population policies, Sarah Moten, National Council of Negro Women, 1667 K St., NW, Washington, DC 20006 (202) 659-0006.

(7) Religious Interest Group, Douglas Hunt, Church Center for Sustainable Communities/United Church of Christ, 1820 Sanford Road, Wheaton MD 20902-4008, phone & fax: 301-593-4724. Next meeting is June 20th, 2:00 p.m. (a) ZPG, 1400 Sixteenth ST, NW - Suite 320, Washington DC 20036.

(8) Adolescent Sexual and Reproductive Health Concerns, Dr. Asha Mohammed, Center for Population Options, 1025 Vermont Avenue, NW, Washington, DC 20005 (202) 347-5700.

(9) Men's Roles and Responsibilities, Nick Danforth, Association for Voluntary Surgical Contraception, 79 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016 (212) 561-8000.

(10) People Sustaining People: a group of people of color who are working to influence US and international population policies, Sarah Moten, National Council of Negro Women, 1667 K St., NW, Washington, DC 20006 (202) 659-0006.

(2) The NGO Planning Committee for the ICPD requests that NGOs planning to attend the ICPD make travel reservations and complete and return their NGO Forum registrations (see enclosed forms) as soon as possible.

(3) Global Issues Forum, US State Department, Thursday, June 23rd, 2:00 p.m. R.S.V.P. 202-647-0753. State Department “First Tuesday Briefings” continue on the first Tuesday of each month at 10:00 a.m. at the Office of Personnel Management, 19th & “E” Streets, NW, Washington DC. July’s meeting will feature a presentation by the Agency for International Development.

(4) Network “interest groups” are available. The purpose of these groups is to facilitate communication among individuals and organizations concerned about specific issues. Interest groups may advocate a particular viewpoint. However, interest group views and positions can not be ascribed to the Network. The following individuals are organizing interest groups. Please contact them for further information.

(5) Religious Interest Group, Douglas Hunt, Church Center for Sustainable Communities/United Church of Christ, 1820 Sanford Road, Wheaton MD 20902-4008, phone & fax: 301-593-4724. Next meeting is June 20th, 2:00 p.m. (a) ZPG, 1400 Sixteenth ST, NW - Suite 320, Washington DC 20036.

(6) Adolescent Sexual and Reproductive Health Concerns, Dr. Asha Mohammed, Center for Population Options, 1025 Vermont Avenue, NW, Washington, DC 20005 (202) 347-5700.

(7) Religious Interest Group, Douglas Hunt, Church Center for Sustainable Communities/United Church of Christ, 1820 Sanford Road, Wheaton MD 20902-4008, phone & fax: 301-593-4724. Next meeting is June 20th, 2:00 p.m. (a) ZPG, 1400 Sixteenth ST, NW - Suite 320, Washington DC 20036.

(8) Adolescent Sexual and Reproductive Health Concerns, Dr. Asha Mohammed, Center for Population Options, 1025 Vermont Avenue, NW, Washington, DC 20005 (202) 347-5700.

(9) Men's Roles and Responsibilities, Nick Danforth, Association for Voluntary Surgical Contraception, 79 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016 (212) 561-8000.

(10) People Sustaining People: a group of people of color who are working to influence US and international population policies, Sarah Moten, National Council of Negro Women, 1667 K St., NW, Washington, DC 20006 (202) 659-0006.

The World Bank also notes that the rate at which life expectancies have improved in less developed countries has declined since 1955 - from 2.7 years in the periods 1950-55 and 1955-60 to 2.6 years in 1960-65 and to only 2.0 years in 1965-70. [World Bank, "Health," Sector Policy Paper, District of Columbia, 3/1974, annex 2, p. 3.] A particularly significant factor in the slowdown of the decline of LDC mortality appears to be that mortality in childhood has shown a somewhat greater resistance to decline than mortality at some later ages. [Tim Dyson, "Levels, Trends, Differential and Causes of Child Mortality - A Survey," World Health Statistics Report, vol. 30, no. 4, 1977, pp. 289-90.]

The persistence of infectious diseases (above all diarrhea) that cannot be conquered with modern medicine is, in large part, responsible for slowing the decline in infant mortality. Malaria control, antibiotics, and immunization programs have brought some quick, dramatic gains, but further progress depends on improvements in nutrition and sanitation, which are coming along slowly, if at all. According to Dr. John Bryant (formerly with the Rockefeller Foundation, now with the office of International Health, US Department of Health, Education and Welfare):

"The great weapons of modern medicine are aimed at the pathophysiology of disease and its susceptibility to pharmaceutical, immunological, or surgical attack. Health services are designed to deliver these weapons mainly through the hands of doctors. The dismal fact is that these great killers of children - diarrhea, pneumonia, malnutrition - are beyond the reach of these weapons.

"If children sick with these diseases reach the physician, there are sharp limits to what he can do. Diarrhea and pneumonia are often not affected by antibiotics, and the frequent presence of malnutrition makes even supportive therapy difficult or futile. And even these interventions by the physician, whether or not they are therapeutically effective, are only sporadic ripples in a running tide of disease. We are speaking of societies in which, at any given time, a third of the children may have diarrhea and more than that may be malnourished. Their lives are saturated with the causes - poverty, crowding, ignorance, poor ventilation, filth, flies." [John Bryant, Health and the Developing World, Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell, 1969, p. 39.]

The causes of high infant-mortality rates are well known and closely linked to environmental conditions. As shown in Table 13-11, the diseases most often fatal during early childhood in a developing area (in this case, Latin America) are fecally related and airborne contagious diseases. Although diseases such as cholera, typhoid, and polio all contribute to the mortality statistics, intestinal parasites and various infectious diarrheal diseases are probably the most devastating of the fecally related types. Surveys of parasite-infected populations frequently show from 70% to 90% infestations. [W. J. van Zijl, "Studies on Diarrheal Diseases in Seven Countries by the WHO Diarrheal Diseases Advisory Team," Bulletin of the World Health Organization, vol. 35, no. 2, 1966, pp. 249-61.] In Egypt, Iran, and Venezuela, the monthly incidence of diarrhea among preschool children has been estimated to be 40-50%. [W. J. van Zijl, "Studies on Diarrheal Diseases in Seven Countries by the WHO Diarrheal Diseases Advisory Team," Bulletin of the World Health Organization, vol. 35, no. 2, 1966, pp. 249-61.]

The effects of diarrhea, pneumonia, and intestinal parasites are greatly aggravated by undernutrition, which is the major underlying cause of death among children. Deaths from infection nearly always result from a combination of undernutrition and infection. When women are undernourished, too frequent pregnancies result in malnutrition for the mother and baby, low average birth weights, and poor resistance to disease.

The prospects for reducing malnutrition are mixed. The Global 2000 Study food projections, in the medium case, show only limited improvement in per capita food availability and, in some instances, declines. Furthermore, when food distribution among income classes is taken into consideration, the number of malnourished, disease-vulnerable children is likely to increase by 2000. Increased death rates in parts of Asia have already been observed during poor crop years. [Lester R. Brown, World Population Trends: Signs of Hope, Signs of Stress, District of Columbia: Worldwatch Institute, 10/1976, pp. 15-25.]

To further complicate the situation, many of the diseases most threatening health in developing countries are becoming increasingly resistant to drugs now being used in their treatment. [Sheldon M. Wolff and John V. Bennetts, "Gram-Negative Rod Bacteremia," New England Journal of Medicine, 10/3/1974, pp. 733-34; Henry E. Simmons and Paul D. Stolley, "This is Medical Progress? Trends and Consequences of Antibiotic Use in the US," Journal of the American Medical Association, 3/4/1974, pp. 1023-28; LaVerne C. Harold, "Transferable Drug Resistance and the Ecologic Effects of Antibiotics, in M. Taghi Farvar and John P. Milton, eds., The Careless Technology, Ecology and International Development, Garden City: Natural History Press/Doubleday, 1972, pp. 35-46.] Already drug-resistant pathogen strains [Pathogen resistance to drugs is not limited to developing countries; it causes increased mortality in industrialized societies as well] ("Rise of Antibiotic-Resistant Bacteria," Science News, 8/24-31/1974, p. 119). Certain staphylococcus infections (especially in hospitals) and gonorrhea in particular are growing problems. There are many indications that drug resistance in pathogens will continue to increase throughout the world (Marietta Whittlesley, "The Runaway Use of Antibiotics," New York Times Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122). Coastal waters off New York have been contaminated with both sewage and mercury. Tests show that bacteria in these waters have developed varying degrees of resistance to ampicillin, tetracycline, kanamycin, and streptomycin, and research with both the genus Vibro and the genus Bacillus led to the conclusion that ampicillin resistance and mercury resistance are genetically linked (Marine Ecosystems Analysis Program, New York Bight Project Annual Report for FY 1976-77, Boulder, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, 1977, p. 28.) have contributed to severe epidemics in several LDCs.

In Central America between 1966 and 1971, a dysentery pandemic occurred in which the drugs normally used to treat the disease proved ineffective [Sheldon M. Wolff and John V. Bennetts, "Gram-Negative Rod Bacteremia," New England Journal of Medicine, 10/3/1974, pp. 733-34.]

In recent years resistance to commonly used therapeutic agents against malaria has increased substantially in South America and Southeast Asia. There is every reason to believe that these resistant strains will spread, thus hampering treatment and eradication. [World Health Organization, Weekly Epidemiological Record, 10/14/1977-11/11/1977, pp. 325-70; 6/23-30/1978, pp. 181-96.] In short, there is growing evidence that numerous pathogens and vectors [See the food and agriculture section of this chapter for a discussion of the increasing problems of insecticide resistance and immunities developing in strains of insect vectors.] are evolving strains that are resistant to many of the common and least expensive drugs.
Times Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122.] While new drugs will continue to be developed, the new drugs are often more expensive and effective for a smaller group of pathogens than those that they replace. [Marietta Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122.] Excessive use of common antibiotics both Times Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122; Janice Crossland, "Power to Resist," Environment, 3/1975, pp. 6-11.] and in animal feed [Office of Technology Assessment, Drugs in Livestock Feed, vol. I, Technical Report, District of Columbia: GPO, 1979.] may increase the rate at which resistant strains evolve. The most inexpensive, common antibiotics are widely available without prescription even in remote rural LDCs.
Times Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122.] And the appearance of resistant bacterial strains may not be due only to low probability mutations; it is now thought that epidemic diseases may suddenly acquire resistant traits through higher-probability contacts with more common, harmless intestinal species that have already evolved their own resistance.
Times Magazine, 5/6/1979, p. 122.] If the reduced LDC mortality figures projected in the population chapter are to be achieved, progress must be made in controlling the facially related diseases, the airborne diseases, and the increased mortality associated with these diseases as a result of nutritional deficiency. These diseases are largely of environmental origin and can be controlled only through improved environmental and sanitation conditions and through improved nutrition and education, all of which require capital investment, as well as through changes of habits and cultural traditions. As discussed above under urbanization in the LDCs, there is reason to question whether the needed improvements in sanitary and environmental conditions will occur. By the year 2000, sanitary conditions in some areas may even deteriorate. This situation, worsened by increasing scarcities of food and energy in poorer regions, could lead to an increase, rather than a decrease, in mortality rates among some populations [Davidson R. Gwatkin, "The Sad News About the Death Rate," Washington Post, 12/2/1978, op ed page; and his "The End of an Era: A Review of the Literature and Data Concerning Third World Mortality Trends," District of Columbia: Overseas Development Council, forthcoming.]

20072. DPR. Tenth United Nations International NGO Meeting On The Question of Palestine: Part 16: Annex IV: List of Participants and Observers: Participants and Observers: Participant NGOs. Held on 8/25-27/1993, at Austria Center, Vienna, Austria. Palestine Groups Of Norway. Palestine Committee Of Norway. Palestine Red Crescent Society. Palestine Solidarity Association Of Sweden. Palestine Studies Program, University Of Exeter. Princeton Middle East Society. Prisoners Friends Association. Salaam - Children Of The Olive Tree. Society For Austro-Arab Relations, Spanish NGO Committee On The Question Of Palestine (Comite Espanol De Ong Sobre La Cuestion Palestina). Trust Programs For Early Childhood Family, And Community Development.
UMNO Youth - Malaysia. Union Of Palestinian Medical Relief Committee. Union Of Palestinian Women Committee. United Methodist Church - General Board Of Global Ministries. United Nations
Association Of Egypt. Women's International League For Peace &
Freedom (WILPF). World Federation Of Trade Unions (WFTU). World Peace Council (WPC). World Young Mens Christian Association (World YWCA).

20073. DS. "Egypt: Introduction", in Country Reports on Human Rights Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. According to its Constitution, Egypt is a social democracy in which Islam is the religion. The President is Hosni Mubarak, who was reelected unopposed to a 6-year term by the People's Assembly in 1993. The President appoints the Cabinet which is responsible to him. His party, the National Democratic Party (NDP), has governed since its establishment in 1978. It commands large majorities in the popularly elected People's Assembly and the Shura (Consultative) Council. One opposition party is represented in the People's Assembly: the others boycotted the previous People's Assembly election in 1990 and are not represented. There are several security services in the Ministry of Interior., two of which are primarily involved in combating extremist violence: the State Security Investigations Sector (SSIS), which conducts investigations and interrogates detainees; and the Central Security Force (CSF), which enforces curfews; bans on public demonstrations, and conducts paramilitary operations against terrorists. Egypt is a developing country with a mixed economy dominated by the public sector.
Agriculture, an almost entirely private sector, remains the largest single employer. Remittances from approximately 2 million Egyptians working in the Gulf countries are the largest source of foreign currency earnings.
In the past 4 years, the Government has enacted significant economic reforms, which have reduced the budget deficit and stabilized the exchange rate, but has made slow progress on other reforms, including privatization. The Constitution provides for various human rights, including a multiparty political system, regular elections, the rule of law, and an independent judiciary, freedom of opinion, and the right to peaceful private assembly. However, the Emergency Law continues to restrict many basic rights. There continued to be widespread human rights violations in 1994. The security services and terrorist groups remained locked m a cycle of violence. Security forces committed human rights abuses in their campaign against terrorist groups, and frequently victimized noncombatants as well. Under the Emergency Law, abuses included the widespread torture of detainees in security cases, the government's continued failure to punish those responsible for torture, arbitrary arrest, and detention without trial, and the use of military courts to try suspected terrorists. The Government continued to arrest and harass journalists and lawyers who defended accused Islamists.
Terrorists bombed banks, attacked and killed government officials, security forces, Egyptian Christians, and foreign tourists, and were responsible for the majority of civilian deaths in 1994. The ruling NDP dominates the political scene to such an extent that, as a practical matter, the citizens do not have a meaningful ability to change their government.
The Government continues to restrict substantially basic rights of expression and the press. Women and Egyptian Christians face discrimination based on tradition and some aspects of the law.

20074. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhumane, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There is convincing evidence that the police and officers of the SSIS systematically practice torture. The law does not adequately protect citizens from physical abuse by security forces. Article 126 of the Penal Code prohibits torture to obtain a confession but is silent on the mistreatment of detainees for other reasons. Punishment for offenders is imprisonment for a maximum of 10 years. A one-year sentence and a modest fine may be imposed if the injury does not reach the level of bleeding or wounding. However, Article 126 does not address such abuses as blindfolding and The Minister of Interior stated several times in 1994 that torture does not exist in detention facilities. Instances may occur, he said, but they are isolated and not official government policy. The Minister also stated that the authorities investigate all allegations and punish those responsible. Government officials have accused human rights organizations of focusing on the rights of accused terrorists, while ignoring those of the victims of extremist attacks. Officials argued that international human rights groups exaggerate torture reports, but that reporting does not take into account the extreme nature of the security threat. However, the report indicates that the Government does not adequately investigate torture complaints in cases involving suspected terrorists. Since 1986, there is no evidence that officers implicated in such cases have been prosecuted or punished. While the Government has investigated torture complaints in criminal cases and punished some officers, the punishments do not necessarily relate to the seriousness of the injury. In August the press reported that a senior SSIS officer received 6 months’ imprisonment for permanently crippling a suspect during interrogation. Officers of the SSIS allegedly are responsible for most of the torture used on suspected terrorist detainees. Prisons report that torture takes place in police stations, SSIS headquarters in Cairo, and the governorates, and at Central Security Force camps. Torture is used to extract information, coerce the victims to confess and to end their anti-government activities, and deter others from such activities. Torture victims are usually taken to a state security office where they are handcuffed, blindfolded, and questioned about their associations, religious beliefs, and political views. Victims have reported the following torture methods: detainees are frequently stripped to their underwear, hung by their wrists with their feet touching the floor or forced to stand for prolonged periods; doused with hot and cold water; beaten, forced to stand outdoors in cold weather; and subjected to electric shocks. Some victims, including female detainees, report they have been raped or threatened with rape; others report that security officers have inserted solid objects, including electric devices, into their anuses. Written records of detainees’ whereabouts are not kept while they are in the custody of the state security police, a period which may last 10 days or longer. Records are maintained only after security forces deliver the detainee to a prison. The absence of such a record in the early days of detention invites abuse and effectively blocks the investigation of torture complaints. The security forces also transfer detainees from prisons to other facilities where they are interrogated, tortured, and then returned to prison. No written records are kept on such transfers. To pressure male fugitives to surrender, security forces have taken custody of their relatives, including minors and female family members. An undetermined number of such detainees have been subjected to physical abuse. According to government sources, the prisons have a 400% occupancy rate resulting in unhealthy living conditions, severe overcrowding, and occasional outbreaks of disease. Many of the counts 31 prisons were constructed during the Ottoman era. Prisoners report cells are poorly ventilated, and food is inadequate in quantity and nutritional value. Prison officials occasionally levy collective punishment on inmates, suspending visits and delivery of food to inmates by their families. According to official prison sources, in Qanater women’s prison, the prison doctor was prosecuted for sexually molesting 12 female prisoners during examinations. Prisoners reported that prison guards beat a number of women in the aftermath of the scandal, and a sweep of the prison facilities resulted in the confiscation and destruction of many prisoners’ clothes and personal belongings. As many as 28 adolescents between the ages of 12-17 have reportedly been detained in the Assiut General Prison, a facility for adults. The charges against the adolescents reportedly include membership in the illegal Islamic Group, monitoring the movements of the police, and attempting to break into a mosque. The adolescents allege that they were blindfolded and tortured at the state security police headquarters in Assiut or at local police stations in southern Egypt. Torture methods reportedly included suspension, electric shocks, and beatings with sticks. In some cases, electricity was reportedly applied to the penis and tongue. Some of the adolescents have been detained for prolonged periods without trial in one case since 1993. Prison officials impose particularly harsh living conditions on some categories of prisoners such as Islamic activists. Al-Aqrab prison, which houses security suspects has been closed to all visitors, including lawyers, since January, despite an administrative court order in April annuling the Ministry of Interior’s ban. [7] 20075. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (a) Freedom of Speech and Press", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print, District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution provides for freedom of speech and the press. Egyptians openly express their views on a wide range of political and social issues, including vigorous criticism of the Government, without fear of retribution. Nonetheless, there are substantial limitations on the freedom of the press. The Prime Minister and the Cabinet are often targets of criticism, but the press law stipulates fines or imprisonment for criticism of the President or a foreign head of state. However, in recent years, opposition journalists have, within limits, criticized the President without harassment, although he may not be satirized in cartoons. The Government owns most major dailies, and the President appoints their editors in chief. These newspapers generally follow the government line. Nevertheless criticisms of government policies are frequently found in the government-owned press. The opposition newspapers are associated with political parties. Most are weeklies, except the centrist daily Al-Wafd and the smaller Islamist semiweekly Al-Shaab. All have small circulations. Opposition newspapers frequently publish tough criticisms of the Government, inspiring rejoinders from the government-owned press. They also give greater prominence to human rights abuses than the state-run newspapers. Most of the opposition press receives foreign funding as well as government subsidies and is printed and distributed by government-owned publishing house. The Government restricts the press in a number of ways. It controls the right to publish through its power to license newspapers. The Higher Press Council, chaired by the Speaker of the Shura Council, has the power to approve applications for licenses and publications. Most members of the Higher Press Council are close to the ruling National Democratic Party and are inclined to follow the government line. In a potentially serious move against the freedom of the press, the Higher Press Council in September issued new regulations for licensing new newspapers, requiring applicants to provide detailed information on sources of financing, editorial structure, and, in the case of a political party paper, the party’s ideology and platform. The regulations may be applied retroactively to existing newspapers and represent a significant tightening of the Government’s control over the opposition press. Opposition party papers may be called to account for publishing articles deemed inconsistent with their official ideologies. In the past, the Government has refused to license new parties whose stated platforms duplicate those of existing parties (see section 2). As in past years, the Government continued to interfere with freedom of expression, arresting and harassing Egyptian and foreign journalists, and confiscating printed material from the marketplace. In general, the Government harassed some journalists who wrote stories about corruption, portrayed Egypt in an unfavorable light, explored human rights and military issues, or who were associated with Islamist opposition elements. The Government has used such harassment to indicate that there are limits to criticism of the Government. In March state security officials interrogated journalist Moustafa Bakry for his article in Al Shabha newspaper in which he criticized the security forces’ use of violence against demonstrators protesting the massacre at the Hebron mosque in 2/1994. Also interrogated were Adel Hussein, the Chairman of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), and Magdy Hussein, Al-Shaab’s editor in chief. The three reportedly had been accused of publishing articles that threatened state security, social order, and national unity. The Government did not file charges. In the spring, state prosecutors repeatedly interrogated Magdy Hussein and the leadership of the SLP in connection with libel... suits filed against them by senior government officials for articles on official corruption. As of late September, two of the four cases had been dropped against them. In 1994, a court sentenced another reporter for Al-Shaab, m Abdul Satar Abu Hussein, to 1 year in prison for publishing state secrets in an article on US-Egyptian military exercises. Abu Hussein claimed his article was derived from open sources. He also claimed that after he was arrested, he was held incommunicado for 3 days, under torture, and questioned about articles he had written in this stories for artists and writers. For artists and writers, the previously published work, law, faculty deans were elected by their peers. The Government justified the measure as a means to combat Islamist influence in the school system. In January a court ruled against Islamist lawyers who had petitioned the court to divorce Nasr Abu Zeid, an Arabic language professor at Cairo University, from his wife on grounds that Abu Zeid's writings on the Koran were heretical. The petitioners argued that, as a heretic, Abu Zeid should not be allowed to remain married to a Muslim woman in a Muslim country. The court found the petitioners had no standing to file a divorce suit. The case was in appeal at year's end. [ ]

20076. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (c) Freedom of Religion". In Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Constitution provides freedom of belief and the practice of religious rites. However, there are important limitations. Islam is the state religion. Most Egyptians are Muslim, but approximately 10% of the population, 6 million people, belong to the Coptic Orthodox Church, the largest Christian minority in the Middle East. There are other small Christian denominations. The small Jewish community practices its religion without harassment. Members of recognized religions maintain links with coreligionists abroad. The foreign clergy pursue their ministries without harassment, but the law effectively bars non-Muslims from proselytizing. Islam accepts Christian and other converts, but Muslims face legal problems if they convert to another faith. There is no clear legal provision against conversion or proselytizing, but Article 98f of the Penal Code prohibits any person from "degrading or disdaining any of the holy religion or any of its religious sect with "the intention of harming national unity and social peace." This is interpreted as forbidding the conversion of Muslims by non-Muslims. Conviction is punishable by 6 months to 5 years' imprisonment. In 1993 the authorities twice arrested an Egyptian lay missionary for preparing Christian missionary literature for publication. A court ordered his release from detention in March. In July the Ministry of Education issued a decree prohibiting local school officials from requiring schoolgirls to wear the hegab (head scarf) without parental consent on school grounds. A group of lawyers and parents, who favored the hegab, challenged the decree. An administrative court ruled against the Minister, but his decree was later upheld by an appellate court. The courts have upheld the principle that Muslims cannot change their identity papers to reflect their conversion to a new religion. As a consequence, married male converts from Islam must register their children as Muslims, as the law considers them to be Muslims. In the past, state security forces have harassed and detained for prolonged periods Egyptian Christians accused of proselytizing Muslims. In 11/1993, security forces arrested six Coptic Christians who had sought to dissuade another Coptic Christian, who was also arrested, from converting to Islam. All seven persons were held in detention without formal charge. The Supreme State Security Court ordered their release in May. An 1856 Ottoman decree still in force requires non-Muslims to obtain what is now a presidential decree to build or repair a place of worship. Coptic Christians maintain they are frequently unable to obtain such authorization or are blocked by the security forces from using the authorizations that have been issued. As a result some communities use private buildings and apartments for religious services.

From 1992-1994, the Government increased the number of building permits issued to Christian communities to an average of more than 20 a year, compared to the average of 6 permits issued annually in the 1980's. Most permits appear to be for the repair of existing structures and not for new construction of churches. Christian and Muslim reformers urge the abolition of the Ottoman decree, but Islamists defend the building restrictions. According to human rights and legal sources, the Government in June closed two buildings in an unzoned area near Alexandria which had been used by Coptic Evangelical Christians since 1990 for church activities. Church lawyers are pursuing the legal suit against the closures. The lawyers maintain that the closures violate previous court rulings upholding the right to conduct religious services in private buildings without prior government approval. They also point out that the closed buildings are located in an area were unlicensed buildings are common. In July security forces arrested a Coptic Christian who protested the closures in letters published in newspapers. The police released the individual after 10 days' detention after he signed a statement binding him not to discuss the closures in public. In theory, mosques must also be licensed by the Government, but the Government reports approximately half of the estimated 70,000 mosques in Egypt are unlicensed. The Penal Code prohibits using a place of worship for antigovernment speeches, and the Ministry of Religious Affairs provides themes and monitors sermons. In practice, the Government cannot control all sermons, especially at "unauthorized mosques where sermons may invoke antigovernment, anti-Christian, and anti-Western themes. In 1994 the Government increased efforts to bring private mosques under its administrative control as a means to counter Islamic extremism. [2]

20077. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994, Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Egyptians and foreigners are free to travel within Egypt except in certain military areas. Males who have not completed compulsory military service may not travel abroad or emigrate, although this restriction can be circumvented. Unmarried women under 21 must have permission from their fathers to obtain passports and travel; married women require the same permission from their husbands. Citizens who leave the country have the right to return. In recent years the Government has denied permission to Christian converts from Islam to travel abroad. The deportation of citizens and aliens granted political asylum is prohibited and not practiced. Egypt is host to thousands of refugees, but only a few are granted the right to resettle in Egypt. In the past, some Ethiopians and other Africans, who seek documentation as refugees by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, have been detained by the police and then transported to areas near the Libyan or Sudanese borders where they are released. Some have returned to their countries; others have found their way back to Egyptian cities. [2]

20078. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The Government remains committed to the protection of children's welfare within the limits of its budgetary resources. Many of the resources for children's welfare are provided by international donors, especially in the field of child immunization. Child labor is widespread, despite the Government's commitment to eradicate it. International health experts have condemned female genital mutilation (FGM) as damaging to physical and mental health. Statistics on the prevalence of FGM vary but government and private sources agree it is common among 70-80% of rural and poor urban women. The act is generally performed on girls between the ages of 7-10, probably with equal prevalence among Muslims and Coptic Christians. A 1959 decree and subsequent amendments, which described the practice as "psychologically harmful," limited the practice to excision. However, the more drastic infibulation is practiced in some parts of southern Egypt. The decree prohibited doctors not engaged in the excision of genitalia from providing any operation on the genitals. The law stipulates penalties for nonmedical practitioners; a barber was sentenced in 11/1994 to a year at hard labor for circumcising a child. However, the law does not stipulate punishment for parents who violate the law. Following public outcries in 1994 over foreign television airing of the circumcision of a 9-year-old girl, the Minister of Health, in the company of religious leaders, announced the Government would hold its first conference on FGM. The Government also broadcast television programs condemning the practice. The Sheikh of Al-Azhar, head of the world's oldest institution of Islamic thought, has issued a decree declaring FGM a religiously mandated duty. His ruling could hamper any public educational efforts by the Government. [2]

20079. DS. "Egypt: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Women", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the DS, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. The law provides for equality of the sexes, but aspects of the law and many traditional practices discriminate against women. By law women need their husbands' or fathers' permission to obtain a passport or travel abroad (Section 2.d.). Only males can confer citizenship. In rare cases, this means that children born to Egyptian mothers and stateless fathers are themselves stateless. Laws affecting marriage and personal status generally correspond to an individual's religion, which for most Egyptians is Islam. A 1979 liberalization of the Family Status Law strengthened a Muslim woman's rights to divorce and to child custody. In 1985, however, the changes were found unconstitutional on grounds that they conflicted with Islamic law and were repealed. Under Islamic law male Muslim heirs have the duty to provide for all family members who need assistance. Egyptian women have employment opportunities in government, medicine, law, academia, the arts, and, to a lesser degree, in business. About 100 officers in the Egyptian diplomatic service are women, including 3 ambassadors. There are no women judges. Although there is no legal basis to prohibit women judges, a woman under consideration for promotion to magistrate was denied the promotion on the basis of gender in 1993 and is suing the Government. Social pressure against women pursuing a career is strong, and some Egyptian feminists say that a resurgent Islamic fundamentalist trend limits further gains. Women's rights advocates also point to other discriminatory attitudes and practices such as female genital mutilation (FGM) and the male relative's role in enforcing women's compliance with religiously prescribed codes of sexual conduct. Family violence against women occurs and is reflected in press accounts of specific incidents. Official or unofficial quantitative data do not exist. In general, the intervention of neighbors and extended family members tends to limit the Prevalence and scope of such violence. Abuse within the family is rarely discussed publicly owing to the value attached to privacy in this traditional society. Neither the government, nongovernmental organizations, or human rights organizations has commented publicly upon family violence. There are at least two active women's rights groups, one affiliated with the EOHR. The other is the Communications Group for the Enhancement of the

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
Status of Women, which has published a booklet on the legal rights of Egyptian women. [2]

2008. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Egypt: Part 04: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Through the Penal Code prohibits the use of torture to obtain a confession, there is convincing evidence that police and security forces systematically practice torture. Such a determination was made in August when a state security court found that all 27 defendants tried for the torture of 10/1990 assassination of People’s Assembly Speaker Rifaa Al-Mahgoub were tortured while in custody. The court acquitted 17 defendants of all charges but sentenced 10 to prison on related charges. The presiding judge found that security forces used “hiding methods to extract confessions.” However, no action was taken to punish the officials responsible for the torture. In September a military court ordered the release from detention of Sami Salama Abdul Munin, one of 35 detainees in a trial of alleged terrorists. The court decision was based on a complaint by Abdul Munin that both his feet were crippled and his kidneys injured by physical abuse committed by security officers while he was in police custody. Mahmoud Hussein, 46, died in may several days after his release from police custody, reportedly owing to injuries sustained during interrogation by security forces for his alleged connection with terrorist groups. The Government stated that it was investigating the case, but at year’s end there had been no public statement. The Government generally investigates torture complaints in cases involving persons arrested for common crimes and has punished offending officers. However the Government does not adequately investigate torture complaints in cases involving detainees in political or religious cases. There is no public record that offending officers in such cases are punished, thus suggesting that the Government tacitly condones the mistreatment of those it considers to be opponents. Officers of the Interior Ministry’s GDSSI are known to practice torture on all alleged terrorists and nonviolent Islamists. Torture, which takes place in police stations, at GDSSI offices, and at CSF camps, is used to extract information, coerce the victims to end their anti-government activities, and deter others from such activities. Torture victims are usually taken to GDSSI offices where they are handcuffed, blindfolded, and questioned about their associations, religious beliefs, and political views. Victims have reported the following torture methods: During interrogation, detainees are frequently stripped to their underwear, hung by their wrists with their feet touching the floor hung upside down, or forced to stand for prolonged periods; doused with hot and cold water; beaten; forced to stand outdoors in cold weather, and subjected to electric shocks. Some victims in 1993, including female detainees, reported that they were threatened with rape. As many as 10 days may elapse from the date of arrest until detainees enter the penal system. During that period, detainees are usually held at GDSSI offices where they are questioned and often tortured. The security forces do not acknowledge any detention during that period, pointing to the lack of any documentary proof of arrest. The lack of written records during the early days of arrest invites the abuse of detainees and frustrates investigations into torture complaints. The Government denies that such temporary disappearances occur and maintains that all arrests are conducted with warrants and that written records are always kept on the whereabouts of detainees. Moreover, the security forces sometimes transfer detainees from prisons to other facilities where they are interrogated, tortured, and then returned to prison. No written records are kept on such transfers. Under pressure fugitives to surrender, security forces have taken their relatives, including minors and female family members, into custody. An undetermined number of such detainees have been physically abused while in custody. Persons arrested for ordinary criminal offenses are commonly mistreated by the local police. Mohamed Ali Mohamed Ali, 33, arrested in January for car theft, was allegedly hung by his wrists for extended periods and beaten with a stick while in police custody. An investigating officer allegedly injected a mixture of water and human waste into his leg, causing gangrene. On October 17 Ali appeared in court on a stretcher and told the judge that the police had injected his leg with feces after he refused to confess to several car thefts. The court acquitted Ali on one charge of car theft but sentenced him to 6 months on other charges. At year’s end, there had been no public record of any investigation into Ali’s alleged mistreatment. [3]

20081. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Egypt: Part 11: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. There is freedom to travel within Egypt except in certain military areas. Egyptian males who have not completed compulsory military service may not travel abroad or emigrate, although this restriction can be circumvented. Unmarried women under 21 must have permission from their fathers to obtain passports, married women require permission from their husbands. Citizens who leave the country have the right to return. In October the Government discontinued the practice of requiring a special travel permit, issued by the Ministry of Interior, for Egyptian citizens to visit Israel. In recent years, the Government has denied permission to Christian converts from Islam to travel abroad. In a recent case, police arrested a convert to Christianity at Cairo airport and prevented her from boarding a flight to Europe. The Government also sometimes prevents travel for political reasons. In March security forces prevented Faten, the second wife of Omar Abdel Rahman, from departing Egypt for a pilgrimage to Mecca. The deportation of Egyptian citizens and aliens granted political asylum is prohibited and not practiced. Egypt is host to thousands of refugees, but only a few are granted the right to resettlement in Egypt. In the past, some Ethiopians and other Africans, who seek documentation as refugees by the Ministry of Interior, for Egyptian citizens to visit Israel. In recent years, some have returned to their countries; others have found their way back to Egyptian cities. [4]

20082. DS. “Near East and North Africa: Egypt: Part 12: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within The Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation”, in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The ruling National Democratic Party (NDP) dominates the 464-seat People’s Assembly. In October Mubarak’s reelection was submitted to the public in a national referendum in which 96% of the voters approved it. The Government claimed that 86% of the electorate went to the polls, although the actual figure was believed to be much lower. Under Egypt’s electoral system, the electorate was not presented with a choice among competing presidential candidates; it was offered the opportunity only to vote for or against Mubarak’s reelection. Two opposition parties, the Wafd and the Islamist-affiliated Socialist Labor Party, urged the public to boycott the referendum, and two other parties, the leftist Tagammu and the Nasserist, urged the public to vote against Mubarak. The other opposition
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

20084. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Egypt: Part 15: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (b) "Children", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. The Government is committed to the protection of children's welfare. According to law, public education is compulsory until age 12, and the employment, or job training, of children under age 12 is prohibited. For many years, the Government has operated a "reading for an program" which seeks to bring literacy to older children and adults. The Government has also employed the media to promote children's education and welfare. Examples include Egypt's annual international children's film festival and television programming aimed at children's education. However, despite the Government's commitment to children's welfare, child labor is a widespread problem. Moreover, much of the resources for children's welfare are provided by international aid donors, especially in the fields of education and child immunization programs.

Female genital mutilation (excision), which international health experts have condemned as damaging to both physical and mental health,

---

20083. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Egypt: Part 14: Respect For Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language of Social Status: (a) "Women", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Egyptian law provides for equality of the sexes, but aspects of the law and many traditional practices discriminate against women. Under Egyptian law, only males can transmit Egyptian citizenship. In rare cases, this means that children born to Egyptian mothers and stateless fathers are themselves stateless. Laws affecting marriage and personal status generally correspond to an individual's religion, which for most Egyptians is Islam. A 1979 liberalization of the family status law strengthened a Muslim woman's rights to divorce and to child custody, but in 1985 the changes were found unconstitutional on grounds they conflicted with Islamic law and were repealed. Under Islamic law, non-Muslim males must convert to Islam to marry Muslim women, but non-Muslim women need not convert to marry Muslim men. Muslim female heirs receive half the amount of a male heir's inheritance, while Christian widows of Muslims have no inheritance rights. A sole female heir receives half her parent's estate - the balance goes to designated male relatives. A sole male heir inherits all his parents' property. Male Muslim heirs have the duty to provide for all family members who need assistance. Egyptian women have employment opportunities in government, medicine, law, academia, the arts, and, to a lesser degree, in business. About 100 officers in the Egyptian diplomatic service are women, including 3 ambassadors. Social pressure against women pursuing a career remains strong, however, and some Egyptian feminists say that a resurgent Islamic fundamentalist trend limits further gains. Women's rights advocates also point to other discriminatory attitudes and practices, such as female circumcision and the male relative's role in enforcing women's compliance with religiously prescribed codes of sexual conduct. In 1993 Fatma Abdul Raouf was denied employment as a magistrate in a public prosecutor's office, the first step in Egypt to becoming a judge, because she is a woman. She is currently suing the Ministry of Justice for sex discrimination. There are no women judges in Egypt. Family violence against women does occur, but its extent is unknown. Abuse within the family is seldom discussed publicly, owing to the value attached to personal privacy in this traditional society. There are at least two active women's rights groups, one affiliated with EOHR.

The other is the Communications Group for the Enhancement of the Status of Women, which has published a booklet on the legal rights of Egyptian women. [=] enforces child labor laws, especially in family-owned enterprises. [\textsuperscript{23}]

20087. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Libya: Respect for Human Rights: Section 2: Respect For Civil Liberties, Including: (d) Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. With the exception of security areas, the Government usually does not restrict the internal movement of Libyan citizens. It requires exit permits for travel abroad. Following the failed 10/1993 coup plot, the Government imposed additional exit requirements, including authorization from certain ministries and limits on access to hard currency. Women must have their husbands' permission for travel abroad. Authorities routinely seize the passports of Americans, as well as those of some other nationals, married to Libyan citizens upon entry into Libya. In 1991 Libya and Egypt agreed to allow the unrestricted travel of their nationals across their mutual border, and thousands of Libyans reportedly go back and forth regularly. This travel, as well as travel from Libya to Tunisia, continued at a high level in 1994, partly as a result of the international embargo on airline service to Libya. In response to antigovernment activity, the Government tightened border controls temporarily in late 1993 and again in mid-1994. The Government increased restrictions on travel across the Tunisia-Libya border in late 1994, possibly in reaction to improving Tunisian relations with Israel. In late 1993, the Egyptian media reported that Mr. Qadhafi turned over three expatriate Egyptian Islamists to the Egyptian security services. The Revolutionary Committees maintain surveillance of some citizens when they are abroad. The right of return is more nearly an obligation; the regime often calls on students, many of whom receive a government subsidy, and others working abroad to return to Libya on little or no notice. Students studying abroad are interrogated upon their return. Some citizens, including exiled opposition figures, refuse to return. [\textsuperscript{24}]

20088. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Saudi Arabia: Part 04: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. As in 1992, there continued to be reports that Saudi authorities tortured and abused detainees, both Saudi citizens and foreigners. Abuse included the practice of flogging, beating the soles of the feet to cause intense pain, and sleep deprivation. A foreign journalist was arrested in a business dispute, subjected to flogging, and deported. Allegations appeared in the International Arabic-language media in August that detained members and sympathizers of the Committee for the Defense of Legitimate Rights, which announced its formation in May, were subjected to torture while in detention. In keeping with their customary practice, Saudi officials made no comment on these allegations. Following a March 9 riot at the Rafha refugee camp in which eight people were killed, including four Saudis, there were reports that some refugees had been beaten during the investigation into the cause of the riot. Responding to UNHCR, Saudi authorities promptly relieved the responsible guards from duty at the camp, but there was no indication the guards were otherwise reprimanded. The UNHCR reported that Saudi soldiers responding to the riot did so with minimum force and that documented cases of torture and abuse of refugees by Saudi guards had declined significantly. Agents of the Interior Ministry were alleged to be responsible for most incidents of torture. The Government failure to punish human rights abusers is a salient factor in the climate of impunity that prevails. While it is general government practice not to respond to reports of abuse, the Saudi Government has been responsive to diplomatic inquiries in some specific cases. The Mutawaw'a sometimes physically abused detainees while seeking to elicit confessions for supposed social misconduct. They often used switchlike sticks to harass those they perceived as violating religiously mandated standards of behavior and sometimes hit or slapped persons for alleged infractions of proper behavior. One of the 49 women who were arrested in 1990 for driving cars to protest the ban on women driving reportedly had the car in which she was driving seized in June while returning from visiting friends and was detained by Mutawaw'a. She was held for 3 days and beaten while in custody because she had been at a family gathering in which men who were not close relatives were present. In another instance, an American woman and her Saudi female companion were picked up by the Mutawaw'a and held incarcerated- the Saudi woman was struck by the Mutawaw'a and injured herself in trying to run away. In most areas, Mutawaw'a are seldom punished for such acts, so far as is known, none of those involved in the instances cited were punished. Representatives of the International Committee for the Red Cross (ICRC) and the UNCHR both visited Saudi detention facilities where Iraqi refugees were held in 1993. Officials from the UNCHR officially recognized by the Government in June, regularly visit detained refugees in the Kingdom. Recognized international human rights organizations like the UNCHR reported that the Saudi Government improved conditions and treatment for some detainees in specific cases. The Saudis rigorously observe criminal punishments prescribed in their interpretation of Islamic law, including execution by beheading and stoning, and amputation for reported theft. In the absence of two witnesses (four witnesses in the case of adultery), confessions before a judge are almost always required for conviction—resulting in credible charges that this induces many forced confessions. Defendants are tried in closed chambers, without benefit of defense counsel being present. All 85 capital sentences in 1993 were carried out by beheading, sometimes followed by gibetting, which was confirmed in two of the cases. An Amnesty International report noted the increased number of executions in Saudi Arabia in 1993 which government officials explain is due to the rise in drug trafficking, a capital offense in the Kingdom. Death by firing squad is imposed for capital sentences for women instead of beheading. Repeated thievery is punishable by amputation of the right hand as prescribed by Shari'a law. For less severe crimes, such asadultereness and public defiling Islamic precepts, the Shari'a punishment of flogging with a cane is often imposed. Egyptian Mikhail Cornelius Michel received 500 of the 1000 lashes to which he was sentenced for blasphemy before being released from prison and deported. [\textsuperscript{25}]

20089. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Somalia: Introduction", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1995. pp. 1143-1154. [The absence of progress toward reconciliation and a continued decline in security led to the relocation of the US Liaison Office from Mogadishu to Nairobi on 9/15/1994. US diplomats based in Kenya made periodic visits to Somalia after that date.] Somalia has been in a state of nearly unceasing civil war since 1988. Its last president, dictator Mohamed Siad Barre, fled the country in 1991. The fighting between factional clan leaders resulted in massive killing, displacements and starvation of thousands of citizens and led the United Nations to intervene militarily in 1992. There continued to be no central authority in Somalia. Despite UN operations in Somalia (UNOSOM) efforts, the Somalis have not been able to reestablish international relations with any government. There continued to be instability within Somalia, including Mogadishu, continued to be split between General Mohamed Farah Aideed of the Somali National Alliance (SNA) and Ali Mahdi
Mohammed of the Somali Salvation Alliance (SSA). Attempts to reach reconciliation failed. In the extreme south, where Darod clans are strong, remnants of Siad Barre's Somalia National Front (SNF) vie for control with other group including a divided Somali Patriotic Movement (SPM). The Isaak-dominated Somali National Movement (SNM) continued to control the northwestern Somaliland area and in the northeast, the divided Somali Salvation Democratic Front (SSDF) controlled the traditionally Majertain homelands. In both areas violent intrafactions conflicts developed during the last months of 1994. The fighting in Hargeisa capital of the Somaliland region, was particularly intense and resulted in numerous civilian casualties and the suspension of almost all humanitarian assistance programs. In response to worsening conditions the UN Security Council (UNSC) passed several resolutions concerning Somalia and UNOSOM. Resolution 897 scaled back the number of peacekeepers the goals of the UN mission. In November, in the absence of political reconciliation and a deteriorating security situation the UNSC ordered a total withdrawal of UNOSOM from Somalia by 3/31/1995. At year's end close to 10000 peacekeepers from Pakistan, Egypt, Bangladesh, Malaysia, and Zimbabwe remained on the ground. When UNOSOM was forced to abandon the development of a national police force, local law and order remained highly arbitrary and largely in the hands of factions and clan-based Islamic courts some of which applied strict Islamic (Shari'a) law. Somalia's economy improved in 1994, compared to 1992 when US and other foreign troops intervened to halt mass starvation. UNOSOM was initially successful in facilitating the flow of food to the starving population, and, despite the deteriorating security situation, agricultural production revived in many parts of the country. Excellent rains during the principal growing season resulted in a bountiful harvest close to 76% of prewar levels. Thousands of displaced people and refugees returned to their homes. Flooding in the fall of 1994 caused extensive damage to crops in the Juba valley, apparently without causing too much harm to reserve food stocks. Commercial exports of livestock and fruit increased in 1994, including an estimated 13000 metric tons of bananas. The human rights situation deteriorated throughout the year as calls for military restraint went unheeded. Intraclan conflict worsened as rival groups, including those of Aideed and Ali Mahdi, jockeyed for power and control of strategic areas. There were continuing reports that factional militia, bandits and clan militias committed extrajudicial killings and also intimidated, detained, raped, and kidnapped persons in order to gain or maintain power in areas under their control. It was impossible to investigate these charges in most instances. Violence and social discrimination against women and abuse of children remained widespread. There were few reports of abuses by UNOSOM troops in 1994, in part because of the changes in UNOSOM's mission and the withdrawal of a significant percentage of foreign troops. [-]

2009.090. DS. "Saudi Arabia: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1999. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. There were credible reports that the authorities continued to torture and otherwise abuse detainees, including citizens and foreigners. A common method of torture is intense pain. The authorities also deprive detainees of sleep, beating, especially "fallaqa," which is a beating on the soles of the feet to cause intense pain. The authorities also deprive detainees of sleep. Agents of the Ministry of Interior also allegedly responsible for most incidents of abuse. The Government's failure to announce the punishment of human rights abusers has contributed to a public perception that abuses can be committed with impunity. The Mutawaa'in were also responsible for abuse. In 5/1994 they arrested 19 expatriate workers from the United States, Egypt, Canada, Ireland, and Venezuela after they departed a party at a private home. The Mutawaa'in reportedly beat an Egyptian and a Venezuelan man, ripped off the outer clothing of an Egyptian woman and severely beat an American woman, ramming her head on a car door, resulting in serious injury to her face and one eye. Following diplomatic protests, the Government indicated privately that it had conducted a high-level investigation and that "very strong measures had been taken against the Mutawaa'in involved. However government official did not specify what actions were taken and did not make a public report on the incident. In May, after CDLR spokesman Mohammed Al-Mas'ari fled the Kingdom, security forces arrested several members and supporters of the Committee for the Defense of Legitimate Rights (CDLR) (see Sections 1.d. and 2.a.). Security officials reportedly tortured these detainees after their arrest. In accordance with standard practice, the Government did not comment on the allegations. Al-Mas'ari reported that he was tortured during 6 months of detention in 1993. While regular access to detention facilities by impartial observers is rare, representatives of the UNHCHR visited detention camps holding Gulf War refugees. In 1993 during her visit to the Rafha refugee camp at the invitation of the Government, UNHCHR Ogata praised the Government's contributions to the refugees' welfare. In May Amnesty International (Al) published a report containing allegations that guards tortured and beat refugees at the Rafha, Syria. However, reliable sources indicate that the allegations were inaccurate and exaggerated. Many of the incidents cited in the AI report allegedly occurred between 1991-1993. Sources from UNHCHR and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) confirmed some of these incidents and reported that authorities promptly removed the guards responsible for abuses. The sources also maintain that documented cases of abuse of refugees by guards dropped significantly during that period. Government rigorously observes the criminal punishments according to its interpretation of Islamic Law, including amputation for repeated theft and execution by beheading and stoning. In 1994 the authorities beheaded 69 of the 80 persons convicted for drug trafficking, rape, and murder. They impose execution by firing squad for women convicted of capital offenses; there was one such execution in 1994. The number of executions, which had risen in recent years because of drug trafficking was down from 85 in 1993. The authorities punish repeated thievery by amputation of the right hand. In 1994 they imposed this punishment on 5 Sudanese and a Pakistani. For less serious crimes, such as drunkenness or publicly flouting Islamic precepts, the authorities often impose flogging with a cane. [-] should be noted that the urban population of Asmara did not specifically desire came from the Liberal Progressive Party who professed to have formation it had not been able to present candidates at the elections. It in decisive terms, for unconditional union with Ethiopia. Opposition to this deputed separate representatives, who had not been elected by their figures, thereby introducing further arbitrary factors into the recorded not represented. Except in rare instances, those who attended the interrogated regarding the number of people they purported to represent.

The methods of selection showed local variations, and there were separate divisions, and these Administration advised these communities early in 1947 wholly in favour of Union with Ethiopia those who expressed no opinion at were usually unable to give a reasoned, or sensible, answer to relevant reservations on the "Method of Investigation," their conclusions on the result of the hearings differed very little from that of the U.K. and the USA.] INTRODUCTION: Because of the differing nature of the population and of the terrain of Eritrea, it has been considered wise to present the results of the investigation of the wishes of the people, in the first instance, by each administrative division separately, as, except in the Akkele Guzai which embraces both plateau and lowland, these divisions roughly correspond to the differing geographical and ethnologic areas. The method by which the recorded figures were calculated, and any special circumstances noted in the division concerned, are explained in each case. The reports by divisions are followed by an analysis of the results obtained for the whole country together with a summary of important factors which must be taken into account when considering them.

REPRESENTATION: In preparation for the arrival of the Commission, the British Military Administration informed the inhabitants of settled villages, through the normal administrative channels, that meetings of representatives with the Commission would probably be held at various centres, and that each community should elect representatives to attend those meetings. In most cases the elections were held as much as twelve months prior to the Commission's hearings, and the majority of the representatives chosen were confirmed later. The procedure for the tribal communities of the Western Province was different because of the scattered and nomadic character of the population which made it impractical to hold community meetings. The British Military Administration advised these communities early in 1947 to begin to elect their representatives and this was done. Agreement upon the selection of representatives was necessarily a gradual process and no definite date could be ascribed to individual elections. For both of the above methods the Administration determined the unit of representation supplementary questions which went beyond the simple main issues. Agreement upon all regarded as supporters. The representatives had evidently been coached in the appropriate replies to give to the obvious questions and weightier reason for omitting them, however, was that no machinery had been thought that to some extent these inhabitants retained their village or tribal affinities, and that their views would find expression through family or kinship channels, but the observations made by the Commission suggest that this was effective to a limited extent only. A weightier reason for omitting them, however, was that no machinery exists for municipal elections, and could not adequately be improvised in the time available. Of the Eritrean inhabitants of Asmara, (a) 59580 are Moslems and (b) 36000 are Christians. Of these the Liberal Progressive and Pro-Italy parties claim only 1200 and 7000 respectively. The Moslem League and Unionist parties claim 47370 and 57790 respectively. Although no means of verifying these claims exists the general political trends observed by the Commission throughout the country suggest that the Christians would mostly favour union with Ethiopia, and that the Moslems would support the Moslem League. Since the Pro-Italy party would draw its strength either equally from both, or in greater numbers from the Moslem League, a Unionist majority for Asmara is probable. No allowance has been made for these figures in the accompanying statistics.

HAMASIEN DIVISION: The Hamasien division which is situated on the plateau and includes the town of Asmara, was the first to be visited. Two meetings were held on 23rd and 24th November respectively, at which 327 representatives from 123 villages, representing a census population of 114000 appeared before the Commission. The figures shown as claimed by the representatives are those shown for the villages in census figures supplied by the administration. Most of the representatives claimed to represent a whole village, and the majority of those to whom the question was put gave the number of their followers as being a figure substantially higher than that of the census. The result of the interrogation of the representatives was a vote in favour of unconditional union with Ethiopia, desired on behalf of 95.8% of the population said to have been represented. A small fraction declared in favour of the Moslem League programme, and a much smaller one for Italian rule. The Commission did not question the representatives as to whether any solution other than the one they advocated would be acceptable to them and no preferences of this nature have therefore been recorded. The general tenor of the replies obtained from the twelve representatives of the Moslem League was that they would follow the policy of their leaders. They were not asked for, and did not volunteer, any preference regarding the Power to whom the trusteeship should be entrusted, but the opinion was ventured that it would be the duty of the Four Powers to choose the trustee. Membership of the political parties concerned implied no specific status and included women, men and children of all ages. Often a whole community was regarded as belonging to a party and it is probable that in a village declared to be wholly in favour of Union with Ethiopia those who expressed no opinion at all regarded as supporters. The representatives had evidently been coached in the appropriate replies to give to the obvious questions and were usually unable to give a reasoned, or sensible, answer to relevant supplementary questions which went beyond the simple main issues. There was ample evidence of party drilling and organization, but, despite this, there is no reason to doubt that the overwhelming majority of the population, and practically the whole Christian population, of the Hamasien division desire unconditional union with Ethiopia.

AKKELE GUZA DIVISION: Three meetings were held in this division, which takes in both plateau and lowland, and contains Christian inhabitants of settled villages and nomadic Moslem tribes, on the 26th, 27th and 28th November respectively. At these meetings 855 representatives of 486 villages and tribal communities representing a census population of 180000 were questioned. They were not all interrogated regarding the number of people they purported to represent and use had to be made of the census figures in the same manner as in the Hamasien. In addition, certain rules had to be applied to the census figures, thereby introducing further arbitrary factors into the recorded statistics. The answers recorded by the Commission show that 70% of the "represented" inhabitants of settled villages expressed a preference, in decisive terms, for unconditional union with Ethiopia. Opposition to this desire came from the Liberal Progressive Party who professed to have adherents to an extent which would give them the support of 17% of the plateau inhabitants. Representatives from the settled villages who declared in favour of the Moslem League programme, or in favour of the Pro-Italy Party, were comparatively small minorities. The roles are reversed in the views recorded from representatives of the tribal communities. The followers of the Moslem League claimed figures which would give them as adherents 71% of the members of the tribes, the Pro-Italy Party claiming second place with 22%, the Liberal Progressive Party a fragment and a small party and the Unionist Party nowhere. The information obtained may be summarized as showing a strong majority of the settled inhabitants of the plateau in favour of unconditional union with Ethiopia, the comparatively small opposition mainly coming from Christians supporting the Liberal Progressive Party. Among the Moslem nomadic communities the opposition to Ethiopia is almost complete, a strong majority being claimed to be in favour of the Moslem League policy of independence or trusteeship with rather less than one in four claimed as favouring the return of the Italians in some shape or form. Over the whole division the Unionist claims put them strongly in the lead and gave them slightly less than half of the total inhabitants, the Moslem League claiming one half of the remainder. The followers of the Liberal Progressive Party thought that they might need assistance in technical services and some protection, but little other help from outside. In general they expressed no preference as to the Power which would be acceptable to them as a Trustee Power, but both the U.K. and, to a lesser extent, Italy, were mentioned as acceptable. The Moslems were in the main content to follow the policy of their leaders, and it was stated that if the policy of their leaders changed, they would accept the decision. The U.K. was mentioned as being the first choice for the Trustee Power, and many objections were registered against Italy or Ethiopia filling the role if the U.K. were not available. The Pro-Italy Party consisted almost entirely of ex-soldiers sent by the Party, or who only appeared as the selected delegate of a village or tribal community in a few instances. The reason most frequently advanced for the resumption of Italian rule was the desire to obtain satisfaction of monetary claims. With some representatives, however, the memory of better times when work was plentiful and colonial troops were maintained, weighed heavily. Ex-soldiers in other parties expressed strong dislike of the Italian army, and it was suggested by representatives of other parties that material inducements were offered by the Pro-Italy Party to entice followers of the other parties into their ranks. The numbers claimed by representatives were frequently exaggerated and the figures themselves are therefore to some extent discredited. This fault, however, was not confined to one party and there is no reason to doubt that the results of the investigation in the Akkele Guzai division as recorded fairly reflect in a general way, the wishes of the bulk of the inhabitants. The supplementary questions asked by the Commission followed no set plan, and such information as has been recorded in reply should be regarded only as a cross-section of public opinion taken at random.

SERAE DIVISION: Three meetings were held in this division which is situated wholly on the plateau, on the 30th November, 2nd and 3rd December respectively. At these meetings 902 representatives of 515 villages representing a census population of 170000 were questioned. They were not in every instance asked regarding the number of people they purported to represent, and in such instances census figures have been used in the same manner as for the Hamasion and Akkele Guzai Division. The practice of exaggerating figures reached large proportions in this division, with the result that in the division the number of constituents claimed is double the population shown by the census. All parties were guilty, the Unionist and Pro-Italy Parties probably being the worst offenders, and the excesses to some extent cancel out. The answers recorded show that the representatives claiming 77.6% of the total expressed a preference in decisive terms for unconditional union with Ethiopia. The Moslems claimed 11%, while the Liberal Progressive Party and the Pro-Italy Party shared the remainder, with the former in the majority. The Liberal Progressive Party’s representation remained, of only minor proportions, and in the hearing at Aressa, a Unionist stronghold, no representative holding their views appeared. In this division the followers of the Moslem League specifically nominated the U.K. as their first choice for the trustee power to a greater extent than had been recorded previously, and from the unanimity with which this was specified it is clear that the party policy had been explained in greater detail in this area than elsewhere. Nomination of the Trustee by the Four Powers was the second preference. With this difference, and the fact that a number of representatives gave expression to strong anti-Italian and anti-Ethiopian opinion, the opinions given by followers of the Moslem League followed the pattern of, and were generally in agreement with, those recorded on the previous day. The followers of the Liberal Progressive Party and of the Pro-Italy Party, were also on party lines. Supporters of the latter confirmed that membership was largely composed of ex-soldiers with monetary claims against the Italian Government. Before the hearing at Aressa, the representatives of certain Moslem villages expressed a fear of intimidation if they appeared in such a predominantly Unionist gathering. The Commission therefore heard them at a separate place. The deductions drawn from the above are that the figures given were so exaggerated as to be unreliable in themselves; but that the inflation affected all parties and especially the Unionist Party. It does not, however, alter the fact that a great majority of the inhabitants have declared their preference for unconditional union with Ethiopia.

WESTERN PROVINCE: Four meetings were held in the lowland hills and plains of the Western Province, at which in all 607 representatives of 753 kinship groups and 54 communities representing a census population of 350000 were heard. Special meetings were not held for Keren and Agordat towns as their native population have almost exclusively come from local tribes and were regarded as being represented through their tribal groups. They are almost wholly Moslem. The inhabitants of this province, including the negroid tribes of Barentu, are predominantly Moslem, and representatives claiming to speak for 74.9% of them, almost unanimously, as followers of the Moslem League, expressed a desire for British trusteeship for a period of ten years to be followed by independence or a variation of that theme. When questioned regarding possible alternatives, nearly all declared their willingness to accept any government chosen by the Four Powers but specifically excepting Italy and Ethiopia, while some others stated that they would follow any decision taken by the Moslem League. Even amongst those holding the latter view many expressed antipathy to rule by Italy or Ethiopia. Some stated that they would accept no alternative but their own independence. None of the many representatives questioned regarding union with the Sudan favoured such a course. A few were asked whether they would accept government by Egypt, and most of them rejected the idea. Partition of Eritrea was also regarded with disfavour. That quarter of the inhabitants of the province which did not profess allegiance to the Moslem League was divided about equally between those desiring unconditional union with Ethiopia and membership of the Pro-Italy Party. Amongst those followers of the Pro-Italy Party who were questioned as to whether they advocated Italian rule or Italian trusteeship opinion was equally divided. Representatives of the Moslem League and the Unionist Party, chiefly the former, stated that recently they had lost a number of their followers to Pro-Italy Party, and averred that this party was distributing food and clothing to its members. This allegation was supported by one of the Pro-Italy representatives, who stated that the distribution was made on account of the Commission’s visit. Some ex-soldier members of other parties had joined the Pro-Italy Party in the hope of obtaining satisfaction of their claims against the Italian Government. The party members gave reasons similar to those recorded in previous hearings. A considerable proportion of representatives of the aristocratic classes were in favour of union with Ethiopia though some of them admitted that they had left the Moslem League because it had promised their serfs more rights, and had joined the Unionist Party, even though it had not definitely promised the return of their serfs. Several representatives of the serfs gave as one of their reasons for joining the Moslem League the hope that if independence were granted the payment of tribute would be made direct to the Government and not through the chiefs, although this had not been promised in the party programme. The exaggerated figures claimed on the plateau were not in evidence in the Western Province. Irregularities observed were in the figures claimed by representatives of the
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

imported factor, which affected the number of representatives from the Pro-Italy Party was that the formation of this Party was only authorized Just before the arrival of the Commission whilst the election of representatives took place up to 12 months before its arrival." Four Power Report, Vol. 1, p. 107) particularly when it is considered in the light of the remarks made above regarding the exaggerations and distortions which have accompanied the presentation of the figures, which in their context are more than the unverified claims of representatives and of political parties. The figures, however, are of value in revealing trends of opinion. It is obvious that the country is split into two camps, and that the political thought in each is conditioned in the main by religious creeds are congregated, one in the Christian highlands, and the other in the Moslem lowlands and plains. The Christian inhabitants of the three plateau provinces, apart from an important minority, are strongly in favour of unconditional Union with Ethiopia. This simple aim of the party was clearly understood by those who were in favour of it and there was no room for doubt that this was their desire. The minority is formed of followers of certain important Christian Chiefs who appear sincerely to believe that immediate alliance with Ethiopia would not be in the best interests of their people. It is an essential part of their programme that their country should be re-united with the Tigrai Province of Ethiopia by placing the latter within the boundaries of Eritrea. There is a Moslem minority, mainly composed of nomadic tribes, who migrate between the plateau and the coastal plain, who are opposed to Union with Ethiopia. The Moslem areas of the lowlands and the Western Plain are predominantly followers of the Moslem League. They are in favour of eventual independence but generally agree that an interim period of trusteeship under United Nations' control, will be necessary. It is doubtful whether the political implications of these terms are fully understood by their protagonists. Preference is given for the U.K. to be the Trustee in the published programme of the Moslem League, and this desire was expressed by the majority of those questioned. A great majority of those followers of this party, particularly in the Western Province, who were asked the question expressed opposition to acceptance of Italy as the trustee Power and almost unanimous opposition was recorded in similar circumstances to the appointment of Ethiopia. Not a single supporter was found for the idea that the Western Plain should be amalgamated with the Sudan, and only in isolated instances was Egyptian rule regarded as acceptable. Those desiring the return of Italian rule in one form or another were drawn in the main from ex-soldiers and their families, and many of them, probably the majority, are actuated by the desire to see the old conditions return and to secure satisfaction of claims they have against the Italian Government. It is a reasonable assumption that, even with these inducements, less than 10% of the whole population genuinely desire the return of the Italian Government. And that opposition to this course is several times as strong.

SUMMARY:

Moslem League; Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=495,040; 40.5%; Membership claimed by Party=731,764; 44.8%;

Unionist Party; Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=546,954; 44.8%; Membership claimed by Party=725,156; 48.2%;

Liberal Progressives; Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=52,985; 4.4%; Membership claimed by Party=53500; 3.2%;

Pro-Italy; Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=13260; 9.2%;

Membership claimed by Party=219600; 9.2%;

National; Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=13985; 1.1%;

Membership claimed by Party=56377; 1.1%;

TOTAL Numbers Claimed by reps at Hearings=1,222,224; Membership claimed by Party=1,790,434. Total Population: 850000. [=]

20093. Danielson, Virgina; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 16: The Modern Arab World: Artists and Entrepreneurs: Female Singers in Cairo During the 1920s. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 292-309. Female performers have often been very prominent in the Arab world, especially singers, even if formal music criticism and commentary excludes female singers from being considered serious musicians. In the post-WWII era, women in Cairo seized a leading role in Egyptian urban music, a role that extended into all areas of commercial entertainment, even management and entrepreneurship.

Traditional female singers in Cairo (alima, awalim) were organized in their own guilds; they were typically working class; most were Muslim although some were Copts or Jews; often family members were musicians. The most skilled earned large incomes. The growth of a theater district in Cairo created an opportunity for local singers to perform during intermissions: many singers began their careers in this manner. Smaller theaters also appeared throughout Cairo, meeting the popular interest in musical theater, where singers could work; in such a theater Umm Kultum first sang in Cairo after moving from her village in the 1920s (she was the daughter of a poor Quran reciter and part-time singer). Her "angelic voice" allowed her to overcome her countrified roots, learn new musical styles and practices, and create a sophisticated urban style. In 1928, she assumed management of her career from her father. Her first records came out in 1923-1925 on Odeon Records and sold astonishing numbers of copies almost immediately (she would later attribute the large sales to her years of working the small towns of the Delta, where everyone interested in music had listened to her in person).

At her initial success with records, she won the highest fee in Egypt for a recording, $250 in 1924; in 1926 Gramophone Records gave her $320 per record, rising to $400 in 1927. In 1926-1927, Umm Kuthum earned more than $25,000. Women entertainers in Egypt were ambitious and hardworking, were expected to be morally upstanding, and typically became careful managers of their own finances. Yet entertainers had low social status, and were popularly associated with prostitution, drunkenness, gambling, use of drugs and undignified public displays, yet the accomplishments of women such as Umm Kulthum deended and received public respect: Umm Kulthum's dignity in particular, is credited with raising the level of respect for female singers generally. Egyptian singers also became widely known throughout the Arab world. In her later career, Umm Kulthum assumed a leadership role in the governing board for music programming for radio, was seven term president of the musicians' union, and was on federal commissions for funding of music.

20094. Davies, Kay; AID. "Examples of AID Funding for WID Activities: Egypt," in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger, United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 100-106. The Vocational Training Department (VPTD) Project is technically part of the education sector portfolio. Its most striking feature is the fact that it has been a relatively immediate springboard into the job market for women. These jobs are in non-traditional areas of employment for women such as electrical motor winding, welding, and radio and television repair and maintenance.

USAID financing for this program is $17.5 million. This is a three year program in two vocational training centers. The first year is devoted to classroom work and the next two years are spent actually working as an apprentice in a factory or shop. Private sector managers have become increasingly interested in accepting these trainees as apprentices because of the high level of interest and commitment these women have to doing a good job.

In 1987, 75 females graduated from the program in Alexandria; 22 in industrial electronics (radio and television repair and maintenance); 23 in electrical motor winding; and 30 in weaving. 34 women, or 45% of these graduates are currently employed with 15 of that number in private sector companies. Also in 1987 45 females graduated from the program in Tanta: five in welding; 19 in electrical motor winding and 21 in garment machine operation and maintenance. 23, or just over 50% of these graduates are currently employed with nine of the number in private sector companies.

USAID/Egypt estimates funds allocated to WID activities are $106 million. [=]
On 9/6/1981, Saadawi was arrested. She had been estranged from her then husband and accused of being a Marxist: her lawyer denied she had ever been a member of the Communist Party. She was arrested by a mob of bayonet-tipped rifle waving armed soldiers, who broke down her door without a warrant, seized personal papers, her diary and an incomplete novel (a fearful crowd watched the arrest with some disapproval; one young mother carrying a child cried out: “Shame on you! Poking rifles in the face of a woman. Go fight Israel instead!”). She was taken first to a prison in Cairo for a few hours, then driven into the Delta (the driver was suffering from pellagra she noted, a vitamin B deficiency); she was admitted to a barracks women’s prison as Detainee 1536. In the first cell she met other women activists: Dr. Amina Rashid from Cairo University; Dr. Latifa al-Zayyat; 48-hours later Dr. Awatif Abd al-Rahman arrested at the airport. There were many Copt women in the prison: ostensibly arrested for promoting sectarian strife. The Copts were mixed in with the Muslims, but were suddenly separated into separate cells, making it clear that the government was not afraid of sectarian conflicts but rather solidarity across sectarian lines, even in the prisons. The radio loudspeakers in the prison constantly carried the speeches of Sadat: “I will have no mercy... I will crush and eradicate them... I will have no mercy...” A meeting with officials led to the revelation that the group of “political women” was being held on order of the President of the Republic on a “Precautionary Detention Order... until the Socialist prosecutor can begin the investigations.” (The women would joke: “Why did they call him the Socialist prosecutor?”—“There is nothing left of Socialism except the Socialist Prosecutor.”) Periodically, Sadat’s personal helicopter would carry him from his country home in the Barrages over the women’s prison. Prison life includes slogging tension, like those between the ultra-religious women prisoners (munaqqabas) and the prostitutes; yet the daily exercises of Saadawi came to be a time when many of the women did exercises together in a small but continuing defiance of the wardens. She encountered the prison doctor, Sabir Barsum, who had been in medical classes with her 25 years ago (she had discovered that in class he had passed out when she mentioned menstruation and, after the disapproval; one young mother carrying a child cried out: “Shame on you! Poking rifles in the face of a woman. Go fight Israel instead!”). She was arrested by a mob of bayonet-tipped rifle waving armed soldiers, who broke down her door without a warrant, seized personal papers, her diary and an incomplete novel (a fearful crowd watched the arrest with some disapproval; one young mother carrying a child cried out: “Shame on you! Poking rifles in the face of a woman. Go fight Israel instead!”). She was taken first to a prison in Cairo for a few hours, then driven into the Delta (the driver was suffering from pellagra she noted, a vitamin B deficiency); she was admitted to a barracks women’s prison as Detainee 1536. In the first cell she met other women activists: Dr. Amina Rashid from Cairo University; Dr. Latifa al-Zayyat; 48-hours later Dr. Awatif Abd al-Rahman arrested at the airport. There were many Copt women in the prison: ostensibly arrested for promoting sectarian strife. The Copts were mixed in with the Muslims, but were suddenly separated into separate cells, making it clear that the government was not afraid of sectarian conflicts but rather solidarity across sectarian lines, even in the prisons. The radio loudspeakers in the prison constantly carried the speeches of Sadat: “I will have no mercy... I will crush and eradicate them... I will have no mercy...”
joined any political party. She was asked what she thought of an article published by a journal of the legal Tagammu Party, an article she had neither written nor read. She was accused of attacking the Camp David Accords at the International Womens Conference in Copenhagen in 1978: she stated she spoke about the problems of Palestinian women under Israeli occupation, and that meeting was repeatedly disrupted by Israeli journalists (Saadawi shamed the interrogator momentarily by asking whether he knew the source of his information or Egyptian internal security police). It was then that she realized the only common element among the wide assortment of political prisoners she had encountered: "there was nothing in common among those whom Sadat had imprisoned except their opposition to the peace agreement with Israel." It was then that Saadawi remembered being asked by one of Mrs. Sadat's entourage why Saadawi had been so cruel to an Israeli journalist, who had been ejected for trying to disrupt the meeting—Saadawi just replied by asking when that woman had become a defender of Israel: Saadawi realized suddenly that she had been arrested on the denunciation of Mrs. Sadat, a denunciation that was an Israeli lie [perhaps more specifically, she was the victim of an Israeli disinformation effort which involved reporting to the gullible Mrs. Sadat that Saadawi was a traitor to Egypt]. The inquiry ended with no evidence of any kind being brought against her, but with a statement that having been arrested on the order of president Sadat, only he could release her.

She was returned to prison with the awareness that no investigation would ever lead to her arrest since the charges were simply based on personal malice: "there was no law, no jurisprudence, and no justice." The political women sometimes believed Sadat would remain in power forever and that they would all die in prison, and then came the news that sadat had been assassinated. Not knowing whether Sadat was dead and fearing that if he was wounded he would have all the political prisoners butchered, they fearfully and hopefully tried to find out what had happened. Listening that night to a smuggled radio they heard Sadat was dead. The next day worried prison officials allowed them to buy fresh chickens; days passed without an order for a release although now mail and food packages were delivered from their families; Sadat was buried with few mourners other than the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Israel. Weeks passed: the new government of Husni Mubarak accused political prisoners (listed by name and including Saadawi) of planning a Soviet backed coup. Shortly thereafter she was taken to meet Mubarak (30 other detainees were also there): without even a word to release her, she walked alone out a side door.

Afterword for the American Edition: The memoir of prison was written in 1981. In the following years she traveled to many countries: "I have discovered that this thing called 'democracy' is nothing but a veil— as are the words 'God', 'religion', 'peace' and 'justice'—used to conceal the vilest sorts of force, murder, oppression and exploitation. This veil, which is forcibly placed over minds by the media, is more dangerous than the veil fashioned from a length of fabric that women in some countries use to cover their hair of faces. Upon meeting a number of senior-level European and North American political science professors, I was astonished to discover that they did not know the true reasons behind the war in the Gulf. Somalia, Bosnia, Palestine and elsewhere. I was baffled to learn what a momentous role print journalism and the other media have played in brainwashing these professors—for then what of the masses of ordinary folk? We inhabit the age of technology of false consciousness, the technology of hiding truths behind amiable humanistic slogans that may change from one era to another. The latest slogan is human rights, which has become a sword for the mighty to use against the weak... We continue to live in an age of servitude. Although the form has changed, the fundamentals remain the same. It is the servitude founded on the concealment of rights and the existence of a double standard.... Today power is in the hands of the exclusive possessors of nuclear weapons and their secrets, of the media, of means of rapid broadcast and rapid killing. This power allows them to slay thousands of men, women and children in a hugely destructive war that they have labelled a 'clean war' to assert their innocence." In 1991 the government closed down the Arab Womens Solidarity Association; in 6/1992 the government sent 24 armed guards to her home to protect her: now Saadawi lives abroad.

20099. El-Saadawi, Nawal; Peoples Translation Service [Trans]. "What Is Creativity?", in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 4, April 1, 1982. pp. 2-3. Nawal El Saadawi is an Egyptian doctor and writer. She worked as director of Egypt's Public Health Service, but lost her job in 1972 due to her feminist and liberal activities. Denied permission to publish in Egypt, she went to Beirut, Lebanon. Her works are written in Arabic and have only recently been translated into several European languages. From 1978-80 she worked for the UN in Beirut, dealing with women's programs for West Asia. In early 1981 she returned to Egypt to continue her writing, but was imprisoned in 8/81. A few months before his assassination, President Anwar Sadat embarked on a fierce campaign against government opponents. Several thousand people were arrested. Due to international pressure, El Saadawi was released from prison on 11/25/81 together with 30 other political prisoners.

The following is an excerpt of a speech given at a writers' conference in Oslo, Norway in 7/80, shortly before the UN Mid-Decade Conference on Women in Copenhagen, Denmark.

What is creativity?: Creativity, to my mind, is an innovative process which embraces all the arts and sciences. It includes the love, friendship and cooperation which people develop between one another in the common effort aimed at achieving a better life, and molding better individuals. It is not confined to the intellectual activity or the mental production of the individual, but in its essence encompasses the collective action of groups, classes and nations and the mobilization of the potential of all peoples to improve life, develop societies materially, culturally and morally, and ensure that peace reigns among all peoples.

The human body, whether that of man or woman, the mind and the emotions enfold a range of dazzling capabilities that reveal themselves through creative action and also through the manifold activities carried on everyday by people who are considered "ordinary" because these activities, which to us often appear mundane and repetitive, are the result, historically at least, of a long creative effort. The tendency has been for dominant schools of thought to limit the creative and innovative process, and to see it only in some specific restricted forms of action carried out by an oligarchy of men. This limited class group, elevated by the patriarchal class system to the level of gods, are bestowed privileges and titles and referred to as geniuses, artists, exceptional talents, creators, extraordinary people.

The human being is artistic and creative by nature. He or she is capable of finding solutions to new problems, and does it all the time. This is the essence of creativity, which is a universal human gift, and not a distinction confined to any specific group. He or she is engaged in a constant struggle to improve life and make it more beautiful. The folk songs, legends, dances, arts and crafts handed down through the ages indicate that the most beautiful artistic expression can be the work of thousands or even millions of "ordinary" men and women.

Since it is not possible to divide a human being into separate parts, the mind cannot be isolated from the body. Thus physical activity is an integral part of creative action. Dancing which might appear to be pure entertainment is being made of bodily force to achieve a given objective. The dividing line between craftsmanship, skill and creative action is not as sharply defined as many might think, although it exists within certain limits.

Creativity, Imagination and Reality: Reflection, meditation and contemplation of the past enhance the sensitivity of the individual, like a tool refined and sharpened by practice. Thus, it is that he or she is brought step by step to a discovery of the new in the old, the particular in the general, the astounding in the ordinary, the contradictory in the harmonious and the harmonious in the contradictory. The creative process can only unfold itself in conjunction with this process of contemplation and reflection, which permits the individual to live through reality once more, yet in a way which is different to experience a reality which, although real, is not the exact replica of the reality known before. For ideas, thoughts and concepts are not born outside reality but within it, inspired by it, born of its matter, its energy, its dynamic forces. What grows out of the creative process is in fact reality, but it never is, and never should be, a mirror image. It is more difficult than mere copying, more complex than an exercise in imagination. It is the capacity to restructure reality, to endow it with a different content and form, so that it appears as a new reality.

Whenever I sit writing in my closed room, despite the four walls which hem me in and isolate me from other people, and despite the nature of the writing process which is a purely individual form of action, I always feel that I derive my thoughts, or draw what we call inspiration, from the creative imagination of the men, women and children among whom I have lived or am still living. Even if I rebel against many of the traditions and customs which govern their lives, they remain the rich and lasting source of inspiration for my thoughts and feelings. I have come to realize that my literary or scientific creativity can only flourish if it passes through the multiple network of relations and links which I have established over the years with people of my city Cairo and my village Kafr Tahla. These links are also the support and the protection which have spared me the sorrow of loneliness and the alienation of excessive individualism. My desire to nurture my art, and to preserve my individual identity, my pressing need to be alone, away from people, so that I can meditate and contemplate, are accompanied by an equally pressing need to be in contact with people, not because I want to write about them, but because I must live with them and touch with my hands the fiber of their support.

The Power of Creative Action: The basic power of creative action is the ability to penetrate and influence the minds and hearts of people. This can only be realized when the person involved really lives the life of the people and shares their sorrows and aspirations. Keeping close contact with people and reality, creating action makes the creative woman capable of recording the minutest details related to time, location and the incidents and personalities constituting the essence of reality. This record may permit her to immortalize the fleeting moments involved in the raping of a girl, the beating of a prisoner or the death of a child from hunger, because thousands and even millions of hearts and minds are gripped by such moments. They relive them through the narrative, a play or a film. The incident that was a part of the past, and might have died and been buried with it, is revived by creative action and resurrected to become a living part of the present, of the minds and hearts of people in different ages and places. It disturbs the placid waters of resignation, evokes new thoughts and feelings. The minds and hearts of individuals are transformed, their determination to rebel against oppression is strengthened.

Consequently, the power of creative action lies in its ability to implant seeds of revolution in the hearts of oppressed men, women and children. This revolution might not materialize in the form of a popular movement capable of changing the system within their lifetime, but at least the seeds will have been sown in the ground, and as surely as the sun rises from the East, they will ultimately flourish. Revolution is the natural result of creative action and freedom is the daughter of the revolution. Revolution and freedom, together, constitute the form and content of any creative action.

Conflict With Authority: One of the most difficult problems that confronts a creative woman is the inevitable conflict which breaks out sooner or later between her and authority, between her and the system dominant in society, because this system is built on patriarchal class relations. The intensity of this conflict is proportionate to the effectiveness of the action undertaken by the creative woman. The methods and weapons used against her differ according to the types of society in which she lives.

The dominant system possesses a whole range of oppressive instruments such as censorship, police forces, prisons, newspapers and mass media, as well as religious and cultural institutions. It is, therefore, always capable of breaking any individuals who try to rebel against it, unless those individuals succeed in building up a people's political organization capable of standing up to the powerful forces that will be unleashed against it. This task is an extremely difficult one in societies where liberty and freedom are words devoid of content, where a single individual commands the destiny of a nation and where any criticism or difference of opinion is outlawed. Where this is the case creative people, and especially creative women, feel themselves surrounded, cornered, threatened by obvious and obscure dangers every moment of their lives.

It is undoubtedly a difficult task for the creative woman to safeguard and develop her capacities under the prevailing system of society. She is often called upon to pay a heavy price in her private and public life. She may divorce (I was divorced twice) or be expelled from her job (my experience more than once). She might have to face harsh circumstances which pose a threat to her reputation, or to her economic, psychological or even physical stability (sometimes I have been threatened with violence, even death, by bigoted, fanatical individuals, groups or institutions).

The creative woman must realize that she is struggling against established forces which are equipped with powerful means and deeply rooted values. She must mobilize all her powers in this struggle and depend on the real forces which can support and protect her - those men, women, young people and children whose hearts and minds she touches through her creative production. I believe that, were it not for the hundreds and thousands of readers who sincerely and enthusiastically support my writings, buy my books and attend the lectures I give, I would not have been able to maintain my activity and keep on writing. Moreover, the forces of authority in my country and in other Arab countries would have been able to crush me completely.

If interested in having the full text of the above speech, please send $1.00 to Connexions. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.][=]

Q: As we approach International Women's Day, 1991, we can embark on some kind of intellectual extravaganza to explain things, or we can look at the current global situation as being no different--except in terms of technological sophistication--from what it was 500 years ago when the imperialist powers sailed to our countries, murdered our people and traded land for blankets. They are doing the same thing to us in 1991, only in a different guise. But at the same time, we are witnessing momentous changes worldwide in another direction. Colonialism and international capitalism are in deep recession and crisis. To maintain their reign of terror they are fighting wars all over the globe on an increasingly larger scale to try and stem the tide. Their potential to deceive the people is wearing thin. It seems like internationally we are on the edge of something.

A: Yes, I think that once again, imperialism and colonialism are much more visible, they have been more invisible over the last decades. After WWI and WWII, and after the so-called independence we were given, we were controlled by economic exploitation and economic colonialism. US and British troops were not in the streets, the enemy was more invisible. But the fact is we were colonised economically. For centuries we have not lived with any independence--the colonial powers have not left us alone.
I think we are really witnessing a very important period in the colonial history of our region. We as Arab people, all over the Arab world, having faced colonialism and imperialism for centuries in different shapes and guises, are starting to be awakened. This is one of the positive effects of the war. When I hear about the demonstrations in Algeria, in Morocco, in Jordan, in Libya, in Tunisia, in Sudan, all over the Arab World, even in Egypt and Syria, I know this is an important moment in history. We are no longer simply relying on the West to save us. We are starting to see the light of day and the end of the colonial era.

Q: After recent events it is clear that there will be a new order in the Arab world, but to whose advantage?

A: Yes, unfortunately this new order will be in the interests of the imperialists—the US and Britain. They want another map because they are threatened. They were threatened by Nasser, they were threatened by Qadhafi, they were threatened by Saddam Hussein, they are threatened by any Arab leader who challenges them. They were very threatened in 1973 when there was a clash between the Arabs and the West over oil. Since then, they have been thinking about this war and how to dominate the gulf area and all the Arab countries, because they could no longer simply rely on Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. And when they lost Iran they were threatened again. They were afraid of Iran's power and especially the Khomeini regime, which was very anti-US. The US used Iraq to diminish the military power of Iran. The Iraq-Iran War was initiated and encouraged by the US and their allies to destroy both countries. The Gulf War too was initiated by the US.

Q: Yes, they certainly rushed into the region, ensuring that the Arab people never had a chance to find an Arab solution to the conflict. They are so afraid of Arab unity.

A: Yes, their main aim is to prevent Arab unity at all costs. And for that they need their puppet regimes. But the people of the Arab world have shown that they are united in their opposition to the backward and fundamentalist traditions of Saudi Arabia, supported by the US machine, and in spite of the fact that they won militarily, this will be temporary.

This war was paid for by Kuwait and Saudi money. This is the first time in history that the colonised are paying for being colonised—can you believe it?

I think the injustice built into the UN structure has been clearly exposed in the past months and I think this is very important. That's why, in Geneva, at the Women's International Conference on 2/23/1991, we issued a statement calling for the resignation of Perez de Cuellar. He met Saddam Hussein on 1/15/1991 and the transcript of the meeting was published. At the meeting Saddam Hussein indicated that he was ready to withdraw and open negotiations. And this meeting and this transcript was never discussed by the UN Security Council. Can you imagine? Instead the US rushed to war. It is a scandal.

Q: Can you tell us about the International Women’s Conference you have just attended in Geneva?

A: There were about 90 women from 26 countries. It was called the Emergency Conference since we met at very short notice because we were horrified about what was happening in the Gulf.

The conference was organised by the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. The agenda for the conference was to look at what we could do to stop the war immediately. The conference called for an international conference which would deal with the conflict between Iraq and Kuwait as well as other conflicts in the Middle East, in particular Palestine and the conflicts over oil. And as I mentioned, we also decided to send a delegation to the United Nations to meet Perez de Cuellar and ask him to resign, and also to meet with the UN Security Council, and ask the members who approved Resolution 6-78 to resign, because this resolution was clearly in violation of the UN Charter. It is stipulated within the Charter that the United Nations should work to resolve conflicts between countries peacefully, not with force. And there was definitely no effort put into finding a peaceful resolution. All avenues to peace were blocked.

The women at the conference were calling for peace. We wanted to stop the war, but we wanted to listen to the Iraqi people, and we agreed, because everybody wants peace, but not in exchange for slavery.

Q: How are we to move to an Arab solution and end of all this?

A: First of all there must be Arab unity. Without Arab unity, as scattered and divided countries, we are going to remain powerless. That's why they keep us divided. But Arab unity is increasing. And Arab unity must happen between the people not the governments. During this disaster the Arab people have come together. We feel that we are all, as Arab people, in the same boat. We are colonised, we are killed, this is our oil, they want to take it from us and they come to our land and kill us for their interests, and we can no longer tolerate that. We are also seeing that what really prevents us from having this Arab unity is our governments, they are divided. So, first of all the Arab people have to get rid of the governments that oppress them. The Arab League should then really work hard not to be divided, because in the present Arab League, all the problems of the Arab governments are reflected and there is a great deal of division, and this division is encouraged by the imperial powers.

And also an important development is the increasing power of women in the Arab world. We have to face the fact that women are coming to the fore. We cannot imagine how women are coming up. When you see demonstrations in Jordan, in Morocco, in Algeria you find women in there in the forefront. You see that 50% or more are women. And I think that in a crisis women have a chance to come out and liberate themselves. It's like a crack in the wall, the system is cracked, so the poor come out, women come out. And we must ensure that there is no relapse. We have seen often enough in our histories the way governments and leadership have used women, and then when the struggle is done and the war is fought, they tell them thank you very much, you can now go back home. But we will no longer let this happen. We are not ready to go back home after this scourge, we have to stay on and fight and win.

Also one of the positive results of this Gulf War is that it has clearly differentiated between fundamentalist and progressive Islamic tendencies. There is the Saudi Arabian group who are collaborating with the imperialists. These are the most backward the most right-wing, the most fanatical. And there is another grouping of progressive Muslims, who understand the need to separate religion and state, who understand the need for women's liberation etc. This I think is very positive because it crystallizes the fact that the Muslim religion, like any other religion or ideology, is open to interpretation, and like any other religion or ideology can have a fundamentalist and progressive interpretation. Among the Arab countries you find that each political system, and each country has a different interpretation of the Koran. When you have a progressive political system then you have a progressive interpretation of the Koran.

And of course we have to look at what we call the Islamic policy of America. Quite a lot of people think that the US is against fundamentalism. This is not true. In fact, the United States supports fundamentalism—the most right-wing versions of Islam they can find. And of course this serves the US in numerous ways. You know Saudi Arabia paid a lot of money millions of dollars, fighting Communism instead of Zionism. We call Saudi Arabia the 51st state of America. From Saudi Arabia came the death list of progressive writers in the Arab countries on which my name was included.

And so you see the US has a hidden agenda in relation to the way in which it can use Islam. They have used Islam to divide people, and they discourage Islam if it is enlightened. They use religion in a very clever and cunning way. And we have to be clever back. Some women in the Arab World have started an organisation called “Progressive Muslim Women in the Arab World,” using Islam to unify people, not to divide to liberate women, not to veil them, etc.

Q: On this International Women’s Day, what is your vision for women worldwide?

A: We must achieve unity, we must sit around a table and meet until we do. We should do this collectively and continuously. It’s hard work but we have to do it. And this coming together needs a new philosophy. We need to learn how to cooperate with people who have different ideas and who are from different political groups... We have to transcend all these boundaries, all of these limitations, because it’s time to come together. In times of crisis you have to forget your differences. You have to compromise to bring people together. And we should not reject the idea of nationalism. Although sometimes I am not for it, I believe we can use it in a positive way to achieve unity.

And I think that women can play a major role in the process of coming together as a people and as a world, because women are much more flexible. We are not as dogmatic as men. We listen and we are not as conceited and stubborn. We are ready to listen and change our mind and work with people. That's the advantage we have gained from being so completely excluded from this dogmatic, imperialist, patriarchal system.

Q: Yes, being left out of it is positive.

A: It's very positive, and it has enabled women to greatly contribute to the process of bringing us all together. And I think that in addition to working together in the Arab world, we have to work with progressive groups worldwide to achieve international unity. There are many groups in the imperialist countries that are against the war and against their governments. Many women in the US, in Britain and throughout Europe spoke out against war. We need to study the diversity in the West and to work with groups that are against imperialism and colonialism. And this in turn weakens the idea of the so-called allies—as if everyone in the West is united. This is not true.

We must have global feminism, because very simply we are all in the same boat. I think women in the West are becoming more and more aware of this. They are oppressed by the same element as us. I see women suffering a severe poverty here because of the same government that sent troops to kill the Iraqi people. They have money for war, but they don't have money for women and for children or education or for social services. So we are saying to women internationally that we have one enemy and we are all in the same boat. We are all oppressed but to different degrees. This will bring us together. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$80.] [X]

20101. El-Solh, Camillia Fawzi; Altorki, Soraya [editor]; El-Solh, Camillia Fawzi [editor]. Arab Women in the Field: Studying Your Own Society: Part 5: Gender, Class and Origin. Modern Arab Studies. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 91-114. As the pretense of objectivity in anthropology has started crumbling, being replaced by a realization that making the assumptions built into anthropologic can produce a better understanding of the results of fieldwork. In studying an Egyptian peasant settlement in Iraq, commonalities of being an Arab-American woman can overcome much of the distance between peasants and foreign-academic researchers. The author is Egyptian-Irish, grew up in Egypt, and received her higher education in West Germany. In 1975, a bilateral agreement between Egypt and Iraq provided for the settlement of Egyptian peasants in communities in Iraq at Iraqi expense: in 1976 the Khalasa Settlement was established 36 miles south of Baghdad. Being an Egyptian in Iraq led to some difficulties, both political and in terms of the continuing formality of relations between men and women (the Iraqi Federation of Women tends to underestimate such problems). Even worse, in 1981, the housing crisis in Baghdad due to the Iran-Iraq War had led a spillover of people into Khalasa Settlement. One notable ideological difference between the author and her peasant informants was that while she found female circumcision to be very distasteful, they perceived it as a personal and social good and considered women not circumcised as "distasteful and unclean". Despite the relative advantages of being an Arab and Egyptian woman in Khalasa Settlement, this advantage was fragile and was damaged by a meeting she held with a local official on his request: this meeting made people less friendly towards here and in effect limited her ability to do fieldwork, which was soon ended.

20102. Ethelson, Sally. "Gender, Population, Environment: The Cairo Neighborhood of Manshiet Nasir Reflects The Social and Demographic Circumstances Common to Most Countries In The Region: Rapid Population Growth and Increasing Urbanization; Scarcity of Land, Water and Other Economic Resources; and Limit's On Women's "Social and Economic Autonomy", in Middle East Report, September-October 1994. pp. 2-5. Manshiet Nasir is a squattertown at the dge of Cairo's Muqattam Hills: most homes now have water and electricity; immunization campaigns have eliminated tetanus and other common diseases among women and children. The tacit recognition of settlement rights has enabled the residents to buy and sell their property. PVO’s like the Association for the Protection of the Environment (Gamaat Himayat al-Biat min Al-Talawuth) provide literacy and handicrafts projects for women. Moreover, Manshiet Nasir remains very impoverished and still suffers from public health and sanitation problems. On task done in local workshops is dismantling Cairo hospitals’ used syringes, work that is done by children. The settlement illustrates the problems of advancing an environmentalist agenda in very poor regions: some problems, such as solid waste management or water conservation, may simply be beyond the means of the impoverished communities. Yet the modest interventions in Manshiet Nasir have enabled women to learn to read, to earn money, and thus gain a measure of autonomy, if limited in an absolute sense, may transform the lives of these women. At the same time, population as a concern was downgraded to a secondary concern at the Earth Summit in 1992. The $600 billion forecast needed at the Earth Summit to promote environmental policies is simply not forthcoming: only a few hundred million has trickled into the World Bank’s Global Environmental Facility. The hope that NGOs can do such a global job, even if there are local successes as in Manshiet Nasir is simply unrealistic: Following the Cairo Conference, with all its extravagance and whatever the merit of its proclamations, the task of pushing the process of change in the face of existing hierarchies of wealth and power will remain.
Ford advances the idea that libraries are obsolete except as museums of books as material culture; he begins with a strong-headed Foucault quote observing, ‘rhetoric is a means of momentarily postponing the burning of libraries’ [Foucault, Language, Counter-Memory, Practice: Selected Essays and Interviews (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977)] (p. 10, col. 1), when it is surely more likely that libraries are burned as a result of rhetoric. Postiling his discourse as exploring the ‘new art history...[that is],...the museum’ (p. 10, col. 3), Ford advances a program that would terminate libraries as institutions associated with knowledge (p. 10, col. 1), would terminate classification of knowledge in the name of a new disorder (p. 11, col. 2-3; p. 14, col. 1), would terminate scientific inquiry and reinstate the primary role of a hyper-oral tradition (p. 12, col. 2), and would terminate authorship of text by redefining authorship as little more than rearrangement of previously existing paragraphs, or even better, of images or video clips (p. 12, col. 2). So, for example, Ford argues that: ‘classification and forms of cataloging do not just aid the retrieval of relevant material they impose a grid of the permissible on the field of the possible’ [citing Victor Burgin, ‘Institutional Legitimation Imposes a Grid of the Permissable Upon the Field of the Possible’. The End of Art Theory: Criticism and Postmodernity (London: Macmillan, 1986)] (p. 11, col. 3). However, in real libraries significant books are excluded from collections not because the works cannot be assigned a call number, and not because they don’t otherwise meet the collection policies of the libraries, but rather because of a failure in collection development policy implementation. Characteristically, Ford confuses classification of books as a process with censorship: books are not censored because they cannot be classified, but rather because they are classified (classified as having undesirable ideas). Ford goes on to make very clear his specific rejection of the meaningfulness of ideas by his rejection of intellectual processes that are ‘consistent, unitary and linear’ (p. 12, col. 1); accepting the next logical step, Ford dissolves the possibility of meaningful authorship of text by dissolving the difference between author and reader, making every reader also the producer of the text since the reader can add to or rearrange fragments of any text within the ‘hyper-reality...docuserve’ (p. 12, col. 2-3). Ford quotes Poster who asserts that the effects of [wordprocessing] include[s] the possibility of degendering...and dissipation of the subject, dislocating it temporally and spatially (p. 12, col. 2), a very odd statement that can only have been made by someone who does not type very much on a keyboard (of course, Poster may be using some very unusual wordprocessing software; but Poster’s observation is consistent with Ford’s assertion that the reader becomes the producer in a way that might mean Ford, for example, cannot tell whether or not he is Madonna when watching her Internet hypervideo). This process of creating, mainly by rearrangement and rewriting, makes a personal history of ancient Egypt. In which, for example, Simon Ford is Pharaoh, or of pop culture in which Simon Ford is Boy George, as valid as any objective reality since “the distinction between representation and reality seems to become irrelevant or ‘immaterial’” (p. 15). Ford then goes on to argue that hypertext is ‘rapidly becoming the characteristic mode of expression both in the culture and in the study of cultural forms’, which is a clear confusion between ‘representation’ (termed vaporeon in the software industry) and ‘reality’, since only a few toy hypertext systems have ever been built: this fundamental error in turn become the premise for Ford’s program for reform of libraries in the Western world. Ford does pause to cheerfully note that hypermedia, since it will likely not include materials that are ‘dangerous, radical and potentially treating’ (p. 12, col. 3) will make such materials ‘marginalized, insignificant and practically nonexistent’ (p. 12, col. 3), even as books (the traditional mechanism for disseminating such marginalized ideas) will become the preserve of ‘specialists, be they curators, historians, bibliographers, or librarians’ (p. 12, col. 3): he balances this grim scenario by noting happily that the central role of the visual image will be reaffirmed (but is a self-authored hyperdocument about the neolithic really made more valuable illustrated with video clips from the Flintstones? and is such a document a meaningful replacement for dissertation or education of the young?).

Ford’s central thesis is that the library is a temporary special case of the museum which is now obsolete. With books becoming irrelevant as all correct ideas escape from the physical shell of books into cyberspace (and as real libraries become unreal ‘virtual libraries’), books become the merest material culture (p. 13, col. 1), that should be displayed in exhibit cases for their ‘decorration’ or ‘construction’ (p. 13, col. 2). Ford states that libraries and museums can learn much from each other, and while specifically rejecting the ‘dominance’ of libraries by museums (p. 13, col. 1), he states very clearly that the only remaining purpose of libraries is become a second-rate class of museums and to display books as artifacts of an earlier age, in display cases (p. 13, col. 2) presenting the ‘history of the book’ rather than the book itself (p. 14, col. 1). He tries to soften the impact of this true death of the library as an institution associated with ideas by quoting Hooper-Greenfield saying, ‘where reality and hyper-reality can barely be distinguished, the potential of a return to the concrete material evidence is of overriding importance’, even as he asserts that the specialist nature of any ‘marginalized’ ideas that the books contain be the exclusive domain of experts (who themselves do not pretend to understand such ideas, but rather merely classify the books as physical objects). Of course, Ford is driven to this conclusion by his remarkable assertion that it is a mere ‘misapprehension’ that books and ideas have any real connection (he notes Jesse Shera is wrong to say of books that: ‘its fundamental concern is with the communication of knowledge, ideas, thought; but because those intangibles are embodied in physical objects--books and other graphic records--it is easy to mistake the physical object rather that its intellectual content as the reality’ (p. 13, col. 2). Ford, having already rejected linear text as relevant, and in noting that for the post-modernist person reading is ‘increasingly difficult’ in any event (p. 12, col. 3), describes the ‘book’ as the ‘poor relation’ of text (p. 13, col. 1-2); and so, for Ford, the examination of the cover of a book, or the glue that holds it together, is a greater ‘celebration’ than is the reading of the book (p. 13, col. 2). It is impossible to imagine how anyone who has ever read a book and been influenced by its ideas could claim that the real meaning of a book is in the decoration of its binding. Ford’s self-proclaimed ‘radicalism’ is rooted in the destruction of the library and the book, the traditional media of dissertation and education, culminating in the substitution of the representation of dissertation and the simulation of education for its reality. Postiling an improbable world of omnipresent hypermedia, Ford advocates the immediate gutting of all Western institutions that have administered the destruction of our intellectual freedom and discourse for half a millennium; and advocates, in the name of higher ‘museological’ purpose, the abolition of the book. [Simon Ford is a curator at the National Art Library, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, and self-styled leader of the Movement for Avant-Garde Librarianship.][TXT]

20105. Fridman, L. A. “Polozheniya i Borba Rabochego Klassa Yegipeta v 1913-1938 (The Position and Struggle of the Working Class in Egypt in 1913-1938),” in Voprosy Istori, 1954. pp. 117-128. The article is factual and quotes Egyptian and British sources. It regards ther period 1931-1938 as a school of political activity for the Egyptian working class whose position it describes as follows: owing to the world economic crisis of 1929-1933 Britain had to make some concessions to the bourgeoisie such as an increase in customs duty. There was a marked development of industry in the period 1931-1938 so that by 1937 there were between 160000 and 1700000 workers. The proletariat was being constantly reinforced by landless peasants who numbered from 2 to 3 million. There was thus an army of workers which caused wages to fall far below the cost of living, in addition to which prices were forced up by indirect taxation. Foreign workers received about four times more than Egyptian workers who were quite unable to provide suitably for their families. This caused heavy mortality and led to the employment of women and children. Industry was owned by foreign firms or Egyptian capitalists who earned great profits. Thus the struggle of the workers to better their economic position merged with the struggle to win independence for Egypt. There were periodic strikes, but the workers were leaderless since the Communist party had been broken. The treaty of 1936 caused a new wave of strikes which were forcibly quelled by the Wafd. It had tried to control the trade union movement in its own interests but did nothing to improve the position of the workers. The war put a stop to strikes and
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

I am not a traditional psychiatrist working through a clinic. I am more or less a psychiatrist who wants to change psychiatry and reach people through writing rather than through clinical work.

Q: What kind of reception have your books, especially the Hidden Face of Eve and Women and Neurosis received from the medical profession?
A: Some of the progressive doctors really want to change, especially the young doctors. They read my books and come to home for discussions. But some of the older generation of traditional doctors don't like what I say. They think I am violating the medical profession.

Q: How do you see traditional psychiatry?
A: The medical profession is very commercial. You find the psychiatrist sitting in his clinic watching the clock. He will interrupt you in the middle of a sentence when your time is up. A psychiatrist usually prescribes drugs to his patients. It's easy--he writes you a prescription for some sleeping pills, some tranquilizers and you go home with many drugs to swallow. They call this "treatment" and they profit a lot. Psychiatrists can become very rich in this business. And it's the women who suffer.

Q: What did you discover in your research about women and neurosis?
A: I discovered quite a lot about psychiatric doctors. Most of them believe that mental problems are congenital, genetic or related to the past. So the psychiatrist often asks the patient about her mother or father--whether the parents had a history of depression. The psychiatrist is not interested in the patient's present life. Maybe the patient has a very cruel husband who is responsible for her neurosis. They psychiatrists do not question the relationship between husband and wife because he believes a wife must be obedient to her husband to have a good mental health attitude.

I found in my study that the causes of neurosis, depression or anxiety in women are related to their present life rather than their past history and it is usually caused by a man in her present life (husband, father, boss) who is oppressing her. So neurosis is more often socially caused rather than congenitally or genetically caused.

Most psychiatrists believe that domination of the husband over the wife is something natural and even sought for--every husband is dominant every wife obedient. They don't think the woman becomes neurotic because her husband is dominant. They can't understand that. They treat her in such a way that she should submit to her feminine attitude, her feminine role. They don't try to make her aware of her identity, her independence, her personality. They try to help her adapt to the marriage system and to fit into the obedience role. Most of the women I interviewed during my research were suffering from domination of their husbands. They were beaten by their husbands. They couldn't tolerate such a life and they were rebelling. To a traditional psychiatrist, they were unable to adapt.

Q: How did the women you interviewed for your study on "Women and Neurosis" respond to your questions?
A: Some of them at the beginning were resistant, especially the women in prison Firdaus, who was the topic of my book Woman at Point Zero, refused to meet me. She though I was going to investigate her. But after a time, they developed confidence in me and some of them became my friends.

Q: What kinds of crimes had the women prisoners you interviewed committed?
A: Different crimes--some of them were killers--the prostitute who killed her pimp, the wife who killed her husband, the mother who killed her children. One woman killed her child because she was poor and she couldn't find money for food for him. One woman killed her illegitimate child. There were women who sold narcotic drugs, prostitute women and women who were thieves.

Q: How do women end up in the prison mental hospital?
A: Some women develop mental symptoms in prison and are referred to the hospital. They stay at the hospital for a very short time to be treated as an emergency. Then they go back to their cells, and if they develop symptoms again they return to the hospital.

Q: What are the conditions inside the prisons, the prison hospitals, and the public and private mental hospitals?
A: The situation is very desperate in the prisons. In prison hospitals the situation is bad—the treatment is lacking. The doctors are negligent of the patients because they are considered prisoners not having full rights. The same goes for the public mental hospitals. They are free for the poor and are also very bad, but they are better than the prison hospitals.

The free mental clinics suffer from overcrowding. Some people even sleep on the floor because there aren't enough beds. Some of the nurses exploit the patients by making them work or by stealing their food. These situations are improving now because many people began writing about the conditions in the hospitals.

But in the private mental hospitals, you find the upper class women in clean, bright surroundings. If you go first class you have your own room with a bathroom.

Q: Do women voluntarily go to mental institutions or are they committed?
A: The poor women don't go voluntarily; usually someone in their family takes them. If, for example, a woman develops hysterical fits, especially a poor woman, she is taken by force to the mental hospital. With upper class women, when they suffer depression or anxiety, they go by themselves just to change their atmosphere. Or her doctor may advise her to go to an institution for a month or so to get treatment and relax.

Q: If a husband wants to get rid of his wife, can he commit her to an institution?
A: To get rid of her, he can divorce her. Why should he send her to an expensive institution? The Egyptian family law gives a man the full right to divorce his wife without any reason. Women live under pressure because they are afraid of divorce.

Q: Is there a high suicide rate among women?
A: No, but there are a few cases.

Q: Are lobotomies and electric shock treatment practiced on women?
A: I haven't heard of lobotomies used in psychiatric cases, only in organic cases, when there is a tumor on the brain. [As for shock treatment] they still practice it in hospitals, but the percentage of usage is diminishing, because some people have started to write about it. I wrote in one of my books about damage the electric shock treatment caused. It really affects the brain and personality, so quite a few doctors are refraining from using it.

Q: Are there any movements among mental health patients to organize for better rights?
A: No, not yet.

Q: And women prisoners?
A: Among women prisoners it is very difficult. The prisons are very oppressive. The women are kept separate by the jailers so they cannot come together to communicate or organize.

Q: Are the prisons overcrowded?
A: Yes. When Sadat sent 1536 political prisoners to jail, there was no room for us. [These mass arrests began in 9/1981—those charged were held under the “Law for the Protection of Values from Shame.”] I was with a group of 14 women. They had to evacuate the cell of the beggars for us.

Q: Who were the women you shared the cell with?
A: We came from different groups; there were Muslim fundamentalists, leftists, liberals, Christians—all of the opposition were represented in the cell. It was quite an experience. I wrote a play about it called Twelve Women in One Cell and also a book called Memoirs of My Life in Prison. [Neither are currently available in English.] The three months in prison gave me insight and exposure to a totally different life and totally different people. Whether it was the Muslim fundamentalist or the jailer or the prostitute who served us, everything was new to me.

Q: The jailing are prisoners you?
A: The jailers used prostitutes to assist them in washing clothes and in cleaning the wards. They used prostitutes, but they wouldn't use a woman who sold drugs, for instance. There is a class system in prison—those women who sell drugs are rich and dignified so they might assist the jailer in some of the administrative work. The prostitutes who are imprisoned are considered lower class. Only the poor prostitutes end up in prison, the rich ones pay bribes and escape being caught.

Q: Were you able to have outside contact when you were in prison?
A: No, not a newspaper or even a paper and pen. Everyday there was an inspection. After the assassination of Sadat, though, inspections loosened and we were able to smuggle some things in. The same prostitute who washed our cell, smuggled in toilet paper to write on and pens. So I started writing my memoirs on toilet paper and buried my writing under the ground. I remember one day I unburied my writing and it was all wet, so the letters were indistinguishable. So I started putting the papers inside a tin can so that the water from the ground wouldn't spoil it. We also smuggled a small radio to try to keep in touch with the outside world.

Q: Was there a lot of public reaction to these mass arrests?
A: Outside Egypt, yes. We heard through the radio that internationally people were speaking about it. But in Egypt the radio and the newspaper are controlled by the government. They accused us of being traitors. So we didn't like to listen to the station from Cairo or read the Cairo newspaper.

Q: Were you in prison when Sadat was assassinated?
A: Yes, I was released two months after his assassination [11/1981]. Government officials came to the cell, told me to get my clothes and took me in a car, refusing to tell me where I was going. I thought they were taking me to another prison, but instead I found myself at the home of the new president [Hosni Mubarak]. It was so dramatic. I was one of the first groups of 31 people to be released, and he invited us to his home for a discussion. It was really interesting because I found myself in my sneakers from the cell standing in the house of the president.

Q: Were you doing work about women prisoners when you were arrested?
A: Yes, for many years. When I interviewed women in prison, I never imagined I would someday be a prisoner myself because I've never been a member of any political group. I have always been an independent writer. But under Sadat a lot of people were jailed, including singers and poets. [1]

The last two decades of Infitah (the opening up of Egyptian economy to local and international capital) reversed most of the economic and the social gains made possible by state feminism. It undermined the state planned economy that constituted the materialist basis of Egyptian state feminism. The state, which had been the largest employer, provider of important social services and supporter of equal rights for women in different arenas, has significantly retreated on all of these fronts in the 1980s. It froze its economic commitment to hire all the graduates of Egyptian universities and technical institutes in the state sector, which had kept unemployment down among young men and women. The state presently waits 5 to 6 years before it offers a job to the graduates of different colleges and institutes in the local and central administrations, which represent the bulk of the jobs in the state sector. (Nadir Ferani, Tab'at Mushkil al-Tashhil fi Misr (Cairo: Unpublished paper, 1988), p. 22.) In addition, the more profit conscious managers of the public sector have become increasingly reluctant to hire women because of the gendered expenses the state committed itself to in the 1960s like 3 months of paid maternity leave and the day care services provided for working women.

The last two decades of Infitah (the opening up of Egyptian economy to local and international capital) reversed most of the economic and the social gains made possible by state feminism. It undermined the state planned economy that constituted the materialist basis of Egyptian state feminism. The state, which had been the largest employer, provider of important social services and supporter of equal rights for women in different arenas, has significantly retreated on all of these fronts in the 1980s. It froze its economic commitment to hire all the graduates of Egyptian universities and technical institutes in the state sector, which had kept unemployment down among young men and women. The state presently waits 5 to 6 years before it offers a job to the graduates of different colleges and institutes in the local and central administrations, which represent the bulk of the jobs in the state sector. (Nadir Ferani, Tab'at Mushkil al-Tashhil fi Misr (Cairo: Unpublished paper, 1988), p. 22.) In addition, the more profit conscious managers of the public sector have become increasingly reluctant to hire women because of the gendered expenses the state committed itself to in the 1960s like 3 months of paid maternity leave and the day care services provided for working women.

As a result, unemployment among young women has risen to 40% in marked contrast to the 10% among young men. Finally, the deterioration of the systems of public education and public health and their increased privatization have undermined some of the other gains made by women in the 1960s. Not only did the public education and health systems improve the quality of life of rural and urban working class women in the 1950s and the 1960s, but they also served as the two most important employment outlets for middle class women. Worsening work conditions and salaries in the public social service system have devalued the social standing of these historically feminine occupations and made public employment an unattractive career for young middle class women. The political demise of state feminism is more difficult to analyze. From the very beginning, the political paradoxes of state feminism were overshadowed by the regional acclaim it won in Tunisia, Algeria, Egypt, Syria and Iraq as a progressive approach to women's rights. The discussion of the advances that women made under state feminism left unexamined its problematic definition of women's relationship to the state. In the first section of this paper, I want to present a more realistic assessment of the political accomplishments of state feminism in Egypt. I want to begin this section by asking two questions that sum up the difficulties which state feminism presented its analysts. Was the state's support of women's rights a magnanimous gesture or was it a shrewd political decision that allowed it to serve its own social and political interests? What role, if any, did women play in the decision to launch the policy of state feminism? And how were women, in turn, affected by its program of change?

In Egypt, the regime of Gamal Abdel Nasser initially resisted the demands made by the different feminist groups for suffrage in a publicized hunger strike at the reporters syndicate in 1954. Early in 1956, a few days before the announcement of the new constitution, the representatives of 20 different women's associations formed a general federation that was committed to the defense of women's suffrage. (Ahram, (1/13/1956), p. 78-79.) The decision by the Nasserite state to recognize women's political rights in the 1956 constitution was mindful of this new round of feminist campaigning as well as their success in mobilizing Egyptian public opinion around the issue. According to one of the first public opinion surveys to be done in Egypt in 1956, 64.1% of Cairenes supported granting the vote to women, 33.4% opposed it and 2.5% had no opinion. (See Ahmed Muhammed Taha, al-Mar’at al-Ahl, al-Mar’at al-Misiriya (Cairo: Matb’at Dar al-Tal’if, 1979), pp. 78-79.) State recognition of women's political rights, which was followed by important social and economic changes identified with state feminism, developed as a response to and a reflection of significant changes in public opinion. The state wanted to win this public to its side in the continuing battle with its internal and external opponents, i.e., the political and the social representatives of the old regimes and the West. The regime's positive response to women's demands immediately gave it a progressive social character. It also served to distinguish it politically from the different monarchical governments, which were unified in their refusal to address the political needs of bourgeois and middle class women. Once the state discovered the political usefulness of gender issues in giving it new legitimacy inside and outside the country, the state was reluctant to give up control of the gendered social agenda to organized middle class and bourgeois women whose views seemed radical to the socially conservative free officers.

Credit for the change must go to different feminist groups, who were persistent and successful in their mobilization of the Egyptian public opinion in support of their specific demands. They weaved those demands into the national struggle against the British as well as the new struggle to build a post monarchical Egypt. The generation of Ceza Nabrawi, Inji Aflatun and Duriya Shafiq, who participated actively in this campaign, saw the vote as an important means of political mobilization to influence the state on a variety of important political and social issues. In contrast, the state viewed the vote as a neutralizing device. By recognizing women's right to suffrage, the state hoped to defuse the power of this historical demand to mobilize women around a wider feminist agenda. Without it, the older feminists faced the very difficult task of defining a new agenda in a rapidly changing society. In addition, the state's corporate ideology emphasized the importance of mobilizing women, along with other social groups, around its developmental agenda. It opposed the expression of specific interest as self-centered, divisive and anti-nationalistic. It discussed the need to create a women's organization, within the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), Egypt's only political party, to mobilize women around this agenda. Paradoxically, no such organization was built during this period that was committed to the rapid transformation of society. This institutional failure partly reflected the state's larger ambivalence about institution building. While the state was constantly attempting to build its own viable political institutions (first the Liberation Rally, then the National Union and finally the ASU), it undermined their viability by denying them any autonomy. It was most suspicious of women's organizational efforts because they were continuously surprising and challenging the regime. During the war of 1956, al-Lajna al-Nisa'iya ll Muqawama al-Sabiyaa (the Women's Committee for Popular Resistance led by Ceza Nabrawi) attempted to create alliances between middle class and working class women as part of the resistance to the war. [Jamila Kamel, "al-Khawfa al-Talaa al-Amilah was al-Falaha", al-Mas'a (12/1957), p. 6.] In 1957, Duriya Shaifiq condemned the regime's turn to political authoritarianism and called for the return to democracy. [Cynthia Nelson, "The Voices of Doria Shafik: Feminist Consciousness in Egypt, 1940-1960", Feminist Issues 6, 2 (Fall 1986), p. 27.] Finally, the end of the war brought forth a renewed effort by both Ceza Nabrawi and Inji Aflatun to form a new women's organization in 1957. In all of the above instances, the state reacted repressively to undermine the feminists' attempt to organize themselves. Even when their agenda was sympathetic to the regime, their institutional initiatives were stifled. At the same time, the state domesticated some of the old feminist organizations by encouraging them to transform themselves into social service organizations providing child care services and meals to underprivileged families. Ironically, the old Egyptian feminist Union, which was founded by Huda Sha'rawi, became such an organization under the leadership of Hawa Idris. In short, the principle of allowing women to form organizations, whose agenda and constituency were independent from that of the state, clashed violently with the state's claim that it was the feminist representative of Egyptian women. Despite its formal support of the political rights of women, state feminism was very antagonistic to the political engagement of women and/or their organization building. While it is true that the Nasserite state sought to control other functionally specific organizations, like labor unions and professional associations, in the case of women's organizations, it went one step further by repressing and/or demolishing them and leaving women without any organizational representation. [=]

20113. Hatem, Mervat F. Demise of Egyptian State Feminism and the Politics of Transition (1980-1991): Part 03: The Political Paradoxes of Egyptian government. Given the prevailing Egyptian customs, however, the registration of women for the vote was left as a choice to be decided by each individual woman." [Mujum'at al-Muhtam bi Shu'un al-Mar'at al-Misyriyat, in al-Huqeq al-Qaniyaa il-Mar'at al-Misyriyat (1988), p. 30.] In other words, even though the state gave women the right to vote and to run for public office, they were not automatically registered to vote like men. To be registered, women needed to petition the state before they could exercise that legal right. Here, the state clearly viewed the vote as a primary concern of a small minority of dedicated women who would not be discouraged by this bureaucratic hurdle. For the average illiterate woman in the Egyptian countryside, this was a disincentive. As a result of these voter registration requirements, very few women registered to vote. In 1956-7, only 1% of the total number of registered voters were women. This figure rose to 6% in 1958 and remained the same for 1959, 1960, 1 961, and 1 962. In 1 963-4 when the socialist transformation of Egyptiansocietybegan, the number of registered women voters only increased slightly to 8%. By 1965, it rose slightly again to 10%. In 1967, this rate rose to 11% and in 1972 to 12%. [Muhammed Farghat Farag, "Tatawwur Musherakat al-Mar'at al-Misyriyat fi al-Hayat al-'Amma", in Taghir al-Wadh al-Iltima'i il-Mar'at al-Misyriyat fi Misr al-Mu'asarat (Cairo: al-Markaz al-Qawmi lil Buhuth al-Iltima'ya wa al-Jina'iyat, 1974), p. 207.]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

In less than a year after his formal ascension to political power, President Sadat confronted a political challenge to his power from within the ASU in 5/1971. Following his victory and the defeat of the radical faction, he sought to restructure the party and its affiliated organizations (especially those of the youth and women) so that they owed their allegiance to him. Women, who had up until then lacked their own organizational base within the party, were given their own secretariat in 1971. In his directive to the Secretary General of the ASU, Sadat asked that the president of the new organization be a "woman who was like a man" (Imrat Ragil). This summed up a very important concept which state feminism developed with great skill. It reflected the fear and hostility with which the state approached the organization of women. It did not want a feminist to be the president of the new women's organization. Because it was no longer acceptable to appoint a man to head the women's organization, the next best thing was to appoint a woman, who had a non-gendered perspective on politics which would make her comfortable in a political establishment dominated by men.

The impetus for a change in the regime's agenda for women came from the outside. The United Nations decade for women focused the world's attention on the gender record of different states. Jehan Sadat's participation in the international women's conference in Mexico City in 1975 as an official representative of Egyptian women increased her level of interest in the cause of women's rights. Soon thereafter, she decided to adopt the cause of women's rights as one of her numerous pet projects. Other projects included charitable activities, work with the handicapped victims of the 1973 war, as well as numerous business ventures).

Not surprisingly, with this limited number of registered women voters, the number of women elected to parliament during this period was also negligible. In the 1957 elections, two women were elected to parliament, less than 1% of parliament's total membership. In 1960, there were 6 women elected to parliament (representing 1.7% of membership); in 1969, only 3 were elected (showing a significant drop to 8% of the membership) and finally in 1971, 9 women were elected (representing 2.5% of the membership). In 1976, there were 6 women elected to parliament dropping again to 1.7 of the membership.

In sum, the most striking political paradox of state feminism is its progressive facade of encouraging women's political participation by giving them the vote, but at the same time demobilizing them by undermining their organizational efforts and domesticating their existing institutions. The lack of any representative organization for women, whether official or unofficial, along with the restrictions placed on female voter registration has discouraged women from political participation. It explains the depoliticized consciousness of the younger generation of Egyptian women. Finally, to appease some of the active middle class women, the state included them in visible bureaucratic (largely in the ministry of social affairs) and political positions (some in parliament and some in its political party). This has allowed the state to maintain its progressive image and to ensure minimal representation for women. With both, it could safely justify continued state control of the society's gendered agenda. [ ]

---

Figure 20113. Percentage of Women Elected to the Egyptian Parliament in 1957-1976.

Not surprisingly, with this limited number of registered women voters, the number of women elected to parliament during this period was also negligible. In the 1957 elections, two women were elected to parliament, less than 1% of parliament's total membership. In 1960, there were 6 women elected to parliament (representing 1.7% of membership); in 1969, only 3 were elected (showing a significant drop to 8% of the membership) and finally in 1971, 9 women were elected (representing 2.5% of the membership). In 1976, there were 6 women elected to parliament dropping again to 1.7 of the membership.

In sum, the most striking political paradox of state feminism is its progressive facade of encouraging women's political participation by giving them the vote, but at the same time demobilizing them by undermining their organizational efforts and domesticating their existing institutions. The lack of any representative organization for women, whether official or unofficial, along with the restrictions placed on female voter registration has discouraged women from political participation. It explains the depoliticized consciousness of the younger generation of Egyptian women. Finally, to appease some of the active middle class women, the state included them in visible bureaucratic (largely in the ministry of social affairs) and political positions (some in parliament and some in its political party). This has allowed the state to maintain its progressive image and to ensure minimal representation for women. With both, it could safely justify continued state control of the society's gendered agenda. [ ]

---

Figure 20113. Percentage of Women Elected to the Egyptian Parliament in 1957-1976.

---

240
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

perspective on what are desirable social and political changes. In other words, state feminism, which had originally developed in response to popular demands in 1956 had, by 1979, come full circle. Egyptian femocrats, some of whom had participated in the popular lobbying to give women the right to vote in the 1950's (like Amina al-Said) now believed that all that one needed for the success of a gender agenda, was state support. This was what the ideology of state feminism claimed to divert feminist attention from the important task of educating and mobilizing the public opinion for change. It was clearly successful in contributing dissonance in the historical memory of its femocrats. The ideology rewrote Egyptian women's political history so that it began with the state giving suffrage to women and not with their successful mobilization of the Egyptian public which led the state to recognize their rights. In fact, the state also believed its own ideology which caused it irreversible political damage. Very specifically, the imposition of a state agenda on an unwilling public in 1979 precipitated the political crisis of the regime and that of state feminism.

The Sadat regime issued 2 presidential decrees in 1979 that were to expand the political and the social rights of women. The first decree added 30 seats earmarked for women to the Egyptian parliament and specified that 20% of the seats in the 26 local governorate councils will be for women. [Jehan Sadat, Woman of Egypt (New York: Simon and Schuster.)] The second attempted to introduce some reforms in the Egyptian personal status law by arguing that the first wife of a man who takes a second wife is entitled to file for divorce on the grounds that this is a source of harm to her. It also guaranteed divorced mothers the right to the family residence until her children grow up. I will focus my discussion on the first decree and how it undermined the political legitimacy of the regime and of state feminism. On the surface, the first decree seemed to represent heightened state commitment to women's political rights. A closer examination shows, however, that both the way the decree was passed and its content were politically problematic.

Despite official commitment to increased democratization, the use of a presidential decree to force the issue denied parliament the right to legislate (i.e. to suggest, to debate and then to pass laws). In this process, parliamentary institutions portray the diverse opinions of its general public. In preempting parliamentary procedures, the popular impressions of the continued authoritarian tendencies of the Sadat regime were confirmed. Not only did the presidential decrees backfire by making the regime seem more authoritarian, they also tarnished the old positive image of state feminism as an institutional response to public support for women in the 1950s and the 1960s. The state feminism of the late 1970's was a different creature. It appeared as part of the existing equality in its special treatment of women. [Al-Ahram, 1/1/1988, p. 11.]

The second decree in 1985, the High Constitutional Court struck down the 1979 amended personal status law on procedural grounds. It argued that there was no women's issues. As a result, active middle class women have become unwilling public in 1979 precipitated the political crisis of the regime and New National Democratic Party (NDP) fivefold to 33 members. To middle class women, the NDP appeared as a sympathetic institution keen on the recruitment and the recognition of women as a constituency. The party's political interest in women did not disadvantage its male members. The seats given to women were not taken away from male candidates. The total number of parliamentary seats was increased by the 30 seats that were now reserved for women. Only 3 members ran against men and defeated them in this election. All, but one of the 33 women elected was from the official NDP. Earl Sullivan, Women in Egyptian Public Life (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1986), p. 43.] The 1984 elections contributed a similar crop, 36 members were elected: 31 occupied the reserved seats for women (an extra reserved seat increase the share of the Cairo districts), 2 were appointed by the President and 3 ran against men and won. [Kathleen Howard-Merriam, "Guaranteed Seats for Political Representation of Women: the Egyptian Example", Women and Politics 10, 1 (1990), p. 32.] Two of the last 3 were from the opposition New Wafd Party.

What the above figures show is that the changes instituted in 1979 created an interest on the part of women in the NDP. It was not clear, however, that these new members of parliament were viable representatives who could have won their seats if they were not reserved for women. Since they could not pull their political weight during an election and expand the support base of the NDP, the party quickly lost interest in supporting such a large group of women. This attitude was strengthened by the decision of the High Constitutional Court in 1987 to void the law which established reserved seating for women. The Court argued that the law undermined the constitutional principle of gender equality in its special treatment of women. [Al-Ahram, 1/1/1988, p. 11.] The ruling implicitly challenged the acceptability of state intervention on behalf of women which was one of the key pillars of state feminism. Special treatment for women was declared to be contrary to the principles of equality. The Court was silent on the question of gender discrimination against women in the political arena and what role the state can or cannot play in combating it. [=]

20115. Hatem, Mervat F. Demise of Egyptian State Feminism and the Politics of Transition (1980-1991): Part 05: The Political Crisis of State Feminism. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's Series. Working Paper 3. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-13, 1991. pp. 14-16. The regime of Hosni Mubarak has since reversed the changes introduced by these presidential decrees whose legitimacy and fairness were questioned from the beginning. In 1985, the High Constitutional Court struck down the 1979 amended personal status law on procedural grounds. It argued that there was no national emergency to justify the use of a presidential decree to pass this law while parliament was in session. The rationale given by the High Court reinforced the public's impression of the anti-democratic bent of the Sadat regime, and by association, of state feminism. Immediately after the Court passed this decision, the state, which was keen on sending its official representatives to the Nairobi conference marking the end of the U.N decade for women, proposed a new amended law. Here, again, Egyptian femocrats supported the new personal status law even though it diluted some of the minor changes that were introduced in 1979. (A judge was now required to assess whether or not harm was done and a husband had the choice of offering his divorced wife and children a comparable house of residence). The way the 1979 law and the amended law were passed make clear the structural flaw in Egyptian femocracy. In theory, femocracy was an institutional strategy to suggest change from within the state structures and to mobilize the general public behind it. In practice, Egyptian femocracy was unable as a client of the state to shape and/or modify the official agenda. It could not develop its own program. It had no separate legitimacy from that of the state which denied it the right to separately mobilize the female population around any important issue.

If bureaucratic feminism had limited success initiating and negotiating gender policies, then what was its political attracting point to a section of the present generation of women? The 1979 presidential decree increased the number of women representatives active in the New National Democratic Party (NDP) fivefold to 33 members. To middle class women, the NDP appeared as a sympathetic institution keen on the recruitment and the recognition of women as a constituency. The party's political interest in women did not disadvantage its male members. The seats given to women were not taken away from male candidates. The total number of parliamentary seats was increased by the 30 seats that were now reserved for women. Only 3 members ran against men and defeated them in this election. All, but one of the 33 women elected was from the official NDP. Earl Sullivan, Women in Egyptian Public Life (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1986), p. 43.] The 1984 elections contributed a similar crop, 36 members were elected: 31 occupied the reserved seats for women (an extra reserved seat increased the share of the Cairo districts), 2 were appointed by the President and 3 ran against men and won. [Kathleen Howard-Merriam, "Guaranteed Seats for Political Representation of Women: the Egyptian Example", Women and Politics 10, 1 (1990), p. 32.] Two of the last 3 were from the opposition New Wafd Party.

What the above figures show is that the changes instituted in 1979 created an interest on the part of women in the NDP. It was not clear, however, that these new members of parliament were viable representatives who could have won their seats if they were not reserved for women. Since they could not pull their political weight during an election and expand the support base of the NDP, the party quickly lost interest in supporting such a large group of women. This attitude was strengthened by the decision of the High Constitutional Court in 1987 to void the law which established reserved seating for women. The Court argued that the law undermined the constitutional principle of gender equality in its special treatment of women. [Al-Ahram, 1/1/1988, p. 11.] The ruling implicitly challenged the acceptability of state intervention on behalf of women which was one of the key pillars of state feminism. Special treatment for women was declared to be contrary to the principles of equality. The Court was silent on the question of gender discrimination against women in the political arena and what role the state can or cannot play in combating it. [=] reserved seats for women, showed the diminished commitment of the NDP to women candidates. In 1987, 14 women were elected to Parliament: 13 belonged to the NDP, 1 belonged to the New Wafd party. In addition, the president appointed 4 women bringing the total number of female parliamentarians to 18. [Howard-Merriam, p. 32.] In the 1990 election, the number of women elected to parliament dropped more noticeably to 7: 4 belonged to the NDP and 3 independents. The president appointed 3 more women bringing the total to 10 members out of 444 members. It is interesting to note that the 3 women, who ran as independents, represented Alexandria, Sinai and Ismailiya. The NDP representatives whether elected or appointed represented different sections of the capital city. Out of the 10 members of the 1990 parliament, 3 were workers. Out of these 3 workers, two were independent. [Khatouma M. Intikhabat ‘Amilat al- ‘Amilah, in Al-Hurriya (12/12/1990, pp. 8-9.)] This leads one to suggest that the NDP has now become the representative of Cairene professional middle class women. By deciding to run as independents, working class women seem to have reached similar conclusions regarding the class make up of the NDP.

The only other organizations within which working class women were active were their own unions. Their participation in the unions has changed dramatically in the last decade. In 1981, women workers were largely represented in union committees at the lowest levels of the organization. They were noticeably absent from membership of the Executive Council since its inception in 1956 with the exception of the period from 1971 to 1973. [Amin Taha Mursi, “al-Mufawadat al-Jama’ya fi Misr”, in Al-Ahram (5/4/1981), p. 20.] Equally noteworthy was the fact the Union’s secretariat for women was being run in 1981 by a man. By 1990, an active woman had emerged as the secretary of this committee. She began to encourage other women to be active with the unions. The fact that the Union continued to have a man represent women’s concerns until 1981 is worthy of debate. In Egypt of the 1970s, the principle of having a man represent women’s concerns had been abandoned by most other societal organizations. How is it that the labor movement was oblivious of this trend? Does this mean that the labor movement was more conservative than the rest of society in responding to the need for women representatives? This may be one answer, but there are many others as well. Here, it is important to remind ourselves that in 1971 President Sadat was recommending that the chair of the women’s secretariat be a woman who is like a man. Does this mean that the labor movement formally did what the president suggested be done informally. More significantly, the vicious attacks on the gains made by workers in the public sector since the beginning of Infitah in the mid-1970’s contributed to a climate of retrenchment within the labor movement. This may have created an environment within the unions that trivialized such changes in the light of the challenges that were threatening their very own livelihood. While this does not necessarily excuse the lack of union sensitivity to gender issues, it helps one provide a context for it. There is also the question of the greater solidarity that exists among unionized men and women in their social demands. In 1986, the male workers at al-Nasr car factories asked management to provide them (the fathers) with day care facilities for their children. [Fardus Bahnacy, “Humum Imr’at ‘Amilat al- ‘Amilah”, in Al-Mar’at al-Jadida 2 (1986), p. 35.] In Egypt, this particular demand has been associated with the struggles of middle class women, who wanted to juggle family and work obligations. The fact that this demand was picked up by working class, not middle class men, reflects a greater male sensitivity within this class to the problems of their working wives. In a parallel pattern, the female workers at al-Mahalla textile factory struck in support of their male colleagues in 1986. They refused to work until the striking workers were released which led the police to intern some of them. They were quickly released, however, for fear that protests would increase in reaction to the internment of the women. [Muthaharat “Amilat al-Mahalla”, al-Mar’at al-Jadida 2 (1986), p. 37.] Here, the state assumed that working class patriotism would make the internment of women unacceptable and would be reason for increased activism.

What is clear is that working class men and women do not behave in ways that we expect of them. This should lead one to question some of middle class assumptions that dominate the literature regarding the appropriate strategies for representing the interests of women in general. Juggling the need for autonomous representation with the need for participation in the institutions that protect one’s class interest may be the special dilemma facing working class women. [=] 20117. Hatem, Mervat F. Demise of Egyptian State Feminism and the Politics of Transition (1980-1990). Part 07: The Politics of Transition. G.E. von Grunebaum Center for the Study of the Middle East, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-13, 1991, pp. 19-26. Let me now turn to a different but a somewhat related question, to what extent have the opposition parties opened up their ranks to women of different classes? This is not an easy question to answer partly because only anecdotal evidence is available. There are more women candidates, who contest elections from the opposition parties than there are candidates from the NDP. For example, in the 1984 elections, 140 women candidate ran for election. Out of this group, 75% ran for the opposition parties. [Sullivan, p. 110.] In the 1987 elections, the number of women candidates dropped to 40, 27 of which belonged to opposition parties i.e. 67.5%. [Howard-Merriam, p. 35.] The figures seem to suggest that the opposition parties choose more women to run for them, it does not tell us anything about where they were placed in the party list. Under the list system used for both the 1984 and the 1987 elections, only those candidates placed high on their party’s list have a chance of being elected. Given the fact that in both elections only 2 or 3 women candidates were elected from the opposition parties, it is safe to assume that most women candidates were placed very low on their party’s lists. Of those who were elected, all came from the middle class. None came from the working class leading one to assume that the class make up of these parties is not very different from that of the NDP.

The 3 major political parties that have benefited from the opening up of the political system are: the labor party, the Nationalist Unionist Progressive Party and the New Wafd party. One can add the Muslim Brotherhood to that list. Since 1981, when the state began an effort to court the moderate Islamist groups, represented by the Brotherhood, by giving them permission to participate in the political process and in this way split the Islamist movement and marginalize its militant groups. Because the state still upholds the principle of “no politics in religion”, it has not allowed the Brotherhood to operate as an autonomous political organization. Instead, it encouraged the Brotherhood to form electoral alliances with the other opposition parties and in this way contest elections and have deputies in parliament. The use of the list system which allowed only those parties with 8% of the vote to have representation in parliament made electoral alliances with the Brotherhood politically expedient to most of the opposition parties. In 1984, the Muslim Brotherhood allied itself with the New Wafd party (the representative of the new parasitic bourgeoisie identified with the Infitah) to emerge as the official political opposition in parliament. Out of 58 elected members, 10 were from the Brotherhood. In 1987, the Brotherhood allied itself with the labor party (which up until then had a social democratic agenda) under the label of the “Islamic alliance” and were able to increase their number of representatives in parliament to 34. [Hala Mustafa, “al-Qawm al-Islamiya wa al-Taqarab al-Dimukratiya fi Misr”, in Al-Ahram (3/3/1990), p. 3.] In 1990, most of the opposition parties (the Labor party, the New Wafd party and the Muslim Brotherhood) boycotted the elections with the exception of the Nationalist Unionist Progressive Party, which represented the alliance of the Nasserites and the Egyptian left, and emerged as the representative of a more secular opposition in parliament that included the independent representatives.

The participation of the Brotherhood in the political process triggered a debate on whether or not electoral politics was a legitimate Islamic concern for women. The debate showed that Islam’s position on women’s political participation was ambiguous at best. While the liberal Islamic scholars, who represent the views of the State’s religious establishment, argued that there is no verse in the Quran or the Sunna that forbids or denies women that right, the conservatives, who represent the militant views of some of the Islamists, contend that the absence of a verse in support of women’s rights to run for public office implies some of the Islamists, contend that the absence of a verse in support of women's rights to run for public office implies that this is not a proper activity for women. The conservatives argue that if hearing a woman's voice is a sin, then her absence from the political arena is a virtue. They also cite the ominous hadith that no people will ever succeed if they are ruled by a woman. In response, the liberals point to the fact that the prophet consulted his wives in political matters and in fact got good advice from them. After concluding a peace of Hudaybiya, Um Salma, one of the prophet's wives, advised him to let his frustrated followers who were told that they were going to visit Mecca to perform the rituals of the pilgrimage, to perform these rituals outside of Mecca. Her advice succeeded in lessening the frustration and the anger felt by those who accompanied the prophet in this trip. The liberals also point out to a Qur'anic verse that asks the prophet to accept the political endorsement (al-bay'ah) from Muslim women. It says the following:

If women come to endorse you by promising not to believe in another God, not to steal, not to engage in adultery, not to give false testimony regarding what they have done or seen, then you should accept their endorsement and extend to them God's forgiveness.

The whole debate points to the use of conservative and liberal textual strategies in arguing for change. The conservatives will opt, more often than not, for a literal reading of the texts proceeding through a tight deductive system to reach conclusions that adhere as closely as possible to the letter of the text. This strategy is designed to discourage any departure from what it sees as a pure Islamic ideal that existed in the past and which needs to be reproduced at the present. The silence of the text is also taken as an injunction against change which may introduce alien influences which confuse the ideal of the return to a [text missing].

The liberals rely on a different textual strategy aimed at opening up new spaces where silence exists. While the conservatives will sometimes use Qiyas (analogies) as in the argument they offer about a women's voice being a sin and hence the virtuousness of their abandonment of public engagement, it is the liberals who use this logical tool most frequently. It allows them to move inductively to support an evolving view of the religion. Charting the presence of these diverse strategies within the Islamist debates allows one to appreciate the nuanced differences in the Islamist discourses and the political uses to which they put religion. It is a more fruitful way of proceeding because it moves away from the essentialist debates regarding whether Islam is truly for or against women.

As an electoral ally, the Brotherhood advocated a socially conservative agenda. It is not clear, however, whether the Brotherhood can be held responsible for the problematic positions both the New Wafd and the Labor parties have on women and their issues. For example, in the 1984 elections, the only two women elected to parliament, who did not belong to the NDP, were members of the New Wafd party and the Muslim Brotherhood. The nomination and electoral support that the Brotherhood gave to Rizga al-Balshi served to dispel the image of the Brotherhood as unsympathetic to women. Her election was an important symbolic gesture towards veiled women who gave the Islamist movement its visible urban social base. It is not clear that al-Balshi was elected through the votes of Islamist women. The evidence indicates that it was the male Islamist vote that carried her to victory. [Sulivan, p. 110.]

In the 1987 election, no women representatives won from the Brotherhood confirming the symbolic nature of al-Balshi's election. The New Wafd's alliance with the Brotherhood in this election did not lead it to nominate another veiled woman. Its candidate for that election was Olfat Kamel, a veteran parliamentarian, who was very popular in her working class neighborhood of al-Gamalia. The party did ask its Coptic women candidates, however, to cover their hair while campaigning. More serious was the way the party dealt with Olfat Kamel's candidacy in the 1987 election. Despite her respected electoral showing in different elections, she was placed in fourth position on the party's list. Because success under this list system depended on one being placed high on the list, Kamel had complained about her ranking to the party leadership. While campaigning in her neighborhood, Awli Hafez, a leader figure in the Wafd leadership, humiliated Kamel and her son by publicly advising him to "tell your mother, she can either have fourth place or nothing. In the argument that followed, Kamil's son had a heart attack and was hospitalized. Only his death made the Wafd put Kamil at the number 2 spot where she had been placed in the 1984 elections. ["Olfat Kamel la Tufadil al-Tabikh", Rose al-Yusef (3/3/1987), p. 8.]

This sad and violent story shows the deep hostility, which even the most experienced women candidates, face in the different political parties. It demonstrates the high cost women must pay for their political success. Finally, it reveals how the political leadership of the different political parties uses the language and the rhetoric of fundamentalism to intimidate and to put women in their place. This is why politics continues, after 4 decades of state feminism, to be a very dangerous arena.

In contrast, the labor party gave no attention to women in its 1984 electoral program. The party called for the formation of a women's section and another for the youth. It also called for having a representative of women and of the youth in each of its committees. [Iqbal Baraka, "al-Nas wa al-Intikhbat: al-Nisf al-Hawl", Sabah al-Khayr (5/17/1984), p. 12.] It had very few women members and consequently placed only a few women on its electoral list. [Ibid.] The party's alliance with the Brotherhood in the 1987 elections has affected its self definition and contributed to a split in its ranks. The socialists claim that the party was taken over by the Islamists, who now control the leadership, and have succeeded in marginalizing the other elements. The power struggles within the party has pushed the gender issues to the side and created a new socially conservative environment within the party that inhibits women.

Finally, the Nationalist Unionist Progressive party distinguishes itself from other parties by having a well developed program for women that analyzes the causes of gender discrimination in Egypt and commits itself to policies which will contribute to the liberation of women. It is important to note here that when the Constituent Assembly of the party met in August 21, 1976 to discuss the establishment of the party, it approved the formation of a feminist wing for the party. It was only 6 years later in January 1982 that the party held the Constituent Congress of the Federation for Progressive women. The delegates who attended the Congress represented the governorates of Cairo, Giza, Alexandria, al-Gharbiya, al-Bihara and al-Dhaqahali, all in the Egyptian Delta, where the party was active. Upper Egypt seems to have been regarded as an inhospitable region for its activities or was ignored because it had no significant industrial work force. The program reiterated its support to the involved use of the legal arm of the sate to further the rights of women. In other words, it advocated the upholding of the institutional principles of state feminism as its strategy for the liberation of women. While the party recognized that the accomplishments of state feminism met with numerous obstacles in the day today practice, it argued that with the economic development of Egyptian society these obstacles will disappear and legal equality transform the daily reality of women. [The Nationalist Unionist Progressive Party, al-Mu'atamar al-Ta'ssissi li lIthhad al-Nisf al-Taqadumi (Cairo: 1982), p. 25.] Until then, it called upon all the feminists in feminist associations and political parties as well as independent figures to use their program as a basis for a unified program that Egyptian women can work for. It also called for the establishment of a single organization that can democratically unify women's efforts, represent their interests and work for the realization of their goals. [Ibid.] In short, the party's program was committed to the resurrection of state feminism: its organizational ideals and agendas.

Despite the problems that state feminism contributed in practice and of which it is aware, the party put its faith in economic development as the ultimate solution to all problems. [=] representation of women and their agenda. Some parliamentarians admitted that some women were elected only to fill up the reserved seats, not because they would make good representatives or because of their commitment to a women's agenda. [Maha 'Amran, "Awal Na'iba Barlamanliya fi Misr wa al-Alam al-'Arabi" in Sabah al-Khayr (3/12/1987), p. 25.] Once they were elected, they did not contribute much to the general discussions or to pushing any particular agenda. [Tahani Sabah al-Khayr, "Al-Ma'lufa Min Malak al-Shahab " in Majmu'at al-Muhtamat, p. 23-24.] As a result, state feminism was unsuccessful in delivering what it promised in terms of the political representation of women. Women were still underrepresented in both the cabinet and parliament. [Ibid., p. 24.] Finally, some femocrats confessed that it is unrealistic of female constituents to expect them not to represent the interests of their party first. [Al-Sawabi, p. 28.] This is they point out is first political principle of state feminism.

This realistic assessment of femocracy led the representatives of women's social organizations (which include charitable and functionally specific organizations like the Egyptian Planned Parenthood) as well as the key female public figures (university professors, media personalities and active political and social figures) to call for the establishment of a non-governmental feminist union that would put the cause and the interests of women at the forefront. Beyond that demand, women were divided on the key questions that will govern its activities and strategies for change. For example, what should be the relationship between women and society? Which one should be the focus of struggle? Who should be the leader of this new union? What kind of relationship should develop between feminist (intellectual) women, the state, and its femocrats?[Iqbal Baraka, "Ala men Ta'qa Mes'uliyat ma Yahduth?", Sabah al-Khayr (3/12/1987), p. 26.]

This collective drive to organize middle class women was met by resistance from the Egyptian femocrats, headed by the minister of Social Affairs, Dr. Amal Osaman, who refused to give them institutional permission to establish a women's union. Even though the femocrats had been humbled by the discussion of the glaring inadequacies of state feminism, they have been successful in resisting the demand for the establishment of a women's union and which would spell their own political death. There were a few exceptional cases where this strategy did not work. Under pressure from leading public opinion figures and the threat of litigation, the ministry gave permission to Nawal El-Saadawi to form her Arab Women Solidarity association. They also gave permission to smaller groups outside of Cairo (e.g. the Bir al-Balad association) to organize. Both of these organizations have proven to be harmless cultural organizations, which joined the small fragmented public that was interested in women's concerns and issues and which did not pose a serious challenge to femocracy. This encouraged Egyptian femocrats, led by the minister of Social Affairs, to begin a serious search for new bases of social and political legitimacy among its Cairene professional constituency. For example, the ministry formed agencies that provide upper middle class women with domestic help. It also encouraged small businesses to provide that same affluent group, with ready to cook primary attention. Working class women are, for most part, active within constituency. For example, the ministry formed agencies that provide their problems. Working class women in both the rural and urban areas are voting, but they are not voting for women. Most of these newly registered voters were from outside Cairo (from Alexandria, the Egyptian Delta and even some Upper Egyptian governorates especially the very small governorates that the number of women registered to vote had doubled to 32% in 1988 and 38% in 1989. [Magda Mehanah, "Ma'ha fi Asu'ha", al-Ahram (12/22/1989), p. 13.] In an explanation of how this dramatic feat was accomplished, the undersecretary explained that the ministry had increased the number of registration places whenever any woman representative from the NDP or the Democratic Front, Sabah al-Khayr, "Tansim Nisa'i Sabab Kusur al-Mar'at al-Siyasi", in Sabah al-Khayr (3/12/1987), pp. 23-24.]

How will the increase of women registered to vote affect the prospects of the Egyptian femocrats and women's political engagement in the waning years of state feminism? It is very early to tell, but the 1990 elections already provide some tentative pointers. Most election reports note the heavy voter turnout among women. [Zakaria Abu Hiram, "Fazt al-Dimuqratiya wa Khasaral al-Mu'aradha", in Akher Sa'h (12/12/1990), p. 6.] Even though many turned out, the 1990 election brought smallest number of women representatives to parliament. Clearly, more women are voting, but they are not voting for women. Most of these newly registered voters were from outside Cairo (from Alexandria, the Egyptian Delta and even some Upper Egyptian governorates especially the very small governorates that the number of women registered to vote had doubled to 32% in 1988 and 38% in 1989. [Magda Mehanah, "Ma'ha fi Asu'ha", al-Ahram (12/22/1989), p. 13.] In an explanation of how this dramatic feat was accomplished, the undersecretary explained that the ministry had increased the number of registration places whenever any woman representative from the NDP or the Democratic Front, Sabah al-Khayr, "Tansim Nisa'i Sabab Kusur al-Mar'at al-Siyasi", in Sabah al-Khayr (3/12/1987), pp. 23-24.]

This poses a new challenge to the different women's groups and Egyptian femocrats who have been unable to reach and mobilize these new voters to vote women and/or their own interests. Finally, when women have voted for women in this last elections, they were more likely to vote for independent women whether they came from the working or middle classes, who have cultivated this constituency over the years and have delivered some important services. ["Kira'a fi Intikhabat 90", in Akher Sa'h (12/12/1990), p. 9.] This clearly spells trouble to Egyptian femocrats, who now must juggle the need for the support of the NDP with the importance of developing rapport with a constituency that is presently wooed by independent candidates. [=]

20119. Hatem, Mervat F. Demise of Egyptian State Feminism and the Politics of Transition (1980-1991): Part 09: Conclusion. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's Series. Working Paper 3. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von Grunebaum Center for Near Eastern Studies, April 12-20, 1991, pp. 29-31. The political demise of state feminism simultaneously foreclosed some institutional options which had previously been available for women and opened up some new institutional spaces and strategies for the mobilization of women for change. Active middle class women still monopolize the debate on how to address the political interests and needs of women. They no longer have a single institutional voice, however. The attractiveness of Egyptian femocracy, as an institutional strategy of representation, has been seriously undermined by the many reversals that it has faced in the 1980's. For this reason, the Egyptian femocrats are busy redefining their bases of support by appealing more consciously to Cairene middle class women. Along their side, there are numerous formal and informal nongovernmental women's groups that are also seeking to appeal to Cairene middle class women by presenting alternative discourses on their problems. Working class women in both the rural and urban areas are not represented in these organization and their concerns are not given primary attention. Working class women are, for most part, active within their own communities and their labor union organizations. It is these women who are now voting in very large numbers and are supporting political candidates that represent their class and community. What is ironic is that working class women, who vote with their families to Cairo are the least likely to resist to vote in their new place of residence. [Mehana, p. 13.] The dislocation and the lack of a supportive community that encourages their political participation explain this change in their behavior. As a result, Cairo has one of the lowest rates of female registration in the country along with the very small governorates of Port Said, Suez, Ismailia, Matrouh, North Sinai and al-Wadi al-Jaddid.

For the Egyptian femocrats and the women active in the different groups that emphasize the importance of using women's electoral power to influence policy, a broader class perspective.
is essential to emphasize the importance of using women's electoral power to influence policy, a broader class perspective is essential for the success of their strategy. Unfortunately, however, the political and ideological struggles currently taking place between the state and different groups of women regarding the principle of adequate (minimal) political representation for women, which is the only remaining feature of the old state feminism, continue to focus attention on the mobilization of Cairene middle class women. This spells failure for both the declining state feminism and its middle class feminist alternative.

20120. Hirschhorn, Norbert. "Appropriate Health Technology in Egypt," in Middle East Report, November-December 1989. pp. 26-28. Primary health care has been the major focus of health workers in the last two decades, with their work including: immunizations, maternal care, education for hygiene, health and nutrition, family planning, availability of essential drugs, and first aid. One major advance has been the rehydration therapy (associated with the inevitable childhood diarrhea): UNICEF estimates that 5 million children die of diarrhea worldwide every year. Diarrhea is so threatening because the process of dehydration it brings about leads to malnutrition and further diarrhea. In the early 1960s, physicians discovered that glucose and water could provide quick and cheap rehydration: termed ORT (Oral Rehydration Therapy), initially, this was widely used in cholera hospitals in Dhaka and Calcutta; and by the mid-1970s was used worldwide. This very cheap and easy technique seems like it should have eliminated the problem of childhood diarrhea, but 80% of such episodes remain untreated by ORT. Worldwide, many parents and health workers continue to use ineffective constipation drugs or antibiotics (inf1980-1986, Egypt spent $78 million annually on useless antidiarrheal drugs, while the NCDDP effort cost $25 million over the first five years). Egypt has developed a network of primary care units that are accessible to 95% of the population; 80% of pharmaceuticals used in Egypt are locally produced. In 1977, the Ministry of Health started to distribute ORT packages (and in 1978 the packages were produced in Egypt). In 1980, ORT was systematically used in Dakahlia governorate, reducing child mortality by 40%; the National Control of Diarrheal Diseases Project (NCDDP) was started in 1982 (funded by AID) to distribute sufficient ORT packages nationwide. Since 1982, infant mortality has fallen 37%, and from diarrheal causes by 60%; ORT is available in 99% of the primary health care system, and 80-95% of mothers have been trained to recognize dehydration (which included the first massive public health TV advertising campaign). However, inappropriate use of antibiotics remains high (promoted by pharmaceutical companies), and increasing women visit physicians before using ORT, rather than using it through autonomous self-care. NCDDP has failed to adress causes of diarrhea. The NCDDP must now shift its emphasis to maintaining high levels of treatment of diarrhea, while broadening its efforts to reduce diarrhea.

20121. Hirschhorn, Norbert; Greenough, William B., III. "Progress in Oral Rehydration Therapy: Every Year, the Therapy--Feeding Feeds the Lives of a Million Children Who Become Dehydrated From Diarrhea: New Versions Are Being Developed To Improve That Number", in Scientific American, May 1991. pp. 50-56. While many medical procedures are complex and expensive, Oral Rehydration Therapy (ORT) is inexpensive and easy (including sodium chloride (3.5 grams), Trisodium Citrate (2.9 grams), Potassium Chloride (1.5 grams), and Glucose (20 grams) per liter of water). It replaced a more costly treatment, and was promoted by WHO beginningin 1978. The diarrhea group of diseases (including cholera bacteria Vibrio cholera, rotavirus and Escherichia coli) are the leading killer of small children in the Third World, leading to 5 million deaths per year. While new to modern science, a similar technique was described in ancient Hindu texts. The Cholera Research Center in Calcutta (now the International Center for Diarrheal Disease Research) found that even the most severely affected patients could respond to the ORT treatment. The greatest success with ORT has been in Egypt, where the 100000 children dying from diarrhea in 1983 were cut to 50000 dead per year. The Egyptian success was based on an extensive network of public and private health providers, and a commited Ministry of Health.

20122. Hoertz, Peter J.; Pritchard, David I. "Hookworm Infection; It retards Growth and Intellectual Development In Millions of Children Yet Is Largely Ignored By Researchers; New Findings Suggest Excellent Possibilities For a Vaccine", in Scientific American, June 1995. pp. 68-75. Roughly one-fifth of the world population, some 1 billion people, mostly in the tropics, harbor hookworms in their small intestine. Each extracts a small amount of blood through the intestine walls; an individual can have 20, 100 or even 1000 hookworms in their small intestine. One result of hookworms is iron deficiency anemia and protein malnutrition (which afflict up to 25% of infected individuals, especially children and pregnant women). Severe infestation of children can cause severe retardation of growth and impair cognitive, motor and behavioral development. Sadly, there has been little research on hookworms in the last 25 years. New research indicates that vaccines can be developed against the hookworms of the two major genera, Ancylostoma and Necator, taking advantage of the strategies evolved by the hookworms to thwart the vascular and immunological defenses of the human body.

Typically, the barely visible larvae of A. duodenale can burrow through the skin of the legs and feet; reaching the intestines through the blood stream. Ingested larvae have an easier transition to the intestines. They soon mate and begin to release eggs within about two months of arriving in the body as larvae. Notably, researchers at the Institute of Parasitic Disease in Shanghai have determined that A. duodenal infections can be spread by breast milk.

Properties:

Ancylostoma duodenale (Peru, NE and SE coastal Brazil, North Africa and Middle East, Egypt, West-Central-East Africa and Madagascar, India and southern China): 0.3-0.5 inches long, eggs produced daily: 10000-30000; estimated blood removed daily per worm: 0.05 teaspoons; mouthparts: sharp teeth; natural adult life span: 1 year; ability to produce infection if ingested: yes; ability of larvae to lie dormant in host: yes.

Necator americanus (south India, South China, Southeast Asia, Indonesia, Papua New Guinea, NE coastal Australia, Oman, West-Central-East-Southern Africa and Madagascar, Mexico, Central America, Amazon basin, Colombia, Venezuela and the Guianas): 0.2-0.4 inches long, eggs produced daily:50000-10000; estimated blood removed daily per worm: 0.004 teaspoons; mouthparts: cutting plates; natural adult life span: 3-5 years; ability to produce infection if ingested: no; ability of larvae to lie dormant in host: no. [TXT]

20123. Holloway, Marguerite. "Population Summit: Women's Health and Rights Shape Cairo Documents", in Scientific American, June 1994. pp. 14, 16. The once-a-decade population conference will be held in Cairo later this year. If the third and final preparatory conferences are any indication, the summit will see thousands of women delegates. One major goal of the conference is to stabilize world population, now at 5.7 billion. While new to modern science, a similar technique was described in ancient Hindu texts. The Cholera Research Center in Calcutta (now the International Center for Diarrheal Disease Research) found that even the most severely affected patients could respond to the ORT treatment. The greatest success with ORT has been in Egypt, where the 100000 children dying from diarrhea in 1983 were cut to 50000 dead per year. The

20124. Holloway, Marguerite. "Population Summit: Women's Health and Rights Shape Cairo Documents", in Scientific American, June 1994. pp. 14, 16. The once-a-decade population conference will be held in Cairo later this year. If the third and final preparatory conferences are any indication, the summit will see thousands of women delegates. One

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Mr. Upton: Thank you. Sorry I am a little bit late. I am going to take a careful look at your testimony when I get back to my office shortly, but I just have a couple of questions that I would like answered. In looking ahead to the testimony by Elise Smith, who is going to follow you, I believe, she actually commends AID, and I quote her: "We have a longstanding partnership with the AID and over the years have worked closely with the Office of Private and Voluntary Cooperation." I think that is a nice, nice plug, and I would assume that you would have similar things to say about them—is that right?—with regard to this relationship.

Ms. Davies: Yes. The Overseas Education Fund (OEF) has been one of the finest organizations with which we have worked in the women in development field, and we have a good relationship with them.

Mr. Upton: One other question: I know that currently out of AID’s budget, $2 million is used for women in development. Is that right?

Ms. Davies: The WID Office Budget is $2 million.

Mr. Upton: Is $2 million, that’s right.

Ms. Davies: Yes.

Mr. Upton: But the same AID is responsible for getting funding from other sources to supplement that $2 million. Is that correct?

Ms. Davies: Many of AID’s programs already incorporate women in development. I explained before you came that there is some $100 million in the Egypt portfolio for women in development activities, for example, and another $1.2 million in Nepal, so the Agency is spending much more than it ever was 6 years ago when the policy was specifically encouraged. This is being done on a very significant level.

Mr. Upton: Is $2 million, that’s right.

Ms. Davies: Yes.

Mr. Upton: One other question: I know that currently out of AID’s budget, $2 million is used for women in development. Is that right?

Ms. Davies: The WID Office Budget is $2 million.

Mr. Upton: Is $2 million, that’s right.

Ms. Davies: Yes.

Mr. Upton: But the same AID is responsible for getting funding from other sources to supplement that $2 million. Is that correct?

Ms. Davies: Many of AID’s programs already incorporate women in development. I explained before you came that there is some $100 million in the Egypt portfolio for women in development activities, for example, and another $1.2 million in Nepal, so the Agency is spending much more than it ever was 6 years ago when the policy was specifically encouraged. This is being done on a very significant level.

Ms. Davies: Yes. The Overseas Education Fund (OEF) has been one of the finest organizations with which we have worked in the women in development field, and we have a good relationship with them.

Mr. Upton: Would it be possible for the record later on to submit the various earmarks from the various programs with a total showing the full range of funds from the other programs?

Ms. Davies: We can certainly give you a sampling, and I think that would be the best thing to do. One of the biggest difficulties we and all donor organizations that work on women in development have is the precise disaggregation of moneys for women. An example which I often use pertains to an ORT project in Guatemala. Part of that project was a $100,000 study on the effects of carbon monoxide from cooking stoves on pregnant women. It is very difficult for AID or any organization to try to determine the direct benefits to women. In this case, the mission decided to continue with the study, but how do we attach a dollar amount to that? It is obviously very difficult, so I would prefer that we give you a sampling.

Mr. Upton: OK.

Ms. Davies: It would be much easier.

Mr. Upton: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. [The information referred to above appears at the conclusion of the hearing.]

[====]

20126. House Select Committee on Hunger. "Hearing: Questions from the Committee: Part 8", in AID and Third World Women, the Unmet Potential. House Select Committee on Hunger, United States House of Representatives. US Government Printing Office: Washington DC, May 11, 1988. pp. 1-33. Ms. Davies: As I explained in my opening remarks, we try to leverage that money with resources from other bureaus and missions. It is very important, when we look at what AID spends on an annual basis, to understand the difficulties we have in disaggregation what we are spending account by account. However, we do not know that Egypt reported about $110 million in WID-related activities last year. Now I recognize that we have a very big program in Egypt, but $110 is quite significant for women in development. In a very small program like Nepal, the mission has reported about $1.2 million for such activities.

When you look at what we are spending in the Agency overall, it is hundreds of times more than what we are spending in the Women in Development Office. Frankly, the funding of the WID Office is not as much a concern as is the integration of WID issues throughout the Agency. We need to ensure that the Agency spends its money more appropriately and efficiently on WID issues and in integrating WID into our programs.

Mr. Dorgan: The point I was trying to make is, the amount of money in the WID office determines how much you can leverage, and it reflects the priority of the Agency itself, and it seems to me that with the 15% level and with some of the questions that we have here, that it may be that this is not a priority at AID, or at least not the kind of priority we think it should be.

Let me ask, in terms of priorities, 6 years ago when the Women in development policy paper was issued by AID, the suggestion was made that the data collection should be broken down by gender, and yet 6 years after that suggestion there is no such policy. Also, last year I believe you testified before this committee and suggested one of the biggest obstacles was the lack of disaggregated data by gender.

I feel this situation deserves a policy response by AID but the question is, Why has AID itself not mandated the disaggregation of that data by gender?

Ms. Davies: In the socioeconomic sections of AID’s handbook that explains the project process, the collection of disaggregated data is specifically encouraged. This is being done on a very significant level now, much more so than it ever was 6 years ago when the policy was brought to bear, or even 2 years ago. However, it is very difficult to collect data at all stages of project development.

There is now more data available in country and project and the program proposals from the field are disaggregating that data at a much higher rate than ever before. A great deal of our technical assistance to the field is to help them with that disaggregation issue. We recognize that this is a very complex undertaking, and more needs to be done. This is one of our priority areas in AID right now. [====]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================
cells; disabled prisoners are often abused; foreign prisoners, some 5% of the prison population, are usually held in isolation) and fierce punishment within prisons; and numerous incidents of brutality by the guards. The most serious incidents of brutality occur in the daiyo-kangaku. The Ministry of Justice has tried to minimize such concerns. Japan retains the death penalty for seventeen crimes: 53 prisoners are now on death row, including 3 women. Executions are kept secret (even lawyers of prisoners may have a difficult time obtaining information about their clients). Three of them by the excessive use of lethal force. Three civilian which began in the first half of the 19th century and was largely under European influence. A preliminary period of enlightenment was followed that during a surprise inspection of the New Valley Prison in 6/1995, article was originally written for the Encyclopedia of Islam where it includes the very detailed regulations for prisoner labor. They are: Dr.  Essam El-Erian, a former member of the People's Assembly and an official in the Egyptian Doctor's Syndicate; Mohammed
El-Sayed Habib, a former member of the Assuit University Faculty Club; Abdel Moneim Abul Futuh, secretary general of the Arab Doctors' Federation; Mohammed Khairat El-Shater, chairman of the board of El-Mohandes Bank; and El-Sayed Mahmoud Ezzat, a professor of medicine at Zagzig University. Forty-nine other defendants received three-year sentences. "In 1994 security forces in Minya Province demolished the homes of 17 individuals. The Emergency Law empowers the Government
no wiretaps, intercept mail and search persons or places without warrants." [2]

20128.  Hussain, Adil. "Egypt: Oppression in the Land of the Pharaoh", in Crescent International - Special Supplement. April 1996. p. 5. Egypt receives an estimated $2 billion annually in aid from the US. The regime of Husni Mubarak is vigorously defended as an important adjunct to US policy to secure the surrender of the Arab regimes to Israel. US support extends to framing the blind alim Shasha Omar Abdul Rahman and sentencing him to two life terms because his followers have challenged the pharaoh of Egypt. The Mubarak regime's record of torture and crimes against his own people is horrendous. Even the US state department's Mubarak regime. It makes grim reading. Here are some excerpts: "There were at least 71 reported deaths of persons in police custody...compared to 82 such deaths in 1994 and 97 deaths in 1993. Thirteen of the deaths occurred at the New Valley Prison which began receiving prisoners in 2/1995. "Reception Party: Under the supervision of a prison official and doctor, guards reportedly beat new arrivals for 30 minutes with fists and heavy plastic sticks. The inmates are then forced to crawl to their cells on their hands and knees. Other prisoners allege that they have been stripped to their underwear, forced to stand for prolonged periods in cold water, burnt with cigarettes, and subjected to electric shocks. Some claim that they have been threatened with rape or the rape of their relatives." Authorities reportedly denied family members permission to view the bodies of their reatives. While denying charges of intentional mistreatment of prisoners, the Government stated that during a surprise inspection of the New Valley Prison in 6/1995, inspectors found that the medical facilities were deficient and ordered them brought up to standard. "Security forces killed approximately 181...some of them by the excessive use of lethal force. Three civilian bystanders were killed inadvertently by security forces. Five suspects died while attempting to escape arrest." "Eleven individuals...had disappeared in 1994, six have since been located in detention facilities, but five remain missing." "Victims have reported the following torture methods: detainees are frequently stripped to their underwear; hung by their wrists with their feet touching the floor or forced to stand for prolonged periods; doused with hot and cold water; beaten; forced to stand outdoors in cold weather; and subjected to electric shocks. Some victims, including female detainees, report that they have been threatened with rape." The report also listed the following people who had died in custody: "Abdel Harith Al-Madani, a lawyer, who died in custody under suspicious circumstances in 4/1994 [a day after he was taken from his office in perfectly good health];" "In 1994 Saber Ahmed Mahmoud was beaten to death by four policemen;" "1994 death of Hassah Salah Sayyed." 1994 death in custody of Eissa Taher Solomon. ... Gamal El-Shazly had been tortured on 12/27/1994 in a police station in Manshatts Nayr. ... Fateh Al-Bab Abdul Moneim who died in police custody in 1994. The 1994 death of Sayyed Hassan Fetouh Eleiwa. ... 1994 death in custody of Amre Mohamed Salwat. Mohammed Abdul Hamid Hassan, reportedly died in police custody in 1994. State prosecutors also closed the books on the following deaths in custody on grounds that the perpetrators could not be identified: Mohamed Abdali Hamid Hassan, Effat Mohamed Ali Wal. El-Mohamadi Mohamed Mohamed Mursi, and Mohamed Gomaa Abdul Sayyed El-Sudani. "The Ministry of Interior continued to ban visits by relatives and lawyers at Al-Aqrab Prison and Torah Istiqbal Prison.
"Security forces conducted mass arrests and detained thousands of individuals without charge. The Emergency Law allows authorities to detain an individual without charge. In 1/1996 security forces conducted a large operation in the southern province of Minya, detaining over 3000 youngmen...local human rights group estimates that approximately 15000...are in detention. "From 10/1994 to early 1995, the Government maintained a dusk-to-dawn curfew on Mallawi and several surrounding villages in Minya province. "Use of military and State security tribunals under the Emergency Law has deprived hundreds of civilian defendants of their constitutional right to be tried by an "ordinary judge."
"The court sentenced five prominent defendants to 5 years of hard labor. They are: Dr. Essam El-Erian, a former member of the People's Assembly and an official in the Egyptian Doctor's Syndicate; Mohammed
El-Sayed Habib, a former member of the Assuit University Faculty Club; Abdul Moneim Abul Futuh, secretary general of the Arab Doctors' Federation; Mohammed Khairat El-Shater, chairman of the board of El-Mohandes Bank; and El-Sayed Mahmoud Ezzat, a professor of medicine at Zagzig University. Forty-nine other defendants received three-year sentences. "In 1996 security forces in Minya Province demolished the homes of 17 individuals. The Emergency Law empowers the Government
no wiretaps, intercept mail and search persons or places without warrants." [2] 20129.  Kasparova, V. "Zhenskoye Dvizheniye na Vostoke (The

The writer claims that the fact that in the Soviet Union women have been put on an equal footing with men has been an encouragement to the women of the East especially in Japan, China, Mongolia and India. In Egypt the women's movement was initiated by Syrian writers living in Cairo. At first it was intellectual, but women participated in the clashes with the British forces in 1919 and 1920. The present movement to improve social conditions and acquire political rights was the prelude to a movement of a class nature by Egypt's women workers. [From: "Part IV: Egypt: 1917-1930", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Literature)", in Zapiski Instituta Vostokovedeniya, 1935. pp. 159-182. The article was originally written for the Encyclopedia of Islam which appeared in a somewhat truncated form. Krachkovsky defines new Arabic literature as work produced in Arabic in a period of renaissance which began in the first half of the 19th century and was largely under European influence. A preliminary period of enlightenment was followed by literary activity, first in Syrian, then among emigrants in America, and finally in Egypt with the school of modernists beginning in 1907.

Krachkovsky enumerates the leading figures in different spheres, namely poetry, the historical novel and fiction, drama, and other forms of literature, under which he deals with journalists, essayists and women writers. In the last part of the article he outlines the study of Arabic literature of the given period in Europe and the US, attributing its shortcomings to inadequate facilities and insufficient contact between scholars. [From: "Part II: Arabs and the Arab World: Social Structure: 1931-1944", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An 20131.  LCOME; Lawson, Fred. "The Gulf War: The Labor Crisis That Led to Bloodshed", in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Summer-Fall 1991.

247
LABOR POLITICS IN both Iraq and Kuwait played a key role in the Gulf war, something you are not likely to read about in the New York Times. Iraq, in particular, made a dramatic shift in 1988 and 1989 away from a state-controlled economy that was, at least in principal, committed to the objectives and principles of a socialist order; that is, an egalitarian order that meant to do away with exploitation in Iraq's domestic economy. The shift was away from this kind of order towards one in which market forces would determine virtually all aspects of the country's economy, particularly in domestic economic affairs. This shift away from socialism and towards private enterprise generated a severe crisis in virtually all sectors of the Iraqi economy and the Iraqi regime responded by building up the country's armed forces and in particular, by shifting them back into military occupations and away from the civilian economy. We will look at this in detail further on and trace the origins of the Iraqi move into Kuwait in terms of the labor relations at home. In the case of Kuwait, the labor force has been, since the 1950s, made up primarily of non-Kuwaitis, that is, Pakistanis and Indians, Bangladeshis and other Arabs, Palestinians and some Egyptians. The fact that the Kuwaiti labor force has come primarily from non-Kuwaitis has left advocates of liberal reform in Kuwait without any political allies at home, and left them weak when confronting the regime. The reformers, therefore, have been unable to force the regime to reestablish the parliamentary system that was present in the country in the 1970s. In fact, by 1989 and 1990, the severe conflict between the liberal reformers and the ruling family was creating enough tension in Kuwait society that one could argue that this tug of war convinced the leadership in Baghdad that there would be some factions within Kuwait that would welcome an Iraqi move into the country that would result in the overthrow of the ruling Al-Sabah family. Therefore, both in Iraq and Kuwait, labor politics escalated the conflict. Labor relations pushed this disagreement between the two governments in the direction of armed confrontation and finally war. Let us look first at Iraq. In the 1980s the regime put in place a whole series of policies that were designed to encourage the growth of private enterprise, and not only private enterprise; the Iraqi state tried to make market relationships, the prices associated with supply and demand, the primary way in which labor was bought and sold and in which goods were produced and sold — not only in the country's internal economy, but externally as well, as the government looked for outside investment from Western Europe and the US to come into the economy and encourage private enterprise. The shift away from Ba'athi socialism and towards a wholesale privatization of the economy had predictable consequences — the same kind of effect we see in Eastern Europe today. It generated severe shortages of capital within Iraq industry and generated inflation, particularly pushing up food prices, as food came to be bought and sold in the unregulated market, rather than distributed through state agencies. Privatization generated tensions between state managers who had run the public sector firms and the new private entrepreneurs who were being encouraged to buy up state factories. There was a whole range of consequences, but for our purposes, the most important component of the drive toward privatization was the government's effort to undermine the network of state affiliated trade union federations that had been set up during the 1960s and early 1970s at the height of Ba'athi socialism. In the Spring of 1987, the State repealed the laws that regulated local branches of the main trade union federations. In effect, the state abolished the local unions that together made up the national union federation and the State replaced these locals with company-based labor associations in the larger private sector firms. So no longer do Iraqi workers have a functioning national trade union association. Now, instead there are company-based unions run within the firm level and run with the collaboration of the owners of the larger private concerns. Saddam Hussein announced the shift in government labor policy by telling the General Federation of Trade Unions that the term "worker" had been abolished in Iraqi society and that from now on all people who worked, all trade union members would be called "officials."

IRAQI WORKERS BECOME 'OFFICIALS': In light of this change, now that all Iraqi workers were to be called "officials," state employees, if you will, President Hussein continued, workers federations could safely be abolished. In his words, "Now that we are all becoming state officials," So the labor component in the drive toward privatization was to take away the distinct autonomous labor organizations and rework those labor federations in a way that would take away the collective aspect of the labor federations and treat all workers in Iraqi industry as autonomous employees of the central administration. This shift in terminology couldn't mask the growing level of unemployment that resulted from the trend toward privatization. As state-run factories were either shut down entirely or scaled down and forced to find other means of employment. Although there are no clear figures of the level of unemployment, anecdotal evidence indicates that the number of jobless workers was growing while the number able to find full employment in Iraqi society was dropping dramatically by the Spring of 1990. Furthermore, during the course of Iraq's eight year war with Iran, from 1980 to the cease-fire in 1988, Iraqi women had moved into virtually all sectors of the local economy. We had the equivalent in Iraq of the "Rosie the Riveter," phenomenon in the US in World War 2. Iraqi women moved into state agencies, they moved into the educational system and they moved into factory work, not so much farm work as we can tell, but certainly into the large industrial enterprises in the cities. The General Federation of Iraqi Women projected in the Fall of 1983, while the Iraqi-Iran war was still building up, that 28% of the country's industrial workers would be women by the middle of the 1980s. As a result of the war we do not have any clear figures. We are not certain how many Iraqi women moved into the factories, but it seems, again from anecdotal evidence, that the percentage of women in most industrial concerns was even higher than 28%.

IRAQI WOMEN PLAY CRITICAL ROLE: Women moved into the labor force into occupations that had traditionally been carried out by men and this gave a great deal of strength, even influence in policy making, to the General Federation of Iraqi Women. By the Spring of 1990, the GFIW participated in the meetings of the Revolutionary Command Council and had, in particular, the ear of President Hussein, himself. Thus, the leader of the women's movement was in a major policy making position as a result of the importance of women in the Iraqi labor force. As a result of these two trends: growing unemployment and women's growing predominance within the industrial workforce, the regime found it impossible to demobilize the country's armed forces, or, after the Iraq-Iran war came to an end with the cease fire in 8/1988. So Iraq kept its large army, what has been called in the US press, its "million person" armed forces — the million people including the popular army, the not very well-trained popular militia in Iraq — virtually intact. In 9/1989, the Iraqi General Staff decided to democissor a major section of the military, after a great deal of debate — in which Saddam Hussein is reported to have taken part — to demobilize five regular army divisions, that is, throw some 35000 additional young men into the country's already bursting labor market. This decision accompanied the government's move to change the regulations under which foreign labor was operating in Iraq. During the course of the Iran-Iraq war, the government invited and encouraged foreign workers, especially from Egypt, to come to Iraq and take over some of the places left behind by Iraqi men, and the government allowed relatively generous exchange rates, so that Egyptian workers could send some of their salaries back to Egypt. In the Fall of 1989, the government changed those regulations (See MELB Vol. 2 No. 2) and severely restricted the amount of Iraqi funds that Egyptian workers could take out of the country. Most of the Egyptians, faced with these new regulations, therefore, moved into the educational system. The General Federation of Iraqi Women projected in the Fall of 1990 that 28% of the country's industrial workers would be women by the middle of the 1980s. As a result of the war we do not have any clear figures. We are not certain how many Iraqi women moved into the factories, but it seems, again from anecdotal evidence, that the percentage of women in most industrial concerns was even higher than 28%.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
unemployment problem, but it certainly helped reestablish a higher degree of state supervision over the country’s internal economic affairs, and in particular took young men who might have caused problems for the regime at home — not being able to find work — and gave them something to do, keeping them off the streets and out of the country entirely. On August 2nd, the morning of the move into Kuwait, President Hussein issued an order reactivating 13 regular infantry divisions, even though the Iraqi army was already virtualy fighting a war. It is not clear who has much of a fight. The army was victorious, but the government bfeefed up the size of the armed forces, anyway. This move set the stage during the Fall of 1990 for re-introduction of state control over a whole range of the country’s domestic economic affairs. Rationing of vital food stuffs was reimposed at the beginning of September. Flour, tea, sugar and rice began to be distributed through state agencies again, rather than being left to private enterprises and at the end of the month, the Ministry of Industry and Industrial Relations took over the allocation of fertilizers to the country’s farms. Those trends can be viewed as redirecting the country’s economic policy away from the crisis ridden transition to private enterprise and back to a more centrally controlled state dominated economy. Meanwhile, during 3-4/1990, trade union groups in Kuwait joined with professional associations, lawyers guilds, engineers groups, along with student organizations to petition the ruler of Kuwait not to make any changes in the 1962 constitution until the parliament could be called back into session. The parliament had been disbanded in 1986 after its members began criticizing the way the government was handling an unofficial stock market crash in Kuwait. The cabinet responded to the petitions in late 4/1990 by announcing that elections for parliament would be postponed, but that elections would be held for a new national council. This new national council was given responsibility for reviewing the country’s parliamentary experience, seeing what had worked and what had not worked in the old constitution, and was going to set the future direction of political life in Kuwait.

ELECTION BOYCOTT PLANNED: The new council was to be composed of 50 members, 50 of them elected through popular ballot and 25 appointed by the Emir. Kuwaiti trade unionists immediately criticized the proposal on the grounds that the council had too many appointed members. The ruling family would basically get to determine the shape and policies of the new national council. Opponents of the regime, less say, the liberal reformers, announced that they would boycott the elections. On 5/9/1990, the Minister of Interior (the Minister of Interior in Middle Eastern countries and often elsewhere doesn’t have charge of national parks, but is the agency for the police and state security services) reported the arrest of eight of the most prominent leaders of the reform movement who had attended what the Minister called an illegal meeting in January to plan how to boycott the election and how to spread the word about the boycott. They were released three days later but on May 13th four more liberal reformers were arrested on broadly the same charges. The state didn’t really tolerate any open criticism of its plans to elect a new national council. The elections were held on June 10th as the diplomatic crisis with Iraq was escalating. It seems that after the war, the degree of Iraqi state supervision over the economy will continue to grow. The war re-introduced rationing and control over labor groups with prohibitions on any kind of criticism of the government and on efforts by labor to organize independently of the Ba’ath party and the central administration. But unlike the 1970’s, the new state control in Iraqi politics will probably contain little socialist content, won’t really be committed any more to socialist principles, won’t really have a major role for socialist institutions like the General Federation of Iraqi Workers. As a result, it seems that Iraqi workers will be left in even a weaker position in Iraq of the 1980’s than they were in the Iraq of the 1960’s and 1970’s. Iraqi workers will, no doubt, face the problems related to market relationships, that is, they will be pulled in and out of work according to the vagaries of supply and demand, and more and more will be subject to the dictates of the central authorities. Consequently, even if the Iraqi government goes through with its plans to establish a parliamentary system, to put in place a constitution and to have elections for a national parliament, maybe even for president, and the government, was in fact, moving in that direction in June and July of last year, and has said that it will reestablish a parliamentary regime) those elections probably won’t do much to improve the lot of the country’s industrial workers. The best a parliament might do is somehow reconcile the new state-dominated economy with the country’s new private bourgeoisie. The workers are more than likely to be squeezed out of the post-war political order in Iraq. Kuwait’s future is less predictable. I am confident that the degree of state control of Iraq is going to be strong but it is not clear who are the implications of the war will be for labor politics. In the rush of enthusiasm after the war, a whole range of Kuwaiti citizens announced that they will take over running their country, that they will not allow foreign workers back in in large numbers any more, that they do not trust foreign nationals; therefore Kuwaitis will take over all levels of the country’s economy. Should this happen, if Kuwaitis, in fact, become the oil workers and the factory workers, in addition to being the government bureaucrats and the bankers, then Kuwaiti nationals will become predominant in the country’s labor force and we might get an indigenous labor movement, made up of Kuwaiti citizens and not just the most vulnerable foreign workers who are in the country only at the pleasure of the state. The presence then of an indigenous labor movement might provide liberal reformers with potential allies to work with in opposing the ruling family and with whom to work in reestablishing a constitutional order. So the implications of the war for Iraq might not be all bad. However, it is hard to imagine that Kuwaitization will actually take place. There is a rush of enthusiasm, there is a rush of nationalism, but a program of replacing foreign workers with Kuwaiti nationals has been announced many times before and it has never worked. It never succeeded because Kuwaiti citizens, who are given stipends by the state and full welfare benefits by the state, don’t find it necessary to work in the factories and the oil fields and take out the garbage, etc. It seems that even in post-war Kuwait, Kuwaiti citizens will not really want to do many of the menial jobs that help keep Kuwaiti society going. It is probable that the current regime of the Al-Sabah family and the central administration will continue to dominate Kuwaiti politics for the foreseeable future and we may expect the regime to continue to import labor into the country to rebuild Kuwait with foreign workers rather than local citizens. (Fred Lawson is a professor of government at Mills College, Oakland, and is a long-time member of the Editorial Board of the Middle East Report. Prof. Lawson at this presentation at a conference in San Francisco, May 4th sponsored by Labor for Peace and Justice, an organization of labor activists who came together, initially, to oppose to Gulf War). [=]

20132. LCOME: Marlowe, Lara. “Saudi Arabia’s Guest Workers Victimized by Gulf Conflict”, in Middle East Labor Bulletin, Winter-Spring 1991. DHAHRAN, SAUDI ARABIA – Every morning the pavement outside the Dhahran International Hotel is stacked high with unwieldy, heavily taped cardboards boxes containing the possessions of departing Filipino workers. Frightened by talk of chemical warfare and mindful of the fate of more than half a million Asians formerly employed in Iraq and Kuwait and now trapped in Jordanian refugee camps, Saudi Arabia’s ‘guest workers’ continue to leave by the thousands. Eight weeks into the crisis, Saudi Arabia has been added to the list of gulf nations forced to reestablish a consitutional order. So the implications of the war for Iraq might not be all bad. However, it is hard to imagine that Kuwaitization will actually take place. There is a rush of enthusiasm, there is a rush of nationalism, but a program of replacing foreign workers with Kuwaiti nationals has been announced many times before and it has never worked. It never succeeded because Kuwaiti citizens, who are given stipends by the state and full welfare benefits by the state, don’t find it necessary to work in the factories and the oil fields and take out the garbage, etc. It seems that even in post-war Kuwait, Kuwaiti citizens will not really want to do many of the menial jobs that help keep Kuwaiti society going. It is probable that the current regime of the Al-Sabah family and the central administration will continue to dominate Kuwaiti politics for the foreseeable future and we may expect the regime to continue to import labor into the country to rebuild Kuwait with foreign workers rather than local citizens. (Fred Lawson is a professor of government at Mills College, Oakland, and is a long-time member of the Editorial Board of the Middle East Report. Prof. Lawson at this presentation at a conference in San Francisco, May 4th sponsored by Labor for Peace and Justice, an organization of labor activists who came together, initially, to oppose to Gulf War). [=] workers leaving and Yemeni, Jordanian, Sudanese and Palestinian candidates being refused entry because of their leaders' support for Saddam Hussein. The Indian government has refused even to issue visas for new laborers to replace their compatriots fleeing Saudi Arabia's eastern province. Many of the 1.6 million Egyptian workers forced to leave Iraq after the invasion are now expected to fill the gap. President Hosni Mubarak's dispatching of soldiers to Saudi Arabia's northern border has laid the political foundations for hiring displaced Egyptians. For the same reason, more Syrians will also now find work in the kingdom, although Saudis remain leery of what they call the Syrians "over-politicization." The Yemenis, Jordanians, Sudanese and Palestinians who remain are finding life more difficult. "We can't trust them anymore," a Saudi official said. "Those who leave won't be allowed to return. Although our government denies it, we are looking for reasons to deport them. They are watched by the police, and they are being very careful." The ability to control workers' movements has been central to the Saudi's importation of foreign labor. Immigrants are given entry visas and their passports are usually held by their employers for the duration of their stay to prevent their moving to better-paying jobs or leaving the country on short notice. Some laborers eager to leave because of the crisis have had difficulty obtaining exit visas or repatriating the earnings they have banked here. The government has for more than a decade attempted to "Saudi-ize" the labor force but has met with limited success. Saudi women rarely work, and men refuse to toil for the low salaries that Asians and poor Arabs accept. They will not perform menial tasks currently undertaken by Sri Lankans and Bangladeshis. "Before the oil boom, we lived without servants," an official at the Saudi Chamber of Commerce said. "If a war starts, Saudis may have to do some of these jobs-and they should." Indeed, poor Saudis are hard to find. A base income is not guaranteed by the government, but every citizen is eligible for free education and medical care and can receive lump payments to cover losses from unforeseen accidents. The only Saudis living in poverty are desert Bedouins, whose lifestyle is a matter of choice. Although Saudis are not expected to become janitors or ditch diggers, the government hopes that the gulf crisis will encourage more of its citizens to take low-level clerical positions. For the poorest of the remaining foreign workers, life in Saudi Arabia is a joyless, if remunerative experience. Luis, a Filipino driver, is supporting ten family members who live in Manila. "I work 12 hour days, and then I go home to a room that I share with nine Filipino men," he said. "We get on each others' nerves and sometimes there are fist fights. I have met a few Saudis, but I feel uncomfortable in their homes because I know the women cannot come out while I am there. There is nothing to do for entertainment." Many of the guest workers are political exiles or refugees from civil wars in Lebanon, Kashmir, southern Sudan and Sri Lanka. Mohammed, a hotel receptionist, fled Pakistan eight years ago, pursued by the government for his activities in the militant Muslim League. "YOU GET NUMB AND DON'T THINK OF HOME": "The first year, I thought I was going to die of loneliness and boredom," he said. "After that, you get numb. I don't even think about home anymore. Separation from families and fear of war are the most common complaints. Ranjan, a member of Sri Lanka's Tamil minority, believes he would have been murdered had he stayed in his strife-torn homeland. He has had no word from his wife and children for the past six months. Makhboul, a Pakistani, sees his wife and children only once every two years. Asian workers talk with emotion about the rules that affect colleagues who bring their wives to work in Saudi Arabia, where school-teaching and nursing are almost the only jobs open. Luis told of a friend who brought his wife under her maiden name so that she would be able to work. "They have to live in separate compounds," he said. "They cannot be together. They cannot sleep together. All they can do is meet for lunch in a cafe." [Lara Marlowe is a Middle East correspondent for the Financial Times of London and several US papers including the San Francisco Chronicle where this article appeared on September 22. Her description of the life and treatment of immigrant workers can be applied to the other gulf states.] [ ]

20133. Lederach, John Paul; Stork, Joe. "The Intervention in Somalia: What Should Have Happened: An Interview with John Paul Lederach", in Middle East Report, March-April 1993. pp. 38-42. While many Somalis and foreign relief workers believed that intervention in Somalia was necessary, the US approach may not have been the best way to address the problem. Focusing the food aid and relief effort only on the Mogadishu-Barbera-Kismayutriangleintensified internal displacement, without addressing any of the problems of regionalism that had shattered the country. The relief community sought a small peacekeeping force, but the 30000 troops deployed by the US was far out of scale. This massive deployment has paradoxically made all areas not held by peacekeepers more dangerous. The peacekeeping force's massive intervention also pushed all Somali institutions out of the decisionmaking process, including elders, womens associations, trademen, professionals and intellectuals. In Somailand, where the peacekeepers did not venture, these local groups are rebuilding civil society. Political Islam has little appeal in Somalia, although there are 2000 men under arms in Loscoray; their present modest ascendance is mainly due to the vacuum left by the peacekeeping forces. Many Somalis believe that Egypt and Italy are the foreign powers most likely to maintain a unified Somalia. [Lederach directs the International Conciliation Service of Mennonite Central Committee.]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Sustainable Development to be given a monitoring role in this process.

20137. Lederer, Edith M. "Population Control: What Next? Conference OKs Plan, But Implementation is Voluntary", in Seattle Times, September 15, 1994, p. A22. UN Population Conference delegates have adopted a 20-year action plan to address the world population crisis by economic development and the empowerment of women. However, the agreement is not a treaty and is not legally binding. Individual nation delegations stated they would carry the program home for implementation, such as Nigeria’s Bisi Ogunleye of the Women’s Association of Nigeria and a founder of the Women’s Caucus at the conference. The Vatican failed to prevent abortion from being defined as a major public health issue. The plan calls for spending $17 billion per year by 2000, increasing to $21.5 billion by 2015, but provides no initiative as to where the money will come from (current spending is $6 billion per year). The Women’s Caucus, which numbered 1500 at the conference, has formed a post-Cairo task force to monitor funding, resource allocation and implementation of the World Population Plan of Action. The Natural Resources Defense Council called on nations to make their commitment to the platform real: it called on the UN Commission on Sustainable Development to be given a monitoring role in this process.

20138. Lederer, Edith M. "Population Meeting Agrees on Fertility Wording", in Seattle Times, September 12, 1994. p. A5. Wording believed by the Vatican and its allies to indicate approval of abortion, 'fertility regulation', was changed to 'regulation of fertility'. In addition, the First World succeeding in overruling the Third World in rejecting the right of Third World immigrants in the First World to family reunification. US delegate Tim Wirth was shouted at by an anti-abortion activist.

20139. Lee-hui, Lilian Lay-ean. The Impact Of Muslim Women On The ReligiousEducation Of Their Children In Egypt. Fuller Theological Seminary, School Of World Mission. Dissertation. 115pp. AAC 1352245. [Advisor: Woodberry, J. Dudley] This is a study on the status and roles of Muslim women in Egypt and how they affect women's ability to influence their children in religious education. The research aims to seek a potential means for evangelism among Muslims. The main methodology is literature research, and a very small portion is field research through questionnaires. Findings include the following: the subordination of women to men is a worldwide phenomenon. Muslim women have unique problems because of Islamic teaching. Although Muslim women do not possess visible power, they do have invisible power to influence the future generation for Christ if they can be empowered to educate their children in Christian ways. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [c]

20140. Lee-hui, Lilian Lay-ean. The Impact Of Muslim Women On The ReligiousEducation Of Their Children In Egypt. Fuller Theological Seminary, School Of World Mission. Dissertation. 115pp. AAC 1352245. [Advisor: Woodberry, J. Dudley] This is a study on the status and roles of Muslim women in Egypt and how they affect women's ability to influence their children in religious education. The research aims to seek a potential means for evangelism among Muslims. The main methodology is literature research, and a very small portion is field research through questionnaires. Findings include the following: the subordination of women to men is a worldwide phenomenon. Muslim women have unique problems because of Islamic teaching. Although Muslim women do not possess visible power, they do have invisible power to influence the future generation for Christ if they can be empowered to educate their children in Christian ways. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts.] [c]

20141. Leo, John. "Clinton's Abortion Bullies Buckle At Cairo Conference", in Seattle Times, September 13, 1994. p. B5. The Cairo UN Population Conference will be recalled as 'one of the oddest adventures' of the Clinton Administration. The Clinton Administration is following its usual policy formulation pattern: initial bullying from a controversial stance, quiet collapse, followed by the excuse that the original policy was never intended. In 3/1994, the State Department ordered all Embassies to lobby host governments conform to the US policy that abortion is a 'fundamental right' of women (notably, this directive promised no funding to support this new fundamental right). Tim Wirth, undersecretary of state and leader of the US abortion lobbying effort notes that: 'a government which is violating basic human rights should not hide behind the defense of sovereignty'; that is, if a nation does not support abortion, its laws and constitution are void. In addition, the US is using its aid and trade to pressure countries to adopt the Clinton Administration abortion policy. Guatemalan and Peruvian diplomats fear that the US will immediately end their aid funding if they do not provide for universal abortion on demand. Notably, while the Vatican and its 20-30 nation-state allies forced the Clinton Administration to back down, the press was so intent on denouncing the Vatican that the Clinton policy reversal was overlooked in the US press. [TXT]

20142. Lutfi, Huda; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]: Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 06: The Mamluk Period: Manners and Customs of Fourteenth Century Cairene Women: Female Anarchy versus Male Sharia Order in Muslim Prescriptive Treatises. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 99-121. Mid-fourteenth century Mamluk society was economically prosperous and politically stable. However, superstition was common and the routine visiting of the tombs of sufis was an important part of the daily life for women. Religious conservatives, such as Ibn al-Hajj (Abu abd allah ibn Muhammd al-Abdari al-Fasi, b. Fez, Morocco. d. Cairo 1336; here relying on his Al-Makdhal ila Yammiyat al-Amal bu Tahsin al-Niyyat (Cairo: Al-Matbaa al-Misyriya, 1929)), were critical of the mixing of sexes at shrines and on religious occasions; he argued that religious ignorance was attributable to Fatimid Caliph Hakim, whose orders to women to remain at home came during droughts, famines, plagues and periods of inflation. Like other medieval urban societies, Mamluk society saw the role of women as to remain in the home: Ibn al-Hajj was especially distrustful of the daily presence of women shoppers in the marketplaces and shops of the cities. Women had a strong presence in Cairene society and significant legal and traditional prerogatives.

20143. Macklin, William R. "Coptic Orthodox Church Split From Western Catholicism 1500 Years Ago", in Seattle Times, November 12, 1994, p. C4. The Coptic Orthodox Church, with 22 million members worldwide, is presently headed by Pope Shenouda III. The church split from Western Christianity 1500 years ago. Last month, the Coptic pope toured North America in the face of almost complete press silence. Much Coptic practice is identical to that of the Roman Catholic Church: a mutual call to unity in 1973 has resulted in the working of a panel of theologians to resolve doctrinal differences. Much of this is due to Pope Shenouda III, who was produced by the vast monastic establishment of the church, yet who became the first Coptic pope to visit the Vatican; his outspoken defense of Coptic minority rights in Egypt led Anwar Sadat to banish him to four years exile in a desert monastery (where he wrote 16 books); becoming one of the 1600 political exiles under Sadat's rule. Pope Shenouda was released in 1985 by Pres. Mubarak, after the assassination of Sadat. One major difference from the Roman Catholic Church is the requirement that priests who do pastoral work be married. The Coptic Church also does not oppose birth control, even if women remain barred from the priesthood.

20144. Maguire, Daniel C. "The UN Population Conference: International Consensus On Controlling Population Provides Hope For Planet", in Seattle Times, September 7, 1994. p. B5. International 'consensus' has been reached at the UN conference on six points: (1) women must be educated and empowered; (2) parents must be able to believe their children will survive; (3) rich countries like the US must realize their consumption pattern makes them a more significant threat to the environment; (4) development must abolish poverty; (5) humans must limit their power to destroy the environment; (6) contraception and voluntary abortion must be universally available. [David C. Maguire is professor of moral theology at Marquette University, and president of the Religious Consultation on Population Reproductive Health & Ethics.]

20145. Mahmoud, Fatima Babiker. The Sudanese Bourgeoisie: Vanguard of Development: Part 06: Education and Consumption: Businessmen and Their Families. London: Zed Books; Khartoum: Khartoum University Press, 1984. pp. 102-117. Education in Capitalist Families: Access to education has always been rationed in Sudan, with higher education remaining the preserve of the wealthiest families. In the Turko-Egyptian period, few Sudanese were educated, most having attended religious schools. The first state schools were opened in 1867-1868 in Khartoum, Berber and Dongola. The British established the Gordon College in 1902 to "train a small class of competent artisans... and to produce a small administrative class for entry to the government service". The number of schools established in the first year after education was equal to all those established in six decades of colonial rule. However, educational opportunity remained maldistributed. In 1974-1974, while 64.2% of urban children attended primary schools (95%), and 100% of wives had domestic workers in the home. Capitalists homes had many appliances and consumer electronics products: 100% have private doctors; all traveled abroad for annual medical check-ups (70% to England, 27% to Egypt). For major surgery, capitalists travel to major hospitals in Khartoum (38%), Egypt (34%) or England (28%). Capitalists have the best housing (more than 79% had homes with 5 or more rooms), and 96% are also landlords to some extent. Most women married to capitalists remain in the home and have no paid employment (95%); 100% of wives had domestic workers in the home. Capitalists hospitals had many appliances and consumer electronics products: 100% have cooling systems, 96% have tape recorders, 100% in Khartoum had TV sets (TV service had just started there at the time of the survey), 20% had washers and driers; and 71% had modern kitchens.

20146. Mannin, Ethel. Women and the Revolution: Part 24: Women and Past Revolutions: The Women's Revolution in the East. New York: E.P. Dutton & Co Inc., 1939. An enormous amount of propaganda has been brought to bear, and is consistently sustained, in the interests of "the socialization of the East". Uzbek women are laying aside their veils and entering the universities of Samarkand and Tashkent with the men, and working with them in factories and offices; throughout the Republics Eastern women are being educated to Western ideas of mother-craft and demonstrations. They did most of the picketing work. They went in route for forbidden Samarkand, a guide was very eloquent about the socialization of the Persian women--Persians forming a considerable part of the cosmopolitan population. Before the Soviet campaign for their emancipation, she said, they had been mere chattels of men, subject to all the degradations the unenlightened East imposes on women as a matter of course; they were required to lie on the floor in childbirth, being regarded as unclean at such times; they had no rights, no freedom, no place in society; to-day, unveiled, socially and morally, they take their place as "useful Soviet citizens," co-equal with men; they are taught birth-control and personal hygiene, and go into hospital and receive proper medical attention when they bear their children; they rise to high positions in the State, become doctors and engineers and hold administrative posts. When the movement for their emancipation first began and they began to lay aside their veils and assert themselves as free individuals, they were called harlots by the men, and many of them were murdered by husbands and fathers who preferred to see them dead rather than succumb to Western ideas. But to-day in Baku there is a museum showing the emancipation of Persian women, though the ancient East still has a considerable hold, and women still squat on the ground outside their low, flat-roofed adobe houses, shapeless bundles in faded parajans, their faces hidden behind thick "velis" of horsehair, resisting both Westernization and attempts to persuade them and their families to move into the workers' barracks in the new town which is slowly but surely encroaching on the old in an on-creeping tide of new buildings.

The opposition to moving out of the hovels of houses into the modern flats is merely an Eastern version of the Western slum-dwellers and their preference for their slum houses rather than a box of a flat in a vast impersonal block. Russia has no more business in Turkestan than the British have in India--the right of free secession from the Soviet Union as laid down in the Constitution is, as Cecily Hamilton points out [In: Modern Russia (Dent, 1934)] concerning the Ukraine, "more theoretical than real"--and the emancipation of a people, both men and women, should come from within from themselves; it should not be imposed on them from without, "for their own good", which savours too much of the British in India and Africa, and Mussolini's "civilizing" campaign to the Abysсинians. The need is for an upsurge of the spirit of freedom and revolt in the people themselves, not a grafting on of ideas from without. The upsurge of spirit was manifested in India during the Civil Disobedience Campaign, when "women who had spent their whole lives in seclusion came out in thousands to walk unveiled in Congress processions". [Reginald Reynolds in The White Sahibs in India (Secker & Warburg, 1937).] At that time India was, in the words of the Congress leader Nehru, in the throes of "a great eruption, of human energies which make the hundreds of millions of India as well as that Empire which still holds sway here". Gandhi's campaign gave a tremendous impetus to the woman movement, linking it up with the general movement for national freedom. Brailsford describes that revolutionary year as opening "the doors of countless purdah homes. One heard, wherever one went, the ripping of curtains and veils. The Congress movement beckoned to women in every form of national service, and with courage and devotion they answered its call. They spoke at its mass demonstrations. They did most of the picketing work. They went in thousands to prison. They were often chosen as the 'dictators' of the local committees... I found them foremost in every public activity, and the men paid them the most generous tributes."

[In: Rebel India (Leonard Stein, publisher with Victor Gollancz, 1930).] What happened in India is an excellent example of the importance of the woman movement extending beyond purely feminist causes and allaying itself with the general revolutionary cause. It is when the women see that the fight against imperialism and the capitalist system is their fight, that their wrongs are rooted in these evils, and that their emancipation therefore lies in the overthrow of those evils, and seeing this are not content to be merely feminists, moulting the wrongs of women, protesting and fighting merely for their own sex, but become revolutionaries, fighting the system responsible for their wrongs along with the wrongs of men, that they make real progress. The revolution in social organization carried out by Mustafa Kemal in the nineteen-twentyes, when Turkey became a Republic, gave women freedom from the veil, and a social and moral status in line with that of Western countries, polygamy was prohibited, and the laws governing marriage, divorce, inheritance, Westernized. The separation of religion from the State served the women of Turkey in their emancipation as the underlining of the power of the Roman Catholic Church served the woman movement in the French Revolution. (As Blaisdell has observed, “it is one of the greatest disappointments of a revolution esthetically to see the power of the Church to impose on a lay society the immutable reason of its dogmas relating to marriage.” [In: Rebel India.]) One of the first radical reforms Mustafa Kemal effected in the Republican Government was the handing over of all educational institutions (including the medressehs, religious colleges) to a commissariat of Public Instruction; hitherto they had been controlled by offices for religious affairs. In Palestine the women’s movement moves forward with the Arab struggle against British imperialism and Zionism. The nationalist spirit of freedom has penetrated behind the veils of the Arab women and given them boldness and courage, sweeping away the encumbrances of Islamic tradition as it were overnight. In 1929 the woman’s movement organized an Arab Women’s Congress at Jerusalem, and two hundred delegates faced the public gaze unveiled, meetingunder the presidency of Madame Kazem Pasha Hussein, wife of the late President of the Arab executive. It was the first women’s congress ever held in Palestine, and it had the courage not merely to stand openly for social and economic freedom for women, but to identify itself with the nationalist movement. It pledged itself to work for the mitigation of the sentences passed on nationalist political prisoners: it protested against the importation of firearms into Palestine for arming the Jews; it pleaded the cause of the oppressed peasants and asked the Government for legislation to relieve their distress; they demanded the establishment of a free, self-governing, democratic state.

Outside of the congress the women organized propaganda and demonstrations. In 1932, after Lord Allenby’s visit to Jerusalem, the women expressed their nationalist spirit by organizing mass demonstrations, and a procession first to the Musjid of Omar, where a Christian woman preached from the pulpit of the mosque, and then to the Holy Sepulchre where a Moslem woman preached before the tomb of Christ, symbolizing the nationalist solidarity of Arab womanhood. Not in addition to, but as part of its nationalist fight, the Arab women movement fights for better education for women and girls, and for the raising of their social status generally. A writer in the Congress Socialist [September, 1937] (the organ of the Congress Socialist Party of India) observes, “The part that women have played and continue to play in every struggle for freedom is one of the noteworthy features of every colonial fight. Everywhere the women’s movements have taken on a new orientation and they have entered upon a new phase of their struggle for complete emancipation. They stand to-day shoulder to shoulder with men with greater zeal and determination than ever, whether it be in China, Egypt, India, Spain, or Palestine.... And in this present fight against imperialist domination the Arab woman has risen to her fullest height and stature as an individual of exceptional courage.” In China it is again a story of the woman’s movement marching side by side, in co-operation with, the anti-imperialist movement. Anna Louise Strong, in her excellently concise study of the Chinese revolutionary struggles from 1927 to 1935, China’s Millions [Gollancz, 1936], says: “Nowhere on earth to-day is the social clash more picturesque and startling than in the fight for women’s rights in China. In this ancient land, with its primitive peasantry, where parents to get food still sell their daughters, and where respectable women remain indoors in retirement, there has arisen a generation of ‘bobbed-hair girls’ who declare that both sexes are equal citizens. They marched behind the Nationalist armies as propagandists in uniform; they aroused the countryside; they formed women’s unions. Many of them to-day are martyrs because of their activities. From time to time news dispatches from China describe the execution of a dozen or a score of women, who are condemned as revolutionists on the evidence of their bobbed hair alone.” During the Nationalist drive of 1925-7 bobbed hair became the outward and visible sign of the Chinese woman’s emancipation; it became, as Anna Louise Strong says, “a flag for which women die”; it is the challenge to the outworn traditions which enslaved women—challenge in the same way that the laying aside of the veil was a challenge on the part of the women of Turkestan, India, Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, Persia; a challenge and an act of self-assertion; a demand of these Eastern women to be regarded not merely as women, but as human beings, co-equal with man, individuals with a place in society and a duty to it. [↩]

The condition of women in most countries of the Arab world is in a state of flux. The reasons for this are many, but let us limit ourselves to three important causes: the first is religion, the second is economics and the third is politics. By religion I mean certain modern interpretations of Islamic teachings espoused by disparate groups of people who have been named “fundamentalists”, “activists” or “integristes” by the media. There is a strong current of integrisme sweeping the Muslim world, one which seeks to look at society holistically and to adapt institutions to an interpretation by such groups of “Islamic” norms. Because the integristes movements cover a wide spectrum of concepts and ideas which often differ from group to group within the same country, let alone different Muslim countries, there is little unanimity among them, save on the use of religious idiom in communicating with each other and with the public at large. The reason for the rise of such movements is the alienation of the public from governments and from any ideologies they espouse. When such an alienation and suspicion of the governing elite is widespread, anomie sets in, and one of the alternatives to that is a return to religion as the only constant ideology. Thus new interpretations of religious teachings are posited and supported by some of the population.

There is no unanimity among these groups regarding the role of women either, for various groups have interpreted that role differently. In Egypt, at one end we have those who believe that the role of women in society is limited to that of child bearing and nurturing which means nurturing children, older members of the family, and of course, the spouse. The woman is thus limited to the household and its functions and has no presence in the marketplace, here used in the wider sense to mean activities of a political/juridical/economic nature. Her space is limited to the family and the household and is, therefore, purely private. Accordingly, she is dressed with absolute modesty in loose flowing gowns that go down to her ankles, with long sleeves, high collars and a headdress that shows nothing of her hair or her neck. Even more extreme groupings prefer that a woman wear a niqab, a mask over her face, sunglasses that hide her eyes, and gloves that cover her fingers, and that she be kept secluded whenever possible. Yet, while positing such a retiring position for women, many of the same groups encourage their education.

Less extreme groupings are content with women who dress modestly and who may or may not cover their hair with a veil, a scarf, a bonnet or turban. A modest form of clothing is also enjoined on males who frequently allow their beards to grow. [Note: Fadwa El-Guindy.]

The attitude of integristes movements towards women and work also differs. Many of them believe that women have no place in the marketplace, for such “would lay them open to insult and harassment.” The underlying assumption here is that men are so susceptible to female charms that a woman is a walking temptation, whether dressed modestly or not. Al-Ghazali (died 1111) believed that woman’s voice was a Awa, a blemish. Others, motivated by economic factors, feel that women should be allowed to work. For instance, Sheikh Al-Ghazali in his “al-mara fi-l-islam” (1980) has sustained women’s right to work as specified in the Quran and has stated that no part of a woman is a blemish. Those who tread the middle ground concede that women can go out to work but that they should be limited to work that services women and children, not men. Hence, some work is labelled "for males" and some "for females" (probably the work that men don’t want to do). Many, though, support training women as doctors for women and children, so they need not come into contact with a male doctor who is not kin. Unmarried women to dress modestly and do not seek work, for her modest garb will prevent gossip about her and will send a message that she is not to be sexually harassed. Thus her outer appearance is a sign of her inward uprightness and allows her to work side by side with strange men, not her kin, and earn her living without incurring criticism from neighbors and relatives alike. This attitude is usually found among the section of the bourgeoisie that had heretofore not encouraged their daughters to become enrolled in higher on and had not allowed them to work outside the house. They are the ones most fearful of what "the neighbors might think", but who, because of a stratified economy and a falling standard of living need the salaries earned by working women.

What needs underlining is while there is nothing in the Quran that prevents women from having a public as well as a private role, recent interpretations, or medieval interpretations of religious injunctions resuscitated by some men have relegated women to a private role which they describe as being in line with her ‘femininity’. Others have nevertheless encouraged women’s public participation as the junior partner in a world mostly run by men. Amazingly enough, Muslim women have been elected heads of state as frequently as western women. The use of religious interpretations can therefore encourage the emancipation of women or discourage it, depending on the interpreters and the agenda behind their interpretation. This brings us to the next cause of the condition of women. [=]

20149. Marsot, Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid. Women in Egypt: Gender Relations and Political Liberalization: Part 02. G.E. von Grunebaum Center’s Series. Working Paper 9. Pamphlet. Los Angeles, Calif.: UCLA, G.E. von GrunebaumCenter for Near Eastern Studies, January 1992. pp. 6-8. What, one might well ask, has all this to do with democratization? This brings us to the third rubric, that of politics. If in a liberal society there are lobbies which represent various interests, (unions, associations etc.) which take up the cause of the poor, the disinfected, the workers and so on. They may not be as successful as those which take up the causes of the affluent, but there is support for the weak in some fashion. That support then appeals to the lawmakers who disburse funds to help the poor through social security and medicare as well as old age pensions. But third world countries have no answers to social problems because the money is not there and the lawmakers have little or no clout.

During the parliamentary years in Egypt ie. pre-1952, parliament was dominated by landowners who never did a thing for the peasant. Only in the 30s did they begin to pass legislation forbidding child labor and limiting the working hours for women. Any social services that were introduced, women are shoved to the back of the line. As more new technology becomes widespread, some highly educated women benefit from their knowledge of it but the rest do not. Thus, education plays a key role. Those who can afford the expense of higher education can plug into shenanigans and all sorts of finagling, elicited funds from amongst the wealthy to set up clinics, dispensaries and hospitals for the poor. Indeed by 1952, before the government took over their enterprises, they had set up 2 million hospital beds in the country. It was women’s organizations who set up the nursing corps for the army and set up rehabilitation centers for the war wounded. It was benevolent organizations that set up Braille institutes, orphanages, and training schools for the needy. The government spent little or nothing on such institutions.

After the revolution of 1952, more funds began to be spent by the government on social work, but only government employees have been given old age pensions. There is a form of social security, but that pays a pittance, and individual enterprises are responsible for setting up insurance. The poor get short shrift in hospitals, that is assuming there is space to admit them, and they actually receive treatment. There is a saying that a medical student gets the best training in the Qaar al-airi, the largest government run hospital, but the patient gets the worst treatment, and if he/she comes out of the hospital healthy it is little short of miraculous.

The need for some sort of support in old age has led to a horrifying increase in the birth rate, so that one million babies are born every eight months, with people assuming that since a number of them will die, one or two of them might be successful enough to support their parents in their old age. This is especially the case among agricultural workers, who represent approximately 40% of the population.

Medical care is fine for the elite who can afford to pay for it, but even in the best of hospitals the nursing is below par, and that many prefer to fly to London, the USA, or Paris for treatment. Those who have no option have to depend on their own families to bring them food and to supervise their medication. Furthermore, because nurses and orderlies are so poorly paid, a little bit of bakshish helps the nurse to show more efficiency.

On the other hand, the integrists have taken up the slack and have organized themselves to render social services for their members whenever these are needed. They therefore run clinics, schools, and set up networks for finding people jobs and helping each other whenever necessary. These services, financed by donations from wealthy members, have attracted an increasing number of adherents and have been a positive element in the movements. Once again, the people using alternative strategies have found means of self-help amongst the community which enables them to survive difficult times. Much like the early Quakers who stood guarantors for their workers, so integrists find work for their members and guarantee them a support system. [\textendash]

20150. Marsot, Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid. Women in Egypt: Gender Relations and Political Liberalization: Part 04. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's

In authoritarian regimes repression is the means used by government, ocasionally allayed by gifts from sugar-daddy governments. Thus the government subsidizes essentials, but the rich benefit alongside the poor.
For example, the gas subsidy favors those with private cars as opposed to public transportation. Most of the economic pie is reserved for the army the main support of the government, and the high bourgeoisie, which is the government's ally and main beneficiary. Because there is no public responsibility, all is done according to the will of the president and his circle of advisors; musical chairs are played with one minister trying to bakshish the other in order to get more of the budget for his projects.

Until Mubarak came to power there was a one-party system which had little or no clout in parliament and which represented little of the commons about it. Political parties have now been reinserted but how much clout does parliament have? For the time being very little, but one assumes it will acquire more as liberalization proceeds apace; however, it is a slow process and parliaments learn by doing. For the time being the cabinet is appointed by the president and is responsible to the president, but as time passes, parliamentary knowledge expands and people begin to realize that they have more power to make decisions that affect the good of the whole.

To-date, parliament is still in its infancy, but there are hopes for its maturity. As far as women are concerned, their numbers in parliament have radically decreased. Under Sadat, a number of seats had been set aside for women. Mubarak has done away with that and women have to compete with men for the seats. There is always one woman in the committee as the Minister for Social Affairs, but no other ministry has ever been given to a woman.

One can point out that in authoritarian regimes women as well as men are not granted many rights, and that both sexes are indifferent to governments with which they do not identify and which they consider to to be "the other", yet they always expect the government to improve the situation within the country. Nevertheless men are given preference over women, even though the government claims to be an equal opportunity employer. Government employees within the same cadre receive equal salaries regardless of sex. There are, however, fewer women under-secreteries of state, but their number is growing, as is a rising number of women ambassadors, though their numbers are still exiguous. All over the world, with few exceptions, men are still preferred over women. [\textendash]

20151. Marsot, Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid. Women in Egypt: Gender Relations and Political Liberalization: Part 05. G.E. von Grunebaum Center's

As the issues of one parent families grow, or the issue of absentee fathers among those who work abroad continues, women will have to struggle harder in order to get what they need, especially when the economic pie becomes smaller. Women who are married are invariably told that they are taking a job away from a man "who is supporting a family", as though she were working for the fun of it or to indulge in consumer buying. This perception on the part of males may be because according to Islamic injunction men are the ones who are responsible for the family and its expenses, and maybe some men believe that women work merely to buy expensive clothes, and maybe some among the elites do. But most of those who work do so in order to support a family.
Women who work are normally given no more than the minimum salaries to rely upon are encouraged to work. When the first woman taxi driver appeared in Cairo, the male drivers helped her, because they knew she was a widow, and I was told, "she is raising a family" by male taxi drivers, but when the younger women began to break into the field, the males were not as accommodating, and slandered the women as unprofessional, sloppy etc.

Women still have a long uphill battle to acquire minimum rights (though we not live long enough) but that struggle can only go somewhere when the women's organizations acquire more clothing than they have, and when the men's organizations begin to see the need to parlay with women on common causes. Let us not forget women have bought into the patriarchy; especially mothers, since once they become a mother they rise in stature and in status. It is mothers who socialize their children and who discriminate between the different sexes, so that education at the primary level, the level of infancy, breeds in discrimination. So long as women alone are left the task of nurturing and socializing the family then we can expect this discrimination to continue.
So long as society educates men and women differently, the same holds to be. Women are taught home economics whereas men are taught calculus, even in government schools where the curriculum is supposed to be the same. Furthermore, religious interpretations will continue to feed discriminatory practices until a generation of women scholars, such as Bint al-Shati and others like her, arise to defend the condition of women in Islam.

Urbanized intellectual women have tried to organize associations that concentrate on women's problems. At first they were refused permission to organize, then when permission was finally given they split into factions and one faction is now accused of wrongful handling of funds.

This may be normal, and in due course women's organizations will become the mouthpiece for demands for women's rights, especially as concerns personal status, divorce, marriage, child custody and support. At the moment the government needs the support of the religious establishment to combat the current of integisme which seeks to overwhelm the government, so they dare not concede any rights to women that might upset the ulama, the most reactionary element of society. In due course, however, the government might realize that they have stronger support from women than they could ever hope to get from the ulama or the integistes.

Finally we must note that greater liberalization can only encourage the creation of effective trade unions for both men and women. Only then can we begin to assume that the rights of the common person can be safeguarded, but that is still a long way away for both men and women.

In brief, the condition of women and their roles in society are determined by a multiplicity of reasons in which religion, economics and politics play a part. When the economic pie diminishes then religion and politics come together to discriminate against women and thus reserve the pie for the men. Much as Rosy the Riveter was hailed a heroine during the war, and then told to go home and have babies after the war because then she was "taking a job away from a good man"; so muslim women, or rather women the world over, are manipulated by their society and pushed either into the market place or out of it depending on the needs of the day.

When women become more conscious of their rights and organize themselves to oppose such discriminatory practices, then religion and politics, as well as economics, all hasten to accommodate the new realities and seek to co-opt certain groups among women. Such electoptation may be at the expense of other groups of women, or may benefit all women in the long run. In the final analysis, elite woman are the greatest beneficiaries of any system, whether it encourages or discourages women's participation outside the home, because they have the option of choice, they have access to men with power, and they do not fear or care for public criticism. By elite women I mean women who are highly educated, education being the ultimate channel for vertical mobility, or who come from prominent families, which is often a short-cut to power as in the case of Benazir Bhutto.

Women of the bourgeoisie, middle, and lower classes follow the example of elite women, but are slower in breaking through tradition and convention. They are the ones most susceptible to integrative movements, and who espouse the notion that a woman’s place is in the home. The working class woman, somewhat akin to elite women, (though with a limited number of choices and knowing that she has to work to support herself and her children) is not ruled by any traditional system that hinders her ability to seek a livelihood. Whatever works for her is good, as far as she is concerned. Lastly, the rural peasant woman, much like her male counterpart, is the one with the least choices, but she also is the one who all her life has been involved in work. She labors in the fields, at home, and in the marketplace where she buys, sells and barter whatever she has: butter, ghee, chicken, cottage industries, etc., as she has done for millennia. She is a basic element in the alternative market.

Poor countries have more limited choices than rich ones for both males and females. But whether poor or rich, the strategies used by both sexes to attain their needs are many in the face of governments which are limited in their possibilities for expansion. Alternative methods are therefore invented to by-pass the obvious and the traditional. It is therefore amongst alternative groups and strategies that one can detect the real workings of a society. [-]

20152. Mason, Isaac. Mohammedans of China: Part 3. Read before the China Society, March 15, 1922. It is interesting to read what is offered in the way of proof for these miracles, as follows: "Christians ask why it is that the cleaving of the moon was seen only in Arabia, and not elsewhere. We answer that some people from Persia also saw it; moreover there are differences of time and location to take into account; daytime in China is night-time in America, so it can be understood that all the world could not see the moon at the same time, But if you still doubt, look at the Old Testament in the book of Joshua, chap. x, 12, 13, and you will see that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still in the midst of heaven, and it hasted not to go down for about a whole day. Who witnessed that event? If it be queried ‘How could Mohammed ascend into heaven? Heaven is not a place of solid substance, how could it be pierced (by a material body)? We answer, have you not heard that Enoch, at the age of 365 years, ascended into heaven? Again, the prophet Elijah also ascended into heaven. Moreover, when Jesus was being baptized by John, the heavens suddenly opened, and a dove came forth and alighted upon Jesus. Are not these proofs that heaven has been opened, and that Prophet ascended into heaven?

Christians say that our Prophet used force to propagate his Faith; this was not so. The Prophet divided people into three classes; those who submitted were to be left alone; those who would not obey were to be punished; those who after punishment still remained obdurated, were to be killed. The women and children, and the aged, in all cases, were to be forgiven. The benevolence of the Prophet was unequalled. But Christians should know that the methods of Moses were the same as those of Mohammed. It is said in Exodus that Moses commanded the Levites to kill the worshipper of the calf, and they killed 230000 people. Again, it is said in the first book of Kings, that the punitive wars and other good deeds of David were pleasing to God. This is sufficient to prove the falsity of the Christians’ slander of our Prophet.

People of other religions consider that our Prophet acted contrary to reason and good principles in the matter of having nine wives. But these people only know one side of the matter. The wives of Mohammed were all women of excellent character, so they assisted in bringing out the perfect character of the Prophet. The case is not to be compared to one of inordinate desire and love of beauty. Moreover, the prophet Jacob married four women; David at first had seven, and afterwards more shall 90 wives; Solomon had 1000, one hundred times as many as our Prophet had; how can Mohammed be said to have been extravagant in this respect?"

It may be mentioned here that the biographers of the Prophet have so far considered Chinese ideas of propriety and good taste as to tone down or entirely change some of the facts. The Arabic records state that all the wives of Mohammed save one had been previously married; in the Chinese accounts the women are all virgins who, in view of the high destiny awaiting them, refuse advantageous offers of marriage in order to keep themselves unsullied for the Prophet. In the Chinese view there is no question of siring children, which may account for this change in the records. In the case of Zeinab, the wife of Mohammed's adopted son Zeid, who was divorced in order that the Prophet might marry her, the Chinese account says that she refused to marry anyone but the Prophet. The Arabs were scandalized at Mohammed's action in this case, and the Chinese would be equally or more so, hence the changed story.

Time does not permit me to deal more fully with the Chinese accounts of Mohammed, nor with the doctrines of Mohammedism. But I wish to say something about the Five Practices, or the Five Pillars, as they are called, of the Faith. The Recognition and Confession of the Only True God is regarded as fundamental; then follow Purification and Prayer, Fasting, Almsgiving, and the Pilgrimage.

(1) Recognition and Confession are briefly summed up in the words of the Kalima:—“I testify that there is no God but God, and Mohammed is the chief Prophet of God, the chosen and sent of God.” The Kalima is printed in Arabic and Chinese, and is widely circulated and well-known among the Moslems. Fuller statements of the Creed, and expositions of it are to be found in many of the books and tracts, but these probably interest the a-hongs more than the ordinary believers who have often no clear idea of the doctrines of Islam, and are content with a more or less satisfactory observance of the rites. In a small booklet in my possession, printed in green ink, and entitled "The Root of all Goodness," a statement of the Creed is as follows: “Verily there is no God but only the True God, and Mohammed is His Prophet. I believe in the True God; I believe in all the angels; I believe in all the Sacred Books; I believe in all the Prophets; I believe in the world to come; I believe that good and evil are determined by God; I believe in the resurrection.”

(2) The purification required as a necessary preparation for prayer is purity from outward and material, as well as from legal and ceremonial uncleanness. In China two kinds of outward purification are sufficient for the smaller ablution: representations of pitchers or other waterholding utensils are found on some signs of Mohammedan shops and inns. It is very important that at least the hands be thoroughly cleansed before one attempts to touch the Holy Koran. Shoes are removed at the door of the mosque, and ceremonial little round caps, which run up to a peak at the top, are worn by the worshippers. The imams and a-hongs who read the Koran wear turbans of white or green colour, the latter colour distinguishing the Haji, that is those who have made the pilgrimage to Mecca. It may be mentioned that an old term for Moslems is “ch’an t’ou ti”—the turbaned ones; but in Western China many who are not Moslems wear turbans.

The prostrations and bowings and other ceremonies of worship are similar to those of other Moslem countries. The prayers repeated are said in the first book of Kings, that the punitive wars and other good deeds many who are not Moslems wear turbans.

Sacred Books; I believe in all the Prophets; I believe in the world to come; I believe that good and evil are determined by God; I believe in the resurrection.”

(3) Fasting is observed in the month of Ramadan with more or less strictness throughout China among Moslems. During this month a devout observer will not allow any food or drink to pass his lips during the hours that daylight permits a white thread to be distinguished from a black one. Eating and drinking take place freely after the sun has set each day; when the fastening month falls during the hot weather many allow themselves to rinse out the mouth with water, but without swallowing it.

(4) Almsgiving as a religious act has always been a matter of importance among Moslems; in China it is limited almost exclusively to the helping of their own poor; but on the occasions of funerals, alms are also given, a custom which, in many localities, is frequently observed.

(5) The Pilgrimage: considering the distance and the difficulties of travel it is not surprising that no large number of Chinese Moslems are able to obtain their heart's desire by a visit to Mecca. Yet pilgrims do go from all parts of China, and it is said there is a special part of Mecca where they congregate, and where they are looked after by Chinese who reside there. Those who have made the pilgrimage and are entitled to the name of Hajj are very proud of it, and often wear a distinctive badge; they are delighted to exhibit their Meccan passport. Those who cannot go will frequently contribute towards the expenses of an a-hong or other devout believer who can attempt the journey, hoping thus to share in the merit. Some few a-hong find their way to the Mohammedan University Al-Azhar at Cairo. Those who have been to Mecca sometimes complain of the bad treatment meted out to them in Arabia, where they have been fleeced by their co-religionists. The orthodox Turks and Arabs scarcely acknowledge them as good Moslems, this being probably due to the irregularities known to exist in China.

The Chinese character ch'ao which is used for the Pilgrimage, also means "acing towards," so the prostrations towards Mecca are considered to share, in some measure, in the merits of Pilgrimage. The first season of worship in the mosque in the morning is called "The Pilgrimage," and regular attendance at this service is held to make up, to some extent, for failure to visit Mecca.

The two great divisions of Islam are known in China as the White Caps (Sunnite) and the Red Caps (Shiite). There are many sects, and it is quite beyond the limits of this paper to discuss them; the reasons for divisions are often obscure. A few extracts from Mr. G. F. Andrew may be of interest, and must suffice on this matter. He says: "It is at the same time the most difficult to get at the root of these sectarian divisions. One suggestion is that before the coming of the Salars (to Kansu) there was but one sect, which was divided into sects which their co-religionists had lapsed, and determined upon a dissolution order. The order to dissolve AWSA was issued pursuant to the 1964 law that governs private nongovernmental organizations in Egypt. This law gives broad powers to the Ministry of Social Affairs to dissolve the organization. In addition, the Women's Rights Project, a division of Human Rights Watch, is distributing information about the local communities are perfectly independent of each other, and recognize no authority above them, in China or elsewhere. I have not been able to discover that Chinese Moslems pay any attention to any Caliphate, nor have they much, if any, regard for Turkey and the Sultan. The Caliphate is seldom referred to in speech or in literature, except in spasmodic magazines; in one of these I saw a reference to drunken foreign soldiers and sailors in Constantinople, which it was said was, without a struggle, occupied in 1517. The Sultan, however, was said to be "the first and greatest power in the East." The Caliphate lost its importance among Moslems; in China it is limited almost exclusively to spasmodic magazines; in one of these I saw a reference to drunken foreign soldiers and sailors in Constantinople, which it was said was, without a struggle, occupied in 1517. The Sultan, however, was said to be "the first and greatest power in the East." The Caliphate lost its

20153. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt, Part 1. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. The Arab Women's Solidarity Association (AWSA), headed by Dr. Nawal El-Saadawi, a well-known writer and leading figure in the Arab women's movement, has been ordered dissolved by the Egyptian authorities. AWSA will contest the dissolution order in legal proceedings scheduled to begin on October 31 before the State Council Court. This three judge panel hears cases brought against the government that seek the reversal of administrative decisions or compensation for damages resulting from such decisions. Fourteen attorneys have volunteered to work on AWSA's challenge of the dissolution order. The order to dissolve AWSA was issued pursuant to the 1964 law that governs private nongovernmental organizations in Egypt. This law gives broad powers to the Ministry of Social Affairs to legally register private organizations, control their activities and order their dissolution (see below). The law has long been criticized by Egyptian human rights advocates and lawyers as a major barrier to freedom of association. The independent Egyptian Organization for Human Rights condemned the government's move against AWSA as "a new assault on freedom of expression, which is already severely restricted in Egypt." Middle East Watch sent a letter to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on August 30, protesting the decision to dissolve the organization. In addition, the Women's Rights Project, a division of Human Rights Watch, is distributing information about the case this month to women's rights organizations in the United States and abroad, in an effort to mount an international campaign of support for AWSA and the reinstatement of its legal status in Egypt. [a]

20154. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt, Part 2: AWSA's Activities and Status. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. The Arab Women's Solidarity Association, established in 1982, has been in the forefront of the controversy and difficult battle to promote equality between the sexes in the Arab world. The organization was founded by Dr. El-Saadawi, a women's organizations in Egypt are directed by a woman.

257

AWSA operates as an international nongovernmental organization, recognized by the Egyptian Foreign Ministry, and as a private domestic organization governed by the rules of the Ministry of Social Affairs. The Egyptian branch of AWSA, located in Cairo, was legally registered with the Social Affairs Ministry in January 1985. AWSA was recognized as an international nongovernmental organization when the United Nations Economic and Social Council granted it consultative status in April 1985. AWSA receives funding from the United Nations and other international organizations for various program activities.

20155. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt: Part 3: Law No. 32 of 1964: Broad Powers To The State. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. The order to dissolve AWSA was issued by the Deputy Governor of Cairo for the Western Region in an administrative decree dated 6/15/1991. [Decree No. 19 from the Governorate of Cairo, Office of the Deputy Governor for the Western Region, concerning the Dissolution of the Arab womens Solidarity Association, signed by General Abdel Raouf Abdel Rahman.] AWSA was not informed of the decree until almost a month after the date of the dissolution order, when it received a letter with the order attached. The order provides no specific reasons or justifications for the decision. On this basis, AWSA's lawyers intend to challenge the decree as illegal on its face. In accordance with provisions of the Law of Associations, the Deputy Governor's order appointed a liquidator and specified that AWSA's assets be transferred to another organization, Women of Islam. [The law states that when a society is dissolved, the authority that issued the dissolution order shall appoint a liquidator, for a set period and fee.]

Women of Islam, a Cairo-based organization registered with the Ministry of Social Affairs, provides housing and other services for female students from the provinces who are studying in Cairo. An Egyptian journalist told Middle East Watch that the group is "an ordinary association, similar to hundreds of other such organizations in Egypt that are in the social-welfare business," adding that associations of this type do not address women's rights issues. Another source familiar with women's groups in Egypt said that Women of Islam "has no public image -- it is not terribly active." She commented that the choice of a little-known group such as Women of Islam as the recipient of AWSA's assets may have been intended as "the ultimate insult" to AWSA. AWSA's representatives informed Middle East Watch that the director of Women of Islam is Mr. Farouq El-Fiel. [Some women's organizations in Egypt are directed by men.] Mr. El-Fiel, who also serves as the Director-General of Social Affairs in the Ma'adi district, a Cairo suburb, was appointed the legal Minister of Social Affairs to dissolve legally registered organizations on the following grounds: if it is proven that the organization is not capable of achieving the purposes for which it was formed; if the organization disposed of its funds in a manner inconsistent with its purposes; if the organization's general assembly was not convened in two successive years; or if the organization "committed a flagrant violation of the law or if it violated public order or morality. The law provides that members of an organization's board of directors and the heads of the inspectors responsible to the organization's dissolution are prohibited from serving on the boards of other organizations for a period of five years from the date of the dissolution order. The law also stipulates that an organization may appeal a dissolution order before the State Council Court. The Egyptian Organization for Human Rights noted recently that the law has been used to dissolve organizations whose activities the authorities judge to be "political": The dissolution of AWSA is not the only case of the Egyptian government's violation of the freedom of establishing associations. Nearly two years ago, a decision was issued dissolving an association called Friends of Arab Media Club, thereby stopping the publication of the weekly paper Sawt al-Arab, issued by the association, the pretext being that the association dealt in political matters. [EOHR, "The Dissolution of the Arab womens Solidarity Association," 7/30/1991.] One Egyptian parliamentarian interviewed by Middle East Watch earlier this month described Law No. 32 as "absolutely obsolete. It provides for complete state control of private voluntary organizations. The groups are totally dependent financially on the Ministry of Social Affairs and have no freedom of initiative." Another knowledgeable source agreed, and commented to Middle East Watch: "The Ministry of Social Affairs creates lots of private voluntary organizations by handing over to them responsibility for day care, sewing courses or literacy courses, and a very small amount of funding. But these groups have no programmatic independence. The Egyptian Organization for Human Rights is challenging the constitutionality of Law No. 32, in legal proceedings initiated over a year ago."

liquidator of the Arab Women's Solidarity Association in the dissolution decree. The decree further grants Mr. El-Fiell's ten percent of AWSA's assets as a liquidator's fee, and specifies that his tasks be completed within six months. Middle East Watch believes that the conflict-of-interest in Mr. El-Fiell's appointment as liquidator is apparent. Following a press conference by AWSA and press coverage of the government's order, additional information about the Egyptian authorities' position emerged. Several days after an Egyptian newspaper columnist wrote a strong defense of AWSA and condemned the government's action against the organization as incompatible with democracy, AWSA representatives said that the Deputy Governor issued a public statement. He claimed that AWSA was being dissolved for financial and administrative reasons, implicitly denoting criticism of the government's move as politically motivated. The Deputy Governor alleged that there was only one Arab Women's Solidarity Association in existence -- namely, the domestic group registered with the Ministry of Social Affairs. He claimed that the international arm of AWSA was "a figment of the imagination." Therefore, he stated, AWSA improperly held two bank accounts: one for the Egyptian branch and the other for the international group. AWSA representatives told Middle East Watch that the bank account of the international organization had been opened with the knowledge of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; that AWSA had held its international conferences with the express permission of the Foreign Ministry; and that AWSA had engaged in regular correspondence with the Foreign Ministry about its activities. AWSA's position is that the Ministry of Social Affairs has chosen to ignore these obvious facts, as well as the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' own admission that AWSA is one of the organizations in Egypt with international status. In 8/1991 reply to a letter from Dr. El-Saadawi written after AWSA was notified of the dissolution order, the Foreign Ministry confirmed that AWSA has an international organization and that this entity is among the organizations in Egypt with status at the UN Economic and Social Council. The letter also pointed out that only the United Nations could revoke the organization's international status. Ironically, AWSA received official authorization from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on July 18 to hold an international conference in Cairo from 11/24-27/1991, on the subject of women and development. AWSA already had received a $15000 grant from the World Bank in support of the conference, which was planned to include participants from across the Arab world. [---]

20157. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt: Part 5: Impact of the Dissolution Order on AWSA's Activities. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. "We're almost closed," Dr. El-Saadawi told M EW in an interview on August 29. "The order to dissolve our Egyptian association prevents us from continuing our activities, because the Ministry of Social Affairs says that the international organization does not exist." Based on the Ministry's contention, we cannot function on a pan-Arab level. Because of the dissolution order, it's illegal for us to continue the work of the Egyptian branch until the appeal is heard by the court, a proceeding that only commences on October 31. The Law of Associations states that the members, officials and employees of a society that is ordered dissolved "shall be prohibited from continuing its activity or disposing of its funds." "One Egyptian lawyer interviewed by Middle East Watch in August predicted that the case could turn into a lengthy legal battle which would, in effect, suspend AWSA's activities for the duration of the proceedings. Another observer made a similar observation in an interview. Dr. El-Saadawi also explained that the organization's two bank accounts -- one for AWSA's Egyptian branch, and the other for the international organization -- have been frozen by order of the authorities. The proposed liquidation of AWSA's assets apparently will include the funds in the international account, which AWSA points out are "donated by United Nations organizations" to carry out specific activities proposed by AWSA. Yet, Women of Islam -- which carries out work markedly different from AWSA's -- has been designated as the sole recipient of AWSA's assets. [---] interviews with Middle East Watch, AWSA representatives said that while the organization viewed this letter as "threatening," AWSA nonetheless began a campaign against the Law of Associations, arguing that it was antithetical to democracy. [ ]

20159. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt: Part 7: Dissolution: An Extreme Measure. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. AWSA representatives believe that the authorities' move to dissolve the organization is an unjustifiably harsh measure. Middle East Watch agrees. If the organization is suspected of administrative or financial irregularities, a thorough investigation should be opened and the Ministry of Social Affairs should bring its concerns to AWSA's board of directors. If the investigation reveals that violations of the provisions of the Law of Associations were committed, the law provides that the board of directors can be removed and replaced by a temporary board appointed by the administrative authorities. Instead, a decision appears to have been made to short-cuts all public investigatory procedures and simply shut down the organization. Middle East Watch believes that this approach gives weight to the suspicion that the government's motives have a political dimension. [ ]

20160. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egyptian Government Moves To Dissolve Prominent Arab Women's Organization: Court Challenge Set for 10/31/1991: A New Assault on Freedom of Expression in Egypt: Part 8: Human Rights Standards and Egyptian Constitutional Guarantees. New York: Middle East Watch, February 12, 1993. In the absence of detailed reasons and persuasive supporting evidence for the administrative order to dissolve the Arab Women's Solidarity Association, Middle East Watch believes that the Egyptian authorities' move is an arbitrary abridgment of the right to freedom of association and freedom of expression. These rights are set forth in human rights instruments and in the Egyptian Constitution. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which Egypt has ratified, states that everyone "shall have the right to freedom of association with others" (Article 22) and that everyone "shall have the right to hold opinions without interference" (Article 19). With regard to freedom of association, Article 22 further states in part: No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those which are prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order (ordre public), the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. Middle East Watch calls on the Egyptian authorities to demonstrate that AWSA's dissolution meets the tests established in Article 22. The Egyptian Constitution also provides for freedom of expression and association. Article 47 states: "Freedom of opinion is guaranteed. Every individual has the right to express his opinion and to publicise it verbally or in writing or by photography or by other means within the limits of the law. Self-criticism and constructive criticism is the guarantee for the safety of the national structure." Article 55 grants citizens "the right to form societies as defined in the law." It prohibits societies "whose activities are hostile to the social system, clandestine or have a military character." Middle East Watch believes that the burden is on the Egyptian authorities to produce compelling evidence that AWSA's activities fall within the categories proscribed by the Constitution. We share the concern articulated by the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights in its statement of July 30: The Egyptian government, rather than respond to the demands of public opinion for more public liberties and, particularly for the freedom to form nongovernmental organizations, arguments and, rather than respect its international commitments to maintain basic standards of human rights and civil liberties, this government continues to adopt the course of increasingly tightening the constraints on basic rights and liberties in Egypt. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights also provides that States Parties "undertake to ensure the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all civil and political rights" set forth in the Covenant (Article 3). Article 26 provides additional protection against discrimination on the basis of sex: All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, non-belief, age, or any other status. Thus, in the context of the standards established in Articles 3 and 26, it is impossible to ignore the irony of the Egyptian government's move to dissolve AWSA and thereby stifle the voice an organization committed to promoting women's equality and eliminating gender-based discrimination, goals to which Egypt also has committed itself by ratification of the Covenant. Middle East Watch believes that the women and men affiliated with AWSA should be afforded human-rights protection by the Egyptian government to fully exercise individual and collective freedom of expression, and esteem of association to continue to carry out activities related to their activities. The protection of these basic freedoms is crucial at times when internal or external political or religious forces may press the authorities for the curtailment or termination of the activities of legally established organizations with which they do not agree. [ ]

20161. Middle East Watch; Human Rights Watch. Egypt: Trials of Civilians in Military Courts Violate International Law; Executions Continue, No Appeal of Death Sentences to Higher Court: Part 12: Mistreatment and Torture of Two of the Defendants, Both Lawyers. New York: Middle East Watch, July 1993. Radwan al-Tuni himself was arrested on 12/5/1992, while he was walking out of the courthouse in Assyut with other lawyers. The group was surrounded by security forces, who took out their guns, chased the other lawyers away, and arrested al-Tuni. He was brought to the SSI office in Assyut and held overnight, then transferred to the Assyut police station for two days, and moved to the Central Security Forces paramilitary camp for one day. From there, he was transferred to Tora Istikbal prison near Cairo, where he was held for about twenty days. [Hundreds of suspected Islamist militants have been held without charge at this prison, some of them for over three years. For additional information, see Middle East Watch, Prison Conditions in Egypt (Human Rights Watch: 2/1993).] From the prison, al-Tuni was brought to Lazoughly, SSI headquarters in Cairo, where one lawyer (who visited him in prison after he was returned from SSI headquarters) told Middle East Watch that "he was treated badly to get him to confess to taking messages and money between the prisons and the outside. The lawyer said that he had been unable to obtain details about al-Tuni's mistreatment "because when I visited him at Tora Istikbal, an investigations officer sat between us for the entire visit. The officer was writing down every word we said. When we were saying goodbye, Radwan whispered that he had been subjected to very bad treatment at Lazoughly. [MEW interview, Assyut, 2/1993. Middle East Watch has documented the torture of detainees held incommunicado at Lazoughly and other SSI offices in Egypt. See Behind Closed Doors: Torture and Detention in Egypt (Human Rights Watch: 7/1992).] From Lazoughly, al-Tuni was brought before the state security prosecutor, who ordered his detention for fifteen days, following the expiration of his thirty-day detention order under the emergency law. Al-Tuni then was moved to the men's prison at Qanater, northwest of Cairo, and finally back to Tora Istikbal. Before al-Tuni's own arrest, he had visited in prison Mustafa al-Sawid, another lawyer and defendant in the trial who was acquitted by the military court in April. During this visit, al-Tuni learned that al-Sawid had been tortured. Al-Sayyid was held at SSI's Cairo headquarters for approximately twenty-five days after his arrest. According to an Assyut lawyer interviewed by Middle East Watch: He was blindfolded the entire time and tortured. They threatened to rape his wife. He was interrogated for sixteen hours a day. They took turns. He was naked and was forced to stand, while blindfolded. He was electric-shocked and beaten. After that, he was brought to Tora Istikbal, where Radwan visited him and learned what had happened. [MEW interview, Assyut, 2/1993. This lawyer had learned the details of al-Sayyid's torture from al-Tuni.] The allegations are consistent with SSI torture methods documented by Middle East...

The realization that anthropology has served imperialist interests in its study of the Third World, and the realization that the importance of women has been downplayed in anthropology, coupled with a general Middle Eastern critique of Orientalism, has led to a new appreciation of the value of research that can be conducted by Arab-American and foreign trained Arab women in their own societies. In her own graduate work in anthropology, she became especially aware of the devalued stereotypes of Arab women in Western thought, and became aware that these stereotypes did not have anything in common with her own family or personal history. Her status, reinforced by beginning to work in the village after everyone met her husband, a university professor also working in Egypt, was usually seen as acceptable in the village; however, there were a few people that were suspicious since she started to work in the village after the 1973 War and feared she might be a Zionist agent. The author's being female allowed her access to women as informants, and this allowed a redress of the normal anthropological bias that is both that of males and outsiders in Arab culture. Significantly, she rejects the idea that anthropologists act from a basis of social responsibility (advanced by some Jewish anthropologists who study Arab societies) and in fact notes that anthropologists conduct themselves from a position of relative powerlessness. One significant constraint over her conduct was the norm of the discipline of anthropology as objective and disengaged from the people studied; yet she developed a personal accommodation to her personal commitment to empowerment of the women she studied (termed "dynamic objectivity") by the feminist scholar Keller). This model of interaction tries to overcome the paradigm of anthropology as "mining Third World cultures", despite the reality that anthropology is conducted by people with considerable power among people who have less power and who are the objects of study.

Kuwait: 52% of males, 12% of females.
Colombia: 52% of males, 18% of females.
Romania: 52% of males, 9% of females.
Switzerland: 50% of males, 37% of females.
Turkey: 50% of males, 50% of females.
Ghana: 50% of males, data not available on females.
Ireland: 49% of males, 36% of females.
Guyana: 48% of males, 4% of females.
Austria: 46% of males, 13% of females.
Hungary: 45% of males, 23% of females.
Mexico: 45% of males, 18% of females.
Chile: 45% of males, 26% of females.
Venezuela: 45% of males, 26% of females.
Israel: 44% of males, 30% of females.
Soviet Union: 44% of males, 10% of females.
Czechoslovakia: 43% of males, 11% of females.
Cuba: 40% of males, data not available on females.
Norway: 40% of males, 34% of females.
Egypt: 40% of males, 1% of females.
East Germany: 40% of males, 29% of females.
UK: 38% of males, 33% of females.

Canada: 37% of males, 29% of females.
Australia: 37% of males, 30% of females.
Hong Kong: 37% of males, 5% of females.
Guatemala: 36% of males, 10% of females.
United States: 35% of males, 28% of females [current data (1987)].
New Zealand: 35% of males, 29% of females.
Peru: 34% of males, 7% of females.
Uganda: 33% of males, data not available on females.
Sweden: 30% of males, 30% of females.
Ivory Coast: 24% of males, 1% of females. [Multinational Monitor is copyrighted by Essential Information Inc. [1346 Connecticut Avenue NW, Room 411, Washington DC 20036. Tel: (202) 833-3932. Cable: MULTIMON] and is reprinted by permission.] [•]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

The Catholic Bishops of Oceania, commenting on the Cairo draft document, consider the 1993 Port Vila Declaration of Population & Sustainable Development, made by 19 leaders of Pacific Nations, as a far better presentation of population and development issues. The Vila Declaration, the Bishops say, rightly emphasises the respect needed for the social, cultural and religious beliefs of diverse regions, while the Cairo document is willing to use the power of the State and media to impose solutions. The Bishops point out that the Vila Declaration shows that these serious matters can be addressed in ways that respect the dignity of individuals and of peoples, and without recourse to the repression of fundamental human rights and the taking of human life itself. It is clear that the tragic history of the East Timorese people under Indonesian occupation, presents a clear example of the dangers of the approaches proposed by the Cairo conference draft document. The people of East Timor are profoundly religious. The basis of their society is the family. CNRM, conscious of the deeply rooted religious and family values of our people. The National Council of Maubere Resistance expresses its deep support for the insights and views expressed by the Catholic Church on this most important subject for human welfare, and calls upon delegates to the conference to study the tragic example of East Timor very closely, avoiding adoption of resolutions that may encourage states to follow the models provided by repressive dictatorships like that of Suharto’s Indonesia. [Jose Ramos Horta; Special Representative, CNRM; Sydney, Dir. Gen. International Relations-CNRM] [–]

20165. Nawar, Laila; Lloyd, Cynthia B.; Ibrahim, Barbara. “Gender, Population, Environment: Autonomy and Gender in Egyptian Families”, in Middle East Report, September-October 1994. p. 18. The Egyptian family is being changed by transformations in social and economic realities: for example, the extended family has declined, with the nuclear family now comprising 84% of Egyptian families. In Egypt, as in most societies, women are socialized to provide for their families, and typically women have wage earning jobs to support their families: in a surprising number of cases, women are the sole wage earners in their households. However, women’s autonomy seems to be increasing, with both the average marriage age of women and the number of years of education received by women increasing. Women have a strong voice in family matters that affect them, such as family planning, childbearing and child rearing practices. Urban women have more autonomy than rural women. Educated women in general delay the marriages of their daughters to allow them to gain more education. However, women continueto seek their husband’s permission for activities outside the home, and rarely are involved in civic activities. National population policies in the future will depend on the degree these trends of greater education and autonomy for women can continue.

20166. Nelson, Cynthia; Keddie, Nikki R. [editor]; Baron, Beth [editor]. Women in Middle Eastern History: Shifting Boundaries in Sex and Gender: Part 17: The Modern Arab World: Biography and Women’s History: On Interpreting Doria Shafik. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991. pp. 310-334. Doria Shafik was a militant Egyptian feminist of the 1940s and 1950s; she was put under house arrest in 1957 for protests against Gamal Abdel Nasser, and spent the remaining 18 years of her life in virtual seclusion, until she committed suicide by leaping from her sixth-floor apartment on 9/20/1975. Becoming acquainted with Shafik through her poems, the reconstruction of this other by the process of writing her biography was a gradual one. She was born into a modest middle class family, but obtained a PhD from the Sorbonne in 1940; becoming a French teacher in Egypt, she rapidly was transformed into an intense political activist, as well as a poet and publisher (French language magazine La Femme Nouvelle, and Arabic language magazines Bint al-Nil (Daughter of the Nile) and the children’s magazine Katkuk (Little Chicken)). She organized a feminist union and political party (Bint al-Nil Union), she stormed the Egyptian Parliament, attempted to illegally run for parliament, protested the British occupation, and undertook hunger strikes in 1957 starting a hunger strike at the Indian Embassy protesting Zionism in Palestine and dictatorship at home). Shafik saw her life as running in tandem to the political and social transformations that were underway in Egypt. As nationalism grew in Egypt, she gradually switched from French to Arabic in her writings, and through work in Bint al-Nil Union, came to appreciate polygamy and hasty divorce as a central evil in the lives of Egyptian women. Bint al-Nil Uniondeveloped a platform with three goals: “(1) to establish the constitutional and parliamentary rights of the Egyptian woman in order to defend her rights; (2) to diffuse cultural health and social services among poor Egyptian families through the promotion of literacy programs and the creation of small industries to augment their earnings; and (3) to call attention to the conditions of these families, especially maternal and child care, through the full use of all mass media, conferences and editorials and to adopt every means that would guarantee their protection and support. Yet her independent stance resulted in her condemnation by both the progressive left and Nasserites: arrested, her movement collapsed and she was forgotten.

The purpose of the directory is to facilitate networking, development of appropriate channels of communications, professional advocacy, and building of expertise. For each entry, the directory provides (when applicable), the mailing address, telephone number, educational background, employment history, voluntary services, development expertise, community groups, international activities, conference participation, and publications. The guide is intended to facilitate: (1) helping local voluntary organizations and professional women to locate appropriate advisors and contacts; (2) helping national bodies to work more effectively and more appropriately; (3) providing regional bodies with much needed information and contacts; (4) supporting international bodies in their for appropriate resource persons; (5) promoting greater awareness of relevant projects of mutual concern to other professionals."

20168. New American View. "Foreign Policy; 'Dual Containment': Clinton's New Middle East Strategy", in New American View-News and Informed Commentary on the Pro-Israeli Lobby in America. Vol.8(11). June 1, 1993. (Editor's Note: The following is excerpted from an address by Martin Indyk to the Soref Symposium of the Washington Institute for Near East Affairs, a pro-Israeli think tank. Indyk, the former director of the institute, is now senior director for Near East and South Asian affairs at the National Security Council. Those in attendance at his address were a mix of pro-Israeli activists, academic specialists in the Middle East and government policy and intelligence officials. Indyk laid out the essentials of the Clinton administration's strategy for the region, particularly with regard to the "dual containment" of Iraq and Iran.)

It is an honor to be addressing you on the occasion of Barbi Weinberg's departure from the Presidency of the Institute and her ascension to the role of chairperson. Most of you will know well that Barbi was the founding mother of the Institute, its inspiration and guiding light for more than eight years. Without Barbi there would be no Washington Institute—if it is as simple as that. And without Barbi, I would not be standing before you tonight, as a spokesperson for the Clinton administration. I would probably be engaged in some compelling research on Australia's relations with Vanuatu [a small island republic in the Southwest Pacific Ocean]. All of us in the Washington policy-making community owe Barbi a tremendous debt of gratitude. For without her vision and energy and wisdom, the policy debate on Middle East issues would have languished and a lot of people would have gone unstimulated and unfed. [Barbi Weinberg is a major financial backer of pro-Israeli causes and the woman who provided the primary funding for Indyk's institute.] I came to Washington with some thoughts on how to put Barbi's vision of a Middle East think tank into practice. I never imagined that the institute would come to be such an important source of research, scholarship and policy advice for the government, the diplomatic community and the media. We were—and you still are—are engaged in a noble enterprise. [Actually Indyk came to Washington to do graduate study and work at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).] Barbi and I now pass the institute into the very capable hands of Mike Stein and Dennis Ross [head of the planning staff at the State Department in the Bush administration] and Rob Satloff and John Hannah and Carole Stern and all of you in the hope and belief that you will together take its activities to new heights of excellence, and yet retain that sense of mission that marks the Washington Institute apart as a very special place. My task is to try to lay out for you the Clinton administration's approach to the Middle East. Despite the dramatic developments in the global arena in the past four years, we still have an abiding interest in reciprocating the friendship of those in the Arab world who seek good relations with the United States. We still have an abiding interest in the security, survival and well-being of the state of Israel. Changes in policy [from the Reagan-Bush years] stem from the dramatic global and regional developments that are impacting on the region's political dynamics. The end of the Cold War has had profound consequences for the Middle East. The superpowers are no longer competing for influence in this volatile region and that means that the United States no longer needs to view the region through a competitive global prism. For the first time, we can judge developments there more in terms of how they impact on our regional rather than our global interests. For the first time since the 1950s, the US is the unchallenged dominant power in the region and all sides now look to Washington to exert its influence. However, the absence of superpower competition also brings in its wake less influence over the policies of regional powers, let alone over our Cold War European and Japanese allies. We are tasked with greater regional responsibilities and yet have less ability to fulfill them. With the proliferation of ballistic missiles, on the one hand, and the success in containing Iraq but fails to contain Iran, it will have United States no longer needs to view the region through a competitive contain Iraq and Iran. To the extent that the international community should be compelling for another reason as well. Iran does not yet face dramatic global and regional developments that are impacting on the all responsible members of the international community. This argument should be compelling for another reason as well. Iran does not yet face the kind of international regime that has been imposed on Iraq. A structural imbalance therefore exists between the measures available to contain Iraq and Iran. To the extent that the international community succeeds in containing Iraq but fails to contain Iran, it will have inadvertently allowed the balance of power in the Gulf to have tilted in favor of Iran, with very dangerous consequences. That imbalance therefore argues for a more energetic effort to contain Iran and modify its behavior even as we maintain the sanctions regime against Iraq. The president and the secretary of state made it clear that our approach to the [peace] negotiations will involve working with Israel, not against it. We are committed to deepening our strategic partnership with Israel in the pursuit of peace and security. Those who genuinely seek a comprehensive and lasting peace should recognize that this goal can be accomplished without Israel undertaking a withdrawal from territory, involving tangible risks to its security. And those who seek real progress should understand that it won't come without this kind of special relationship between the US and Israel.

20169. New American View. "Israel's Navel Academy", in New American View-Monitoring the Special Relationship Between the United States and Israel. Vol. 5(1). January 1, 1990. Cairo is considered the capital of the belly-dance, but surprisingly the art of la danse de ventre, as Napoleon's soldiers called it, is also taught in Israel. Drs. Leah and Benny Gavish, who were first exposed to belly-dancing while studying at the University of Illinois, conduct dance classes for "pimpilyteenagers, elegantblonde matrons and plump housewives." The Gavishes teach only women because they found that the men who attended their classes did not come to dance, but rather to see "the girls and get a free show." (JP.)

20170. OSS; Migration Project: M Project. Population Plan for Egypt. Memorandum Series M-173. District of Columbia: OSS, Migration Project (M Project); Library of Congress, January 2, 1945. During the past decade there has been a steadily increasing interest in the population problem and the accompanying social conditions. In the spring of 1937 the Egyptian Medical Association held a series of forums on the subject, and over the next two years the matter was considered top news by the local press. One hopeful development was the creation of the Ministry of Social Welfare in 8/1939, which was to be charged with all such questions. Although certain definite work was undertaken, the outbreak of war in September and the transfer of the Government's energies to problems of defense greatly hindered the new Ministry's growth. In 1949 the Royal Society of Political Economy appointed several Commissions to study postwar problems as related to Egypt, one being for social reconstruction. This Commission has been hard at work, the flow of events has intervened with its own type of solution through typhus and malaria epidemics and widespread destitution and malnutrition on a scale not experienced for many years past. The net effect of these conditions can not be measured accurately as the vital statistics have been scanty for the past three years. Five important conditions, specifically affecting population growth, are given: age distribution, health, natural resources, social standards and international relations. Cleland then outlines a population plan based on the increase and conservation of national wealth, emigration, reduction of births raising living standards, birth control and registrative legislation.

20171. Ode-Vasiliyeva, K. V.; Krachkovskiy, I. Yu. Obratpsy Novoarabskoy Literatury (1880-1925) (Specimens of New Arabic Literature). Leningrad: Leningrad Eastern Institute, 1928. The work is in two parts, part one containing the chrestomathy, and part two, which came out in 1929, comprising a dictionary. Krachkovskiy contributed a foreword to part one. It is reproduced in vol. 3, pp. 47-64 of his collected works. Krachkovskiy began by pointing out that whereas the differences between classical and modern Arabic were minor where grammar was concerned, in the case of style and vocabulary they were formidable. The chrestomathy covered the four decades from the 1880s, which was the beginning of the new period of Arabic literature, to the 1920s. It comprised forty writings by 21 authors in chronological order. The object was not only to acquaint the reader with the modern literary language of prose writers but also with the cultural and social life of the Arabs in the last fifty years. In particular it reflected the social and political life of Syria and Egypt in the given period, laying considerable emphasis on the movement for emancipation of women. Krachkovskiy describes the background and achievements of a number of the most eminent authors, among them are injections that this conclusion was confirmed that the material was confined to what was available in Leningrad. [From: "Part II: Arabs and the Arab World: Social Structure: 1917-1930", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. p. 17.]

20172. Ode-Vasiliyeva, k., "Otrazheniye Byta Sovremennoy Arabskoy Zhenschiny v. Novelle (The Life of the Modern Arab Woman as Reflected in Novels)", in Zapiski Kollegii Vostokovedov, 1930. pp. 293-306. The writer came from Palestine where she taught in the Russian Palestine Society prior to marrying a Russian and thus had first-hand experience of her subject. She says the question of the status of Arab women as a contributory cause of the backwardness of the Arabs was first raised in Syria in 1849 but had no impact on Arab life as it was put forward by Christians. The movement for emancipation of women was begun by the Egyptian writer, Qasim Amin. It developed in Syria where there was a women's society in most towns. In Palestine it made little progress but in Egypt the women had been able to take off the veil and some were taking part in public life. Emancipation of women was, however, a long way off. The low status of women was described in Egyptian literature and especially in the novels of Mahmud Timur. The question was of concern to all Arab countries. [From: "Part II: Arabs and the Arab World: Social Structure: 1917-1930", in A.R.C. Bolton, Soviet Middle East Studies: An Analysis and Bibliography. New York: June 1959. p. 18.]

20173. Omar Abdel Rahman, Sheikh. "Shaikh Omar, Undaunted, Condemns America's War on Islam", in Crescent International, February 1-15/1996, p. 6. In The Name of Allah The Most Beneficent, The Most Merciful. Grace be to Allah and blessings and peace be upon the Messenger of Allah, Allah, the Almighty, says: "Never will the Jews and the Christians be pleased with you (O Muhammad, peace and blessings be upon him) till you follow their religion" (2:120). And the Almighty says: "Neither those who disbelieve among the people of the scripture nor the mushrikun like that there should be sent down unto you any good from your Lord" (2:105). And He further says: "Many of the people of the scripture wish that if they could turn you away as disbelievers after you have believed, out of envy from their ownselves, even after the Truth (that Muhammad, peace and blessings be upon him, is Allah's Messenger) had become manifest unto them" (2:109). Allah also says: "And they will never cease fighting you until they turn you back from your religion (tawheed) if they can" (2:217). All four verses are from Surah Al-Baqarah. In another surah, the Almighty says: "They respect not, of all the land save the house of their own, and when the truth came to them from their own selves, they would have believed if it had been Allah's Will, but Allah willed to lead them astray, till He took from them their knowledge, and they believe not in Allah, nor of the Messenger, till He makes their hearts to be conformed to what they have written, till He makes manifest for them their hearts" (7:52). can it erase the Qur’an?

If America contemplates such a horrible deed, Allah will annihilate it and remove it from the face of the earth, just like He eliminated the Soviet Union, because Allah has guaranteed the continuance of His religion. He is the Guarantor in preserving His book. Allah, the Almighty, says: “Verily We: It is We who have sent down the dhikr (i.e., the Qur’an) and surely We will guard it (from corruption)” (15:9). Speaking in manly tone, the US government or its representatives in Germany maintain that Allah has左手 the Qur’an, and that this religion has a strong current just like high voltage electricity, jolting whoever comes close. What America has done in this case is put on trial what I said in sermons and religious teachings, which is all from the Book of Allah and the Sunnah (traditions and teachings) of His Messenger. America put on trial the Book of Allah and the religion of Islam, and thinks that the killing of Islam is easy, like it perpetrates the killings of people worldwide. Muslims and others are now aware that America wants to kill Islam and destroy the Qur’an because all that I have done is preach Islam. I have spoken with the Words of Allah, and I am spreading the religion of Islam. I have not done anything else nor did I commit any crime. You [the American government and prosecutors] have confessed that I have not committed any crime, and was not charged with doing anything. All the charges are directed against the words of Islam, and not against my words. If we imagine the war when Muslims are on the eastern bank of the River Jordan, and the Jews are on the western bank (as told in the hadith of the Prophet, peace be upon him), or as (former US presidents) Nixon and Reagan imagined the war which will take place in Armageddon (as written in the Bible) in which they claim that they will defeat the Muslims, then this is a war. But this case against me had solely the purpose of destroying the word of Islam itself, because that is the only factual truth that I have come to know. I have not done anything but taught Islam.

I have legally obtained an entry visa to the US, and later became a lawful permanent resident (green card holder), and then I entered and departed, came and went, and moved throughout the US east to west. If I had committed any crime, I would not have travelled the way I did, but actually I would have fled. Have you been sleeping? A clear sign of your sleep is that you did not arrest me despite my continuous movement. Indeed you are more deserving of being put on trial, and if you were alert and you did not arrest me, then either you are traitors or stupid. This is not the case, then I am innocent. Another pointer to the fact that the US government was more concerned with my words and not my actions, was their continued listening to my press conferences and tapes of my public sermons. Are all of these not my words? No matter how hard they try to manipulate and distort the facts about my words, it is clear that they are only dealing with words. After their attempts to distort the facts, and their lies and fabrications about Islam in many matters and their manipulation of the facts, they did not allow us, an Islamic scholar (as an expert witness) to attach that my words is but the words of Islam, the Qur’an and the noble Messenger, and what Allah has ordered. As if the US government prosecutor is knowledgeable about Islam, he appointed himself an expert in the religion of Islam despite his complete ignorance of it. I only teach Islam in schools, universities and mosques. It is my only profession. Then the prosecution distorted the facts, manipulated the intent of my words and barred the jury from listening and knowing about what Islam and Qur’an really are saying. The prosecution has no evidence to present against me. It is impossible that I can build a bomb, or put one anywhere. That is not my profession. That is not the profession of a Muslim preacher. I could do that neither physically nor by virtue of my position as a Muslim scholar. That confirms that the attack in this case was only on Islam. The whole focus, activity and concern in my life is teaching Islam. I tell people in schools and mosques what the Qur’an says. And I tell couples how to resolve their marital problems. I advise businessmen about valid and prohibited transactions in earnings and profits. All that I have done is teach Islam.

The telephone is my only window to the world, and I use it as an effective tool in the call to Islam. Despite the fact that the US government did not use my conversations as evidence for conspiracy (against the US), they falsely told the jurors that my telephone conversations were incriminating. They presented to the jurors the persons I spoke with and their telephone numbers, but they never produced the recordings of these conversations which they claim were incriminating. Where is the truth and honesty, O prosecutor? America worked tirelessly to weaken the Muslims in Bosnia by imposing the arms embargo. The white house and congress abused diplomacy in deciding whether to lift or enforce the embargo. Such actions made America a partner of the Serbs in killing hundreds of thousands of Muslims, and in raping women and annihilating children, supporting the Croats, and Russia is strengthening the Serbs. We see that everyone, led by America, has united to isolate and weaken the Muslims, and the whole plan is for destroying Muslims in the Balkans. Behold, the whole world, listen! Islam cannot be stopped with violence or warfare. Nor can it be stopped by spending millions of dollars spreading lies, deception, corruption, and with fabricated trials like this one. The honorable can never combat Islam in this manner. What are you afraid of? Who are you working for? Why don’t you listen to the truth? Whether America wills it or not, the future belongs to Islam. The Qur’an indeed proclaims it, and history provide proof. You fill find that anywhere you go: in Nigeria, India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, Egypt, the Middle East, the US, and even in America’s prisons, you know that you will not find good prison behavior comparable to that of Muslims prisoners. The US, with its power and influence, must not bruise itself in stopping these Islamic forces. Whatever it does towards that end will only harm America. It will only bring upon itself bankruptcy and destruction if it tries to stop Islam. =]

20174. Palmer, Monte; Leila, Ali: Yassin, El-Sayed: Al-Omran Center for Strategic & Political Studies. "Chapter 7: The Attributes of Bureaucratic Performance", in The Egyptian Bureaucracy. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1988. pp. 121-146. While the aggregate productivity of the bureaucracy is low, some units have high productivity: at Aluminum Corp. high productivity is correlated with better communication, better match between skills and jobs, or rural origin, were more willing to remain at the rural location of the plant for higher wages, and had higher morale; one major part of job satisfaction at the firm was the belief that promotions were made on the basis of merit and were fair. Despite supervisor beliefs that low productivity is mainly a product of low skill levels among workers, additional training and education is not sufficient to raise productivity (notably, lowest productivity bureaucrats are also the less amenable to retraining). The entry of significant numbers of women into the bureaucracy since the mid-1970s has had no significant impact on the character of the bureaucracy.

Population:1962...estimated 27 million. 1977...estimated 38 million. 1982...estimated 43 million. 38% live in urban settings; 62% in rural areas. 99% live in the Nile Valley, the Delta and along the Suez Canal (3.5% of the total land). With 6000 people per square mile, Egypt is one of the most densely populated areas in the world.

Women’s Lives: The vast majority of Egyptian women are poor and illiterate. 46.7% of employed women are married compared to 78.2% of women working at home. Only 11% of women over 16 have never been married. In the urban centers, the divorce rate is 2% compared to 1.2% in the rural areas. 1923 the Women’s Federation was founded by Hoda Shaarawi. 1956 women gained the right to vote. 1962 first women cabinet minister.

Religion: Principal Religion: Islam, 92% of the people are Sunni Muslims. There are also about 7 million Coptic Christians.

Languages: Arabic is the principle language. The influence of the Egyptian Arabic (in film, radio, etc.) goes beyond the national borders.

Economy and Work Situation: GNP per capita $280. Main agricultural products: cotton, wheat, rice, sugar cane and corn. Main industries: Textiles and processing of food products. Egypt has become heavily dependent on financial assistance from abroad. In 1977, of the total employable work force, 50.6% of the men and 7.4% of the women were employed. Female participation in non-agricultural job categories: Professional...22.6%, White Collar...4.5%, Sales...5.5%, Manual Labor...3%, Service (including domestic)...16%; Industries: Extractive...0.3%, Manufacturing...3.3%, Construction...0.3%, Electricity and Gas...0.7%, Commerce...15.9%, Transport...0.9%, Public and Administration...7.3%. Most women living in the countryside work in agriculture, textiles, and other fields, but do not receive any income for their work. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30].
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Egypt

Perhaps the heartbeat suggested the first musical instrument, the drum. And perhaps the natural movements of a body needing to stretch evolved into dance. Today in many cultures, dance is entertainment. One watches dance, or one dances at a social function or on stage. There are also cultures living close to the harmony of the earth, to the natural cycles of the moon, the sowing, the harvest, where dance is an expression of the continuity of life, of the relationship between the people with their environment. It is, in its essence, a ritualistic expression.

Middle Eastern or Oriental Dance, commonly referred to as Belly Dance exists today, often misunderstood and ridiculed. Its roots and functions in traditional society are generally unknown. Nahed Sabry, an Egyptian dancer explains in an interview in Habibi, "The correct name is Raqs al Sharqi, (Eastern Dance) not Belly Dance. This misnomer is used by foreigners who are preoccupied by the stomach muscles to the exclusion of the hips."

Raqs al Sharqi is centered in the belly. Physical life begins there; energy is drawn into the body at this spot. The dance requires a knowledge and awareness of the different muscles of the body, and a strength and agility to isolate them. Body movement is constant and concentrated, occupying a small surface counterpointed by balance and fluidity to the motion. The movements echo the many rhythms of the music which vary in tempo, ranging from slow to fast with light or heavy drumbeats.

Figure eights, circular movements, and shimmies accentuate the hips and pelvis. The arm movements are sinuous and snake-like. The torso stretches and writhes like a serpent, highlighted by the belly rolls which undulate like waves or by stomach palpitations which flutter incessantly. The hands gesture gracefully, miming offerings, greetings, in the cities, most of the professional dancing is still performed in cabarets and cafes were opened to entertain the invading imperialists. As economic exploitation increased, more people flocked to the urban areas seeking employment. For many women, prostitution and/or dancing were the only options. Armen Ohanian, a famous Armenian dancer in the late 19th and early 20th centuries in her book The Dancer of Shamakha, describes her horror upon observing the dance in a cabaret.

"Thus in Cairo one evening I saw with sick, incredulous eyes, one of our most sacred dances degraded to bestiality horrible and revolting. It is our poem to motherhood, which all true Asiatic men watch with reverence and humility in the faraway corners of Asia where the destructive Occident has not yet penetrated. In this olden Asia which has kept the dance in its primitive purity, it represents maternity, the mysterious conception of life, the suffering and the joy with which a new soul is brought into the world."

Raqs al Sharqi is still practiced throughout the Middle East. The folk dancing of the peasants of North Africa, Egypt, and Turkey, in particular, contain many of the elements of the dance. Folk troupes are present in many of the countries. The dance is integral to life in the villages and entertainment in the cities.

United States dancer Donna Whitely in Habibi describes her impressions of the dance in Egypt: "The village dance is a celebration of life, a time to acknowledge your place in the community. Each dancer was different, based on her own interpretation. The foundation of her dance was what her mother taught her and what her mother's mother taught her, and so on. In one village, there might be lots of abdominal movements, in another there might be lots of shimmies, swinging and undulations. The dance is done with dignity as an expression of sensuality, not as a tasteless sexual invitation." In many villages, the women only dance for each other.

In the cities, most of the professional dancing is still performed in cabarets where a good dancer is highly respected for performing her art. It is difficult to transcend the conservative attitudes of one's family towards dancing in public. Maya Medwar, a well-known Egyptian dancer and actress talks about her experience in an interview in Habibi. "There was a fellow that sings. He wanted me to go with him to Lebanon to dance while he is singing. I wrote to my brother to tell him and my brother said, "Before you come I'll destroy the theater. Do you want to put us in disgrace? How would I feel when some guy says I saw your sister shaking her hips?" Nahed Sabry comments: "My family objected to the extent that when I would come home late they wouldn't speak to me."

Maya and Nahed acknowledge that much of the negative attitude is due to the independence a woman exercises in choosing an alternative to wife and mother. Ultimately, Raqs al Sharqi is a dance of the power of women, and the dancer celebrates herself.

20177. Peoples Translation Service [Trans]. “Raqs al Sharqi: A Woman’s Dance: Background”, in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 4, April 1, 1982. p. 21. Archeological evidence suggests that Raqs al Sharqi originated as a sacred dance to worship the Goddess, who for thousands of years was considered the supreme deity with other gods and goddesses occupying minor roles. All art forms were the manifestations of religious expression. song and dance, painting and sculpture were forms of magic ritual with themes of fertility: a plentiful harvest, a celebration of births, a grieving of deaths, and a promise for reincarnation.

Statues and Egyptian tomb paintings capture the images of the dance. In many of the paintings, the dancers are finger-snaping or holding cymbals, ritualistic instruments that honor the goddess. The word cymbal comes from the Goddess Cybele. [Reprinted with permission of People’s Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]

20178. Peoples Translation Service [Trans]. Interview: “Celluloid Politics; Interview with Egyptian Filmmaker Atiat El Abnoudi About International Feminist Film and Video Conference and Her Work”, in Connexions. Women Organizing Against Violence. An International Women's Quarterly, n. 4, April 1, 1982. pp. 11-13. [From 5/25-31/81, the first International Feminist Film and Video Conference was held in Amsterdam. The conference was organized by a Dutch feminist film group called Cinemien and financially sponsored by the Dutch government. Two hundred women from 32 countries, all involved in filmmaking and video, came to Amsterdam to exchange ideas and information.

The following interview with Atiat El Abnoudi, an Egyptian filmmaker, was conducted in Cairo on 8/6/81. The women who worked on this issue had several discussions about some of the opinions expressed in this interview. We include this conversation with Atiat El Abnoudi as a contribution to the dialogue among feminists internationally. Special thanks to Diane Belle James for conducting the interview.] Q: What happened at the conference in Amsterdam? A: We talked about a lot of things, what we do, what are problems are. It was very interesting. Before the conference I received, from my point of view, a one-sided paper on feminist problems and women filmmakers making films for and about women. So I was very happy to attend the conference just to mention a different point of view. We third world women have other problems. We don't think we can separate ourselves from men's struggles, because both men and women are oppressed. How can we talk about women's liberation apart from national liberation? Q: Do you think the women there were closed to that point of view? A: Yes. Western European women, and Americans, Australians and Canadians, have a certain standard of living, a certain kind of infrastructure that helps them to get employment. They have the right to work. Their struggle is over how much they should get paid; here we are at the stage of getting the right to work. In my country, if a woman works she gets the same wage as a man. So it's different.

Western women talk about sexual liberation. Here we have sexual oppression. We can't walk in the street with a man without society talking about us. We have to be married; men in our country have the right to marry four women.

Q: It's not very prevalent though, is it? A: But he has the right. His economic situation might prevent him, because he has to support all of them, but by law he has the right.

Q: Did you discuss such things at that conference? A: This conference was for women filmmakers, so it dealt with a very specific subject. We did not discuss the whole women's issue. We talked about filmmaking and doing things with film and video. We realized that we are privileged, because in our countries not many women have the same kind of education. So what are we going to do with this privilege? I am a filmmaker. What kind of films am I going to make? If I am privileged and the whole society paid for me to be educated in England and in the film school here at the University of Cairo, and I have a law degree and so forth, I can't say that I'm just going to work for women because I am a woman. You see what I mean?

Q: Did you find that women from other third world countries shared the same problems? A: I think so. At the end of the conference we made a statement. We were obliged to because of all the things that went on around us. We found a lot of people didn't understand how we can talk about society or national liberation movements and not talk about feminist problems. We said we are not against talking about feminism or feminist films, but we want to express the other point of view. We want to inform you of what is going on in our countries.

At the conference some journalists asked a very racist question: “Did you get something out of this conference?” So I said, “Why do you ask me the question in that way? Why don't you ask me how much the conference benefited from me?” You know they always think about third world people as underdeveloped and coming to Europe to get something. Why don't they think I can contribute to the conference? It's good for other women at the conference to see us, to talk with us, and at least to think that there are other women in the world that have different problems and are militant and fighting.

So we made a declaration, supported by the whole conference, and I think we put in it everything we wanted to say. (See declaration at end of article.) For me it was like the manifesto I've been working on all my life. I've been working on films now for ten years and this is my statement too. Q: Did you show any of your films at the conference? A: They showed two of my films, the first one I made, Mud Horse, and my most recent film, Seas of Thirst, which is about a small fishing village in the delta, in the far north, surrounded by the Mediterranean Sea and the Borolos Lake. Although the village is surrounded by water, the people there don't have fresh water. They have to travel 12 kilometers to get it. The whole village works. They fish, then give their catch to the merchants who sit there and do nothing but take the fish and give them money, loans and things like that. The very old play of capital and workers. In the village, everyone on shore is also exploited. The children work; the old women knit the nets; the whole village works all the time. Yet they don't have the essential necessities, such as fresh water, that any animal must have to live. They are constantly looking for water.

Looking for water, the women walk along the shore of the sea until they come to a low point between the hills where the rain water has been caught and is less salty. Because they are poor women they can't afford to send a car to the nearest town for water. As a woman in the film said to me, “Every day I need six containers of water. A container [20 liters] is 15 piasters. So how much will I pay daily? If I want to wash and cook and drink and have a bath or anything, how much will I have per day, and how much can I afford to pay from my very limited salary, because I am the wife of a teacher [a teacher's monthly base pay is about US $40] and I have four children.” Q: You also went to Munich recently? A: My visit to Munich was for work. I'm working with Pierre Hoffman, a West German producer. He's a man, but has a very good idea of making eight 30-minute films under the title As Women See It, by women filmmakers in eight different countries. I'm making the film for Egypt. There's another one being made in Senegal, one in Nicaragua, Peru, India, France, West Germany, Italy and possibly Poland. They've already started some of the films. They've finished shooting in Senegal, and they've finished editing in Peru. As the artistic supervisor of this project, I'm going to Nicaragua next month to supervise the shooting. Later I'm going to India to supervise the shooting there. Every filmmaker will choose her own subject and use her own people. The director, the crew, everyone will be local. That's what I like about this project.

The project is being financed by money from a variety of sources, such as the Dutch government, the West German Ministry of Education, the World Council of Churches. Some countries will finance their own film and will receive the entire program of eight in exchange. We may make a two-hour version of the eight films for theatrical distribution.

Q: They would have to be cut a lot for that.
A: Yes, but the eight-film program serves some purposes and the two-hour version serves others. I think it will be very interesting. I am excited about the project. But you know when Pierre Hoffman showed up at the conference, he was refused by the European women. I can't understand why these women don't like to work with men.

I can work with men and women. I don't really like this dishwasher machine level of struggle. Who is going to wash the dishes or who is going to take care of the children? That has nothing to do with liberation. If I have a well-off husband, he will buy me a dishwasher. So what else will I ask of him? Okay, so he tells me, don't wash, don't take care of the children; I will get you a baby sitter and a dishwasher. Liberation is something else. It's the conception of being a slave for a man, not who will bring up the children or wash the dishes.

Q: But the example of the woman with the rich husband doesn't work for all women.
A: I mean we are not sisters. We have conflict among each other. It's a class question. Maybe it's a naive point of view but I'll tell you anyway. When Marx wrote his book, there was another Marx on the other side who also wrote his book to fight the Marxist book. If you have a theory, someone else is going to make an anti-theory. So the capitalist made his book to fight the Marx book, which said the working class will make their revolution if they have solidarity. So the capitalist said okay, no solidarity. We will give them what they want. We will make them bourgeois. So the capitalists gave them a car, a house. In many countries, the working class has been split apart and now they are fighting for better cars and better houses, better education, and things like that.

Because a woman--in every society, in every class--is the most important and most oppressed person in the family, she has the most potential to be revolutionary. So I think this movement, coming from the old European society giving them these: you want a liberation movement, okay; solidarity with women: okay. Have your cafes and clubs and parties and be separated from your society. They encourage them to do that. Again they are splitting society, the way they split the working class. It means isolation. And it's not par hasard (by chance).

Q: How do you support your film work?
A: I got back from studying film work in England in 1976. I didn't get any work until 1978. Then the Egyptian Catholic Association [Coptic] asked me to make a documentary about their work in upper Egypt. The result was Move Into Depth. In this film I tried to accentuate the social conditions of the people and to show why the ECA concentrates their work in upper Egypt. The title comes from the Bible when Peter met Christ and he said to him, "I spent all night at the sea and didn't catch any fish." So Christ said, "Move into depth." It was a symbol of their work in the depth of Egypt to try and fish the real Egyptian person, and to help people to be themselves.

I finished that film in 1980. Meanwhile, the Catholic Relief Service, an American organization that has been working in Egypt some 25 years, wanted me to make a film about their projects. I spent two years going around the country looking at what they were doing and I was really trying to figure out what I could do because I don't make propaganda films. They were really good people and they understood my problem. Finally, I had the courage to say that I was going to make a film that could help the Catholic Relief Service. So I made a film of this village with no fresh water called Seas of Thirst.

Q: Has the film been shown yet in Cairo?
A: Yes, but I must explain. When you are making films in a third world country, there are many things to avoid to be able to show your work. I wanted to show the film before declaring to the censor that the film had been made, because I didn't know what the censor would do.

The Catholic Relief Service organized the opening at the American University and the invited the American ambassador and his wife, and so on. I had three showings at the American University without going through the censor. After that, I went to the censor and told them the film was an American production, so they passed it.

But if you want to participate in an international film festival, you have to go through the festival committee. They refused me. So, I said, okay, you refused this film as a representative of the official Egyptian cinema, but I am a private producer. So what are you going to do with me? It's a very delicate situation.

Q: But aren't they asking for a shortened version of the film for television?
A: Not here, abroad. Egyptian television had never shown any of my films until last year when Mud Horse was aired. Maybe in another ten years they will show Seas of Thirst.

"The Establishment of a New School To Educate Husbands on How To Share Housework" was the title of a report which appeared in the Egyptian newspaper, Al-Aharam, ten days after International Women's Day. The report explained, "Male and female characteristics are not stamped into us from birth as people are wont to think, but, in fact, they are a product of society. Society is what creates the individual and fashions him [sic] as male or female. In other words, this is a process of education and no more."

Relying on research in the field of social sciences and anthropology, the expert for sociology, Samia A-Sa'ti, claims that the social behavior of men and women is the result of social conditioning which penetrates into the realms of the family and dictates different behaviors to the male and female members of the family.

These things are not new. What is new, however is that the government of Egypt was willing to agree to the establishment of an experimental school which includes primary and intermediate grades in Medina-Nasser, near Cairo, in order to try to educate boys and girls in a more egalitarian way. Amedy Al-Kasas, principal of the school, said, "It is not fair that the woman should work exactly like the man, while at the same time fulfilling all of her duties as a housewife--cleaning, washing, doing laundry and cooking. Why doesn't the husband take part in these difficult duties just as she takes part in bringing in income?"

In order for the husband to take part in housework, adds Al-Kasas, "There is no choice but to teach boys how to do such work." The experimental school teaches all of its male and female students, side by side with their conventional academic studies, to cook, wash floors, do laundry, use household tools and appliances, and so on. All of these activities are considered basic learning subjects which students are tested on. Their grade in this test is written onto the report card next to the rest of their grades. This year, the first class of students will graduate from the school. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.]
We were unable to meet with the Chairwoman of the Iraqi Women's Federation, Manal Younis, as at the time she was on a ship bound for Iraq with a cargo of medicines and milk. (Since UN sanctions against Iraq were imposed, over 4300 people have died in Iraq from lack of medicines.) The ship, however, did not reach its destination, as it was tear-gassed by American and other naval forces guarding the Red Sea. Two women were critically injured. When we left Baghdad, there was no further news of what happened to those on board, except that the ship had been forced to unload its cargo at the port of Kabbous, Oman. We sent a message of solidarity to the 250 women on board the ship, who had come from different parts of the world including the Arab Region.

Aims and Objectives: The objectives of the Peace mission were: 1) A plea for negotiations without preconditions since preconditions would only be an obstacle in the face of such negotiations. 2) To arrive at an Arab settlement of the conflict under the auspices of the UN. 3) Immediate simultaneous withdrawal of all troops (foreign multinational and Iraqi) and their replacement by Arab and UN troops under the supervision of the UN. 4) The convening of an International Conference to deal with the conflict between Iraq and Kuwait as well as other conflicts in the Middle East, in particular the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the conflicts over oil.

On 1/10/1991, our Delegation organized a press conference and held a demonstration in front of the American Embassy in Baghdad to protest against the dispatching of American military forces to the region. We handed in a letter of protest which insisted that the principles of the UN, including the solving of all conflicts by negotiations and peaceful means, should be upheld everywhere and at all times.

No conflict can really be resolved as long as these double standards prevail. We made it clear that in our views, the Western capitalist countries and their allies are not so much concerned over the "liberation of Kuwait" as they are over maintaining their monopoly over the oil and money of the Arab Gulf countries. We also published a joint declaration with the Iraqi Women's Federation which upheld similar ideas.

Before leaving, we paid a visit to the Volunteers in the Peace Camp. A large number of men and women had come to Iraq from all over the world to build a "human wall" between the armies on the Iraqi-Saudi border. Among them were women between 70 and 80 years of age, some of them using crutches.

After our visit to Baghdad, the Women's International Peace Delegation had been planning to visit the US to meet with Bush, but this was postponed when the attack on Iraq began on 1/16/1991.

Since then, in Amman, Turkey, the US and other countries, we have continued to organise various actions for peace and send appeals for a stop to the war. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [s]

The woman, who was subsequently executed, amazed me by her strength of character." Saadawi says. The woman came to Cairo from her village with her uncle and was married off to an older man who ill-treated her. She ran away but was unable to find a job to support herself and so turned to prostitution. Her life was made a misery by the pimp who controlled her and whom she eventually killed without remorse. [The Middle East Magazine, a monthly English publication, 1/1984, No. 111]

This book, written 11 years ago in Arabic for an Arab audience, was published in Beirut in 1978. It was immediately banned in several Middle Eastern countries, including Egypt, the author's country of birth.

On the face of it, it tells the story of a prostitute who was condemned to death for killing her pimp. It is a true story, or at least was... inspired by an even that actually took place: Firdaus, the prostitute, really existed and was executed in 1974. The book tackles an issue that has become important in the Western Women's Movement only in the past three or four years—one which is only now being seen as part and parcel of every woman's struggle: who and what is a prostitute?

For Nawal El Saadawi, speaking through Firdaus, the answer is clear: "I now know that all of us were prostitutes who sold themselves at varying prices, and that an expensive prostitute was better than a cheap one." And again: "Men force women to sell their body at a price, and the lowest paid body is that of a wife."

Behind the story lies a major radical and feminist analysis of women's oppression, not only in the Arab world or the Third World, but the world over. [Liliane, Outwrite, English Feminist Monthly, 2/1984.]

Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [x]

[Excerpted from a Connexions interview with Nadia Hijab 8/1988.]

As a first step in the discussion of women and religion, I think it is very important to distinguish between what is religion and what is religious custom or tradition. I'll take the example of female circumcision, because I couldn't help noticing that an article in Connexions n. 25 (The Politics of Health) says that Islam advocate female circumcision. That is actually just not true. Islam the religion--if you look at the Koran, the Word of God that Muslims follow, the sayings of the prophets, and all the ways of the life of the Muslims of the early days--does not advocate female circumcision. Interestingly enough, the misconception that it does is as prevalent among people in the region as it is among people in the West. And part of the fight to end circumcision involves pointing out to people the difference between what they think is attributable to religion and what is in fact religion. There are family planning groups in Egypt, for example, who are very aware of this distinction. They go around to the villages to talk with women and to point out the harmful effects of circumcision. They take with them social workers, doctors or medical personnel, and religious scholars, whose view has weight with the people. They point out that circumcision has nothing to do with Islam, that medically it's very harmful and so on, and that's where you begin to eradicate the practice at the grass-roots level. Another stereotype about Islam and women that's more complicated than it seems is the wearing of the veil. This is an issue that has a lot of visibility in the West. Women who don't wear veils don't get covered, excuse the pun, but actually I think it's a minority of women in the Arab world who wear Islamic dress now. Of course quite a number of women from the rural areas like to cover their hair with a scarf, simply because they feel better that way, they feel it's more respectable. But the women turning to the veil as symbolic of an Islamic revolution are still a minority. What often annoys Arab women is that wearing Western dress should be taken as a symbol of modernity. Why can't people dress as they like? But of course the use of the veil as a part of the Islamic revolution makes a statement not just about clothes but about women's position in society. The situation is that some women have been forced, whether they like it or not, to behave and to dress in a certain way. On the otherhand, some women turn to the veil (by this I mean the actual Islamic headdress) because they want to be able to go out into the society and work, and because it's fairly new that men and women work together outside the home; people are not used to this. Women find that if they wear respectable Islamic dress people won't look at them as sexual objects or as women, they'll just look at them as workers or as students. In this sense, ironically, Islamic dress has a liberating impact for them rather than a restrictive impact. And some women do turn to Islamic dress as part of the revolution against the West. They say to themselves "If the West thinks that our identity and our religious attitudes are not for them, that's tough. I'm going to turn to my own religion, to Islam, to define my identity." This gesture is tied to the belief that people in the region are still dominated and exploited by the West both economically and politically. It's a complex phenomenon. But the veil isn't necessarily imposed on women. In many cases, women take an active part in it themselves as a form of personal expression.

Also, in looking at the issue of religion and women in the Arab world, it's important to understand how Arab family law works. Throughout the Arab world, family law is based on Islamic law; Arab countries draw their civil codes from the sharia (canon law). There are 21 Arab states, and there are 22 members of the Arab League, which includes Palestine. In each of those states, there is a different system of law, yet all of those states claim that their family law is drawn from Islamic sharia, even if their other laws, like the commercial code or criminal code, have broken with it. Some of those countries, like Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, do not have a civil family law; the courts simply apply the Islamic sharia directly. Other countries like Egypt, have adopted a civil code based on sharia.

What I find fascinating is that although all the laws have this common base, there are significant differences between them. Tunisia, for example, has a very liberal family law based on sharia; it bans polygamy altogether because of the way it interprets the Koran. Although the Koran says that a man is allowed to marry one, two, three, or four wives if he can treat them equally, and thus interpret this passage to mean that polygamy is banned. Other Arab countries have interpreted it to mean that polygamy should be severely restricted, and in some Arab countries there are no restrictions at all.

There are other large differences as well. In Tunisia, men and women have equal rights when it comes to opting for divorce. But in other Arab countries, while a man can get a divorce at any time very easily, a woman has to petition for divorce on traditional grounds. If her husband doesn't maintain her, if there are no sexual relations between them for three months, or if he treats her harmfully, she has a right to petition for divorce. Whether she gets a divorce or not depends on the judge and how liberal or conservative he is.

The debate on women's rights in the Arab world is conducted within a religious framework; in fact, the main opportunity for the Arab world to debate the role of religion in society comes in the form of this debate on women's rights. For example, people say that women should have full and equal rights under the law based on the Koran, or they argue that religion should apply to the people themselves and not be state law. The role of religion in society in Western countries is based on the concept of a separation between church and state, but in the Arab world, it really hasn't been worked out in that way yet. It's quite an active and fascinating debate.

In some cases family law is being reformed for the wrong reasons—the reform hasn't developed from within the society but has been imposed from above, as in the case of Tunisia. There is a very strong Islamic backlash in Tunisia, and some women are worried that it may lead to a reversal of that progressive code. And even in the Tunisian laws, there are still two areas in which women are not completely equal. The man is still the legal head of the family, and inheritance proceeds exactly as it is defined in the Koran. That is, the man gets twice the share a woman does, which up to a certain point is fair—to the extent that he has to earn most of the income.

Family law reform was also partly imposed from above in Egypt. There wasn't an Egyptian family law until 1979; before that, there were certain laws on the family which had been improved in the 1920s because of lobbying by the early women feminists, and these laws had stayed the same until 79. At that time, largely as a result of initiatives by Gehan Sadat (wife of the late Anwar Sadat), a law was passed which improved the situation of women somewhat, but was nowhere near as progressive as Tunisian law. And although Sadat was a very unpopular president, even among secularists and leftists, feminists couldn't help but feel that there were improvements. For example, a husband's taking a second wife became automatic grounds for a divorce, whereas previously a judge would have decided whether it gave grounds for divorce or not. And the husband was required to inform both the first and the second wife that he was taking a second wife. But more importantly, the woman was entitled to be housed as long as she was bringing up the children, and because Egypt has severe overcrowding problems, especially in Cairo, this was a significant improvement.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

