Women in the Middle East and North Africa
A Bibliography

2007

James Joseph Sanchez, PhD, MLS
compiler

Middle East Abstracts & Index Vol. 20E(ii)
A Reprint of the edition of 1997

Reference Corporation
Seattle, Washington
www.ReferenceCorp.net
Table of Contents

Volume 20E(i)

Table of Contents ................................. i
List of Figures ................................ ii
Bibliographic Essay .............................. iii

Accession Numbers

General Middle East and North Africa 10000 1
Afghanistan 12000 40
Algeria 14000 126
Bahrain 16000 168
Cyprus 18000 184
Egypt 20000 195
Iran 22000 297
Iraq 24000 380
Jordan 26000 502
Kuwait 28000 530
Lebanon 30000 544
Libya 32000 590
Morocco 34000 597
Oman 36000 616
Qatar 38000 626
Saudi Arabia 40000 629
Syria 42000 657
Tunisia 44000 681
Turkey 46000 688
UAE 48000 730
Yemen 50000 736

Volume 20E(ii)

Table of Contents ................................. i
List of Figures ................................ ii
Israel-Palestine ................................. 60000 1

Author Index ................................... 594
Subject-Corporate-Named Persons Index ........ 599
List of Figures in Vol. 20E(i-ii)

[Figures are numbered by the record that presents the numerical data used in that figure.]

Volume 20E(i)

Figure 20113. Percentage of Women Elected to the Egyptian Parliament.
Figure 22032. Numbers of Guerrillas Who Died in the Struggle Before the Iranian Revolution (1963-1977): Islamic Groups.
Figure 22037. Percentage Literacy Rate Among Iranian Women, 1977 (estimated).
Figure 46033. Percentage of Women Students in Turkish Universities, 1927-1983.
Figure 46034. Percentage of Female Turkish Civil Servants, 1938-1982.
Figure 46035. Percentage of Female Faculty Staff in Turkish Universities, 1932-1983.

Volume 20E(ii)

Figure 60032-A. Percentage of Children Among Extrajudicial Killings of Palestinians Under Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir (August 1992-January 1993).
Figure 60032-B. Percentage of Children Among Extrajudicial Killings of Palestinians Under Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (August 1992-January 1993).
Figure 60054. Palestinian Marriages That Ended in Divorce Among Couples Married at Ages 15-20 As a Percentage of All Divorces.
Figure 60115. Comparison of Average Monthly Incomes of Israeli Men and Women in 1996.
Figure 60388. Jewish Immigration to Palestine, 1931-1940.
Figure 60408. Gaza Strip Intifadah Casualties in 9-10/1988 (Not Including Tear Gas Injuries).
Figure 60493. Percentage of the 80000 Palestinian Children Jailed in the Gaza Strip Reported by the International Red Cross Committee in Gaza To Have Been 'Systematically Tortured'.
Figure 60560. Percentage of Higher Civil Service Positions Held by Women in Israel (c. 1990).
Figure 60564. Composition of Military Occupational Specialties to Which Women Are Assigned in the Israeli Army (1977-1978 data).
Figure 60674. Ethnic Composition of Hebron (c. 1995).
Figure 60712. Comparison of the Percentage of Women in the Palestinian Electorate With the Percentage of Women As Candidates.
Figure 61021. Percentages of Palestinian Refugee Girls Attending School (7/1980).
Israel-Palestine

60000. -------. "Inhuman and Unacceptable", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 23, 1995, p. 4. While attention was centered on the 5400 Palestinian prisoners who cannot fathom why they have to remain behind bars while the Palestinian National Authority and Israel are talking peace, other Palestinians who appear to be free are hostages to a process of slow torture at Israeli governmental offices, whether renewing identification cards and travel documents, applying for permits for summer visitors or going about the routine business of registering births and deaths. The suffering of the Palestinian applicants at the East Jerusalem branch of the Israeli Ministry of Interior has been one of the most talked about issues for the past two years. You would not treat a mangy dog the way the applicants have been treated at this station. With the onset of summer, the number of cases of people - men, women, children and senior citizens - waiting to enter the building who have lost consciousness, suffered sunstroke, and collapsed from mere exhaustion has skyrocketed. Very few of those who line up in the wee hours of dawn, some as early as midnight and a desperate few the afternoon before, ever get in on the day of their choice. This week, following a visit to this branch on 6/21/1995, Israeli Interior Minister David Liba's reaction no differently from everyone else when he saw for himself the wearied mass of humanity pressed against one another, jostling and wrangling to get in. Horrified - he called the situation "inhuman and unacceptable" - he made the sensible move to close down the East Jerusalem branch of his ministry until arrangements are made for what we hope will be efficient and dignified service. We would like to see how serious he is about solving it. For his is not the first such attempt. Whatever attempts his predecessors, Arieh Der'i and Uzi Baram, made they were half-hearted. A branch opened recently in Beit Hanina was shut down even before it got started and when the employees at the main branch went on strike because they were overwhelmed with work, no solution was found to their dilemma.

Inquiring into the reasons for the growing mass of people outside the office, one realizes that there is more to it than a case of work overload. A new category of people have joined the line. They are Palestinians married to a West Banker who wish to have their children registered. What these people reflect is the effects of the closure of Jerusalem. Needless to say, the ministry is slow reviewing these files if and when the applicants get through. What continues to amaze us is that the Israeli officials are willing to accord themselves very little dignity. Despite what they see in day in day out, they never appear to have said to themselves that this miserable picture ought to shame them. Instead, they recently took measures that give indignity a new name when they added a cage to the entrance of the building to contain the crowd, and gave instructions that parents were to leave their children outside. A picture published in the Arabic daily Al-Quds on 6/19/1995 shows the squarer in which children have to be "deposited." The paper presented it as a present to Liba. It should keep his conscience alive. [↩]

60001. -------. "Renaissance' Report Sparking a Debate; Orthodox Said to Drive Israelis From Religion", in Forward (New York), November 22, 1996, p. 2. A report presented at the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Seattle, written by Elan Ezrachi, blames the Orthodox for driving Jews from Judaism in Israel, and blames Conservative and Reform for their 'tactical failures' (that is, the 'liberal synagouge'). The study comes as the Knesset is considering a bill to delegitimize non-Orthodox conversion: Netanyahhu spoke on the question but many at the conference concluded that he ducked the issue. The report was financed by the Doron Foundation and Nathan Cummings Foundation. Rabbi Rachel Cowan, the director of Jewish Life Program at the Nathan Cummings Foundation, argues that successful re-Judaization programming in Israel could be used on American Jews. [TXT]

60002. -------. "10-Point Program Supported by People in Different Countries: Signature Campaign Supporting 10-Point Program Developed", in Peoples Korea, September 17, 1994, p. 4. Yasser Arafat, President of the State of Palestine, signed the signature paper on 8/25/94 supporting the "10-Point Program of the Great Unity of the Whole Nation for the Reunification of the Country." The signature paper says, "We express support to the Korean people's struggle to achieve the country's reunification by confederation for the "10-Point Program of the Great Unity of the Whole Nation for the Reunification of the Country." A signature paper was signed in Italy by Roberto Gabriele, general secretary of the C.C., the Movement for Peace and Socialism, Paolo Pioppi, secretary general of the Italian Committee for the Reunification and Peace of Korea and the director and the senior editor of Radio Chita Aperta of Italy on 8/17/94 on behalf of members of their organizations. Signing the signature paper, they expressed the belief that Korea's reunification would be realized in line with the 10-point program of the great unity of the whole nation under the wise leadership of Comrade Kim Jong II and evinced his determination to invigorate the solidary movement for supporting the program in the future. In Portugal, the mayor of Santiao Duca and deputy mayors of the city and the chairman, vice-chairmen and officials of Ajuda district, Lisbon, signed a signature paper. By the end of 8/94 more than 1.1542 million people of the broad segments had signed the paper in the country. The signers expressed full support for the 10-point program and demanded the south Korean authorities immediately remove the concrete wall, a symbol of division and confrontation. MP Adolphe Nahayo, chairman of the Burundi National Olympic Committee, signed a signature paper on 8/24/94 and said that Korea is sure to be reunified as there is His Excellency Kim Jong II, and the 10-point program of he great unity of the whole Korean nation, a program of reunification. In Yugoslavia, a signature paper was signed on 8/4/94 by General Secretary of the New Yugoslav Communist Movement Branko Kitanovic, Chairman of the Servian Writers Union Yovan Stula, reserve Colonel Nikola Kovic and poet Stevo Vasiljevic. The paper expresses support to the 10-point program on achieving the great unity of the whole nation and founding a neutral, nonaligned and confederal state, which indicates a short cut to the reunification of Korea. In Ghana, a signature paper was signed in 7/94 by the governor of Suhum County, central region and members of the County Assembly, the governor and a patriarch of Zashikian County, Volta region, about 30 members of the Acra city branch of the Committee for Defense of the Revolution of Ghana, the secretary general of the Koforidua City Moslem Youth Organization, central region, the chairperson of the Christian Women's Council, officials of the Mobilization Planning Department and the Educational Department of Accra city, and members of the Suhum and Accra branches of the Ghana-DPRK Friendship Association on behalf of their organizations. In Nepal, a signature paper was signed by Kharendra Prasai, secretary general of the Jhapa, Nepal, Committee for Supporting Korea's Reunification, Tulsi Ram Dukhwar, chairman of the Revolutionary Youth Union of Nepal, Chandra Bahadur Ulak, chairman of the International Foreign Languages Association of Nepal, Ashaga G. Basukola, chairman of the Phaktapur, Nepal, Society for Korean Studies, Dev Narayan, chairman of the Saptary, Nepal, Committee for Supporting Korea's Reunification, Sureya Lai, chairman of the Peace Action Committee of Nepal, and Surendra Aryal, chairman of the Biratnagar, Nepal, Committee of Journalists for Supporting Korea's Reunification. Moreover, a signature campaign supporting the "10-Point Program of the Great Unity of the Whole Nation for the Reunification of the Country" took place in different countries including Austria, Ukraine, Yemen, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Tanzania, Burundi, Lebanon, Nigeria, Egypt and Ethiopia. [↩]

60003. -------. "12th Opinion Poll Reveals Surprising Reactions", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 21, 1994, pp. 8-9. The 12th opinion poll of the Survey and Polls Unit at the Center for Palestine Research and Studies was conducted 9/29-30/1994 and 10/1/1994. The topics covered included economic living conditions in Nablus; the negotiations; the performance of the Palestinian National Authority and the opposition and resistance. Palestinian-Jordanian future relations; the participation of women in elections, and political affiliation. SPU has been conducting regular public opinion polls to document an important phase in the history of the Palestinian people and to record the reactions of the community with regard to current political events.

According to CPRS, it does not adopt political positions and does not tolerate attempts to influence the conclusions reached or published for political motives. CPRS is committed to providing a scholarly contribution to analysis and objective study, and to publishing the results of all our studies and research.

General background: This poll was conducted over a three-day period: Thursday and Friday, 9/29-30/1994, and Saturday, 10/1/1994. A number of political events preceded the poll, summarized below:

1. There was an increase in discussion on the topic of elections, as the Palestinian-Israeli negotiations regarding elections continued.
2. The economic situation continued to be one of the most important topics of concern to Palestinians. Ahmed Qrei’, PNA Economic Minister, stated that the wheels of the Palestinian economy were beginning to move. Freih Abu Middein, Justice Minister, also announced that more companies are registering themselves as legal enterprises of the ministry.
3. The results of the poll, as will be indicated later, show that the majority of the Palestinians feel that the economic situation is still bad.
4. There is continuing debate concerning the imprisonment of the supporters of the opposition, especially in Gaza. At the same time, dialogue between the PNA and the opposition continued.
5. Negotiations between Jordan and Israel continued during this period, amid an increasing stabilization of their relations.
6. The transformation of authority over education was completed during this period, making the Palestinians the sole authority over the educational system.
7. For the purpose of this poll, public-forum interviews were eliminated and replaced by household interviews. The process of sample selection began with the creation of lists of all locations in the West Bank and Gaza, according to district, population size and distribution, and type of locality (city, town, village, and refugee camp).

A simple random sample of locations to be surveyed was selected from these lists. Fieldworkers and researchers created maps for these localities. The sample units—blocks—to be surveyed were selected randomly. Households were selected based on a systematic sampling framework. To choose the individual to be interviewed within the selected household, fieldworkers had to flip a coin twice to determine the gender and age of the respondent. We received 750 questionnaires from the West Bank and 501 from Gaza, for a total of 1251 interviews. Interviews were conducted on a face-to-face basis. A few interviews took place on Wednesday, 9/28/1994.

Data was processed through the use of SPSS, a computer package that is able to detect illogical answers and other inconsistencies. The margin of error for this poll is less than 3% and the confidence level is higher than 95%.

Results: 1. Economic Living Conditions: The poll shows that 50% of the Palestinians polled feel that one year after the signing of the Declaration of Principles, their economic conditions have not changed. As many as 40.8% feel that economic conditions have deteriorated since the signing of the DOP, and only 9.2% feel that conditions have improved.

Improvement in economic conditions however has been felt by residents of Gaza City, where 21.3% indicated such a perspective. In Ramallah-Al-Bireh 15.1% indicated that their economic have improved.

On the other hand, none of the respondents in the Jericho area sample indicated an improvement in the economic situation, and 70% of them said that conditions remained the same.

The residents of the north, middle and south of the Gaza Strip felt a worsening in their economic situation just a year after the signing of the DOP.

2. Palestinian-Israeli Negotiations: The poll shows the majority of Palestinians support the Palestinian-Israeli negotiations. Results showed a correlation between district and view of the negotiations. Unlike the rest of the Gaza Strip the residents of Gaza City had the most positive outlook towards the negotiations, where 39% said that their support for the negotiations has increased. In contrast, residents of the middle and south of the Gaza Strip are least supportive of the negotiations. For example, 33.8% of the residents of the south of the Gaza Strip declared their support has declined.

This difference can also be related to refugee status. Refugees are on the whole more critical of negotiations than non-refugees. The residents of the middle and south of Gaza are mostly refugees. In Gaza City, the majority of residents are non-refugees.

The most educated give the negotiations less support, with 48% of those with bachelor's degrees saying their support for the negotiations had declined, or that they remained opposed to the negotiations. However, the list to opinion in this group was quite even, with 46.4% of them viewing the negotiations positively.

In addition, 48.4% of students said their support had declined or that they opposed the negotiations compared with 41.3% who viewed the negotiations positively.

There was a correlation between political affiliation and views on the negotiations. It was interesting to find that among the supporting groups, the supporters of the Palestinian People's party are the most critical. A total of 26.7% of them declared that their support for the negotiations had declined, or that they remained opposed to the negotiations. However, the split in opinion in this group was quite even, with 46.4% of them viewing the negotiations positively.

In contrast, 21.2% said they are dissatisfied. A similar satisfaction rate exists in both the West Bank, 30%, and Gaza Strip, 32.1%. However, dissatisfaction in the Gaza Strip is higher, where 26.5% said that they are dissatisfied. This is compared with 17.6% in the West Bank.

The results obtained from the Gaza Strip portray a significant degree of polarization. Residents of Gaza City are most satisfied with the PNA, while residents of the southern part of Gaza, for example Rafah are most dissatisfied. Positive evaluation of the PNA can be found in the north of the West Bank, like Jenin and Nablus.

In Jericho, however, there was a split where 26% said that they are dissatisfied and 22% said that they are satisfied. It is interesting to notice the differences in the various regions of the Gaza Strip and to compare the situation in Gaza City with that of Jericho, where the people are less satisfied with the PNA. This is possibly due to the fact that most PNA activities are seen and felt in Gaza City and not in Jericho or the rest of the Gaza Strip.

4. Evaluation of the opposition: Palestinians are generally dissatisfied with the performance of the opposition. It is interesting to find that dissatisfaction with the performance of the opposition is also high among the supporters of the opposition groups. For example, 33% of PFLP supporters and 27% of Islamic Jihad supporters are dissatisfied.

5. Armed Operation: Palestinians were asked about their position regarding armed operations by some Palestinian factions against Israeli targets in the Gaza Strip and Jericho. A total of 32.7% of the respondents said that they support the continuation of such operations, while 55.8% said that they don't support such continuation. Only 11.5% said that they have no opinion on the subject.

Support for the continuation of armed operations against Israeli targets is higher in Gaza than in the West Bank. A total of 38.8% of...
Gazans said that they support the operations, compared with 28.6% in the West Bank. West Bankers may not be as supportive because they fear that these operations would bring a halt to the negotiations before the West Bank joins Gaza and Jericho under Palestinian authority.

There are also more refugee camp residents in Gaza than in the West Bank, and there is more support for the operations in refugee camps than elsewhere, although this support is roughly equal to the opposition, where 44.9% of refugee camp residents support the continuation, and 44% oppose it.

There is a correlation between the area of residence and view of armed operations against Israeli targets. Support for the continuation of these operations is higher in the north and south of Gaza. The least support, however, is in Gaza City itself. There is less support for such operations in the north of the West Bank than in the south. The poll results show an inverse relation between age and support for armed operations, where 41.2% of the age group 18-22 declared support for the continuation of these operations. In contrast, 22.4% of those over 50 declared their support for such operations.

Attitude towards armed operations is influenced by political affiliation, as shown in Table 1.

| Women and Elections: Palestinians were asked about their positions regarding the preferred extent of the participation of women in elections. The choices for this question were: participation through voting, candidacy, and a number of seats reserved for women; voting and candidacy only; voting only; and no participation at all. At total of 54% chose the first option, 17.8% the second, and 16.1% the third, while 12.1% said that women should not participate at all in elections. The only significant difference between genders was in the first option, with more women, 58.4%, choosing this option than men, 49.7%.
| The northern area of the West Bank is less supportive of women's participation than the middle and the southern areas.
| In Gaza, however, support for women's participation is higher in the northern area than in the center and southern areas.
| 6. Palestinian-Jordanian Future Relations: The poll results indicate that the majority 60.5%, of Palestinians support an independent Palestinian state as opposed to a complete union with Jordan, 20.9%, or a confederation, 16.3%.
| Support for independence is much higher in Gaza than in the West Bank. Support for a union with Jordan is highest in Nablus, Tulkarm, and Hebron. Traditionally, these cities have shown strong pro-Jordanian tendencies due to close family and commercial ties. Support for a confederation is strongest in Jerusalem (see Table 2).
| 8. and 9. Elections: The poll results indicate that consistent with previous findings, 79% of respondents prefer elections as the means to select their representatives. Only 12.4% preferred appointment by the PLO.
| With regards to participation in the elections, 74.1% indicated their intention to participate. This is a higher percentage than obtained in the previous poll in 8/1994, where 65.1% indicated their intention to participate.
| It is interesting to find that supporters of the opposition are intending to participate as well. [=]

16 16 year old Iyad Mohammad Zayada of Nablus was shot dead by Israeli soldiers.
18 Military bulldozers demolished a home in Jabel al-Mukaber.
23 21 year old Azzam Ayoub al-Sagir of Hebron was shot dead by Israeli soldiers.
25 Bulldozers overturned 500 dunams of cultivated land in Shoyukh.
26 Israeli bulldozers destroyed 35 dunams of cultivated land owned by Nablus residents.
28 Israeli soldiers shot and killed 14 year old Saker Azzam Ass'ad Mohammad of Ramallah during clashes after soldiers raided the village.
29 Hassan Hamed, 30, was killed by an explosion in Shati Camp.
30 A 38 year old women from Rafah Camp miscarried after being beaten by soldiers. 500 dunams of land in Sourif (Hebron) was confiscated. [=]

1. Israeli authorities demolished one home in Burkeen and four in Jiftlik. Military bulldozers demolished five wells in Deir Mar Saba. Soldiers uprooted 200 fruit trees in Hawara.
2 Military authorities sealed a home in Karwat Bani Zeid Ramallah) and partially demolished another in Rafah. Israeli authorities sealed a home in Nablus.
5 Israeli soldiers shot and killed 23 year old Mazen Ahmad Abu Swei from Iras (Bethlehem).
7 Israeli soldiers opened fire on youths throwing stones outside of Jenin Camp. Military bulldozers demolished a home in Jenin. Israeli authorities confiscated 2,000 dunams of cultivated land in Zawaya (Nablus). The tents had been provided by the UNRWA to replace homes demolished by the military.
9 Israeli soldiers demolished five homes in the Jenin area, two in Nablus, one in Jabaliya Refugee Camp (Gaza) and another in Jenin.
10 Israeli soldiers shot and killed 31 year old Ryad Ahmed Ibrahim Mize' ro of Anatta (Jerusalem) when he attempted to attack a military patrol with a knife. Israeli bulldozers demolished two homes in the Ramallah area, two in the Nablus area, and two in Kafr Beni Hassan. Israeli authorities closed the Firas Education Centre and the Arab Institute for Education, both in Bethlehem.
11 Military bulldozers demolished a home in Bethlehem.
13 Soldiers shot randomly and injured four Palestinians in Jenin when youths threw stones at an army jeep. Hani Mustafa Deib, age 22, was shot in the chest by Israeli soldiers and died a short time later in the hospital.
14 12 year old Issa Toma Sawaghleh of Aboud (Ramallah) was run over by a settler and killed.
15 The military demolished the home of an 80 year old resident of Ein K nya (Ramallah), and another home in Jenin.
17 Israeli soldiers shot and killed 17 year old Walid Khaled Zak Zaki al-Souky of Jenin during an armed clash with soldiers. Military authorities demolished a home in Yatta (Hebron).
20 Israeli authorities ordered residents in Beit Fourik (Nablus) to uproot thousands of trees on 18 dunams of land.
23 Military authorities demolished on home in Rafah Camp and forced two other homeowners to demolish their own homes. Israeli authorities uprooted 200 citrus trees in Jiftlik (Nablus).
25 Military authorities sealed a home in Nusseirat Refugee Camp.
27 Israeli soldiers shot and killed 21 year old Iyad Nimer alSabah as he walked past a military camp near Tulkarm. Israeli authorities tore down three tents in Rafah Camp displacing 27 persons. The tents had been provided by the UNRWA to replace homes demolished by the military.
28 The Civil Administration in Tulkarm ordered nine residents awaiting family reunification to be deported.
29 21 year old Nabil Cadura al-Hamed of Silwad (Ramallah) was shot dead by Israeli soldiers. A 24 year old Palestinian was beaten and stabbed by three Israelis in Katamon, near Jerusalem. Israeli soldiers arrested a nine year old boy in Shabura Camp (Rafah) and beat his mother. [=]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
5 17 year old Ossama Salamah al-A'roudy of Shati Camp (Gaza) died after being shot 13 times by Israeli soldiers. Two other youths were severely wounded, sustaining gunshot wounds to the head and neck. The soldiers also shot 68 residents when they surrounded the soldiers in an attempt to allow the youths’ escape.

14 Israeli soldiers shot dead Ahmed Abu Nahleh (43) during a fierce clash with the army in Sheik Radwan (Gaza City). Abu Nahleh was the father of ten children.

15 Ossama Salamah al-A’roudy of Shati Camp, died due to gunshot wounds to the head. 29: Israeli authorities demolished the home of Mohammad Abu Rumayas in Zaatara village (Hebron) as “unlicensed”.

24: In Hebron, Israeli bulldozers uprooted 20 olive trees belonging to Ismail Abu Rajab.

28: Israeli authorities destroyed the homes of Mustafa Kafish and Mustafa Natcheh in the “Issa neighborhood (Hebron) as "unlicensed".

3: Awad Bkheit (33), from Deir Balah, was shot dead while taking a bus home from work inside the "Green Line". 4: ustafa Akawi (35) died after undergoing interrogation and torture in Hebron Prison (see page 24).

5: Jallal Sanallah (12) died when he was shot in the throat by a special unit of civil dressed soldiers who raided the Ein Beit Ilma Refugee Camp (Nablus). Three other people were severely wounded.

8: Bahiya Othman (70) died of a heart attack after the car transporting her to the hospital was shot at and stopped repeatedly by soldiers during a curfew on Irtas village (Bethlehem).

11 17 year old Harod (Arteen) Daniel Kolizian of Ramallah was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during a confrontation with the military. A 15 year old was shot in the genitals by an Israeli soldier. The boy and his father were walking down the street when the soldiers fired without provocation. Two boys in Hebron were burned on the feet and legs by soldiers.

12 A 2 year old girl was shot in the face when soldiers in East Jerusalem began to shoot youths stoning passing military vehicles.

13 Military bulldozers demolished a home in Hebron. The Civil Administration announced plans to deport five women from Ramallah within six days.

14 Rafat Ibrahim at- Oassis, age 16, died of gunshot wounds to the head suffered in the August 5th attack in Shati camp. Transporting her to the hospital was shot at and stopped repeatedly by soldiers in an attempt to allow the youths’ escape. Moatez a-Zugheir (14) who was shot in the right side of his jaw.

15 year old Ra’ed alalad of Tulkarm was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during confrontations near As-Salam School. Two other youths were hit in the back by gunshot and severely wounded. Over twenty Palestinians from Anabta, Nur Shams and Shweikeh (Tulkarm) received notification that they would be deported.

17 year old Harod (Arteen) Daniel Kolizian of Ramallah was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during a confrontation with the military.

21 year old Mohammad Ghazy Yameen of Nablus was shot in the chest by soldiers after refusing to stop when ordered. He died upon arrival at the hospital.

15 year old Ra’ed alalad of Tulkarm was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during confrontations near As-Salam School. Two other youths were hit in the back by gunshot and severely wounded. Over twenty Palestinians from Anabta, Nur Shams and Shweikeh (Tulkarm) received notification that they would be deported.

22: 22 year old brother died in 1989 when he was run over by a jeep during transportation. A 15 year old was shot in the chest by soldiers after refusing to stop when ordered. He died upon arrival at the hospital.

29: Israeli authorities demolished the home of Mohammad Abu Rumayas in Zaatara village (Hebron) as “unlicensed”.

3/2/92: Jaber as-Sarfandi (27) from Salfit (Nablus) as "unlicensed". [=]

3/1/92: Jaber as-Sarfandi (18), Yabna, Rafah (Gaza), was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during a confrontation with the military.

3/1/92: Jaber as-Sarfandi (18), Yabna, Rafah (Gaza), was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during a confrontation with the military.

3/1/92: Jaber as-Sarfandi (18), Yabna, Rafah (Gaza), was shot dead by Israeli soldiers during a confrontation with the military.

4: Husseir Abu Kheir (22) from Khan Yunis (Gaza) was shot and killed during clashes with Israeli soldiers.

5: In Hebron, a settler opened fire on Palestinian youths, injuring ‘Aref Al-Hamouni (17) in the abdomen.

6: In Jabalya refugee camp, the military demolished the family residence of Jihad Muhsein (22), who has been arrested and charged with killing collaborators.

7: Israeli soldiers shot and killed Ahmad Abu Nahleh (43) during a fierce clash with the army in Sheik Radwan (Gaza City). Abu Nahleh was the father of ten children.

8: Bilal Ghaleb Harim (21) from Salit (Nablus) was shot dead by six soldiers who fired at close range during a raid on Salit. Bilal’s 17 year old brother died in 1989 when he was run over by a jeep during military raid.

13: Israeli authorities sealed the homes of Shehadeh Araham (40) and Ibrahim Matur (27) from Sa’ir (Hebron) for “security reasons.”

14: Israeli civilians attacked the home of Riyadh al-Malaki in Ramallah, smashed windows and spray-painted eleven Stars of David on the doors and walls of his home.

16: Soldiers raided the dwelling place of six families living in caves outside Kissan village (Bethlehem), and demanded that they evacuate the area and move to Fasayel village (Jericho). They were threatened that if they did not do so, their sheep would be confiscated and they would be fined for being in a “restricted area”.

18: Israeli soldiers shot dead Musa Dababseh (31) from Nuba (Hebron) after arresting him. His family was informed by the military headquarters in Hebron that he had been “accidentally” shot dead in a wooded area near his village. Israeli authorities demolished the home of Atallah Othman from Yutma (Nablus) as “unlicensed”.

20: Soldiers fired tear gas and concussion grenades at the secondary boys school in Al-Sira a-Shimaliyeh village (Nablus), and then raided the school.
soldiers opened fire inside the home arresting 2 youths, Hasan Shafa'i Prison Camp, firing rubber bullets and tear gas. Several prisoners were mourners of Sa'id Mohammad Mustafa Bariyeh, shot the day before. In Ansar III entered al-Fara' Refugee Camp (Nablus) and raided the home of Rima (Ramallah) a soldier shot Ismail Misha'l Barghouti in the head. Youth escaped. Camp, four youths were injured by live ammunition, including Hamde (Nablus). Also arrested, Iyad Jubran (24) and Buriyeh (24), and one with Israeli forces near Khabab Ibn Aratee Mosque in Hebron. In Rafah fleeing soldiers after being stopped inside al-Fara' Refugee Camp 30: Yakoub Nasser Edin, 19, was shot and killed during clashes. Bethlehem) were closed "until further notice," claiming stones were was shot with live ammunition after a stone-throwing incident. A-Louban. 60011. ------. "60 Days in the Occupied Territories: 2/16/92-4/15/92, Part 3", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 2. 3/27/92: Civilian clothed 24: Soldiers fired live ammunition and tear gas at students. Special unit soldiers, some disguised as Arab women, raided Jenin Refugee Camp, killed in the hospital after being shot by a special undercover unit. Yousef Mohammed Sa'ed, 19, exiting his home while surrendering. Al-Khader Secondary Boys and Girls schools (al-Khader, Bethlehem) were closed "until further notice," claiming stones were thrown. 3/28/92: Sa'id Mohammad Bariyeh (28) was shot dead while fleeing soldiers after being stopped inside al-Fara' Refugee Camp (Nablus). Also arrested, Iyad Jubran (24) and Buriyeh (24), and one youth escaped. 3/29/92: Special unit soldiers, some disguised as Arab women, entered al-Fara' Refugee Camp (Nablus) and raided the home of mourners of Sa'id Mohammad Mustafa Bariyeh, shot the day before. Soldiers opened fire inside the home arresting 2 youths, Hasan Shafa'i (22) and Naser Bariyeh (17). 4/1/92: Majed Abu Zouhru (17), Mohammad al-Hamadia (18), Ashraf Abu Harb (20) and Iyad al-Jazar (23) were shot dead in the main vegetable market of Rafah City (Gaza Strip), by Border Police who opened fire in the crowded market during the pursuit of other youths. At least 50 were injured, 5 critically. Clashes erupted after the imposition of curfew and additional 50 were shot and injured. After a stone-throwing incident, which provoked no military action (Hebron), 12 disguised soldiers opened fire on local youths killing Mohammad al-Ja'afri (14) and injuring Ra'ed al-Ja'afri (14) and Amjad al-Majid al-Taneen (12). Jundiyeh Tabei Abu Hussein (45) was struck dead, while walking with her daughter, by a military vehicle in al-Karara Village (Khan Yunis, Gaza). 4/6/92 Settlements in Bethlehem and Nablus districts were expanded by the confiscation of 38 dunums belonging to Fayez Mahmoud Ahmad (Nablus) and the transport of 85 pre-fabricated houses (Bethlehem). 4/7/92: Authorities demolished the following structures claiming they were "unlicensed": 2 homes in 'Ein ash-Shibili village (Jordan Valley), displacing 26 people and the home of Hafez Salahat (40), al-Bathan (Nablus), displacing 8 people. 4/8/92: Tareq Dukhan (22), Nuseirat Refugee Camp, was shot dead and 3 others arrested near the Egyptian Border. A curfew was placed on the camp 2 days later. [=] 60012. ------. "60 Days in the Occupied Territories: 2/16/92-4/15/92, Part 4", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 2. 4/9/92: Military shot dead Abed al-Qader Yusuf Shabrawi (23), Nur Shams Refugee Camp (Tulkarm), in the forefront, exiting his home while surrendering. 4/12/92: Nimrah Mosque (Hebron City) was closed for one month claiming "illegal materials" were found there. 4/15/92: Zakaria Qablan (23) and Abasan al-Khatri (Khan Yunis, Gaza Strip) were shot dead during a clash with undercover special unit soldiers. Iyad Abed latif Eštayyah (18), Sallam Village (Nablus), was shot dead after a clash with an army patrol. The village was placed under strict curfew. [Compiled by Josie Glausiuz, on the basis of Asel Research & Information.] [=] 60013. ------. "60 Days in the Occupied Territories: October 15 December 15: Part 1", in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 2. OCTOBER 16: Rizeq Na'el Beih, 21, from al-Khader Bethlehem) was hospitalized after he lost control of facial muscles following interrogation in Dahlia Prison. 17: Iman Issa Odeh, 21, married to West Bank resident Mohammad Sa'id, was deported to Jordan. Her visitor's permit had expired. 20: Israeli soldiers severely beat and arrested six students during a raid on al-Soumwal High School (Gaza). Jasser Abu Rmeila, 39, died in Jneid Prison of a heart attack. He had been denied medication. 24: Soldiers fired live ammunition and tear gas at students during a raid on 4 Schools in Rafah Camp. 29: Mohammad Zayed al-Rajari, 16, was killed by a special unit which shot him while he was writing graffiti on walls in Hebron. Two youths were injured and hospitalized. Yousef Mohammad Sa'ed, 19, was shot with live ammunition after a stone-throwing incident. A-Louban a-Sharqiyah Girls School (Nablus) was closed when the Israeli forces appropriated the building and converted the school into a military post. 30: Yakoub Nasser Edin, 19, was shot and killed during clashes with Israeli forces near Khabab Ibn Aratee Mosque in Hebron. In Rafah Camp, four youths were injured by live ammunition, including Hamde Hussein Farahat, 14, shot in the head. During a demonstration in Beit Rima (Ramallah) a soldier shot Ismail Misha' Barghouti in the head with a rubber bullet. Prison guards raided Sections 3, 4, and 5 of Ansar III Prison Camp, firing rubber bullets and tear gas. Several prisoners were injured. 31: During clashes in Balata Camp, soldiers shot Nadera passengers shot dead Abdallah ash-Shami (26), Assireh ash-Shamaliyeh (Nablus). 3/10/92: 'Ala Ibrahim al-Moghrabi (30), Rimal (Gaza), was shot dead with 15 live bullets after hitting soldiers with his car at an intersection. 3/11/92: Khaled Fahmawi (18), Jenin Refugee Camp, died in custody after being arrested. 3/13/92: Military issued a 1-month closure order on Ottoman Ben 'Atan Mosque (Hebron), claiming worshippers "instigated" confrontations. [=] Tuqan, 50, Amar Hindiyeh, 15 was hospitalized after soldiers beat him on the genitals. Ghassan Mohammed Awad, 17, from Awarta (Nablus) was shot dead during clashes with the military. Kamel Ayoub Abu Sneineh, 24, from Hebron, was pushed onto a burning tire by a soldier and severely burned.[=] 60014. ------. "60 Days in the Occupied Territories: October 15 December 15: Part 2", in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 2. NOVEMBER 2: Soldiers shot tear gas into Bethlehem Girls School, where pupils were demonstrating. 4: Riyad Mohammad Abu Asseb, 21, was found lying on the ground in Dahriya, in a state of shock, and was hospitalized in a mental institution. He had been thrown from a military vehicle. Riyad was arrested in Hebron on October 17. 5: Hamdi Abdel Hassan, 21, was killed by ten bullets shot by men in civilian dress who were driving through Arrabeh (Jerin). Soldiers beat 15 students during a raid on a Bethlehem Boys School. 7: Soldiers closed Jal'azoun Boys Preparatory School (Ramallah) after students stoned a military petrol. 9: Prison guards raided isolation cells in Ramle Prison, severely beat prisoners, and fired tear as. Five prisoners were overcome with tear gas and two fell unconscious. 11: Israeli bulldozers demolished the home of Ibrahim Mosa Ibrahim Omar, 22, from Dura (Hebron) for "security reasons". Three dunams of land belonging to the Ankawi family from Beit Sira (Ramallah) were confiscated for a military camp. 13: Sakher Nahed Tafesh, 1 1, from Zaitun neighborhood (Gaza) died from an exploding unidentified object. 14: Basem Fathi Sha'tban, 20, was shot dead in Jerin by a special military unit. Soldiers raided Bethlehem Girls High School and shot tear gas canisters and rubber bullets at students. 15: Prison authorities in Hebron Prison fired tear gas into prisoners' cells as they celebrated Palestinian Independence Day. 16: Sami Issa Fotagura, 23, was beaten on his head during interrogation. He received a spinal injection in Ramle Prison Hospital after which he lost sensation in his leg. 17: A special military unit raided Yamun High School (Jerin) and shot Issam 'Arkwai (17) with live ammunition. He was then arrested with thirteen other students. The home of Rateb Madi 'Atiyeb from Kibya (Ramallah) was destroyed. He was charged with driving a vehicle into a bus-stop at Tel-Hashomer, killing two soldiers. 18: Israeli authorities demolished the houses of Ibrahim Da'oud in Kuseein (Nablus) and Fareed Hussein Magi in Burka (Nablus) because they were unlicensed. 19: Radj Aniss al-Bastami, 73, from Jisser Titi (Nablus) died of wounds sustained when a special military unit shot at worshippers leaving a Mosque on November 15. The Injass family's home in Khirbati Bani Hareth (Ramallah) was attacked by settlers, who smashed a window, and threw two burning tires inside. Soldiers arrested two Bir Zeit University students during a raid. 21: 300 dunams of uncultivated land were confiscated from Nahaleen Village. The house of Mohammad Hussein Hamdan, 45, from Dura, (Hebron) was demolished, displacing 13 family members. 24: The home of Riyad Hussein Farhat, in Shujaiyya (Gaza) was sealed on the pretext that he had incited a group of residents to stone military vehicles. 27: The unlicensed home of Salim Ahmed Mo'ti Assakra (50) from Bethlehem, was demolished, displacing twelve persons. 29: Guards raided Section D of Hebron Prison, firing tear gas canisters into the cells. Several prisoners were overcome by as. 30: After 14 days of interrogation in Megiddo Prison, Fouad 'Abd al-Salam from Kufur Ruman (Tulkarm) developed a mental disorder. He had no previous history of mental illness.[=] 60015. ------. "60 days in the Occupied Territories August 15—October 14: Part 1", in Challenge, November-December, 1991. p. 2. AUGUST 16 Khayri Barakat a-Natshe, 12, died of injuries received in an explosion on August 13, in his father's shop. 18 Mahmoud Omar Zakarni, 30, from Kabatyja Jenin), was shot dead with live ammunition as he sat on his balcony. 24 Five "unlicensed" houses were demolished in Dir Balah (Gaza). 28 Khaled Abdel Rahman Ofeh, 41, from Tulkarm refugee camp, was shot dead when soldiers raided his home. Israeli authorities demolished the unlicensed house of Hashem Smeiri, 40, from Karara village (Gaza). In subsequent confrontations soldiers kicked Fatima Smeiri, 35, pregnant, and she miscarried. The first two of eight unlicensed homes were destroyed in Rafah.[=]
25 Ahmad Sadeq Amin, 23 and Hassan Ahmed Itmel, 23, of Qabatiya (Jenin), members of the Black Panthers, were shot dead by soldiers. Qabatiya was placed under curfew. Saber Nazzal, 24, of Faqar, was shot dead by soldiers.

28 Rami Abd Latif Qatifa'an, 12, from Sheikh Radwan (Gaza) died of head injuries inflicted on September 26th, by Israeli soldiers. Fifty dunums planted with olive trees were confiscated for use as sewage pits for Hebron settlements, including Kiryat Arba.

30 Four children were injured by unidentified objects which exploded while walking among olive trees in Tayaseer (Nablus) near a military camp. [=]

60017. ------. "60 days in the Occupied Territories August 15—October 14: Part 3", in Challenge, November-December, 1991. p. 2. OCTOBER

1. Soldiers gathered residents of Arura village in the cemetery and severely beat five people, includin Wajih Ziyab, 32, whose legs were already broken and was on crutches.

2. Israeli authorities sealed the house of Fakhri Bani Fadel, 58, from Akhrab (Nablus), because his sons stabbed four Israelis in Bnei Brak in October 90.

3 Ahmed Al-Himri, 60, from Deir Al-Balah, (Gaza) was beaten by soldiers near the spinal cord. His left hand and leg became paralysed.

4. Israeli authorities sealed the two-room house of Khaled Azrek, in ’Ayda refugee camp (Bethlehem).

5 Khaled Ryan, 27, of Balata camp (Nablus), was shot dead by four members of a special unit disguised as women. The unit shot and injured five more people.

6 Mohammed Bashir Hindi, 10, was shot dead durin clashes in Shati camp (Gaza).

7 Imad Qassem ’Atike, from Burkeen (Jenin), was shot by a member of a special unit. The prison administration at Ansar III placed the camp under curfew, and fired tear gas canisters and rubber bullets, injuring several detainees. The prisoners initiated a hunger strike. Soldiers demolished the house of Mahmoud Ramadan, from Kufur N’imem (Ramallah).

8. Soldiers shot and severely beat Aymen Na’im el-Kawasmi, 19, from Hebron, during confrontations.

9 Da’oud Saleiman Klob, 39, from Shati camp (Gaza), died of head injuries sustained after he was shot by soldiers on October 8. 18-year-old Issa Khalil Sa’lah, from Khader (Bethlehem), was shot in the head by a soldier, as he was writing graffiti on a wall. 44 dunums of land belonin to Tawfik Mohammed Daka, 70, from Araba (Jenin), were confiscated.

12 Israeli authorities closed Toubass Boys Hih School (Jenin) for two weeks, after masked youths demonstrated inside the school rounds.

13 Hassan Omar al-Sana’, 16, from Nablus, died of injuries sustained on October 9th. Omar and other youths were chased by settlers when he fell into a valley, fracturing his skull and breaking his back, ribs and limbs. Israeli authorities sealed Ziyyab Abu Kheizoran’s house in Fara’ (Nablus) displacing 14 people.

Compiled by Josie Glausiusz, based on Aseel Research and Information releases. [=]

60018. ------. "A Brief Guide to the Elections: Special Interest Groups", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 19, 1996. p. 7. Women: 16 seats at the Legislative Council are allocated for women. Women form 54.5% of the total population. Christians: There are two seats allocated for Christians from the Jerusalem Constituency. There are also two Christian seats for Bethlehem and one for Ramallah. Samaritans: More than 170 Samaritans residing in Nablus registered to vote in the elections. They have been allocated one seat in the Legislative Council. There are four candidates competing for this seat. Handicapped: No seats were allocated for the handicapped. One handicapped candidate from the Nablus constituency, Imad Libadeh, calls for this right. [=]

60019. ------. "A Message From Pen" in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 30, 1995. p. 13. The Pen Center For Palestinian Writers wishes to express its solidarity with all of our political prisoners who are currently on a hunger strike. In the absence of their rights and freedom, they are preparing to sacrifice their lives. Theirs is a courageous stance born out of desperation and a catalogue of grave physical and mental abuse, including torture. The Israeli government continues to renege on Article 20 of the Cairo Agreement and its undertaking to release five thousand prisoners within five weeks of its signing. On 8/4/1995, 160 prisoners were released and up to June of 1995 there were 3215 new arrests. The prisoners are men and women who fought long and hard for peace through the end of the Israeli occupation. Their continued incarceration is incompatible with the current peace negotiations and we urge Israel to unconditionally release all Palestinian political prisoners and to return to their basic inalienable rights. Should Israel refuse the sole demand of the prisoners and the Palestinian community who daily stand in support and solidarity with them it invites and condones the death of thousands and delivers a fatal blow to the very heart of any possibility of real peace in this region. We call upon the United Nations and the international community to oblige Israel to adhere to the Cairo Agreement and thus avoid an impending tragedy. Hanan A. Awwad, President Pen Center for Palestinian Writers, Jerusalem [=]
the fanatic attacks against Palestinians. The support visit recently paid by the Likud members of the Knesset to the settlers’ vigil is an overt demonstration of the widespread hatred for Palestinians and the deep contradictions between claims to being a democratic state and the true racist nature of a large segment of Israeli society. Moreover, the unsatisfactory interference of the Israeli army and police to stop the atrocities and dangerous incidents caused by the settlers reveals the Israeli government’s great indifference and lack of goodwill to handle the issue of the settlements. In fact, it stood paralyzed when a Palestinian youth was shot dead by settlers near Ramallah on 8/13/1995. For all the above reasons, we strongly demand the immediate evacuation of the settlers and the removal of their tents from the surroundings of the schools so that students may start their new academic year in an atmosphere of security and tranquility. We urgently warn of the damaging ramifications of the settlers’ continuous provocative presence in the Palestinian neighborhoods of occupied Jerusalem and the West Bank. It creates a real threat, weakening the peace process. The government of Israel and the Municipality of Jerusalem can be assured of the hazards and risks that are created by these settlers even before any blood gets shed. [2]

60021. ------. “Agudat Yisrael Leader Pinchas Horowitz Blames Reform Jewry For Hitler’s Rise”, in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), December 6, 1996, p. A3. Pinchas Horowitz, leader in the Agudat Yisrael party made a controversial statement during a news conference in Tel Aviv on Sunday. Horowitz accused the assimilated Jews of Reform Jewry for the Holocaust. The statement was made at a rally against the High Court of Justice which is seen by Agudat Yisrael as anti-Jewish.

Horowitz argued that Hitler had come to power in Germany because of the high percentage of non-Orthodox Jews in Germany, saying (in an Israeli Radio broadcast that was taped at the studio): “95% of the Jews were Reform and assimilated. That teaches you that when you destroy that which exists, the Shabbat, when you destroy Judaism, when you destroy faith in the Almighty, Hitler arises”.

On Monday, Horowitz denied having made the remarks of the previous day, and noted in clarification: “The Reform are the ones who do everything to destroy religion”.

In response, Reform movement spokesman Anat Galili noted that Agudat Yisrael’s “manipulation of the Holocaust is sickening and not even worth relating to”. Galili noted that a complaint had been filed with the police on the grounds of incitement, and that a libel lawsuit may also be filed. [TXT]

60022. ------. “Angry Israeli Civilian Kills Pregnant Palestinian Woman”, in Seattle Times, April 12, 1994, p. A14. An Israeli whose car was damned by Palestinian protesters attacked an unarmed, pregnant Palestinian woman on the West Bank and killed her with machinegun fire, in the village of Jib. The shooting took place as 20000 Palestinians in Ramallah were under 24-hour curfew as Israeli soldiers searched for a dissident. The national film news agency justifies the murder of the pregnant woman by stating that stones had been thrown at Jewish property. No charges were filed against the Jewish gunman. [TXT]

60023. ------. “Another Netanyahu Nanny Slings More Dirt”, in Seattle Times, July 5, 1996, p. A12. Another of the Netanyahu servants reports being brutalized and starved by now First Lady Sarah Netanyahu. Netanyahu demanded 20 hour work days, on one occasion shouting at the servant for 20 minutes for eating one tomato. Servants were forced to wash their hands before touching the ritually ‘clean’ Netanyahu children: Sarah Netanyahu responded that only ‘dirty people’ say things like that.

60024. ------. “Arab Child Day Commemorated”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 4, 1994, p. 15. Speaking at a celebration Sunday, 10/30/1994, marking Arab Child Day, the director of education and culture in Nablus Zahran Hassunah said interest in the education of young Palestinians has risen recently. He said that there are now 63 kindergartens in Nablus attended by 6000 children. [2]

60025. ------. “Arms Proliferation in Nablus”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994, p. 15 National and religious figures and officials in Nablus called for a stop of the spread of arms and guns among the residents and the use of weapons in disputes and during weddings.

They warned the Palestinian people against using these weapons in weddings or celebrations and to avoid using them in disputes.

Haj Mu’az Nablusi, chairman of the Nablus Chamber of Commerce, said the phenomenon is dangerous, and stated alms must be confined to responsible parties whose job is to protect the people and the country.

Nablusi pointed out that the most hazardous cases involve the shooting of weapons during weddings and celebrations. He also clarified that the use of weapons in disputes is a red line that should not be crossed. He added, “The use of weapons will not solve problems but add to them.”

Sheikh Jamal Mansour said that all those who care about the people and the country should shun the use of weapons.

He pointed out that there are many people who want to dash the hopes of the Palestinian people, to disturb national unity, and to destroy the social network. He affirmed that there is carelessness on the part of the Israeli authorities regarding this issue since they allow weapons to be used during weddings. [2]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

60027. ------. “Arts and Culture: A Word on Behalf of Women” in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 30, 1995, p. 13. Palestinian writer Liana Bader has written three novels; “A Compass for the Sun Worshipers,” “The Eye of a Woman” and “The Stars of Jericho.” She also has published a number of short stories. Sharif Waked, “A Balcony on Daytime” and “Golden Hell.” Her novels have been translated into English, French, Dutch and Spanish. She left Jericho in 1967, studied at the University of Jordan and continued her education in Beirut, where she volunteered to work with women in the refugee camps during the time the war was in Lebanon. She lived in Tunis after 1981 and worked for the Palestinian Education Ministry. Bader is married to Yasser Abed Rabbo, the Palestinian Minister of Culture and Education. Question: What does writing mean to you? Answer: Writing is a way of expressing one's self. Through writing, I have a dialogue with the difficult history of the Arab World. I remember Andalusia and the big disturbances that surround us during these times of the New World Order. Writing is also a way to consider the question of being a woman. It is also an affirmation of my Palestinian identity. Question: What made you write? Answer: I grew up in a house which respected science, literature and education. This allowed me to read intensively. When I was in secondary school, I published a story in the Jihad newspaper called “A Gypsy in the Depths” and this story caught the attention of Mahmoud Shqer and Khalil Sawahi, the editors of the literary page in the paper, on which I published “The story entitled “The Doors” in another newspaper. Sawahi commented on this story by saying that if the writer continues to write, she will become one of the most important Arab women writers. Question: Whenever you write, you focus on women. Is this true? Answer: I always try to present the viewpoint of women. In my latest novel, “The Stars of Jericho,” I presented the history of the city through the viewpoints of its inhabitants, who vary in many ways, but I wanted the woman to have her viewpoint as well. Women hold a lot of knowledge about existence. This often makes them sarcastic. The women always give us their frank opinion. Question: “The Stars of Jericho” is about the experience of 1967. Why did you write it? Answer: The first two novels were about the civil war in Lebanon and the war of 1982. I wanted to write about the Palestinian experience in Lebanon, but by that time the Gulf War had broken out and I went through a dry period. I looked at my roots, and began to write about events that took the Palestinians from 1967 through the Gulf Crisis. In perspective, I could see a thread of linking the two periods. Question: It is an unusual way of presenting a story. Answer: When I started writing “The Stars of Jericho,” I thought a lot about the time frame of the story—whether it would be a simple time frame going forward and how could I do it now that I have been out of the country for such a long time and its inhabitants have been dispersed all over the world due to the wars. The problem I had was the time frame, and therefore, I went back to reading old Arabic literature, and found out that the writers of the time used to go in circles, i.e., the story would be told and then told again and, in a circular fashion. I looked at this Arabic heritage, and found out that the time factor was not as important as the incident or the characters. I also consider that the loss of the simple and normal Palestinian history has created an uncertainty about time. Today this is being compensated for by documentation and the writing of history books. [1]

60028. ------. “Arts and Culture: Documenting the Voice of Palestinian Women”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, August 18, 1995, p. 13. When a young person is exposed to political and social upheaval, the memory of these events remains. The harsh occupation, the daytime bombing of a military base, a cold-blooded matricide—traumatic events which can only be aid to rest if a way is found to exteriorize them, or present them to the external world. This is what Norma Murkus has done. Born in Bethlehem, Murkus learned to infuse her present work with her past. Images of the June of 1967 War made her contemplate the uncertain future of the Palestinian people, and particularly their culture and the status of women within it. Deeply influenced by the murder of a mother by her son—for the reason that the mother had sought a divorce—Murkus took up the struggle for women’s rights. Society had failed to condemn the murderer. Murkus recognized that social oppression weakens the will of the people to fight against political oppression. At the age of twenty-five, after ten years of activism within the Palestinian resistance movement, she went to the south of France to study journalism. In 1979, she got work with the Egyptian press, and expressed her views on Israel and the Camp David Accord. She then continued her studies at the Luffer school of Journalism in Paris, before going on to work for Arabic and international papers. On her return to the West Bank, she covered the events following Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982. Her excellent work earned her a scholarship to Stanford University from Reuters Agency. The major turning point in her career came with her introduction to the world of film. She met film producer Yves Toizot in Paris and helped with the production of his film on the life of Yasser Arafat. Since then, her love for cinema and film production has increased. “I decided to produce a film on the role of Palestinian women, and though I had difficulties securing funding, my persistence bore fruit after three years,” Murkus said. The success of the film was largely due to its political content, the photographing of prominent Palestinian women, and financial help from French television, the French National Center for Cinema, and the European Community. “Films on the Middle East are rarely produced by Arabs, but are usually done by foreigners who just visit the country. Even though I lived in France for seventeen years, I never thought of producing a film about France.”

The film portrays the social and political role of Palestinian women from the years 1972-1991. It focuses on two girls: One was permitted by her parents to travel abroad to continue her education—and later falls in love—and the other is forbidden to travel and suffers from parental restrictions. Yet the two women have very different characters. One is socially oppressed, but has freedom of political expression—though, since she is a woman, her views are not taken seriously—while the other, though dressed in the conventional Islamic style, rebels against the imposition of an arranged marriage. “This is a flaw in our society,” said Murkus. “Once a woman reaches her thirties, the chances of her getting married are rare, especially if she’s uneducated.” According to Murkus, both internal and external factors have negatively affected Palestinian society. Although Israeli attempts to destroy Palestinian society have largely failed, they have certainly affected the social structure. And internally, close inter-marriage in village communities has led to a high percentage of mental disability. Murkus comments that “education and awareness are the answers to these issues.” The film was well received. Le Monde described it as “The best documentary film presented in the year 1994 on Channel three.” But, while western papers wrote positive reviews, the Palestinian and Arab press was silent. “The film presented another angle of the Palestinian people. Beyond the cliches of occupation, terrorism, refugee camps, we discovered within our society a different struggle—the struggle for women’s rights.” (Al-Quds) [2] metals, tools and wood, he needs to develop more control over his approach to the materials. Kan'aan’s experiments in the use of this style are still that—experiment. Yet he promises to distinguish himself on the contemporary Palestinian art scene. Daoud Al-Hayek (Nazareth) works with large spaces where a violent struggle between colors and shapes takes place. His thematic reference to motifs reflects the idea of the artist reacting painfully to the Palestinian situation. He makes use of geometric spaces, exploding with strong colors over large surfaces, interlinked sometimes at close range, other times at a distance. The colors help him relieve himself of his strong emotions and to channel them. He underscores the spaces with black lines and creates sharp corners that remind us of the hilly areas around Al-Hayek’s native Nazareth. The overall effect is often reminiscent of the Palestinian kuffiyeh. The new work of Abed Abedi (Haifa) reflects a change in his style with the use of new materials, such as hay. In the past, his main themes were social and political, and were rendered in an expressionist style. Presently, he uses cool colors—blue, white and yellow. He surprises us with the recurring motif of a black rectangle. It draws the eye and gives the impression of a door or a window. Asad Azi (Sha’afi Amr) leaves large spaces of his paintings empty, while crowding selected corners with ornament, as well simple designs for which he has used eye-catching colors. Although Azi lives in an Israeli environment, Tel Aviv, the sentiments displayed in his paintings are clearly rooted in his Arab heritage. The work of Khalil Rayyan (Damoun) should have been better displayed by the center, since it is well worth seeing. Rayyan’s work is distinguished by his subject matter—women—and the material which he uses to give expression to his theme—bronze. His form is simple, but at times he has exaggerated it to bring about harmony of mass and empty space. He has drawn on some of the experiences of British sculptor, Henry Moore. Rayyan is considered one of the few sculptors who has proven himself on the Palestinian scene. Walid Ghashash (Acre) has distinguished himself for his use of the abstract and the geometric. Inside circular, wooden shapes, he has added geometric spaces, some filled by strong colors and a graduated use of color in others. He has succeeded in establishing harmony between the circle, the rectangle and the square. Jasser Abu Rabia’ (Al-Goref) is an artist influenced by his Bedouin tradition. This is true whether he works in metal or stone. He has succeeded in using simple, raw materials in a modern form, allowing himself to be inspired by the natural colors of the desert stones and aluminum, which he has used to offset a black background. He can be considered a post modernist and is a complete antithesis to the rest of the artists in the exhibition. His work is simple, but at times he has exaggerated it to bring about harmony of mass and empty space. He has drawn on some of the experiences of British sculptor, Henry Moore. Rayyan is considered one of the few sculptors who has proven himself on the Palestinian scene. Walid Ghashash (Acre) has distinguished himself for his use of the abstract and the geometric. Inside circular, wooden shapes, he has added geometric spaces, some filled by strong colors and a graduated use of color in others. He has succeeded in establishing harmony between the circle, the rectangle and the square. Jasser Abu Rabia’ (Al-Goref) is an artist influenced by his Bedouin tradition. This is true whether he works in metal or stone. He has succeeded in using simple, raw materials in a modern form, allowing himself to be inspired by the natural colors of the desert stones and aluminum, which he has used to offset a black background. He can be considered a post modernist and is a complete antithesis to the rest of the artists in the exhibition. His work is simple, but at times he has exaggerated it to bring about harmony of mass and empty space. He has drawn on some of the experiences of British sculptor, Henry Moore. Rayyan is considered one of the few sculptors who has proven himself on the Palestinian scene. Walid Ghashash (Acre) has distinguished himself for his use of the abstract and the geometric. Inside circular, wooden shapes, he has added geometric spaces, some filled by strong colors and a graduated use of color in others. He has succeeded in establishing harmony between the circle, the rectangle and the square. Jasser Abu Rabia’ (Al-Goref) is an artist influenced by his Bedouin tradition. This is true whether he works in metal or stone. He has succeeded in using simple, raw materials in a modern form, allowing himself to be inspired by the natural colors of the desert stones and aluminum, which he has used to offset a black background. He can be considered a post modernist and is a complete antithesis to the rest of the artists in the exhibition. His work is simple, but at times he has exaggerated it to bring about harmony of mass and empty space. He has drawn on some of the experiences of British sculptor, Henry Moore. Rayyan is considered one of the few sculptors who has proven himself on the Palestinian scene.
climax when settlers attacked the Qurtuba school on Wednesday, injuring twenty-five schoolgirls. It took another twist when the Israeli Army threw canisters of tear gas into a kindergarten, clearing the path for settlers to continue their attacks. This attack confirmed what the people of Hebron have been saying since the massacre at the Ibrahimi Mosque on 2/25/1994. They have maintained that the perpetrator Baruch Goldstein was not a man who acted in a deranged way in a moment of lunacy, but one of a cohort of settlers whose intention it has been to drive fear into the people of Hebron, and drive them out of the city. The settlers are much mistaken if they think that they can achieve their aim. The people of Hebron will endure. Nonetheless, yesterday’s attack hardly belies the fears of the local population. It was proof that they were right and that Goldstein’s disciples are on the loose. The settlers should have been taken out of the center of Hebron immediately following the massacre, if not for political, then most definitely for moral reasons. The fact they were not raises questions concerning the intentions of the Israeli government. In perspective, it is unlikely that the four hundred settlers of Hebron would continue to act so brazenly and persist in their provocations without the assurance that the Rabin government backs them in their demand to stay—official statements notwithstanding. They have every reason to feel encouraged as they follow the delaying tactics exercised by the Israeli government. They know that Rabin is on their side, and they have proof of it. Why else would the Israeli soldiers arrest the citizens of Hebron instead of the settlers attacking the school? Rabin has ordered protection for them, and his purpose is to ensure a place for the settlers in the heart of Hebron—or else why would he be offering the Palestinians alternative plans that he is sure will be rejected?

The Palestinian National Authority position on Hebron has been clear throughout: the settlers must be evacuated, and Hebron treated in the same way as all the other cities where the redeployment plan applies. Hebron has become a powder keg. This deplorable situation is likely to bring about a breakdown in the peace process. Spokesman Marwan Kanafani has explained that President Yasser Arafat has begun seriously to question the value of continuing talks with the Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres if he cannot assure himself a solution to Hebron, and to the other pivotal issue, the release of the prisoners. No wonder the Palestinian National Authority declared that it had no reason to celebrate the second anniversary of the Oslo Accords. The date coincided with the attack on the school in Qurtuba. Not an occasion for celebrations. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

60041. ------. "Briefs: Runaway Russian Boy Was Hidden by Father [11 year old Boris Talinsky to prevent having to return to Tashkent with his mother. The father was arrested."] in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, November 26, 1994. p. 4.[TXT]

60042. ------. "Briefs: Soldiers to Ride Buses for Free [according to a cabinet decision, but does not include reservists. The move is to reduce the risk from hitchhiking. Women soldiers have been able to ride for free."] in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, October 29, 1994. p. 4.[TXT]

60043. ------. "Business and Economics: In Brief--Grants for Small Projects," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, July 28, 1995, p. 10. Faisal Hussein, Palestinian National Authority Minister without Portfolio, signed 7/20/1995 eight agreements with the European Union, supporting small projects with $650,000 for two years. He remarked that the small projects are programs that would cost between twenty thousand to seventy thousand dollars. Among the beneficiaries of the aid are: the Muslim Women's Society in Shuafat; summer camp programs throughout the West Bank, a rubbish collection program in Abboud village near Ramallah; and a project to install a solar electric system at the Charitable Society of Saif in Hebron. [=]

60044. ------. "Business and Economics: In Brief; UNRWA Supports Women's Projects in Gaza UNRWA"," in Biladi: The Jerusalem Times; October 20, 1995, p. 10. UNRWA Development and Planning Department announced 10/12 that it has allocated a special budget to finance new projects for women in the Gaza Strip. An official at UNRWA told reporters that there will be continuous training courses to develop the roles of women in administration, marketing and other fields. [=]

60045. ------. "Business and Economics: United Nations Development Program Inaugurates Programs for Human Development", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, August 18, 1995, p. 11. With the announcement that the sixth United Nations Development Program Global Human Development Report 1995 is to be released on 8/17/1995 in Oslo, the United Nations Development Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People in Jerusalem initiated a process to generate a Palestinian Human Development Profile, which is to be finalized by June of 1996. For the first time, this process has been planned so as to involve all relevant governmental, civil society, and United Nations' organizations in a professional dialogue on the importance and the implications of the sustainable human development concept to Palestinian society. Sustainable human development is a concept directed at providing people with more chances and choices to meet the needs of current generations without endangering future generations. Although choices can be infinitely complex and change over time, people need essentially: to lead a long and healthy life, to acquire knowledge; to have access to resources for a decent standard of living. There are other things people value highly, such as political, economic and social freedom, opportunities for creativity and productivity and self-respect. Basically, sustainable human development includes four major elements: productivity, equity, sustainability and empowerment.

The objective of the Palestinian Human Development Profile is to reflect the status of human development in the Palestinian Territories at this point in time. The Profile will allow the Palestinian Territories to be included in the global human development reports, and hopes to spark public discourse on the concept of sustainable human development. More importantly, it will provide a continuing analysis of the situation, highlighting the achievements, issues, and gaps which the Palestinian National Authority could use to determine the proper areas for policy intervention, when formulating development plans. The timeliness of this endeavor stems from the fact that whatever "development" is occurring in the Palestinian Territories, in the aftermath of the signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993, is, to a large extent, a reaction to emergency situations and unsustainable. Furthermore, people are not seen as the source of development. How can the situation be reversed, to make people both the means and ends of development? How can viability and sustainability be ensured for the sake of future generations? What long-term challenges confront Palestinians in an emerging independent society? Can Palestinian people's choices and capabilities be enlarged? The United Nations Development Program global human development reports utilize development indices which rank different countries on how far they have achieved human development. By using disaggregated data on human development, at the national and sub-national levels, they help identify and monitor the gaps among regions, between sexes, rich and poor, urban and rural areas, young and old, among ethnic groups. Here are some relevant illustrations, drawn from the world and Arab states, in particular: The 1995 United Nations Development Program global Human Development Report, introduced two new measures of human development which highlight the status of women and gender disparities around the world. It reveals that 1.3 billion people live in poverty today, of whom 70% are women. Two-thirds of the world's illiterates are women. 73 million people lived in poverty in the Arab states (excluding Palestine), in 1990, and more than ten million people were underfed. Where are the Palestinian Territories in these figures? What is the nature of Palestinian poverty, and what measures should be taken to alleviate it?

The 1995 United Nations Development Program global Human Development Report estimates that women's contribution to the global economy, which has not been approximated before, is eleven trillion dollars. Globally, women's participation in the labor force was about 39.5% in 1990, with little difference between the developing and industrial countries. In the Arab states, only 17% of Arab women participate in the formal labor force. The 1996 Palestinian Human Development Profile hopes to assess the status of Palestinian women's unpaid and underpaid work, and their real contribution to the productivity of the Palestinian workforce. As in previous human development reports, the 1995 United Nations Development Program global Human Development Report addressed indicators concerning the improvement of human capabilities; specifically, access to health, education, and economic resources. While more than three-fourths of the world's people live in developing countries, they enjoy only 16% of the world's income. In developing countries, even tough average life expectancy has increased by more than a third over the last thirty years. About seventeen million people still die every year from infectious and parasitic diseases. In twelve of the nineteen Arab states assessed in the Report, life expectancy has reached sixty-five years. However, less than three-fifths of the rural population have access to safe water, and only half have access to basic sanitation facilities. Data about access to education in the Arab states shows that, although the adult literacy rate nearly doubled during the past two decades, and school enrollment increased nearly sixfold between 1980 and 1991, about eight million people are still illiterate, nine million children are outside the primary school system, and fifteen million are outside the secondary school system.

Being a part of the Arab World, and on the verge of becoming a member of the larger world, the Palestinian Territories face a tremendous challenge to improve the human capabilities of their people, and enlarge their choices in order to ensure the continuity of future generations. As a step in that direction, the 1996 Palestinian Human Development Profile will attempt to address a number of basic human development indicators, including: expectancy of long and healthy life at birth; access to knowledge; access to necessary economic resources; gender-related issues; environmental issues; quality of life issues, encompassing individual and societal security under occupation, economic, political and cultural freedoms, and regional and national social and cultural integration. The ultimate goal and challenge for the Palestinian Human Development Profile is to provide a comprehensive framework on human development issues, and to make it available to the various policy decision makers, with the aim of progressively enhancing the quality of life of the populace. [=]

60046. ------. "Business: Briefs BTS Gets Rights for Chinese Anti-Cancer Drugs [BTG, with headquarters in Israel, received exclusive marketing rights in many countries for 3 anti-cancer drugs made in PRC, including a drug similar to Taxol; Taxol by Bristol-Myers Squibb is used to treat ovarian, breast and perhaps lung cancer.", in Jerusalem Post International Edition, August 6, 1994. p. 20. [TXT] 60047. ------. "Candidate Forums Planned This Month", in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), October 4, 1994. p. 20. Candidates for Superintendent of Public Instruction and from 37th, 41st and 45th Legislative districts will appear at the Temple De Hirsch Sinai, and the candidates will focus on Jewish concerns. The event is sponsored by Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle, American Jewish Committee, Anti-Defamation League, Coalition for a Jewish Voice, National Council of Jewish Women and the Temple.

A coalition of Jewish women’s organizations are sponsoring a candidate forum at Herzl-Ner Tamid Conservative Congregation on Mercer Island. The forum will include state legislative candidates, and KIRO-TV news director Ilene Engel who will moderate a panel discussion of candidates for governor, attorney general and US House of Representatives.

Finally, 1st District Congressional candidate Jeff Coppesmith and Sen. Patty Murray will appear at the Bnai Brith Business Network on 10/19/1996. [TXT]

60048. ------. "Catholics Defend Prisoners’ Rights", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994. p. 5. The sound of the call of our brothers, the Palestinian prisoners in jails, reaches the ears of the Lord, who sets prisoners free and heals the afflicted. A group of these dear prisoners, prominent among them the women and the young, have sent us letters describing their tragic conditions of life. We in the Assembly of Catholic Ordinaries of the Holy Land feel therefore, that our task is to raise our voice in defense of the rights of the Palestinian prisoner, whose cause seems to have become merchandise for sale, or even forgotten, unsaleable goods in the peace process or else a hostage and means of political pressure.

We are very happy about the peace process. But we suffer to see that, in spite of this process such inhumane methods are still used against these prisoners who have fought for the dignity of their people and nation.

Therefore, on basis of our faith in the Lord Jesus, who is the Prince of Peace, on the basis of our deep feeling of human dignity, and on the basis of our consciousness at favorable conditions are needed to pursue the peace process, we consider that the liberation of all prisoners is at the heart of the peace process and at the heart of the Palestinian cause. It must head all efforts for peace and all agendas for peace.

So, we address our appeal to the Palestinian and Israeli authorities, and to the two states who are patrons of the peace process, the United States and Russia, to the friendly European states represented by consuls here in the Holy City and to the world community at large, to make the liberation of the prisoners top priority.

We also address a word of love to our brothers and prisoners. We say with St. Paul that if one member suffers, all members suffer with him. We do suffer with you. Your cause is our cause. You also served the Palestinian cause and brought it before the tribunal of world opinion. Today, we bring your cause to the same tribunal.

Our hope is that our brothers the prisoners will not need to use the weapon of the hunger strike. The dignity of the Palestinian people is the dignity of these prisoners. For them, we raise our prayer and our voice. For their dignity, safety and liberation, we send forth this call. The day of liberation is near. With the Holy Bible we tell them with trust: Raise your heads, for the day of your liberation is near. [For the Catholic Ordinaries’ Assembly of the Holy Land, Archbishop Lufti Laham, Jerusalem.] [=]

The director general of the ministry’s mental health department Abdul Aziz Thabet said that the new clinic will serve traumatized children transferred from other clinics or schools.

Headed that the children’s mental disorders are primarily caused by the effects of the Israeli occupation.

Thabet said that it is very important to establish such clinics and the ministry will open more throughout the Gaza Strip. He emphasized the importance of increasing the cooperation between the institutions which already work in this field and the clinic in order to facilitate an exchange of experience and knowledge.

The newly opened clinic was founded through the efforts of the WHO. A team of 8 doctors and social experts will work at the clinic. [=]

During this period, 1202 Palestinian residents of the occupied territories have been killed by Israeli security forces. Of these:

-1169 were shooting deaths, including plastic and “rubber” bullets;
-33 non-shooting deaths (beatings, burns and other);
-257 children were killed: 68 were 12 years old or younger, 189 aged 13 to 16.

An additional 100 Palestinians were killed by Israeli civilians and 27 by “collaborators.”

53 members of the Israeli security forces and 69 Israeli civilians, including three infants and two tourists were killed in the occupied territories by Palestinians.

Since the beginning of self-rule one member of the Israeli security forces was killed by a Palestinian policeman.

According to The Associated Press, 827 Palestinians suspected of collaborating with the Israeli authorities have been killed in the occupied territories, whereas according to the Israeli military, the figure is 986. This number does not include 43 Palestinians killed in detention facilities by Palestinians.

100 Israeli civilians, five tourists and 22 members of the Israeli security forces were killed inside the “green line” by Palestinian residents of the occupied territories.

22 Palestinians from the territories have been killed inside the “green line” by Israeli civilians, while 26 were killed by Israeli security forces. [=]

60051. ------. "Crime Rates Soar as Oppression Deepens", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), December 30, 1994. p. 6. Sociologists confirm that the rate of crime is on the rise in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip despite the self-rule agreement with Israel and the implementation of the first part of the Oslo Accord.

Those specialists underscore the economic, social and psychological pressures which the Palestinians have to bear.

Maher Abu Zanat, a lecturer at An-Najah University in Nablus, says all behavior has a motive.

Every crime is a manifestation of behavior, he says, adding that the motive for burglary can be traced to the state of social relations and the closure of the occupied territories by Israel.

He says that psychological factors follow from the pressure Palestinian people are exposed to daily, accompanied by a loss of hope due to the failure of the PLO-Israel agreement to bring about an improvement in the standard of living.

Abu Zanat notes that presently there are too few work opportunities for the large number of Palestinians.

In the past, young Palestinians had clearly defined places to expend their energy, says Bernard Sabella, a sociologist at Bethlehem University. In today’s society, he continued, the avenues available to young people are insufficient to absorb their energy.

Sabella says that the rise in crime in the occupied territories, especially in Jerusalem, is due to the state of the economy as well as the absence of official bodies to regulate their lives.

Personal factors also play a role, he adds, referring to drug addicts and dealers.

The Palestinian academic says that Israel's policy of a security cordon is adding to the growing rate of crime. According to Sabella, half of the labor force has depended on work inside Israel, but the policy of excluding large numbers of young Arabs from entering Israel means they have no hope to find work. Over 70% of Palestinians were born after 1967. [6]

60052. ------. "Cuban Fixer Meets Bill: The $12 Billion Florida Scam", in Counterpunch, February 16, 1997, p. 3. The Homestead AFB that was flattened by Hurricane Andrew in 1993 had already been targeted for re-development as a gigantic regional airport. The $12 billion development project, the largest project ever planned for the region, amidst Biscayne National Park, Everglades National Park, and Florida Keys National Marine Sanctuary arouses great fears among environmentalists for the air traffic and toxic stormwater and seapage that the project would generate. Significantly, the gigantic project was never put to bid, but was instead handed off to an unknown company, the Homestead Air Base Developments Inc. (HABDI). While other firms offered cash payments as high as $64 million to develop the site, HABDI got the site in a free, exclusive 70-year lease, Dade County manager Joaquin Avino, immediately after securing the deal for HABDI, resigned and joined The Miami Herald notes that the Association was involved in the largest corruption case ever made in Miami, with several officers of the Association being videotaped offer cash bribes to Dade County commissioners in 1989. Herrera's management of HABDI has brought into it a "vicious, violent, mean-spirited, destructive, hateful and demagogic style". While Herrera's rise from impoverished refugee from Cuba to multi-millionaire remains obscure, his new connections are clear enough: one director in the Latin Builders Association, Miguel DeGrandy, is also chief lobbyist for HABDI and a partner in the Miami/DC law firm Greenberg Traunig: the managing director of Greenberg Trauwig is Marvin Rosen, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee's finance committee from 1994 through the 1996 election.

[Zionist activist] Rosen started in national politics in the 1980 election as coordinator of Sen. Edward Kennedy's effort to win the nomination; in 1984 he was the leading fundraiser for Walter Mondale; in 1988 Rosen was finance chairman of the Dukakis campaign; and in 1992 he was personally recruited by Clinton as a fundraiser. To capitalize on his new national ties, he opened a DC branch office in 1993, and hired Ron Brown's son Michael Brown to be director of legislative affairs (and the two sides across the Taiwan Straits shifted their relationship from confrontation to communication by giving warm response to the first high-level, non-government talks between Wang Daohan and Koo Chen-fu, the respective chairmen of Chinese mainland's Association for Relations Across the Taiwan Straits and the Taiwan-based Straits Exchange Foundation. The meeting held in April marks a step toward the reunification of the country.

2. The first non-LDP regime since 1955 was established in Japan. On 8/6/93 Moritomo Hosokawa, a virtual unknown in national politics a year and a half ago when he formed the Japan New Party, was elected Japan's new prime minister, bringing to power a coalition government to replace the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP). Miyazawa's cabinet resigned on 8/5/93 to make way for the new government. Hosokawa and his coalition have promised to revamp the electoral system and enact stricter political funding laws to discourage corruption.

3. Chinese women track and swimming athletes made miraculous achievements. During the Fourth World Athletics Championships held in August in Stuttgart, Germany, Chinese runners Liu Dong, Qu Yunxia and Wang Junxia won gold medals in the women's 1500- meter, 3,000- and 10,000-meter events respectively. Their re-election. (Alan Farago of the Sierra Club Miami chapter observes: "Bill Clinton doesn't have any ethics. He just follows the money. But now he must really be surprised to find himself trapped in the sewers of south Florida politics.") However, Clinton and Gore have tried to pose publicly as staunch defenders of the environment, even as pandering to large polluters. Gore's scheme to moderate the environmental predation of Cuban American sugar barons at the southern end of Lake Okeechobee trumpeted with immense press acclaim, has collapsed with little press attention. In one recent quiet effort, Gore's aide Katie McGinty, now head of the Council on Environmental Quality, met with Herrera and illegally allowed his HABDI development project to proceed without environmental impact studies, which is entirely illegal, this is in line with present administration policy, which is to tell the bureaucrats in advance of the desired decision, whatever their subsequent investigations might disclose". So, HABDI, without competitive bids, with no disclosure and no environmental impact statements, has been allowed to proceed with the a vast project with potentially disastrous environmental implications.

Miami Sierra Club and other greens have demanded criminal investigations of HABDI, and there are several unanswered questions: (1) there are rumors that HABDI money comes from drug money-laundering and from South American airline companies, through Jorge Mas Canosa's Cuban-American Foundation; (2) HABDI may have bribed Dade County officials: one lobbyist for HABDI, Howard Gary, was arrested as part of another southern Florida real estate development kickback scandal; and (3) did Rosen use his position as finance chairman for DNC to influence the transfer of Homestead AFB to HABDI?

Unfortunately, the person to whom they are directing their call for investigations to is Janet Reno, who "turned the blindest of eyes to political corruption and the rise of the Cuban-American mafia" as Dade County district attorney. [7] achievements ended a long period in which Chinese athletes had yet to capture a gold medal in this particular world-class track and field competition. Wang and her team mates also broke world records in the national games in September. Later in early December, Chinese female swimmers won 10 golds and set nine records in Spain at the Inaugural World Short-Course Swimming Championships.

4. A new government was established in Cambodia. Cambodia was finally walking out of the shadows of almost two decades of war after the National Assembly approved the cabinet list of the royal government and its political program on October 29. War-weary Cambodians have been longing for peace and national unity and stability. With the efforts of the Cambodian people and the international community, the country adopted a new constitution which restored Cambodian's constitutional monarchy.

5. The Palestinian State and Israel signed a peace accord. After 14 painstaking secret talks between Israel and Palestine, both sides signed in Washington on 9/13/93 an agreement on Palestinian self-rule in Gaza and the West Bank town of Jericho. Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization recognized each other, a historic step toward the realization of Middle East peace.

6. Yeltsin and his rivals resorted to arms in Moscow. The fight during the past two years between the Russian government and the legislature finally resulted in severe bloodshed in early October. Proparliamentary demonstrators attacked the city hall and television headquarters. Russian President Boris Yeltsin declared a state of emergency in Moscow and ordered military forces to restore order after the lawmakers refused the last chance to surrender their arms and leave the parliament building. After a battle lasting 10 hours, Alexander Rutskoi, Russian acting president appointed by the Parliament, and Parliamentary Speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov were arrested. A total of 142 people were killed during the two-day assault.

7. US army got stuck in Somalia. For a year since the US led UN peacekeeping forces were stationed in Somalia, US forces suffered heavy casualties. Facing great domestic and international pressure, US President Bill Clinton had to adjust his policy towards Somalia in October and decide to withdraw his army and seek a political solution to the problem.

8. A session of the Communist Party of China (CPC) constructed a frame for a market economy. The 14th Central Committee of the CPC convened its third plenary session from 11/11-14/93, to specify an overall plan and a program of action for establishing a socialist market economic system in the 1990s. The meeting upheld Deng Xiaoping's theory of reforms and was determined to make the market a fundamental factor in the disposition of resources under state macro-control.

9. The first high-level Sino-US summit meeting in four years was held in Seattle. While Sino-US relations are at a critical juncture, plagued by various problems since the summer of 1989, the Fifth Ministerial Conference on Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation held in Seattle on November 19-20 provided the opportunity for top leaders of the two countries to exchange views face to face. The top talks proved to be fruitful with understandings achieved and better mutual ties promised.

10. The Sino-British talks on Hong Kong failed. After 17 rounds of talks over Hong Kong’s political future in 1993, China and Britain failed to reach an agreement because of Britain’s insincerity throughout the discussions. The British side unilaterally brought the negotiations to a halt when it tabled part of Governor Chris Patten’s political reform bill to the Hong Kong Legislative Council on 12/15/93. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

---

Welfare was surprised to hear from Kol Ha'ir about what is going on in the market. She decided on the spot to conduct a sting operation. Yesterday at 6 o'clock in the morning, Kol Ha'ir accompanied 12 investigators from the ministry’s Division of Investigations and Enforcement, who, with the aid of two policemen, conducted a raid on the market.

The operation was called “Operation Yehuda.” Thirty-seven children between the ages of 8 and 13 were caught, along with four employers. The employers admitted that they paid the children only a few shekels for a day’s work. The legal division of the ministry intends to press charges against the employers.

Before the raid was conducted, several of the officers were positioned for half an hour at three positions which were indicated in the Kol Ha’ir report. The second stage involved the positioning of two teams who were responsible for closing off the main exits.

From the interrogation of the children, it seems that they lied to Kol Ha’ir concerning their wages. Two of the children who were caught were forced to unload a truck received from their employer, who was detained for interrogation, one shekel each. Another employer confessed that he had given to one boy only three shekels. Other children said that they get between three and five shekels for unloading a truck.

All of the children were taken to the corner of Agrippas, where it was explained to them in Arabic that it was illegal for them to work at their age. The officers had not been gone for five minutes when the children went back to work as usual. [=] 60056. ------. "Editorial: The 'Piece' Plan for Bosnia", in Crescent International, December 16-31, 1995, p. 1. Peace has become a dirty word, especially when it relates to the affairs of Muslims. It is used (abused?) to numb our critical faculties so that we are unable to discern the details of what has been proposed. Palestine and Bosnia immediately spring to mind. The similarities between what has been dished out to the peoples of Palestine and Bosnia are so striking as to lead one to believe that perhaps its authors simply changed names on the maps and presented them as a solution to the parties concerned. Both in Palestine and in Bosnia, the victims were told to accept the hopelessness of their situation and sue for peace. To call the Dayton agreement a peace plan is to legitimize the systematic destruction of Bosnia, the rape of tens of thousands of Muslim women, the genocide of three hundred and fifty thousand people and the deliberate obliteration of the rich history and heritage of Muslims from the heart of Europe. The Serbian campaign in Bosnia has been of the same order as the nazi rampage through Europe, only fifty years later. The Dayton agreement has actually rewarded 'ethnic cleansing' - that demonic notion which only the warped minds of the Serbs could conceive. Srebrenica and Zepa, two of the United Nation's so-called safe havens in eastern Bosnia, where the Serbs perpetrated genocide as recently as last July, have been handed over to them.

Equally revealing is the investiture of Slobodan Milosevic, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip for the scholastic year 1994/1995. The operation was called “Operation Yehuda.” Thirty-seven children between the ages of 8 and 13 were caught, along with four neighbors. Fear was compounded by hatred. The ultimate indignity inflicted on the Muslims was to dishonor their women. Who would like to return to a life of shame and humiliation? The war criminals - Radovan Karadzic, Ratko Mladic and Slobodan Milosevic - are free. Milosevic has even been declared an international statesman and rewarded, within twenty four hours of signing the Dayton agreement, with the lifting of the United Nations' sanctions against Serbia. The arms embargo against Bosnia remains in place. One could hear echoes of the slain Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin's pontifications about peace in the words of American president, Bill Clinton. Neither Palestine nor Bosnia offer any surprises. At least in Bosnia, the people put up a valiant struggle. Those in Palestine who are resisting the monstrous injustices are being dehumanized and delegitimized. This process will now be repeated in Bosnia as well. Both ultimately reflect the pathetic state of the regimes in the Muslim world and their complete failure in the face of aggression against vital parts of the Ummah. [=]

60057. ------. "Education Expert Fears Drug Epidemic", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 27, 1995, p. 15. There are 36000 drug addicts in the West Bank, 7000 of them between the ages of 17 and 35, according to Rasmiyah Abdul Khader of the school of education at An-Najah University. Speaking at a symposium at the university, she warned the drug phenomenon could spread to Palestinian educational institutions. Abdul Khader said the phenomenon is a response to unemployment, free time, and family and other social pressures. She said the Palestinian National Authority should make plans to deal with unemployment, and institute clubs where young people could spend their leisure time. [=]

60058. ------. "Education: Schoolbag; Summer Camp in Khan Yunis" in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 30, 1995, p. 12. The Palestinian Women's Union in Khan Yunis in the Gaza Strip inaugurated a summer camp for children called Tal Sultan. The summer camp includes one hundred and fifty students divided into seven groups. This is the first summer camp held by the union. [=]

60059. ------. "Education: Statistics Study for the Scholastic Year 1994/1995," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 1, 1995, p. 12. The Palestinian Statistics Center along with the Palestinian National Authority Education Ministry issued a study regarding education in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip for the scholastic year 1994/1995. The study included the most important indicators in the education field and a list of all schools, students and teachers for that year. According to the statistics, the total number of students for this year was 654697, 337866 of who were males. The students are enrolled in 1910 schools, 492 of which are for girls while 910 are mixed schools. There are 21054 teachers, 10068 of whom are women. The study is supposed to be statistical presentation of education and truancy rates from schools. It also included a number of seminars and exercises which helped activate discussion between participants. Participants Mohammed I’layan confirmed that there should be a radical change in society’s view towards women and men. “Supporting women is not just fulfillment of humanitarian needs. What is required from all of us is to change the concepts which are related to women,” he said. Isalh Jadd, a lecturer at Birzeit University said that teachers are central communicators and formers of values inside the society. She added, “There are future workshops planned as part of a detailed program for teachers and school students, for the purpose of developing certain ideas and values. This is necessary because of our frameworks of reference for prevailing values does not match cultural, physical and intellectual development trends.”

60061. ------. “Election Update”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 29, 1995. p. 1. The registration period for candidates has been extended to 1/4/1996. A total of 38 candidates are now standing for the Jerusalem sets. Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen) was appointed 12/21/1995 to head the Palestinian Elections Commission. Two candidates are in the running for the Presidency: Yasser Arafat and Samiha Khalil. Islamic leader Imad Falouj is running as an independent candidate for the northern Gaza Strip. Only 15 women candidates have registered to date. Faisal Hussein, Minister without Portfolio, announced on 12/25/1995 that he was no longer a candidate. The formation of a National Coalition party has been announced by Haidar Abdul Shafi. The number of members in the Legislative Council has been increased from 83 to 88. The Legislative Council will initially be based in Gaza. The Palestinian Green Party has been formed, headed by Ahmad Abu Ghosh.

60062. ------. “Electoral Victory For Fatah's New Generation Boosts Hardliners”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), November 11, 1994. p. 3. The Fatah movement held a conference 11/3/1994 to elect members of the Leadership Movement Committee and the Movement Council of Fatah in the Ramallah area. The conference took place under the slogan, “Jerusalem is the eternal capital of Palestine. No to any custody of the city other than Palestinian, End of occupation and release of all prisoners.” Treasurer of the Higher Movement Committee of Fatah in the West Bank, Manwan Barghouti, announced the results of the elections of the 15 members of the Leadership Movement Committee in Ramallah.

The winners held a meeting and elected Tawfiq Barghouti as treasurer of the Leadership Movement Committee in Ramallah. Barghouti said that the elections were a high achievement for the movement. He said this is an inauguration of democracy in the Palestinian land and in the internal decisionmaking system of Fatah. He argued that elections are the only way to reinforce the unity of the movement. Barghouti claimed that the elections will pave the way for general elections. Abdul Fatah Hamayel, newly elected member of the Leadership Movement Committee, declared that elections are desired by the people in general and the Fatah movement in particular. “We hope to achieve this request on the way to regaining our independence,” he said.

Hamayel said the elections will be the model for other elections in the future.

Rabina Thiab, newly elected member of the committee and head of the Fatah women’s committees, said the elections were free and fair.

According to Fatah sources, the political change wrought at the ballot box was caused by the extent of new participation. They added that the election of these new faces is a victory for hard-liners who insist on fundamental issues in the negotiations with Israel.

The next elections of the Fatah movement will take place in Tulkarm at the end of this year. Afterwards a general conference will convene including all the elected people in the regional committees and the council of the movement. The conference will elect the Higher Movement of Fatah in the occupied territories as a precursor to holding elections for the self-rule Council. 53 candidates competed for the seats on the Leadership Committee while 116 competed for representation on the Movement Council. [=]

60063. ------. “End of a Detention Center”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 29, 1995. p. 3. South of Hebron - Palestinian women danced outside the Thahiriyeh Detention Center as after the Israeli Army withdrew, on Tuesday, 12/26/1995. Palestinian sources said 300 policemen entered the town in accordance with redeployment procedures reached in the Taba Accords signed in Washington on 9/28/1995. The policemen wore their weapons and arrived in military vehicles led by the head of the Liaison Committees, Brigadier-General Ziyad Al-Atrash. Thahiriyeh was one of five villages in which the Palestine Police took up their duties. The other four were Dura, Yatta, Bani Naim, Thahiriyeh and Nuba. Part of the Palestine Police is now housed in the former Thahiriyeh Detention. The building, which had served the Jordanian Army before 6/1967, was converted into a detention center in 12/1967 as part of Israel’s attempt to contain and suppress the Intifada. Prisoners were held in abysmal conditions before they were sent on to Ansar II in the Negev Desert. [=]

60065. ------. “Feature: Conference in Beijing--New Horizons for Women,” in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 1, 1995, p. 7. The Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People of the United Nations' Development is joining thousands of women and men from all areas of the world to participate in the United Nations' Fourth World Conference on Women, which will take place in Beijing, China, 9/4-15/1995. The aims of this Conference are to evaluate the changes which have occurred in women’s lives since the Nairobi conference in 1985, and to take the necessary actions to ensure that women’s issues maintain a high priority status on the world's agenda.

During the past twenty years, the women's movement has picked up speed, not only on the local and regional levels but also on the international level. Following the First World Conference on women, which was held in Mexico in 1975, gender equality has experienced a noticeable advance in the labor market, as well as in the laws and regulations adopted, or to be adopted, by various governments to ensure women's rights. Various advocacy efforts at different levels and the increase in the general awareness of women’s issues have had a marked influence on providing women with access to better medical care, intellectual resources and to social equity. However, we still must ask the questions, to what extent has the status of women improved in light of the social and economic problems that face the world today? How committed are the various governments to eliminating all forms of discrimination against women? The Fourth World Conference on Women will attempt to answer these and other questions. The primary goal of the Conference is to adopt a platform of action which will address the critical areas of concern identified as obstacles to the advancement of women. The platform will include actions to eradicate poverty; to eliminate inequality in education and economic participation; to further protect and preserve the environment; to end inequality in sharing of power and decision-making; to improve the image of women in the mass media; to promote the rights of women; and to eliminate violence against women. The realization of these goals will depend on the commitment to and monitoring of the decisions made and actions taken by governments, NGOs, the private sector and individuals. The second goal of the conference is to determine the priority in actions to be taken by the global community, including the United Nations, to raise the status of women.

The third main goal of the Conference is to mobilize women and men at the policy-making and the grassroots levels to achieve the above-mentioned goals. Until now, three international United Nations' conferences on women have been held. The first conference took place during the International Women's Year, 1975, in Mexico City, Mexico. The conference adopted a Plan of Action which resulted in the United Nations' General Assembly's proclamation of the first International Year for Women. Following the conference, in 1979, the General Assembly adopted the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which now has the signatures of approximately one hundred and thirty-nine countries. An independent committee of experts was established to monitor the implementation of the Convention's articles, as well as to discuss the reports submitted to the committee by various governments. In turn, the committee is responsible for making recommendations to the governments, and for actions for the advancement of women. The second conference took place in Copenhagen, Denmark, in 1980. The main objective was to adopt a Program of Action to remedy women's problems in the second half of the Decade for Women, with emphasis on education, employment, and health. The third conference took place in Nairobi, Kenya, in 1985, with the objective of evaluating and revising the achievements of the United Nations' Decade for Women. The conference's participants adopted, by consensus, the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the year 2000. The comprehensive strategies called for work plans at the regional, national, and international levels to empower women and allow their access to basic human rights. In 1990, an evaluation by the commission of the Status of Women, an intergovernmental body consisting of forty-five member states responsible for formulating global policies and recommendations for the advancement of women, showed that the international community had become more sensitized to, and aware of, women's issues. However, the evaluation also showed that there had been a relapse in the application of the Nairobi forward-looking strategies. Therefore, it has become one of the Fourth World Conference on Women's goals to encourage women's advancement at a faster pace, in addition to examining previously undisclosed issues, such as violence against women.

The United Nations' Development Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People has participated in and supported the various preparatory national meetings for the Conference. In particular, United Nations' Development Program/Program of Assistance to the Palestinian people has sponsored preparatory workshops in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to introduce the Conference and NGO forum participants to the United Nations' system and conferences, working with media in addition to lobbying skills and strategy formulation aimed at influencing the Platform of Action. The United Nations' Development Program/Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People has been able to mobilize extra funds and in coordination with other donors, particularly the Royal Netherlands Embassy in Cairo and the United Nations' Population Fund, have sponsored the participation of eight women from the official Palestinian delegation, as well as fourteen women from the Palestinian NGO delegation. United Nations' Development Program/Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People, through its well-established Gender in Development Program, is committed to play a full role in advocating the advancement of Palestinian women by following up on women's issues and supporting projects which meet women's economic, education, legal, social and health needs. In addition, the Gender in Development Program at United Nations' Development Program/Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People will support the recommendations of the conference in Beijing, and therefore, help implement the international Platform of Action. [ = ]

60066. ------. "First Woman Candidate", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995, p. 7. Nabita Abu Ramila was the first Palestinian woman to announce her decision to run in the legislative elections. Abu Ramila is mother of 9 children and works for women's rights. She declared that she will run as an independent candidate even though she is a Fatah supporter. Fatah, however, have denied that she was, at any time, one of their local activists. Abu Ramila lives in Beit Umar, near Hebron. The village is considered highly conservative and known for its chauvinistic attitude towards women in general. Regarding her agenda, she said, "I will work to achieve women's goals, including freedom and liberty." Her husband, Ahmed, said, "I will support and encourage her to run for the elections, although I doubt if her job would enable her to be a full-time mother at the same time." [ = ]

60067. ------. "Focus: Crime and Criminals in the 'Promised Land'", in Crescent International, November 1-15, 1996, p. 4. How sick is the Israeli society? The simple answer is: very sick. People who enjoy beating up young children and shooting at unarmed civilians are bound to develop a criminal mentality. The Israeli society is also very vicious. It is fair game to beat up, insult, injure and kill Palestinians without fear of retribution. Israeli courts have never sentenced a Zionist Jew to more than three months in jail for killing Palestinians. Soldiers often get suspended sentences. This mentality has penetrated all strata of society. Domestic violence has escalated among Israeli Jews. Crime rates have gone up dramatically. According to a study by the Israeli Institute for the Protection Of Victims Of Rape & Crime, there was fourteen hundred cases of rape and violence last year. Furthermore, 46% of the victims of sex violence were Jewish teenagers, of which 36% were family members. Rape among friends and neighbors accounted for 26%. One should not be surprised by such developments in a country that claims to be based on religion but is overwhelmingly secular. Religion is used merely as a cover of convenience. It is interesting to note that the religious argument is used most often by Zionist settlers or Orthodox Jews who insist on adhering to Jewish injunctions, like observing the Sabbath on Saturday or that God "promised" them the land of Palestine! Yet these Jews are not above violating their own rules in the most blatant manner such as sexual misconduct. In the settlement of Kiryat Gat in Occupied Palestine, a gang of fifteen to nineteen-year-old Jewish youths raped and battered a fifteen-year-old Jewish girl. Such behavior, however, is neither uncommon nor confined to Jewish youths. On 10/7/1996, a prominent Hasidic rabbi from New York was charged with fondling a fifteen-year-old Australian girl last year while she was sleeping near him on a flight from Australia to Los Angeles. United States' federal prosecutors filed one count of sexual contact with a minor against Israel Grunwald, age forty-four, who allegedly touched the girl's breasts in May of 1995. He was sentenced on 10/15/1996.

Grunwald is a rabbi in the Hasidic Pupa sect in Brooklyn, New York. His assistant, Yehudah Friedlander, who had graduated from rabbinical school but was not ordained, was sentenced in January to twenty-two months in prison and one year supervised release for placing his hand under the girl's pants and touching her genitalia without her consent. The incident was witnessed by another passenger who confronted the crying girl when she ran to the washroom. The passenger then contacted the flight crew who alerted authorities in Los Angeles. The rabbis were arrested as they walked off the flight at Los Angeles International Airport, amid protests from the Jewish community. At the time, the administrator of the Council of Jewish Organizations in Brooklyn said the men, as members of the Pupa sect, would "not even talk or sit next to a female," much less touch her. This is the same kind of argument used by Israeli officials about the brutalities inflicted on hapless Palestinians. When the Zionists are accused of torture, Israeli officials reply matter-of-factly that their military manuals prohibit torture. That may be so but it has not prevented the Zionists from perpetrating horrible crimes against innocent people. On 7/21/1996, for instance, a retired Shin Bet officer convicted of clubbing to death two Palestinian boys who had been arrested near Tel Aviv after they commandeered a bus in April of 1984. The two were later bludgeoned to death. At the time, the Israeli government flatly denied any wrongdoing even though the two boys had been photographed alive as they were led away by Shin Bet agents. While crimes against the Palestinians become a matter of routine, it also affects the rest of the Israeli society, including Jews. Israeli gangsters and criminal elements are now the most notorious and vicious in the world. The American Federal Bureau of Investigation is actively pursuing these Jewish mafiosos after discovering that many
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Russian Jews have superseded the Italian mafia.

In August, three leading drug lords were arrested in Toronto. All were Russian Jews. On 9/8/1996, the Israeli government announced the arrest of thirty-five Russian Jews for using Israeli banking facilities to launder drug money. Jeffrey Robinson, a British author and 02-638385, 02-667726, 02-663162/3, Association for the Support and 02-638385, 02-667726, 02-663162/3.

In August, three leading drug lords were arrested in Toronto. All were Russian Jews. On 9/8/1996, the Israeli government announced the arrest of thirty-five Russian Jews for using Israeli banking facilities to launder drug money. Jeffrey Robinson, a British author and considered an authority on the Russian-Jewish drug lords, said on British Broadcasting Corporation world service that the number of such gangsters was perhaps more than three hundred and fifty or higher. Robinson is the author of the best-seller, "The Laundromat," a book that deals with the drug trade. The drug trail has taken some interesting routes. In Brooklyn, New York, a rabbi was arrested two years ago for facilitating the laundering of drug money through his synagogue account for years until his discovery. What better way to make it kosher! The drug lords even promised him a cut for Israel—every Jew's, and indeed, many gentiles', favorite place to send donations to these days. While some people may be under the impression that most of the money to Israel comes from the United States, Canada is not very far behind either. Zionist settlers boast that on a per capita basis, Canadian Jews send far more than American or other Jews in the world. Much of this money is sent in violation of Canadian Income Tax laws. The Canadian government revoked the charitable license of the Toronto Zionist Council last April after a Revenue Canada audit found it was funnelling funds to Zionist settlers in Occupied Palestine, in contravention of Canadian laws. A number of other Jewish organizations involved in transferring money to Zionist settlers are also under investigation. One group in particular, the Press Foundation, while maintaining a low profile, collected five million dollars last year, according to the "Toronto Star" which ran a long piece on Canadian Jewish organizations on 10/12/1996. The most rabidly racist Zionists hail from North America who insist that they are the "chosen people" and that Palestine was "promised" to them by God, whether they were born in Brooklyn (New York) or North York (Toronto). Yigal Amir, the assassin of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin had a "fatwa" issued by a rabbi in North York to kill Rabbi [–]

60068. ------. "Forum Explores the Lives of Women in Exile," in Week in Germany, March 8, 1996, p. 6. The differing fates of the women driven into exile by the Nazis will be the focus of the fourth Else Lasker-Schuler Forum scheduled for 3/14-17/1996 in Wuppertal (North Rhine-Westphalia). "Exile research was largely a matter of researching on men," explained Hajo Jahn, director of the Lasker-Schuler Society, in announcing the subject of this year's forum. "Exile literature appeared to have been a strictly male literature." But the example of Lasker-Schuler (1869-1945) herself, an acclaimed German Jewish poet who fled Germany in 1933, shows how inaccurate those preconceptions are. Under the title "Women in the Land of the Hebrews," the forum will give special attention to the women who, like Lasker-Schuler, eventually settled in what was then known as Palestine after leaving Germany. Literary scholars will be joined by survivors of the Nazi era from Germany, the US and Israel in the forum's proceedings. As in the three previous forums, there will also be sessions devoted to Lasker-Schuler's work as a poet and artist. [–]

60069. ------. "GUIDE TO THE ISRAELI LEFT: Part 1", in Challenge, May-June, 1991, p. 37. Ad Kan (Up To Here). Tel Aviv University lecturers group founded in early 1988. Organizes teach-ins symposia and demonstrations against the occupation and related policies. Maintains contact with Palestinian academics and lawyers in the territories. Prof Moshe Shaked Tel Aviv University, Dept. of Sociology, tel.03-739639 (h). Alternative Information Center. Publications News From Within a monthly bulletin on the situation in the Occupied Territories as well as The Other Front a weekly bulletin of analytical commentary and translations from the Hebrew press. Police raided office after it allegedly allowed facilities to be used to print a pamphlet aimed at a terrorist readership. Director Michel (Mikado) Warschawski served a six-month prison term for allegedly closing his eyes to the origin of the pamphlet. P.O. Box 24278 Jerusalem tel. 02-241159. Association for Civil Rights in Israel. Advocacy for civil rights in Israel and the Occupied Territories. P.O. Box 8273 Jerusalem 91082 tel.

through the New Israel Fund (U. S. and Canada) or the Jerusalem Foundation (Greta Britain). Interns for Peace. Program to train Israeli and American Jews and Arabs for community work in Jewish and Arab villages. Participants spend two years in the villages organizing encounter groups between Arab and Jewish schoolchildren or doing similar work. 35 Geula Street, Tel Aviv. tel. 03 657995. [–]

60071. ------. "GUIDE TO THE ISRAELI LEFT: Part 3", in Challenge, May-June, 1991. p. 37. Isha L ’ isha (Haifa Women’s Center). Sponsors Palestinian-Jewish women’s dialogue groups cultural exchanges and symposia. Extensive support program for women and other feminist activities. 88 Arlooor Street, Haifa tel. 04-664949. Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information. A future-based public policy and development think tank to research problems of coexistence between Israel and the future State of Palestine. Reports published in English Hebrew and Arabic. P.O. Box 51358 Jerusalem, tel. 02-285210, fax 02- 289094. Friends of IPCRI, P.O. Box 1120 Long Beach NY 11561 USA. fax 516- 431-1909. Kav La’Oved (Workers’ Hotline). Defends labor and other rights of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories who work in Israel. Bimonthly newsletter in Hebrew and English describes recent work and current issues 78 Allenby Street, Tel Aviv, tel. 03-663754. Account357770/38BankLeumi, Branch 811 Ahad Ha’am Street, Tel Aviv. League of Jaffa Arabs (al-Rabita). Lobbies for rights of Jaffa’s Arab community. In 1989 held its seventh annual International Volunteer Work Camp in which Israeli Jews and Arabs and Europeans worked to build roads clean streets improve kindergarten facilities and parks etc. 73 Yeletf Street, P.O. Box 41097 Jaffa 68171. tel. 03-812250. Neled (Israeli Women for Coexistence). Dialogue group of Jewish and Arab women in the Tel Aviv area. Solidarity actions with Palestinian women in the Occupied Territories. 6 Tor Hazahav Street, Herzlia. Bracha Yanov, tel. 052-552485. This partial list is based on a full list prepared by the Alternative Information Center and available from the center for $5/NIS 10. The second half of this list will appear in the next issue of Challenge.[–]

In a statement issued 5/29/93, the organization reported that 26 Palestinians were shot dead in the Strip by soldiers and special Israeli military units in the first four weeks of last month. At least 400 others were shot and injured.

The number of casualties makes it clear that there are new open-fire regulations for the soldiers which “free the soldiers to use lethal force without any type of justification, and this has led to the killing of six children under the age of 15, as well as one woman who was inside here house at the time she was shot.”

According to the statement, the soldiers involved in all these killings were not in situations which jeopardized their lives.

Faris Kurdi, 18 months, was used as an example in the statement. The child was killed by an Israeli soldier at a distance of 70 meters while in his father’s arms. The father was standing inside a shop in Jabaliya refugee camp. The statement inquired as to “what kind of danger this child posed to justify that he be shot.”

It was also noted that 35 children have been killed by the Israeli army in the Gaza Strip since the beginning of the year and 221 others since the beginning of the Intifada.

“Human rights violations practiced by the Israelis are collective punishments and are aimed at subjugating the Palestinian people,” said the statement. It noted that the killings, as well as the closure of the territories, have had devastating effects on all aspects of life in the Strip.

Despite exaggerated Israeli figures, only 7000 Palestinian workers from the Gaza Strip have been allowed to return to their jobs inside the “green line.” At least 40000 Gazans were working inside the "green line" before the closure, said the lawyers.

Moreover, the collective loss of workers’ income amounts to $1.56 million daily as a result of the closure—$70 million over the last two months.

The industrial sector, said the statement, has suffered losses of more than $50 million, while the agricultural sector has lost nearly $150 million. As for unemployment in the Strip, it has exceeded 80%.

The lawyers held the Israeli authorities responsible for the effect of the closure on the current health situation and the suffering endured by many who are prevented from reaching hospitals in Jerusalem. [=]

60073. ------. “Gaza Kindergartens Unlicensed and Overcrowded”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 19, 1996. p. 12. Palestinian kindergartens in the Gaza Strip are suffering from a lack of entertainment facilities for children and a shortage of high-quality services. The supervisors of these kindergartens say that despite the importance of these services to the children in the schools, they lack qualified teachers, adequate funds and space. Um Ahmad, 37, who administers a kindergarten in the Sabra neighborhood in Gaza, said that the center has only four rooms separated by one small corridor. She added that the kindergarten is roofed with asbestos which makes it very cold in winter and very hot in summer. “In addition to these problems, the classes are overcrowded because there is not enough space outside for children to play,” she said. Um Ahmad said that she started working at the kindergarten five years ago, after the death of her husband. The kindergarten is her only source of income. She refused to discuss her academic qualifications, saying, “Teaching kids comes from practice.”

According to another supervisor in the Sheikh Radwan neighborhood in Gaza, the kindergartens help children prepare to enter schools. She explained that children learn how to behave in kindergartens. However, she said that most of the kindergartens in the Gaza Strip do not offer good services to the children who attend. Mahmoud Saleh, principal of the Imam Kindergarten in Khan Yunis, admitted that the situation in his kindergarten is deteriorating. He said that he needed to find financial support before it was too late. Another supervisor of a kindergarten, Ziad Subhi, said that the lack of financial support of kindergartens prevents the development of education in the Palestinian society. Subhi added that the formulation of a unified plan would enormously help the kindergartens to improve and develop. Figures available from the PNA Ministry of Social Affairs show that out of 350 operating kindergartens in the Gaza Strip, only 120 have official operating permits. According to the figures, most of the unlicensed kindergartens are privately owned while the others belong to the municipality, women’s associations or political parties. In addition, the majority of the supervisors of the kindergartens do not have high academic qualifications, while those who do carry certificates lack experience. The Ministry of Social Affairs is responsible for the supervision of kindergartens. Samia Shaath and Iman Udwan, two officials at the Ministry, are responsible for supervising more than 120 kindergartens. Shaath said the Ministry needs a larger team of supervisors to be able to fully perform their supervision. She added that she and Udwan were unable to do it alone. [=]

60074. ------. “Gaza Police Restrict Political Freedom”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994. p. 3. The Palestinian police in the Gaza Strip have announced two directives were issued by the Palestine police which, according to Al-Haq, the Ramallah-based human rights organization, “violate the rights to freedom of assembly,association and peaceful political expression.”

The first directive, issued 9/9/1994, and addressed to the Rashad Shawa Cultural Center, the, YMCA, Al-Azhar University and the Jalaa Cinema in Gaza City, banned them from staging political meetings unless prior permission is obtained from Ghaizi Jabali, chief of the Gaza police.

This was quickly followed by a second directive which prohibits all bus companies in the Strip from "transporting political groups for any purpose without advance written permission" from the Palestinian police.

According to Al-Haq, on the same day, Palestinian police sealed off the YMCA, the venue for the Third National Conference of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. The event was canceled since the participants were prevented from entering the building.

The Arabic daily Al Quds reports that political demonstrations have also been prohibited.

In a statement released 10/6/1994, Al-Haq calls these directives "a grave violation of the rights to freedom of assembly and association guaranteed by Article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Articles 21 and 22 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights."

It goes on to add that such measures are not compatible with democratic values and political pluralism. While the first directive states that it is made in accordance with the law, it breaches international human rights standards. The second directive has no stated legal basis and even goes beyond the Israeli army's Military Order No. 62, applicable to the Gaza Strip, and No. 101, applicable to the West Bank, which restrict freedom of assembly and association.

A spokesman from Al-Haq explained that the directives are not orders based on any law, which so far does not exist, but administrative orders, similar to those issued under so-called states of emergency.

Muna Rishmawi, chairwoman of the Palestinian Lawyers Committee, also questioned the legality of such directives during the Jerusalem-based research center Panorama's second Palestinian conference on Democracy in Gaza, 10/23-26/1994. She pointed out such restrictions might have serious implications for the forthcoming Palestinian elections.

"For the Palestinian National Authority to provide an organizational structure (for political meetings) is one thing, but to require a permit cannot lead to free elections," she said.

Al-Haq has asked for the immediate withdrawal of the two directives in order to adhere to the 1988 Palestinian Declaration of Independence and Article 14 of the Agreement on the Gaza Strip and Jericho Area, which states the Palestinian authorities are required to exercise their powers and responsibilities "with due regard to internationally accepted norms and principles of human rights and the rule of law."

60075. ------. "German Politicians Pay Last Respects to Yitzhak Rabin", in The Week in Germany, November 10, 1995, p. 1. Germany's political leaders set aside their differences early this week to give unanimous voice to their shock at the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on 11/4/1995. In a telegram to Israeli President Ezer Weizman, President Roman Herzog, speaking for many Germans, praised Rabin for his courageous commitment to peace. Herzog was on hand for Rabin's funeral in Jerusalem on 11/6/1995. Joining the president were Chancellor Helmut Kohl (CDU), Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel (FDP), Bundestag President Rita Sussmuth (CDU), Prime Minister Johannes Rau of North Rhine-Westphalia (SPD) and SPD head Rudolf Scharping. Back in Germany, German citizens placed flowers and candles outside the Israeli embassy in Bonn. Taking a break from the usual parliamentary give-and-take, Chancellor Kohl praised Rabin before the Bundestag on 11/8/1995 and expressed his condolences again to Rabin's family. Rabin, the chancellor said, ranks as one of the great figures of the century and Germans owe him a particular debt of gratitude for his efforts on behalf of German-Israeli friendship. Kohl added that he hopes the tragedy of Rabin's murder will not disrupt the Middle East peace process and that Germany will do what it can to contribute to that process. While visiting the Middle East earlier this year, the chancellor announced that Germany will participate in a US $400 million water project in the region and will provide an extra DM 10 million in development aid to the Palestinian administration in Jericho and Gaza. [≡]

60076. ------. "Guide to Israeli Organizations for Peace, Coexistence and Human Rights", in Challenge, July-August 1991, p. 41. [This partial list is based on a full list prepared by the Alternative Information Center and available from the center for $5/NIS 10. The first half of this list appeared in the last issue of Challenge.]

Palestinians & Israelis for Nonviolence: Branch of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation, includes Israelis, Palestinians and foreign residents. Worked for the reunification of Palestinian families with Israelis for Family Reunification and the Palestinian Center for the Study of Nonviolence. P.O. Box 8343, Jerusalem 91083. Jeremy Milgrom, tel. 02-710892, Jerusalem; Amos Gvitz, tel. 02-5232621, Kibbutz Shlaim; Kamil Shehadeh, House of Grace, 10 Palyamon Street, Haifa. Partnership (Shutafut): Activities have included participating in efforts to take food to children in Gaza Strip refugee camps, running a club for Arab and Jewish children in Haifa, and other coexistence activities. Coordinates a broad coalition of peace groups in the Haifa area. P.O. Box 9577, Haifa, tel. 04-660281.

Peace Now: Organizes rallies and "peace days" in the West Bank, demonstrations against the founding of new settlements, solidarity visits to villages in the Occupied Territories. 177 Ben Yehuda Street, Tel Aviv 63472, tel. 03-5460227, fax 03-5464239; Jerusalem tel. 02-690134. Account 783-177887, Bank Hapoalim, Zion Square Branch, Jerusalem.

Public Committee Against Torture in Israel: Founded in 1/90 by a group of lawyers, psychiatrists and professionals to fight the use of torture as a means of interrogation. Uncovers and publicizes facts so as to mobilize public opinion for the abolition of torture. P.O. Box 8388, Jerusalem 91083, tel. 02-630073. Rabinic Human Rights Watch: Israeli rabbis from Orthodox, Conservative and Reform streams who oppose abuses of Palestinian human rights, make condolence visits to victims of settler violence, counter inaccurate information with eyewitness testimony. P.O. Box 32225, Jerusalem. Jeremy Milgrom, tel. 02-710892.

Red Line - Jews and Arabs Against the Occupation: Western Galilee-based group which began with a four-day march from the northwest corner of Israel to Jerusalem. Solidarity visits to West Bank villages bringing food, clothing and medical aid, and public appearances at kitutzim, villages and schools. Currently building a playground in an Arab-Jewish neighborhood of Acre. Supports negotiations with the PLO and a two-state solution. Works in conjunction with the Council of Heads of Arab Local Councils. P.O. Box 207, Nahariya. Account 36730, Barclay's Discount Bank, Main Branch, Acre.

Reshet (Women's Network for the Advancement of Peace): Grew out of Brussels meetings of Israeli and Palestinian women in 1989. Brings a broad spectrum of Israeli women, including many from the mainstream, into contact with leaders and rank-and-file of Palestinian women's committees. Makes visits to women's committee projects in the Occupied Territories and invites Palestinian women to speak to women's groups in Israel. P.O. Box 9668, Jerusalem 91090. Rene Anne Gutter, tel. 02-410002, Jerusalem; in the Tel Aviv area tel. 03-227663.

Runners for Peace: Israeli-Palestinian running club sponsored by Runners World magazine. Successfully appeals an army ban on their running in Bethlehem wearing T-shirts reading, "Peace between Palestine and Israel, each free and secure," in the colors of both flags. Members also run within the Jerusalem city limits, and joined Palestinian and Israeli runners from Nazareth and Wadi Ara in a recent demonstration against the expropriation of land from these areas. 19 Kafir Etzion Street, Jerusalem. Hillel Bardin, tel. 02-732936.

Shati (Support Project for Voluntary Organizations): Provides technical assistance and training in fund-raising and other organizational skills to volunteer groups. Recently facilitated a study day on "How to Put Across the Message of Peace" for the Forum for Political Education, 33 Rambam Street, Jerusalem, tel. 02-634706.

Women & Peace Coalition: Arab, Jewish and mixed Israeli women's organizations working with "independents" to end the occupation and other forms of oppression. Sponsors annual women's peaceconferences. Organized a march of over 500 Israeli and...
Palestinian women in both parts of Jerusalem during the “1990: Time for Peace” events of 12/89, and a weekend conference in Kfar Yasif on “Fear as a Barrier to Peace” in 6/90. P.O. Box 61128, Jerusalem 91060. Haya Shalom, tel. 02-255984.

Women’s Organization for Political Prisoners: Assists Palestinian women prisoners in Israeli jails by providing information to prisoners’ families, delivering clothes and other necessities to prisoners, making visits after release, providing better sanitary conditions. Jerusalem branch publishes monthly reports in Hebrew and English. Tel Aviv branch publishes newsletter in Hebrew, English and Spanish; the two branches function separately. Jerusalem: P.O. Box 8537, Jerusalem 91083. Account 707317, Barclays Discount Bank, Branch 63, Jerusalem. Tikva Parnass, tel. 02-241159. Tel Aviv: P.O. Box 31811, Tel Aviv 61361. Yael Oren, tel. 03-294510.

Women in Black: Organizes one-hour women’s vigils every Friday afternoon at over 30 locations throughout Israel and several in Europe and North America, demanding an end to the occupation. Began soon after the outbreak of the Intifada. In Jerusalem, the vigil is held at France Square, near the Kings Hotel and in Tel Aviv near the northern train station, both from 1:00-2:00 p.m. P.O. Box 61128, Jerusalem 91060, tel. 02-255984. Ditza Bitterman, 209 Dizengoff Street, Tel Aviv, tel. 03-410452.

Yesh Gvul (There is a Limit): Movement of conscientious objectors to army service in the Occupied Territories. Some 600 reservists have signed movement’s petition declaring their refusal to “take part in suppressing the uprising and insurrection in the territories.” Holds periodic forums open to the public, solidarity demonstrations with imprisoned objectors, and other activities. P.O. Box 6953, Jerusalem 91068. Ishal Menuchen, tel. 02-637201. [∗]

The seven hour meeting was entitled “Human Rights Intervention and Protection: A Workshop of Israeli and Palestinian Human Rights Organizations on Roles, Responsibilities and Cooperation in the Current Period.” It focused on practical issues of administrative and legal intervention on behalf of Palestinian individuals and groups following the Cairo Agreement and early empowerment.

The workshop dealt with the changes and difficulties human rights advocates have been experiencing in assisting clients, both in the autonomous areas and in he West Bank, during the past he agenda included land-related issues; prisoners and detainees; health care; freedom of movement; residency; rights; workers rights and compensation for injury; and property loss.

The discussions provided the human rights community an unprecedented opportunity to clarify new procedures and the responsibilities of the Palestinian and Israeli authorities on various issues. It also enabled participants to share information on strategies and results of their interventions under new circumstances.

Several proposals for follow-up and cooperation in the future were considered, with a view toward insuring protection of human rights, and providing appropriate and effective services.

The meeting, the first of its kind since the signing of the Declaration of Principles in 9/1993, through some 50 human rights officials, representing 15 organizations including the Association of Civil Rights in Israel, B’Tselem, Workers Hotline, the Public Committee against Torture in Israel, Physicians for Human Rights, Defense for Children International (Israeli and Palestinian sections), the Alternative Information Center, Al-Haq, Bir Zeit Human Rights Office, Mandela Institute, Land and Water Establishment, the Society of St. Yves, and the Gaza Center for Rights and Law.

Through an intensive coordinated effort of ACRI, HaMoked, MK Naomi Chazan, and the Palestinian National Authority officials, six Gazans received permits to attend the meeting. A representative of Solidarity International was refused a permit to attend by the Israeli authorities for security reasons. [∗]

60078. -------. “Health and Economics: Coping with a Climate of Violence,” in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 22, 1995, p. 12. The Gaza Community Mental Health Program organized its Second International Conference on “Palestinians in Transition: Rehabilitation and Community Development,” on 9/13-15/1995 at the Rashad Shaqer Center for Rehabilitation and Research, Gaza. The main themes of the conference included violence, ideology, national mental health planning, women’s issues, children and the psychological impact of war. Rachma Marton, chair of the Association for Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights, spoke during the plenary session on mental health. She gave several examples of how severely mentally ill Palestinian prisoners are wrongly diagnosed by Israeli physicians as having no mental illness. She added that if the prisoners do not behave normally due to their illness, they are placed in solitary confinement where their mental health deteriorates further. Maton pointed out that the physicians themselves are victims of a “system which swallows physicians.” The director of the Middle East Justice Network, USA, Nancy Murray, gave a lecture entitled, “In Whose Interests: United States’ Policy and Democracy in Palestine.” During her current visit to the Palestinian areas, she was struck by the deepening of the Israeli government’s apartheid practices. She defined apartheid as the systematic separating of groups to perpetuate the dominance of one group. Murray addressed the question of how Palestinians in this period of transition can work toward a future without apartheid. If the Palestinians mobilize to tell the world they will not accept an apartheid solution, it will spur anti-apartheid movements all over the world, particularly in the United States. This approach would be successful because the anti-apartheid movement which fought apartheid in South Africa was very strong, and so the groundwork for a movement against Israeli apartheid has already been laid. Eyad Sarraj, head of the Gaza Community Mental Health Program, tackled the issue of the settlers’ violence in Hebron. He said that about fifty Palestinian girls were injured by settlers who attacked their school in Hebron on 9/14/1995. Seventeen toddlers, one to eighteen months old, were hospitalized after Israeli soldiers unleashed tear gas outside their daycare center, he added.

A number of workshops were organized later to discuss ideology and racism, the psychological effects of historical events on the individual and on society, racism in the Zionist mind, and medical strategies for the care of victims of torture. Inge Genefke, medical director of the Rehabilitation and Research center for Torture Victims, in Denmark, argued that torture is the most effective weapon against democracy. She also said that torture is an instrument of power and is used by many governments throughout the world to maintain their power base and exercise control over their citizens. “This violates the United Nations’ Convention which issued a declaration against torture in 1987.” She added that despite the long-term effects on torture, it is possible eventually to rehabilitate the victims of torture. Sorem Bojholm, a psychiatrist at the Rehabilitation and Research Center for Torture Victims, focused on monitoring the health and rehabilitating the survivors of torture. He propounded the theory of their being a link between the method of torture used and the subsequent symptoms manifested by the survivors. Rona Fields, from the Association in Community Psychology, USA, described the torture suffered by Palestinian prisoners during the Intifada and stressed the need for helping the prisoners to adjust to life outside prison. [∗]

60079. -------. “Health: First Pancreas Transplant in Nablus”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 2, 1996, p. 12. The first transplant operation of its kind was conducted by a Palestinian physician, Yusef Masri, at the Women Union Hospital in Nablus 1/21/1996. The doctor operated on Fathi Wishahi, age thirty-four, from Jerin, who was suffering from diabetes. According to Masri, one-third of the patient’s pancreas was taken out while the rest was transplanted in his intestine. He said the patient is recuperating and will soon be discharged from the hospital. The surgical doctor hailed this advance for local medicine, saying, “We first had to ensure the patient did not suffer from diabetes.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

After that, the five-hour operation went smoothly and successfully." [=]

60080. -------. "Health: Thalii–Development is the Basis of Our Existence", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 2, 1996, p. 12. Maqassed Hospital in East Jerusalem is continuing in its efforts to improve its medical care and services. The hospital recently opened a new hereditary disease department. It is the first of its kind in the hospitals of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Amr Thalji, the head of the Maqassed Hospital said, "The addition of this important department to the hospital was done in accordance with the general policy of the hospital. The hospital strives to enhance its own sections in order to fill the gap in the medical care and services that are available in Palestine. We have been planning to open this department for years. We sent Doctor Bassam Abu Libdeh abroad to continue his studies in the specialty of hereditary diseases. He has now returned and is implementing his training." Thalji pointed out that Palestinian society is in great need of this kind of health service. "There is a comprehensive plan to improve all the sections in the hospital but its realization depends on our financial capabilities," he said. Abu Libdeh said that the new department will greatly aid the efforts to eradicate the problem of hereditary diseases. He added that the department will be staffed by specialists and will aim at spreading awareness of the worryingly high incidence of hereditary diseases among the Palestinian population. He explained that the cultural acceptance of intra-family marriages is the main reason behind the increase of such diseases in the society. He continued, "The services offered here are of two kinds. Firstly, in our clinics, we provide intensive care for patients suffering from such hereditary diseases as mental retardation and abnormality. Secondly, we offer post-treatment care for these patients and counseling programs for pregnant women who are carrying retarded babies. We give them medical advice and educate them in the dangers of marrying relatives, taking certain medicine or being exposed to x-rays during pregnancy. We also counsel young couples who are contemplating marriage and who are related to one another about any possible negative effects on their children." Abu Libdeh added that, in order to avoid hereditary diseases, the department laboratories examine the chromosomes, blood and CVS of the patients. "If we detect the disease, we sit with the parents and explain the danger and ways to avoid it in the future. We also explain to them the possible problems the patient will face in the future so that they can prepare themselves." Asked if there are treatments for the hereditary diseases, Abu Libdeh said, "There are a lot of hereditary diseases. Some become fatal in a short period. Others can be treated but not totally eradicated." Abu Libdeh said that, now the hereditary disease department of the Maqassed Hospital is open, people no longer have to go to Israeli hospitals for treatment where treatment is very expensive. He explained that the cost of treatment at the Maqassed Hospital is one-sixth of the cost at the Israeli hospitals. He added that this will allow more Palestinians to have access to important treatment. [=]

60081. -------. "ID Procedures Changed", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), November 11, 1994, p. 2. The lawyer who specializes in family reunification at the Alternative Information Center, Ahmed Ruweidi, along with field researcher Fuad Abu Raya met 11/8/1994 with the head of the pediatric sector of the Makassed Hospital, Anwar Dudin. Ruweidi explained details of the new procedures in the ministry of interior regarding birth registration in the hospitals of Jerusalem.

He said that babies of Jerusalemite mothers and West Bank fathers will be registered with their mothers as Jerusalemites. Although a meeting took place between the hospital officials and the head of the interior office, there were no clear and direct instructions regarding the registration of new born babies in Palestinian hospitals.

The ministry refused to deal with the hospital and claimed that there was no such law. Abu Raya pointed out that the hospital started giving identity numbers to babies of Jerusalemite parents from 6/1994 automatically. As those fees are paid by the National Insurance directly to the hospital, the parents were not charged. The hospital also pays the money for the baby through a special clerk who gives them directly to the Jerusalem-born mother.

Shukri Alayan said there are special problems related to the registration of babies born among the population of the West Bank. The hospital provides the Ministry of Interior with three copies of the registration. The ministry then sends the copies to the civil administrator responsible for the area in which the child was born.

While this is the procedure Alayan says the Ministry of Interior does not send on the registration papers. This ends up costing the citizens $100 in fines because parents are obliged to announce the birth of a child within 10 days. [=]

60082. -------. "IFOR Recommends Japan Settle Sexual Slavery Issue (4): Some Legal Issues: Possibility for Retrospective Legislation", in Peoples Korea, June 4, 1994, p. 7. [Continued from the 4/9/1994 issue] The Japanese legislature may face the legal issues under Articles 31 and 39 of the Japanese Constitution, which guarantees the due process of law and prohibition of a retrospective panel legislation. Therefore, we need to examine whether any retrospective legislation is possible for the said purpose, namely punishment of the past crimes. Article 15 (1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Japan has been a Party since 1979, prohibits a retrospective penal law, in general, by stating, "No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offense on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offense, under national or international law." It should be noted, however, that the said provision allows conviction on account of any act or omission which constituted a criminal offense under "international law." Furthermore, Article 15 (2) stipulates "Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations." As a result, it is allowed for the State Parties to legislate retrospective domestic laws in order to punish perpetrators who committed a criminal offense according to the general principles of law under international law (see M. Novak, "UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights CCPR Commentary," NP Engel, p. 281). One may find such examples in many countries including Israel, Australia, the UK, Canada, and Denmark. [=]

60083. -------. "In Brief: Occupied Palestine", in Crescent International, May 1-15, 1994, p. 2. Fatma Khalayfeh, a 21-year-old Palestine mother of one, who was pregnant with her second child, was shot and killed in her home when a zionist settler, Natan Engelsman, started to fire wildly in Al-Jub refugee camp on 4/12/1994. The camp is five kilometers from Jerusalem. [=]

60084. -------. "In Briefs: Have Deal Will Travel," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 6, 1995, p. 2. President Yasser Arafat flew to Saudi Arabia 10/2/1995, where he met Crown Prince Abdallah Ibn Abdel Aziz to discuss the peace process, the issue of job opportunities for Palestinians in Saudi Arabia, and his gratitude for the prince’s pledge of $100 million for the self-rule areas. Arafat arrived in Yemen 10/3/1995, where he again discussed the peace process with President Ali Abdullah Saleh. The next afternoon, 10/4/1995, Arafat reached Cairo where, in addition to discussing the peace process, he discussed the urgent issues of the plight of the Palestinians expelled from Libya and Israel's refusal to set free women prisoners. He also congratulated Mubarak on the anniversary of the October War of 1973. [=]

60085. -------. "In Memoriam, Dr. Lilian Moed", in Challenge, March-April, 1991. p. 10. A leader, a teacher, an educator and a woman of vision, she dedicated her life to reforming the world and to the values of equality, women’s rights, peace and nonviolence. We mourn her loss. Women and Peace; Women in Black; WILPF. [=]

60086. -------. "In a Policy Shift, United Jewish Appeal Federation of New York (UJA) Ready To Accept 'Directed Giving'," in Forward (New
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

York, November 22, 1996, p. 2. The United Jewish Appeal Federation of New York has decided to end its policy against directed giving, and will allow donations to be directed to programs such as overseas rescue and Jewish continuity, or programs to assist the emigration of Soviet Jews and sending children to Jews-only summer camps. The new policy could have implications for charities that maintain direct money overseas, such as the United Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal. Directed giving may also be allowed by the Jewish Federation Council of Greater Los Angeles. Some, such as Rita Kaplan, founder of the Rita J. & Stanley H. Kaplan Foundation, see directed giving as allowing more to be spent on “Jewish continuity”, rather than the traditional 70%-US and 30%-Israel split. [TXT]

---

60087. ------. “Infected Prostitute [Israeli prostitute seeking entry to drug treatment program tested positive, but failed to return; has sex with six men per day; she will sue the Ministry of health with not seeking her out; 154 AIDS deaths, 73 alive with AIDS, 1010 with HIV],” in AIDS Newsletter, March 1993. p. 9. [TXT]

60088. ------. “Intifada Update: 7/18/93”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 1. The military authorities handed over the body of Fathi Abu Khader, 40, to his family. He was laid to rest in a massive funeral. The man died in hospital as a result of wounds sustained earlier in the week.

In Jabalya refugee camp in the Strip, a 10-year-old youth was shot and injured by soldiers as they retaliated at stonethrowers.

In Khan Yunis, another Palestinian was also shot and injured. A Molotov was tossed at a military vehicle in Shate’ refugee camp, Gaza Strip, but failed to explode, according to military sources. [=]

60089. ------. “Intifada Update: 7/20/93”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 1. Izzat Matar, 10, of Jabalya refugee camp, died in the hospital. The boy was shot and injured in the head the previous day.

In Khan Yunis, a hand grenade was tossed at a police station, but no injuries were reported.

A Molotov was tossed at a military encampment in Hebron. No casualties were reported. [-] 60090. ------. “Intifada Update: 7/21/93”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 1. A Palestinian youth died when he was run over by an Israeli police car in Abasan, in the Strip. Suleiman Anafat, 16, was riding his bicycle at the time.

Another Palestinian died of a heart attack as he was chased by the military in the village of Sawahreh a-Sharqiyah on the outskirts of Jerusalem. The man was identified as Aziz Zuheikah, 21. The village observed a day of mourning in memory of the youth. Zuheikah was also mourned in a leaflet distributed by Fatah.

Molotovs were tossed at military vehicles in Khan Yunis, but no injuries were reported.

In Bureij refugee camp, Gaza Strip, soldiers arrested a youth hunting for membership in Fatah. He was previously sentenced to 20 years imprisonment and then released in the prisoner exchange of 1985.

Curfew was imposed on Salif, village in the Nablus district, following protests and clashes with the army. [=] 60091. ------. “Intifada Update: 7/22/93”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 1 & 15. In Gaza City, three people were shot and injured. Three other masked youths were arrested.

In Jerusalem, youths attacked a military car in the area of Ras al-Amoud. Soldiers arrived and searched for youths.

The main street in Abu Dis was blocked by youths. Israel sources reported that at least 605 people from the West Bank were arrested in Jerusalem for not having permits.

In Hebron, the military used tear gas to disburse stonethrowers.

A youth tossed a Molotov at a military vehicle in Jerusalem. The youth was arrested later, according to the army.

Another Molotov was also tossed at a military car in the Rafah Strip. [=] 60092. ------. “Intifada Update: 7/23/93”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 15. Six Palestinians from Shate’ camp - four of them children - were shot and injured. Sources in Shifa Hospital said one of the injured was a 4-year-old girl who was shot with live ammunition in the stomach. She remains in stable condition.

Curfew was imposed on Shabboura camp in Rafah from 3 a.m. to 9 a.m. on allegations that the army was hunting for Intifada activists.

Many homes were entered forcefully and searched thoroughly, while dozens of residents were arrested for interrogation.

A Molotov was lobbed at an army post in Hebron. Soldiers shot their guns in the air, and the army didn’t disclose the amount of damage.

Demonstrations took place in the streets of al-Bireh and Ramallah. Tires were lit and youths attacked soldiers with empty bottles. Soldiers retaliated with percussion bombs and tear gas. [=]

Two soldiers were injured when a hand grenade was tossed at them in Rafah. A fire bomb was also tossed in the city at a military patrol. Massive acts of protest were also reported in the city of Gaza.

Curfew was lifted off Bureij camp. 6/8/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead Raed Yahya Khousa, 21, in the Sheikh Radwan quarter of Gaza City.

Nine Palestinians were shot and injured in Shate’ and Jabalya refugee camps.

Two fire bombs were tossed at an Israeli military patrol in the city of Hebron. The area was cordoned off and searched.

The military reported that a wanted youth was arrested in the town of Beit Sahour, near Bethlehem.

Military authorities sealed a mosque in the village of Burqin, bringing the number of sealed mosques over the past two days to three.

Another mosque was also off for two months in the village of Ubeidiyyeh, in the Bethlehem region.

A mosque in the village of Deir Dibwan, near Ramallah, was also sealed by the authorities.

Several houses were raided in the village of Kufr Ra’i, near Nablus.

6/9/93: A general strike was observed throughout the occupied territories to mark the beginning of the 67th months of the Intifada.

Israeli soldiers shot dead 12-year-old Amin Ammarm, from Bureij refugee camp in the Strip. The body of the martyr was laid to rest under strict military restrictions.

14 others were also shot in the clashes with the military in the camp and 11 others were arrested. The clashes occurred after the curfew was lifted off the camp, which has a population of about 22000.

In Aida refugee camp, in Bethlehem, 3 Palestinians were shot and injured by the military.

In Khan Yunis, an Israeli force arrested 2 Palestinians who stoned the military.

An Israeli truck driver was injured in the back when stabbed by a Palestinian girl at Erez checkpoint.

In Jabalya camp, a fire bottle was tossed at a military patrol.

Clashes were also reported in Gaza City.

In Hebron, a fire bomb was tossed at a military patrol.

6/10/93: In the Strip, at least four Palestinians were shot and injured by the military.

A hand grenade was tossed at a military path in Rafah refugee camp. The bomb exploded, but caused no damages nor casualties, according to the army. [=]

Two other youths were injured in Shate’ camp after demonstrations there.

In Khan Yunis and Rafah, five Palestinians were shot and injured during clashes with the army.

Two Molotovs were lobbed at an Israeli jeep in the center of Ramallah, allegedly causing no damage. Soldiers opened fire at the direction they though the cocktails came from, but no injuries were reported.

The army announced it had arrested two youths in the Gaza Strip who belonged to the Red Eagles, a strike force belonging to the PFLP. Riad Issa, of Rafah, and Khaled Issa, of Shate’ camp, were arrested along with three other Palestinians who “provided assistance” to them. [=]

60095. ------. "Intifada Update: Confrontations Similar to Early Intifada: Part 1", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), March 22, 1993. p. 1, 2. The week was marked with massive confrontations between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip. The confrontations were as fierce as those which erupted at the beginning of the Intifada more than five years ago.

Israei soldiers shot dead five Palestinians, among whom was a three-year-old girl. Large numbers of civilians also suffered injuries this week. The number of Palestinians killed during the Intifada is now put at 1198.

Curfews were imposed in several areas, while military presence was escalated throughout the occupied territories, especially in Jerusalem.

The following are incidents reported during the week:

3/13/93: Clashes were reported in several areas in the occupied territories leaving a number of Palestinians injured. In Khan Yunis in the Gaza Strip, curfew was imposed and search campaigns were conducted for Palestinians suspected of killing an Israeli settler the previous day.

In Jabalya refugee camp in the strip, at least one Palestinian was shot and injured in clashes with the Israeli army.

An Israeli car was set ablaze in Jerusalem.

Stones were hurled at police headquarters in Bethlehem.

In Tulkarm, a homemade bomb exploded. No damages or injuries were reported.

Curfew was imposed on Hebron following an incident in which shots were fired at an Israeli army patrol.

3/14/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead 3-year-old Huda Siaje in Hebron. The girl was in her father’s car when soldiers fired at the car, killing her. The army said her father failed to stop for an identification check.

Several Molotovs were tossed at an Israeli bus near Ibrahim mosque in Hebron; no damages were reported.

Two Molotovs were also tossed at an Israeli bus in al-Bireh, Ramallah area.

More Molotovs were tossed at Israeli patrols in the Gaza Strip. In Jabalya refugee camp, at least four Palestinians were injured when soldiers shot stone throwers.

In Beit Hanoun in the Strip, three youths were shot and injured when soldier tried to quell demonstrators and stone throwers.

The city of Khan Yunis remained under curfew for the second day in a row. A 13-day curfew was lifted off Block C in Rafah.

Two youths were arrested in Jerusalem for allegedly stoning Israeli patrols.

In the Strip, a youth suspected of stabbing an Israeli was arrested. [=]

60096. ------. "Intifada Update: Confrontations Similar to Early Intifada: Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), March 22, 1993. p. 1, 2. 3/15/93: Israel Radio reported that an Israeli army patrol was fired on by individuals in an Arab car in Gaza City; no injuries were reported.

In Jabalya, the authorities sealed the house of a youth suspected of stabbing an Israeli settler.

In Khan Yunis, another house was also sealed because the owner allegedly took part in killing a settler earlier in the month.

Curfew remained in force in the city of Khan Yunis for the third day in a row.

Curfew was reimposed on Block C in the Rafah refugee camp only hours after it was lifted after a duration of 13 days. Camp dwellers attacked military patrols and settlers with stones.

Three Molotovs were tossed at a military camp in Rafah camp. In Jerusalem, an Israeli bus was set ablaze at the Central Bus Station near Damascus Gate in East Jerusalem.

Stones were also hurled at Israeli cars north of Jerusalem.

3/16/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians and injured scores of others in a fierce confrontation in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

In Khan Yunis refugee camp, Said Salmi, 17, and Faiz Basiouk, 19, were shot dead. At least 50 others were shot and injured in various incidents as fierce confrontations broke out in the camp. The incidents occurred shortly after a two-day curfew was lifted off the camp and the town of Khan Yunis.

A bomb was also tossed at a military patrol in the city, but caused no casualties according to military sources. The area was cordoned off and searched.

Confrontations were also reported in various neighborhoods throughout the Strip. In Jabalya camp, youthes stoned military patrols. In Rafah, clashes left at least 10 Palestinians shot and injured by the army.

In other areas in the Strip, more than 15 Palestinians were also shot and injured, and seven Molotovs were tossed at military targets. In Bureij refugee camp, one soldier was injured when a hand grenade was tossed at him.

In the West Bank, a youth was shot and injured in Hebron. Another Palestinian was also shot and injured in the village of Yatta, Hebron district, when an Israeli guard of a fuel tanker shot at stone throwers.

In Jerusalem, two Palestinians were arrested while allegedly smashing windshields of Israeli cars parked in the Damascus Gate area. [=]

60097. ------. "Intifada Update: Confrontations Similar to Early Intifada: Part 3", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), March 22, 1993. p. 1, 2. 3/17/93: A strike day was observed throughout the occupied territories. The strike was called for by Hamas to protest the expulsion of 413 Palestinians three months ago.

Scores of Palestinians were shot and injured in fierce clashes between Palestinian civilians and Israeli soldiers.

In Gaza City and the refugee camps of Khan Yunis, Bureij and Nuseirat, at least 50 persons were shot and injured by soldiers. Military presence was beefed up in the West Bank and Gaza Strip after what the authorities described as a “deterioration in the security situation in the territories.”

In the West Bank, settlers continued their attacks against Palestinian property. In al-Lubban village on the Nablus-Ramallah road, settlers set a gasoline station ablaze.

Settlers also established barricades on the Ramallah road to prevent Palestinian workers from crossing the “green line.” A Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers in the village for allegedly refusing to stop for an identification check.

In Jenin, three youths were also shot and injured by soldiers.

3/18/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians in Gaza and injured more than 70 others in incidents described by some Palestinian sources as a massacre committed by the army.

In Khan Yunis, soldiers shot dead 19-year-old Raed Muhammad Shana. At least 40 others were shot and injured in incidents in the city and camp of Khan Yunis.

Israel Radio reported that scores of Palestinians stoned... soldiers and military observation posts. According to Palestinian sources, the army and Palestinian civilians clashed over the control of the roofs of two buildings in the area. Soldiers withdrew from the roof of one of the buildings following confrontations that left 69 Palestinians injured. Palestinians took control of the building following the army’s withdrawal. The army returned with reinforcements during the day and attacked the Palestinians and took control of the building again. In Rafah, Israel Radio reported that Yusef Ibrahim Gharib, 47, was shot dead. Palestinian sources said the man was shot by soldiers who were firing at stone throwers. In the West Bank, scores of students demonstrated and stoned the army in Nuru Shams refugee camp near Nablus. [–] 60098. ------. “Intifada Update: Confrontations Similar to Early Intifada: Part 4”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), March 22, 1993, p. 1, 2, 3, 1993: The army announced it had found disguises and “a variety of weapons” in a car in the Sheikh Radwan neighborhood of Gaza City. Believing that the car was used by Intifada activists that were still nearby, the army broke into a home in the neighborhood, but no arrests were made. Unidentified persons shot a car at a Hebron plate in the Jericho region. Settlers are presumed responsible. Despite the army’s heightened state of emergency in East Jerusalem, about 300,000 Muslims from inside and outside the “green line” were able to reach al-Aqsa Mosque for Friday prayers. Settlers punctured the tires of dozens of Palestinian-owned cars with knives at the Ram junction on the Ramallah-Jerusalem road overnight. [–] 60099. ------. “Intifada Update: Intifada Enters 65th Month: Part 1”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 12, 1993, p. 1, 10. Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians—a shepherd and a 13-year-old girl—in the occupied West Bank. Numerous other citizens were injured throughout the occupied territories. The number of Palestinians killed by Israeli forces during Intifada is now put at 1216. Military siege continued on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, precluding Palestinians from crossing into Israel proper and occupied East Jerusalem. The measure has created severe hardships for the population prevented more than 100,000 Palestinians from going to their jobs inside the “green line.” The army staged several search campaigns for young activists in the Gaza Strip. Many activists were reportedly arrested. Following are incidents reported through the week: 4/9/93: The military siege remained in force on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Confrontations between Palestinian civilians and the Israeli military were reported in the village of Tarqumya in the Hebron district. Two Palestinians were arrested in the incidents, and two soldiers were injured by stones. A Molotov was tossed at a military patrol near the Ibrahim Mosque in Hebron. In Ramallah, one Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers. An Israeli car was set ablaze in Jerusalem. 4/4/93: At least 27 Palestinians were shot and injured by the military in clashes in various regions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Clashes were reported in Rafah, Deir al-Balah, Bureij, Awarta, Bani Suheilah and Tarqumya. In Maghazi refugee camp, Gaza Strip, a large search campaign was conducted for “wanted” youths. Curfew was imposed on the camp in the early hours but lifted following the search. Settlers choppeddowen at least 40 olive trees in Kufir Deik, Nablus region. Scores of trees were also uprooted in the village of Deir Estiya, Nablus region. 4/5/93: Israeli soldiers shot and injured seven Palestinians in various confrontations. Meanwhile, the military siege continued. Military presence was beefed up throughout the territories. In al-Bireh, Ramallah region, Hashimiya Secondary School for Boys was ordered shut for two weeks following acts of protest by the students. [–] 60100. ------. “Intifada Update: Intifada Enters 65th Month: Part 2”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 12, 1993, pp. 1, 10. 4/6/93: A general strike called for by Islamic Jihad was observed throughout most of the occupied territories. Israeli soldiers shot dead one Palestinian and injured several others in confrontations. In Qabatyia, Jenin district, soldiers shot at Bilal Suleimana, 24, for allegedly refusing to stop for an identification check. He was killed instantly. The young man was a shepherd and was attending to his sheep at the time. Military sources reported that a “wanted” youth was arrested in Barta’a in the Jenin district. Israeli sources also reported that the army conducted search campaigns in Deir al-Balah camp in the Gaza Strip, the third such campaign to find “wanted” youths in five days. The camp was put under military siege during the search. Similar searches were also reported in Shati’ and Maghazi refugee camps, also in the Strip. In Nablus, a soldier was attacked by a Palestinian youth with a knife. The soldier, who was slightly injured, shot at the youth and seriously injured him. 4/7/93: One Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers in the village of Kufir Ain, Ramallah district. The incident occurred when soldiers opened fire at stone throwers. An Israeli passenger was shot and injured near the settlement of Kiryat Arba, Hebron district. In the village of Barta’a, Jenin district, an 18-year-old youth was shot and injured by soldiers. In Jenin, a Molotov was tossed at a military jeep, setting it ablaze. Two “wanted” youths were reportedly arrested in Khan Yunis. Four others who allegedly helped them hide were also arrested. 4/8/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead Ra’ida Qarrah, 13, in the village of Bani Suheilah, east of Khan Yunis. The girl was shot in the head. No further details were available. In Gaza City, soldiers attacked demonstrators who stoned military patrols. In the city and camp of Khan Yunis, the military conducted a large search campaign. Curfew was imposed on both the city and camp during the search. Several people were arrested. 4/9/93: The occupied territories witnessed a general strike as the Intifada entered its 65th month. Two Palestinians were injured by soldiers in Burqin during confrontation in the Jenin-area village. The Palestinian were identified as Majed Shalamish, 19 and Hasan Iqz, 65. The home of Sharif Abu Dhile, of Jiftlek in the Jordan Valley, was sealed. Abu Dhile was accused of having killed a settler in January 1991. A homemade bomb was lobbed at a military car as it passed by a mosque in al-Khadr, near Bethlehem. [–] 60101. ------. “Intifada Update: Intifada Enters 66th Month”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 17, 1993, pp. 1-2. The Israeli military shot dead four Palestinian civilians in the occupied territories during the week. The army announced that it had killed six Palestinian activists as they tried to cross into Egypt early in the week. The number of Palestinians killed by Israelis during the current Palestinian uprising in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip is now put at 1251. Scores of Palestinian civilians were also shot and injured by soldiers in various acts of protests. Attacks against the Israeli military witnessed a noticeable escalation. At least 10 soldiers were injured in various incidents. The following are incidents reported during the week: 5/8/1993:
In the village of Deir Dibwan in the Ramallah area, soldiers shot and killed Nazem Jawad Sarmeh, 16, after their patrol was stoned by youths in the village.

In the Gaza Strip, at least nine Palestinians were shot and injured by Israeli soldiers. A Palestinian source reported that five "wanted" Palestinians were able to escape from Gaza to Egypt.

5/9/1993: The occupied territories witnessed a general strike as the Intifada entered its 66th month.

In the Rimal neighborhood of Gaza City, two children were shot and injured when soldiers chased a number of stone throwers. Ten other Palestinians were also reported injured by soldiers in the Strip.

In the town of Kufr R`ai, in the Jenin district of the West Bank, one youth was shot and injured after youths stoned soldiers.

In the village of al-Khadr in the Bethlehem region, one person was shot and injured when soldiers attacked stone throwers. 5/10/1993: In the town of Beit Ummar, near Hebron, soldiers shot and injured one youth when their patrol was stoned.

5/10/1993: In the town of Beit Ummar, near Hebron, soldiers shot and injured one youth when their patrol was stoned.

5/10/1993: In the city of Rafah, the Strip, two youths were shot and injured when soldiers attacked stone throwers.

5/11/1993: Six Palestinians were shot and injured in Rafah City, Gaza City and Shate' refugee camp.

Two other bottles were tossed at a military patrol in the West Bank village of Bal'a.

Large numbers of Israeli forces raided the city of Deir al-Balah in the Gaza Strip in the search for wanted Palestinians. The forces destroyed a number of houses which the army suspects of having once harbored Palestinian activists.

In Nablus a soldier was shot and injured.

5/10/1993: In the town of Beit Ummar, near Hebron, soldiers shot and injured one youth when their patrol was stoned.

In Jerusalem, an Israeli car was set ablaze. Five Israeli cars were set ablaze in the Thouri neighborhood of Jerusalem.

Stones were hurled at soldiers in the city of Gaza. Tear gas was used against protesting youths there. In the village of Beit Ur al-Tahta, a fire bottle was tossed at a military patrol.

Two other bottles were also tossed at a military patrol in the town of Aboud, southwest of Nablus.

5/11/1993: Six Palestinians were shot and injured in Rafah City when an Israeli patrol retaliated after being shot at by youths. One Israeli soldier was also injured in the incident. The area of the incident was cordoned off for searches.

Two other Palestinians were shot and injured in the city of Gaza.

In the city of Khan Yunis in the Strip, a fire bottle was tossed at an Israeli patrol. No casualties were reported.

Curfew was imposed on Deir al-Balah refugee camp.

In Bureij camp, soldiers attacked school children with tear gas after they conducted acts of protest.

5/12/1993: Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians and injured several others in various areas of the occupied territories.

In Deir al-Balah in the Strip, soldiers shot dead Fouad Temraz, 10. Several others were also shot and injured in the incidents.

In the Shaboura quarter of Rafah camp, soldiers shot dead Muhammad Salem Abu Talimah, 13.

At least 25 people were shot and injured in the Strip during the day.

Fierce clashes between Palestinian protesters and Israeli soldiers were witnessed in the Strip, after news broke out that the army had killed six Palestinians from the Izz ad-Din al-Qassam units in Gaza.

The six had been trying to cross into Egypt one week before.

A general commercial strike was observed in the Strip in protest.

In the city of Nablus, two Israeli soldiers were stabbed and injured by unknown youths. The guns of the two soldiers were also taken by the attackers. Curfew was imposed on the city following the incident and searches were conducted.

5/13/1993: Soldiers shot dead Ra'fat Aqel, 20, of Nuseirat refugee camp in the Strip, and injured 10 others in confrontations with Palestinian protesters.

In Rafah refugee camp, also in the Strip, seven Israeli soldiers were injured when a hand grenade was tossed at their encampment on a rooftop in the camp. Curfew was imposed on the camp following the incident.

One hour following the incident, an Israeli patrol was shot at in the Shaboura quarter of Rafah. An attacker was injured when soldiers shot back, but he was able to escape.

Curfew was imposed on the area.

Curfew remained in force in Jabalya refugee camp and Beit Lahiya for the second day in a row. Curfew was, however, lifted off Rafah camp.

A commercial strike was observed for the second day in the Strip to protest the killing of six Hamas activists.

In Am'tari refugee camp in the West Bank one person was shot and injured in clashes with the army.

Curfew remained in force in the city of Nablus for the second day.

5/14/1993: A bomb was placed in a military post in Yatta, near Hebron. The army said it defused the bomb before any damages occurred.

A Molotov was tossed at an army vehicle near the al-Akhdar Mosque in Hebron; no damages were reported.

In the Thouri neighborhood of Jerusalem, two Molotovs were lobbed at an Israeli car. One of the cocktails hit an Arab residence, but it did not ignite. The other hit the car and exploded, causing physical damage.

Two 12-year old boys were injured when soldiers opened fire at demonstrators in Bureij camp, in the Strip.

Two other Palestinians were injured during demonstrations in Gaza City and Shate' refugee camp.

The curfew on Jabalya and its camp entered its third day while the curfew on Rafah and its camp entered its second day. The army said these curfews were necessary for the search for Palestinian activists.

A 17 year old from Ainabous, near Nablus, was shot and moderately injured when soldiers opened fire at stone throwers in the village.

In Sa'ir, near Hebron, soldiers shot a 16-year old boy in the foot, alleging he had been throwing stones at them. [=]
West Bank and Gaza Strip is now put at 1241.
Clashes continued in various regions between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian civilians. Below is a summary of the week’s incidents:

4/30/93: A settler alleged he was fired at in the settlement of Gilo, south of Jerusalem, by an unknown assailant. The settler was slightly injured. The assailant was said to have fled towards the town of Beit Jala, near Bethlehem. Curfew was imposed on the town while search campaigns were conducted.

In the village of Abu Dis, Molotov cocktails were tossed at an Israeli patrol; no casualties were reported.

In the village of Mughayer in the Ramallah region, a “Wanted” Palestinian was arrested.

In the Strip, three alleged members of the pro-PFLP Red Eagle group were arrested.

In Beit Hanoun, in the Strip; three other Palestinians were arrested. Guns were found in their possession.

5/1/93: In Jenin, a fire bomb was tossed at an Israeli encampment. The surrounding area was searched by the military.

Clashes were reported in the villages of Zababdeh and az-Zawiyia, in the Jenin district. In the village of Kufr Deik, two youths were arrested.

In the Bethlehem region, curfew remained in force in the village of Irmas.

Curfew was also imposed on a quarter in the city of Hebron.

IN Qalandia refugee camp, near Ramallah, owners of two houses were notified by themilitarythat their houses will be sealed.

In the village of Kharbatha, also near Ramallah, the villagers were forced to paint over the slogans on the walls.

In Beit Hanoun in the Strip, curfew entered its second day. Six houses were demolished by the military. Eight people were also arrested in the town on charges of resisting occupation.

In Gaza City, a hand grenade was tossed at a military patrol. Soldiers shot back and the Palestinian was able to escape, according to local sources.

5/2/93: In Nablus, an Israeli patrol was stoned, and soldiers retaliated with live ammunition. One Palestinian was slightly injured.

In the village of Silat al-Harthiyeh in the Jenin district, an Israeli truck was stoned and its driver slightly injured.

A fire bomb was tossed at an Israeli car near the village of Hizma, just north of Jerusalem.

On the Hebron-Bethlehem road, an Israeli driver was stoned and slightly injured.

In Rafah, two Palestinians were shot and injured by soldiers.

According to Israeli sources, at least two of the killed were wanted for membership in an underground Fatah organization. The military alleged the incident occurred when the passengers did not heed soldiers’ orders to stop for identification. At least 14 other Palestinians were shot and injured in the Strip. Curfew was imposed on at least one neighborhood.

5/4/93: 4 more Palestinians were shot dead by the military in the occupied territories, as the Gaza Strip witnessed a strike in protest of the killing of 4 Palestinians the day before.

In Maghazi refugee camp in the Strip, soldiers shot Yusef Abu Muhaisen, 25, and his brother Jum’ah, 30.

According to press reports, a group of armed Israelis travelling in a civilian car with Gaza plates stopped near the two brothers—who were in an olive orchard—and shot them. The army claimed that Yusef was wanted by the military.

In Shate’ refugee camp, Ahmad Subuh, 20, was shot dead when soldiers shot at protesters. At least 6 Palestinians were shot and injured in the clashes.

In the West Bank, Anwar Baqah, 19, died in a hospital as a result of wounds sustained one week before.

Massive clashes in Khan Yunis left at least 25 people injured.

Near Beit Hanoun in the Strip, an Israeli guard was slightly injured when he was attacked with a knife. The area of the incident was cordoned of and searched.

In Jabalya, a fire bottle was tossed at a military patrol. At least four Palestinians were shot and injured in ensuing clashes.

In the village of Awarta, Nablus, one Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers.

5/5/93: A commercial strike was observed in the Gaza Strip in protest of the martyrdom of 8 Palestinians within two days.

Two Palestinians were shot and injured in the Tufah neighborhood of Gaza City.

In Jabalya refugee camp, scores of camp residents came out to stone the military. At least two youths were injured when soldiers shot at protesters.

In Khan Yunis, three Palestinians were shot and injured as they stoned the military.

Searches for armed activists continued by the military in the Gaza Strip cities of Khan Yunis and Abasan. Curfew was imposed to facilitate searches in one neighborhood of Rafah.

Strike was observed in Jenin and Qalqilya in protest of the high Palestinian death toll and in solidarity with the conditions of Palestinians in the Strip.

A day of mourning was observed in Nablus after the death of a city resident. Shops and businesses closed their doors.

Clashes were reported in Hebron and neighboring Halhoul.

The body of the martyr was taken by the camp residents and buried immediately in a massive funeral.

Most of the occupied territories witnessed a general strike called for by Islamic Jihad to mark the beginning of the 66th month of the Intifada. It was the third day of strike in the Strip.

In the West Bank, activists shot at an Israeli van in the town of Halhoul, near Hebron. A third Israeli vehicle in Assira village, in the Nablus district, was shot at. A third Israeli vehicle, a military car, was shot at near the town of Qabatyia, Jenin.

In Jerusalem, a Molotov was tossed at a military patrol. An Israeli car was also set ablaze in the Sheikh Jarrah neighborhood of Jerusalem.

The village of Bettir, in the Bethlehem region, was raided by soldiers during a search of stone throwers. The army alleged that the Israeli train that passes by the village was stoned.

In Hebron, two military patrols were stoned.

Several people were shot and injured in the Strips refugee camps.

5/7/93: 7 Palestinians were injured during confrontations with the army in Nuseirat, Shate’ and Bureij camps, all in the Strip.

The army sealed a street in Qalqilya, alleging that too much stone throwing was occurring there.

A coffee shop in Qabatyia, near Jenin, was also closed. The army said activists were using the site to shoot at the military government headquarters nearby.

In the Thoun neighborhood of Jerusalem, an Israeli rent-a-car was burnt down. Israeli police arrested two Palestinians for interrogation. [+]

A Molotov was tossed at a military patrol. An Israeli train that passes by the village was stoned.

According to press reports, a group of armed Israelis travelling in a civilian car with Gaza plates stopped near the two brothers—who were in an olive orchard—and shot them. The army claimed that Yusef was wanted by the military.

In Shate’ refugee camp, Ahmad Subuh, 20, was shot dead when soldiers shot at protesters. At least 6 Palestinians were shot and injured in the clashes.

In the West Bank, Anwar Baqah, 19, died in a hospital as a result of wounds sustained one week before.

Massive clashes in Khan Yunis left at least 25 people injured.

Near Beit Hanoun in the Strip, an Israeli guard was slightly injured when he was attacked with a knife. The area of the incident was cordoned of and searched.

In Jabalya, a fire bottle was tossed at a military patrol. At least four Palestinians were shot and injured in ensuing clashes.

In the village of Awarta, Nablus, one Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers.

5/5/93: A commercial strike was observed in the Gaza Strip in protest of the martyrdom of 8 Palestinians within two days.

Two Palestinians were shot and injured in the Tufah neighborhood of Gaza City.

In Jabalya refugee camp, scores of camp residents came out to stone the military. At least two youths were injured when soldiers shot at protesters.

In Khan Yunis, three Palestinians were shot and injured as they stoned the military.

Searches for armed activists continued by the military in the Gaza Strip cities of Khan Yunis and Abasan. Curfew was imposed to facilitate searches in one neighborhood of Rafah.

Strike was observed in Jenin and Qalqilya in protest of the high Palestinian death toll and in solidarity with the conditions of Palestinians in the Strip.

A day of mourning was observed in Nablus after the death of a city resident. Shops and businesses closed their doors.

Clashes were reported in Hebron and neighboring Halhoul. [ ]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Israel-Palestine

Israeli soldiers shot dead five Palestinians during the week. A fifth died as a result of wounds sustained last week. A 92-year-old man also died in the hospital after being run over by a military vehicle last week.

The number of Palestinians killed during the Intifada is now put at 1282.

Several areas in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank were raided by the military. A number of "wanted" persons were arrested.

The following are incidents reported during the week:

7/10/93: In Jenin, a man was shot and injured. The army said he was a Fatah activist.

Two Molotovs were tossed at a military patrol in Bethlehem. The area was cordoned off and searched.

Settlers raided the village of Khirbet a-Deir in the Hebron district.

In Jabalya refugee camp, in the Strip, three "wanted" Palestinians were arrested by Israeli special army units.

7/11/93: Ashraf Samamreh, 16, died in an Israeli hospital as a result of wounds sustained the previous week when soldiers shot 1 protesters in Dhahriya, Hebron district.

Israel Radio reported that three Palestinians tried to kidnap an Israeli in Ateel village in the Tulkarm district.

In Deir al-Balah refugee camp, in the Strip, a "wanted" youth was arrested, allegedly for membership in the PFLP.

7/12/93: Soldiers killed Issam Salah and Muhammad Mughrabi in Balata refugee camp, near Nablus. Two others were shot and injured.

In Yamoun village, near Jenin, one youth was shot and injured. In Rahaf, in the Gaza Strip, a hand grenade was tossed at a military patrol. No damages were reported, and the area was cordoned off and searched.

A Molotov was tossed at a military patrol in Gaza City.

Clashes were also reported in the Shaja‘yya quarter of the city.

7/13/93: Soldiers shot and injured one Palestinian in Rafah in retaliation for throwing stones. Searches also continued to search for "wanted" persons.

Another Palestinian was shot and injured in Shate‘ refugee camp.

In Gaza City, soldiers used tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse protesters. A "wanted" activist was arrested in the city. He was reportedly carrying a pistol. [=]

7/14/93: Israeli soldiers shot dead Ibrahim Samara Iweisi, 23, in al-Bireh. According to Israel TV, soldiers shot at a private car when the driver refused to stop for an identification check. Iweisi got married one week before.

Another youth—Iweisi’s cousin, who had come from Jordan to attend the wedding—was seriously injured.

Following the incident, violent protests broke out in the streets of al-Bireh and Ramallah, and army gunfire could be heard late into the evening.

In the Shaja‘yya quarter of Gaza City, a "wanted" Palestinian was arrested.

Four other persons were also arrested in Bani Suheilah in the Strip, for allegedly helping "wanted" activists to hide from the Israeli authorities.

Fierce clashes were reported in several refugee camps throughout the Strip. No information was available on the number of casualties.

7/15/93: Ahmad Abu Ilayan, 92, died in the hospital as a result of wounds sustained at the beginning of the week, when he was run over by an Israeli military vehicle.

Soldiers were raiding the marketplace in the village of Bani Suheilah when the incident took place.

Two Molotovs were tossed at an Israeli car in al-Bireh. No casualties were reported.

In the Shaja‘yya quarter, one Palestinian was shot and injured by soldiers when they tried to disperse a demonstration. Another Palestinian was also shot and injured in Shate‘ refugee camp.

In Khan Yunis, a "wanted" Palestinian was arrested. The man was found in the possession of a pistol, according to the military.

In the Ramallah district, a day of mourning was observed in memory of Ibrahim Iweisi, who was killed the previous day.

7/16/93: Soldiers shot and killed 39-year-old Fathi Abu Khdeir, of Rafah camp. The father of 6 had been shot during anti-occupation demonstrations in the Strip a few days before.

7 Gazans—four of them children—were shot by soldiers. After three Molotovs were thrown at a settler’s car in Issawiyya, near Jerusalem, the army raided the village. One Palestinian was injured by soldiers. [=]

APRIL 19: Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians and injured several others in various clashes.

According to Israeli sources, soldiers shot at two masked youths, killing one of them, in the village of Yamoun in the Jenin district.

In Khan Yunis refugee camp, soldiers shot Majdi Abu Musa, 27. The man was "wanted" by the Israeli authorities and accused of membership in the Red Eagles unit of the PFLP.

Two bombs were found by soldiers ready to explode near the Jewish settlement of Nitsarim.

Scores of demonstrators stoned Israeli cars and burned tires in the streets of Jebel Mukabber, Jerusalem area. Six youths were arrested.

In Ramallah, confrontations between protesters and the army took place in several streets in the town. One youth was shot and injured. A Molotov was tossed at a military patrol but no casualties were reported.

In the village of Beit Awa, in the Hebron district, was raided by the army and thoroughly searched.

A homemade bomb exploded near a passing Israeli car, which suffered damages, in the Hebron-area village of Sammu.

Molotovs were tossed at Israeli patrols in the village of Beita.

APRIL 20: Israeli soldiers shot dead two Palestinians, demolished 15 houses and injured several other people in clashes.

According to the army, Zakariya Shourbaji, 33, shot at a military patrol. The soldiers retaliated by killing him. An Israeli officer was shot and injured in the clash. Shourbaji was said to be a member of Hamas.

In the village of Yamoun, soldiers shot dead Majed Musleh in a clash with protesters.

Israeli forces rocketed and demolished 15 Arab houses in the Tuffah quarter of Gaza City during a search campaign. The houses were inhabited by 39 families consisting of at least 200 people. In Bani Suheila, two "wanted" youths were arrested.

Mosques were raided in the village of Shuyukh, in the Hebron district. The Israeli authorities alleged that provocative materials were found in one of the mosques.

In the village of Qarawat Bani Zeid, Nablus area, a house was sealed. The owner of the house was arrested on alleged security charges.

Another house was sealed off in the village of Azzoun, Qalqilya region, for similar reasons.[=]
Strip and injured more than 60 others during widespread anti-occupation demonstrations there. Muhammad Abu Shawish, 13, of Nuseirat refugee camp, was killed when soldiers shot him in the eye with live ammunition. Massive demonstrations had broken out in the camp after the army opened a new observation post on top of one of the buildings of the camp. Wael Sa'd, 15, of the Sheikh Radwan neighborhood of Gaza City, was killed when soldiers shot him in the head.

The residents of Gaza City held a general strike in mourning of the killing of Zakaria Shourbaji the day before and in protest of the use of rockets to destroy their homes. Palestinians reported that eight people were injured during demonstrations in Khan Yunis refugee camp. Widespread arrest campaigns continued in Jabalya and Shate' refugee camps, and in Khan Yunis and Rafah cities, where curfew was clamped to facilitate the searches.

In Hebron, an Israeli truck driver opened fire at three Palestinians, slightly injuring Mufid Atrash, 28, of Dura. The Army said the truck driver had been "provoked" by the Palestinians, and was justifed in shooting at them. A 17 year old from Dheishe refugee camp was injured in demonstrations in Bethlehem.

Three Molotovs were lobbed at an Israeli car near Tulkarm. Two Molotovs were lobbed at an army jeep near Beit Horon settlement, in the Ramallah area. No damages were incurred, and soldiers opened fire in the direction they thought the Molotovs came from. No injuries were reported. Curfew was imposed on Beit Sahour, near Bethlehem, after the sound of gunfire was heard. The curfew was lifted a few hours after imposition, and it wasn't known who fired the shots.

APRIL 22: Israeli forces raided the house of Bir Zeit Mayor Mansour Shahin and arrested two "wanted" youths. According to local reports, Israeli special forces units dressed as women shot and tossed hand grenades at the house, forcing the residents and the two youths to come out.

In Issawiyyeh, on the outskirts of Jerusalem, six children under the age of 16 were arrested. The members of the group are charged with throwing stones and Molotovs at Israeli cars, and painting nationalistic slogans on walls. In Khan Yunis, 12 people were shot and injured by the military. Curfew remained in force in Shate' and Jabalya refugee camps for the second day in a row. Clashes in Shate' camp left 14 people injured.[=]

APRIL 23: Anwar Abu Kloub, 22, was killed by soldiers in Gaza City. About 60 Palestinians were injured in the demonstrations that were taking place in the city. In the Shaboura Quarter of Rafah, violent demonstrations took place between youths and soldiers. Eight youths sustained bullet wounds and were taken to Nasser Hospital for treatment.

The army initiated a massive search campaign in Beita, near Nablus. No arrests were reported, although the army announced that "inciteful materials," such as Palestinian flags, were found in one of the village's mosques. The home of Abdul Rahman Kmeil, in Qabatya, Jenin, was sealed. The army alleges that Kmeil tried to kill a collaborator in the village two years ago. The army announced it had arrested a Fatah cell operating in the northern villages of Ramallah. Allegedly heading the cell was Ayed Hussein, 31, who was arrested in Bir Zeit the day before. According to the army, the cell is responsible for shooting at a settler recently and planning to assassinate Israeli Police Inspector-General Yaakov Terner.[=] 60111. ------. "Intifada Update: Youth Dies in Chase", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 1. A 10-year-old Palestinian youth died after being shot by the Israeli army earlier in the week. Another youth was killed when run over by a military vehicle. A third youth died of a heart attack as he was being chased by the military. The number of Palestinians killed in Intifada activities is now put at 1285.

The following are incidents reported during the week. [=] 60112. ------. "Intifada's Children: Picking Up The Pieces" Gaza's Children Have Left Emotionally Disturbed By Years of Hostilities", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, October 31, 1993. p. 15. Palestinian women with assistance of French-run Enfants Refuges du Monde have been working in Khan Younis, Gaza Strip, to counter the effects of the occupation on young children, at the Sunrise Hope Center (Al-Shuruq Wal Amal). The brutality of the generation of the Israeli occupation has scarred the souls of Palestinian children, who cannot draw pictures free of explosions or beatings by Jews soldiers. These brutalities are a simple constant in the lives of the children. Some children come to the center unable to contain their anger, portraying in their drawing the omnipresent image of Jewish soldiers kicked a Palestinian child. Some children are almost catatonic after nighttime Israeli manhunts that resulted in their relatives, who disappear after prolonged torture and beatings in front of the children, or of the death of their relatives accused of being collaborators. More than 300 children have been guided to normal social conduct from their previous trauma. The center, run by women of a variety of political affiliations, was recently confronted by PFLP and communist commandos who tried to close the center: after a confrontation, the commandos paid for damages to the center. Now, the women of the center hope to open a center for troubled Palestinian teenagers. [TXT]

60113. ------. "Israel Frees Palestinians [660 Palestinian political prisoners released by Israel, including many children imprisoned on suspicion of having thrown a stone; there were protests outside the major Gaza prison camp demanding a release of all political prisoners; a general strike on the West Bank also demanded a full release]", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, October 31, 1993. p. 3.

60114. ------. "Israel Names 'A' Woman To Be Spy Agency's Second in Command ['A; will share duties with 'D' at MOSSAD]', in Seattle Times, March 5, 1995. p. A13. [TXT]

60121. -------. "Israeli Soldiers Shot and Killed a Baby and a Palestinian Boy [in suppressing demonstrations in Gaza Strip; Palestinian gunmen are alleged to have killed two Israelis and two Palestinians in drive by shootings]", in Wall Street Journal, May 17, 1993. p. A1. [TXT]

60122. -------. "Israeli Supreme Court Grants 'Spousal Rights' to Gay Man [El Al Israel Airline forced to provide spousal benefits to Jewish gay partner of a flight attendant; Rabbi Moshe Maya of Shas warned this ruling would encourage young people to be gay]", in Seattle Times, December 1, 1994. p. A14. [TXT]

60123. -------. "Israeli Troops Fire on Palestinians Protest [Jewish soldiers attacked Palestinian protesters with tear gas and rubber bullets near Rachel's Tomb, an Israeli controlled shrine on the edge of Bethlehem; five Palestinians were hospitalized, including an elderly woman who was overcome by tear gas when Jewish troops threw tear gas canisters in her home; the protest follows the beating death of a handicapped Palestinian in a Jerusalem hospital]", in Seattle Times, May 30, 1997. p. A13. [TXT]

60124. -------. "Israelis Aim Gas As Rioters, Strike Bethlehem Schoolyard Instead", in Arizona Republic, August 27, 1997. p. A11. Scores of Palestinian schoolgirls were subjected to a chemical weapons attack intended for Palestinian dissidents but Israeli soldiers in Bethlehem, West Bank. A dozen third- and fourth-graders were treated by Palestinian emergency medical services. Israeli soldiers indifferent to gassing and provide no assistance to the non-Jewish children they gassed with chemical weapons. [TXT]

60125. -------. "Israelis Up In Arms Over Proposal To Ease Gun Rules", in Forward (New York), November 22, 1996. p. 5. Another "American export" has found its way into Israel: gun control. The issue now before the Supreme Court is the liberalization of access to guns for Jews. Interior Minister Suisa will lower the age of gun ownership from 21 to 20, will allow all veterans to own guns, and lower the rank of security personnel who automatically receive guns. The Ministry reports 300,000 Israelis are licensed to carry guns, but hundreds of thousands of additional Jews could own guns under the new law. The new law will not affect Jewish settlers in the Gaza Strip and West Bank who have a special 'frontline' right to carry guns. Some women's groups fear an increase in gun ownership will result in more domestic violence. The position of the government is that "guns don't kill, people".

60126. -------. "Jerusalem Now", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, March 24, 1995. p. 4. While all eyes are on Pres. Yasser Arafat meeting American VP Al Gore in Jericho, we see an increasing urgency in Jerusalem. The Israeli Interior Ministry is trying to empty East Jerusalem of its remaining Palestinian citizens with new administrative measures and the tough application of equally racist older ones. The new policy aims to confiscate the identity of cards from all Palestinian Jerusalemites who do not reside within the Israeli-defined municipal border of the city, particularly from women married to West Bankers. These regulations, of course, have no bearing on Jewish residents of Jerusalem, and certainly not on Israelis living in settlements in the West Bank. Meanwhile, 2200 new housing units are nearly ready on confiscated Palestinian land in Shuafat, a Palestinian neighborhood in East Jerusalem, designed to house ultra-orthodox Jews. Other settlements are expanding rapidly in the so-called greater Jerusalem area, and residents have been holding more and more protests against a spate of land confiscation. As if to pour salt on the wound, ninety-three US senators signed a non-binding referendum asking Congress to move the American Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, further alienating the Palestinian public from the peace process, and revealing the fallacy of America's role as a neutral party in the region. Further, no US voice was raised to condemn the Israeli digging under the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock, carried out without permission from the Islamic Waqf, the custodian of Haram Al-Sharif sanctuary. VP Al Gore, who heads the Builders for Peace group aimed at assisting development here, will meet Pres. Arafat in Jericho to lend his help in untangling the endangered peace process and to give developmental support. Particularly in light of the dangerous situation in Jerusalem, the credibility of the US administration is at stake. The Palestinian public cannot help but feel the US bias toward Israel, displayed last week when the US reneged on its promise to Jordan to forgive its $270 million debt. [=]

60127. ------. "Jerusalem's 27th Year of Occupation: Hadashot: 'Jewish Trainees Secretly Using Arab Babies to Practice Circumcisions', in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), June 14, 1993. p. 3. Under heavy criticism, the Israeli Ministry of Health decided last week to form a committee to investigate reports that Jewish trainees in circumcision practice on Arab babies without the knowledge of the families.

A report published in the Hebrew daily Hadashot 6/6/93 revealed that for years, Jewish trainees have been practicing on Arab babies before being officially licensed. According to the report, circumcisions in such cases are done in the absence of the babies' families and performed in secret rooms. The practice has always been kept secret.

Jewish babies born out of wedlock are also subjected to similar practices, it was disclosed.

In Israel, when official circumcisers cannot perform the operation they must suggest someone else to perform the task. The babies' parents usually accept the suggestion, now knowing that this was a means to enable trainees to get some practice, said the report.

There are approximately 90000 Jewish and Muslim males born in Israel every year, noted the report. Each circumcision costs $110.

The Hadashot report found that Jewish religious institutions and even Jews from abroad knew about the practices and trained on Arab babies.

The news created great indignation among the Palestinians living inside Israel. Knesset member Tawfik Ziyad, from the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, sent a message to the Israeli Minister of Health demanding an immediate investigation into the matter. He also insisted that all those involved be brought to justice.

The deputy Israeli health minister, Nawaf Masalha, was quoted in an interview with Al-Ittihad Arabic daily as saying it is entirely possible that such a practice is occurring, since the circumcisers working in these hospitals are not under the jurisdiction of the Health Ministry; rather, the Ministry of Religion.

He added that an investigation committee will be formed and will consist of two doctors, a Jew and an Arab. A Muslim will also be appointed to the Committee of Circumcisers at the Ministry of Religion. To date, there has never been an Arab member on the committee, even though both Muslims and Jews practice circumcision. [=]

60128. ------. "Jewish Settlers Excited and Happy At Massacre of Palestinians", in Headline News-CNN, February 28, 1994. The range of opinion among Jewish settlers in the West bank on the slaughter of 200 Palestinians at prayer in Hebron ranged from admiration to enthusiasm: Statements quoted by CNN included: "It doesn't bother me. They are terrorists"; 'the massacre is a good beginning', 'the massacre was a good thing', "I wish I had the courage to do what he did", and "Goldstein should have killed more." All Jewish settlers rejected being disarmed since they consider all Palestinians to be 'terrorists'. One young Jewish settler, obviously an Americans, dared the massacre of Palestinians at prayer as 'moral and courageous'.

Prof. Ehud Sprinzak of Hebrew University noted that the Israeli government had long encouraged the radicalism of the Jewish settlers and was not concerned by their attacks on Palestinians.

All the Jewish extremists interviewed appeared to be Americans, that is, dual-nationals. CNN interviewed no Palestinians for the report. [=]

60129. ------. "Jewish Women Defy Rules of Prayer, Angering Men", in Seattle Times, November 12, 1996, p. A3. Some 60 Jewish women prayed at the Wailing Wall to the jeers and threats of ultra-Orthodox men; a folding chair was hurled by the male guardians of the Wailing Wall at the women. Women are supposed to be servile and obsequious at the Wailing Wall so as not to disturb theimportant prayers of men. Jewish MK Anat Maor stated: "Just as men hated Goldstein and an interpretation of religion, so should women have the right to wear skullcaps. This is another effort to return us to the Middle Ages." There were no injuries in the confrontation. [TXT]

60130. ------. "Jews Pleased With Massacre At Cana", in Prime News (CNN), April 18, 1996. Beginning with the Israeli CNN reporter arguing that 'Jewish History' uniquely empowers Israelis in the massacre of their enemies [in this instance Lebanese], CNN interviewed Jews in Tel Aviv, all of whom were enthusiastic at the killings, and each differentiated between the death of Jews (which is bad) and the death of non-Jews (which is good):

Two young men noted: "We have to kill them there because otherwise they would kill us here".

A young Jewish women in very high heels: "We should not feel guilty because they are doing this same thing to us [Jews]."

A young Jewish man: "This is war. There is no problem."

The report concluded with video coverage of Israeli attacks on Palestinian refugee camps, refugee columns and villages. No Jew has died in the bloody, US-backed war. [TXT]

60131. ------. "Jobless Rate Drops to 7.5%", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, December 17, 1994. p. 16. Unemployment fell to 7.5%, that for women to 8.2%. The 9 month average is 7.8% compared to 10.4% a year ago. The increase in new jobs was 0.6% at 11700. The workweek grew to 37.1 hours from last years' 36.7.

60132. ------. "Know the Enemy, A San Francisco Spy Story, Part 1", in Revolutionary Worker (Chicago), January 16, 1994. p. 4. Last Jan. the San Francisco Police Department and the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith (ADL) were caught red-handed-illegally spying on some 12000 individuals and nearly 1000 groups. Now, an outrageous deal has been struck between the ADL and the government. The deal-announced in 11/1993-is a naked attempt to whitewash the spies, keep them in operation, they must suggest someone else to perform the task. The died in the bloody, US-backed war.

The San Francisco District Attorney and the ADL, there would be no more investigation of the spy scandal and no prosecution of ADL or its paid agent/Roy Bullock. The ADL did not have to admit that it had done anything wrong or even apologize. The ADL only had to "agree" not to receive confidential information from state or local employees in California-which is illegal anyway. Instead of a fine, the ADL is donating $75000 to "anti hate-crime funds"-which the ADL is using to boost their credibility of the US administration is at stake. The Palestinian public cannot help but feel the US bias toward Israel, displayed last week when the US reneged on its promise to Jordan to forgive its $270 million debt. [=]

60133. ------. "Know the Enemy, A San Francisco Spy Story, Part 2: Background to the Scandal", in Revolutionary Worker (Chicago), January 16, 1994. p. 4. The San Francisco Bay Area has long been a center of broad and diverse resistance against imperialism. This has made the Bay Area a prime target of the political police. The Civil Disturbance Guidelines passed by the City in 1990 supposedly limited police spying and operations against political activists. The City was forced to do this because of widespread public disgust and criticism of the San Francisco Police Department following exposures about police... spying during the Democratic Convention, the police sweeps of the Castro gay district, and the videotaped police beating a United Farm Workers founder Dolores Huerta. But in 1993 it was revealed that Tom Gerard, a member of the San Francisco Police Department Intelligence Division, and the ADL's Roy Bullock were helping run a massive, secret spy ring. They completely ignore the 1990 regulations. Since the mid-1980's they had spied on, infiltrated, and kept files on hundreds of groups. Bullock also worked alongside agents of the CIA. Some of these people had been homeless, black, anti-apartheid and Arab organizations were heavily targeted. The Revolutionary Communist Party was a high-priority target of this spy operation. The only known investigation against political groups undertaken by the San Francisco Police Department while its spying guidelines have been in place targeted the RCP—and that investigation relied in part on information supplied by Bullock and the ADL. This political-police spy network extended nationwide and was linked with the highest levels of government. Gerard worked for the CIA and had trained death squads in Central America during the 1980's. The ADL shared its files with at least 20 law enforcement agencies—including the FBI, the CIA and police departments across the country, as well as the governments of Israel and South Africa.

60134. "Know the Enemy, A San Francisco Spy Story, Part 3: Preserving the Imperialist Spy Network", in Revolutionary Worker (Chicago), January 16, 1994. p. 4. The San Francisco spy scandal deeply stung the rulers. It opened a window into their dirty world of spying against political groups and sparked broad anger and protest. The ADL deal is designed to slam the window shut and help end the crisis before more is revealed. It aims to protect the spy apparatus of the US imperialists and the ADL's part in it. After some past political-police scandals, the powers implemented formal limits on the spying of government opponents. This happened nationally and in cities like Seattle, Detroit, and Chicago in the '60s and '70s and in the '80s in San Francisco. There is no talk in the official circles of such measures in relation to the current San Francisco spy scandal. But there is plenty of outright coverup. First, the ADL was not forced to release its spy files—-as it could have been if the case went to court—and the City is refusing to make them public. Instead, the DA agreed to return the hundreds of file folders seized from ADL offices, as well as most of Bullock's files. The contents of those files could reveal the targets, extent and depth of the ADL's spying, including its focus on revolutionary organizations like the RCP. And they could also expose the involvement of other government agencies in the spy network. All this might spark even broader protest and spark higher levels of government into the scandal. (An example is San Francisco mayor Frank Jordan, who was Police Chief while the Gerard/Bullock network was in high gear. It recently came out that Jordan has been illegally keeping police intelligence files.) This is why various government agencies involved are trying to bury the scandal. They are using their tired old "rogue operation" story—claiming that only Gerard and Bullock were involved. Bullock was a paid FBI informant, and in the early 1980's the FBI instructed its field offices to deal directly with the ADL. But the FBI recently said it will not investigate FBI's link to the spy ring, the San Francisco Police Commission report which came out last summer was a whitewash of the San Francisco Police Department, even though the Police Department was at the center of scandal. And now the City has announced it plans no further investigation.

60135. "Know the Enemy, A San Francisco Spy Story, Part 4: City's prosecution Never Serious", in Revolutionary Worker (Chicago), January 16, 1994. p. 4. The City offered a number of lame excuses for not prosecuting the ADL. But it is clear that the powers never had any intention of putting the ADL on trial. According to the San Francisco Examiner, the ADL and the City were secretly trying to settle the case for months. The only sticking point was how much the ADL would pay. In 1993 a judge ruled that the ADL was a "journalistic" organization because it publishes some of its materials. This meant that the ADL's files and sources were "protected" and could not be seen by the people it spied on or be used in a court case against it. This ruling made prosecuting the ADL much more difficult. It was a blatantly political move—much of the ADL's information was gathered illegally and intended for secret distribution to law enforcement agencies, not for publication. The DA's office also said that prosecuting the ADL would be costly and time consuming, but since when did this stop the government when they really want to go after someone. Check out the millions spent persecuting the LA4+. Or the money San Francisco has spent arresting the LA4+. The DA's office said that they are too busy and they want to use the "Matrix program" to "clean-up" city streets, the kid-glove treatment given the ADL has outraged many. One Arab-American activist said, "You can bet that if it was an American Arab organization that behaved this way, it would have been tried, prosecuted and hung." trying to hatch a deal that prevents Gerald from even going on trial. People need to fight to stop this outrage from happening and to expose all of Gerard's bloody connections. Gerard is arguing that he needs his own FBI files to defend himself. So far the FBI has refused to hand them over. This could give Gerard an opening to argue that his case should be thrown out.) And the San Francisco Police Commission's plans to roll back limitations on police spying must be condemned and opposed. This scandal has revealed a government raising by lies, deceit, and spying-backed up by brute force. But this is not a government that feels confident and all-powerful. The broadness of the organizations targeted for spying shows how the rulers are afraid that there are many potential allies of the oppressed people in this society. And the focus on the RCP points to the government's fears of the people on the bottom rising up, joining with a determined revolutionary leadership and winning support from the middle classes. [=]

60138. --------. "Letter to the Editor: Judith Green", in Challenge, January-February 1993. p. 39. The article by Simona Shirimon in the last issue of Challenge ("Inhabiting the Borderlands," vol. III, no. 6, pp. 32-3) claims to "explore the social and political meanings assigned to being a Jewish man or woman in the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Yet it doesn't make a very convincing case for what we are being "assigned" but rather expresses a contempt for Israeli society, male and female, which one may assume is based on her own political stand concerning the conflict.

One doubts that the values of loyalty to family and "homeland" which Sharoni finds so offensive when encountered in the "sociopolitical context" which is Israeli society would disgust her so much in the Palestinian context. Would she not empathize with and admire the sort of Palestinian woman and mother lovingly described in the same issue by Maya Rosenfeld ("Mothers in Solidarity," pp. 7-9) as mothers, wives, sisters and grandmothers of Palestinian "soldiers"? Why then is this sympathy automatically withheld from their Israeli counterparts who are instead accused of the crime of fulfilling "their natural national duties"?

The Palestinian women interviewed, and Maya's article is representative of many such descriptions in Challenge, aren't quizzed about their political attitudes, nor are they asked intrusive questions about why their sons are in prison (some for a life sentence which, even in the draconian Israeli military court, is not lightly given). In other words we are asked, and I accept the request without asking political details, to look them squarely in face as human beings, as women, and respond from the heart. Israeli women of wildly differing political attitudes also make many personal sacrifices for their nation but they are condemned by Ms. Sharoni as being tools of Israeli state doctrine.

Not only does Ms. Sharoni's political attitude generate this double standard, but she also completely fails to make her case that the Israeli "state doctrine of national security" has any effect at all on the actual behavior of Jewish women. The evidence given here for an intense national ideology consists of a few out-dated quotes from Geula Cohen and Ben-Gurion and a study of soldier's letters from 1948 which evince a passionate attachment to the "homeland" which one would expect under the circumstances (the feminine epithets attached to the earth and the motherland are widespread in Indo-European and Semitic imagery, not peculiarly Hebrew).

Admittedly, there is a demographic war on, but the Palestinian women, because of the custom in rural society to value large families, are winning it hands down. The birth-rate among Jewish Israeli women is only slightly higher than in other modern industrialized nations (and this includes the quite high birth-rate of the religious community which has no relation, either practically or ideologically, to Israeli's military strength), whereas the birth-rate in the West Bank and Gaza is among the highest in the world. If Sharoni considers remarks made by Ben Gurion in the 50s to have any current significance, either they have lost their punch or Israeli women act pretty much like modern, educated women anywhere else in the world and plan their families, as do the more urbanized Palestinian women in Israel and the Territories. I think very few of us, or them, see our bodies as "national battlefields." The only real encouragement to a higher Jewish birth-rate (not mentioned in the article) are the maternity benefits given to women in Israeli free pre-natal and well-baby clinics, paid maternity leave, etc. - which are the envy of feminists in the United States who fought for these privileges and lost. I suppose one could see these benefits as part of the "demographic war"; most feminists would see them as accomplishments.

I hope Ms. Sharoni isn't offended if a Jewish woman anywhere in the world decides to have a baby to honor the memory of a relative- or of any anonymous Jew- who was killed in the concentration camps. Both Palestinian and Israeli women have children in the hope of bringing them up in peace, not in order to kill or be killed.

Although I am sure I am in Ms. Sharoni's political orbit, I am very wary of this kind of thought which is neither gender studies nor political-social analysis but using truisms from one realm to make disparaging remarks in another.

Judith Green; Challenge Editorial Board Member.[=]

60139. --------. "Letters to the Editor: Release a colleague", in BiladiJerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 5. Dear editor, The Women's Studies Program at Birzeit University strongly protests the arbitrary administrative detention of our colleague Mr. Imad Faisal Sabi'. On 12/20/1995, only a week before the Israeli army was due to redeploy from the town of Ramallah, Israeli soldiers detained Imad on the streets of Ramallah. He was then taken to his home, which was ransacked and his personal papers seized. Imad was later served with a six-month administrative detention order and is currently imprisoned in Megiddo Prison in Israel. Imad, age 34, is married with a baby daughter. We have worked closely with Imad Sabi' since our Women's Studies Program was established; he has been active as a translator of our publications and a participant in our seminars and workshops. His sincere commitment to social justice and gender equality, as well as his academic skills, have made him a particularly valuable colleague. Imad, who received a B.A. in Economics (with distinction) from Birzeit University, contributed his efforts to the Women's Studies Program while also working as the Executive Director of Programs at Bisan Research Center, a Palestinian NGO concerned with issues of community and social development. He has also worked with another Palestinian community NGO, the Tamer Institute of Community Education. We are strongly convinced that Imad has been detained solely because of his political convictions and legitimate lokitical activities as a part of the Palestinian left opposition. For Israel to use illegal administrative punishments to curtail the expression of Palestinian political opinion is a blow violation of human rights and a blow to Palestinian democracy. Arbitrary administrative detention -- imprisonment without charge or trial-- is illegal under international law. Its cynical use by Israel on the eve of the redeployment of the Israeli army from Palestinian cities should be of great concern to all those concerned with human rights, peace and justice in the region. Please join us in demanding the immediate release of Imad Sabi' and all other administrative detainees. [=]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

60151. -------. "Luc Dhore Visits Havana", in Granma International (Havana), July 21, 1993. p. 5. Luc Dhore, VP of Association of Western Europe Parliament Members Against Apartheid and member of the Flemish Social Christian Party visits as part of an education delegation of the Union of European Christian Democrats; he was accompanied by his wife, Julie Standaert, president of the Council for the Emanicipation of Women in Belgium. [TXT]

60152. -------. "Medical Kit: Course in Surgical Nursing", in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, December 29, 1995. p. 12. A Norwegian aid committee is sponsoring a one-year full-time post basic surgical nursing program implemented by the College of Medical Professions of Al-Quds University. Program will start 1/1996 in which 10 participants from governmental and non-governmental sectors will be enrolled. The program aims at developing operating room services and qualifying a group of operating room nurses. This is the second time the College of Medical Professions is offering the NORWAC sponsored program and expects to continue offering the program on a yearly basis. The graduates of last year’s program have formed an operating room nursing committee working under the umbrella of the Palestine Nurses Council. [=-]

60153. -------. "Medical Kit: French Surgeons to Treat Children “, in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996. p. 12. A French team of surgeons and doctors have begun treating Palestinian children with heart diseases at the Maqassed Hospital in East Jerusalem. The operations are taking place between Jan. 4 and Jan. 11, 1996. The French team arrived in Jerusalem as part of an effort to undertake operations on children with heart malformation. Two members of the team are cardiologists, two are anesthesiologists and one nurse. The operations will be done with the approval and financial support of the French Government and the French Consulate-General in Jerusalem. [=-]

60154. -------. "Medical Kit: Health Program in the Gaza Strip", in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995. p. 12. The Women’s Health Department at the PNA Ministry of Health is preparing a comprehensive plan to develop women’s health care, in particular maternal. Dina Abu Shaaban, director of the department, says that the plan calls for workshops to train health care workers and women in regards to prenatal and general health care. Abu Shaaban said the mortality rate for mothers during delivery is 40-60 per 100000 deliveries. She explained this by saying that women’s health is often overlooked during pre- and post-natal care. The PNA ministry has formed three teams of field researchers to gather more data on women’s health care in the Gaza Strip. Another team has been sent out to spread health awareness among young men. The Women’s Health Department will hold a workshop in cooperation with the Peace Initiative for the Population Institution to be held at the Rashad Shawa Cultural Center on 12/3/1995. [=-]

60155. -------. "Medical Kit: Herbalist Cures Infertility", in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, August 25, 1995. p. 12. A Palestinian herbalist from Nazareth recently cured a religious Jew of infertility, but according to the Israeli media, this did not cure the patient of his troubles. A problem erupted when the wife, now pregnant, discovered that her husband had been treated with a cure extracted from the horn of a rhinoceros, and demanded to have an abortion. A rabbi assured her that the treatment violated no code of the Jewish religion and urged her to have the child. In Nazareth, herbalist Ahmad Yihya, who studied at the Natural Sciences & AcupunctureCollege in Tel Aviv, said treatment of infertility through natural cures is approved by the Israeli Ministry of Health. [=-]

60156. -------. "Medical Kit: Relocation of the National Hospital", in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, November 10, 1995. p. 12. Palestinian residents of Nablus have called for the relocation of the National Hospital to Juseid. Nablus residents expressed their desire to relocate the National Hospital to the premises of the former prison. The current hospital is very small and the building is dilapidated. Residents added that it would be beneficial for patients to be outside the city center, away from the noise and pollution. According to PNA officials at the Ministry of Health, the National Hospital only has the capacity for 104 patients, but it is staffed by 35 doctors and 76 nurses. The space at Juseid would be able to accommodate many more of the 500000 residents of the northern West Bank. [=-]

60157. -------. "Medical Kit: Treatment Way Up", in Biliadi: Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), June 16, 1995. p. 12. The Health Work Committee issued a report in Gaza which stated that 18060 patients attended the committee's clinics during the last 2 months. It added that 6060 of those were treated for free because of the deteriorating economic situation in Gaza. Among other activities the committee completed a 1 week training course on medical issues, took courses in nursing and organized a lecture on health and cleanliness for children. The report added that 1020 children attended the 5 clinics of the committee while 640 pregnant women attended the maternity clinic during the same period. [=-]

60158. -------. "Mediterranean Women Prepare for Beijing", in Biliadi-Jerusalem Times, December 16, 1994. p. 13. Women gathered in late November from all over the Mediterranean to attend the Second International Mediterranean Women’s Conference held under the auspices of the Valencia Women’s Institute, UNESCO and the Spanish government. Its purpose was to coordinate the plans and preparations of the agenda for the Women’s World Conference to be held in Beijing in August 1995. The conference was opened by Lord Ossorio, president of the Women’s Institute, who gave a special welcome to the Palestinian delegates for being able to attend, despite the difficulties faced by Palestinians in the occupied territories. Silvia Barakas, general secretary of the women's Institute, added her own congratulations to the Palestinian people and President Yasser Arafat for being awarded the Spanish Prize for Peace. Pilar Bidraza, consultant to the Spanish Ministry of Culture, stressed the importance of the role of women in the world in general, and Mediterranean women in particular. She called for united action to achieve equal rights and opportunities. Bidraza added that the Mediterranean is a center for culture, and as such, should highlight the utilizing role played by the women. It is essential to include men in any such program she said. Representing Palestine was Hanan Awwad, president of the Palestinian section of the Women's International League for Peace & Freedom. Awwad thanked the participants for their solidarity with the Palestinian people and stressed the need to increase such meetings, in a multicultural effort to achieve greater understanding and cooperation between nations. Awwad underlined the importance of cultural dignity and its influence upon women. She stressed that the women's issue is a matter for Palestinian society in general. It is part of the united challenge to the occupation, she said, and the national struggle to establish a free and democratic homeland. In presenting her paper titled "Is Peace Possible?", Awwad addressed the Oslo Agreement and the Palestinian National Authority.

She highlighted the continued abuse of Palestinian human rights, and the long delays that impede the implementation of agreements. She re-affirmed that peace cannot be achieved without justice, and a comprehensive peace will not be realized without the complete withdrawal of the Israeli army from the occupied territories, including Jerusalem to the pre-1967 borders. The Valencia Forum concluded that the world is suffering from a multi-dimensional crisis—economic, social, political and cultural—which contributes to the weakening of women's condition, and the increasing inequality between the North and the South. More and more, Mediterranean women are demanding recognition of the role they play in the evolution of societies toward more human attitudes of peace, justice and tolerance. The forum recommended emphasis on cultural action as a means of fostering understanding between the Mediterranean countries. This perspective should not forget the importance of promoting economic development. Moreover, it should satisfy social and political demands for peace, participation, democratization and equal opportunities for development, both personal and professional. While wars and violence plague certain areas of the Mediterranean basin, the forum saw it absolutely necessary that the international community assume the responsibility of creating conditions of a negotiated peace amongst all belligerent parties. Any peace achieved must respect and protect human rights of all nations involved and each specific culture. To this end, the cultural tradition of women should be used in favor of justice, tolerance and respect. As a result of the conference, the Valencia Forum will establish a permanent commission, drawn from its membership, to implement certain feasible actions, including an information network and a Mediterranean women's newsletter. A charter of cooperation with universities and research centers to facilitate the exchange of students. The commission will support the publication of scientific and literary works by women, and run in-depth studies of different cultures. It will also provide training in communication and responsibility techniques in order to reinforce women's capacity for organization and creating social movements. [=]

60159. -------. "Middle East Events in the US: Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), June 14, 1993, p. 7. 6/24/93: Workshops—Teaching about the Arab world and Islam is the theme of a teacher workshop sponsored by the Middle East Policy Council in Washington, D.C., and conducted by Arab World and Islamic Resources and School Services (AWAIR) of Berkeley, California. The June workshop will be held at Ohio State University, Youngstown, Ohio. Future workshops will be held at Texas Wesleyan University, Central Missouri State University and the University of Kentucky.

630/93: Program—Women, Children and Family Relations in the Middle East is the focus of the 14th annual 1993 Summer Institute held at New York University, New York City. The program will focus on the changing roles of women and the problems of children and family relations in the Near East; understanding the Islamic population in high schools in the US; and the patterns of growth in Islam in America. The status of the Middle East peace talks will also be discussed. [=]

60160. -------. "Mormon Church Agrees To Halt Its Posthumous Baptisms of Jews", in Arizona Daily Star, April 30, 1995, p. B4. The Mormon Church has agreed that it will stop posthumously baptizing victims of the Holocaust, as well as almost all other Jews. The contract was signed by the Church and five major Jewish groups. The Church had agreed to end the practice in 3/1991 after pressure from the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, but there have been continuing posthumous baptisms. No other group has ever been categorically excluded from posthumous baptisms, reports the church's Family History Department. The Jewish groups included the US Holocaust Memorial Council [a federal agency], Living Memorial to the Holocaust-Museum of Jewish Heritage, Simon Weisenthal Center, and Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem. [TXT]

60161. -------. "Mt. Scopus Hadassah Meeting [Inbal Blitsin, an israeli doing research at the UW School of Social Work, will discuss her kabrotz experiences]", in Jewish Transcript (Seattle), October 4, 1996. p. 26. [TXT]

60162. -------. "NGOs Draft Development Plans", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994. p. 13. The Palestinian NGOs have played an important and distinguished role in past years, both on the political and grassroots levels, as well as on the level of the qualitative service provision the various fields, such...as health, agriculture, education, early childhood development, training and human rights.

This role has been of primary importance in enabling the Palestinian people to remain steadfast, and to resist the Israeli occupation, at a time when the occupation restricted any real sustainable development efforts with the intention of controlling Palestinian natural resources and keeping the Palestinian economy dependent on the Israeli economy.

The Cairo-Oslo agreement has not drastically altered the objectives the Palestinian development strategies, given that the newly-formed Palestinian authority has only gained limited control over the Gaza Strip and Jericho without sovereignty over land and water resources. At the same time, this authority is still restricted making capacity. Israeli military forces have not withdrawn from the autonomous areas, but rather, re-deployed their forces around the Gaza Strip and Jericho. With the persistence of settlement activities, Arab East Jerusalem is becoming more and more isolated from the rest of the West Bank.

The persistence of this political situation hinders the integration of the Palestinian society with the international community, thus preventing Palestinian from adopting the documents of the ICPD implementing the program action.

As we Palestinian NGOs approach the final days of the ICPD, we want to stress the following:

1. We reiterate our commitment and support of the document and recommendations of the ICPD, especially those coinciding with our objectives and goals as stated in the National Report on Reproductive and Women's Health, Gender Equity and Equality, and Sustainable Development.

We are now in the process of drafting a comprehensive, detailed program on population and development on two levels. First, we intend to mobilize and raise awareness of the Palestinian community on the ICPD document and program of action to guarantee wider participation in the drafting of Palestinian population policies. Second, we want to influence public policymakers to adopt the ICPD document and program of action in future policies.

We stress that the population policies should take into consideration that the right of Palestinian families to make an informed, responsible choice on the number of children is a basic human right. This policy should be incorporated in other development activities that should guarantee an increase in average per capita income. In this context, we reiterate the importance of the NGOs’ role in policymaking, implementation, monitoring and evaluation.

3. We emphasize the importance of integrating women in all development processes. We stress that women must be empowered, given equal access to resources, decision-making, education and health services. We must influence the Palestinian authorities to adopt laws and regulations that guarantee gender equality, and pressure them to adopt all of the international conventions on women, particularly the Convention of the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

4. We reaffirm the importance of sexual and reproductive health education, which should be an integral part of the formal educational system at all levels. In this respect, a special women’s reproductive health program, including family planning, must be available and accessible to all women at reasonable prices.

5. As Palestinian NGOs, we state that it is difficult to formulate a homogenous Palestinian, population policy with any future possibility of sustained development along as settlement activities persist in the occupied territories. Settlements must be dismantled, as they phase a serious obstacle to any comprehensive development strategy. The Israeli settlers already control the majority of water, land and natural resources.

For example, in the Gaza Strip, 5000 settlers control 40% of the land and its resources, while 900000 Palestinian use the remaining 60%. This homogenous situation will only escalate if tens of thousands of Palestinian refugees are allowed to return; it would be virtually impossible to absorb all the refugees.

We take this opportunity to stress that the ICPD was a rare occasion for us all to meet and formulate a common vision, through which we can increase participation and take collective responsibility for this world in which we all share and live. [=]

60163. ---------, "Needs of Elderly Considered", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 25, 1994, p. 15. The Atta Society ended its second workshop on 11/18/1994 during which the situation of the elderly in the occupied territories was discussed. More than 30 nurses, field workers and experts from the Orthodox Charitable Society in Izariya, the Islamic Rahmah Society in Jebel Mukabber and Dar Al-Alam in Abu Dis, near Jerusalem, attended. Nurse Mary Hanania talked about the kinds of medical equipment used to aid the elderly and explained how they operate to guarantee safety and comfort. Another nurse addressed the psychological problems the aged face in homes for the elderly. She explained how they can be avoided. [=]

60164. ---------, "New York City: Gay Synagogue Barred From Salute To Israel Parade sponsor American Zionist Youth Federation excludes Congregation Beth Simchat Torah; Rabbi Joseph Sternstein notes all other marching groups would withdraw if the homosexuals were allowed to march!", in New York Times, May 8, 1993, p. A16. [TXT]

60165. ---------, "News In Brief: The Middle East", Crescent International, August 1-15, 1996, p. 2. In an exchange of prisoners and residents were taken aback when their identity cards were withdrawn. It is not clear why. Meanwhile, Israeli Arab women are no longer required to obtain permits to go to Gaza. [=]

60166. ---------, "News in Brief: Ayyash's Mother and Brother Continue to be Detained," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 13, 1995, p. 2. After days in solitary confinement, Ayshah Ayyash, mother of Yahya Ayyash, who is wanted by the Israeli authorities, was transferred to a cell with other women. An Israeli court ordered her moved after an appeal by her attorney Anwar Abu Lafi. It is reported that Mrs. Ayyash was deprived of sleep for several days in an attempt to extract information from her on the whereabouts of her son. Attorney Lea Tzemel, along with the Popular Committee to Fight Torture, presented an appeal to the Israeli High Court to put a stop to the detention and torture of Mrs. Ayyash and her other son, both of whom are being held at the Russian Compound in Jerusalem. Human rights organizations in the West Bank have called on Amnesty International to take the Ayyash family's case. [=]

60167. ---------, "News in Brief: Erez Junction Rejects Jerusalem Identities," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 1, 1995, p. 2. Israeli military authorities at the Erez Junction have been turning back holders of Jerusalem identity cards. It is not clear why. Meanwhile, Israeli Arab women are no longer required to obtain permits to go to Gaza. [=]

60168. ---------, "News in Brief: Fiance Arrested in Jerusalem Murder", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 17, 1995, p. 2. The body of Inas Salah of Ras El-Amoud was discovered some days ago in Imwas village. According to the autopsy report, conducted by Abu Kibir Forensic Institute, the young woman had been stabbed to death, and her body burned. Her fiance, Usama Izzak Abu Diab of Silwan was picked up by Preventive Security and confessed to the crime. Mediators have been brought in to deal with the two families according to Tribal Law. Both families were urged not to shed more blood. [=]

60169. ---------, "News in Brief: Journalist Attacked by Settler Dog", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 29, 1995, p. 2. The Journalists Association in Jerusalem has issued a statement in Hebron condemning settler attacks on journalists. The incident which prompted the statement occurred in Hebron on 9/26. Settler Michael Ben Shitreet unleashed his dog on journalist Kawthar Salaam while she was interviewing a Hebronite in the street. An hour later, the attack was repeated on Salaam. She was seen running into a shop with the dog snapping at her heels, closely followed by the cursing settler. The settler was arrested. Hebron's Mayor, Mustafa Natsheh, on hearing of the incident, lodged a complaint with the Israeli Civil Administration. [=]

60170. ---------, "News in Brief: Martyr at Ramallah Checkpoint", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), June 16, 1995, p. 2. Israeli troops shot dead Yehya Shehadeh, 21, of Deir Ammar village 6/12/1995 at a checkpoint near Beit Sira village along the "green line." Shehadeh's brother, who was a passenger in the car, reported that she had lost control of the car, but skidded to a stop a few meters past the checkpoint. However, soldiers continued to fire incessantly at the driver. [=]

60171. ---------, "News in Brief: New Identification Restrictions", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 24, 1995, p. 2. The Israeli Ministry of Interior has instituted new procedures for East Jerusalem residents. Arab residents applying to renew their identity cards will first have to prove that they have paid the municipal taxes, amona. Many women who carry the Jerusalem identity card but are married to West Bank residents were taken back when their identity cards were withdrawn without explanation. [=]

60172. ---------, "News in Brief: Occupied Palestine: Two Palestinian Children Kidnapped and Tortured by Zionist Settler", in Crescent International, July 16-31, 1996, p. 2. Two Palestinian children, aged 10 and 12, were kidnapped by a Zionist settler from the Guivat Oz settlement near Jenin on 7/10/1996 and badly tortured. Muhammad, 10, and Muhammad Karakhjee, 12, were chained, beaten with iron rods, their bodies burnt with cigarettes, stripped naked and then dosed with paint before being dumped in a field. A Palestinian farmer passing by picked them up and rushed them to the hospital. [=]

60173. ---------, "News in Brief: Orthodox Weigh In on Assisting Suicide", in Forward (New York), November 22, 1996, p. 3. Four Orthodox Jewish groups (Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, Rabbinical Council of America, Agudath Israel of America) have argued in briefs to the Supreme Court that terminally ill people do not have a right to doctor assisted suicide.

60174. ------. "News in Brief: Pakistan", in Crescent International, December 16-31, 1995, p. 2. The zionist occupation forces attacked and injured twenty Palestinian youths, many of them children, in Nablus on 11/18. This vicious attack was carried out when the Palestinians protested against zionist brutalities. [–]

60175. ------. "News in Brief: The West", in Crescent International, May 15, 1996, p. 2. Thousands of Muslims and other people participated in a rally in New York on 4/19/1996 condemning zionist terrorism in Lebanon. The rally was held outside the United Nations' plaza and addressed by Imam Muhammad al-Asi, a similar rally attended by at least five hundred people was also held in Toronto on 4/16/1996 outside Queen's Park, the Ontario provincial legislature building. There is widespread revulsion felt by people in North America at zionist brutalities despite desperate attempts by the United States' government to try to cover them up.

Britain's chief rabbi, Doctor Jonathan H. Sacks, in an open letter dated 3/6/1996, addressed to the community, called for revising the "Six Million" figure of Jews killed during the second world war. He said that it was important to find out how many people, presumed dead, were still alive. He said it was far more important to unite families that to live with a figure arrived at quite arbitrarily.

The Paris club on 4/29/1996 agreed to reschedule Russia's $40 billion United States' debt. The principal repayments can be delayed by six years while debt repayments have been extended for a period of twenty-five years. Without rescheduling, Russia would have had to pay $8 billion, this a sum it simply did not have. It had been unable to meet its debt obligations last year. William Colby, the former Central Intelligence Agency's chief, was reported missing and presumed drowned, when his capsized canoe was found near his holiday home in Charles County's Canoe Sound, in Maryland on 4/28/1996. He was the Central Intelligence Agency's chief from 1973-1976. Crime rate on United States' college campuses continues to escalate. The murder rate went up by 26% between 1993-1994; drug abuse was up by 22% and sexual assault by 12.2%. The survey was conducted by the "Chronicle of Higher Education", a weekly paper dealing with campus issues. [–]

60176. ------. "News in Brief: Trouble in Hebron", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 22, 1996. p. 2. Tensions mounted in Hebron after an ax-wielding Palestinian man attacked an Israeli settler on 12/19/1995. The man apparently attacked a woman, who was lightly injured, then fled. Palestinian residents said that following the event, Israeli soldiers began checking identity cards and arrested some 20 Arabs. Following the incident, a group of settlers marched through the streets of the Old City of Hebron calling for the expulsion of the Arab residents. According to residents, the settlers attacked several vegetable vendors in the suq. In another, earlier incident on 12/14/1995, Mohammed Idriis Sarsour was shot and killed after stabbing two settlers near the Ibrahimi Mosque. The 23-year-old man was shot by border police and left bleeding in the street. The settler brother, the 22-year-old man was shot and wounded, attack Sarsour according to some witnesses, who then defended himself. Later that day, settlers celebrated at the spot of the killing and the Israeli army arrested Sarsour's brothers. Hebron Deputy Mayor Izhak Natshieh blamed the Israeli authorities for the recent flare-ups in Hebron. "The Army could have arrested Sarsour; there was no reason to kill him," he said. The situation in Hebron was described as "teetering on the edge of disaster" as a result of these incidents. [–]

60177. -------. "Ninth Feminist Conference", in Women In Black Newsletter, Spring 1993. The Ninth Feminist Conference of Israel will be held in Givat Haviva on 5/20-22/1993. Like last year, this year's conference is being planned jointly by Arab-Israeli and Jewish-Israeli (Mizrachi and Ashkenazi) women. All events will reflect a balance of these groups, to create the conditions for real unity among feminist women in Israel, regardless of religion, nationality, ethnic origin, sexual preference, or economic status. For registration, call 04-664949; 03-561-7121; or 02-439966. [–]

60178. -------. "Omissions Haunts Airline Map Makers", in Seattle Times, June 23, 1996. p. K9. Lufthansa has been accused by the Simon Wiesenthal Center of supporting 'rejectionist elements who wanted to undermine the Middle East peace process' by not including the word 'Israel' on a tiny airline map. A Lufthansa spokeswoman Karin Weber stated: "On our map we have included the cities of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem but not the name Israel because of graphic constraints". Lufthansa has promised to correct the anti-semitic omission. [TEX]

60179. -------. "On the Circuit: Children's Rights", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995. p. 14. First lady Suha Arafat was in Paris this week to speak at an international symposium organized by UNESCO to discuss children's rights. Speaking in French, Mrs. Arafat told her audience that 50000 Palestinian children have been exposed to arrest procedures over the years. She said a great number of them are still in Israeli jails, and called for the release of all prisoners, women and children especially. The audience included the wives of many world leaders involved in organizations dealing with children. Mrs. Arafat told them the PNA has invested great effort to remove the negative, psychological impact the occupation has had on the children. [–]

60181. -------. "One World/One People: International Women's Choir Can You Help?", in Challenge, July-August 1993. p. 14. Shirley Mae Staten, an African-American musician and community worker, is organizing and raising funds for an international woman's choir (IWC) consisting of over 40 women from more than 20 countries to tour five continents in autumn of next year, including a 3-5 day stopover for concerts and workshops in Israel. Her message is the connection between music and peace and the strength and power of women to bring people together. One Jewish Israeli woman and one Arab Israeli woman will participate in the choir. The choir will perform in Jaffa-Tel Aviv, East and West Jerusalem, Nazareth, and Haifa.

Money is needed for the choir's tour. Contributions for the Israeli stopover should be sent to WILPF*, Account No. 210486/06, Bank Leumi, Branch 804, 87 Ben-Yehuda Street, Tel Aviv, Israel (note for IWC).

Any ideas or suggestions for the choir itinerary or the visit in Israel will be gratefully received by: Elana Wesley, 3 Alber Kiosso Street, Jaffa-Tel Aviv, 68134. Israel [Tel./Fax (972)-(3)-8118051 or: Aliya Strauss, 24130 Mahrozet Street, Jaffa-Tel Aviv, Israel [Tel. (972)-(3)-689983].

For more general information about plans and needs, Shirley Mae Staten can also be contacted at: 200 W. 34th Ave., Suite number 210 Anchorsge, AK 99503 USA. [Tel. (907)292-1307, Fax (907)258-5443]

Your help and support for this unique project would be greatly appreciated.

[The Women's International League For Peace and Freedom, a non-profit organization; all contributions will be acknowledged and are tax-deductible][–]

The north Korean stand is in line with international law. As the Vienna Convention stipulates any treaty imposed on one country through threats or acts of coercion is illegal, the 1905 protectorate and 1910 annexation treaties were signed at gunpoint. The aggressive war is a crime under international law. The Cairo declaration of 1/1/43, noting that the three great powers were fighting to “punish the aggression of Japan,” stated that they, “mindful of the enslavement of the people of Korea, are determined that in due course of time roa shall become free and independent.”

To support their argument regarding the 1905 and 1907 treaties, the north Koreans revealed that the first treaty bore no endorsement, or signature or royal signature of the Emperor Ko Jong as he opposed it and that the royal signature affixed on the second treaty was false.

The north Koreans claimed that the two treaties were illegal and dead letters in view of three legal codes, the then Korean law, the old Japanese Constitution and international law: (1) Article 9 of the 1899 Korean Code stipulates that the Emperor had the authority to conclude and ratify a treaty (Article 9 of the 1899 Korean Code) and Article 18 of the 11/21/1894 imperial decree on the format of official documents states that “the royal seal shall be stumped on a document ratifying a treaty after the Emperor affixes his signature to it. (2) Article 4 of the old Imperial Constitution of Japan states that the Emperor “shall conclude all treaties,” but the 1905 treaty bore no signature of the Japanese Emperor.

(3) Public international law stipulates that a treaty can be implemented when it has been approved by the kings of its signatories and that a treaty not endorsed by the state will become a mere piece of scrap paper soon. What emerged from the 8 rounds of talks is the blatan Japanese behavior which puts Japan in striking contrast with Germany, which expressed official apologies for the Nazi crimes and took serious steps to atone for the wrongs done.

Throughout the bilateral talks, unlike the Germans, the Japanese rationalized their past crimes against peace and humanity, scoffing international law, the Cairo Declaration and the verdict of the Tokyo military tribunal, in other words, the Japanese view that the Japanese colonialist are not guilty of any wrongdoing in their war of aggression against Korea and other parts of Asia. [ ]

60183. ------. “PK Commentary: Reconsideration of Pyong-Tokyo Talks (2): Part 2”, in the People’s Korea, May 29, 1993. p. 8. The Japanese response to the north Korean demands is two-pronged: One is the idiosyncratic attempt to justify the 41 years of ruthless colonial rule and the all-familiar offer to settle the property claims. The other is a series of foot-dragging tactics designed to divert attention from the fundamental questions at issue and sidetrack the talks.

In short, the Japanese stand is “We have done nothing wrong in Korea and left something constructive.” The Japanese position can be summed up: The 1905 and 1910 treaties were valid; No illegal seizure of assets or recruiting of manpower took place in Korea; There is no evidence that the Japanese Government was involved in the drafting of some 200000 Korean women for forced prostitution for Japanese troops; There is no need for the Japanese Government to compensate the Korean comfort women; Only the question of property claim remains yet to be settled.

Most scandalous about the Japanese behavior is the persistent attempt to stall the talks. In the first place, the Japanese first asked the north Koreans to define its territorial jurisdiction, the issue which they would never raise in reestablishing diplomatic relations with the new defunct Soviet Union or China.

Secondly, the Japanese repeatedly raised the issue of the Japanese high school dropout-turned B-girl who was allegedly abducted to north Korea to teach Japanese to the woman agent who allegedly planted an explosive in a KAL jetliner to explode it in midair over Burma. No wreckage of the KAL plane has been recovered from the Burmese waters. Japanese police have failed to produce any physical proof of her abduction to north Korea. Few Japanese aircraft experts accept the version of the explosion given by the south Korean and Japanese authorities. Serious doubt is cast on the motive to recruit and poorly-educated low-class woman as a Japanese-language teacher.

Thirdly, the Japanese have insisted that diplomatic relations with Pyongyang is conditional on matters which have nothing to do with the agreed-on agenda: UN membership, the question relating the DPRK’s sovereignty, progress in north-south relations—purely domestic affairs of the Korean people—and acceptance of international inspections of nuclear facilities, the issue to be discussed between north Korea and the International Atomic Energy Agency. [ ]

60184. ------. “PK Commentary: Reconsideration of Pyong-Tokyo Talks (2): Part 3”, in the People’s Korea, May 29, 1993. p. 8. The DPRK joined the UN as a separate state in September 1991 simultaneously with south Korea as Seoul applied for separate membership. North and south Korea signed two landmark agreements, one designed to commit them to non-aggression against each other and bring the two parts of Korea together, and the other to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula.

Strange indeed, Tokyo never raised the issue of IAEA inspections when it reestablished state relations with China. Nor have they demanded international access to nuclear facilities in India, Pakistan, Israel and South Africa. As regards Beijing, Tokyo never urged better ties between Mainland China and Taiwan as a precondition for diplomatic relations. Japan kept silent when Washington threatened to leave the IAEA when the world body insisted on inspecting suspicious nuclear facilities in Israel.

Regarding the nuclear issue, the north Koreans signed a safeguards accord with the IAEA, and allowed in IAEA inspectors on six occasions. The north Korean charge is that the Japanese are trying to create red herring to divert attention from their refusal to come to terms with the past and their deliberate negligence of the comfort woman issue, scuttle the Pyongyang-Tokyo negotiations, and prepare the world public for their own nuclear weapons program.

Japan is building the world’s largest nuclear waste-processing plat at Rokkasho Village in the northern Aomori Prefecture under the long-range program to develop Japanese nuclear weapons. It is a matter of common knowledge that Japan is implementing plants to store some 100 tons of weapons-grade plutonium, sufficient to make several thousand Hiroshima-type A-bombs.

Japan has already succeeded in launching multi-stage rockets which can easily be converted to nuclear-tipped inter-continental ballistic missiles. Japan is a virtual nuclear power ready to take on a greater role, eager to achieve what it failed during the last world war.

At UN meeting north Korea expressed its objection to Japan becoming another permanent members of the Security Council and has taken issue with the Russian proposal to remove the enemy state clause from the UN Charter. Pyongyang has done a great deal to make the world community wary of Japan’s dangerous nuclear weapons program. [ ]

60185. ------. “PK Commentary: Reconsideration of Pyong-Tokyo Talks (2): Part 4”, in the People’s Korea, May 29, 1993. p. 8. With the 8 rounds of talks held, the DPRK and Japan are still far away from the avowed goal of leaving the unfortunate past behind them. However, the north Korea-Japan talks have created a worldwide interest in the issue of military prosecution by causing a chain reaction of vociferous outcries for full accounts of the issue and compensation in Asian capitals and at world bodies.

The comfort woman issue has become a hot item at international forums meetings in Vienna and at UN meetings in Geneva as the UN Human Rights Commission has launched an official investigation of the issue. At long last Tokyo finds itself standing at the dock of a world court, accused of crimes against humanity.

Should the Japanese continue to resist coming to terms with the past aggression against Asia and repugnant atrocities perpetrated, Japan would become a pariah state. “As its power grows, coming to terms with the past is becoming more necessary in order to come to terms with the future,” BBC Tokyo correspondent Gordon Brewar wrote in the 4/26/92 issue of The Financial Times, the influential daily in London. The resentment and distrust growing in most of the occupied Asian countries is too strong for Tokyo to erase the shame by doling out the Japanese yen. [ ]

60186. ------. “Palestine and People: On the Circuit”, in Biliad-
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Jerusalem Times, November 17, 1995, p. 14. Tourist Police: Some 330 recruits, fifteen of them women, graduated 11/9/1995 from the Police Academy in Jericho. They were part of a special two-month training course for tourist police. The director of President Yasser Arafat's Jericho bureau Sami Musallam was the guest of honor at their graduation. During the final part of the ceremony, the graduates lined up to compose the word "Jerusalem." Moviemaker: Chilean moviemaker Michelle Ernesto is in Beit Sahour this week to visit the town where his father was born and his relatives still live. Ernesto, who takes pride in his Palestinian origins, is working on a film he has entitled, "The Four Stations of a Traveler". It tells the story of a Palestinian emigre who leads an alienated existence throughout the world. Before coming to Beit Sahour, Ernesto was in Damascus where he participated in the ninth Damascus Film Festival as the head of the panel of judges. [=]

60187. -------. "Palestine and People: On the Circuit," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, July 28, 1995, p. 14. Children's rights: An-Najjah lecturer Rima Kilani was guest lecturer at a Palestinian-Norwegian meeting 7/23/1995 at the Friendship Society in Nabiis. She spoke about the rights of children in Palestine and enjoyed the packed audience of children that listened to her. Discrimination within the family were among the problems she felt were most prominent. Friendship society director Muhammad Sawalha said he is keen on organizing meetings between children and specialists on a regular basis. [=]

60188. -------. "Palestine and People: On the Circuit," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, July 28, 1995, p. 14. Special Award: A delegation of twenty men and women representing United States based Birhe-Falastin Foundation visited the In'ash Usra Society 7/26/1995 to award director Samiha Khalil a special shield in appreciation of her efforts over the years to promote Palestinian culture. [=]

60189. -------. "Palestine and People: On the Circuit: Charity Bazaar", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 24, 1995, p. 14. The Melia Art & Training Center in Jerusalem wrapped its two-day annual charity bazaar at the Y.M.C.A. Saturday 11/17/1995. It included displays of Palestinian traditional costumes, and wool embroidery. The center is a branch of the Arab Orthodox Society. Through the center, the society trains women in various income-generating skills ranging from child care to fashion design. This year, the society invited international designer Toshiko Mizumo to introduce some new ideas. [=]

60190. -------. "Palestine and People: On the Circuit; Quranic Studies", in Biladi: The Jerusalem Times; October 20, 1995, p. 14. The Directorate of the Islamic Waqt in Jericho inaugurated special courses this week, all of which aim at providing young people with a thorough introduction to the Holy Quran. Jericho's Director of Waqt, Sheikh Ismail Al-Jamal said seventy youngsters have joined the courses which are taking place at seven different locations in the city. The youngsters, both male and female, are being taught how to recite the Quran in the right way. Al-Jamal also said the Waqt has plans for a theological seminary in Jericho and plans courses to instruct teachers how to teach the Quran. [=]

60191. -------. "Palestine and People: Palestinian-Israeli Women Demonstrate Against Siege", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), May 6, 1994, p. 15 A joint Palestinian-Israeli women group demonstrated at the Dahiya Al-Barid checkpoint last It week to protest the Israeli restrictions imposed on the Palestinian people.

The group carried signs with slogans against the closure of Jerusalem, house demolition and collective punishment. The demonstrators tried to pass the checkpoint but were confronted by border guards, who prevented from crossing.

Hanan Ashrawi, former spokesperson for the Palestinian peace delegation, said, "Peace is a responsibility for all of us. Peace must not become removed from reality. Furthermore, it is not just a signature. Real peace is showing goodwill on the behalf of both parties."

The head of the Union of Women Committees for Social Work, Salwa Hadib, discussed the women's activities and said, "We work for peace, and we believe that UN Security Resolutions 242 and 338 should be implemented in the occupied territories."

Amal Khresheh, director of the Federation of Working Women Communities in the West Bank and Gaza, said that the federation has relations with Israeli women's associations and that they agree on living in peace side by side in two independent states--Israeli and Palestinian. [=]

60192. -------. "Palestinian Agricultural Relief Committees Inaugurates Integrated Development", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, May 9, 1997, p. 10. The Palestinian Agricultural Relief Committees, on 5/6/1997, inaugurated the first Integrated Development Program in the Palestinian village of Falamiah in the Qalqilya district, northern East Bank. According to a Palestinian Agricultural Relief Committees' press release, the most important achievements of this program are reclamation of 1500 dunums of land for agricultural purposes, the building of sixteen kilometers of agricultural roads, the construction of a 1000 cubic meter and a two hundred cubic meter water reservoirs with pumping stations, changing the old inefficient irrigation system, establishing an experimental station with a greenhouse for organic agriculture and another greenhouse for conventional agriculture, and introducing cultivation of various medical herbs, such as za'tar (thyme), sage and chamomile, and new fruits such as apples, plums, askadinia and avocado. The program financed by the French government, also included the establishment of a Women's Association to provide training for women in the tailoring, drying and gardening of medical herbs. Falamiah has a population of 351 people according to 1992 figures with 2464 dunums of land. Agriculture is the main source of livelihood for the population. [=]

60193. -------. "Palestinian Female Candidate: Women Must Have a Role in Building Palestine", in Peoples Weekly World (CPUSA), January 13, 1996, p. 14. Nabiis Abu Rmeila is the first woman Palestinian candidate to run for the 1/22/1996 elections for the Palestinian Council in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Abu Rmeila was interviewed by phone from her home village of Beit Ummar, near Hebron. Abu Rmeila said, "The public enthusiasm as evidenced by [the people] going to the registration offices is great. I call upon the Palestinians women to preserve and exercise their right to [participate in the] elections."

Abu Rmeila said she was led to run because of "my faith in my people, and in the militant role of Palestinian women who were behind my decision to run. I [was] also encouraged by the strong support of my own family and relatives, who expressed their pride over my participation in the elections. I would also like to underline the right of the Palestinian women to participate in the various structures and activities of the PNA [Palestinians National Authority], and through them to represent our Palestinians people on Arab and world scales".

Abu Rmeila outlined her election program as follows: "Campaigning for women's right to espouse their proper place; to take part in the decisionmaking; to achieve social justice and equality with men; to assist peasants to keep hold of their lands; to defend human beings and land; to care for the workforce and fight against unemployment by creating new jobs and building factories along with establishing training centers; to care for the martyrs' children, and the right of the displaced and refugees to contribute in the building of the independent Palestinian state, with Jerusalem as its capital.

Abu Rmeila was asked to assess her role as a woman candidate in the conservative Hebron society. She responded, 'My candidacy demonstrates the role being played by women in the Hebron region, and that these women are able to give, to lead by example, and deal with hardships. My participation in the elections is also an announcement to the society as a whole that Palestinian women are brave, self-confident and determined to contribute to the building of our state'.

On Abu Rmeila's chances in the election, she said, "I hope I
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

---

Palestinians forced many of them to emigrate. Yet there is a phoenix-like persistence in the Palestinians. They have also the quality of steadfastness and pursue their ambitions in the political, economic and commercial spheres. Their weaponry is education. The Ramallah Youth Union in Westland, Michigan is one such ex-patriate society. Surrounding the club, there are sports fields, parking lots, and land for future building projects. The club has a special significance for the people of Ramallah who live in the United States. It provides them with their homeland, and the opportunity to keep in touch. Mahir A'jouni, the head of the union, explains, "The union means so much to the sons of Ramallah. It's a center for gossip from home. We have meetings, we socialize, we have parties and lectures in the center. We also publish a magazine, This is Ramallah, full of news and activities taking place back in Ramallah. Another important function is that it informs Palestinians in Palestine about the Ramallah Convention that is held yearly in the United States. The convention gives the opportunity for Palestinians to exchange their points of view and cooperate on various projects. In the office of the union, I work with the editorial staff of the magazine. It is published in both Arabic and English. Working for the magazine is voluntary," Alqoumi continued, "There are 17 clubs scattered throughout the United States. These clubs play a vital role in preserving traditions and customs. We're always aiming to maintain our heritage. For example, our youth section has a debke group, alongside sporting activities and educational lectures. You won't be surprised to hear that many marriages have resulted from these meetings."

Samir Farhat, former head of the Ramallah Union, elaborated, "The concern of Palestinians to protect their identity, traditions and customs in United States is very strong. We preserve the details of Palestinian marriage customs even more rigorously than at home." Nabih Hanna, who has lived in the United States for 40 years, still speaks Arabic in the peasant dialect. He explained that the traditional funeral ceremony has not changed either. Leila Hanna graduated from college in America, writing her thesis on the Ramallah people's integration into American Society. After working for a time in Jerusalem she married and now works for a civil rights organization. "I'm glad that I'm Palestinian," she says. "The blood of Palestine runs through our veins. My father is a former mayor of Ramallah who contributed much to the Palestinian cause --and we shall continue doing this here." Hanna has been elected the presidents of Ramallah's Union in Detroit, the first woman to occupy such a position. One of the aims of the union is to offer scholarships to support Palestinian students to carry on their educations. This year some 150 scholarships were awarded. Another accomplishment is the Palestinian Ramallah phone book, renewed every five years. It is a vital tool for Palestinians to contact friends of colleagues from Ramallah in the United States. Another publication has been a book on traditional Palestinian Cuisine. From his office in Michigan, Karim Alqoumi, a prominent Palestinian attorney, keeps track of various cases dealing with his job. Aside from his work, he keeps up with the latest news from his homeland, Palestine, in which he served for many years. He has contributed to the establishment of many Palestinian committees dealing with the Palestinian cause. In an interview with Al Quds newspaper, "Alqoumi said: "I finished my secondary education at Al Ahlia college in Ramallah. In 1948, I emigrated to the United States. I remember very well that the plane that I traveled in was the last plane to depart from Lydda Airport before the start of the war. I continued my studies in Wien University (The University of Vienna) graduating with a Ph.D in Saw. I was the first Palestinian lawyer to graduate and practice law in the 1950's. My love for Palestine was the main reason behind my success. My interest in the Palestinian question began when I was in the secondary school in Ramallah. I believe that every Palestinian, from the age of five, attains a type of political awareness. We are the most politicized society in the world."

A'jouni returns to his memories saying, "When I entered Wien University, we established the Arab Student Council, and Arab Unity for the Defense of the Palestinian People. From this stemmed the idea of forming the Ramallah Union. Since then, the union has had spawned affiliated branches all over the United States. In 1952, the first magazine was published. This Ramallah. The idea of publishing such a magazine arose when six students from Ramallah, who studied in Wien University called for the establishment of an Arab magazine. I had the honor of writing the first article, opening the editorial on the behalf of the founders. In 1976, I had the further honor of representing the Ramallah Union in the Palestinian Congress in the United States. This congress represented all the Palestinian factions. Furthermore, I represented the Jordanian Community Union in the United States from 1970 to 1974. I resigned from the Palestinian local control. The status of Jerusalem remains a point of dispute, with Netanyahu insisting on a Jews-only city, and the Pope seeking guarantees for all faiths in Jerusalem. The POpe noted that Sara Netanyahu, the wife of the PM, was a 'Polish girl': confirming this, Netanyahu added that she had been a Polish Jewish girl "in Jerusalem... for six generations". [TXT]

60208. ------. "Pope John Paul II and PM Benjamin Netanyahu Meet, Looking to Jerusalem Trip", in New York Times, February 4, 1997. p. A5. Pope John Paul II and Netanyahu met in the Vatican to discuss a future meeting in Jerusalem. The Pope as pope has never visited Israel (although he visited in 1963); Arafat has offered a visit in 2000 to the Pope. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a sensitive topic. We are trying to allow the opportunity for the new Palestinian generation to adopt the advantages and ignore the disadvantages of Western society. I could say that we have successfully managed to overcome the cultural differences. Over 90% of Palestinians have done so." [AjJouni has been helping various institutions in the West Bank as well. He collects money during the year and at the times of conventions to assist Birzeit University. He and his wife, Suhila, visited Birzeit University for the first time in 1976. After finding out the needs of the university, 'AjJouni managed to collect financial aid from Palestinian Americans. Last year, he estimated the funding would reach $170000. 'AjJouni, speaking on education said, "Education for Palestinians is a vital tool for building the new Palestinian state. This is why we established the Friends of Bir Zeit University. I'm proud to be the head of this institute." In addition to the Birzeit fund, 'Ajlouni and 14 others from various Arab regions managed to top up the support fund for the students on Wien University. Out of the 14 donors, four are from Ramallah. Each one contributed $14000, making a total scholarship fund of $217000. Asked about the American view toward Palestinians, 'Ajlouni said, "After the peace process, the view has changed. Americans know we are striving for our rights. Today, we're not afraid to say that we are Palestinians--because the image of the Palestinian is no more that of a terrorist." [=] bulldozers were knocking down houses m which women and children were living", responded by saying: "they are all terrorists", is statement accurately summarises Israel's strategy and the assumptions that underlie it, over many years. It is interesting to note that General—as he then was—Sharon justified the massacre in the Lebanon as the way to maintain ‘quiet on the West Bank'. How wrong he has proved to be! According to Amnesty International (June 1989): “On 2/9/1987 demonstrations erupted against the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, marking the beginning of the period of unrest soon to become known as the intifada. Since 9 December almost every day Palestinians, including children, have staged demonstrations in which stones, petrol bombs and other missiles have often been thrown at Israeli soldiers and settlers. The Israeli authorities have responded with force, which has often been excessive and indiscriminate, using such means as live ammunition, rubber and plastic bullets, teargas and gravel cannons. More than 360 Palestinians were reported to have been killed by early 4/1989 in shooting incidents alone. Thousands have been injured, many of them requiring hospital treatment. A number of Israeli soldiers and civilians too, as well as several Palestinians suspected of collaborating with the Israeli authorities, have been killed in violent attacks by Palestinians. As well as demonstrations and riots, mass strikes and tax boycotts have been organised by Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, and popular committees have been set up to coordinate such activities and create alternative structures to the Israeli Civil Administration. They have organised, among other things, food distribution, medical relief, and educational programs. Some Palestinian employees of the Israeli Civil Administration, particularly police officials, have resigned from their posts. In their attempt to suppress such activities, the Israeli authorities resorted to various measures. A number of Palestinian newspapers and institutions were closed down and the popular committees proscribed. Currency restrictions were introduced to control money going to families and institutions in the Occupied Territories. New identity cards were issued in the Gaza Strip to monitor the population more closely. More than 60 Palestinians were served with deportation orders and 48 were actually deported. Villages, towns and refugee camps have been put under prolonged curfew, sometimes for a month or more, during which time electricity, water and telephones have been disconnected. Trees have been uprooted and crops ruined. Dozens of Palestinian homes have been demolished or sealed up as punishment. During the first few months of the uprising hundreds of teenagers and young men were arrested, summarily tried on criminal charges—often without legal representation—and sentenced to several months’ imprisonment for throwing stones and setting up roadblocks. In March 1988, however, the Israeli authorities decided to make more use of administrative detention. More than 5000 Palestinians have been in administrative detention since the beginning of the Palestinian intifada. Most of them for six months; some repeatedly. At least 1,100 are reported to be on detention at present, the vast majority in harsh conditions in the Ketzioth detention centre in Israel. Administrative detention in Israel and the Occupied Territories can and has been used to detain prisoners of conscience, held for the non-violent exercise of their right to freedom of expression and association. The International Committee of the Red Cross, one of the few organisations still able to travel relatively freely in the occupied West Bank and Gaza, has accused the Israelis of deliberately stirring up tensions which culminated in Thursday’s killing of at least four Palestinians in the West Bank village of Nahhalin. "For five or six days before the killings, Israeli border guards had been systematically provoking the villagers by making religious and personal insults", an ICRC spokesman, Mr Carlos Bauverd, said. During the pre-dawn Israeli raid on Nahhalin, part of which was witnessed by the ICRC, Israeli soldiers opened fire “without discrimination and without restraint” he said. Apart from the Nahhalin killings, the ICRC condemned Israel for an “increasingly frequent use of firearms and acts of physical violence against defenseless civilians”. Mr Bauverd said that among recent violations of the Fourth Geneva Convention had been systematic violence against medical teams and ambulance drivers who were employed by the Red Cross and by the UN Works and Relief Agency for Palestinian Refugees. “These people have been pulled from their vehicles and beaten by Israeli soldiers. When drivers have tried to dismantle roadblocks to get to wounded people they have been arrested”…. Singled out for particular criticism was Israel’s policy of deporting Palestinian activists to Lebanon, something which is outlawed under Article 49, collective punishments and the destruction of houses, and excessive violence against demonstrators. (Guardian 4/15/1989) . . . The Border Police, which answers to the Ministry of Police rather than Defence, is a 5500-strong regular force, although many of its lower ranks arrive after being rejected even as cooks or drivers by the army. Many hold extreme right-wing political views. The force has a tendency to be so brutal as to simply terrify Palestinians into submission, although—and this makes Nahhalin unusual—that toughness is not necessarily a problem of being trigger-happy. They are widely accused of sexual abuse and there have been some allegations of rape. Many people from Nahhalin said on Thursday that tension had been mounting after Border Police began to make obscene remarks or gestures at local women. (Guardian 15th April 1989.) Jewish settlers in the occupied West Bank yesterday wounded three Arabs when they shot up a village near Ramallah after Israeli vehicles had been attacked by stone-throwers. A few hours earlier, settlers fired at Arab houses in the West Bank City of Hebron after petrol bombs were thrown at an Israeli car. It was not known whether anyone was hurt in this shooting. Highlighting their anger, a group of settlers also appealed to the right-wing minister, Mr Ariel Sharon, to allow them a free hand for revenge against the stone-throwers. "Arik, do something. You can break the intifada like you broke Gaza", a settler said, referring to the former general’s successful campaign in the occupied Gaza Strip in the early “You’re right. I know what should be done but I’m a voice in the wilderness in the Cabinet and nothing will happen unless you press (Prime Minister) Shamir to let me handle things", the minister said. "What should be done is to put all the Arabs on a skewer and roast them", a passing motorist shouted. “Throw the Arabs out”, shouted a young woman. (Guardian 5/27/1989) . . . “The West Bank is different from the Gaza strip in three or four ways. The West Bank is five times the area; the Gaza strip can easily be sealed off. Over 60% of the residents of the Gaza strip live in refugee camps, against 10% on the West Bank. And there are the settlers.” Some 70,000 Jewish settlers, many of them highly critical of what they see as General Motza’s soft approach, live among 650,000 Palestinians on the West Bank, against only 2000 among the 650,000 inhabitants of the Gaza strip. (Independent 6/1989) Ariel Sharon . . . Likud Hawk . . . told reporters in the Golan Heights wrested from Syria in the 1967 war and held onto in the 1973 war, that “we are a war. It’s a different kind of war. But it’s a war. In order to be able to overcome all our problems . . . the most important thing is to restore law and order, to bring to an end terror and violence, called here intifada and to eliminate the heads of the terrorist organisations and first of all of Arafat.” Mr Sharon, now Trade and Industry Minister, has made such threats before, and Israel is not above assassination. As defence minister, Mr Sharon launched Israel’s invasion of Lebanon in 1982, with the declared aim of clearing Palestinian Refugees. “These people have been pulled from their vehicles and beaten by Israeli soldiers. When drivers have tried to dismantle roadblocks to get to wounded people they have been arrested”…. Singled out for particular criticism was Israel’s policy of deporting Palestinian activists to Lebanon, something which is outlawed under Article 49, collective punishments and the destruction of houses, and excessive violence against demonstrators. (Guardian 4/15/1989) . . . The Border Police, which answers to the Ministry of Police rather than Defence, is a 5500-strong regular force, although many of its lower ranks arrive after being rejected even as cooks or drivers by the army. Many hold extreme right-wing political views. The force has a tendency to be so brutal as to simply terrify Palestinians into submission, although—and this makes Nahhalin unusual—that toughness is not necessarily a problem of being trigger-happy. They are widely accused of sexual abuse and there have been some allegations of rape. Many people from Nahhalin said on Thursday that tension had been mounting after Border Police began to make obscene remarks or gestures at local women. (Guardian 15th April 1989.) twice as many victims. However, the UNRWA in Gaza said 400 Arabs were injured by gunfire, beatings or teargas inhalation on Saturday. Arab hospitals in Gaza said troops shot and wounded eight people in continuing protests yesterday. The violence occurred during the Muslim holiday of El-Fitr, which is marked by parades and visits to the graves of relatives. Gen. Lapid said residents of Nuseirat refugee camp provoked the most serious violence... helicopter dropped teargas canisters, and troop reinforcements were called in. In the clash, two people were shot dead and at least 42 people, including two Israeli soldiers were wounded. (Guardian 5/8/1989)

...Mr. Shamir said in Tel Aviv that no effort would be spared to catch the murderers of Steven Rosenfeld, a 48-year-old American immigrant, found stabbed to death... near an Arab village adjoining the West Bank settlement of Ariel. He was the 21st Israeli to be killed during the intifada. About 520 Palestinians have been killed... "Israel's security forces will uphold this violence with an iron fist." Mr. Shamir said... Ariel, with a population of 6,000, attracted controversy recently when it ordered Palestinians employed there to wear tags saying "foreign worker". (Guardian 6/25/1989)

In chilling proof that the Israeli Army has learned nothing in the 17 months since the intifada began, three Palestinians were killed and more than 140 injured in the Gaza Strip over the weekend, while one soldier suffered a broken jaw... A second depressing aspect of the latest events is the fact that Israeli soldiers are still using live fire against mourners with stones and slingshots—a seven-month-old girl was among those hit by bullets. Most depressing of all is that 466 Palestinians died, in spite of the renunciation of violence by the PLO and its recognition of Israel's right to exist within secure borders, a change of administration in Washington and a more moderate line from Mr. Gorbachev. (Moscow, peace in the Middle East is as distant as ever. (The Independent 5/8/1989)

The Israeli Prime Minister, Mr. Yitzhak Shamir, said yesterday that proposals for Palestinian elections in the occupied territories were more public relations than substance, reinforcing Arab accusations that the initiative was aimed at ending the intifada without conceding real political power to the Palestinians. He told a parliamentary committee that those elected would not form a parliament: "The elections have more importance from a public relations point of view than in a practical sense." (Guardian 6/27/1989)

As well as joining the kidnappers in the Lebanon the Israelis have been extending their territory there too. The Independent reported on the 25th April: While world attention has been focused on the crisis afflicting Beirut and central Lebanon, Israel has been quietly extending its hold on areas in the south within its self-declared security zone. At the weekend, 300 farmers were evicted from their land just over the border from Israel. About 40 square miles of Lebanese territory were effectively annexed by the Israeli forces, according to Lebanese sources. It was the second instance this year of Lebanese citizens being expelled from their property in the south. In January, dozens of people were evicted from the Israeli-occupied town of Chebaa, on the eastern slopes of Mount Hermon, the snow-covered mountain ridge which forms the southern-eastern frontier between Israeli-occupied south Lebanon and Syria. It is at Chebaa that the 300 farmers have now arrived, together with what flocks and other possessions they were able to take with them. Having received no compensation for their lost land, they are now penniless and homeless. Eight Palestinians, described by Israel as leaders of the uprising in the occupied territories, were deported to Lebanon yesterday, as the army went on alert to guard Jewish settlers planning mass new cards bore magnetic strips, like credit cards. The information...
after trying to protect his son from arrest. They were convicted of the lesser charge of brutality. The judges advocate agreed with the accused that the victim died not from the beating at his house but from wounds suffered later when he was held at an army outpost. They concluded that the culprits would never be found among the 20 or so other soldiers who participated in the beating. This was the first trial of soldiers accused of beating to death a Palestinian in their charge since the beginning of the uprising. During the trial earlier this year, a soldier after soldier testified about systematic brutality in an atmosphere of fear and racial loathing... Dedi Zucker, Knesset member for the Left-Wing Citizens’ Rights Movement, called the verdict the most important since the beginning of the Intifada. He said it was the first time a court had questioned the army’s policy. Prosecutions and disciplinary actions have been rare; the army protects its own. Two weeks ago, an Israeli colonel escaped with dismissal for ordering soldiers to break the arms and legs of Palestinians already arrested. Since the uprising began in 12/1987, two soldiers have been convicted of manslaughter. Nearly 500 Palestinians have been shot dead or beaten to death in this period. (The Independent 5/26/1988).[=]

60210. -------. “Powerful Women”, in Jewish Press (New York), June 14, 1996. p. 32. Two Israeli women were included in the World Business list of the most powerful women in international business: bank Leumi CEO Galia Maor, and Dubek managing director Ruth Hirsh. [TXT]

60212. -------. “Prisoners Launch Hunger Strike”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 21, 1994. p. 2. An open hunger strike was launched by all the prisoners, women and men at Tel Mond Prison near Tel Aviv 10/17/1994. The inmates have also refused to accept family visits until they are released.

The Mandela Institute in Ramallah which works with political prisoners announced that the prisoners released a statement confirming their strike which says, “No retreat, no surrender until our demands are met.” A Nazareth-based organization, The Prisoners’ Friends Society, sent Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin, a telegram demanding the release of two prisoners, Iman Abu Hayat 16, and Najla Fathi. 15. The imprisonment of both young women contravenes international conventions, the message read. The society also called for the release of Nidal Barghout whose health condition is deteriorating rapidly.

Prior to the strike, prisoners in Jneid Prison in Nablus denied reports that Palestinians held in Israeli jails will go on an open hunger strike starting 10/15/1994. This information was given to attorney Ahmed Khatib of A-Dameer, a Jerusalem-based human rights organization, who met with inmates 10/13/1994. The prisoners, however, told the attorney that they have no choice but to strike if Israel fails to release the women prisoners, as well as the ill and elderly.

According to Khatib, the prisoners in Megiddo Prison are suffering from a number of skin diseases. Any requests for clean sheets and clothing have been refused by the prison authorities. [=]

60213. -------. “Protection Needed”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 31, 1993. p. 4. Two statements should set the alarm bells off around the world regarding the grave situation of human rights under Israeli occupation.

The statements were made by the head of the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, Cornelio Sommaruga, upon his visit to the country last week, and by the London-based Amnesty International on the situation in the Gaza Strip. While Amnesty International expressed its deep concern for the unjustified killing of civilian Palestinians—among them a number of children—by Israelis, Sommaruga demanded that the Israeli authorities apply the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention specifically drafted for the protection of civilian populations under occupation. He also affirmed the applicability of this convention to the occupied Palestinian territories.

During the trial earlier this year, the Palestinians express their appreciation for the aforementioned statements, they regret the fact that the international response to the recent escalation of Israeli practices has been very negligible.

We believe is high time that the international community take some action to put an end to Israeli transgressions and stands firm in its support of the Palestinian demand for international protection. It has already been 26 years since the Israeli occupation of 1967, and the pleas for protection have fallen on deaf ears.

International action against Israeli policies and violations of human rights have not been strong enough or sufficient enough to force a real change. This is attributed mainly to the unlimited support of US administrations to Israel, their “strategic ally.” Officially US support, which grants the Israeli practices almost full political and military cover, certainly has not given enough consideration to the cause of peace in this region, nor to the interests of the American people.

The statements made by the two organizations, which have a worldwide reputation as watchdogs for human rights, should be taken quite seriously by the United Nations and all those concerned for peace in the region. These statements, in fact, underline the Palestinian demands that Israel should stop its violations of human rights before peace negotiations can continue.

At a time when the Palestinians and other Arab parties are indulging in the peace process and taking the necessary steps to make the achievement of a political settlement possible, the Israelis are escalating their practices to strangle the Palestinian population. International protection for the Palestinians under Israeli occupation is in demand now more than at any other time. It is the duty of all those concerned with peace, human rights, and freedom to raise their voices for that cause. Now is the time for action. [=]

60214. -------. “Quranic Dowry”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 25, 1994. p. 15. There is a growing interest in Islamic customs, traditions and cultures among Palestinians of 1948. In a unique episode, a young Palestinian woman from the village of Qalansuwah inside the “green line” agreed to marry a young man from the Tulkarm refugee camp on condition that he learn by heart a surah from the Quran. The young woman asked her suitor Naser Hawji to learn Surat An-Nurhus his dowry. The marriage contract also states that in case of divorce, Hawji will have to learn all the other Quranic surahs by heart. [=]

60215. -------. “Rabin Responsible for Worst Year in Gaza Human Rights Conditions: A Report by the Gaza Center for Rights and Law: Closure”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 8-9. The indefinite closure of the Gaza Strip takes the strangulation of the Gaza economy by the State of Israel to yet another degree of severity, reducing the number of Gaza laborers employed in Israel to 15000, 50% of the preclosure level and possibly 20% of its pre-Intifada level. This has led to a dramatic fall in purchasing power within Gaza, affecting not only those deprived of their livelihood through the reduction of work permits, but the very level of the economy, whether producer, retailer or consumer.

According to calculations based on data provided by UNRWA, the Statistical Yearbook of Israel 1991 and local researchers, the average household income (four members) has dropped to monthly NIS130 ($48), despite the recent Municipality Relief Program. This monthly income represents a decrease of 13% from the pre-closure level and a drop of up to 66% (calculating 70000 Gaza workers in Israel) from the days before the Intifada.

In addition, religious and social obligations cannot be followed... in a satisfactory manner, with a days-long procedure to apply for - and slight chances of receiving - a travel permit. After denying legal security and numerous economic, social and political freedoms, the Israeli government has now effectively punished some 800,000 people with collective imprisonment on an area of about 360 square kilometers. [=]

60216. ------. "Rabin Responsible for Worst Year in Gaza Human Rights Conditions: A Report by the Gaza Center for Rights and Law: Killings and Injuries During 6/93, Part 1", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 8. Four Palestinians were killed by the Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip during 5/93, taking the total killed during the first six months of 1993 to 84. The Israeli army continues to locate snipers armed with live ammunition on rooftop observation points in highly populated and sensitive areas in the middle of refugee camps within the Strip. Shootings by those snipers appear random, often occurring at times when there are no violent disturbances or clashes taking place, or causing injury to persons who are some distance from such disturbances.

During 6/93, one 13-year-old boy, Amin Muhammad Ammar, was shot dead by a sniper as he crossed a road in Bureij refugee camp. It is difficult to reconcile the use of lethal force by these snipers with international law provisions concerning the use of force.

In particular, the Code of Conduct of Law Enforcement Provisions stipulates that the use of force must be proportional to the "legitimate objectiveto be achieved," and should be exceptional. Furthermore, locating snipers in the heart of densely populated areas is unnecessarily provocative and it itself contributes to increasing tension... .

Over 800 Palestinians were injured by the Israeli army during the month of 6/93, many very seriously. Once again, a large number of those injured (347) were 16 years of age or under. The number of assaults and/or beatings of Palestinians by Israeli soldiers was even higher during 6/93 than in previous months. Many Palestinians suffered quite serious injuries as a result of assaults by the occupying forces.

On 6/26/93, two very young children suffered serious injuries when an Israeli foot patrol opened fire with live ammunition while pursuing a young man through the streets of Block B of Shaboura refugee camp, in Rafah. Omar Hijazi, 32 months, were playing in front of their houses when one of the foot soldiers opened fire indiscriminately.

Omar received bullet wounds is his left thigh and left arm. Mahmoud received a number of bullet wounds in the abdomen, chest, pelvis and back. They were both taken to the UNRWA clinic in Rafah and from there transferred to Nasser Hospital in Khan Yunis. Both are in critical condition. [=]

60217. ------. "Rabin Responsible for Worst Year in Gaza Human Rights Conditions: A Report by the Gaza Center for Rights and Law: Killings and Injuries During 6/93, Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 8. Kamel Dawa, 4, from Jabalya refugee camp, was severely injured when Israeli soldiers fired live ammunition and rubber bullets into the crowded market area on the morning of 6/19/93. Dawa, who was with his father at the time, was shot from a distance of only 12 meters. He received bullet wounds in the right side of his abdomen.

The Gaza Center for Rights and Law continues to receive an alarming number of reports of Palestinians being beaten, often severely, by security forces. At about noon 6/16/93, Nour ad-Deen Abu Hatab, 18, of Khan Yunis refugee camp, was near Bilal Mosque. A soldier from an Israeli army patrol called over to him. Abu Hatab was not asked any questions or placed under arrest, but was immediately beaten savagely about the head with a gun by the soldier. He suffered a compression factor and internal bleeding and underwent two operations for fracture of the skull.

At about 10:30 a.m. 6/11/93, Iz ad-Din Yassin, 15, from Nuseirat refugee camp, went to visit his uncle, who lives in Bureij refugee camp. On the way, he was apprehended by foot soldiers who held him and tied his hands behind his back with electric cable. He was restrained in this way for almost 90 minutes before being beaten for a few minutes. He was then released and allowed to go on his way.

This 15-year-old boy is mentally retarded, and this is apparently well-known to the army forces in the camp.

Journalists who attempt to report on the deteriorating human rights situation in the Gaza Strip are facing increasing harassment from the security forces. In particular Palestinian journalists, whether working for the local or international media, are at risk of injury if they attempt to cover events in the refugee camps.

On 6/21/93, Palestinian reporter Majdi Arabeed, 28, was shot in the leg while witnessing sporadic clashes between residents of Shate' refugee camp and Israeli soldiers. The shooting took place near the taxi station in the center of the camp. At about 4:30 p.m. one of the officers of the patrol told Arabeed that he would be shot if he did not leave the area. Majdi refused to leave and continued to witness the demonstrations. About 90 minutes later, he was shot in the leg from a distance of some 70 meters. He was taken to Shifa Hospital, where he was treated for shrapnel wounds. [=]

60219. ------. "Rally marks Fatah Day", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996. p. 3. President Yasser Arafat has stressed that an independent state depends on an elected presidency, on an open legal system, and on a free legislative council. Arafat was speaking at a rally organized by Fatah marking 31 years since the movement began. The rally took place at the Falujah School at the Jabaliya Refugee Camp near Gaza Jan. 2. In his speech, Artaf stressed election related issues. "In the beginning, the wish was for an administrative council composed of 24 members, but thanks to your will, you have transformed it into a legislative council for the Palestinian people so it will become a part of the Palestine National Council," Arafat said. "We are passing through perilous times. We may or may not become. This phase begins with the elections," Arafat told the gathering. He called upon Palestinian women to cast their voice alongside those of the men in the upcoming elections.

Arafat appealed the people of Jabaliya, birthplace of the Intifada, and stressed that the Intifada thwarted a conspiracy to obliterate the Palestinian people, and put them on the map again. "They also said Gaza and Jericho First and Last. Now the cities of the West Bank are being liberated one following the other, and soon it will be the turn of Jerusalem," Arafat said. Celebrations marking Fatah Day continue throughout the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. At the Aroub Refugee Camp in the Hebron area, citizens celebrated by lighting 31 torches on the peaks of the surrounding hills Monday, Jan. 1. [=] naturalized American citizen, is an aristocrat who travels in the best circles of society and highest reaches of political power in North America and Europe. Singer, a Hasidic Jew from Brooklyn who spoke only Yiddish until he was 12, toils tirelessly and faceless in the trenches of international Zionism. But the two men have worked together on behalf of world Jewry for more than a decade. Bronfman is president of the World Jewish Congress, and Singer is the group’s secretary general.

60220. ------. "Raphael Patai, 85, a Scholar of Jewish and Arab Cultures; Treating Scripture As a Window Into an Ancient People's Rollicking Psychology", in New York Times, July 25, 1996. p. B8. A dedicated Zionist, Raphael Patai built his career trying to make the stories of the Jewish people the basis for a generation of Middle East scholars. His dedication to Zionism led him to receive his doctorate at the Hebrew University in 1936. His most popular books were the pop psychology of the 'The Jewish Mind' and the racist pop 'The Arab Mind', (this last mildly controversial pop-Feminist 'Hebrew Goddess' (this last work generally ignored by serious scholars). He died at the home of his daughter, Dr. Jennifer Schneider, in Tucson, Arizona. He is also survived by daughter Daphne Patai in Amherst, Massachusetts, companion Simone Boy of Forest Hills, and brother Prof. Saul Patai of Jerusalem. [TXT]

Last month, the two delivered a joint public address on the future of Higher Education. The report also stated the number of pupils in those schools as 654697. The breakdown follows: The Gaza Strip: 351 schools - 71 government, 159 UNRWA, 21 private. 134 of those are all male, 105 all female, 112 mixed. 6556 male and female teachers teach at those schools. The West Bank (including Jerusalem): 1559 schools - 913 government, 100 UNRWA, 546 private. 374 all male, 387 all female, 896 mixed. 14498 teachers in 12947 classes. There are 436 kindergartens, 13 in the Gaza Strip with 1061 children, and 423 in the West Bank with 35768 children. There are 1468 Vocational high schools with various areas of specialization - agricultural, industrial, nursing: 77 in the Gaza Strip, of which 35 are male and 42 female; 1391 in the West Bank, 1198 male, 193 female. The report noted that in the cities of Tulkarem, Qalqiliya, Jenin and Jerusalem, there were no female students to be found in vocational schools, including nursing. [-]

60223. -------. "Schoolbag: School Year End Census", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 29, 1995. p. 12. There are 1900 schools in Palestine, including government and UNRWA schools, according to a report issued 12/25/1995 by the Palestine Census Bureau affiliated with the Ministry of Higher Education. The report also stated the number of pupils in those schools as 654697. The breakdown follows: The Gaza Strip: 351 schools - 71 government, 159 UNRWA, 21 private. 134 of those are all male, 105 all female, 112 mixed. 6556 male and female teachers teach at those schools. The West Bank (including Jerusalem): 1559 schools - 913 government, 100 UNRWA, 546 private. 374 all male, 387 all female, 896 mixed. 14498 teachers in 12947 classes. There are 436 kindergartens, 13 in the Gaza Strip with 1061 children, and 423 in the West Bank with 35768 children. There are 1468 Vocational high schools with various areas of specialization - agricultural, industrial, nursing: 77 in the Gaza Strip, of which 35 are male and 42 female; 1391 in the West Bank, 1198 male, 193 female. The report noted that in the cities of Tulkarem, Qalqiliya, Jenin and Jerusalem, there were no female students to be found in vocational schools, including nursing. [-]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

are suffering in jails. These prisoners ask for nothing but to back to their wives, husbands, children and families.”

Shaath heard appeals from three of the 32 female prisoners being held in Tel Mond. Eighteen of the women are supporters of Fatah at the peace process, and Shaath said that they must be freed before they and their families in the West Bank and Gaza turn against the process.

“We all have to work together to guarantee their freedom. The problem is not with food or clothing, it is with their freedom. This is what they need,” the minister added.

When he was also calling for the release of prisoners who oppose the peace process, Shaath said, “These Palestinians were imprisoned because they fought against the occupation, therefore if they are released they will be committed to peace.”

Shahal was supposed to accompany Shaath, but according to Israel Radio he had to attend an important session in the Knesset.

Earlier in the week, Shaath expressed his concern for the prisoners. “We must work nonstop to release the prisoners. In order to do that we have to improve their situation and solve their problems.”

He continued, “I realized that the prisoners’ issue must be negotiated separately from any other subject such as redeployment and elections.”

Shaath reported that President Yasser Arafat had agreed to launch a new campaign to secure the release of all Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails.

“There is no reason for the Israelis to delay releasing Palestinian prisoners,” said Shaath.

He confirmed that the Palestinians are continuously pressuring the Israelis to put essential issues on the agenda of negotiations, but the prisoners’ issue should take on a new dimension and be dealt with separately.

Shaath said, “For his visit to the jails was Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres’ statement that all those who signed the oath have been released.

Shaath believes there are prisoners who signed the oath who have yet to be released.

“Shaath also wanted to show that prisoners represent all factions and not only Islamic movements,” he said.

Shaath also indicated that the withdrawal of the Israeli army will pave the way for legislative elections which will take place in 7/1995.

“The delay in releasing prisoners is due to the Israeli posturing of withdrawal from Palestinian population centers. It was decided that there would be a general amnesty as soon as withdrawal of the Israeli military takes place.”

The minister remarked that Arafat has taken on the cause of sick and old prisoners and is working to get them released immediately.

He added that Rabin promised to release them but to date has only released eight female prisoners.

The bus attack that occurred in Tel Aviv caused Rabin to change his mind about releasing more prisoners, Shaath said.

“I don’t want to promise anything now, but I hope our efforts will have positive and practical results,” he added.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian prisoners and detainees at Ansar III

The strike results from an increase in collective and individual punishment.

The prisoners called for immediate closure of the detention center.

A memorandum released by the prisoners added that the health situation in the detention camp is deteriorating and the food is inadequate.

The detainees called for more space inside their tents, fresh water, and heating. They also called for permitting their lawyers and families to visit them and appealed for the cessation of the policy of separating prisoners of the West Bank and Gaza.

The detainees called on the Palestinian National Authority to intervene for their immediate release. [-]

60228. -------. “Shot Going Home”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times

Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 21, 1994. p. 2. A young man in his twenties was shot dead by Israeli soldiers after returning home from working in his family’s field in Halhoul near Hebron.

Israel Radio reported that Imad Adaraba, 23, was on his way home with four other youths, when he aroused the suspicion of some Israeli soldiers in the area.

Relatives said that Adaraba did not attack the patrol.

Military authorities are investigating the incident, said Israel Radio.

His body was moved to Abu Kbir Forensic Institute near Tel
Aviv for autopsy. [=]

60229. -------. “Six Shot Dead: Intifada Update, Part 1”, in Al-Fajr Israeli military shot dead six Palestinians this week and injured more than 100 others. Four of the six people killed were from the Gaza Strip.

The number of Palestinians killed during the Intifada is now put at 1232.

The military siege imposed on the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip entered its second month. Only a limited number of Palestinian workers were given permits to allow them to go to work in Israel proper and occupied East Jerusalem.

Following are incidents reported during the week:

APRIL 24: Curfew was imposed on the Tuffah Quarter of Gaza City following confrontations between Palestinian civilians and Israeli soldiers.

APRIL 24: A total strike was observed throughout the occupied territories called for by the UNLU.

Israelis soldiers shot and injured several Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In Shate’ and Bureij refugee camps in the Strip scores of Palestinians stoned military patrols. Several were injured and hospitalized.

In the city of Khan Yunis, two Palestinians were shot and injured when soldiers retaliated at stone throwers.

In Rafeh, one Palestinian was also shot and injured when soldiers disbursed protesters. Searches continued in the cities of Rafah and Khan Yunis.

Curfew remained in force in the Tuffah quarter in Gaza City.

In Bureen village, Nablus region, a youth was shot and injured when soldiers shot at a passing car.

In the village of Beit Ulla, Hebron district, two youths were shot and injured and four arrested in clashes with the military.

In Ramallah, two “wanted” Palestinians from the Jenin region were arrested.

An Israeli car was set ablaze in Jerusalem.

APRIL 26: Ahmad Hamdan, 12, was shot dead in Khan Yunis camp.

In Nuseirat camp, Najah Abu Dallal, 33, also died of wounds sustained the week before.

At least 11 other Palestinians were shot and injured in the Strip in clashes in Khan Yunis, Nuseirat and Shate’.

APRIL 27: A general strike was observed in the occupied territories. The strike was called for by Palestinian organizations opposing the current political process. The strike came on the day the ninth round of talks resumed in Washington, DC.

Fierce clashes erupted in the Gaza Strip, leaving at least 75 Palestinians injured by Israeli soldiers. Clashes were reported in Nuseirat, Bureij, Khan Yunis, Jabalya and Shate’ refugee camps and in Gaza City.

Another Palestinian was also injured in Nablus in the West Bank.

Fierce clashes were reported in Jenin, where youths attacked settlers’ cars with Molotovs. [=]
In Qalqilya, activists shot at a military encampment, the area was cordoned off and searched.

APRIL 28: Israeli forces shot dead four Palestinians and injured scores of others.

In the village of Iritas, Bethlehem region; soldiers shot 25-year-old Mahmoud Shahin in the head, killing him. Two others were also injured in the shooting. The military alleged that the incident occurred when they refused to stop for an identification check.

In Kufur N'meh in the Ramallah district, soldiers shot dead 14-year-old Ibrahim Deik. The army alleged the boy was aiming a handmade gun at soldiers in the village. Palestinians said the youth was participating in a stone-throwing demonstration.

The boy is the son of martyr Khaled Deik, who was killed during a gun battle with soldiers in 1985.

In the Gaza Strip, Khalid Haleel, 20, from Bureij refugee camp, was shot dead and 15 others were injured when soldiers shot live ammunition at Palestinian protesters.

The incident occurred following the establishment of an additional, military encampment in the refugee camp. In Shate’ refugee camp, soldiers shot dead Rami Abu Nakhal, 12, allegedly after the soldiers were hit with stones.

Search campaigns continued in the Rafah area. Two suspects were arrested.

In Hebron, an Israeli settler was injured when his car was stoned.

In Jalazun refugee camp, two Molotovs were tossed at a military patrol.

Another Molotov was also tossed at the military in the old city of Nablus.

APRIL 29: Ramzi Mansour, 18, of Bureij refugee camp, died of wounds sustained April 28 during clashes in his home camp.

In Sa’ar, near Tubkarm, two Molotovs were tossed at an army jeep, burning the jeep but causing no injuries to the soldiers inside. The soldier opened fire in all directions, but no injuries were reported.

Two homes were sealed in Jalazun camp, north of Ramallah. The army said the owners, Fouad and Walid Hodali, were convicted in injuring a soldier in Ramallah in 1990.

Youths pelted a military vehicle in Yamoun, near Jenin. At the time, soldiers said they opened fire, injuring one 18-year-old. Yamoun was put under siege, and soldiers searched everyone who wanted to enter or exit the village.[2] 15: Israeli authorities demolished six homes in Hebron and Jerusalem. More than 41 Palestinian residents were displaced.

16: Samer Naim Suleiman (16) of al-Zawiya was shot dead by Israeli soldiers while walking to his grandfather’s house. When neighbors rushed to his aid, soldiers told them, “We will give him the proper treatment.”

17: Munir Abu al-Aziz Jaradat was ambushed by undercover soldiers and shot dead near Jenin. Witnesses said that his hands were raised and empty.

18: Yusra Mohammed Abu Ajour (25) and her three children, aged six years to one week, were deported to Jordan. Authorities stated that she lacked an updated resident permit, which cost 450 NIS (180 USD) and must be renewed every three months. The home of Ibrahim Abu Amrah was demolished by Israeli authorities, who claimed it had been built without a permit.

21: Two rooms of a house belonging to Rayek Suboh (40) in Azmout (Nablus) were demolished by Israeli authorities, displacing six people. Israeli authorities closed the main mosque in Ya’abad (Jenin), saying they’d found “agitating material” there in an earlier raid.

25: Yusuf Mohammad Abu alSoba’ (23), Ali Mohammad Sawalmah (24), and Mustafa Abd al-Fatah Jawabrah (29) were ambushed and killed in the village of Arrabeh (Jenin) by five Israeli undercover soldiers dressed as Palestinian women. Arrabeh, Kuf Ra’ey and Fahmi villages (Jenin) were placed under curfew; Arrabeh remained under curfew for eight days. 613 dunams of land near Al Khader (Bethlehem) owned by Abdallah Khader al-Sbeih Ibrahim Obeid, and others were confiscated by Israeli authorities for “military use.” The land is near Efrat Settlement.

26: Na’if Abdul Slaaam from Singil (Ramallah) was shot five times by an Israeli from Shiloh settlement after he had attacked another settler. Ra’d Fathi Sa’adeh (15) from Awarta (Nablus) was shot in the abdomen by Israeli settlers, who drove by and fired from their car. Sha’adeh was walking home.

27: Settlers from around Hebron rampaged in the center of town after a Palestinian woman stabbed a settler there. Three Palestinians were injured. Hebron was under curfew for nine days. Israeli authorities uprooted 300 collectively owned olive trees near Mazra’a al Qabaliyia (Ramallah) for future settlement 300 olive trees owned by Hussain Al al-Hajai (55) from Bani Na’im (Hebron) were uprooted by Israeli authorities. No reason was given.[26]

2: Undercover soldiers raided the village of Bartaa’a Al-Shargieh (Jenin), arresting 14 people and destroying property. Later, a helicopter and 24 ground vehicles re-entered the village and arrested 12 more people. A two-day curfew was imposed.

3: Ashraf Abd al-Rahim Yaghmor (18) of Beir Jalla (Bethlehem) was shot in the back and killed by Israeli soldiers.

7: Rami Sadeq Abu Khder (12) of Tamoun (Nablus) was severely burned by a cellophane wrapped bomb that looked “like a piece of halaweh.”

12: Rami Zakaria al-Mazloum (20) of Gaza City was shot dead by Israeli undercover soldiers dressed as mechanics while taking part in a march.

13: Imad Yusuf Shuaqiqat (27) of Jaba (Jenin) was shot and killed by members of the special forces.

14: Israeli soldiers besieged the campus of Al-Najah University in Nablus for 8 days, claiming that 16 armed Palestinians were hiding there. 4, 500 students and faculty were left without food telephone contact. Nablus and environs was declared a “closed military zone,” and visitors were denied entry. The crisis was ended after six Palestinians gave themselves up in order to be deported for three years.

15: Yasser Ahmad Numruti (28) of Khan Yunis Refugee Camp (Gaza) was ambushed by Israeli soldiers while driving in his car, then killed after a foot chase.

21: Mahmoud Khaled Kabha (30) of Ya’bed (Jenin) was shot dead by eight special unit soldiers while walking at night with a Black panther leader in the area.

24: Na’im Abu Amounah (6) of Kan Yunis Refugee Camp (Gaza) was shot by Israeli soldiers, and died later. He was in a car with his father.

27: Nour al-Din al-Akad (16) of Khan Yunis Refugee Camp (Gaza) was shot dead in his home by undercover unit soldiers. He had overheard a conversation that disclosed their identities.

29: Israeli bulldozers razed eight homes, in the West Bank and gaza Strip, displacing more than 38 people, including 94 year-old Abd al-Hakim Wishamy. Authorities confiscated hundreds of dunams of land in Luban al-Gharby (Ramallah).

30: Salah Mahmoud Kara’in (23) of Silwan was shot dead by a bus driver after stabbing two Israeli policemen.[26]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

builddozed by Israeli authorities, on the pretext that it was unlicensed.

4: Mustafa Barakat of Anabta (Tulkarem) was suffocated to death by a bag placed over his head during interrogation in Tulkarem prison. Al-Siyassa Newspaper, owned by Khaled Khalfa, was closed by Israeli authorities, on charges that it had relations with an illegal organization.

5: Three houses in Allar (Tulkarem) were bulldozed. 21 people were displaced.

6: The Silwan home of Hussein Subuh Da'na (55) was ordered demolished by Israeli authorities, claiming that it was unlicensed. Many members of the 44-person family that lived there were displaced.

8: Three Palestinians from Gaza, whom IDF claimed to be members of Ez a-Din al-Kassam cell, were arrested in Ramallah.

9: A youth (17) was shot and wounded in Nablus by soldiers who claimed he was throwing stones. A masksed youth was shot by soldiers in Hebron. Four people were wounded in clashes with the army in Jabaliya and Khan Yunis refugee camps. A youth was shot in Nablus, sustaining moderate injuries, by soldiers who claimed he was throwing molotov cocktails.

10: Three youths were wounded in Jabaliya and Shafi refugee camps during clashes with soldiers.

12: A house was demolished in Jabal Mukabar (Jerusalem) for claims of illegal construction; 18 people were displaced.

13: Abdel Kadir Kamir (24) died from an explosive that he seems to have been holding.

14: Abd alader Qawasme (12) was shot in the head by soldiers in Hebron.

Compiled by Aaron Shakow, based on Aseel Research and Information reports.[=]

15: Yeheksel Mizrabi was stabbed to death near his residence by a Palestinian in a Jewish neighborhood in East Jerusalem. His death sparked anti-Arab riots. Samir Mohammad Salameh (32) from Khan Yunis, Gaza, was found dead in his solitary confinement cell in the Beersheba prison. Prison authorities claim that he committed suicide.

17: Salim Abn al-Latif Jazar (18) from Askar refugee camp Nablus, was killed during clashes with soldiers.

18: Khaled Abu Qamsan (27) from Sabra neighborhood, Gaza was killed by soldiers. Anot1er Palestinian was seriously wounded. Jaa'far Mohammad Salim (17) from Alar, Tularkam, was killed during clashes with the army.

19: 1 5-year-old Mahmoud Abdallah Lehuweiti from the Tularkam refugee camp was killed by soldiers.

23: Medical worker Awad Ali Sirdi (28) was shot dead while transferring wounded Palestinians to the UNRWA clinic in Gaza.

26: year-old Chava Velberg from Kiryat-Arba, near Hebron, was killed in a car accident after the car was stoned by Palestinians. In revenge, settlers damaged Arab property in Hebron.

28: Haidar Mohammad Khreish (25) from Rimal, Gaza, died from gun-shot wounds.[-]

60238. "Sixty Days of Occupation February 15 - April 14, 1993: Part 2", in Challenge, May-June 1993. p. 2. MARCH 1: Nathan Azaria (33) and Gregory Abramov (27) were killed and 9 other Jews were injured in Tel-Aviv by Ziad Salame (19) from Gaza. Gaza was put under temporary closure.

2: Yehoshua Weissbrod (40) was killed after mistakenly driving into the Palestinian neighborhood of Shabra in Gaza. He was shot and then shot to death.

8: Uri Magidish (38) was stabbed to death by two of his workers at a Jewish settlement in the Gaza Strip. Mohammad Ali Abu Shubak (24) from Jabalya refugee camp was killed at his breakfast table by an army undercover unit. 16-year-old Taisir Mohammad Abu Ghalion was shot dead by soldiers in Tularkam.

10: Majed Haja (17) was shot dead in A-Ram by an undercover unit. David Libskind (24), a reserve soldier, was badly injured after being stabbed by two Arabs in Nazareth.

12: Simcha Lev (53), a female settler, was killed with an axe in Khan Yunis while driving Arab workers. The body of missing soldier Yehoshua Friedberg was found near the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway; he was allegedly killed by Palestinians. 1 5-year-old Musa Zakaria Haimuhi was killed in Hebron by soldiers. Nidal Hussein Naser (23) from Beit Hanun, Gaza, was killed while handling explosives.

14: 3-year-old Huda Ishak Sijaj was shot dead by soldiers in her father's car; the car was fired upon by the army when her father drove past an IDF roadblock without stopping.

15: Ofer Cohen (24) and David Bracha (27), Jewish settlers, were killed by an Arab driver while they were walking on the side of the Nablus-Ramallah road.

Naser Ali Abu Asheh (24) from Nur Shams was fatally shot by the army.

16: Sa'ad Salmi (17) and Faiz Bayuk (18) were killed by IDF soldiers in clashes in Khan Yunis. 75 Palestinians were injured.

Yusuf Ibrahim Gharib (45), a school principal from Rafah, Gaza, was shot in the head by soldiers while paying condolences to the family of Mahmoud Abu Mathkur.

18: Raid Mohammad Shana (18) from Khan-Yunis was shot, and 50 Palestinians were injured, four of them critically.

20: Soldier Yosi Shabtai (27) was killed in an ambush laid by Hamas' militant wing, Izz al-Din al-Qassam, at Jabalya refugee camp, Gaza. Another soldier, Gitai Avisar, was killed in an ambush in the West Bank. 7-year-old Maher Naim Majeida and 16-year-old Taleb Fares Hamrani were killed by soldiers during demonstrations in Khan Yunis.

25 Palestinians were injured.

7 houses were demolished by anti-tank missiles in the Dir al-Balah refugee camp.[=]
8: 13-year-old Ra’ida Omar Farah from Bani Suheila, Gaza, was killed by soldiers.
12: A Jewish settler from Jerusalem shot and killed a Palestinian who was running away after trying to steal a car. The settler was arrested.
In sum: 37 Palestinians were killed (10 were children sixteen years-old or younger). 17 Israelis were killed (including 3 soldiers, 3 policeman, and 1 child).
Compiled by Meir Turniansky[=]

18: An Israeli guard at the Gilo settlement, Alexander Tcherinchovsly, was seriously wounded and his partner, Alexander Vilovsky, was lightly wounded by two Palestinian gunman.
19: Rab’a a-Shurafi (47) of Jabalia Refugee Camp, Gaza, died of tear gas inhalation. Twenty other Palestinians, including a 4-year-old and a 12-year-old, were wounded by IDF gunfire in Gaza.
26: IDF soldiers opened fire at 3 youths preparing to throw molotov cocktails. Two were seriously wounded.

27: Jamil Ibrahim Wadi (24) of Khan Yunis Refugee Camp, Gaza, was shot dead after ambushing an IDF post near Gush Katif settlement. A soldier was seriously injured in the attack.
29: A youth from Jayush, Nablus, was seriously wounded by gunfire in clashes with the army. Twelve Palestinian workers from Sawahra village were shot in West Jerusalem by settlers in reprisal attacks.

2: Fifteen people were injured by IDF gunfire in Gaza City and 10 in Shati Refugee Camp, Gaza, in clashes with the IDF. Five children, aged 8-14, were shot in Khan Yunis Refugee Camp when a grenade was thrown at a military vehicle.
3: Four Israeli soldiers were injured when 2 grenades were thrown at military headquarters in Gaza City. A mosque in Gaza City was sealed for 3 months after allegedly inciting material was found inside.

6: The body of Yaron Chen, a soldier from Jerusalem, was killed by IDF gunfire while soldiers were chasing his wanted brother. All Muhammed Sayady (18) from Deheishe Refugee Camp was killed by a bomb while at his workplace.
6: The body of Yaron Chen, a soldier from Jerusalem, was found near Beitunia after he was kidnapped by 3 Palestinians the day before at ARam junction, Jerusalem. Soldiers Tomer David from Manara and Lev Pishakov from Beit Shean were shot dead by Adnan Aziz Mar’i, a member of the Islamic Jihad from Qarawat Bani Hasan, Nablus, who was then killed by a third soldier. The soldiers were stationed at a roadblock in Deir Balut, Tulkarm, set up to search for Chen’s kidnappers.

26: IDF soldiers opened fire at 3 youths preparing to throw molotov cocktails. Two were seriously wounded.

27: Jamil Ibrahim Wadi (24) of Khan Yunis Refugee Camp, Gaza, was shot dead after ambushing an IDF post near Gush Katif settlement. A soldier was seriously injured in the attack.
29: A youth from Jayush, Nablus, was seriously wounded by gunfire in clashes with the army. Twelve Palestinian workers from Sawahra village were shot in West Jerusalem by settlers in reprisal attacks.

3: Four Israeli soldiers were injured when 2 grenades were thrown at military headquarters in Gaza City. A mosque in Gaza City was sealed for 3 months after allegedly inciting material was found inside.

6: The body of Yaron Chen, a soldier from Jerusalem, was killed by IDF gunfire while soldiers were chasing his wanted brother. All Muhammed Sayady (18) from Deheishe Refugee Camp was killed by a bomb while at his workplace.
6: The body of Yaron Chen, a soldier from Jerusalem, was found near Beitunia after he was kidnapped by 3 Palestinians the day before at ARam junction, Jerusalem. Soldiers Tomer David from Manara and Lev Pishakov from Beit Shean were shot dead by Adnan Aziz Mar’i, a member of the Islamic Jihad from Qarawat Bani Hasan, Nablus, who was then killed by a third soldier. The soldiers were stationed at a roadblock in Deir Balut, Tulkarm, set up to search for Chen’s kidnappers.

16: Fatehi Abu Khader (39) of Rafah Refugee Camp, Gaza, died of gunshot wounds sustained several days earlier from undercover units. Seven others, including 4 children, were wounded during demonstrations in Gaza.
19: A 6-year-old child from Gaza City and a youth from Deir al-Balah were wounded by IDF gunfire.
20: 9-year-old Izzat Matar of Jabalia Refugee Camp, Gaza, died of head wounds sustained on July 17 when soldiers opened fire on him and 2 other children in the camp.
21: Salman Arafat (16) of AbuHusn, Gaza, was killed when he was knocked off his bicycle by an Israeli police car. A’liz Zahaila (21) of Sawahra a-Sharqiyia village, Jerusalem, died of heart failure while soldiers were chasing him.

22: Ten Palestinians, 5 of them children, were injured during clashes with soldiers in the Gaza Strip.
24: Fifteen Palestinians were shot in the Gaza Strip, including 5 children. Among them was a 4-year-old girl who was shot in the stomach while standing in front of her house.
28: Israeli troops demolished 3 houses in Khan Yunis with anti-tank missiles.
30: Four Palestinians were injured by 2 grenades thrown into a furniture store in Bethlehem.[=]

1: Jeannette Kadosh (39) of Jerusalem, Maher Abu Srur of A’ida Refugee Camp, Bethlehem, and Muhammad al-Hindi of Jabalia Refugee Camp, Gaza, were killed by IDF gunfire at a Jerusalem roadblock after the 2 Palestinians had hijacked Kadosh’s car. Earlier, they had attacked an Egged bus in Jerusalem. A third gunman was critically shot by soldiers. Olga Chaijov (42) was killed on the bus and the driver sustained moderate wounds. Five Palestinian workers from Sawahra village were shot in West Jerusalem by settlers in reprisal attacks.
2: Fifteen people were injured by IDF gunfire in Gaza City and 10 in Shati Refugee Camp, Gaza, in clashes with the IDF. Five children, aged 8-14, were shot in Khan Yunis Refugee Camp when a grenade was thrown at a military vehicle.

3: Four Israeli soldiers were injured when 2 grenades were thrown at military headquarters in Gaza City. A mosque in Gaza City was sealed for 3 months after allegedly inciting material was found inside.

6: The body of Yaron Chen, a soldier from Jerusalem, was found near Beitunia after he was kidnapped by 3 Palestinians the day before at ARam junction, Jerusalem. Soldiers Tomer David from Manara and Lev Pishakov from Beit Shean were shot dead by Adnan Aziz Mar’i, a member of the Islamic Jihad from Qarawat Bani Hasan, Nablus, who was then killed by a third soldier. The soldiers were stationed at a roadblock in Deir Balut, Tulkarm, set up to search for Chen’s kidnappers.

10: An Israeli truck driver smuggling vegetables from the Gaza Strip into Israel was wounded by IDF gunfire.
13: Salem Fakhri Salem (18) from Jaljalia, Ramallah, was shot and killed during clashes with the IDF. He was denied medical care for one-and-a-half hours.
Eighteen Palestinians were killed including 4 children 16 or under.

Ten Israelis were killed including 3 civilians.
[Compiled by Yiftat Susskind[=]]

52
and Paris. United States' president Bill Clinton would not be so concerned if his own mother died, but Zionists are a different matter. They control the United States' political system and worshipping at the altar of the Zionist gods is a ritual that every American politician must perform if he/she wants to be elected. How accurate is it to describe the Israelis as civilians? Each Israeli citizen, man and woman, over the age of fifteen is required to perform military duty. There is no exception to this rule. Thus, every Israeli is a soldier. And, contrary to media reports, there were no children who died in the bombings. The Israelis "children" were all over the age of fifteen. The Zionist-controlled media failed to mention that the two Jerusalem bombings had targeted the main police station in the city. There was only fleeting mention of the fact that the Ashkelon bomb had targeted an army reserve waiting spot, next to a synagogue where Zionist terrorists receive their "blessing" to kill innocent Palestinians. Every Israeli settler carries a gun. They have no compunction shooting and killing Palestinian villagers and town people while the Israeli army watches. Following the 2/25/1994 massacre by Baruch Goldstein in the Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron in which forty-eight Muslim worshippers were slaughtered while praying, the Palestinians were placed under curfew. The Zionist thugs were free to prowl the streets with guns slung across their shoulders. The Zionists have even built a shrine on the grave of the monster Goldstein where pilgrims from far and wide come to pay homage. Obviously, Palestinian/Muslim life is cheaper than the life of the Israelis or other Palestinian areas. A month after 9/11, when Hanitzotz prisoners were placed under curfew, the Palestinians were dynamited by self-confessed killer of Yitzhak Rabin, have been dynamited. On the other hand, not only the homes of those who were involved in the Jerusalem or Ashkelon bombings were dynamited but also those of their relatives. Under Zionist justice, if you happen to be the relative of a person wanted by the Zionists, then you are guilty. Are Muslims not entitled to the same standard of justice.[=]

60245. -------. "The Case of Rami Muslah, Age 14", in Challenge, January-March, 1991. p. 23. Amnesty International announced November 13 that Rami Fakhrri Abdullah Muslah, 14, had allegedly been tortured while in detention in Gaza Central Prison. Known by Palestinians as "the slaughterhouse, the prison is notorious as the worst torture center in the Occupied Territories. Muslah's treatment is by no means unusual, despite his young age. A schoolboy from al-Bureij refugee camp in the Gaza Strip, Muslah was arrested September 25, 1990, a few days after an Israeli soldier was burned to death in the camp. He was taken to Gaza Central Prison and held there one month without seeing a lawyer or being allowed out of his cell. The lawyer who saw him October 29 said the boy was breathing heavily, had difficulty speaking and coughed frequently, sometimes spitting blood. The next day, a judge extended Muslah's detention for 120 days. According to Amnesty: On 9 November two lawyers visited Rami Muslah and took an affidavit from him. They said that he looked ill, continued to have difficulty speaking and coughed frequently. In the affidavit Rami Muslah alleges that he was interrogated by eight men. They apparently beat him all over his body, including his chest, stomach and genitals. He said one placed a gun to his head and threatened to shoot him if he did not confess, then poured water over his genitals, saying that it was petrol, and threatened to set it alight. Throughout the period of interrogation he was hooded and handcuffed. He was also beaten all over his body in a cell by someone who claimed to be a prisoner as well. Afterwards Rami Muslah said he was taken to a medical orderly who slapped his face. An interrogator then forced him to pick up his hood, which was on the floor, with his mouth, and kicked him as he bent over. The torture apparently continue over the period of a week. Rami Muslah indicated that he had seen a doctor three times, in addition to the medical orderly, but had only received some tablets. Muslah's lawyer has submitted a complaint to the attorney general about the allegations. His case has been adopted by the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel.[=]

60246. -------. "The Israeli Army and the Hebron Massacre: Israeli Violence and Palestinian Resistance Continue", in Revolutionary Worker, April 3, 1994, p. 14-15. Israel has not let up the repression in Hebron or other Palestinian areas. A month after the massacre, Hebron is still under curfew. On 3/23/94, 1500 Israeli soldiers barged into a children's hospital and other buildings in Hebron and used them as a firebase for a 22-hour assault on an apartment building. The army said some members of the Islamic group Hamas were inside. Troops sprayed the building with automatic weapon fire and shot dozens of anti-tank rockets at it. A bulldozer was used to reduce the building to rubble. When the dust cleared, a pregnant woman in the hospital who had been hit by the gunfire lay dead, along with four accused Hamas members. When news of this assault spread, fierce protests erupted across the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Youths in Hebron defied the curfew to fight street clashes with troops. Over 30 Palestinians were reported wounded in a single day. To try to stop the protests, the army had to place Nablus, the largest city in the West Bank, under curfew. Palestinians launched a three-day general strike to mark one month since the mosque massacre in Hebron. [=] on the grounds that they were “a security risk to the state.” This decision bore the fingerprints of the Shabak, whose legal advisor appeared in front of the committee in camera.

The final argument was supplied by the new Minister of Police on June 20, 1990:

“1. It is impossible to grant [Yacov Ben Efrat’s] request due to the latter’s obstinate insistence to be with the security only.

2. It is still possible to find a suitable place for the prisoner. But he firmly objects to being in any place other than the security wing, and to this the commissioner does not agree for reasons of prison security.”

This claim has no grounds whatsoever. It is no secret that all decisions concerning Hanitzotz prisoners were made by the Shabak, while the prison services’ role was Any other alternative means being in wings where social and moral disintegration prevail under the reign of the drug. The attempt to separate us from prisoners convicted on the same charges is based on racist norms of discrimination between Jews and Arabs that should be rejected by enlightened people. We, political prisoners in Israel and the world, belong to one family. The desire for social justice, progress and peace unites us.

Despite the political separation from other political prisoners, the bonds of solidarity were never cut off. The demand of the Hanitzotz prisoners met a rock of resistance on the authorities’ part. Yet they still feel that by raising the issue and struggling for midst of a hunger strike in June 1989, Yacov Ben Efrat and Assaf Advik explained their motives:

“The security prisoners’ wing is the only place in prison where we can reasonably maintain our way of life. Any other alternative means being in wings where social and moral disintegration prevail under the reign of the drug. The attempt to separate us from prisoners convicted on the same charges is based on racist norms of discrimination between Jews and Arabs that should be rejected by enlightened people. We, political prisoners in Israel and the world, belong to one family. The desire for social justice, progress and peace unites us.”

Despite the political separation from other political prisoners, the bonds of solidarity were never cut off. The demand of the Hanitzotz prisoners met a rock of resistance on the authorities’ part. Yet they still feel that by raising the issue and struggling for midst of a hunger strike in June 1989, Yacov Ben Efrat and it they will pose a new challenge for the peace movement - continuing the dialogue behind bars as well. [Yacov Ben Efrat’s release is due on October 14, 1990.] [=]

60248. ------. “Thousands of Israelis Flock to Hebron to Back Settlers [some 8000 Israelis march to support Jewish settlers; a Palestinian counterdemonstration was cornered and beaten by Israeli troops; Jewish soldiers beat a Palestinian woman who shouted at soldiers beating her husband]; in Oregonian (Portland), November 10, 1996, p. A3. [TXT]

60249. ------. “UFO Contact: The Holy Land”, in Sightings (Fox Television), May 12, 1995. Massive numbers of aliens are landing in Israel to contact Israeli blondes, ‘Sightings’ breathlessly observes. Hanna Shommech, Shoshana Yahud, Ziporet Carmel, and Dorom Rotem, four Israeli women living in the Jewish settlement of Qadima, were visited by a seven-foot tall, bald alien. One was advised telepathically by the alien to: “Go away: I could smash you like a little ball”.

Rachel Gueta notes that three of her sheep (with voice over a photograph in which hundreds of sheep carcasses were heaped) were found drained of blood and ‘with shaved cheeks and with holes drilled in their cheeks’; in addition, about 40 of her chickens had ‘frozen to death’ with fear. Rather out of the blue, Israeli entrepreneur Eli Cohen notes that he saw a UFO in 1991.

Barry Chamish, Israeli ‘Biblical UFOlogist’ observed that UFOs were once seen to be angels by the ancients. By contrast, Zeharia Sichim, Israeli author of the ‘Seventh Seal’ opined that the aliens were our enemies and he, personally, was quite afraid of the threat they represent. The closing comment on this ‘news’ segment noted that cattle mutilations were becoming common in Israel; later in the program it was found (in the context of a news report on swimming Sasquatches (Big Foot) at the edge of the remote Puget Sound) that there are large numbers of Giant Humansoids in Israel. [TXT]

60250. ------. “Upcoming Peace March”, in Challenge, May-June 1992, p. 38. A six-day Walk for a Peaceful Future will take place on 6/5/92-6/10/92, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the Six-day War. The statement uniting the participants calls for a just and peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, “based on meeting the aspirations of both the Israeli and the Palestinian people to self-determination, national independence, international recognition and security.”

A range of activities in support of the cause of peace, justice and freedom will take place during the walk. These include a vigil in support of Women in Black on 6/5/92 in Jerusalem, and a gathering in solidarity with Yesh Gvul outside Atlit military prison on 6/6/92. The walk will then proceed to Jerusalem, through Israel and the West Bank.

For further information, please contact Walk for a Peaceful Future, PO Box 51721, East Jerusalem (tel: 02-828 980, fax: 02-829 534). [=]

60251. ------. “Updates: Women In Black”, in Challenge, March-April, 1994, p. 40. The Jerusalem group has been on-again, off-again since the signing of the DOP. After the December 13 deadline for the start of withdrawal passed, Women in Black decided to renew their weekly vigil until Israel withdraws its forces from Gaza and Jericho. On February 4, when the number of participants reached on all-time low of eight, a decision was taken to stop standing, which was again altered due to the February 25 massacre, when a group of approximately thirty stood again at Paris Square. [=]

60252. ------. “Violence Against Children”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995, p. 12. The phenomenon of violence against children in our society is not new. Throughout history, violence has been used against children in various forms in various cultures. For a time, children were used as sacrifices to the gods, while female infanticide is still practiced. Corporal punishment is well known in modern society and still prevails in some countries. Mustafa Masri, a Palestinian psychologist from Gaza, said that corporal punishment is an unsuitable practice exercised to put pressure on children or to force them to do something or act in a certain way. He explained that violence has various forms, one of which is corporal punishment: physical abuse like hitting, beating, burning and choking. Verbal violence is another, and has a great psychological impact on children. They suffer just as much, if not more than, from physical abuse. The third form of violence is sexual. According to Masri, violence leads to the disintegration of the family. He confirmed that violence against children obstructs the developmental process and growth. It also affects their concentration negatively and can lead to severe psychological problems like hysteria and lack of self-confidence. Jaser Salah, a psychologist at the Gaza Center for Mental Health, said that in his experience with abused children, the reasons behind the abuse go back to issues like natural disasters and man-made causes like war and family violence. "Violence is a very dangerous phenomenon that should be rejected by all societies, since traumatized children can themselves become unnecessarily violent with others;" he added. He said that children should be allowed to express themselves freely and adults should listen to them attentively. There should be special guiding sessions for abused children where they can be counseled with games and drawing. Fathi Balawi, Deputy Education Minister, rejected the use of corporal or verbal punishment at schools. He said the ministry had issued a decree to all Palestinian schools to...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

ban the use of violence against pupils, to protect them from teachers who have little experience. He stressed the importance of creating a congenial atmosphere in the schools where there would be mutual respect between teachers and pupils. According to the legal advisor at the PNA Justice Ministry, Suleiman Dahdouh, children enjoy a special status within Palestinian law. The law, he explained, bans the use of violence against minors even if they have purposefully committed a misdemeanor. Dahdouh said the law forbids children under 14 from working, and female children under 16 and male children under 18 from getting married. It guarantees free education and health care for all...[=]

60253. "Voices from the Inside", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 27, 1995. p. 8. [Palestinian prisoners in Jneid Prison in Nablus released a statement on 1/20/1995 explaining the problems they are facing in Israeli prisons]. At a time when the political situation should allow the release of all Palestinian prisoners from Israeli prisons without condition, the prison administration has clamped down on the prisoners and taken or threatened to take away some of the few privileges they have. They have also left many of our demands hanging in the air without solving them, claiming tight budgets, security reasons, or the political situation.... We are renewing our demand for the release of all male and female prisoners without condition, and call for the immediate release of all the female, sick, elderly, youth and long-term prisoners. We are calling on all the human and legal institutions, national and popular committees, and other organizations to support our battle from behind bars by organizing campaigns on the ground to put an end to the deteriorating conditions in the prisons due to the oppressive measures the various prison administrations are enforcing, e.g. Far'a prison where the authorities recently shot tear gas at the prisoners, and carried out other oppressive measures. The following are some of the most important problems constituting the new attacks by the Israeli prison administrations: - An increase in prisoners in solitary confinement without reason, and the continued isolation of scores of prisoners for many years with no reason in Jneid, Beersheba, Ashqelon, Nitzan, Ramle and Kfar Youna prisons, amid making them endure extremely severe conditions; - Increasing oppression in Shatta Prison and refusing to listen to the fair demands of the prisoners which do not conflict with the security of the prison; live ammunition has even been used in Far'a prison; - Impeding necessary health examinations and operations and using routine procedures to hinder examinations; - Increasing oppressive searches in many prisons, especially Jneid, and bringing special forces from outside the prison for this purpose; - Refusing to transfer prisoners with light sentences to prisons closer to their homes; - Bad nutrition, and lack of fruits and vegetables; - Prohibiting the prisoners from the use of the telephones, and denying special visits to their homes due to ill health. We call on the public and all the institutions, powers, and supporters of our demands to rejuvenate the support campaigns and to do their best to put an end to our suffering. We also call for press conferences and popular peace demonstrations in support of our demands, of which the most important is the unconditional release of all the female prisoners without exception. Together until victory, The Palestinian political prisoners in Jneid Central Prison...[=]

60254. "WHO Statistics [Japanese life expectancy is highest at 83 for women and 76.3 for men; after Japan, men live longest in Israel, Sweden, Australia, Greece; women live longest in France, Switzerland, Australia, Canada; lowest infant mortality is in Japan, Finland, Singapore, Sweden, Norway, Canada, Switzerland, and highest in Brazil, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Argentina, Rumania]", in Gramma International (Havana), June 15, 1994. p. 15. [TXT]

60255. "Weekly Review, Part 6", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 3, 1993. p. 12. [DAUGHTER ASKS FOR REPATRIATION OF EXPELLED FATHER: A resident of Halhoul has applied to the military governor of the Hebron area asking that her father, expellee Ahmad Iqeil, be allowed to return. Maha Ahmad Iqeil said her father, expelled in 1971, was allowed in for one month last summer to see his family. The Israeli governor promised to study her request. TAX RAID ON EXPELLEE'S BUSINESS: Israeli tax authorities raided the textile factory of expellee Wael Hindiyeh of Nablus and forced caretaker Bilal al-Urtani to pay 3500 NIS on the account. Hindiyeh, one of the few expellees to have returned from the Marj az-Zuheri expulsion of December 1992, came home after he was wounded by Israeli gunfire. He was then transferred to prison in Israel, where he is still being held. QALQILYA LANDOWNERS FORCE A SHOWDOWN WITH SETTLLER: The Israeli High Court looks today into a case entered by the inheritors of the late Abdullah Abdul Rahman and Hasan Abdul Rahman, both of Qalqilya, against the Israeli Ministry of Defence. According to the plaintiffs, the Ministry of Defence broke the law when it granted a settler, Avi Morris, of the settlement Alfe Manshe, the right to set up a gas station on their land. Israeli authorities had confiscated a part of the land to pave a new road. The plaintiffs asked the High Court to have the settler and his equipment removed, and the land returned to them. OPERATION SMILE TEAM BACK IN JERUSALEM: A medical team from the United States specializing in cosmetic surgery will be performing operations free of charge at the Augusta Victoria Hospital in Jerusalem and at the Ahil Hospital in Gaza in June. The tour is part of a program called Operation Smile. Last year at Augusta Victoria, 40 surgeons from the Operation Smile organization operated on 150 Palestinian children who had suffered all degrees of disfiguring at the hands of Israeli soldiers during the Intifada. The surgeons are volunteers, and will be bringing with them all the necessary equipment. Volunteering Palestinian physicians and nurses will take part in the campaign...[=]

60256. "Weekly Review: 17 Palestinians killed in January 1993", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), February 8, 1993. p. 12-13. [1/31/93: Israeli troops shot dead 16 Palestinians in January while one Palestinian was shot dead by an Israeli settler. Five of the 17 were children under the age of 16. 12 of the dead Palestinians were shot in the Gaza Strip and 5 were killed in the West Bank. Most were shot in the head or chest with live ammunition. [An-Nahar]...]

60257. "Weekly Review: 6/17/93: Palestinian Family Returns Home", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly, June 21, 1993. p. 13. [Israeli authorities have allowed a Palestinian family to go back to their house, which had been sealed for the past eight years. The house, located in Bethlehem, belongs to Musa Muhammad Ihmeidan. Occupation forces closed down the house after Musa's son Ahmad was accused of a "security offense." [An-Nahar]...]

60258. "Weekly Review: 6/18/93: 25 AIDS Cases in the West Bank", in Al-Fajr-Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), June 28, 1993. p. 12. Palestinian medical sources announced yesterday that there are 25 AIDS cases registered in the West Bank. Dr. Mustafa Barghouthi, head of the Palestinian Medical Relief Committees, said that the cases deal with 16 men and seven women and children. Dr. Barghouthi added that the Israeli government, in charge of medical institutions in the occupied territories, is not doing what it should and that there aren't any campaigns to educate the public about the AIDS virus and how to protect medical workers from contracting it while treating AIDS patients...[=]

60259. "Weekly Review: 7/16/93: Study: 5000 Gaza Infants Die Yearly", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 26, 1993. p. 12. A recent study sponsored by the Norwegian government revealed that of every 1000 infants born in the occupied territories each year, 40 to 50 under the age of 1 die. This means that 4000 to 5000 Palestinian infants in Gaza die...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

includes a handicrafts section and a corner devoted to Islamic women's garb. Videos illustrating the condition of the expellees were screened. Al-Fajr [=]

60263. ------. "Weekly Review: 7/7/93: Border Guard Excused for Killing Boy", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 13. A border guard who killed a 13-year-old Palestinian boy was exonerated by a judge in a Tel Aviv court, who explained that the border guard acted under pressure.

Border guard Boaz Nahmani fired a rubber bullet at the child's head during a stone-throwing incident at Balata refugee camp, near Nablus, in 1990.

Judge Yehoshua Gross reprimanded Nahmani for firing from a distance of 24 meters instead of 40 meters, as prescribed by regulations. He reprimanded him further for firing at the child's head instead of his feet, also in contravention of regulations.

Despite the condemnation, the judge went on to explain that Nahmani had acted under "extenuating circumstances" in an area "known for its violence." So instead of being charged with manslaughter, the 22-year-old guard will be charged with "negligence."

Verdict in the case will be issued 9/21/93. Al-Fajr [=]

60264. ------. "Weekly Review: 7/7/93: Settler Kills Child", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 13. A general strike was observed in Ramallah and al-Bireh yesterday to protest the killing of a child run over by an Israeli settler driving through the main street of al-Bireh 7/6/93. Alia' Abdul Hamid Nisr was six years old. Al-Quds [=]

Organizers included the Federation of Working Women's Committees, the Center for Family Care, the Palestine Center for Guidance, and the Red Cross Society.

A representative of the Federation of Working Women's Committees thanked industrialists in Nablus for their contribution toward the festival.

Among the activities, a play was presented by children from the northern part of Palestine. It dealt with the issue of injustice. An-Nahar/Al-Quds [=]

The march, organized by the Federation of Unions of Palestinian Workers, was bolstered by protesters from women's organizations and Israelis.

They were protesting the Israeli government's decision to impose a collective punishment on the Palestinian people and deprive some 120000 Palestinian workers from earning their daily bread.

The protest march arrived within view of the city of Jerusalem when the authorities broke up the demonstration and arrested some of the leaders, including Federation Secretary General Shaker Sa'd. [An-Nahar] [=] 60267. ------. "Weekly Review: Autopsy Published", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), March 22, 1993. p. 12-13. 3/15/93: The autopsy report on 3-year-old Huda Ishaq Siyaj said the child was killed by a bullet that had caused a severe internal and external hemorrhage.

The child was killed 3/14/93 in Hebron when Israeli shot at the car her father was driving, claiming that he failed to stop when ordered. [An-Nahar] [=]

The photographers--boys and girls--shot their pictures with the aim of creating a unique documentary record of various facets of life in the camp seen through their eyes only.

The youthful photographers were prevented, despite efforts by UNRWA, from getting to the inauguration due to the siege on Jerusalem. [Al-Fajr] [=] 60269. "Weekly Review: Film on Intifada Women Gleans Prize in Germany", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 31, 1993, p. 12-13. 5/23/93: A Palestinian film received third place in a documentary film festival organized by the Green Party of Germany. The film, "The Women Next Door," was directed by Buthaina Khoury, a Palestinian filmmaker living in Ramallah. The documentary relates the suffering of the Palestinian woman, her role within society and her rise to the forefront during the Intifada.

The film took a year and half to make and was co-directed by Israeli filmmaker Michaela Avid. In Germany, it played four times to full houses in Munster and Munich. [Al-Quds] [=] 60270. "Weekly Review: Foundling Rescued", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993, p. 12-13. 4/15/93: A resident of Jerusalem came across an abandoned baby in the Sa'dieh Quarter in the Old City. Basima Siam, 35, said she was walking at 6 a.m. in one of the alleys of the neighborhood when she heard cries coming out of a plastic bag in the gutter.

"I looked into the bag, and I found a baby only hours old," she said. "I took him home, washed him and dressed him." She then informed the police and an ambulance from the Bikur holim in West Jerusalem was sent to pick him up. Siam has asked to adopt the baby. [Al-Quds] [=]

The girl was arrested last November, charged with tossing an empty bottle at an Egged bus, and imprisoned in Telmond. Earlier, the judge had refused to accept the girl's testimony because of the methods the interrogators had used. Hasounah was confined in a narrow space between two closets and was beaten by her interrogators in an attempt to force a confession.

The judge has decided to review the case and a verdict should be issued by 5/4/93. [Al-Quds] [=]

The report also said that February 1993 witnesses the worst anti-tank missile attacks on Palestinian homes, with 10 homes completely destroyed and nine others partially damaged.

As for the number of Gazans injured in February, the figures were reported as follows: 316 injured by live bullets, including 134 children under 15, 259 injured by plastic- and rubber-coated bullets; 182 treated for beatings by soldiers; and 196 treated for tear gas inhalation. [An-Nahar] [=]

A district court in Israel decided two weeks ago to let him go free on bail in view of his injuries, which called for urgent attention. His attorney was surprised when the police reminded the youth for further questioning, although his wounds are far from healed.

His family has turned to various human rights organizations in an appeal to save him from prison conditions, which they fear might cause an even greater deterioration in his health. [Al-Quds] [=]

The committee helped some of the families plant the saplings in the martyrs' cemeteries in the area. [Al-Fajr] [=]

The door of the Bara'em Nursery was heavily damaged; the iron bars on the windows removed; the furniture smashed; and toys destroyed.

This is the sixth time the nursery has been attacked in recent months, with the apparent motive being an internal political dispute. [Al-Fajr] [=]

The committee helped some of the families plant the saplings in the martyrs' cemeteries in the area. [Al-Fajr] [=]

60277. "Weekly Review: Settler Fires on Boy", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), May 17, 1993, p. 13. 5/11/1993: A 15 year old from Khadr village in the Bethlehem area was operated on in Beit Jala Hospital after he was fired on by a settler.

The settler said the boy had thrown a stone at his car while it was passing through Khadr. The boy sustained critical wounds. [AN-NAHAR] [=]

The settlers, who arrived from the neighboring settlement of Kfar Drom, claim that the two schools belong to them as they are on land they say belongs to the state of Israel. [Al-Fajr] [=]

Naser Abu Srur, 24, a student at Bethlehem University, is accused of participating in the killing of an Israeli intelligence officer, Haim Nahmani. Nahmani was killed four months ago in a Shin Bet safehouse in West Jerusalem.

The court decided to postpone till 5/23/1993 the session involving another defendant, Mahmoud Abu Sru.

The main suspect, according to the Israelis, is Maher Abu Sru, who the army has not yet been able to apprehend. (AL-QUDS) [=]

60280. -------. "West Bank Leaders Stay Away From Cairo Agreement", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), May 6, 1994. p. 2. Most Palestinian notables in the occupied territories who are supporters of the peace process, refrained from joining the signing ceremony in Cairo 5/4/1994, express their reservations about the agreement. The following are excerpts of some of their reactions:

Haidar Abdel Shafi (former head of the Palestinian Peace Delegation) declared that the Cairo Agreement does not give reason for optimism because of what is Israel is doing and applying on the ground contradicts the notion of peace.

Abdel Shafi wondered whether Arafat's momentary hesitation over signing goes back to a contradiction between what is written and what was drawn on the maps.

According to him, the agreement sets up many obstacles in the path of achieving a just peace. It gives Israel more reasons to become intransigent and claim rights to the occupied territories.

He said Israel has expressed its point of view by creating more settlements and by including Jerusalem in the scope of its plans, in addition to the numerous practices aimed against the Palestinian people.

Abdel Shafi added that the new situation demands of the Palestinians to confront a new set of threats. Since the impasse in the Washington talks, the US has proven itself to be aligned with Israel. The Palestinian are truly alone, he declared. This situation demands that they count only on themselves, and self-reliance is what they need to count on in those difficult times. It is the essential factor, he said.

Abdel Shafi pointed out that the one weapon the Palestinians possess in the coming phase is to fulfill their potential in a unified stand that serves the objectives of the Palestinian people.

Sheikh Jamil Hamami said that he was deeply pained by what took place in Cairo. He asked whether the future of the Palestinians has come down to nothing but this result. He added that if it indicates anything, it proves the lack of seriousness in the attempt to bring a solution to the Palestine cause, and an equal lack of seriousness in coming to grips with the destiny of the Palestinians.

According to him, this agreement represents a major obstacle in the path of a just and comprehensive peace and in the path of fulfilling the aspirations of the Palestinian people. He explained that the people feel very sad in the occupied territories in the light of Israeli arrogance, the hostile practices of the settlers, and the blind American support for Israel.

He declared that the agreement is of a provisional nature because it does not fulfill the aspirations of the Muslim Palestinian people who have suffered and borne much. This agreement was born dead, he believed.

Sheikh Hamami said it is necessary for the Palestinian people to stand as one and take a clear-eyed view of the implications of this turning-point. He does not bless this agreement, he said, and find it most urgent that all the Palestinian forces make common cause and confront the negative elements that follow from this agreement.

Hanan Ashrawi (human rights activist and former Palestinian spokeswoman at the Washington talks) declared that the Palestinian people deal with facts, and not with conferences, documents or political positions. They are working towards ending the occupation. She pointed out that while the chairman of the PLO signs the agreement in Cairo, Israel continues to impose the closure on the city of Jerusalem and the settlers persist in provocative acts against the Palestinians.

The Palestinian are not against peace, Ashrawi said. But the process must be established on substantive considerations and on a cumulative process effect that brings about the realization of one's rights, and not a cosmetic operation that allows the occupation to dig in.

Faisal Husseini (West Bank Fatah leader) claimed that it was not necessary to hold to the actual date of the signature, leaving important issues aside and unresolved. It would have been better to have postponed the signature date until an agreement with clear outlines was reached. [=] 60281. -------. "What's New From the Israeli Left?: August 16 - October 15 (A Partial List of Events): Part 2", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 40. Sept 6, A people's peace initiative: Fifteen Holon residents distributed red roses to Palestinian laborers as a gesture of peace and friendship, when the carloads of workers from Gaza and Hebron arrived at their regular pickup area in the industrial district of the Tel Aviv suburb at 6 am.

Sept 16, Red Line visit: Red Line, Jews and Arabs Against the Occupation, paid a visit to Qabata refugee camp near Jenin bringing clothing, medications, and baby food and collecting information on human rights violations.

September 17, Ramya wedding: Members of the Committee of Solidarity with the Residents of Ramya shared in the joyful occasion of a wedding in the threatened village. The bride, from the unrecognized village of Husseiniana, plans to live with the groom's family in Ramya, bringing the number of families in the village to eighteen.

Oct 2, Visiting a released prisoner: A delegation of Women for Women Political Prisoners visited Intisar al-Qaq, who had been released from a three-year imprisonment sentence five days earlier. Intisar gave birth to a daughter, Watan, in prison. She was not granted parole and the child was separated from her during the final year of her sentence.

Sept 29, Yehsh Gvuli solidarity rally.

Sept 30, So' lidarity with Mordechai Vanunu: Members of the Israeli Committee for Mordechai Vanunu demonstrated against the Prime Minister's residence on the sixth anniversary of Vanunu's abduction and imprisonment for divulging the secret of Israel's nuclear capability. They called for an immediate end to his solitary confinement, for his release and for a nuclear, biological, and chemical weapon-free Middle East. [=]

60282. -------. "What's New From the Israeli Left?: 2/92-4/92 (A Partial List of Events): Part 1", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 39. 2/25/92: A delegation of Members of the Israeli Committee for Mordechai Vanunu demonstrated at the Prime Minister's residence on the sixth anniversary of Vanunu's abduction and imprisonment for divulging the secret of Israel's nuclear capability. They called for an immediate end to his solitary confinement, for his release and for a nuclear, biological, and chemical weapon-free Middle East. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

60283. ------. "What's New from the Israeli Left?: 5/92-6/92 (A Partial List of Events), Part 1", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 39-40. 5/17/92: On the eve of the Israeli Festival, the largest international celebration of art and culture in Israel, 50 members of the Women and Peace Coalition and Women in Black demonstrated against the violation of human rights and use of torture during interrogation in Israeli prisons.  5/30/92: Members of Red Line (Arabs and Jews against the Occupation) traveled to Jenin Refugee Camp, bringing donated clothing for camp residents and visiting the family of someone who had been wounded by the mitsa'arvim units (disguised in Arab clothing) and paying a condolence call on a recently bereaved family.  5/30/92: Some 40 members of Yes Gvul visited the site where Jamal Ghanem was shot and killed some two months ago by mitsa'arvim in Shweiqa Village near Tulkarem, while he was playing soccer. A simulation of the shooting, by Palestinians who had been present at the time, showed that it would have been impossible for Ghanem to flee, and that he could have been arrested without being killed. Yesh Gvul contends that Palestinian spectators present at the time of the incident were not questioned at all in the course of the IDF investigations, and that the army was satisfied with the testimony of soldiers alone.  5/30/92: On the eve of Jerusalem Day, the religious Zionist peace movement, Oz veShalom/Netivot Shalom held a forum on the subject of Jerusalem's unification. Panelists included Moshe Amirav (Jerusalem City Councilman - Shinui), Tsvi Mazeh (Chair, Oz veShalom/Netivot Shalom), and Knesset members from Labor and Likud. While the Likud speaker stressed that no part of Jerusalem was negotiable, Amirav presented his vision of a unified Jerusalem with dual sovereignty: unified on the municipal-government level, but with the Israeli flag flying over West Jerusalem, capital of Israel and the Palestinian flag over East Jerusalem, capital of the Palestinian state. He and other speakers stressed the importance of equalizing the level of services to Jerusalem's Arab population.  60284. ------. "What's New from the Israeli Left?: 5/92-6/92 (A Partial List of Events), Part 2", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 40. 5/31/92: After an eleven-hour appeal to the High Court, the police permitted the holding of a demonstration called by the "Covenant of Equality" on Jerusalem Day. Despite the short notice, and despite the many difficulties arising from the closing of some roads to traffic, about 40 people came to the entrance of the village of Silwan to demonstrate their opposition to the national consensus regarding the "unification of Jerusalem." "There is no unification under occupation," "There is no unification - there is Judaization," were some of the slogans of the demonstration. Joining the demonstrators was the head of the "Committee for the Defense of the Lands of Silwan Village," Abu al-Walid Sirhan.  6/1/92: The International Day of the Child was marked by some 1000 children from the four children's centers in the Jenin area operated by Israeli-initiated "Care and Learning." Begun when schools in the West Bank were closed for extended periods, these centers offer basic learning skills and play and group activities in a warm and supportive environment. The slogan of the day was "A meeting of all children for a better life."  6/5/92: Hundreds of people participated in the Women in Black vigil in Jerusalem commemorating 25 years of the occupation. Regular demonstrators were joined by men and women from all over the country, as well as participants from the International Walk for Peace in the Middle East. (The walkers were participating in a 5-day protest walk, which began on 6/6/92 in Atlit, and was scheduled to continue to Jerusalem via Jenin, Nablus and Ramallah.) Later, against the will of the police, demonstrators joined Palestinian women in a march through the Palestinian village of Silwan, protest the continuing takeover of homes in the village by Jewish settlers.  6/6/92: Yesh Gvul, one of its regular demonstrations on the mountain overlooking Atlit prison, was joined by some 200 foreign and local participants in the International Walk for Peace in the Middle East. The names of the 170 Yesh Gvul prisoners who have been sent to prison in past years, rather than having served in the territories, were read out and a number of speeches were made.  6/8/92: The Peace Movement Coordinating Committee of Haifa and the North, along with members of constituent organizations including Women in Black, Re'ut (Arab and Jewish Youth Movement), and Peace Now demonstrated in Haifa's Hadar section. Speakers called for the reactivation of the Israeli peace and protest movement.  60285. ------. "What's New from the Israeli Left?: 5/92-6/92 (A Partial List of Events), Part 3", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 40. 6/7/92: Several hundred people, including Peace Walkers and members of Hadash, demonstrated opposite Megiddo Prison, where many Palestinian political prisoners are being held.  6/7/93: Thirteen Israelis, mostly activists in the peace and protest movement, were arrested along with some 100 international participants in the Walk for a Peaceful Future in the Middle East, when police on foot and horseback blocked their attempt to walk into the territories to continue their walk to Jerusalem. They were held 48 hours and released on their own recognizance.  6/8/92: Peace Now movement marked the 10th anniversary of the Lebanon War with memorial vigils in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa.  6/9/92: The New Spirit Movement held a demonstration at the Palace of Peace in Atlit, and was scheduled to continue to Nazareth via Jenin, Nablus and Ramallah. Later, against the will of the police, demonstrators joined Palestinian women in a march through the Palestinian village of Silwan, protest the continuing takeover of homes in the village by Jewish settlers.  6/10/92: Yesh Gvul, one of its regular demonstrations on the mountain overlooking Atlit prison, was joined by some 200 foreign and local participants in the International Walk for Peace in the Middle East. The names of the 170 Yesh Gvul prisoners who have been sent to prison in past years, rather than having served in the territories, were read out and a number of speeches were made.  6/12/92: Members of the Women's Peace Net visited Nablus where they met with recently-returned Opposition to the expulsions. is offering to put them up in several apartment buildings near Carmiel if peace negotiations, held a meeting in the Hakawati Theater in East villagers are still on their land more than two years after the evacuation of Hanitzotzl A-Sharara (see p.34). A debka (Palestinian folkdancing) troop August 28: Solidarity with Ramya. A meeting in solidarity with the Baqa Center in Majd al-Krum, the Progress Arab Students' Block and Dozens of activists attended.

Galilee, destroyed in 1951. Visitors came from the village of Sha'ab, the Israel to negotiate openly with the Palestine Liberation Organization. The people of Ramya are demanding to stay in their homes and families for many years.

A cardboard replica of one of the 38 children killed by the IDF in 1993 in which no Palestinian children were killed by the IDF.

A variety of peace and justice groups gathered in Jaffa for a work shop on active, nonviolent ways of responding to various injustices.

A vigil opposite the Augusta Victoria Hospital in East Jerusalem, standing in a symbolic cage which they erected on the spot. Demonstrators spoke out mainly against the closure’s medical implications, including the fact that it denies the Palestinian population access to the modern hospitals located in Jerusalem, sometimes with fatal results.

Visit of returned expellees. Peace activists from Hanitzotl A-Sharara, Women In Black, the Progress Arab Students' Block, and AJCAD, visited two of the 30 expellees who were returned on April 30 and May 3: Abdel Jawad Saleh, (see p.6) and Musa Shahshir, Nablus, expelled in 1969. The visitors affirmed the right of all Palestinian exiles and refuaees to return and called for escalation of efforts to implement UN decision 1979 to bring home the 413 expellees.

200 people visited the site of two Arab villages in the Galilee, destroyed in 1951. Visitors came from the village of Sha'ab, the Baqa Center in Majd al-Krum, the Progress Arab Students' Block and Hanitzotl A-Sharara (see p.34). A debka (Palestinian folkdancing) troop from the Baqa Center performed.

Representatives of Israeli and Palestinian organizations, including members of the Palestinian delegation to the peace negotiations, held a meeting in the Hakawati Theater in East Jerusalem. A joint statement was read out and signed, expressing strong opposition to the expulsions.

Representatives of Israeli and Palestinian organizations, including members of the Palestinian delegation to the peace negotiations, held a meeting in the Hakawati Theater in East Jerusalem. A joint statement was read out and signed, expressing strong opposition to the expulsions.

Women in Black and other organizations in their campaign. family's home. At center, Shomali's mother, receiving the visitors.

Protest of information on human rights violations in the Occupied Territories, to taking action in opposition to these violations. B'tselem is also calling for more stringent open-fire regulations, and enlisting other organizations in their campaign.

Women's Committees, from Beit Hanina, Jerusalem, demonstrated Marj a-Zuhur. Skirmishes between supporters of the Communist Party and the Islamic Movement led to police intervention, and the meeting was dispersed.[=]

Yossi Wolfson and Ran Paz.

March 25: AJCAD took 200 children of expellees to the Israeli-Lebanon border-crossing point at Rosh Hanikra, during the Muslim holiday of ‘Id alFitr, which ends Ramadan. They had a short rally with Jewish and Arab speakers, and released helium balloons, on which the children had written their father’s names. A cardboard replica of one of the expellees' tents was attached to ten large balloons.

May Day: 200 people visited the site of two Arab villages in the Galilee, destroyed in 1951. Visitors came from the village of Sha’ab, the Baqa Center in Majd al-Krum, the Progress Arab Students’ Block and Hanitzotzl A-Sharara, Women In Black, the Progress Arab Students’ Block, and AJCAD, visited two of the 30 expellees who were returned on April 30 and May 3: Abdel Jawad Saleh, (see p.6) and Musa Shahshir, Nablus, expelled in 1969. The visitors affirmed the right of all Palestinian exiles and refuaees to return and called for escalation of efforts to implement UN decision 1979 to bring home the 413 expellees.

July 3: Yesh Gvul solidarity with refuseniks. Some 35 activists demonstrated opposite Military Prison 6, where two reservists are currently in prison for refusal to serve in the Occupied Territories.

Yesh Gvul supporters shouted greetings from the hill question "Who is responsible for the killing of the children in the Palestinian territories?" Among the speakers were lawyer Yehoshua Shofman of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, Rabbi Uri Regev from the Center for Jewish Pluralism, and Colonel Moshe Giv’ati who was imprisoned for refusing to serve in the Occupied Territories. Yossi Wolfson and Ran Paz.

This year the central meeting was held in Sha'ar'am, with the participation of the Arab Follow-up Committee and AJCAD, in solidarity with the Palestinian expellees in Marj a-Zuhur. Skirmishes between supporters of the Communist Party and the Islamic Movement led to police intervention, and the meeting was dispersed.[=]

Visiting returned expellees. Peace activists from Hanitzotzl A-Sharara, Women In Black, the Progress Arab Students' Block, and AJCAD, visited two of the 30 expellees who were returned on April 30 and May 3: Abdel Jawad Saleh, (see p.6) and Musa Shahshir, Nablus, expelled in 1969. The visitors affirmed the right of all Palestinian exiles and refuaees to return and called for escalation of efforts to implement UN decision 1979 to bring home the 413 expellees.

May 7: The Nablus-West Jerusalem Dialogue: 15 Israelis attended a reception for the nine residents of Nablus who were among the expellee who returned home this month. They heard each expellee speak about his experience and hopes for the future, including working together towards a peaceful solution to the conflict which separated them from their homes and families for many years.

May 2: On the one-year anniversary of the death of Anton Shomali of Beit Sahur, Edith Eckhart of Grandmothers for Peace, and representatives from the US Methodist Federation for Social Action and the Rapprochement Center for Dialogue in Beit Sahur visited the family's home. At center, Shomali's mother, receiving the visitors.

Compiled by Maxine Kaufmann Nunn from The Other Front (Alternative Information Center, P.O. Box 31417, Jerusalem); The Other Israel (Box 2542, Holon 58125) and personal conversations. All photos by Maxine Kaufman Nunn.[=]

Peace activities from their homes and families for many years.

July 3: Human rights activists protest the closure. Some 50 Israeli activists held a vigil opposite the Augusta Victoria Hospital in East Jerusalem, standing in a symbolic cage which they erected on the spot. Demonstrators spoke out mainly against the closure’s medical implications, including the fact that it denies the Palestinian population access to the modern hospitals located in Jerusalem, sometimes with fatal results.

July 10: Nonviolence workshop. About 20 activists from a variety of peace and justice groups gathered in Jaffa for a work shop on active, nonviolent ways of responding to various injustices.

July 13: B’tselem decrse IDF killing of Palestinian children. About a dozen supporters of the campaign stood in West Jerusalem's Zion Square, holding pictures of the 36 children killed by the IDF in 1993. In this campaign, 'ts'lem has departed from its usual operating goal, the provision of information on human rights violations in the Occupied Territories, to taking action in opposition to these violations. B'tselem is also calling for more stringent open-fire regulations, and enlisting other organizations in their campaign.

July 16: Downtown Indigenous Women's Committee, from Beit Hanina, Jerusalem, demonstrated ‘Marj a-Zuhur. Skirmishes between supporters of the Communist Party and the Islamic Movement led to police intervention, and the meeting was dispersed.[=]

March 30: Land Day. Several mass meetings and processions were held in Arab towns and villages in Israel to commemorate the six martyrs who were killed on March 30,1976, during a general strike that was held in protest of mass land confiscations. This year the central meeting was held in Sha'ar'am, with the participation of the Arab Follow-up Committee and AJCAD, in solidarity with the Palestinian expellees in Marj a-Zuhur. Skirmishes between supporters of the Communist Party and the Islamic Movement led to police intervention, and the meeting was dispersed.[=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

================================================================================

August 29: Israelis and Palestinians march for peace. More than one hundred people, including Palestinian supporters of the peace talks from Nablus, marched peacefully through the streets of the West Jerusalem residential neighborhood of Talpiot, under banners (in Hebrew, Arabic, and English) calling for coexistence between Israel and Palestine, both free and secure. Earlier they were hosted in the homes of Israelis in West Jerusalem and then shared a meal in a West Jerusalem hotel.[6]

60291. ------. "What's New on the Peace Front July 16 - September 8: Part 3", in Challenge, September-October 1993. p. 21. September 3: Women In Black Vigil in Jerusalem changed its appearance to express support for the peace initiative. Women added white to their black outfits and wore ribbons saying "Yes to Peace." In a meeting held on September 7 it was decided to add other slogans more clearly calling for a two state solution and to keep standing every Friday so long as Israeli troops remain in the territories.

September 4: The Peace Bloc called its supporters to participate in a demonstration in support of the Gaza and Jericho First plan in Tel Aviv. The demonstration was organized out of the Labor party offices, by the Labor Party, Meretz and Peace Now, featuring as keynote speakers Minister of Housing Benyamin Ben El'azar, former Military Commander of the West Bank; Minister of Communication Shulamit Aloni and writer Amos Oz. Estimates of participation vary between 40,000 and 150,000 thousand.

September 7-8: Nonviolence conference in Jerusalem featuring Palestinian nonviolence activist Dr. Mubarak Awaad, who was allowed into the country for the first time since he was deported in 1988. See next issue of Challenge for more details.

[Compiled by Yohanan Lorwin from The Other Front, The Other Israel, and other sources.[=]]

November 27: Some 50 people from the Peace Bloc, Yesh Gvul, and Women in Black demonstrate across from the Defense Ministry in Tel Aviv against the shootings in Gaza and call for the disbanding of the undercover units.

December 4: The Peace Bloc and Palestinians demonstrate against settler violence and for prompt IDF pull-out from the Occupied Territories and the immediate removal of the settlers from Hebron. The demonstrators, who were stopped at a roadblock, marched along the Jerusalem-Ramallah highway, carrying placards calling for the dismantling of the undercover IDF units and the re into crowds and, in a separate incident killed a Palestinian motorist. December 6: The Action Committee for the Jahalin Tribe (ACJT) holds a 1 50-person demonstration protesting the threat to evict 250 families from their present location to facilitate the expansion of Ma'aleh Adumim (see p. 20). Speakers included bedouin rights advocates Nuri alUghi; Shlomo Elbaz of the East For Peace; members of the tribe and neighboring communities; and Palestinian leaders.

December 10: Wo men in Black stand again. After a nearly two-month hiatus, 104 Jerusalem Women in Black renewed their vigil with slogans supporting peace and condemning settler violence. The weekly vigil is scheduled to continue until the promised IDF withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho takes place.[=]

60293. ------. "What's New on the Peace Front: October 2 - November 6: Part 1", in Challenge, November-December 1993. p. 32. October 2: The Israeli Committee for Mordechai Vanunu and for a Middle East free of Nuclear, Biological, Chemical Weapons marked the seventh anniversary of the abduction and imprisonment of Israeli nuclear prisoner Mordechai Vanunu with a protest vigil calling for his release and for a Middle East free of weapons of mass destruction. The vigil took place opposite the home of Environment Minister Yossi Sarid in Tel Aviv.

October 4: Rabbis for Human Rights set up a symbolic Succot Shalom (Peace Hut) at the a-Ram checkpoint north of Jerusalem during the Jewish holiday of Succot. They were protesting the continuing closure of the Occupied Territories and reminding the Israeli public that "despite the signing of the Agreement, a significant portion of the residents of the territories continue to be under closure," while at the same time expressing encouragement to the government in its peace efforts.

October 4: Reshet, the Israel Women's Peace Net, held a dialogue meeting between Israeli and Palestinian women, and constructed a Succat Shalom hut on Kibbutz Ramot Menashe.

October 5: JerusalemNablus Dialogue for peace hosted a family picnic on Mt. Gerizim in October 4, a-Ram Nablus, West Bank under the banner "Let us make the peace agreement a blessing for both peoples." Some 300 Israelis and Palestinians socialized and discussed various issues, including the release of political prisoners and responses to the agreement in general.

October 7: Gush Shlom and the Palestinian Liberation Organization's mainstream Fatah party held their first joint demonstration under the slogan "Peace begins with prisoner release" in Nablus. Several thousand demonstrators called upon the Israeli government to immediately release all of the Palestinian political prisoners and close all "security" prison facilities — and jails. A delegation of three ap- October 7, Nablus protesting the prison gate were not permitted to deliver a letter of solidarity to the prisoners despite a High Court decision allowing them to do so.

October 13: Am Mer mis and the organization Care and Learning which she founded in Jenin were chosen as one of this year's four recipients of the Right Livelihood Award, also known as the "Alternative Nobel Prize." Arna was chosen in recognition of her "passionate commitment to the defence and education of the children of Palestine victimized by military occupation." (see page 34)

October 15: Rapid Response Network members paid a solidarity visit to a family whose home in Hizmeh village had recently been demolished, and notified press and others of the incident. They were responding to an appeal from one of their lawyers, to be with the family when they re-erected the tent the police had forced them to take down. Negotiations resulted in the family being allowed to re-erect the tent on neighboring, undisputed property. (see article on p.22 and poem)

October 16: Rejet held a dialogue meeting and a constructed a Succat Shalom hut in Kibbutz Negba with activists from Palestinian women's committees in the Gaza Strip. Reshet also sent messages to the Palestinian delegation in Washington D.C., Palestinian women in the Occupied Territories with whom the group has been working, and women at the PLO head quarters in Tunis expressing joy at the mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO.[=] 60294. ------. "What's New on the Peace Front: October 2 - November 6: Part 2", in Challenge, November-December 1993. p. 33. October 17: Rabbis for Human Rights made solidarity visits to Bedouins protesting outside the Prime Minister's office. Some 40 Negev Bedouins joined the permanent occupant's of the protest tent which has stood opposite the PM's office for 50 days, ever since seven families were forcibly evicted from their homes and their tents dumped at the Ramat Hovav toxic-waste-dump. The 600 Negev Bedouins, most of whom have been relocated since the 50s, are all awaiting a High Court decision on their appeals against eviction.

October 19: Rabbis for Human Rights paid a visit to a Palestinian family whose home in Hizmeh village had been recently demolished.

October 27: Yesh Gul. Adi Laxer, 32, was sentenced to 35 days in the Atlit Military Prison for his refusal to do his reserve duty as a prison guard in Megido Prison. This is Laxer's third imprisonment. He has twice served a 26-day sentence for similar offenses. Yesh Gvul is holding a solidarity visit on the hill overlooking the Megido Prison on November 12.

61

October 29: Remembering Kufr Qassem Massacre. The annual commemoration of the 1956 massacre in which Israeli border police soldiers murdered 49 workers returning home unaware that a curfew had been imposed. The village held a general strike and a procession of thousands marched to the cemetery. Representatives of Hadash, Meretz, Hatnitzot/A-Sharara, and the Students' Progressive Block laid wreaths of flowers.

October 29: Hatnitzot/A-Sharara and Students' Progressive Bloc activists visited Anmeh Rimawi, a Ramallah trade union activists and a mother of three who had been released from Hasharon Prison two days earlier (see p. 12). Rimawi, who was released only 45 days before the end of her sentence, described severe cases of aging women prisoners who were not released. The delegation called for the release all Palestinian political prisoners.

October 30: Ras al-Amud. Gush Shalom, the PLO mainstream Fatah party and the Silwan Residents' Association protested the Jewish neighborhood to be built in the midst of Palestinian Ras al-Amud. Several hundred Israelis and Palestinian Jerusalemites gathered to protect ongoing efforts to preserve the neighborhood. November 6 Baqa Cultural Center in Mad al-Krum (western Galilee) held an Olive Day, a day of olive tree planting on private lands which are in danger of confiscation. The Arab, Jewish, and international participants planted 100 olive trees, enjoyed a meal prepared by students of the Mothers' School, and enjoyed the performances of dancers and singers from Maj al-Krum and Ramallah.

Compiled by Maxine Kaufman Nunn from The Other Front, the Other Israel, and other sources.[=]

60295. -------. "What's What We Said -- Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Says US Aid No Longer Needed", in The Spotlight, February 28, 1994, p. 2. (The Spotlight, 300 Independence Ave. SE, Washington, DC 20003) Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister, has told American supporters of Israel that his country no longer needs its annual American $3 billion handout. "You want me to be the beggar and say we need money for poor people, [but] Israel is a rich country, I'm sorry to tell you," he said to the Women's International Zionist Organization. In addition to the federal largess, Israel receives an estimated $500 million yearly in private donations. Even Israel's most ardent partisans are beginning to recognize the US cannot continue its massive financial support. "I hope that with peace, Israel can go to the United States and volunteer to take less, because even if Israel doesn't volunteer, it's going to happen anyway," said David Clayman of the American Jewish Congress. [=]

60296. -------. "White House Targeted Minorities For Funds", in Seattle Times, January 24, 1997. p. A16. Presidential aides drew up plans to collect campaign monies from Asian-Americans, Hispanics, African-Americans and "others," offering them unprecedented access to the White House in return for money. Documents ordered released by former Clinton aide Harold Ickes include plans for fundraising and influence peddling to six key electoral groups upon which the re-election campaign would be based: (1) African-Americans; (2) Asian Pacific Americans; (3) disabled Americans; (4) Jewish-Americans [the pro-Israeli lobby]; (5) Latinos [Hispanics]; and (6) "others". Illegal donations by Asians have promised $1.5 million in refunds by the Democratic National Committee.

Separately, The Justice Department and congressional committees report investigations of foreign contributions. The White House has admitted again that it provided inaccurate or incomplete information in three more instances about its knowledge of illegal fundraising: Mike McCurry terms the latest disinforming statements as "innocent results of internal miscommunication". The problem involves the knowledge that Clinton had of his aides arranging money for Webster Hubbell from Lippo Group after he resigned from the Justice Department in disgrace. In 12/1996 the White House stated that no one had any knowledge of the Hubbell deal; in fact, top aide Bruce Lindsey was aware of the arrangement.

Secondly, separately, statements that meetings between John Huang and Lippo executive James Riady, previously described as mere social encounters, now appear to have involved specific discussions of the trade policy input on Indonesia and China that Lippo was paying for.

Thirdly, separately, the statement made by VP Al Gore during the re-election campaign that he had no knowledge that the gathering at a Buddhist temple was actually a fundraiser now is admitted to be quite wrong. In fact, Gore lied during the re-election campaign, admitting that he had been fully informed, in writing, by his staff that the gathering was actually a fundraiser for which large contributions had been paid in advance.

Fourthly, separately, the Export-Import Bank is defending its support for Clinton appointed director Maria Haley. Haley gave an unusual $16.5 million loan to a big Democratic donor (Pauline Kanchanik) to open a Blockbuster Video franchise in Bangkok, Thailand.

60297. -------. "Who's Who In This Issue", in Women In Black Newsletter, Spring 1993. We're sorry that by press time we did not have information to share about Stasa Zajovic (Belgrade, Yugoslavia) and Annemie Butterweck (Cologne, Germany). Tamar Rappaport is a senior lecturer in the Education Department of Hebrew University. She was recently appointed coordinator of the Gender Studies Unit. For several years she has been studying gender in Israel.

Adrienne Rich is a much published Jewish-American poet and essayist, who has been active on behalf of peace in the Middle East, as well as feminist and lesbian rights.

Sarit Hellman is a lecturer in sociology at the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and the Hebrew University. She is currently completing her doctorate on the subject of conscientious objection to army service in the Lebanon War.

Jesse Montell, a Jerusalem Women in Black, works in Shatil (technical assistance to social change organizations) and at the Hot Line for the Defense of the Individual for human rights in the occupied territories.

Erela Shadmi is a lecturer in law enforcement and women's studies at Beit Berl College and the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. She is a former lieutenant-colonel in the Israeli Police Force, and now a Woman in Black in Jerusalem. [=]

60298. -------. "Woman in Haifa, Israel [sues a TV weatherman for $1000 for predicting a sunny day; it rained while she wore a lightg dress, and she caught cold]", in Seattle Times, March 23, 1996. p. A2. [TXT]

60299. -------. "Women Demonstrate for Women Political Prisoners", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 40. On 4/28/92, a group of 70 Palestinian and Israeli women gathered outside Hasharon Women's Prison north of Tel Aviv to commemorate the Day of the Prisoner (4/17/92). Participants demanded an improvement of prison conditions as well as the immediate release of three political prisoners who are suffering from illnesses. Some demonstrators carried posters with a picture of Rabha Shtay - a 33-year prisoner from Jerusalem who is sick with cancer of the liver and who was recently sentenced to 8 years and 6 months imprisonment. International organizations have intervened to demand Shtay's release. Other women carried posters with the picture of Hsuniya Abd al-Qader, 41, from Balata Refugee Camp who was taken on a stretcher to prison on 4/9/92. She suffers from acute spinal problems and high blood pressure. She has recently been declared an administrative detainee (held without trial). This is the third time Hsuniya has been placed under an administrative detention. [=]

60300. -------. "Women and Peace Call on Artists to Boycott Israel Festival", in Challenge, May-June, 1991. p. 26. The following appeal was sent by Women and Peace to artists invited to participate in the
Women in Black Will Not be Intimidated: Part 1

60301. "Women in Black Will Not be Intimidated: Part 1", in Challenge, July, 1990. p. 10. The Women in Black vigil began in Jerusalem immediately after the outbreak of the intifada. A wide range of women, some of whom never participated in political activities before, stood every Friday noon in France Square, holding hand-shaped signs saying No to Occupation, expressing their protest in silence. Soon Women in Black spread to 32 locations throughout the country and have become the most persistent protest against occupation, arousing strong feelings among both supporters and rivals.

The most consistent and almost sole arena for activity of right-wingers from Moledet and Tehiya and Kahane disciples, is to hold counter-demonstrations and harass participants in Women in Black vigils. It seems that Women in Black have become the "raison d'être" of a handful of frustrated and violent fanatics, who appear regularly at the vigils, waving Israeli flags, which serve a dual purpose; they proclaim the super-patriotism of the bearers and also serve as clubs with which to beat the women standing in peaceful and silent vigils.

In contrast to the women, these arch-racists dress in white and try to provoke the black-garbed women with verbal obscenities and sexual jibes. Violence against Women in Black intensified after the murder of 7 Palestinian workers in Rishon LeZion by Ami Popper, probably a Kahane groupie. Previously, there had been attempts by motorists to 'accidentally' run over the women standing on the pavement. But on the Friday after the murder, Women in Black in Jerusalem and Beersheba lodged formal complaints to the police that guns were drawn and pointed at them from passing busses.

In Jerusalem, where both the women's vigil and the rightist counter-demonstration are the largest and most regular, there were formerly only a handful of right-wingers among scores of women. But recently their numbers have grown and they have started taking up the women's place in the square. This has led to what has become known as "the battle for the square".

There has also been a marked increase in the support and encouragement expressed by passersby for the rightists, as well as sexist epithets hurled at the women - the mildest of them are such sick comments as "Black widows", "May you wear black every day of your life" and so on. Drivers even stop their cars to shake the hands of the rightists.

In Haifa, violence against Women in Black reached such a point that they were forced to change the place of their vigil. However in their new location they are still subjected to threats and physical attacks by rightists, but they do not react to complaints from the women, perhaps because they empathize with the aggressors and hope to erase this form of protest from the Israeli scene once and for all.

The interesting phenomenon in this recent development is the women's dodged persistence and unwavering determination. They will not surrender their vigil, which is the only form by which they can express their disgust at the oppression in the Occupied Territories and at the government's refusal to negotiate with the PLO. Rightist overt and covert violence constitutes a real problem for the non-violent and silent vigil of Women in Black. Women may have to find new ways to cope with the mounting violence while continuing to attract tens of new women who may join the vigil after the rise of a right-wing government.[=] 60302. "Women's Peace Conference Demands End to Occupation: Part 1", in Challenge, January-March, 1991. p. 36. Some 600 Israeli, Palestinian and foreign women participated in a weekend for peace in Jerusalem on December 28-29. The conference, entitled "Women Strive For Peace In A Time of Crisis," was organized by the Women and Peace Coalition and the Women's Peace Net in Israel, as well as Palestinian women's organizations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Sponsored by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, it drew women from Scandinavia, Italy and the United States. The first day of the conference witnessed a larger than usual turnout for the traditional Friday vigil of Women in Black in Jerusalem. Later the women held an all-night vigil opposite the house of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, handing him an appeal. Appeals were also sent by foreign women to their consulates and to the US embassy. The next day, the women held discussions and workshops at the Jerusalem Cinematheque. The conference was held against the backdrop of the Gulf crisis on the strive, and the nature of the mounting violence while continuing to attract tens of new women who may join the vigil after the rise of a right-wing government.

Among the issues addressed were how to carry on a long-lasting strive for peace, the impact of the Gulf crisis on the peace process and the role of women in reviving one. The Supreme Court of Justice rejected an appeal from the women against the police, which was filed after the latter refused to rant a license for a peace march along the walls of the old city of Jerusalem.

The Cinematheque was also pressured to refuse to rent its premises to the women. The women discussed the reasons for the absence of an active peace movement in Israel and the role of women in reviving one. Among the issues addressed were how to carry on a long-lasting strive for peace, the impact of the Gulf crisis on the strive, and the nature of the mounting violence while continuing to attract tens of new women who may join the vigil after the rise of a right-wing government.
check the deterioration in the political situation and secure the future and welfare of the two peoples. We pledge to continue to act for peace and the above mentioned goals, and call upon all women in Israel to join our struggle. [=] 60303. -------. "Women in Brief: Israel [BTselem starts campaign to reduce the number of Palestinian children being killed by Israeli troops; since 1987, some 232 Palestinians younger that 17 have been killed, with 38 in the last six months]", in Peoples Weekly World (New York), July 31, 1993. p. 14. [TXT]

60304. -------. "Young Palestinian Killed Near Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), October 14, 1994. p. 3. Ghazi Haymouni, 23, from Hebron was shot and killed 10/7/1994 by the Israeli army near the Ibrahimi Mosque.

Israeli soldiers shot Haymouni after he attempted to stab an Israeli border policeman in front of the mosque.

The Israeli forces transferred his body directly to Abu Kbir Center for autopsy and then imposed a curfew on the city, following the outbreak of violent confrontations between Palestinian youths and Israeli soldiers. Soldiers used tear gas and live ammunition to clear the demonstrators. [=] 60305. -------. "Youth Shot Dead At Checkpoint", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), September 23, 1994. p. 3. 1ahed Dali from Biddu village near Jerusalem was shot and killed 9/20/1994, by Israeli soldiers at the Dahiet Al-Barid checkpoint north of Jerusalem.

According to the Israeli military spokesman, Dali, 22, and another Palestinian got out of a car before the checkpoint to cross into Jerusalem in order to avoid having their identity card checked.

When the two reached the other side, they hailed a taxi. The soldiers ordered them to stop. They climbed into the taxi, which pulled out into traffic. The soldiers then fired at the taxi. The car stopped and Dali jumped out and ran. At that point, the soldiers shot him in the back.

The spokesman added that the man who crossed with Dali escaped in the taxi. The army has launched a dragnet operation to apprehend him.

Al-Quds Press Agency said Dali was hit by dumdom bullets. This caused internal hemorrhaging that led to his death before the medical team at Ramallah Hospital could rescue him.

According to eyewitness, the soldiers held the wounded Dali for half an hour, allowing him to bleed excessively before they decided to let an ambulance take him to a hospital.

Another young Palestinian was shot under similar circumstances only a few months ago for the same reason. [=] 60306. -------. "[Ahlam Samhan]", in Challenge, January-February 1993. p. 30. Ahlam did not intend to tell me how her nose was broken. If I hadn't asked, she wouldn't have provided the description of the horrifying experience which severely damaged her face. In 1981, a short time after her release from prison, Ahlam was called in for an interrogation at the military headquarters in Nablus. Her interrogators wanted to know whom she had been meeting and what kinds of 'contacts' she had.

Ahlam was 18 at the time but was already experienced, and she reserved the right to remain silent. The interrogators then turned to beating and torture. They Banged her head and face against the concrete wall again and again. Ahlam felt the bone of her nose being smashed, and yet she remained silent. She recalls that in those moments she struggled to concentrate, to think of her friends and of her commitments as a revolutionary. The same night she was released without any charges being filed. Ahlam went to Makassad Hospital, where she discovered that the nose bone had been completely crushed. In an operation the surgeons tried to reconstruct the shape of her nose, using a piece of plastic to replace the original bone.

Twelve years after this operation, Ahlam still suffers from severe pains whenever the weather changes, and she takes large doses of pain killers daily. She also suffers from recurring infections induced by the presence of the plastic bone'. Ahlam was recently examined by a Hadassah specialist in plastic surgery. He concluded that the bone had been smashed to such an extent that further surgery would be impossible. [=]

60307. -------. "[Lebanon Not Important News] [CNN news coverage through the day subordinated the Israeli attack on Lebanon, initially with the news readers leering at women athletes wearing bikinis for the Atlanta Olympics, and later to the sentencing of the Menendez Brothers]", in CNN Prime News, April 17, 1996.

60308. -------. "[PM Peres Honoring In France]", in World Today (CNN), 5/1, 1996. In an effort to restore good relations with Israel, PM Peres was honored with the renaming of a plaza at the UNESCO headquarters in Paris by the government of France. Israel had been angered by the French perception that it could have a role in peace talks ending the Israeli attacks on Lebanon. [TXT]

60309. -------. Editorial: "Reason for Investigation", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), September 23, 1994. p. 4. Recently, the killing of innocent, young Palestinians by Israeli soldiers at the roadblocks and checkpoints on the outskirts of Jerusalem and in the West Bank has increased.

During the last week alone, two Palestinian citizens were killed under similar circumstances while others were wounded. The Israeli's official excuse in such cases has always been that the victims had tried to pass the checkpoints without stopping, and when they try to "escape", the soldiers were compelled to shoot them.

This pretext is not satisfactory or convincing. The soldiers shot to kill. Their lives were not in danger.

Witnesses say that the Israeli soldiers could have easily apprehended those young men if they had wanted. Rather, they took aim with their lethal weapons and shot them in the back.

It is amazing that no investigations have been conducted into these cases, suggesting that the killing of an unarmed, Palestinian civilian is not an unusual act--not in need of any special attention.

This is a gross and dangerous act. Unfortunately, even the human rights organizations located in the occupied territories are no longer concerned with these killings and have become less enthusiastic about following up on the unceasing atrocities committed against the Palestinian people.

We call on the human rights institutions to be more concerned with these incidents and investigate them so that these dangerous crimes executed against innocent people will end once and for all.

It is important to realize that the increase in killings by Israeli soldiers coincides with the efforts being exerted by the Palestinian National Authority to re-activate the educational, economic and social sectors in society.

Will the Israelis' response to these endeavors be to pull the trigger more often and kill even more innocent people?

The roadblocks set up by the Israeli government were not there to induce the killing of Palestinian citizens. Yet it has not been only during the last week, but since the siege was imposed in 3/1993, that dozens of unarmed and innocent Palestinians have been shot dead at the roadblocks. The question is why?

Even more significant is how can these killings be allowed to continue without investigations being conducted or other means used to put a halt to them.

The peace that we are all searching for at this stage cannot be found through the negotiations alone. And it cannot be found through the continuous talks about economic projects that until now have no concrete foundation. Peace is not built through quiet statements in the media. It will only be actualized when the series of killings stop and where the killing of one Palestinian becomes a serious reason to open an immediate investigation.

Therefore, we call on the Israeli officials and the human rights associations to become truly concerned with an issue vital to both life and peace. [-]

60310. --------. Editorial: “Shuttle Chicanery: Part 1”, in Challenge, July-August 1993. p. 3. The visit to this area of US Secretary of State Warren Christopher aims to salvage the peace talks, after they began with such fanfare in Madrid and have now reached a stalemate after the eleventh round in Washington. The US has allocated a period of six months to reach a breakthrough that would enable the two sides to sign a common declaration of principles. Are we truly just half a year away from the the successful resolution of this conflict, a conflict that has developed into one of the most complex and intractable of our century?

Development on the ground indicates that we are no closer now to a solution than we were two years ago. Tensions on the Israeli-Lebanese border have been inflamed again. In July the Israeli human rights group B’tselem published a report on the ominous escalation of the killing of Palestinian children by the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF). Within days of its publication, another child, ten-year-old Azat Matar, was killed in the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem is still cut off from the Occupied Territories, causing unimaginable suffering to the population.

The Palestinian person in the street has lost confidence in both the peace process and US intentions, and the Palestinian delegation is quickly losing credibility. The head of the delegation, Dr. Haidar Abdel Shafi, is far from optimistic about the talks. He is calling on Palestinians instead to shift their efforts into making democratic reforms in the PLO’s decision-making processes and towards inter-Palestinian negotiations for developing a unified policy. [-]

60311. --------. In Time of War: Children Testify, Beirut: 1970. A collection of drawings and paintings by Palestinian children in the refugee camps that express the feelings of the Palestinian people. The editor worked with the children in the camps in a program that aimed at developing their artistic talents and allowed them to express their feelings through paintings and drawings. The book presents the drawings with comments and statements by the Palestinian children. Their comments express their views on war, peace, life in the camps, their view of Palestine their country and the struggle for its liberation. The book is one of the most moving works on the problem of Palestine and the suffering of its people. It presents the feelings and frustrations of the young Palestinian generation in exile and refugee camps.

60312. --------. Interview: “PNA Comptroller Saleh Rafat: Palestinians Will Vote for Committed, Responsible People”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995, p. 5. [Saleh Rafat, the PNA Comptroller, returned recently to his homeland after a long, Israeli-imposed exile. He is one of the leaders of FIDA, the Palestinian Democratic Union and one of the founders of the modern Palestinian National Movement. The interview with Rafat was conducted by Fadel Nasser and Abdul Karim Hasna from the Arabic daily An-Nahar.] Q: What is your position now in the Palestinian National Authority? A: As a politician and a member of the PLO leadership I have a political rather than executive position. I am a member of a political party which has its own program regarding the current peace negotiations. The party has a point of view regarding the implementation of the major economic and social issues in the country. And it has its own position regarding the building of the Palestinian state based on democracy and pluralism. It is fighting for social justice in Palestinian Society, and gives priority to building the infrastructure in education, health, electricity and water. Q: What is your opinion on the Palestinian legislative elections? A: The elections constitute the most positive step achieved through the peace process that started in Madrid. In spite of the existence of so many clauses in the peace accords that cannot be considered just for the Palestinian people, I call on Palestinians to invest in the positive aspects of the Oslo and Cairo Accords. These elections will certainly result in electing a significant and talented portion of Palestinian society to represent the people. The national goals will be achieved through these representatives until all the Palestinian occupied territories are freed, paving the way for the establishment of the Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital. I understand very well the role of the Palestinian legislative council in supporting the executive authority on the issue of institution building. We are committed to building a modern and democratic state where women can play a meaningful role, together with men, in leading the people. It is essential that the council legislate the nature of the political system because it will create the Palestinian constitution in the coming phase. The people then should participate in the elections, and should give their votes to Palestinian national figures who have a clear political vision and commitment to building the state. All Palestinian movements and parties should also participate in the elections to fulfill their obligations and build the country together.

Q: Will you stand as a candidate for these elections? A: I am still examining the possibility of running in the elections through holding contacts with the various political leanings in the Palestinian Democratic Union. Q: What do you have to say to Israel's demand that some clauses of the Palestinian Covenant be rescinded? A: Well, among other things, Israel has not even implemented the Cairo Agreement yet. It has not respected a single deadline in implementing the Oslo and Taba Accords. It violated the accords and is still insisting on keeping Palestinian political prisoners locked up. I would say clearly that this is directly related to Israel’s commitment to withdraw from the Palestinian populated areas, refugee camps, villages, towns and cities occupied since 1967, including East Jerusalem. It is also related to the solution of the refugee issue, allowing them to return to their homeland. Israel is still hampering the work of the Refugees Committee. Only after satisfactory solutions to these issues, and the settlements issues, have been found will we begin to consider the possibility of amending the Palestinian Covenant. Q: Will the elected legislative council replace the Palestine National Council? A: According to the Elections Law, the elected legislative council will be an integral part of the Palestine National Council, therefore it will not replace it. The Palestine National Council will remain the representative body of the Palestinian people at home and abroad. The PLO will remain the only legal benchmark for the Palestinian people. Q: How do you see the future of the peace process following the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin? Will it be easier or more difficult to deal with Shimon Peres? A: We are not talking about persons. We signed this agreement with the Israeli government, and as I said, some of the clauses contradict the interests of the Palestinian people. We are dealing with a government, regardless of who’s in charge. We call on the Israeli government to be genuinely committed to building a modern and democratic state where women can play a meaningful role, together with men, in leading the people. It is essential that the council legislate the nature of the political system because it will create the Palestinian constitution in the coming phase. The people then should participate in the elections, and should give their votes to Palestinian national figures who have a clear political vision and commitment to building the state. All Palestinian movements and parties should also participate in the elections to fulfill their obligations and build the country together.

If the government is honest, then let them hurry up and release the prisoners and allow the refugees to return to their homeland in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Refugees Committee has been stalled for months now discussing and trying to reach a solution simply on the technical problem of how a refugee or displaced should be defined. Q: Will the PNA be able to suspend the elections until these demands are met? A: Our position is very clear. We call for the postponement of the elections until after the withdrawal of the Israeli army from Hebron is achieved and the prisoners are released. Discussions regarding the postponement of the elections until next April is still being held while we stress the importance of including major amendments in the electoral system. We are suggesting the inclusion of the quota system list with the lists of all the electoral departments. We suggested that 41 representatives be elected based upon the proportional representation system and 41 be elected for one constituency alone all over the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Jerusalem. The system as it is now tends to give importance only to local issues. An elected member from Nablus for example is only concerned with issues in Nablus alone. But a member elected by the people from all over the territories would focus his or her efforts on national rather than local issues such as health, education and other main issues. We feel the system must be amended. We presented our suggestions to the Executive Committee.
during the last meeting in Cairo. They were approved in principal but have yet to be implemented. Q: What will be the role of the Palestinian opposition movements and will they assume the leading positions in the PNA? Some Palestinians affiliated to the opposition have returned, others haven't. It's not insignificant that many of those who returned assumed senior positions in the PNA. As for members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, they have assumed high positions, such as heads of departments in many Palestinian ministries. We call for the return of all the rest of our brothers to join in the Palestinian Authority. Israel must stop barring the return of Palestinians to their homeland, whatever their political affiliation. [–]

60313.-------. Interview: "Prisoner Rights Activist Attacked", in News from Within, November 1995. p. 20. [On 10/17/1995 Suha Barghuti, wife of Ahmad Qatamesh, Israel's longest held administrative detainee, was violently attacked by two Israeli soldiers while leaving a demonstration for political prisoners at the Red Cross Center in Ramallah. NFW interviewed Ms. Barghuti following her hospitalization.] Q: What happened on 10/17/1995? A: In the morning I did a radio interview where I asked the Palestinian people to peacefully join the demonstration to call for the release of all prisoners and administrative detainees. Then I left work to attend the demonstration at around 11:45 a.m. It was a peaceful demonstration with no interference from the soldiers; we were just marching with leaflets to the Red Cross Center. I joined the demonstration as a representative of the Palestinian Committee for Administrative Detainees. I left early and was walking towards my car when I spotted two soldiers. I heard a loud noise behind me so I turned around and in less than a second my whole head was totally on fire and my hair in flames. I realized I'd been hit by some sort of bomb or grenade. I didn't lose consciousness and was trying to put out the flames, but as I attempted to rub them out with my hands they just grew. Then another grenade was thrown directly at my head, but missed because I was crouched against a car and low to the ground in an attempt to put out the flames. Q: What sort of injuries did you sustain? A: My right thumb was completely split open from a liquid which leaked from the grenade. All of my hair on the right side was burned off; I suffered first degree burns on my face, and second and third degree burns on my chest that will require further surgery. I have a hole in my right eardrum which may also need surgery. I feel nauseous constantly, and hear a loud ringing noise because my eardrum is damaged. The doctors explained to me that they have never seen injuries from this type of grenade on a person before and that they think the bomb that hit me is usually used in demonstrations as a sound bomb to scare the protesters. Q: Do you believe the soldiers deliberately singled you out and attacked you? A: Yes, I believe I was targeted for the following reasons: I was alone, almost 12 meters from the demonstration; I was not armed, but carrying a handbag on my way back to work; also, a second grenade was thrown directly at me following the first one. The first night I was hospitalized 25 Israeli soldiers came to my home and questioned my mother. Ms. Barghuti was attacked two days after her husband was issued his fifth consecutive detention order. Mr. Qatamesh has been imprisoned for over three years without charge or trial and is clearly being incarcerated for his political beliefs and outspoken opposition to the Oslo Accords. According to the recently signed Oslo II Agreement, over 1200 Palestinian political prisoners, including all women prisoners, were to be released immediately following the signing ceremony in Washington on 9/28/1995. However, Israeli delayed and placed conditions on the prisoner release in an attempt to gain concessions from the PA. By mid-10/1995, 950 male prisoners were freed after they were forced to sign a document illegally imposed upon them by the Israeli government supporting the peace process. The women prisoners remain incarcerated as a result of the Israeli government's arbitrary refusal to release any women accused of having "Jewish blood on their hands." In response, the women collectively and courageously refused to be released until all women are freed. [–]

60314.-------. Interview: "Tribal Affairs Adviser Geith: Factionalism Undermines Traditional Values", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 10, 1995. p. 6. Geith Abu Geith is President Yasser Arafat's advisor on tribal affairs. In the following interview with Al-Quds, he explains the challenges inherent in the post he holds. Q: What is the office of the Tribal Affairs Administration? A: The office is an apparatus of the Palestinian National Authority, the office given advice on the PA, keeping them abreast of events in society, the problems people face, the demands, rights, duties and needs of the people. The operation of the office aims to satisfy the political, economic, humanitarian, and social needs of the Palestinian people. It deals with all tribes inside and outside Palestine. The concept of the tribe reflects the character of our people, its behavior, social norms and inherited traditions. In the administration of tribal affairs we uphold these traditional values and we are very proud of them. We preserve our cultural heritage whether it be in customs or theory. Q: What are your duties as an advisor for the Administration of Tribal Affairs? A: Basically our aim is to support national unity. We created a new department in the presidential office which acts as a mediator of office with the help of a dispute resolution mechanism. Q: What are the main problems you deal with? A: There is no doubt that the occupation has left behind unwelcome societal characteristics which it will be difficult to eradicate. Therefore we are facing lots of cases like assaults on women, and theft of public and private property. In general, the main problems in the Gaza Strip concern disputes over land and house ownership. Other problems are murders, which we try to treat with the Mediation Office of the Red Cross Center. I try to take advantage of the existence of the National Authority. But these problems are less common in the West Bank. Q: Are there any unresolved problems you face? A: No, but there are cases that are not easy to settle. We are doing our best to overcome the difficulties. Q: How do other tribal leaders feel about contacting your through this office? A: Two months ago, I met with a number of people representing 70 tribes - comprising around 30000 Gaza Strip residents - and discussed with them many major issues in a series of 30 meetings. It is important to mention that our people are very happy to deal with us, and to consolidate a positive relationship with us. This in turn forms a stepping-stone to our National Authority presided over by Yasser Arafat. I may add that there are parties who are against our people, who have personal or factional interest. They want to polarize our people. We understand this clearly and will deal with it appropriately. Q: What will be the role of the mukhtars? A: The mukhtars have their own responsibilities while being, at the same time, under the wing of the PNA. The mukhtars' issue in the Gaza Strip is being meticulously studied to obtain good results suitable for serving our people. Q: How do you define the role of women in Palestinian society? A: Women are considered the most honorable human beings on earth. They are mothers, daughters, sisters, and wives. Care for women in our society is like the care of a son to his mother, the brother to his sister, and a father to his daughter. We have always striven for women's rights. They are the ones who cared for the orphans, who fought side by side with the men and endured all the consequences of their actions such as getting arrested and imprisoned, injured or killed. During the party organized on the occasion of President Yasser Arafat's birthday, Palestinian women performed a distinct and clear role in horse-racing. Aida Abu Aida, a 12- year-old girl, was the winner of the race. She deserved the cup offered to her from the president. Similarly, a young Palestinian girl scored 96% in the tawjih examinations, and was offered a scholarship from the president to study medicine. Q: How would you address the Palestinian people at home and abroad? A: We are now living in a critical period. We must deal with, and overcome all obstacles, and we must be aware of conspiracies against the unity of our people. We will build our state, and raise the Palestinian flag on the walls of Jerusalem. Peace will be achieved only if our rights as Palestinian people are met. [–]

$80000 playground construction site funded by his foundation."]}, in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, September 17, 1994. p. 24.[TXT]

60317. -------. Photograph: "Segregated Beach at Dead Sea", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, October 22, 1994. p. 5. The government at a cost of NIS 700000, established a beach with segregated areas for men and women. Tourism Minister Uzi Baram inaugurated the beach.[TXT]

60318. -------. Photograph: ["Gertruda van Lieer, was 1 of 35 Dutch citizens granted honorary Israeli citizenship for saving more than 400 Jewish children during WWII in her center for illegitimate children of German soldiers and Dutch women."]], in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, December 3, 1994. p. 24.

60320. -------. Table: "JMCC Election Survey", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 19, 1996. p. 3. Methodology: A random sample of 1199 people over the age of 18 were interviewed throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip on 1/11-12/1996. The interviews were conducted in randomly selected homes, and the subjects inside each home were also selected randomly according to Kish tables. The interviews were conducted in 74 sampling points chosen randomly according to population. Locale of respondents: West Bank, East Jerusalem 64.7%. Residence: Town 40%, village 37.5%, refugee camp 22.5%. Social status: Single 29.4%, married 65.2%, divorced 1.2%, widower 3.1%, no opinion 1.2%. Religion: Muslim 93.7%, Christian 6%, other/no opinion 0.6%. Gender: Females 54.5%, male 45.5%. Average age of respondents:33. Do you believe that the presence of the Palestinian Council would bring changes to the better, to the worse, or will it make no difference?: Total: Changes to the better, 68.8%; Changes to the worse, 4.7%; Will make no difference, 17.3%; no opinion, 9.2%. West Bank: Changes to the better, 67.5%; Changes to the worse, 6.1%; Will make no difference, 16.1%; no opinion, 10.3%. Gaza Strip: Changes to the better, 71.2%; Changes to the worse, 2.1%; Will make no difference, 19.6%; no opinion, 7.1%. Men: Changes to the better, 66.2%; Changes to the worse, 5%; Will make no difference, 21.7%; no opinion, 7.1%. Women: Changes to the better, 71%; Changes to the worse, 4.5%; Will make no difference, 13.6%; no opinion, 10.9%. Fateh: Changes to the better, 84.3%; Changes to the worse, 1.5%; Will make no difference, 7.7%; no opinion, 6.5%. Hamas: Changes to the better, 48%; Changes to the worse, 10.8%; Will make no difference, 29.7%; no opinion, 11.5%.

To what extent would you say that you are comfortable with the PNA arrangements and organization of the peace process?: Total: Election arrangements are well organized, 43.6%; Election arrangements are somewhat organized, 36.3%; Election arrangements are badly managed, 7.8%; No opinion, 12.3%. West Bank: Election arrangements are well organized, 41.5%; Election arrangements are somewhat organized, 36.2%; Election arrangements are badly managed, 8%; No opinion, 14.3%. Gaza Strip: Election arrangements are well organized, 47.5%; Election arrangements are somewhat organized, 36.4%; Election arrangements are badly managed, 7.6%; No opinion, 8.5%. Men: Election arrangements are well organized, 44%; Election arrangements are somewhat organized, 39.6%; Election arrangements are badly managed, 9.4%; No opinion, 7%. Women: Election arrangements are well organized, 43.2%; Election arrangements are somewhat organized, 33.5%; Election arrangements are badly managed, 6.6%; No opinion, 17.7%. Which Palestinian political or religious faction do you trust most?: Total: Fateh, 38.9%; Hamas, 12.3%; PFLP, 2.3%; Islamic Jihad, 1.4%; PPP, 1.8%; Fida, 0.9%; DFLP, 0.6%; Other Islamic parties, 1.9%; Don't trust anyone, 17.1%; Others, 1.5%; No opinion, 21.9%. West Bank: Fateh, 36.6%; Hamas, 10.6%; PFLP, 1.4%; Islamic Jihad, 0.5%; PPP, 2.6%; Fida, 1.2%; DFLP, 0.8%; Other Islamic parties, 1.3%; Don't trust anyone, 20.2%; Others, 1.8%; No opinion, 23.8%. Gaza Strip: Fateh, 43%; Hamas, 15.6%; PFLP, 3.8%; Islamic Jihad, 2.8%; PPP, 0.5%; Fida, 0.5%; DF LP, 0.2%; Other Islamic parties, 3.1%; Don't trust anyone, 11.3%; Others, 0.5%; No opinion, 18.9%. Men: Fateh, 41.5%; Hamas, 10.8%; PFLP, 2.2%; Islamic Jihad, 1.7%; PPP, 3.1%; Fida, 0.9%; DF LP, 0.4%. Other Islamic parties, 1.3%; Don't trust anyone, 18.7%; Others, 1.6%; No opinion, 18.2%. Women: Fateh, 36.7%; Hamas, 13.6%; PFLP, 2.3%; Islamic Jihad, 1.2%; PPP, 0.8%; Fida, 0.9%; DF LP, 0.8%; Other Islamic parties, 2.5%; Don't trust anyone, 15.6%; Others, 1.4%; No opinion, 29%. Have you decided whom you are going to vote for in your constituency?: Total: Yes, 64.1%; No, 30.6%; No opinion, 5.3%. West Bank: Yes; 63.1%; No, 30.3%; No opinion, 6.6%. Gaza Strip: Yes; 66%; No, 31.2%; No opinion, 2.8%. Men: Yes; 72.1%; No, 24.6%; No opinion, 3.3%. Women: Yes; 57.1%; No, 36%; No opinion, 6.9%. Fateh: Yes; 77.9%; No, 19.7%; No opinion, 2.4%. Hamas: Yes; 58.1%; No, 37.8%; No opinion, 4.1%. Would you vote for someone who is from outside the party/faction you trust most?: Total: Yes; 59.2%; No, 22.9%; No opinion, 17.9%. West Bank: Yes; 53.1%; No, 24.4%; No opinion, 22.5%. Gaza Strip: Yes; 70.4%; No, 20.1%; No opinion, 9.5%. Men: Yes; 64.4%; No, 21.5%; No opinion, 14.1%. Women: Yes; 54.9%; No, 24.1%; No opinion, 21%. Fateh: Yes; 63.9%; No, 29.6%; No opinion, 6.5%. Hamas: Yes; 62.8%; No, 22.3%; No opinion, 14.9%. [=] perception that Israel is a natural ally of the United States. To American eyes, Israel, a country founded by Europeans, is the West's cultural bastion in the Arab world. From a distance, Israel looks like a democracy: its citizens vote in free elections. And Israel is perceived as a vital player in the late twentieth century's Great Game between the American and Soviet empires. The Palestinians—their national aspirations, their dispute with Israel over national soil—have rarely entered the U.S.-Israeli equation. The Carter administration, after declaring Jewish settlements in the West Bank illegal, but did nothing about it; and every year the Department of State issues a pro forma condemnation of Israeli human rights practices in the territories occupied since 1967. Sometimes, though, an issue arises to throw the rights of Palestinians into sharp relief and at the same time impact on the "special relationship" between the United States and Israel. In 1986 the State Department intervened after Israeli authorities balked at granting permanent residency status to Muhammad Akhras, a Palestinian-American seeking to remain in his native village. In 1987 State formally protested what it called Israel's "discriminatory treatment" of American tourists in Israel and the Occupied Territories. When American citizens are involved, the American media take notice. The case of Muhammad Akhras won space in major newspapers here, and when Palestinian-American Naval Hamad appeared at an ADC press conference to describe how she and her four children were detained for 12 hours at Ben Gurion International Airport and then put aboard a flight out of the country, NBC Nightly News and ABC World News Tonight covered the story. U.S. News "Quotes of the Week" ran these words of Hamad's: "They said they don't want Palestinians here; we said, 'We're American citizens,' and they said, 'Bull*.' " Israeli immigration authorities defend the "discriminatory treatment" of Palestinian-Americans and Black Americans on two counts. The authorities say they must take steps to ensure that visitors do not overstay their visas: they must see to it that visitors do not, in the words of one Israeli spokesman, "abuse the rules of hospitality." "[U.S. Lodges New Complaint Against Israeli Treatment of Tourists", Washington Post, 7/17/1987]. The authorities also say that some Palestinian-Americans have been inconvenienced by long searches or interrogations, such inconveniences are dictated by security concerns. No one can fault a sovereign nation for guarding against acts of sabotage, but in the case of Israel, security and demography are closely related. Following the close of the first Arab-Israeli War, a war which pushed some 750,000 Palestinian refugees out of the newly created State of Israel, 150,000 Palestinians remained: a distinct Arab minority in a Jewish state. But by the eve of the June 1967 War, fertility had raised the number of Israeli Arabs to more than half a million, and in six days in 1967 Israel placed one million more Palestinians under military rule. "The dowry is so gorgeous, but the bride is so homely," then Prime Minister Levi Eshkol is reported to have said when Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip was still new. Twenty years later, Israel's Palestinian bride looks—from a Zionist point of view—homelier than ever. According to Israeli demographers, by the year 2000 the Palestinian population of Mandatory Palestine (Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip) will equal the Jewish population, creating a de facto binational state.

The demographic projections have elicited a variety of responses in Israeli society. In 1987 Israeli Reserve General Rehavam Ze'evi, taking a page from extremist Meir Kahane, went on record with the so-called "transfer solution," suggesting that the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip uproot and resettle in Jordan. Meanwhile, the 1987 annual conference of Zahavi ("Blessed is he," an Israeli association dedicated to fostering large Jewish families, called for Jewish population growth as a shield against the Palestinian demographic time bomb. [Peterz Kidron, "The Demographic Crisis" Middle East International, No. 304, 7/11/1987] And a time bomb it is, threatening to explode the Jewish national principle upon which Israel was founded. That national principle was formalized in 1950, when the Israeli Knesset passed the Law of Return, granting Jews around the world the right to immigrate to Israel. The Law of Return states that a Jew from another country, once arrived in Israel, can choose to immigrate if he "expresses his desire to settle." Thus when an American Jew travels to Israel, overstays his visitor's visa and is in technical violation of Israeli immigration law, the authorities overlook the violation, in keeping with the Law of Return. Indeed, as U.S. officials have pointed out, not only can American Jews become Israeli citizens at the drop of a hat, American Jews can get Israeli government subsidies to live in Jewish settlements in the occupied territories. ["Israel Jails Arab-Born American as Illegal Alien," Los Angeles Times, 7/18/1987] Thus when a Muhammad Akhras, a disabled father of seven, overstays his visa, is then jailed and threatened with deportation, and a Naval Hamad, a bank manager and mother of four, is turned back at Ben Gurion Airport and Israeli immigration authorities say such measures are no different from those taken by other countries. ["Some Arab-American Tourists Charged Harassment by Israel," Washington Post, 7/16/1987] they are not telling the whole story. The measures taken against Akhras, Hamad and others were official responses to the Palestinian demographic threat to the Jewish national principle. From that perspective, Palestinian-American families entering Israel, whatever their stated plans, pose a security threat in the special sense that each is another dash of powder in the demographic time bomb. As one Israeli Foreign Ministry official was quoted as saying: "There are four million Palestinians out there. Just think what would happen if one million of them decided to come home. We cannot allow that. We have a legitimate security concern." [Philadelphia Inquirer, 7/16/1986] The U.S. State Department has limited itself to criticism of the Jewish national principle only when that principle finds expression in Israeli immigration policies which favor some American citizens to the detriment of others. "We've made clear to the Israelis that we are against anything that in our view discriminates on the basis of race, religion or national origin," said a spokesman for the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem. [Ibid] In the summer of 1987 the State Department reported 75 cases since June 1 of that year in which American citizens were harassed at Israeli ports of entry. While the Israelis dismissed the incidents by saying how few they were when compared to the number of uneventful entries into their borders, the Americans were firm. "It's not our practice to raise issues which don't exist," State Department spokesman Charles Redman said. "This is a subject that we've been working on for some time. There have been a number of demarches to the Israeli government over time, and we're going to keep working on it." [Washington Post, 7/17/1987] The American press and nightly news programs were "working on it" included a threat to issue a travel advisory to Palestinian-Americans and Black Americans going to Israel, informing them that they "might experience problems getting in," as one U.S. official explained. [Washington Post, 7/16/1987] As an expression of official displeasure, the threat produced an Israeli pledge to have a senior official from either the Foreign or Tourism Ministries present at Ben Gurion to monitor the screening of American arrivals by Israeli immigration personnel. [Washington Post 7/20/1987]

Foreign Ministry spokesman Ehud Gol promised that any Americans detained in the future would be allowed to make telephone calls and be held under more comfortable conditions than those reported by Americans detained in the past, and that authorities posted at Ben Gurion would maintain closer contact with American officials. [New York Times, 7/20/1987] Israel's promise to adjust its policy sounded like an answer to specific complaints about the treatment of Nawal Hamad in June 1987, and indeed the Nawal Hamad case, which ADC brought to international attention at a press conference held July 16 at the National Office, was the one that made the front pages and the top of the evening news. Hamad, a bank manager from Fairfax City, Va., arrived June 26 at Ben Gurion airport accompanied by eight children—four of her own and four from another family, who were en route to Jordan. After two of Hamad's children passed through immigration, the rest of the party was detained, their passports were taken, and they were told that they would not be allowed to enter the country, according to Hamad's signed affidavit. They were held in a detention area Hamad described as "filthy, overcrowded and cold" and were not allowed telephone calls. Restroom facilities were restricted, according to the affidavit. An American official learned of the incident after one of the children succeeded in passing a note to family members waiting outside. The official, U.S. consular officer Mark Kennon, tried to persuade the Israeli authorities to allow the visitors to enter the country. Hamad’s affidavit states that Kennon “was trying to explain [to the Israelis] that they seemed to be a nice enough family, and were not planning on causing any problems.” To no avail: finally, after 12 hours of detention, the visitors were escorted under guard to a departing jet. Kennon’s intervention, unsuccessful though it was, reflected American concerns about previous incidents as well. Kennon told Hamad at the airport that other Americans, including Black Americans, were similarly harassed. In procedure, such leeway for incidents was the rule. In mid-July 1986 the State Department received reports of 75 Americans subjected to “discriminatory treatment” at Israeli ports of entry. Of those 75, 40 were Arab-Americans and 35 were Black Americans, according to the State Department. [Washington Post, 7/17/1987] The Black Americans were said to be suspected of membership in the Black Hebrew sect, a group which claims descent from the Hebrew tribes of the Bible and has sought residence in Israel since the late 1960s. An Israeli court ruled in 1972 that some 1500 Black Hebrews then living in Israel were not Jews and therefore not countenanced by the Law of the Return, [New York Times, 7/13/1987] and in 1984 the Israeli government began expelling some members of the sect. In 1987 some Black Americans were denied entry into Israel, and in two incidents, Israeli immigration authorities demanded bonds of more than $50,000 of Black American groups to ensure that they left the country before their visas expired.

68

U.S. Ambassador to Israel Thomas Pickering, meeting in Jerusalem with ADC President Abeed Jabara and ADC Legal Services Director Albert Mokhiber on July 13, 1987, said that in the previous six weeks the American Embassy had received two to three reports daily of Americans harassed at Israeli ports of entry, the reports generating more than 50 discussions between Embassy personnel and Israeli authorities. Eight such discussions had taken place at the ministerial level, Pickering said. The Americans reported strip and body cavity searches, damage of personal items during baggage searches, long interrogations and waiting periods, confiscation of passports, posting of excessive cash bonds and in some cases denial of entry. One U.S. diplomat called these measures racist, saying they fit the pattern of abuse shown by Israeli authorities toward Arabs under military occupation. Meanwhile, American Consul Howard Kavaler told ADC that some 50 passports were confiscated—illegally, since American passports are considered U.S. government property. Cash bonds were demanded in about 25 cases, according to Kavaler. In some cases the bonding amounts were up to $3,000 per individual. None of this was new in 1987. Between June 1 and mid-July of the previous year, the U.S. Consulate had received complaints from 96 Palestinian-Americans who said their passports were confiscated by Israeli immigration authorities at Ben Gurion Airport. The Palestinian-Americans were given documents allowing them to reclaim their passports only when they passed through the airport again to exit the country, and in some cases the documents were stamped with visas which did not grant the full three months normally provided by a visitor’s visa. In some cases the Palestinian-Americans were subjected to six- and seven-hour interrogations, or required to post bonds in excess of $2,000. [“Arab-Americans in Israel: New Issue”: New York Times, 7/16/1986] Responding to the complaints, in mid-July 1986 American officials had met with Hanan Bar-On, deputy director general of the Israeli Foreign Ministry, and threatened to issue a travel advisory if the confiscations of passports continued. The seizure of U.S. government property was part of a broader stream of Israeli measures taken against American citizens of Palestinian descent.

These Americans felt justified in arguing that they were being discriminated against because the problems they faced from Israeli immigration authorities were not shared by some of their compatriots—notably American Jews. The problems were acute enough for a group of Palestinian-Americans to direct a letter to the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem in April 1986. The letter carried 150 signatures—and would have carried more, it said, but for the fact that many Palestinian-Americans living in the West Bank were afraid of giving out their names. The 150 signatories stated that they had all had immediate family or relatives living in the West Bank and that, while unable to obtain the hawiyeh (Israeli identity card) granting permanent residency status, they had managed in the past to reside legally in the West Bank by making excursions to neighboring countries, passing back through Israeli ports of entry as a way of renewing their visitor’s visas for the standard three-month period. More recently, however, Israeli immigration authorities had begun granting only one-month and one-week renewals which the Ministry of Interior then refused to extend. The letter went on to say that West Bank residents who had the hawiyeh and travelled abroad also were running into problems. Following the June 1986 incident, the Israeli government had ordered its immigration authorities to regard a visit to neighboring countries as a legal reason for the extension of residency status, and then, called a laissez passer, allowing them to return as legal residents provided they did not stay abroad for longer than a year if they left Israel by Ben Gurion Airport, or three years if they left Israel-occupied territory by the Allenby Bridge over the Jordan. While extensions of the laissez passer were in principle obtainable at Israeli consulates abroad, recently, the letter said, Israeli consulates in the United States had “systematically” refused to grant extensions, so that many Palestinian-Americans who were once legal West Bank residents now found themselves subject to the same official caprice besetting Palestinian-Americans who only had visitor’s visas. U.S. consular officers responded to the letter by complaining to the Israeli Foreign Ministry that it discriminated against Palestinian-Americans. But the Israeli policy showed no perceptible change, so the 150 signatories of the April letter turned up the volume of their protest. Banded together as the Ad Hoc Committee for Palestinian-Americans in the West Bank, they enlisted the help of internationally-known Palestinian jurist Jonathan Kuttab, who took advantage of Vice President George Bush’s official visit to Israel in late July to draft a letter to Bush. The letter was hand delivered by another Palestinian of international repute, Mubarak Awad, founder and director of the Palestinian Center for the Study of Nonviolence. Kuttab, noting that American Jews enjoy a “privileged status” in Israel under the Law of Return, outlined the problems faced by Palestinian-Americans and stressed the discriminatory nature of the Israeli policy. “We fully understand Israel’s peculiar security needs and if the measures [taken by Israeli authorities] related to security or ‘terrorist’ activity against Israel or its citizens we would fully accept that,” Kuttab wrote. “However, these measures are aimed against all Palestinian-Americans, including children and older men and women without any pretense for security considerations. In point of fact, not a single non-Jewish American citizen has been involved in any armed or security violation in the West Bank or Gaza Strip in the past.” Later in the summer Kuttab contacted ADC, pointing out that U.S. officials had been known to intervene after American Jews said they were discriminated against in matters of visas, residency and work permits in Saudi Arabia. Kuttab urged ADC to approach the State Department and Congress to get the issue moving. ADC, which had been gathering its own reports from Palestinian-Americans upon their return to the United States and was finding that many had been unaware of their rights as American citizens, concentrated its efforts that summer on what U.S. officials described as a test case for the 7,000 Palestinian-Americans living in the West Bank: the case of Muhammad Akhras. The 150 American citizens who signed the April 1986 letter to the U.S. Consulate said their numbers would have been greater if other Palestinian-Americans living illegally in the West Bank had been willing to make themselves known. Many Palestinian-Americans who had overstayed their visitor’s visas, it was noted, were even afraid of falling under the gaze of Israeli soldiers, who might stop them, demand to see their papers and have them jailed and deported. Not so timorous was Muhammad Akhras, who dared Israeli authorities to jail him and used every means available to him as an American citizen to see that his rights were respected. [\]
West Bank and Gaza is a key element within the overall goal of US assistance to support prospects for peace in the region. In FY 1994, USAID funding levels increased threefold. USAID has accelerated the project design process to ensure that improvements in the lives of Palestinians occur quickly.

USAID SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT GOALS AND MISSION OBJECTIVE (MSOs): The West Bank and Gaza strategy is being updated as a result of increased funding associated with the Declaration of Principles. Strategic objectives and performance indicators will be refined in FY 1994.

1. Broad-Based Economic Growth: Jobs and Infrastructure.
   USAID’s strategy is to improve physical infrastructure and to create private sector jobs because unemployment is at extremely high levels. Private sector capacity to manage, produce and market goods will be strengthened and the climate for local and foreign investment will be enhanced. Support for improved housing and infrastructure through new construction and rehabilitation of existing facilities will generate private sector employment, strengthen policy and planning capacities and support institutional development. By working with Palestinian authorities and nongovernment service providers to improve family health services (which will incorporate family planning efforts), USAID will assist in the transition to an autonomous health care delivery system. The capacity to plan, finance and implement coordinated and sustainable health care services will be strengthened. The West Bank and Gaza program will benefit from regionally funded economic, scientific and technical activities.

   The West Bank and Gaza program has not yet developed a strategy in this area. Plans at this time are to use central resources to assist in efforts to incorporate family planning efforts in the delivery of family health services.

   USAID is assisting the Palestinian people in the transition to self-government by supporting the establishment of democratic administrative and legal systems and strengthening civil society. USAID programs are implemented through local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and private sector groups in these efforts.

   USAID’s strategy focuses on improvements to water, sewage and wastewater treatment systems which will safeguard the environment and reduce illness. Municipal management capabilities will be strengthened to promote the development of environmental services and environmentally sound techniques for future land use planning.

USAID PROGRAM RESULTS: USAID’s strategy is being revised in FY 1994. USAID will not report on performance of the revised strategy until baseline data become available in FY 1995.

1. Broad-Based Economic Growth: Jobs and Infrastructure.
   US private and voluntary organizations (PVOs), working with local counterparts, have assisted local communities with improved water conservation, irrigation, land reclamation, crop diversification and to obtain credit, thereby increasing local incomes. Technical assistance for agricultural and small business entrepreneurs, including graduates of vocational schools, has led to the creation and improved productivity of local small business. USAID health care resources promote primary health care at the community level, including assistance for 4000 mentally and physically challenged or at-risk children in Gaza (implemented by an indigenous PVO), and provide health management and medical training services.

   The strategy has not yet been developed; thus results are not yet available.

   USAID assistance to local nongovernmental organizations helps the Palestinians build a foundation for a participatory, democratic society.

   Financial and technical assistance provided for small-scale water conservation, irrigation, land reclamation, water and waste-water activities have improved the living and working environment for Palestinians by increasing the supply and usage of available water.
teach them the Arabic language, beginning with the alphabet, and Arab Islamic history in English. To keep abreast with standards, the school has 30 computers. The average fee of the school depends on the grade. But for the high school, the fee is $1000 per year. “Although the purpose of the Arab school was to absorb Arab students, we have a few students who have never been to the US. These students come from the European continent. Such a case is Maria Abu Issa, 16 years old. Maria was born in Bucharest, Romania. She lived there for most of her childhood. Two years, she became an orphan. Every day she travels 75 kilometers to come to this American school. It is known that the only American schools available in the West Bank are those in Ramallah’s surroundings and Jerusalem. “I had really learned the English language only when I came to this school. Classes are considered easy. Aside from this, I have self-esteem. As for the school, it has a good education level, and if the student really studies then he will be fit to undertake his university education abroad,” Maria said. Even though Al Urdinia school is considered to be an American school, the name of the school - The JordanianSchool - does not reflect the admission policy. There are Americans, Europeans, and Canadians as well.

Nidal Dies, 17 years old, is a Palestinian Canadian. He is in his senior year. He came from Ontario in 1992. Ever since then he has studied in Al Urdinia school. When he was asked what brought him here, he replied smilingly, “I came here with my mother because she felt that she had to send me to a private school. When I first came here, I was not sure of it. I didn’t know how I would be treated because I’m Christian. I was reluctant, but I was treated nicely and with kindness as if I was a Muslim. On my arrival in this country, I attended the Friends Girls School. But due to the inntadfa, and the difficulty of the English system, the school discontinued the classes of 7th grade and above. Currently, I have a lot of friends here. If you can’t ask for better. It has the Arabic essence in it. The only thing here that would be a disadvantage is the lack of elective courses that they offer. In comparison between the Canadian schools and those here, in Canada, if you’re of Arab origin, you will have a hard time adjusting, unlike here, since there is no stereotype. If I were to study in Canada, I would have to explain, to be yourself, and they do feel free. I’m a councilor in the school because it has many young children and everyone faces problems at home. Many of these kids have either a parent in America, a brother in jail, or they have a hard time coping with the grandparents they are staying with. So the counseling service gives them an opportunity to release their anger. At times we bring in psychologists to speak to the teachers and students to explain how to deal with certain crises or conflicts.” Another American School is Al Jenan School in Beitunia, near Ramallah. The school was built by two Palestinian Americans who returned to Palestine. It was opened only this year and has 300 students from grades 1 through 12. All the students are of American origin except five. Prior to their arrival, some students were studying in the US, Australia, Europe and Latin America. The school has a bus. Fees are $1000 per year, but if there are two brothers or two sisters, then the school discounts 10% for one brother and 20% for the other.

The school follows the Minnesota system. The aim of the school is to prepare students for Arab education close to that followed in the West Bank. It has 7 Arabic lessons for elementary classes per week.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
school from Jerusalem every day. “The American school is a good idea, and is considered stronger than that of the Jordanian system. It qualifies you to carry on your studies in the US, and that is what I want.” He added, “What is unique here is the teachers. They are considered as your friends.” To assist the new students, Al Jenan school has four Public Relations Care Centers. Abeer Issam, a Public Relations assistant, explains, “The purpose of the center is to counsel the students who become afraid because it’s their first year in school. There are 24 teachers. The ratio is one to one.” These American and English schools offer the Palestinian Americans an educational system that they feel at home with. They all assist and give counseling to the students in order to adapt culturally, linguistically, and to overcome all the other obstacles confronting the students. Beyond this, these schools offer Islamic teaching in the English language, building within the person the foundation to carry on their lives abroad and at home. [x]

60330. Aboudi, Sami. “Human Rights Group Says Gaza Prisons Improved”, in Reuter Writer Network System, September 20, 1994. The Palestine Authority has improved prison conditions after the death of a prisoner (Farid Jarbou’a) in a Gaza prison in 7/1995. Hanan Ashrawi, head of the Palestinian Independent Committee for Citizens Rights notes that after reports of physical and psychological violence, the prison system has made improvements. Three policemen have been charged in connection with the apparent torture death of Jarbou’a. Assas Younis of the Palestine Human Rights Information Center confirms that conditions have improved, and notes strict orders to prevent mistreatment of prisoners. Yousef El-Haddad of the Solidarity International for Human Rights (SIHR) notes that the Palestinian Authority now uses professional interrogators who have been trained not to use violence. El-Haddad notes that the complaints of violence in prisons have ended. Some 70 Palestinian prisoners are now being held. The Palestinian prisons have established rehabilitation programs for collaborators. [TXT]

60331. Abramovich, Dorit. “Costumes that Kill: Part Two: Part 2”, in Challenge, March-April, 1992. p. 28. Suna Wawi On October 22, 1989, Suna Wawi, 17, of Bal’a, was walking home from her grandfather’s when she was shot four times: One bullet entered her head; two hit her hand, and one entered her chest. She died immediately. Earlier that day, two cars with West Bank license plates had been seen in the village. The men in the cars wore, galabiyas (traditional Palestinian robes) and were masked.

Suna’s father, Nimer Mahmoud Wawi, immediately filed a complaint with the police, claiming that a mista’arum unit killed his daughter. After a few months, the secret service called Nimer to their office in Tulkarem. Surprisingly, an officer admitted that the shooting of Suna was intentional and was carried out by undercover units. Despite this admission, those responsible were not brought to trial. The father did not pursue the complaint.

Since Suna’s killing, members of the Wawi family have become the target of harassment. For example, Suna’s brother, Ziad Wawi, 22, was declared a “wanted person.” This is apparently a common phenomenon: when a Palestinian is killed in the Territories, a member of his or her family is put on the “wanted person” list. The army explains that the killing of one family member is likely to goad the relatives of the deceased into acts of revenge.

On February 8, 1992, at 2 a.m., thirteen men wearing galabiyas arrived at the Wawi house. They drove up to the house in a Palestinian car. When the father opened the door, he found a pistol pointed at his head. One of the men wore a ribbon around his head with “Hamas” (4) written on it. The mista’arum agents searched every corner of the house for Ziad. When they didn’t find him, one of the men announced, “The moment I find him, I’ll finish him off.” Ziad has not returned home in months.

The method by which families are informed about these deaths is yet another way in which the authorities show their scorn for Palestinians. Suna’s family, for example, learned of her death when it was announced on the radio. This is a very common story. The army makes no effort to inform the families directly. [x]

60332. Abramovich, Dorit. “Costumes that Kill: Part Two: Part 3”, in Challenge, March-April, 1992. p. 28. Sami Ahmed Hussein Nimri Sami Nimri, 17, was killed in Ramin on December 27, 1991. Around 3:30 p.m., a car with West Bank license plates drove into the village. Witnesses said the men in the car wore galabiyas and some of them were dressed as women. Two bullets were fired at Sami at short range; they hit him in the head and he was killed instantly. At the same moment, the villagers spotted a jeep and a military ambulance behind the Palestinian car, from where the bullets had been fired. One of the villagers shouted, “Careful, Jews!” Additional shots were fired into the crowd. Twenty-eight Palestinians were injured. No complaint was filed. [x]

60333. Abramovich, Dorit. “The Time Is Ripe for Peace: The Israeli Government Isn’t: Interview with Peace Now activist Galia Golan: Part 1”, in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 8. Professor Galia Golan is a lecturer in the Political Science department at the Hebrew University. Concurrently, she is the head of both the department of Soviet Studies, and Women and Gender Studies. She is a central activist in the Peace Now movement and one of the leaders of the Women’s Network for Advancing Peace. She left the Labor Party after its last convention in November and joined Ratz (Citizens’ Rights Movement). Golan was interviewed by Dorit Abramovich in the first week of December. [x]

60334. Abramovich, Dorit. “The Time Is Ripe for Peace: The Israeli Government Isn’t: Interview with Peace Now activist Galia Golan: Part 2”, in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 8. Q. Why did you leave the Labor Party? A: What bothered me was that Labor fails to lead the opposition, because most of the time it is occupied with the internal strife between Peres and Rabin. In my opinion, the Labor Party has not come to terms with the fact that it is an opposition party. In addition, the internal party controversy surrounding their platform was somewhat unrealistic. Laborated as if they were in a position to conduct peace negotiations. They were discussing the issue of whether or not to talk solely with Palestinians from the Occupied Territories, while the Likud was sitting with the P.L.O. in Madrid. To me, the discussions seemed irrelevant and certainly promised no alternative to present government policy.

Q: At the party convention, Labor took a policy decision stating it was ready to compromise on the Golan Heights. Wasn’t this an important decision? A: I left that meeting after four hours of discussion, before they even began to discuss the Golan. The discussion started with subjects such as where Israeli sovereignty would be imposed— matters which were ludicrous and unrealistic. Eventually they found a compromise position, but the result is a platform full of contradictions. One sentence speaks of the national rights of the Palestinian people—a serious achievement—and several sentences later, there is opposition to the establishment of a Palestinian state. So what game is being played? All these changes don’t alter anything in the party, with its hawkish majority and leadership. These are compromises which aimed to avoid a split with the doves—something which was apparently in the works.

Q: Surveys show that Israeli public opinion is increasingly inclined to support relinquishing territories and negotiating with the P.L.O. Why is this not expressed in election results? A: It is clear that a large majority of Israelis favors exchanging land for peace. There is a small majority in favor of a territorial compromise even within the Likud secretariat. It is true that public opinion has changed during the last several years. I think that it is a result of the Intifada, the Skuds and the economic situation. The trouble is that people do not vote according to issues. A large portion of the public truly believes in the Likud slogan, that “only the Likud” can bring an agreement which meets Israeli needs. People don’t trust the Labor Party. I think this issue will play a role in the coming elections. Therefore, I want to see a new bloc that will present some kind of alternative.[=]

60335. Abramovich, Dorit. "The Time Is Ripe for Peace: The Israeli Government Isn't: Interview with Peace Now activist Galia Golan: Part 3", in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 8. Q: There is a problem here. A Leftist list is being organized that will be comprised of Ratz, Shinui, and Mapam. Why not also include predominantly Arab parties like the Communist Party or the Progressive List for Peace?

A: This is a matter of Zionist ideology. The same problem exists for Peace Now, which defines itself as a Zionist movement, and for the Women's Network for the Advancement of Peace, but to a lesser extent. There are Israeli Palestinian women in the Network, and Peace Now has undertaken joint activities with Israeli Arabs. But Peace Now does not recruit Arab members. Most Israeli Arabs enter the political arena via non-Zionist parties. As for Peace Now and its constituency, we have always regarded ourselves as an Israeli movement. It is no secret that we are not a movement whose aim is to advocates a Palestinian state; we are not a movement for Palestinian rights. We arose as a movement which seeks a solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict, which wants peace for Israel.

Personally, I think that there will not be peace without the realization of Palestinian self-determination. Israel has not only become increasingly involved in dialogue with Palestinians, but also in everything relating to the infringement of their rights and issues such as land expropriation. But we have done such things as Israelis and as Zionists.

Q: Why, among the Left, was there no forthright discussion of the expropriation of Arab land—or even of the expulsion of a whole village, such as in the case of Ramyah?

A: I do not have an answer to this. I believe in human rights and I don't want to see discrimination against either side. But I must admit that I really didn't pay attention to these issues, and I didn't take into consideration what was happening in the country. What interested me was the issue of immigrants settling in the territories. In Peace Now, we tried to get the immigrants to side with us on this issue.

Q: Do you accept the prediction that most immigrants will support the Likud?

A: We don't know what will happen in the elections. It is projected that there will be a slight lean to the Right. But I think that this immigration could move us towards peace, especially due to the difficulties that have been encountered during their absorption. When there is unemployment at a rate of 11-12%, no housing, and masses of people arriving, it is economically impossible to continue the settlements in the territories. I think that people understand this, and this is why the settlements are simply not popular in the surveys.

On the ideological level, the subject of immigration brings us back to the issue of Zionism. Zionism is based on two elements: land and the ingathering of the exiles. We, on the Left, have reached the conclusion that we must forgo one or the other. I believe that is possible to absorb the immigrants without taking work, land or housing from people who are already there. But because Arik Sharon is the only one planning and building in the territories, this isn't being accomplished—although available land does exist.[=]

A: There are two factors which can influence Shamir. The first is the mood in the country. During the Intifada, people felt that their individual security was in danger, and their feeling of insecurity worsened with the Skud missiles during the Gulf War. The economic situation is also important.

The second factor is external. I pray every day that the US will continue to pressure us, even more pressure that it has done in the past. I am extremely worried that Bush's popularity will decline. For a long time, my biggest worry has been that Bush will just abandon this whole business. I have no doubt that US pressure is the only thing that can keep everyone around the conference table.

Q: How do you assess the United States role in keeping the P.L.O. out of the negotiations?

A: It is clear to everyone that the P.L.O. is present behind the scenes. The Palestinians were correct in saying that they would not go to Washington if they were not given direct contact with Tunis and entrance Permits for delegation members. I hope and believe that this stance will bring about a solution.

Q: Can you describe your picture of the desirable solution?

A: Personally, I am more than willing to give back the territories. I think that it is possible to find solutions to the problem of Jerusalem. I can live without East Jerusalem, on condition that there is peace. I am not disturbed by the idea of a Palestinian State.

Q: What about a state with an army?

A: I find it difficult to believe that we will reach an agreement without demilitarization. I'm also worried. I don't believe that the peace will be based on mutual love, neither from their side, nor from ours. Like the peace with Egypt, there will have to be all kinds of demilitarization and international agreements. The Palestinians also know and accept this. Maybe some day we will be in a position where this is no longer needed.

Q: What is your opinion of the autonomy plan?

A: I don't believe in autonomy, but if the Palestinians can accept the idea-well and good. It would simply be a concession which they were willing to make to the Israeli government. The Palestinians will need to make with self-government or autonomy, if nothing more can be achieved through our present government—but only on condition that this be a temporary arrangement.[=]

A: I hope that we can solve this in the spirit of Nabil Sha'ath, the P.L.O. representative in Cairo. He suggested that we recognize their right, but that the realization of this right would be limited. Palestinians would have the right to return to their state, and we would have the right to return to ours. Realistically, it is clear that it would be impossible to absorb three million Palestinians within the state of Israel, and they would also not be obliged to absorb 200,000 Israelis or more. Basically, the interests of the two peoples are at odds on this issue, but I am not ready to relinquish the State of Israel. I hope a compromise solution can be found. Today, for the first time, it is possible to reach an compromise, and this is the best thing that came out of 1967. There is something to talk about, and the Palestinians are ready to compromise and take the little that is better than nothing.

Q: How would you describe the place of the Israeli woman in relation to the peace process?

A: Most women in Israel are not active at all. Since the beginning of the Intifada, a minority of women have become very active. But for the most part, this activity has not reached the general female public.

When we established the Network, our objective was to reach Palestinian women, but a second aim was to reach Israeli women as well. We organized house meetings for women only, and we saw that, contrary to what we expected, many women are interested in the issues and possess considerable understanding of the situation. These questions concern their lives and families in the same way they concern men. These women have found their voice. It is true that they come from a class with a certain amount of education. I think there is a socio-economic reason to explain why other classes do not identify with such causes. We certainly do not insist that the leadership of these organizations be solely academic or solely Ashkenazi.

Q: Are you optimistic about the outcome of the peace talks?

A: I participated in a conference which took place in Moscow at the same time as the Madrid Conference. A member of the Palestinian delegation described the political situation in Israel thus: "In Israel there are optimists and pessimists. The pessimists are those who are afraid that nothing will come of Madrid. The optimists are those who hope that nothing will come of it." That is exactly the case. I would be optimistic if we had a different delegation. I think that most of the nation wants things to move. If any regime comes up with a real solution, it will be accepted—even if this solution is a Palestinian state. It is possible to convince anyone of anything.

We do not find ourselves in the situation we have wanted all these years. The Arabs are willing to sit with us. The tragedy is that we do not have a government which will seize the moment.[=]

60338. Abramovitch, Dorit. "A Blatant Disregard for Human Life: Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights Condemn Denial of Medical Treatment Under Curfew: Part 1," in Challenge, March-April, 1991. p. 24. One of the few attempts to combat the effects of the curfew in the Occupied Territories took place February 20, when the Association of Israeli Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights (AIPPHR) delivered half a ton of baby food to needy families in the West Bank city of Nablus. As usual for such endeavors, the doctors encountered numerous problems from Israeli soldiers in the area. At the Tulkarm checkpoint, on the Green Line dividing Israel and the Occupied Territories, soldiers delayed the truck of food for over one hour. The commander informed the doctors that they were forbidden to bring food to residents of the territories, adding that there was no need to do so since Palestinians had plenty to eat. The doctors managed to reach Nablus by taking a circuitous route around the checkpoint, and began distributing the food in the Nablus casbah and in nearby Balata refugee camp. Again soldiers intervened, this time in a hostile manner. A number of foreign journalists accompanying the doctors were detained for several hours, and a visiting British parliamentarian was harassed. Despite these difficulties, the distribution proceeded as planned.

Since the curfew began, AIPPHR has acted to oppose the written and unwritten rules that the Civil Administration has implemented in the Occupied Territories. Chief among the association's concerns is that sick persons have been denied proper medical treatment because they are unable to reach hospitals in East Jerusalem. Those most affected are seriously ill patients, whose condition is such that the health system in the rest of the West Bank and Gaza Strip is inadequate. To reach any of the East Jerusalem hospitals, they are required to obtain a special hospitalization permit from the Civil Administration, a time-consuming process which may or may not be successful, depending on the arbitrary decisions of the officials involved.

The Civil Administration has also ordered hospitals in the Occupied Territories to cut back their staff during the curfew. As a result, at most medical centers only 30 percent of employees have been reporting for work, and this in a time of emergency, when the medical situation is very difficult, because the curfew prevents family members from going to work. In January 1991, the number of deaths at al-Maqassed hospital in East Jerusalem doubled. During the month of January, February and March, Hanoun did not receive medical treatment. The cost of the treatment, along with the prohibition on leaving his house, prevented Hanoun from being treated. In March, Hanoun lost his voice. The cancer spread, and he has since suffered from severe pain in the throat. Hanoun was unable to pay for medical treatment. Like most of the inhabitants of the town, his economic situation is very difficult, because the curfew prevents family members from going to work. In January 1991, the number of deaths at al-Maqassed hospital in East Jerusalem doubled. During the month of January, 44 deaths were recorded at the hospital, compared to 22 during December 1990. Turaya Sneineh, age 58, a resident of Hebron, suffered from diabetes. On January 13, 1991 she suffered a stroke and lost consciousness. The telephone in Turaya's house was disconnected because of the curfew, so her sister-in-law was unable to contact Turaya's sons and ask for their help. For three days Turaya remained unconscious. On January 16, 1991, three days after her stroke, Turaya was taken to Maqassed. One day later, she died. The cause of death: a cerebral hemorrhage complicated by diabetes. No one needs to provide medical treatment, the continuing ban on going out to work and the resultant hunger and undernourishment, the failure to distribute gas to residents of the territories, adding that there was no need to do so since Palestinians had plenty to eat. The doctors managed to reach Nablus by taking a circuitous route around the checkpoint, and began distributing the food in the Nablus casbah and in nearby Balata refugee camp. Again soldiers intervened, this time in a hostile manner. A number of foreign journalists accompanying the doctors were detained for several hours, and a visiting British parliamentarian was harassed. Despite these difficulties, the distribution proceeded as planned.

Since the curfew began, AIPPHR has acted to oppose the written and unwritten rules that the Civil Administration has implemented in the Occupied Territories. Chief among the association's concerns is that sick persons have been denied proper medical treatment because they are unable to reach hospitals in East Jerusalem. Those most affected are seriously ill patients, whose condition is such that the health system in the rest of the West Bank and Gaza Strip is inadequate. To reach any of the East Jerusalem hospitals, they are required to obtain a special hospitalization permit from the Civil Administration, a time-consuming process which may or may not be successful, depending on the arbitrary decisions of the officials involved.

The Civil Administration has also ordered hospitals in the Occupied Territories to cut back their staff during the curfew. As a result, at most medical centers only 30 percent of employees have been reporting for work, and this in a time of emergency, when the medical situation is very difficult, because the curfew prevents family members from going to work. In January 1991, the number of deaths at al-Maqassed hospital in East Jerusalem doubled. During the month of January, February and March, Hanoun did not receive medical treatment. The cost of the treatment, along with the prohibition on leaving his house, prevented Hanoun from being treated. In March, Hanoun lost his voice. The cancer spread, and he has since suffered from severe pain in the throat. Hanoun was unable to pay for medical treatment. Like most of the inhabitants of the town, his economic situation is very difficult, because the curfew prevents family members from going to work. In January 1991, the number of deaths at al-Maqassed hospital in East Jerusalem doubled. During the month of January, 44 deaths were recorded at the hospital, compared to 22 during December 1990. Turaya Sneineh, age 58, a resident of Hebron, suffered from diabetes. On January 13, 1991 she suffered a stroke and lost consciousness. The telephone in Turaya's house was disconnected because of the curfew, so her sister-in-law was unable to contact Turaya's sons and ask for their help. For three days Turaya remained unconscious. On January 16, 1991, three days after her stroke, Turaya was taken to Maqassed. One day later, she died. The cause of death: a cerebral hemorrhage complicated by diabetes. No one needs to provide medical treatment, the continuing ban on going out to work and the resultant hunger and undernourishment, the failure to distribute gas to most of the population—all testify to the Israeli government's complete disregard for the life and health of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. The association also filed an appeal with the Supreme Court of Justice demanding immediate suspension of the pertinent Civil Administration regulations, and calling on the army to order soldiers at checkpoints to give preference to any vehicle or ambulance carrying sick or injured persons.[=]

60339. Abramovitch, Dorit. "A Blatant Disregard for Human Life: Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights Condemn Denial of Medical Treatment Under Curfew: Part 2," in Challenge, March-April, 1991. p. 24. Established in February 1988, AIPPHR has as its main goal the struggle against the Israeli government's actions in the Occupied Territories, especially in the medical sphere. The failure to develop a medical infrastructure in the Occupied Territories and the policies of the Civil Administration, which have placed severe limitations on the rights of sick persons there, make it imperative for the association to act to redress the situation. AIPPHR works on behalf of prisoners denied proper medical treatment, defends medical personnel harassed by the governmental violations of Palestinians' medical rights. Its published reports detail a consistent policy of underdeveloping the health apparatus in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Unlike others in the Israeli left, members of the association have not lost their sense of mission since the Gulf war began. As one put it, "We advocate a struggle against human rights violations in the Occupied Territories. Precisely during wartime, it is most important that we continue this work.

Dorit Abramovitch is director of the Association of Israeli Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights. Translation: Elana Wesley.[=] 60340. Abramovitch, Dorit. "Soldiers as Victims, Infants as Aggressors: Actions for Palestinian Human Rights Explode Israeli Myths: Part 1," in Challenge, May-June, 1991. p. 28. The son of Mohammad Moussa from the town of Anabta died at the beginning of March. At the time, there was a curfew in the town. A week before the 3-week-old infant died, Mohammad noticed that his son was dehydrated and had been losing weight. He went outside and asked the soldiers for permission to take his son to the town doctor. The soldiers refused. In the first three months of 1991, there were 74 days of curfew in Anabta. For 74 days, Anabta residents were not allowed to leave their homes. For 74 days, they lived on flour, olive oil and thyme. Throughout the visit of the delegation of the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights to Anabta, serious complaints were heard about the behavior of the soldiers during the curfew. The soldiers had clear orders.

Anyone who stepped outside his house, anyone who went out onto his own roof, was considered to be violating the curfew. The punishment for violating the curfew is well known to all. Mohammad Abdel Karim Hanoun, age 70, suffers from lung cancer. Once a month, Hanoun was unable to pay for medical treatment because he cannot move. If any regime comes up with a real solution, it will be considered to be violating the curfew. The punishment for violating the curfew is well known to all. Mohammad Abdel Karim Hanoun, age 70, suffers from lung cancer. Once a month, Hanoun was unable to pay for medical treatment because he is unable to reach hospitals in East Jerusalem. The telephone in Turaya's house was disconnected because of the curfew, so her sister-in-law was unable to contact Turaya's sons and ask for their help. For three days Turaya remained unconscious. On January 16, 1991, three days after her stroke, Turaya was taken to Maqassed. One day later, she died. The cause of death: a cerebral hemorrhage complicated by diabetes. No one needs to provide medical treatment, the continuing ban on going out to work and the resultant hunger and undernourishment, the failure to distribute gas to most of the population—all testify to the Israeli government's complete disregard for the life and health of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. The association also filed an appeal with the Supreme Court of Justice demanding immediate suspension of the pertinent Civil Administration regulations, and calling on the army to order soldiers at checkpoints to give preference to any vehicle or ambulance carrying sick or injured persons.[=] of all responsibility. These words give every soldier absolute freedom of action. The soldier who refused to allow Mohammad Moussa to take his son to the doctor is considered innocent of any wrongdoing. He is thought to be defending the security of Israeli citizens. He is the heroic soldier we learn about in schools and universities. He is the soldier-hero around which the Zionist myth is built. He has no first name, only his national surname, this “Israeli soldier hero.” So it is not by chance that activity for human rights in the Occupied Territories entails the shattering of fundamental myths. To regard the Palestinian as the victim of the Israeli government would conflict with the perception of the Jew/Israeli as the victim. In the Israeli conceptual separation between aggressor and victim, between strong and weak, the Palestinian is regarded as part of the world which threatens Israel and wants to annihilate it. The Palestinian is perceived as constituting both an individual and a collective threat to every Jew. This is the myth upon which Israeli aggression is built and upon which legitimation of the occupation is based. The Israeli who has been brought up to feel threatened has become transformed from hero to oppressor. The struggle against the government authorities that violate Palestinian rights is thus also a struggle to shatter Israeli myths and change Israeli perceptions. Assistance to the Palestinian who lives under Israeli occupation contradicts the perception that the Israeli is the victim, since here the Israeli conqueror is the one who possesses the power to deny life and freedom to the conquered. For those active in fighting for the rights of Palestinians, the soldier has become transformed from hero to oppressor. The struggle against the government authorities that violate Palestinian rights is thus also a struggle to shatter Israeli myths and change Israeli perceptions.

Translation: Elana and David Wesley Dorit Abramovitch is executive director of the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights.[=]

60342. Abramovitch, Dorit. “The Impact of a Rubber Bullet”, in Challenge, September-October, 1991, p. 21. Samar Abu-Sa’ad, nine years old, was shot by soldiers on Wednesday, August 7, 1991 at 1:00 A.M. A resident of the Anata refugee camp, Samar was returning from his uncle’s house, holding a pita stuffed with falafel. Samar’s mother, Aida Ahmed Abu-Sa’ad remembers that four soldiers were patrolling in a jeep. According to her, even though no demonstrations were occurring in the area, one of the four soldiers fired a rubber bullet at Samar from their jeep 20 meters away. The bullet hit Samar in the left side of his throat and continued through his left lung before lodging in his stomach. The rubber bullet, as it is called by the Army, is a round metal projectile covered by a thin rubber coating. Its round structure enables it to penetrate more deeply than other bullets. Samar’s severe injuries were apparently caused both by the force of the blast and by the position of the jeep, at a location higher than the victim. After the shooting, the soldiers sealed the area for 15 minutes, and then drove off, leaving Samar there, bleeding. Samar received first-aid at the camp clinic and was brought to El-Mokassed Hospital in East Jerusalem. The treating physician preferred to leave the bullet in his stomach, as an operation could endanger him further.

We visited him on Sunday, four days after the shooting. Samar was lying in bed, unconscious. According to the doctor, his condition had worsened the day before, as a result of severe bleeding in his left lung. Samar’s face contorted with pain; sweat dripped from his wound. His mother pointed sadly to her son’s right-hand. As a result of a birth defect, Samar’s right hand is without fingers: “They can’t even accuse him of throwing stones,” she said. One of her sons, fifteen years old, works in Machane Yehudah market in West Jerusalem. “It’s lucky that he works there,” said the mother, “at least that way they can’t shoot him.” The IDF responded to a complaint filed by MP Dedi Zucker of B’tselem in the standard manner—“the IDF is investigating the case.” Translation: Yochanan Lorwin [=]

7. Faeq Wared, 74, from Ramallah. Member of the PNC and the PLO Central Committee. Former head of the Palestinian Communist Party. Expelled in 1967.

17. Naim Ashab, 60, from Jerusalem. Member of the Political Office of the People’s Party. Member of the PNC and PLO Central Committee. Expelled in 1973.

Expelled in 1975.

30. Badi’ Yaziji, from Gaza. Expelled in 1972. [=]
Mixing sexes can also incite a sexual lust and tempt both sexes to commit adultery and fornication resulting in the loss of purity and chastity. It has been proven that one of the most obvious results of mixing sexes in Western societies is that they drown in a pool of sexual permissiveness. Western psychologists and social workers recommended mixing sexes to control the sexual instinct. The result was that emotions were set afame. There are also educational considerations that confirm the necessity of feminizing the role of the man by placing him in the position of a female teacher.

-There are some subjects in the curriculum that concern only girls. A female teacher can do a much better job in explaining these things to girls than a male teacher who feels shy and embarrassed. -The nature of the male teacher's role is limited by his being a human being. He is also an educator who plants values in the souls of his students. Women's psychological and emotional nature is similar to men, but a female teacher has always been more capable of understanding the problems of the girl students and will work to solve them. -One of the principles of a good education is that there is a real friendship between teachers and students. This might push teachers to tutor their students privately outside the classrooms. This would be difficult to accomplish if teachers were men and students were girls because the relationship between men and women is restricted by the traditions and values of our society. Therefore, it is more appropriate for female teachers to teach girls and be there friends. As for the humanistic aspect, freedom is an essential part of the life of an individual. Everyone has the right to choose where to be. Muslim women do not feel comfortable in the presence of men; therefore, this situation would be forced on them and then they would no longer be free. This can be seen with female teachers. For example, when a male teacher enters the room while they are talking about issues that only concern women, they are obliged to change the subject. This intrusion of men becomes a source of annoyance to them, and they do not feel comfortable. The humanistic aspect requires taking men's manhood into consideration and his superiority over women. This is what a male teacher who teaches in a girls' school lacks, since his female boss is directing and giving him orders. This does not fit with the principle of male superiority. It is obvious that there are good and strong reasons that make feminizing girls' schools at all levels so important. This is not a religious demand alone but an essential educational, humanistic and moral imperative that will raise the standards of education in our schools. [-]

60345. Abu Hikma, Hakima. “Shin Bet Interrogation: One Woman's Testimony: Part 1”, in Challenge, May-June, 1991. p. 11. Hakima Abu Hikma, 38, a social worker from al-Bireh, was arrested on September 18, 1990. She spent five months in detention at the Russian Compound in Jerusalem, during which she was held for 20 days in the solitary confinement cell of the Shin Bet. She was tried on March 13, 1991, and released the same day. Following is an account of her experience based on testimony she gave to Women For Women Political Prisoners-Jerusalem after her release. I am a special education teacher at the Swedish Institute (East Jerusalem and Gaza). On September 18, 1990, in the evening, about 18 soldiers arrived at my house and arrested me. At about 1:00 a.m., after I had waited for three hours on the steps of the Civil Administration in Ramallah, I was taken to the Russian Compound. I was examined by a doctor, and, in answer to his question, I told him that I had no health problems. At the time I weighed about 67 kilos. After four hours of investigation concerning my personal details and history, a policeman took me to a solitary cell and said, Welcome to the palace. The cell was filthy, with piles of rotten food scraps, it stank and swarmed with bugs. The stench was so unbearable that I couldn't put anything in my mouth. Drinking water was provided in a used juice bottle which was so dirty, I didn't dare drink from it. The blanket stank. Because of fear of skin diseases, I used it only for leaning against the wall. The entire time I was in the solitary cells, I sat in a squatting position, and now I suffer from pains and swelling in my feet. I was interrogated every day for an average of six to eight hours, sometimes during the day, sometimes at night. The longest interrogation lasted 12 hours. Sometimes they took me out for interrogation three or five times a day. Once they put me in the cellphone. There is one door, and behind it another door which opens into a cell about 75 x 75 cm. in size, very high, smelly and dark. When I leaned on the wall, I realized it was wet, so I sat there in a squatting position (it was impossible to stretch out your legs). I was there for 12 hours, without receiving any food or water. Every time they took me out for interrogation, they put a bag over my head, so I wouldn't see where they were taking me. I was put into the “closet” one more time, and I remained without water for 16 hours straight. During the interrogation, I was moved through all the solitary cells, and they were all filthy, it seemed to be deliberate. Once I called the interrogator and asked him to smell the place, and I requested permission to clean it. He allowed me to clean it, but afterwards I was called to an interrogation and was returned to a different cell, as dirty as the first.[=-]

60346. Abu Hikma, Hakima. “Shin Bet Interrogation: One Woman's Testimony: Part 2”, in Challenge, May-June, 1991. p. 11. During the first 14 days of the interrogation, I could neither drink nor eat anything. Within 16 days I lost 18 kilos and weighed 49 kilos. On the 14th day of the interrogation, I didn't feel well, I was so weak I couldn't walk, I couldn't hear well, and when I tried to speak, no voice came out. The interrogator sent me to the infirmary of the prison, and when I was examined, it turned out that my blood pressure had dropped to 60/80 and it was difficult to find my pulse. The medic called a doctor from Hadassah hospital and asked why I wasn't eating and drinking. I told him it was because they brought the water in filthy bottles and the food was so foul that I was afraid it would make me sick. I sat opposite me and said that he wouldn't move until I drank 10 glasses of water in front of him. Every half hour they took my blood pressure, until my pulse revived. After that, they took me to the interrogations without a bag over my head, because I couldn't breathe with it on. After I had drunk, the doctor gave permission for me to return to the interrogation room. The investigator asked me a few questions, and left me alone in the room with the air conditioning on. I was wearing only sandals, and I felt as though my feet were frozen. During all this time, they did not allow me to shower or change underwear. I began menstruating and, at my request, the medic sent me some cotton wool. When I said that this wasn't sufficient, he sent me some sanitary napkins in its place. I washed my underpants in water from the drinking bottle. Since I never knew when they might take me out for an interrogation, I did this quickly and put the underpants back on. Later, when I was transferred to an ordinary cell, I stopped getting my menstrual periods, maybe because of my drastic weight loss. After they examined me in the hospital, they gave me medication for restoring my periods. During the interrogation, they tried to accuse me of distributing PLO money to families of prisoners, together with a man who had incriminated me in his confession. I denied it. I explained that it was correct that I gave things to the needy, but it was family money given to poor families. I explained that it was charity, which was obligatory for Muslims. I am religious and, during the interrogations, they did not remove my head covering. Once they threatened me that they would bring someone who would rape me. I said to them, these threats were deliberate. Once I called the interrogator and asked him to smell the place, and I requested permission to clean it. He allowed me to clean it, but afterwards I was called to an interrogation and was returned to a different cell, as dirty as the first.[=-]
(I already weigh about 56 kilos), and today I returned to work for the first time. From the February-March report of WOFP-Jerusalem.[4]

60348. Abu Laila, Aiman. "Features: Basic Services Lacking," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 22, 1995, p. 7. The village of Tabeh Sheikh Hamoudeh, (population around 5000) lies in an old Palestinian area to the northeast of Khan Yunis. Its name is derived from the seaside trip of Sheikh Hamoudeh, one of the villagers. It is considered to be part of Qararah village, which lies to the east. As well as lacking any kind of essential services, the villagers also suffer from daily harassment by the Israeli soldiers who are still to be found in their military posts on the borders of the area--despite the signing of the peace accords. The village has a total lack of any educational, health or social services. There is no electricity, while the nearby military posts and Kosofim settlement have access to electric lines. As for the villagers, they even use car batteries to operate lighting systems in their homes during celebrations. Despite the advent of the Palestinian National Authority, the Israeli soldiers prohibited the villagers from collecting water from the nearby wells, and now, they have to walk about three kilometers to fetch it. Umm Abed Thaher, age fifty, said that they can barely find drinkable water. "I’m ashamed to offer our guests tea, fearing that they will refuse because the water is so salty," she said. The roads are unpaved, and the children must walk six kilometers to get to school in Khan Yunis. There are no nursery schools, and no clinics, let alone a hospital. Settler road leads to trouble: In 1988, the Israeli army built a military road to connect the settlements of Gush Qatif and Kosofim, appropriating in the process the land of four Palestinian families. Ostensibly to prevent the settlers' cars from being stoned, the road ends in a military checkpoint to the east of Kosofim. Soldiers leave the checkpoint regularly to harass the villagers. Masa’ad Samiri, a student, said that they often came to the village to check identities and would often arrest people. He said that the soldiers set up road blocks at night, and have even demolished three houses in the village, claiming that they were built without a license.

The road is frequently closed by the Israelis, perhaps for a Jewish holiday or for fear of some attack. This forces taxi drivers to take alternative and difficult routes, with the added annoyance that their cars are likely to be stopped and searched by the military. Even salesmen visiting the village must surrender their identity cards until they have left the area. One villager told of other unhappy incidents in the village’s history. In 1993, the settlers kidnapped Muhammed Abu Haddaf and beat and abandoned him inside the “green line.” In another incident, a pregnant woman who went into labor in the early morning hours had to be taken by car to the military post so that the only telephone in the area could be used to call an ambulance to take her to the hospital. A few months after the signing of the Oslo Agreement, the soldiers uprooted scores of olive and orange trees belonging to the villagers. Despite the signing of the peace treaty, the soldiers still enter the area even though it is now under the Palestinian National Authority’s rule. The whole area has been surrounded by more checkpoints, suffocating the village. Student Yasser Abu Sleisal, age twenty-two, reported that students, including women, were often turned back at the checkpoints. The humiliating searches often ended with the people being told to raise their hands and face the wall. The Israeli army frequently prohibits the entrance of any Palestinian military patrol, even policemen in uniform. The only patrol allowed to enter is the joint Palestinian/Israeli patrol. The respond to the question, because the last time I spoke out about the killing of collaborators, I was accused - by the same Yizhar Be’er - of abhorrent. Contrary to the assumption of the questioner, I believe that the torture attacks were not raised at the conference. At the time, I hesitated to inquire why the conference signed of the peace treaty, the soldiers still enter the area even though it Israel (sponsored by the Association of Israeli-Palestine Physicians for Peace, so do not let us say good-bye to UNRWA. [5]

60350. Abu Shakrah, Jan. "A Point of View by Jan Abu Shakrah: A Palestinian Woman On the Journalists Who Worry About ‘What They Do to Each Other’", in Al-Fajir Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly, June 21, 1993, p. 16. In the last few minutes of last week's conference on torture in Israel (sponsored by the Association of Israeli-Palestine Physicians for Human Rights and the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel), an Israeli journalist raised a predictable question about why the conference had focused only on Israeli torture of Palestinians and not on the brutal torture Palestinians inflict on their own. He cited, with a notable degree of self-satisfaction, photos shown him by Yizhar Be’er (director of B’Tselem) of mutilated victims of “Palestinian torture,” and queried why such tortures were not raised at the conference. At the time, I hesitated to respond to the question, because the last time I spoke out about the killing of collaborators, I was accused - by the same Yizhar Be’er - of expressing sympathy with murderers. But it bothers me that such a called intervention essentially went unanswered, except for a polite response by Neve Gordon, director of AIPPHR, noting that the topic of the conference was, after all, torture in Israel and assuring the questioner that the conference organizers of course considered torture by anyone abhorrent. Contrary to the assumption of the questioner, I believe that such tortures were very much on the agenda of the conference, but remained very largely unarticulated by both Israeli and Palestinian participants, and for very good reasons. The conference was not a therapy session, although it perhaps had some therapeutic effect, nor was it a court of recriminations, although responsible officials, medical professionals and others participating in or acquiescing to torture were very clearly identified. The question of what is to be done to prevent torture and to heal its victims was repeatedly raised and perhaps could be said to be the governing question of the conference. At least in the workshop on rehabilitation, in which I participated, the concern for domestic violence and the brutalizing effects of institutionalized violence on Palestinians was specifically addressed. It seems to me, however, that the refrain, "But look at what they do to each other," calls for more response than an assurance that "Of course, we are concerned." [=]

60351. Abu Shakrah, Jan. "A Point of View by Jan Abu Shakrah: A Response to the Journalist Who Worries About 'What They Do to Each Other,' Part 2," in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly. June 21, 1993. p. 16. I am outraged and appalled, dear journalist, that you take such smug delight in purveying the horrors of mutilated bodies. I am disgusted that not only Israeli officials - who inflict daily, dehumanizing torture and humiliation on Palestinians - but also human rights activists engage in what can only be described as occupational pornography. And I am angry at myself, at Palestinians, and at Israelis who know better, who silently acquiesce to such orgies of perversity and sadism. Do you derive a kind of Mengelian satisfaction from discovering, after the experiment of 26 years of dehumanizing occupation, that, "Ah-ha, we treated them like animals and now, look, they're acting like animals?" And what, may I ask, would lead you to believe that Palestinians would want to share with you the agonies of their own devastated society and personalities? What can you - who planted collaborators in our midst and taught us torture - possibly offer us in return?

The organizers of the conference, I believe, did offer something worthwhile. They offered an opportunity to consider how to prevent torture and how to rehabilitate its victims. While I appreciate the intelligence and care with which Israelis are looking for legal guarantees and sanctions and the honest attempt to reform their own system, I respectfully submit that the system which imprisons Palestinians for their opposition to the occupation and which legitimizes their continued subjugation and humiliation is beyond reform. Removing the tools of dehumanization is a necessary step toward restoring humanity. There are other roles Israelis can play in this work of restitution. I believe the offers of assistance from mental health professionals attending the conference were genuine and that such partnerships in healing can have less than those of closed ones. Problems in closed societies are a result of doubts, skepticism and lack of confidence. Democracy needs cooperation between women and men. The state that we are after offers of assistance from mental health professionals attending the conference were genuine and that such partnerships in healing can have less than those of closed ones. Problems in closed societies are a result of doubts, skepticism and lack of confidence. Democracy needs cooperation between women and men. The state that we are after...

60352. Abu Shakrah, Asaad. "Two Views From the Islamic University: Feminization of Schools (Opposing View)," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times. May 5, 1995, p. 5. The Palestinian National Authority's recent decision to "feminize" the girls' schools in the Gaza Strip was intended to suit Palestinian tradition. Under this decision, all men are to be excluded from female society in the field of education. I admit that I am unfamiliar with the details of this decision and the reasons behind it. Nonetheless, I feel compelled to comment. Since when did our traditions prohibit men from teaching women? Palestinian society has never prevented men from teaching female students in the past. If we take a cursory look at the history of Palestinian education, we will find that men have played a significant role teaching women in schools or universities. What problem will this decision solve? What problems might be complicated? We are living in a transitional period and we need to think deeply before taking any decision before it's too late and we regret it. We are now in the stage of building a healthy society that needs good relations between men and women. This does not require an oppressive separation of the sexes. The annoying thing about this decision is that it was made in haste and could create turmoil at all levels as it arouses many questions and concerns. Will this decision apply to governmental offices? Will women have to deal only with women in the society and will the separation include workers in hospitals, police stations, universities and public transport? Will there be a directive to prohibit women from riding the same buses as men? Is it fair from the economic point of view at least? Are we approaching a stage where we can call a "social divorce."

60353. Abu Shusheh, Khayriyeh, "Painful Memories of a Palestinian Woman," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times. February 3, 1995. p. 5. On 12/29/1947, a couple of days before the new year, 47 years ago, a bomb exploded at the Damascus Gate entrance to Jerusalem's Old City. The burst mixed with the oranges to create one horrendous balloon, a horrifying image that can be seen in Walid Khalidi's book, "Before the Diaspora," which contains photos painful for many. One of the women to be hit by some of the shards from the bomb is from the Ayyad family and she lived to tell us her story. Um Sami Ayyad, from the village of Abu Dis near Jerusalem, said, "I was going to the market that day with my two sisters, Fatima, 19, and Ruqiyah, 6, and after shopping, we went to the bus stop. As we stood waiting, a car came by and stopped, and a young man wearing a dark blue jacket got out of the car, put two barrels on the ground, and then jumped back in the car, which sped off. All of a sudden the two barrels exploded, and from the strength of the explosion, I felt that I had lost my hearing. "I looked at my sisters, and Ruqiyah was on the ground. I thought I was not hurt, but Ruqiyah was. I then went to see Fatima, who asked me to get her some water, so I searched around and put it on her lips. After that, her body stopped moving. "I returned to Ruqiyah, she was standing up and then she fell. I did not know what to do, and thought that she too had died. I started to search my body, and found that my hand had gone into my chest due to the injury. But from the shock, I did not realize that I was injured. "I saw a young man whose...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

body was cut in half, his head on one side and his body on the other. I took the head and put it next to the body so that his parents could identify their son. I don't know how I did that, but I started to get gray hairs from that moment on. "I began searching the area, and found that oranges were mixed with body parts, even the donkeys had disappeared. I started calling out for help and a policeman came and carried my sister Ruqiyah who had been hit in the stomach. She lived until 1988, but my sister Fatima was hit in her heart and she died immediately. I went through a tobacco which used to be in the Russian Compound." Um Sami remembers that incident as if it happened just a few days ago and still bears the scars on her body.

The incident is commemorated every December in the press.
In 1986, Um Sami saw a newspaper which published a photo with a caption: "A Palestinian policeman carrying a little girl who died in the bombing incident." In fact, that little girl was Ruqiyah who lived until 1989. That year, Ruqiyah sent a letter to her sister from hospital asking whether anything was removed from her body after the bomb attack. Um Sami answered that this had happened in 1947 but she could not remember why. That was the last she heard from Ruqiyah before the latter passed away. But Halitha, Fatima's daughter, is not a mother of eight, and she always wished she had seen a picture of her mother, but she never did; she only has her mother's coat to remember her by.
As for the policeman who appears in the photo carrying Ruqiyah, his name is Al-Haj Hasam, aged 95, who now lives in Jordan. Khalidi and other writers on this period say the Irgun, an underground Jewish organization formed in 1935, was responsible for the bomb which resulted in the death of 17 people. Another writer says the Irgun was the first to use bombs in order to spread terror among the Arabs. [=]

60354. Abu-Lughod, Iliamah; Palestinian Human Rights Campaign. Afro-Americans Stand Up For Middle East Peace: Essentials of the Palestine Rights Campaign, 1980. pp. 53-55. [This is an adaptation of Iliamah Abu Lughod's testimony to a US Congressional Committee on 9/30/1975, during the most recent in-depth US hearings on the Palestine issue. Dr.
Abu Lughod, a professor at Northwestern University, is a member of the Palestinian National Council.]

More than 400 representatives of the dispersed Palestinian people convened in the first Palestine National Council (PNC) meeting in 5/1964. That Council meeting committed the Palestinian people to liberating their homeland, and there the Council decided to create the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) to represent and to express the will of the Palestinian people in that liberation process.

In the structure of the PLO, the Palestine National Council is the highest representative body of the Palestinian people. The Council is the authoritative body that establishes and promulgates national goals and policies. In its ranks are representatives of the Palestinian people both inside and outside the occupied territories, including representatives of the General Unions of Palestinian Workers, Women, Students and Writers; the Palestine Red Crescent; the Palestine Cinema and Arts Institution; and representatives of all the major Palestinian political and military organizations. In turn, the Council elects an Executive Committee which is equivalent to a government. The Executive Committee oversees different departments of the PLO that deal with health, welfare, education, arts and culture, diplomacy, and other affairs.

At present the Council has about 300 members representing broad sectors of the Palestinian people; the Executive Committee (of which Yasser Arafat is the Chairman) has 15 members. So long as the Executive Committee has the Council's confidence, it carries out its day-to-day tasks. The Executive Committee is permanently in session, and the Council meets only once a year or for special reasons when it deems this necessary.

The Palestine Liberation Organization has acquired the legitimacy of representing the Palestinian people. It acquired that legitimacy first from its own people; Palestinian associations, groups, and communities in the Arab world and the Israeli-occupied areas accept the formulation of their goals, the methods of achieving these goals, and the various edicts, rules, and regulations which the organization has issued as theirs.

Briefly, the primary goal which has been accepted is that of the liberation of Palestine, which entails the restoration of Palestinian national sovereignty over the entire Palestinian national homeland. The ultimate goal of the Palestine Liberation Organization is to establish a unitary, nonsectarian democratic state for all Palestinians irrespective of creed, national origin, or language. The Organization believes that such goals will be attained only through a national struggle patterned after the wars of national liberation waged by the formerly colonized.

In the conduct of that struggle, the Palestine Liberation Organization has sought and obtained the assistance of oppressed peoples throughout the world and further has obtained considerable support from established states that view Israel as an agent of the West in the Arab world. Thus the socialist system of power has supported the PLO; the Afro-Asian states have supported the Palestinians' struggle; and African and Latin American movements of national liberation have supported them as well. Considerable sectors of societies in the US and Western Europe also have extended support to the Palestinians, to the chagrin of their governments.

As a consequence of this broad international support and the active political campaigns of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the international community as it is legally organized in the UN conferred legitimacy on the Palestinian struggle as well as on the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. Initially the UN in 1948 recognized the rights of the Palestinian people to repatriation (Resolution 194); it has reaffirmed that right almost every subsequent year.

Beginning in 1969, as a direct consequence of the armed struggle of the Palestinian people and political support for the PLO from the socialist system of power and the Afro-Asian and some Euro-American powers, the General Assembly has recognized the status of the Palestinian people as a colonized people entitled to independence.
Several UN resolutions have affirmed the right of the Palestinian people to struggle by all means to attain independence. The culmination of steady recognition of the Palestinian struggle for independence and the legitimacy of the Palestine Liberation Organization as the representative of the Palestinian people came in 10-11/1974 when the UN General Assembly invited the Palestine Liberation Organization to attend the 29th session of the General Assembly and address it on the aspirations of the Palestinian people. After the address delivered by Yasser Arafat, chairman of the PLO's Executive Committee, and the ensuing debate, the General Assembly passed two historic resolutions. One recognized the right of the Palestinian people to independence and sovereignty in Palestine. The other conferred full Observer Status on the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. Today no fewer than 105 states in the world recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole representative of the Palestinians. [=]

a Government, Al-Wazir Will Work To Get Equal Rights and Justice For Minister of Social Affairs Intissar al-Wazir (Umm Jihad, widow of Khalil al-Wazir, known as Abu Jihad; he was assassinated by an Israeli death squard in 1988) is using her new position to push for equal rights for women in the traditionalist, male-dominated Palestinian society. Arafat promised to create a Department for Womens Affairs, and Umm Jihad plans to make sure that promise is fulfilled. Her initial work will be especially important, considering the restrictions on women upheld by the traditional culture. Arafat and al-Wazir have both been promised that by 1996 respect for women will be fully recognized in the new Palestinian state

60356. Ackerman, Gwen. "Netanyahu Wins Israeli Vote; Peres Loses stunning rejection of the Clinton-backed 'peace plan', Israeli voters have selected the most outspoken opponent of peace with the Palestinians as the new Prime Minister of Israel. Pres. Bill Clinton had actively campaigned for Peres, making the bias of his administration very clear to Israelis: the vote repudiates Clinton's intense and uncritical support for Peres.

The new Knesset will have: Labor 35 seats, Meterz 9 seats, Hadash 3 seats, Arab Democratic Party 2 seats, Yisrael with Immigration 6 seats, Third Way 4 seats, Shas-United Torah Judaism Party-National Religious Party 24 seats, Likud 31 seats, Moledet 3 seats.

The outgoing Knesset had: Labor 42 seats, Alex Goldfarb 1 seat, Meterz 12 seats, Yuvi 1 seat, Arab Democratic Party 2 seats, Hadash 3 seats, Yisrael with Immigration 6 seats, Third Way 4 seats, Shas-United Torah Judaism Party-National Religious Party 24 total, Likud 31 seats, Moledet 3 seats, Tzomet 5 seats, Yemin Yisrael 1 seat, Esther Salmovitch 1 seat.

60357. Adawin, Basima. "Young Witnesses", in Challenge, March-April, 1994. p. 5. Goldstein, a father of four children and a doctor, did not spare children. Seven-year-old Kifah Ja'afar Marafa was killed and 13 children were injured.

Five-year-old Musa'b Ja'abari is the most seriously wounded child. He has four bullets lodged in his body - in the chest, hips and legs. He lies quietly in stable condition at the Alia Hospital, but doesn't speak. Musa'b tried to hide behind a pillar but the bullets found him. His father, an ambulance driver for the Alia Hospital, did not know his son was wounded. His grandmother accompanied Musa'b to morning prayer, and now sits by his bed wondering why, after so many years that men and women have been praying in the same room, on that fateful morning the soldiers ordered women to pray in a separate room.

Ten-year-old Khamis Mahmoud Jamal was lucky - the bullet scratched his skull and just missed his brain, and he was clever enough to play dead. His 17-year-old brother was wounded in the leg. Recalling the events, Khamis enthusiastically explains a map of the al-Ibrahimiya Mosque, draws the movement of Goldstein and affirms that other settlers were helping load his M16 rifle. Khamis tried to escape through the doors, but the soldiers shot indiscriminately at those fleeing. On returning back into the mosque he was shot by a settler. He heard Goldstein cry in Hebrew - 'ze hasof shelachem (this is your end). The two men who were praying near him were killed. Khamis' father died four months ago. His mother lives in the Hiseb (vegetable market) and could not make it to the hospital on the first day, so Khamis was taken care of by his brothers.

In a somber painting Khamis drew the massacre with knives, machine guns, and chains surrounding the map of Palestine. A Palestinian flag is flying above the al-Ibrahimiya Mosque. From the corner an M16 is scattering bullets in all directions.

Palestinian children have gone through an endless chain of massacres, from Deir Yassin, through Sabra and Shatilla and the al-Aqsa massacres. Only a just peace can give these children a promise to end these tragedies.[=] 60358. Adv. Assaf. Interview: "Reverend Riah Abu El-Assal: Seeking Recognition, Part 7", in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 6. Question: You said that today everybody accepts that the Palestinians in Israel are part and parcel of the Palestinian people. Is it true that Arabs in Israel are engaged in a certain kind of withdrawal or lessening of concern regarding the Intifada?

Answer: It is a fact that there is less expression of solidarity than there was a few years ago. But the Intifada itself is not the same as it was a few years ago. Also, the Gulf conflict relegated the Arab-Israeli conflict to the margins: even the Intifada did not hit the news when people were busy with the Gulf. The Arab sector inside Israel did express solidarity with the Arab-Palestinians under occupation. But because of the crisis of leadership, even organized events for expressing support and solidarity were lacking. In our little school, for example, I appealed to all Arab schools in Israel to give one pencil and one notebook from every child to every child in the Occupied Territories. About three hundred and fifty of our school kids managed to bring twelve hundred pens and notebooks. But the Arab leaders' response to the action fell short of what we wanted.

In addition, more people are unemployed in the Arab sector. Many more people need help. This does not mean that when you do not have enough to support your brother, you do not have anything else to do with him. On the contrary, there is real concern that their pains are our pains, and their hopes are our hopes. There has been a revival of interests and hopes in the Palestinian struggle after the beginning of the peace talks. This is not true for all of us. Some of us have questions and queries and are not sure where we are going to end up with these talks. [=] two months.

It was supported most generously by the Church of Sweden Mission, also the Palestinian group in Deventer, and the german friends, Lutheran friends from Germany, and many others. So now, we really are almost ready to move into the new school. For safety considerations we chose to complete the basics on all parts of the building that would be needed by staff and students at the time we move in. The kindergarten wing and the entire ground floor of the elementary school wing are now at the stage of 'finish' work. That will make available formal conference space for teachers, officers for the staff, a bookstore and a large meeting room for workshops, and community meetings with parents and other groups as soon as we open. For the children it means typical, modern classrooms, a large play area for organized sports and free play, also completely safe from the possible hazards of an active construction site, since only the finish-work will remain when they arrive. For that to be accomplished, we ask you assistance for a final every-the-top push. Funds are both used up and overcommitted, a fiscal risk taken on behalf of maintaining our momentum to completion. We now again need money to pay for the last of the building materials for this 'move-in' stage of the construction: Plastering, painting, flooring, electrical light fixtures, etc. We also still need to connect with the civil water supply (about which negotiations have been very difficult and complicated) and to complete the toilet unit and its electric system. Some furnishing for the new rooms will be made locally, and we need money for the materials.

Once again, can you, will you help us? We are continuing to work long days to assure that every cent, pence, mark, shekal, etc., are wisely spent. But we need more of them for us to be able to really be able to use all that has come before. The last remaining needs are just that—complete necessities for the school to really come alive. Will you help it, and us, to live this new life? For a total of $10000, we can move in. For $20000 we can finish the package, including playground equipment. Toward these goals, we ask you to consider your means and our needs and give whatever you can. Donations of any amount will be very gratefully received and fruitfully applied. Thank you again for hearing our plea and responding.

Meanwhile, the school life goes on stimulating the growth and understanding of our West Bank students. We would like to share with you a look at some of our accomplishments and honors from our recent activities: In February, Alamal was visited by Rabbi Sheldon Lewis and a group from his congregation in California, and soon after by a group of Lutheran friends from Germany. Also our friend from Jerusalem, Joana Cooper-Ryam, brought international friends to see us. In March, we took two busloads of children and their mothers on a recreational excursion to the town of Jericho, Dead Sea and to some beautiful sites between them: all enjoyed the natural adventure. Also in March we received an Earthstewards visitor, John Snelling, from Portugal. He arrived on the day we celebrated Mother's Day with a program of plays and games as one of 19 Bethlehem area schools [one line lost]. Looking ahead, we have firm plans for exciting events. First our summer camp for learning and support the school. Without such independence the unique peace-related activities could not be-activities like field trips for parents and children into cooperative contact situations with their Jewish counterparts inside Israel and Hebrew lessons for Palestinian parents, to help reduce fears by promoting communication with Israelis. But with such independence, we have also responsibility of complete self-support, because of no political or religious funding. Most of the parents, many still residents of refugee camps, remain poor. So we rely for assistance on a small expanding group of friends from many nations and backrounds— including Christian Ministers from Sweden and Germany friends, and many friends from Switzerland, and from Holland friends, who are working for peace and justice, as well as Jewish rabbis from Israel and California. They support us because the center and the school are the bright blossoms in the desert that was described the desert of despair. Rather he has felt motivated to work in these ways for good childhood, for it is the wealthy tomorrow. The path of the school to become an independent- one. We have no political and nor formal religious affiliation; both Christian and Muslim families attend and support the school. Without such independence the unique peace-related activities could not be-activities like field trips for parents and children into cooperative contact situations with their Jewish counterparts inside Israel and Hebrew lessons for Palestinian parents, to help reduce fears by promoting communication with Israelis. But with such independence, we have also responsibility of complete self-support, because of no political or religious funding. Most of the parents, many still residents of refugee camps, remain poor. So we rely for assistance on a small expanding group of friends from many nations and backrounds including Christian Ministers from Sweden and Germany friends, and many friends from Switzerland, and from Holland friends, who are working for peace and justice, as well as Jewish rabbis from Israel and California. They support us because the center and the school are the bright blossoms in the desert that was described the desert of despair. Rather he has felt motivated to work in these ways for good childhood, for it is the wealthy tomorrow. The path of the school to become an independent- one. We have no political and nor formal religious affiliation; both Christian and Muslim families attend and support the school. Without such independence the unique peace-related activities could not be-activities like field trips for parents and children into cooperative contact situations with their Jewish counterparts inside Israel and Hebrew lessons for Palestinian parents, to help reduce fears by promoting communication with Israelis. But with such independence, we have also responsibility of complete self-support, because of no political or religious funding. Most of the parents, many still residents of refugee camps, remain poor. So we rely for assistance on a small expanding group of friends from many nations and backrounds including Christian Ministers from Sweden and Germany friends, and many friends from Switzerland, and from Holland friends, who are working for peace and justice, as well as Jewish rabbis from Israel and California. They support us because the center and the school are the bright blossoms in the desert that was described the desert of despair. Rather he has felt motivated to work in these ways for good childhood, for it is the wealthy tomorrow. The path of the school to become an independent- one. We have no political and nor formal religious affiliation; both Christian and Muslim families attend and support the school. Without such independence the unique peace-related activities could not be-activities like field trips for parents and children into cooperative contact situations with their Jewish counterparts inside Israel and Hebrew lessons for Palestinian parents, to help reduce fears by promoting communication with Israelis. But with such independence, we have also responsibility of complete self-support, because of no political or religious funding. Most of the parents, many still residents of refugee camps, remain poor. So we rely for assistance on a small expanding group of friends from many nations and backrounds including Christian Ministers from Sweden and Germany friends, and many friends from Switzerland, and from Holland friends, who are working for peace and justice, as well as Jewish rabbis from Israel and California. They support us because the center and the school are the bright blossoms in the desert that was described the desert of despair. Rather he has felt motivated to work in these ways for good childhood, for it is the wealthy tomorrow. democracy and Middle East peace-building. You would be most welcome to contact us, to visit school and to join our efforts toward exchanging views instead of violence, building bridges for peace. [-]

60364. Al-Amal Child Care Center. Press Release: First Anniversary of the Peace Accord. Bethlehem: Al-Amal Child Care Center [Post Office Box 732, West Bank via Israel; tel: 972-2-74-1628; fax: 972-2-74-7084], September 24, 1994. Warming relations with the Jewish neighbors, having been silent these past few months. All of my energy has been devoted to supervising the construction of our new school building on our new land. And that investment of energy has paid off in a way that I hope will please and excite you, as much as it piqueases and excite me. The big news, the beautiful fruit of all our labors, is here: We have seven new classrooms completed and almost ready for occupancy. We have accomplished completely the substructure of the entire L-shaped building that will eventually house another 20 classrooms. (The concrete for the final action was poured last week.) Levelling of the ground for the play area is almost complete. It is a magnificent accomplishment, and we can all be very proud. Thank you for helping me to make it possible. At the same time that I am very happy and proud about our achievement, and also feel sad and frustrated about not being able to share more of it with you. I would love for you to come to visit, to see for yourself the miracle in the hills below Bethlehem. Perhaps you cannot imagine the difficulty of accomplishing even minor projects in the West Bank, and this is such a major one, it is sometimes a suprise even to myself that we have done it. I would like to send you photos and floor plans to help convey all our progress, the result (on the ground) of all our work. But at present we have no resources for doing that, though we plan to do so as soon as we can. Our financial situation at the moment is as desperate as ever. In order to reach the present stage of completion on the construction, all of our resources to date have gone into that, including the students enrollment fees for the last week.

For reasons that are not clear to us, the flow of donations was reduced drastically during the summer, so that our cash situation becomes very critical in the faces of mounting construction costs. (But costs, let us assure you, were strictly minimized by rigorous attention to PLO. But there is no real understanding with the Jewish neighbors so far. Some time ago, whoever has contacts with Israelis was suspected of being a collaborator. Hussein Issa had contacts them. His car was burnt as well as the school bus that brings the school children to school. Hussein’s contacts however were not private ones but part of his concept for the school. Peace education--this was the motto, when back in 1984 he built a house not only for his family of six, but also some appeal for funds to institutional sources were unsuccessful--more about this below.

So we are in need of operating funds, probably more in need than at any other time, because, with little income in the summer, we accepted loans that must now begin to be repaid. Thanks ALLAH that we had the loans, but now we must find a way to make them good. We have sought support from every source that we learned about, but recent efforts have yielded few results so far, though our requests are still under consideration in some places. We want to acknowledge here the special help of our Dutch friends and their work to gain us assistance from a Dutch NGO, CEBEMO, and also our Swedish friends instrumental in the assistance we received from the Church of Sweden mission. If you know of a group or institution in your country that might have charitable goal in Palestine, please do bring ALAMAL Center to their attention. Among our critical remaining needs for the new school are connecting the water and telephone. The total cost of these needs will be about $3000. We still need window panes, doors and light fixtures for some of the completed classrooms. Each stage of our expansion presented its problems. We have, with your ongoing help, surmounted them. We remain confident that we will do so again, and ask you again--humbly, hopefully for the most generous help you can give. We remain committed to the vision that you share with us of promoting peaceful relations among all the people of our region by teaching peace to the children and their parents both in the classrooms and by activities that involve them without fear in the larger, multi-cultural world. To do this we still need your help.

Let me clarify that we are not yet in a position to receive help from the newly created Palestinian Authority. Their focus remains in Gaza Strip and Jericho, where international news coverage will have told you there are problems that challenge the new entity’s capacity. Though it is supposed to begin to administer educational functions in the whole West Bank before long, there is no expectation that this will involve an infusion of of money, nor ease in any other significant way the difficulties of functioning as a private school here.

Finally, may I say a word about the demands that beautiful people like you in the developed world face in terms of requests for help from all the world’s disasters. My heart also breaks for abject disruption and privation of so many lives in Bosnia, Rwanda and elsewhere. But I beg you not to forget Palestine as being still a place of immense pressure, including widespread dstritution, a decrepit infrastructure, and the persistent violence of an occupation and resistance to it. There have been openings in the situation that justify hope, but the road to freedom and democracy and peace is still long, and we too still need. The West Bank as a whole has seen no single benefit, save occasional spiritual uplift, from last September’s accord. Tanks again for receiving our news and our please. May your own way be blessed with peace. To all our Jewish friends we wish special blessings in your holy seasons of new year. May we all have a sweet year.

PS-The way to donate to ALAMAL whenever you can, is to send a check by registered air mail letter to ALAMAL Child Care Center, or send the donation to ALAMAL Child Care Center, Account 118451, Mercantile Discount Bank, Bethlehem, West Bank, via Israel. [-]

60365. Al-Amal Child Care Center; Simon, Jurgen. Press Release: Al-Amal: A School For Peace: A Utopia Started in Bethlehem Ten Years Ago. Bethlehem: Al-Amal Child Care Center [Post Office Box 732, West Bank via Israel; tel: 972-2-74-1628; fax: 972-2-74-7084], November 1994. Bethlehem is a tourist attraction not only at Christmas time, The whole year busloads of pilgrims crowd Manger Square as well as the narrow steps to the grotto in the Church of Nativity. Many shops sell cribis, mary and Joseph, shepherds and sheep from olive wood. Icons, Souvenirs and devotional items. Bethlehem lives on tourism. This is why everything seems to be more peaceful here compared to other places on the Occupied West Bank. Nevertheless, the Israeli occupants remain the enemy for a certain part of the Palestinian population. The time of the Intifadah, the uprising against the occupation has ended since the agreement on ‘Gaza and Jerischo first’ was signed by Israel and the PLO. But there is no real understanding with the Jewish neighbors so far. Some time ago, whoever has contacts with Israelis was suspected of being a collaborator. Hussein Issa had contacts them. His car was burnt as well as the school bus that brings the school children to school. Hussein’s contacts however were not private ones but part of his concept for the school. Peace education--this was the motto, when back in 1984 he built a house not only for his family of six, but also some rooms in the basement where he taught children to read and write and to count. In the meantime, his center Al-Amal has become a model how to exchange views instead of violence, building bridges for peace. [=] Finally, may I say a word about the demands that beautiful people like you in the developed world face in terms of requests for help from all the world’s disasters. My heart also breaks for abject disruption and privation of so many lives in Bosnia, Rwanda and elsewhere. But I beg you not to forget Palestine as being still a place of immense pressure, including widespread dstritution, a decrepit infrastructure, and the persistent violence of an occupation and resistance to it. There have been openings in the situation that justify hope, but the road to freedom and democracy and peace is still long, and we too still need. The West Bank as a whole has seen no single benefit, save occasional spiritual uplift, from last September’s accord. Tanks again for receiving our news and our please. May your own way be blessed with peace. To all our Jewish friends we wish special blessings in your holy seasons of new year. May we all have a sweet year.

The school lessons are very similar to those in every other place of the world: opening the books, reading and writing, copying the floor 1994. Bethlehem is a tourist attraction not only at Christmas time. The West Bank as a whole has seen no single benefit, save occasional spiritual uplift, from last September’s accord. Tanks again for receiving our news and our please. May your own way be blessed with peace. To all our Jewish friends we wish special blessings in your holy seasons of new year. May we all have a sweet year.

PS-The way to donate to ALAMAL whenever you can, is to send a check by registered air mail letter to ALAMAL Child Care Center, or send the donation to ALAMAL Child Care Center, Account 118451, Mercantile Discount Bank, Bethlehem, West Bank, via Israel. [-]

82
expansion of Hussein’s house some years ago is no longer big enough. Therefore, he started building a new school with six classrooms outside of the city center. The parents of the children cannot afford to build a new school. This is why the school needs the donations of Jews from Jerusalem who view the project as a chance for peacemaking, as well as Christians in Sweden, the Netherlands, the USA and Germany. Hussein has finished the carcass of the school buildings, which will hold 12 classes. Now, it needs more donations to buy tables and chairs, blackboards and doors... He is moving on without resting. For the Palestinian Authority that is presently taking over responsibility for the educational system from the Israeli administration. His school can be a real model not only from the educational point of view but also from the economic one. [The author, Jurgen Simon, is an editor at the Central Office of the Press Service of the Evangelical Church in Germany in Frankfurt.] [==]

60366. Al-Asi, Mohammad. “Zionist Gridlock on the American System”, in Crescent International, September 1-15, 1996. p. 7. [Mohammad al-Asi is the Elected Imam of the Islamic Center in Washington, DC, from which he was forcibly evicted by armed guards, hired by the minions of the Saudi regime. He has led the Juma’ Prayers outside on the pavement since 1983.] Bill Clinton’s democratic administration is the most pro-Israel the Americans have ever had. For the first time in US history, there are four Jews in the US cabinet; Mickey Kantor (commerce); Robert Rubin (treasury); Dan Glickman (agriculture); and Robert Reich (labor). The chairman of the US Federal Reserve Board, Alan Greenspan, is also a Jew, as is the director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), John Deutch. The Jews also occupy several high-profile positions in the State department. They are riding high in this Jew-to-the-bone administration. The US ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk, is also a red, white and blue Jew. The Jews are now so well-entrenched in decision-making posts that they brag about it in their periodicals - in Israel and the US. Obviously, they would not mind a second term for Clinton, who is their political slave. Clinton has become the “yes, master” president of the alright Jewish lobby. This does not mean that the shrewd Jew is going to place all his eggs in the Democratic party’s basket, even though 400 Jewish delegates will attend the Democratic party convention in Chicago. Vice president Al Gore had an opening reception sponsored by the National Jewish Democratic Council and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). There was also a “welcome home” reception for Hillary Clinton sponsored by the Chicago Jewish community, and a “Clinton-Gore Leadership Council” luncheon, attended among others by Mickey Kantor. The selection of Jack Kemp as the running mate of Bob Dole is an obvious concession by republican leaders to the powerful Jewish lobby in the country of the “brave and free.” Here is how the Jewish press put it: “The day after Mr. Kemp’s selection was announced, the former congressman and quarterback from Buffalo, NY, visited with the Jewish supporters at a reception sponsored by AIPAC and the National Jewish Coalition [and said] “Tonight, with you, we are like mishpocha (family); Joanne and I will never forget who was there when the going was tough.”

“The following day, Monday, Mr. Kemp spoke by telephone with prime minister Netanyahu. “It’s perfect,” exulted a Republican [Jewish] pollster.... ‘Kemp’s basically Jewish. Dole couldn’t have picked a better candidate, for America or for the Jews. He’s just phenomenal.’ "...On a range of issues, Mr. Kemp’s track record is likely to appeal to Jews. ‘Jack is known as a very strong pro-Israel Republican,’ said a senator McConnell, a Republican from Kentucky. “It was Mr. Kemp, after all, who once faulted Mr. Dole for having a ‘blame Israel first mentality.’ ‘Mr. Kemp’s own pro-Israel credentials are impeccable. He’s particularly close to Mr. Netanyahu. As secretary of Housing and Urban Development during the Bush administration, Mr. Kemp infuriated president Bush’s secretary of State, James Baker, by travelling to the Israeli embassy in Washington to meet with Ariel Sharon, then housing minister, who feuded with Mr. Baker over the issue of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.”...[Mr. Kemp] has long been an advocate of opening up the Republican Party to minorities and city dwellers. At a receptions sponsored by AIPAC and the National Jewish Coalition, Mr. Kemp wished the crowd mazel tov (good luck) and shalom, shalom, shalom, y’alil. “Mr. Kemp’s ties to the National Jewish Coalition, a group of Jewish Republicans, are particularly close. The NJC’s executive director, Matthew Brooks, cut his political teeth on Mr. Kemp’s 1988 presidential campaign, and Mr. Kemp has joined the NJC on at least one ski retreat.” If Bob Dole is so weak as to appease the Jewish lobby by giving in to this pressure, then Mr. Dole should be removed from the race. It is time to find out a replacement for Mr. Kemp’s role in the NJC. [Mr. Kemp has joined the NJC on at least one ski retreat]." If Bob Dole is so weak as to appease the Jewish lobby by giving in to this pressure, then Mr. Dole should be removed from the race. It is time to find out a replacement for Mr. Kemp’s role in the NJC. [Mr. Kemp has joined the NJC on at least one ski retreat]."

60367. Al-Ayam. “Feature: Intifada Generation in the Legislative Council”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 2, 1996, p. 7. The results of the recent Palestinian elections made clear that the impact of the intifada on Palestinian awareness is an ongoing phenomenon. The primary measure that electors depend on to clarify their election choices is the combative measure of candidates. Marwan Barghouthi, the secretary of the higher movement of Fateh movement in the West Bank, and a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council said: “This combative measure appeared particularly during the intifada.” Barghouthi headed student council at Bir Zeit university for two consecutive periods. At that time, the student movement was the primary vehicle of the Palestinian struggle, and paved the way for the eruption of the intifada later. The student movement appeared at the time when Israeli authorities thought it had landed a knockout blow at the Palestinian National/Movement after it arrested and expatriated a number of its prominent leaders. Thousands were arrested, hundreds expeled. Barghouthi experienced both forms of punishment. Between 1978-1987, he spent nine years in prison. He was deported for another seven years. It was a geographical prison. Barghouthi nevertheless continued to organize and lead the intifada. “The generation of the intifada is like an army that requires everything.” With these words, Barghouthi described the present situation of the intifada youth. “Do not forget that this generation was born under the Israeli occupation and grew up during the intifada. Therefore, this generation is the most persistent and determined on the issue of liberation. It does not and will not accept less than liberation. This generation is filled with ambition. It strives to have an education system from the Israeli administration. His school can be a real model not only from the educational point of view but also from the economic one. [The author, Jurgen Simon, is an editor at the Central Office of the Press Service of the Evangelical Church in Germany in Frankfurt.] [==] efficient and qualified candidates." His victory surprised some in Ramallah. He entered the elections as an independent candidate, with minimal funds to publicise his campaign. His only asset, in a sense, was the sentence of fourteen years he received for leading an armed cell in the early eighties. The reputation he gained from his role as a leader of Jneid prison colleagues. Despite changes in the political situation, the combative experiences of the prisoners movement are still ingrained in the minds of people. This, he felt, played a crucial role in ensuring his election. Jamal Shobaki, whose name was closely related with the "Daboya" operation in 1980, received storming applause when his name was mentioned during the electoral campaign in the suburbs of Hebron. His house in "Ithna" village was blown up following the operation, and he was imprisoned for eight years. "Our struggle over the years created a state of solidarity and loyalty between us," said Al-Shobaki. Muhammad Horani was another Hebron candidate. He was imprisoned shortly after finishing high school. He spent a short time in prison, after which he left to study Psychology in Bulgaria. Due to the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982, Horani plunged into defending the revolution, along with thousands of students from all over the world. After three years, when he decided to come back to the homeland, he was taken from the Allenby Bridge to prison. During the intifada, he spent three years in prison at An-Naqub prison. "I believe my election is a gesture of loyalty from the people, the combative value was a strategic accumulation," he posted. In Jerusalem, Ahmad Al-Batsh was the head of the Palestinian Legislative Council. His physical appearance gives the impression that he is a quiet person. Anyone who knows him says that he hardly loses his composure. Once he lost his control and bit the investigator at the Russian compound. As a result, he spent eight years instead of seven in prison. He led an escape attempt from "Kifar yuna" prison in which three people were captured. During his last period of detention, in Ramallah prison in 1993, Al-Batsh was severely tortured. Credibility in dealing with people is considered a primary aspect of gaining their confidence. It is not enough to be a prisoner and just expect support. The main factor in electing the most efficient candidate mainly rests on peoples' awareness. The common issue amongst the candidates is the intifada experience. They have a common bond binding them to each other, along with the thousands of people who experienced arrest, oppression and expulsion. This "collective" past played a crucial role in cultivating their awareness, as well as informing their vision of the present and future. At the same time, because the winners understand who form the biggest part of their constituency, this should establish itself as one of their priorities, as new representatives. The new legislative council must address the most important question, of what to do with the generation of intifada in particular, and the people in general? Muhammad Al-Harani considers the solution is the provision of job opportunities for the youth. He strongly emphasized the need for practical and vocational rehabilitation, as well as the necessity of their involvement in the production sector. Jamal Al-Shobaki said that the Legislative Council should enact laws to attract Palestinian and Arab investment. In this, the council should make efforts to secure political and security stability, which will in turn help in attracting economical and developmental projects. Marwan Barghouti emphasized the necessity of opening sporting and cultural youth clubs, as well as increasing support to the Ministry of Youth and Sports. Due to widespread youth unemployment, thousands are in the Palestinian National Authority's police and security institutions, as these are the only options. Some members believe that this will lead to inflation in the institutions, as usually happens elsewhere. It will impact on future economic development, due to large budgets required by these institutions. It will also have social and behavioral impacts, increasing the likelihood of the recruitment of people at the expense of political and religious institutions. Al-Batsh posited "It is absolutely necessary to provide anyone who is willing to join these institutions with comprehensive training and cultural courses so as to be a productive worker."

The "new council" acknowledges the enormous duties ahead. They are preparing themselves to play an essential role to achieve these duties. Accordingly, they posit their first duty is the final negotiations, seen as the most important, in that it will determine the destiny of the people. Barghouti says that they will use their mandate to ensure support for Palestinians in the negotiations. Horani adds, "The council strongly identifies with Palestinian issues, with Jerusalem as the paramount issue. " The "big battle," as it is called by some members, will be completed on an internal front of the battleground. A major theme that has emerged is the necessity of beginning the building process of the democratic civilized society. Through symposiums and meetings held during the electoral campaigns, it emerged people long for a democratic and free state. "It is a natural demand," and, says Qadwah Fares, "Our people suffered many years of pain, to realize their desire to having a democratic state." The councils should establish this democratic system by enacting the necessary laws, through which Palestinians can present their concerns before the entire world, which will be unable to ignore it as in the past. Al-Batsh posits another priority relating to Jerusalem, namely that the isolation imposed on Jerusalem should be lifted, a constant political in nature, not security-based, as Israel claims. This cordons disrupts the health, economic, social, and educational life for Palestinians in the city. Al-Batsh talked about the deteriorating situation in twelve Palestinian villages north of Jerusalem, and the bad situation of the Bedouins living in Jerusalem, and the necessity of improving their living situation in ways suited to their social environment. He also mentioned that close attention should be given to improve and develop the rural areas of prisoners and the closing of their files should be resolved. Furthermore, the issue of gender reparations for women should be up for discussion, with Al-Batsh advocating they should be accorded full rights and compensated for previous years of deprivation. Moreover, close attention should be given to improving the conditions for refugees, and their was also the necessity for securing the right of return for those expelled or forbidden from coming back for various reasons. The members confirmed that it would exert maximum pressure to make the Legislative Council effective in achieving a qualitative and concrete change in the lives of Palestinians. One final issue for consideration was that of the actual performance of the members, and their ability to implement policy through committees with experts, and use their experiences to provide results. This is one issue on which everybody would be willing to offer assistance. [==]

A Civil Administration officer said that investors had to prove serious intent in order to obtain a license. They also had to give assurances that many laborers would be employed, to help alleviate the financial misery in the occupied territories. If the investor is a Palestinian living in exile, the size of the investment must be a minimum of $100000. The investor is given a one-year residency permit, according to the Civil Administration officer.

The Civil Administration officer added that once seriousness of intent is proven, the investor is issued a West Bank identity card, and also for his family in case he is married.

The owner of the Amal Factory, Malak Tawfiq Hammoud, said she had produced clothing items since 1985 before going into the interior decoration business. She explained that in 1990 she applied for a license to set up a plant in Ramallah because of the good terms. "This plant will provide 40 Palestinian families with work," she said.

Asked why she believed she had received a license, she said that the present peace talks were a factor. She added that there have been changes within the Civil Administration, and that a recent appointment proved to be more open to her request.

Daoud Hussein Najm, the owner of a paints factory, said he applied for a license in 1992 and was asked by the Civil Administration to provide a blueprint for the factory.

He said construction will take between 10 and 12 months and will provide work for 42 to 45 workers in the first stage.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Asking why he decided to set up a factory in the West Bank, Najm said that he did not believe that his wares could compete with Israeli goods in the market, nor with wares in East Jerusalem, but that he had plenty of clients in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Approved factory owners are also lucky enough to be issued licenses to travel beyond the “green line,” the Civil Administration announced.

Since the beginning of the year, some 84 licenses for new factories have been issued. [=]

Maher Abu Srour: Date martyred: 7/1/93; Age: 20; Residency: Aida RC, Bethlehem; Circumstances: Shot after hijacking Egged bus.
Muhammad Hindi: Date martyred: 7/1/93; Age: 12; Residency: Jabalya RC, Gaza Strip; Circumstances: Shot after hijacking Egged bus.
Ala Niser: Date martyred: 7/6/93; Age: 6; Residency: Al-Bireh; Circumstances: Run over by Israeli vehicle.
Safir Shaath: Date martyred: 7/8/93; Age: 22; Residency: Rafah, Gaza Strip; Circumstances: Assassinated by undercover units.
Ashraf Hamamreh: Date martyred: 7/10/93; Age: 16; Residency: Dhahiriya, Hebron; Circumstances: Died of wounds sustained in demonstrations a week before.
Isam Salah: Date martyred: 7/12/93; Age: 19; Residency: Balata RC, Nablus; Circumstances: Shot by soldiers.
Muhammad Mughrabbi: Date martyred: 7/12/93; Age: 19; Residency: Balata RC; Circumstances: Shot by soldiers.
Ibrahim Samara: Date martyred: 7/14/93; Age: 23; Residency: Al-Bireh; Circumstances: Shot by undercover units.
Ahmed Abu Ilayan: Date martyred: 7/15/93; Age: 92; Residency: Bani Suhaila, Gaza Strip; Circumstances: Run over by army vehicle.
Fathi Abu Khader: Date martyred: 7/16/93; Age: 49; Residency: Rafah; Circumstances: Shot by soldiers.
Izzat Matar: Date martyred: 7/20/93; Age: 9; Residency: Jabalya RC; Circumstances: Shot by soldiers.
Suleiman Arafat: Date martyred: 7/20/93; Age: 16; Residency: Abasan, Gaza Strip; Circumstances: Shot by soldiers.
Aziz Zuheikah: Date martyred: 7/21/93; Age: 21; Residency: Sawahra a-Sha’iq, Jerusalem; Circumstances: Died of heart attack during army chase. [=] 60370. Al-Isawi, Tarek. “Survivors of Shelling Cannot Forget The Horror; Hameedeh Deeb Screams In Pain From Her Hospital Bed After Doctors Amputated Her Left Leg and Right Arm. Severely Damaged By Israeli Shelling”, in Seattle Post-Intelligencer, April 23, 1996. p. A2. The Qana massacre killed over a hundred civilians, shattering families, butchering and maiming refugees. Many people's bodies disintegrated as other refugees and rescue workers tried to save them. Still without an official death toll, many bodies were vaporized by the repeated Israeli attacks on the refugees in the UNIFIL camp. Most of the deaths came as Israeli 155mm shells slammed repeatedly into a large mess hall. Many surviving children had multiple amputations.

Throughout most of the world, the arrival of the New Year on 1/1/1997 represents a new beginning of an opportunity to reflect on days gone by and look forward to those yet to come. Taking into account the dismal economic and political situation in most of the Palestinian Territories, one would assume that the majority of Palestinians would have welcomed the arrival of the Islamic New Year on 5/8/1997. Unfortunately, one would be wrong: too many years of occupation and Western influence have finally succeeded in reducing an important date on the Islamic calendar to one of little, if any, real significance for the majority of Palestinian Muslims. Before delving into the matter further, it is perhaps necessary to take a closer look at the religiously sanctioned system of dating in Islam, according to which the arrival–according to the Gregorian Calendar–of the Islamic New Year differs from year to year. The aforementioned system of dating is one of purely lunar months. Therefore, a year comprises 354 days and the months do not correspond to the seasons of the solar year. With regard to the reasons for establishing an Islamic calendar, the Muslim era is computed from the Prophet Muhammad's migration of Hijra from Mecca to Medina, which took place in September 622AD; although the Islamic year actually began on the first day of the lunar year in which the migration took place, for example, 7/16/622 AD. At present, the Hijra year is used mainly for religious purposes and many Palestinians, particularly those of the younger generation, would be hard pressed to give today's date using the Islamic calendar. Having established why the Islamic New Year arrives when it does, it is now pertinent to ask what makes it so special? How is it celebrated? What does it mean to different people? To find answers to these questions, I interviewed a large group of people of varying ages and backgrounds–with surprising and alarming, results. Admittedly, some of the more informed individuals I met with spoke of various customs associated with New Year, but these, it appears, are rapidly dying out. The customs that do still exist include the exchange of sweets among family members and neighbors, including the special New Year sweet, mushabak, which is eaten in the hope that the coming year will be as sweet as the delicacy itself. Several interviewees also mentioned the habit of eating some kind of “green” main course, such as sabaan (spinach) or wara dawali (stuffed vine leaves), symbolizing productivity and fertility, and of hanging something green over the door, such as an olive branch, to ensure peace and prosperity throughout the year. One of the dishes that must not be eaten, however, is maqloub (upside down). As it is believed, that by turning the saucepan, the cook will also turn her family’s life upside down, and not necessarily for the better. Part of the blame for the ignorance surrounding the Islamic New Year must be placed with the schools: according to students, very little is taught about the Islamic calendar in general and the less known religious festivals in particular. Blame should also be put on the Palestinian National Authority for doing so little to promote interest in the Islamic holidays: yet since the end of the Intifada, most of Palestine’s larger towns have taken to arranging large-scale Christian new year parties, with the Palestinian National Authority’s approval, on 12/31/1997. The response of 18-year-old Jerusalem resident Mariam Dahbour, to my question concerning the Islamic New Year, was typical. She said: “To be quite honest, I feel ashamed that I am so unfamiliar with the Islamic calendar, and I find it very sad. Palestinian society seems to become more and more Westernized with each passing year, and I don’t expect it will be too long before more of our customs and traditions are forgotten. “I feel particularly ashamed because my family, like many others, makes such a big deal out of the Christian New Year. We do not attend special parties, but we always stay up late and, come twelve o’clock, turn out the lights for a whole minute while silently asking God to show us his bounty and protect us during the year ahead, before ringing our friends and relatives to wish them a happy new year. Although I believe this is harmless in itself, there is certainly a need for us to return to our Islamic roots and to be more alert to the dangers of succumbing to the Western-Israeli influence with which we are threatened on a daily basis.” Mariam’s sister, two years her junior, appeared even less informed about the Islamic New Year and expressed surprise that, at the time of the interview, its arrival was imminent. “Really?” she asked. “That’s great! At least we can stay at home and do some extra studying during army chase.”

It should be noted that both Mariam and her sister are reasonably educated and come from an average religious family. So what could be done to promote the Islamic New Year as a religious festival and national holiday? Mariam replied: “Whatever we do, one thing is for certain. The holiday should be promoted to such an extent that, in the eyes of Muslims, it replaces the Christian New Year. More and more of my friends and their families are attending Western-style New Year parties. At such parties, there is an extraordinary amount of pressure on people to conform by drinking alcohol, which is totally against our Islamic principles. Many Muslim women feel self-conscious until they dress in a Western manner. Muslims believe that by attending such parties, they are being progressive and open minded. "In Palestine, there is this peculiar concept that "West is best."" Mariam continued, "But from what I have seen so far, this is not the case. We should feel proud of our Arab and Islamic customs, traditions and heritage. I believe it is up to educators, including those in charge of the Palestinian National Authority, and the different religious organizations to ensure that more is done to revive this important date in Islamic history." [-]

60372. Al-Shomali, Yacoub. "In Cold Blood, Part 1", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 17. Everyone knows that a murderer tries to create lies in order to conceal the truth. He tries to overwhelm the truth with doubts in order to weaken its conviction, and attempts to shatter arguments against him in order to escape from the hand of justice. By the same token, the family of the victim endeavors to present reality, convinced that truth alone can defeat the injustice - especially when the case seems to be as incontestable as is our family's case.

Let us give voice to the events so that they may speak for themselves; declaring the truth needs none other than honest expression. We hope that local and world opinion will understand that people with a living conscience cannot be silent about crimes committed under a "legal" pretext founded on hatred and nurtured by a government whose evils may soon spread to other nations like a fire feeding itself.

This calamity began at six in the evening on 5/2/92 - a Saturday. At this time, 22-year-old Anton al-Shomali was returning home from Bethlehem University. He quickly descended a steep hill to avoid harm from the enemy soldiers, and seeing tires ablaze at the entrance to the city, he decided to take a path far away from the location of the trouble. He maneuvered a few kilometers away from the area where the tires were burning, as he felt he was a constant target for the enemy. He was young, and mere youth is a crime. He was also a university student and every student is subject to chase - he himself having twice been a victim of torture in prison. He did not want to hasten death, for there were many family responsibilities awaiting him. His father was born with a paralyzed leg and a paralyzed arm. He aspired to be his father's arm and wanted his father to walk with his leg. This is why he devoted himself to his studies and was a distinguished student, having earned a full scholarship from the university.

In his hasty descent, Anton ran past two heavily armed border guards. He was unaware of their presence, did not carry a green identity card, and wore no mask. Witnesses saw the two soldiers arguing with each other as Anton surrendered with his hands up, one of them saying that shooting was unwarranted. He did not resist when one of the soldiers effortlessly held him while the second shot him from the side through his lungs and heart. The murder happened in cold blood on a main street lined with hundreds of inhabited houses. [-] 60373. Al-Shomali, Yacoub. "In Cold Blood, Part 2", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 17. Together, the soldiers dragged him and threw him down at the side of the road. They left him there without help, nor did they call an ambulance to take him to a hospital. He lay there with blood flowing from his wounds, until the neighbors were sure the soldiers had left the site of the crime. They took him to a Christian Holy Land Mission hospital in Bethlehem, and from there to the Maqassed Hospital on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem. But it was too late. He died on arrival, another soul who yearns for the attention of the world, that it may realize the suffering of our people under Israeli occupation.

The family quickly moved the body to the center of the church, to avoid the soldiers' attempts to snatch it for tedious and lengthy bargaining under the pretext of an autopsy. The autopsy might be better performed on the conscience of the killers.

The army surrounded the church and shot tear gas into the area, thus preventing the priest from delivering a eulogy and depriving the faithful from casting their last look on the martyr before his burial. More tear gas was sprayed on the funeral procession, making the people feel that death pursues them even after death. The army ignored our traditions, barring us from performing our duty to the dead. They gave heed to none, not even the handicapped father of the martyr.

During the month of mourning, the army barred many people from paying condolences to the family. They broke into the father's home and ransacked it, even tearing the martyrs picture. All of this was followed by a period of curfews, during which time we were barred four times from attending worship services in our church. The Israelis' claim that they are the protectors of freedom of religion leaves many questions unanswered. It is evident to the people that the Israeli occupation seeks to do more than commit murder, but also insists on stifling every human emotion and killing the spirit of fellowship among the Palestinians. [-]

60374. Al-Shomali, Yacoub. "In Cold Blood, Part 3", in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 17. We have taken our case to the Israeli courts, but we have no faith in the justice of the occupation. We know that the suspect will simply enter one door and exit another. Yet we are consoled by our faith in the cause, and in the honor our family received by giving yet another martyr to the struggle. We are consoled by the knowledge that injustice has a shorter life than justice, and by our belief in the nobility of our aims: to be liberated and to establish our independent state. Only when these goals are realized will the souls of our martyrs find rest.

[Translation: Dalia Habash] [Y'a'oub al-Shomali is a writer and a member of the al-Shomali family. Immediately after the killing, the family called upon Att. Tamar Peleg of the Association of Civil Rights in Israel, to initiate legal procedures. On 6/1/92 the investigation was removed from the local Bethlehem Police to higher authorities within the Ministry of Police, which is responsible for the Border Guard Unit.] [-]

60375. Aleis, Fady. "Election contest begins in Ramallah constituency", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 7. Throughout the West Bank and Gaza there are hundreds of candidates vying for the 88 seats on the Palestinian Legislative Council. The constituencies have been allocated a certain number of seat each. The Ramallah and Al Bireh district has been allotted seven seats; six Muslim seats and one Christian. There are over 40 candidates competing for these seven seats. The candidates are either independent or part of the Fatah coalition, which has a central program. The candidates concentrate their campaigns on a personal political level aside as well as the central campaign. TJT interviewed the five most prominent candidates to find out their campaign agendas. Abdul Jawad Salah, former Mayor of Al Bireh and member of the PLO central committee, is running as an independent candidate. His campaign agenda concentrates on Palestinian human rights, including all the legal and social aspects, the evacuation of the settlers from the West Bank and Gaza, and the return of all Palestinian refugees. In a speech presented in Al Bir, he declared that, "All Palestinian refugees must return as have Soviet Jews who don't own an inch of this land. Furthermore, without the water issue being resolved and the total evacuation of settlers from the West Bank and Gaza, there will be no peace." Ghazi Hanania, a gynecologist and a candidate for the Christian seat in the Fatah coalition, was asked to reveal his political campaign: "There are many fundamental issues to be dealt with aside from the issue of settlements and Jerusalem. These are considered personal issues relating to the daily affairs of the people. They are: the security of the citizen; an increase in labor wages; the improvement in economic conditions, including the construction of factories. In the health sector, there must be an expansion of rooms in hospitals as well as introducing modern equipment to operating rooms and intensive care wards." Azmi Shueibi, former minister of youth and sports and a member of the Palestinian Democratic Union (FIDA), divided his campaign into political, social, economical and educational aspects. Concerning the political aspect, he emphasized the necessity of "implementing the peace agreement until the end of the second stage of the negotiations and to guarantee the building of a Palestinian state." Discussing social issues, he said, "There must be equal rights for all and they must participate in building Palestinian Institutions."

Lastly, he commented on economic and educational matters: "The economy must be based around the free market and concerning education, there is a desperate need for philosophers, writers, children and the handicapped to be given the opportunity to express themselves. Rabiba Diab, head of the Association of Women's Committees for Social Work, and a member of the Fatah Higher Command is running as part of the Fatah coalition. Discussing her personal campaign agenda, she said: “The first and foremost issue I will concentrate on is that of women and children. Currently in my work, I travel to remote villages to educate illiterate mothers about their legal rights. Aside from this, I have children’s centers in each village where I also educate and give workshops about child development. My present work will become the basis for the future work if and when I am elected. In addition, I will support the issue of prisoners and those Palestinians who were wounded during the Intifada. These people have the right to carry on a normal life as everyone else. I will work to secure their freedom and offer them adequate medical care.” Buthaina Duqnaq, an attorney and the head of labor management in the Jerusalem Medical Equipment Co., is running as an independent: “My priorities are to work for a democratic system that includes freedom of speech, equal rights for all, religious tolerance and ensure the future Palestinian state will give importance to those who were injured during the Intifada. Also, the law must be implemented equally over all people and justice must exclude military courts and a states of emergency must never occur in Palestinian Society.” [—]

60376. Alin, Erika G. "West Bank and Gaza Palestinians and the Peace Process", in Journal of Critical Studies of Iran & the Middle East, Fall 1993. pp. 13-34. In 1991 direct Arab-Israeli peace talks started for the first time in 40 years, following the years of the Intifadah which brought greater attention onto the Gaza Strip and West Bank. The talks were based on the Palestinian willingness, as the weakest party, to compromise on being represented by the PLO. However, Palestinian opposition to the peace process has been considerable: many Palestinian question whether the present peace process is capable of resulting in a meaningful fulfillment of their national aspirations. Palestinian nationalism has emerged as a consequence of the inability of Arab states to successfully confront Israeli military power. By 1974, the Palestine National Council endorsed the principle that a Palestinian state could exist only within the Occupied Territories. Similarly, in the mid-1970s, in the Occupied Territories, the emergence of a large migratory Palestinian work force undermined the traditional rural sociopolitical order, and led to a radicalized urban nationalism among Palestinians. By the end of the 1970s, this led to the spontaneous emergence of a broad spectrum of local and community organizations in the Occupied Territories, including student, youth, professional, volunteer, labor and women’s committees. These provided the training ground for independent Palestinian national development. By the early 1980s, Palestinians were coming to recognize that the only basis for an independent Palestine would be political compromise with Israel: much of this was rooted in the belief (documented by Abdul-Sattar Kassem in 1982) that for much of the Arab world the issue of the Palestinians was unimportant. The Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the emergence of the Intifadah solidified the Gaza and West Bank Palestinians focus on a political settlement with Israel: just as the invasion limited the ability of the PLO of affect events in the Occupied Territories, the Intifadah deepened the growth of independent institutional development. The 1980s saw a sustained effort by West Bank and Gaza intellectuals to both shift the public perception of the PLO towards that of a diplomatic organization, and to shift the willingness of Palestinians to accept a political compromise. While Palestinians were divided as to whether or not the Madrid conference was desirable, in general factions among Palestinians on this question reflected the underlying factions within the Palestinian nationalist movement: in general, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza were skeptical about the peace process being able to fulfill their national aspirations. In addition, Palestinian suspicions were reinforced by Israeli unwillingness to slow the pace of new illegal settlements and by Israeli insistence on a very limited form of Palestinian autonomy. The US also gave Israel $10 billion in loan guarantees without requiring Israel to end settlement expansion. The Madrid process required the Palestinians to begin with a whole series of major concessions before the start of talks: hence, for many Palestinians the major effect of the Madrid talks was to call into question the legitimacy and the judgement of the PLO. Further, the mass expulsion of 400 Palestinians during the peace talks, and the Hamas condemnation of the PLO as a consequence of the deportations, again led to questioning of the role of the PLO in the talks. Even if the peace process leads to elections, it is clear that the PLO will probably lose in free elections.

60377. Aloni, Shulamit. “This is a day of mourning - MP Shulamit Aloni: A speech in the Knesset on the inauguration of the new government”, in Challenge, July, 1990. pp. 2-3. So, after all, there is a government. Finally, there is a government. However, Mister Prime Minister, today is not a day of joy, but a day of deep anxiety. Today is not a day of rejoicing, but a day of mourning; not a festival, but a fiasco. We have before us a government most of whose members are seditious money-grabbers. Its ministers are adolescent and ruled by trickery, as we have seen. In their own eyes they are the smart ones and to themselves they appear full of sense; all their deeds, of the majority of them, are a race after power and riches. They convert law to lawlessness, the rule of law to the rule of force and blackmail directs their moves.

So, after all, gentlemen, there is a government, a national government. Where, in the democratic world today, would a government call itself a national government, a national-patriotic government? Here, where mere citizenship is held in contempt and where, by force of law, we are faced with segregation, discrimination and strict separation of various ethnic groups. What future can the non-Jewish citizens of the state expect from the national patriotic government? What future does this national government promise to the people under military rule in the Occupied Territories for 23 years - a people with no civil rights, no human rights, no future and no hope, when the threat of mass deportation, transfer, which has found itself a place and support in this government, hovers over their heads? What is the character of this national patriotic government which wants to build anew the Third Temple?

What is the character of this national government which wants to build anew the Third Temple on the expanse of the Greater Land of Israel? Gentlemen, doesn't this call to mind the aspiration for expansion of the Third Reich at the expense of the Slavic peoples? Is it possible to grow and to expand at the expense of others only by the use of force? [Chairman demands Aloni to withdraw from the comparison to the Third Reich. Aloni does.]

Let's talk about the expansion of Pilsudsky towards a Greater Poland, and of Mussolini towards a Greater Italy. Irridentism. That is the meaning of the Greater Land of Israel. I will take back the reference to the expansion of the Third Reich at the expense of the Slavs. You said no to peace. You put constraints around our necks and now you are going to exterminate, to uproot, to silence the intifada. What does this mean - to exterminate, to silence and to uproot the intifada without talking peace, without making peace, without recognizing the rights of the others? Doesn't this mean suppressing by force to the bitter end a people who want what we wanted, when we were few and just: to be like every people, to be like every human being, masters of our fate? How will you exterminate? With pesticides? Are you going to perform another Deir Yassin to all the inhabitants of the West Bank? Will you blow up the mosques and build the Temple for presenting sacrifices? You are already preparing Cohanim (priests) for the job! Do you think the world will be silent because we are the Chosen People or maybe because they have guilt feelings towards us? How much longer can we milk the subject of anti-semitism in the service of continued colonialism? Is the Christian world going to be silent? Say it is. Is the Arab world going to be silent?

Are you going to say about this government that the people chose it, that the people authorized you to send our children like mercenaries against civilians, women and children? Did you receive our authorization to drag us into another war and bloodshed?

You were alone in power from 1981 to 1984. What did you accomplish in those years? You ruined the social fabric, you were responsible for terrible inflation, you invaded Lebanon to create a new order in the Middle East, for the sake of the Kingdom of Greater Israel. Now you have bought your power by whoring and bribing at the cost of the destruction of general education, the destruction of health, the abandonment of the weaker parts of the society, of development towns and the aged. You bought your power by whoring and profiteering at the expense of the development of science and research. And all this for the sake of the Greater Land of Israel, for the sake of the Kingdom of Greater Israel. And, in fact you are endangering the Third Temple, the glorious creation of the Jewish people after 2000 years - the State of Israel.

In the whirlpool of your constraints, your arrogance, your huge appetite, you have dragged Israel, which had been developed, democratic, down to the status of the worst of the third world states. What kind of tomorrow does this inflated, this insular national government promise to us and our children?

The Lubavitcher Rebbe and Rabbi Shach and the rest of those conjurers and sorcerers have become the lords of this land. Remember them? They are the ones who justified the Holocaust, the monstrous murder of six million Jews, a million and a half of them children. They will also find a justification for the destruction of our Hebrew culture and the murder of our children for the sake of their Torah scholars, for the sake of their yeshivot, and for the sake of their Hasidim whirling on the graves of rabbis on every hill, on every hill and under every blooming tree.

... But you, those of you - and there are a lot - who were partners in the war of independence and the creation of Hebrew culture, the rebirth of the Hebrew language, you who once spoke about law and justice and the freedom of man, how can you be ready to endanger all that we built here and all that could be built here in these crucial days of large Aliya from the Soviet Union, for the sake of a vain dream of greatness?

How is it that you deliver yourselves to this eccentric from New York, the modern Shabbatai Zvi [a false messiah] and to the deceitful rule of Gush Emunim? How is it that you put over your own head and ours the restless "constrainer", the man of war steeped in blood from Qibya to Lebanon; and his hand is yet stretched forth?

A voice of dread rises from all over the land before your collective countenance and before your way of buying votes for your rule. This voice of dread rises before the memory of the war in Lebanon and the disintegration that came with rampant inflation.

We feel and we hope that this very voice of cry and dread will become the strength that will give us the power to stop you, to sober up and to prevent your attempt at the expansion of the Greater Land of Israel, which can not come about at the expense of others in the modern world. And this voice will come, and may it come upon us before the catastrophe which your government heralds. May it be so.

Shulamit Aloni, founder of the Citizens Rights Movement spoke at the Knesset on June 11 1990. [Translation: Judith Green] [^]

The author wishes to express his indebtedness to Mr. Abraham G. Duker for his generous cooperation in the preparation of this work, to Messrs. Louis Shub and Milton Himmelfarb for their assistance in editing and to Miss Rose A. Herzog for technical assistance. [=]

60380. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M. Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 03: 'The Wandering Jew’. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. "I wandered through town and country. They drowned me with wormwood and choked me with gall, they poured poison in my wounds, and made my bed on thorns, and when I would have laid down my head to rest, they made the ground tremble beneath me, and when I uplifted my complaisances they stuffed my mouth with fiery embers. In every place to which I directed my footsteps they seized me by the hair, collected wood in a pile, and thrust me into the flames. When will it end, o Lord? . . . Where the bonds of ice have been massacred or will have died of starvation and disease." -- These words were uttered by Ahasuerus, the legendary personification in Christian lore of the Wandering Jew, in Berthold Auerbach's Spinoza, written a hundred years ago. According to the legend, Ahasuerus, because he had refused to succor Jesus on his road to Golgotha, had been condemned to eternal life and everlasting wandering, thus becoming the symbol of the Jewish nation. In the light of this legend, Judaism remains aloof; it does not merge into its surroundings; it is detached from them to live forever. But as soon as it takes root in one part of the world, the will of history flings the Jewish people into another. Jews are destined to wander, always.

We may be permitted to doubt the accuracy of these propositions. True, the "everlastingness," the presentation of the national individuality of the Jewish people, can be observed throughout its entire history. The few instances in which Jews were given the opportunity, not only formally but actually, to share completely in the life of the general populations, are not enough to make any general conclusions regarding the future adjustment. Still greater doubts can be raised concerning the truth of the second half of this statement—the everlasting wanderings of the Eternal Jew. The history of the Jewish people has been called the story of its vicissitudes. Correct—but to a great extent this applies to all nations and peoples.

The story of the whole of mankind is a story of migrations. A conspicuous example of the truth of this assertion is the United States, about forty million people having come here from Europe since 1800. The map of Europe is the product of migrations. We learned in school of the "Great Peoples' Migration," which preceded and followed the fall of Rome and is reflected in the sixth chapter of Genesis. The subsequent history of Europe has seen continued ethnic movements and changes. Let us compare the situation now and approximately 1000 years ago, four centuries after the end of the Great Migration. In 900, there was not a single German in the Berlin of today, and in modern Moscow, not one Russian. Madrid was an insignificant Moorish hamlet; in Ankara and in Constantinople—there were no Turks, in Budapest—no Hungarians.

Wandering, as we see, is certainly not a peculiarity of the Jewish people alone. Many a nation has retained in its folklore the memory of its trek in prehistoric times. Its legends tell us how large its population had become, that the land could not provide enough food for all, and how the people had to leave it, to seek a new and better country. Every child learns in Sunday School about the wanderings of the Jews which began centuries ago; the migration of Abraham to Canaan, Jacob's sojourn in Egypt, the exodus of the tribes of Israel, their forty years of trial in the desert, the conquest of the Promised Land and subsequent Jewish migrations.

"And Abram was very rich in cattle. And Lot also, who went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together; for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle.... And Abram said unto Lot: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we are brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt go to the left hand, then I will go to the right, or if thou take the right hand, then I will go to the left." -- This may be a true historical episode from the life of the forefathers of the Jews of today. In any case, it represents a typical social-economic stage in the development of a cattle-breeding people: the need of the group to split up, and the search for larger pastures by the newly formed sub-groups. Other typical phenomena in the history of mankind are subjugation, liberation from servitude and, above all, armed conflict and the conquest of new territories to live on.

The ancient Jews recorded in the Bible various incidents of their history, though not always in exact chronological order. However, the primeval wanderings of other nations lie beyond the border of history. As Horace has said in his immortal Odes, "They are covered by the eternal blackness of oblivion, because the singer who could have told us about them had not been born." Only archaeology with its study of skeletal fragments, weapons and household utensils, the religious symbols and artistic creations of the dim past, has been able to shed light on and trace the paths taken by those wandering peoples.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
Religious History of the Jews the reason why Jewish migrations did not establish any Jewish political centers: "Unlike the Puritans, the Jews could not go out and find for themselves a new empire. Not having the backing of any state, totally lacking in political or military power, they could not have embarked upon any large scale colonization, even if their aversion to statehood and their peculiar economic stratification had not precluded any such ambition. More like the French Huguenots, in the main a class of merchants and artisans, they applied for admission to the neighboring civilized countries."

The first Jewish attempt to create a political body by means of migration is being made at the present time in Palestine.

Migrations play an important part in the social and economic life of every nation. The German census of 1925 included the question: "Where were you living on 8/1/1914?" It appeared from the answers that one-fifth of Germany's population in 1925 resided in places different from their domiciles in 1914. Between 1914-1925 more than 9 million people moved from one town or province to another. Examples like this should help to change our conception of a "fixed" population.

In peace time, millions of people migrate every year from their own village, town, province, or continent. The migratory movement is at the time perpetual, universal, and partial. The illusion of the immobility of nations arises from the fact that migrations affect only a fraction of each one, at a given time. However, migrations never cease within nations.

It seldom happens that a nation in its migration moves en bloc. The wandering of entire nations is as much a myth, as is the immobility of peoples. Ethnical groups do not set out as units in this perpetual motion which only changes outwardly, and which continues throughout the history of mankind. It is the steady migration of members of groups, as individuals or en masse, which constantly breaks down old communities and forms new ones.

Along with the sudden shifting of large masses, passing like a hurricane over the earth, migrations of small groups to nearby places have also taken place at all times. It is the cumulative effect of these smaller migratory movements that has in the past, as well as in our times, created the migrations of nations. Friedrich Ratzel, the father of anthropogeography, wrote: "History is too one sided with regard to the so called migrations of peoples; it regards them as rare phenomena, historical storms, uncommon exceptions, which stir the peace in the every day life of nations. This way of looking at historical movements resembles the now discarded 'catastrophic' theory in geology. In the history of nations, as in the history of the earth, we should set out with the preconceived idea that great effects are produced by great causes. In human history, too, we must take into consideration the effects of the steady process of movement of small forces, which by accumulation become great ones."

Every emigrant usually has some reason for leaving his place of residence. Some migrate because they are unable to find work at home. Others do so in order to get better jobs. Sometimes constant humiliation and persecution because of race, nationality or religion impel people to leave. Sometimes, the hope of finding better investments for their small capital is the inducement to emigrate, and the example of relatives who have been successful abroad serves as the chief attraction.

As in all social phenomena, we can detect here, too, basic patterns and motives. These motives are either "pushing" from, like the flight of Jews from Hitler, or "pulling" towards—the rush of gold seekers into California. Forces that "push and pull" can be further classified, according to their nature, as economic, political, religious, military, and the like. But these forces bring forth migrations only when they are sufficiently powerful to offset the desire of the people to remain where they are. In other words, the propulsive force prevails over the power of inertia. A migration is the result of the "push and pull" between two territories. It takes place when there is a strong enough attractive force from one side, or an expelling force from the other. On the whole, a migration is the result of the reciprocal action between these two forces.

The main factor in the "push and pull" is economic. People go to places where living conditions are better. Science puts it this way: The migratory movement is the result of a differential pressure of population. The migratory stream flows from places where reciprocal relations between means of existence and the number of the population are unpropitious, to places where this correlation is actually or potentially more favorable.

But we should not exaggerate the importance of the economic motive. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the steppe men of Southern Russia were besieged by a nomadic horde, the evacuation of Kiev and the adjacent regions shifted northward, to the Muscovy provinces. They exchanged a rich, abundant land for dark forests and infertile swamps. It is possible to say that, however inhospitable those new places were, they presented easier means of subsistence than the old ones, under the incessant menace of invading tribes. It would be more accurate, however, to state that the main reason for this particular migration was strategic, the attraction of a locality well protected by forests. History knows still more vivid examples of migrations prompted by non-economic motives. Spanish Marranos (forced Jewish converts to Catholicism), French Huguenots, English Dissidents, left a comfortable, often rich living for an unknown future, in order to be able freely and openly to profess their faith.

Whatever the fundamental motives for emigration or the fate of these emigrant groups in their new places, they all left a land economically limited for one with more economic space. The Marranos abandoned Spain, then on the decline, and turned towards the flourishing Netherlands. Huguenots fled from a France devastated by the wars of Louis XIV, to the Netherlands, then on the rise economically, and to Germany, with its still scanty population and growing industry. English Dissidents left England with its limited possibilities for America, the land of potential opportunities.

We should add that in many instances the economic factor played an important role, though on the surface the reasons for migration were religious and political. The persecution of Protestant Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIV was carried out under the slogan of "admission to the neighboring civilized countries." Of Kiev and the adjacent regions shifted northward, to the Muscovy provinces. They exchanged a rich, abundant land for dark forests and infertile swamps. It is possible to say that, however inhospitable those new places were, they presented easier means of subsistence than the old ones, under the incessant menace of invading tribes. It would be more accurate, however, to state that the main reason for this particular migration was strategic, the attraction of a locality well protected by forests. History knows still more vivid examples of migrations prompted by non-economic motives. Spanish Marranos (forced Jewish converts to Catholicism), French Huguenots, English Dissidents, left a comfortable, often rich living for an unknown future, in order to be able freely and openly to profess their faith.

Whatever the fundamental motives for emigration or the fate of these emigrant groups in their new places, they all left a land economically limited for one with more economic space. The Marranos abandoned Spain, then on the decline, and turned towards the flourishing Netherlands. Huguenots fled from a France devastated by the wars of Louis XIV, to the Netherlands, then on the rise economically, and to Germany, with its still scanty population and growing industry. English Dissidents left England with its limited possibilities for America, the land of potential opportunities.

In Jewish migrations, the economic factor played a decisive role in an overt as well as in a concealed form. Kings who welcomed the Jews did not conceal the fact that they expected in return profits for themselves and their subordinates. Those who expelled Jews or drove them to flight, uncouthly spoke of their "spiritual motives" and the impossibility for pious Christians to live peacefully side by side with the enemies of Christ. We should not minimize the significance of religious fanaticism, intertwined with "racial" enmity, but the economic motive was manifested in the very acts of violence. Not only did the mobs kill Jews, but they also pillaged their belongings. The kings who confiscated the properties of the Jews before they expelled them, followed the same procedure. Both acted, in the words of a pious chronicler, "more out of greed, than for God's righteousness." And, if we substitute "domination by a superior race" for "God's righteousness," the reflection of the chronicler on the German pogromists 800 years ago, will apply as well to their descendants today. The Teutons of today are indeed worthy of their forefathers. [=] simple natural forces are obscured by historical events and at the same time serve to demarcate various historical epochs.

The wanderings of the Jewish people for the most part correspond to the world-wide currents of migrations in any given period. For apart from specific factors applying to Jews only, general conditions of migration also influence the trend of Jewish wanderings. This generalization is modified by the fact that the Jewish people has experienced a total "push and pull," and to that degree its migrations have differed from the general trend prevailing at any given time.

Let us examine this relationship since the time the Jews were a settled agricultural nation in Palestine.

The Jewish State in the Holy Land had long been a corridor between Mesopotamia and Asia Minor on the one side, and Egypt on the other. We know but little of the structure, character, and tendency of the human streams which flowed through that corridor in the ancient world. We are acquainted only with their outward manifestations, such as military campaigns and political expansion. Palestine was an outpost of equal importance to the great empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia and Macedonia. All these powers at one time or another sought to assure their domination of this strategic area by seizing Palestine and by shifting its population. Thus came about the first mass deportation of Jews from Palestine in 721 B.C.E., when the Kingdom of Israel in the North was conquered by the Assyrians. 27,000 Jews were deported to different parts of the Assyrian Empire, and foreigners were settled in their places. During the years 597-586 B.C.E., the Southern Kingdom of Judaea came under Egyptian hegemony and in 586, it was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylonia. It was at this point that much of the Jewish population was deported and settled in different parts of the great empire. This mass deportation is represented in the Bible as the banishment of practically the whole of the country's Jewish population, but modern findings indicate that the biblical account is exaggerated.

Enforced transfer of population was often practiced by Eastern despots. In the course of time, this governmental measure was applied less often and finally was no longer practiced. 2500 years later the Nazis revived this practice in the most brutal fashion.

"By the rivers of Babylon, There sat we down, yea, we wept," says the Psalmist. At first, the Jews did not End it easy to adjust themselves to Babylonian captivity. Soon, however, they entered the economic life of Babylon, and acquired much of its rich culture. Their position improved still more after Babylon was incorporated in the Persian Empire. When the Jews were finally permitted to return to Palestine, and Ezra reestablished the Temple at Jerusalem, only a small number of exiles followed him.

The subsequent history of Babylonia Jewry is a denial of the theory of the external character of Jewish wandering. Constantly reinforced by new adherents and numerous Jewish immigrants, the Babylonian community remained for more than a thousand years even after the destruction of the Second Temple, a center of religion and culture for all Judaism.

We usually link the creation of the Diaspora with the great historical disaster of the destruction of the Temple by Vespasian and Titus in 70 C.E. It was then that the uprising of the Jews against Roman imperialism was crushed, and much of the Jewish population of the Holy Land was taken in slavery and scattered throughout the Roman Empire. But, although this political catastrophe culminated in an enforced mass emigration to the West, a movement in this direction had been in swing long before the destruction of the Temple.

The philosopher Philo asserted in the second century that the Jews constituted one-half of mankind. Other writers of that period tell us of the millions of Jews inhabiting the Roman Empire.

Students of demography are distrustful of such general figures given when statistics was not the science that it is today. The science of demography, however, endeavors to make use of data which might have been known to the ancient contemporaries, as a basis for its own calculations. For instance, the size of the army of the Crusaders was estimated on the basis of a story by an eyewitness who described the length of time which it took them to cross a certain bridge in Palestine, still in existence today.

Records of taxes prove to be the most valuable sources for population statistics. True, tax collectors were usually inclined to exaggerate the number of tax payers, while the Jewish communities were prone to underestimate them. Though usually incomplete and often fragmentary, records are being used successfully to estimate the number of Jews in different countries and periods of history.

The estimates by writers of the Roman Empire of the existence of millions of Jews are a proof of the fact that the number of Jews was large enough to elicit amazement on the part of their contemporaries. It is possible that the huge Jewish population of the Roman Empire was the consequence of emigration of Jews from the East. Still it cannot be completely explained without taking into consideration the mass proselytism of pagans. Judaism was then a missionary religion. It is not our task to discuss the theories of the mass conversion to Judaism of Phoenicians and Carthaginians, nations spread throughout the Empire and closely related to Jews by descent and particularly, language. It is sufficient to say that Jewish proselytism was extremely active until the second century, when Christianity began to spread amongst the heathens and the erstwhile pagan converts to Judaism.

As a result of migrations and conversions at the zenith of the Roman Empire, Jewish communities stretched in a long chain along the African and European coasts of the Mediterranean, and penetrated deep into the European continent. Thus, Jews inhabited Cologne and Treves long before the Germans invaded the Roman provinces bordering on the Rhine.

A new large-scale Jewish migration, influenced by the movement of the Arabs, began in the eighth century. In the reign of Mohammad's successors, Arab tribes united by the warring missionary zeal of Islam left their desert peninsula to spread in two directions, westward along the cost of Northern Africa, through Gibraltar, to Spain and France; and eastward through Palestine, Syria, Iraq and Iran to the Caucasus and the Pamir mountains in Central Asia. Their terrific pressure profoundly affected the populations of the three continents. With the exception of the earliest campaigns, the Arabs were in the minority in this victorious march of the prophet's conquering armies. Their bulk was composed of peoples conquered by the earlier converts and carried onward by the Arab torrent for further conquests. The Arab-Moorish armies which had vanquished Spain were composed chiefly of African Berbers. Such was their commander in chief, Tarik, whose name was given to Gibraltar—Gibr-al-Tarik, the Bridge of Tarik.

The Arab expansion could not fail to affect the Jews. Caliphate, which established law and order in its enormous territory, opened up new outlets and lent a wider scope for economic activities. Jews reached the Caucasus together with the Arab invaders. Here they came in contact with the Khazars, whose upper classes as a result embraced Judaism. Together with these, the Jews penetrated into the vast lands of the Slavs, some of whom were vassals of the conquering Khazars.

In their western migration, Jews settled mainly among the Mohammedans of Spain. In the East, the Caliphate of Bagdad was weakening under the growing pressure of the nomadic Turks. As early as the end of the ninth century, an exodus of Jews started, therefore, from the East to Northern 16

Africa and Spain. True, until the twelfth century the majority of Jews still lived in the East, but simultaneously, on the Iberian peninsula, a new population and cultural center of Judaism was rising. Formed under Arab rule, it held its ground for centuries after the greater part of Spain was reconquered by Christians.

In the eighth century, Jews, along with the Arabs, had already passed beyond the Pyrenees, to Provence. Then they moved on northward beyond the Arab conquered territories, down the Rhine to England, and up the Danube to the Slavic East. In the tenth century, Jewish merchants from the West encountered in Kiev their coreligionists coming from the East.

The Jewish people who settled in Christian Europe were driven to a new and tragic migration in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. First, the hordes of the First Crusade perpetrated pogroms on an unprecedented scale in the name of a merciful God. The chronicler in his description of the subsequent extermination of these bands in Hungary and in Asia Minor, intimating that this was God's punishment for the atrocities committed by the Crusaders against the Jews. Since then, persecution of Jews became a permanent part of the social and political life of Christian Europe. Pretexts for pogroms such as the blood libel and desecration of the host frequently made their appearance. In the cities, the rising Christian and handicraft guilds deprived the Jews of the possibility of making a living. Jews, therefore, moved eastward beyond the Elbe and settled in Poland.

Jewish emigration to the East was determined, however, not only by the desire to escape persecution, but also by the general population "pull" towards Eastern Europe. The twelfth to the fourteenth century saw a great German colonizing migration to the Slavic East. Germans went as conquerors. They also came as colonists on the invitation of Slavic princes, who wished to have their territories settled and developed. Agrarian colonization went hand in hand with urban settlement. Cities and settlements of newly arrived merchants and artisans sprang up. In many cases Jews were the pioneers in this urban migration in which they took part, the same as the Germans. Every man with some skill or capital was a valuable acquisition, and Jews were therefore welcome guests in Poland.

German colonization came to a halt in the fourteenth century. But the Jews, fleeing from persecution in Western Europe, continued to move along the paths that had been blazed. Jewish pogroms in the West reached their culmination in 1349-1351, during the terrible epidemic of the Black Death, when Jews were accused of plotting the death of Christians by poisoning wells.

Previously, toward the end of the thirteenth century, they had been exiled from England, and in the fourteenth century from France. Their treatment in the German feudal domains usually followed a twofold pattern: first they would be admitted, so that they might prosper and provide substantial revenues; then they would be banished so that the rulers might appropriate their property for themselves. Indeed, the analogy of the Wandering Jew may with justice be applied to the Jews resident in Western Europe during that period. In Poland, however, Jews remained comparatively untroubled for many centuries. From there, they spread throughout Lithuania and the Ukraine, then parts of the Polish State. Here a new Jewish center came into being. It replaced the Spanish center, which came to an end in 1492.

Four decisive events took place in the second half of the fifteenth century. They were the capture of Constantinople by the Turks (1453); the fall of Granada, the last outpost of Islam on the Iberian peninsula, the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, and the discovery of America, the last three events taking place in 1492. These are closely linked. During the preceding two centuries, the Turks had established themselves in the Near East. They had cut off Europe from the East, deprived her of trade connections, and, penetrating deeper into the North, they threatened to curtail Christian Europe's "living space." Their gigantic blows were felt throughout the continent. Spain, deprived of her political and economic influence in the Mediterranean, was forced to seek other outlets; she therefore drove the Moors back into Africa and began to search for new trade routes. The material effects of the discovery of the new continent were not felt immediately. Previously the Spaniards, following the line of least resistance, had endeavored to expand their "living space" partially at the expense of the Jews. A century of persecution was climaxed by a Royal Decree of 1492, ordering Jews to choose between Christianity and exile.

As a consequence of intermittent persecution, thousands of Jews in Spain had already adopted Catholicism. Many had done so only in appearance and secrecy continued to practice Judaism. It is estimated that there were in Spain 250000 Jews who practiced their religion openly at the time of the expulsion decree. 50000, preferring to remain in Spain, embraced the Christian faith. The rest left the country. Thousands of exiles perished at sea, en route to their new homes. A smaller number settled in the Netherlands, where the Jewish colony was to play an important part in the cultural life of the Jewish people, as well as in the economic history of Europe. However, Marranos continued to leave Spain in a small but steady stream for several centuries thereafter. The largest group among the Spanish Jews, about 100000, settled in the Turkish Empire.

It was a historical irony that Jews, banished from Spain, should find themselves, after a roundabout journey in the very same country—Turkey, whose blows made the whole of Europe tremble. Jews gained a footing in the economic life of the Balkans and the Near East. In the face of the growing might of Russia, its nationalism, and its great power on the Bosphorus. The conquerors did not, however, have a commercial-industrial class of their own. Jews ably supplied this want, and served in this capacity for a long time. Turkey became the promised land for Jews, who streamed into the Ottoman Empire from all parts of Western and Middle Europe. The Jews of Spanish origin, however, predominated.

Thus, beginning with the fifteenth century, a new center of Judaism arose in Turkey. In turn, Turkish pressure gave rise in the middle of the seventeenth century to a new emigration from the largest Jewish center, the Polish-Lithuanian area, back to Western Europe.

The intensive colonization of the Ukraine began in the sixteenth century. The landowners were Poles, and the peasants, Ukrainians. The Jews were the administrators and middlemen. As the oppression by the Polish landowners increased, many peasants fled their serfdom by retreating further into the steppes and becoming free roving Cossacks. They lived on cattle and robbery of neighboring territories. The Turkish sultan, who controlled the Black Sea coast, brought pressure to bear on the Polish government to take rigorous steps against the Cossacks. In answer, the Cossacks rebelled against Poland in 1648, under the command of their national hero Bohdan Chmielnicki, and in alliance with the Tartars, subjects of the sultan. This campaign brought with it a general rising of the peasants of the Ukraine, which in turn resulted in a mass slaughter of Jews.

This was the first blow that spurred the Jews to move back to the West. But the roots of the movement lay deeper. Poland had lost her domination over Eastern Europe. Centuries of expansion gave way to centuries of political retreat in the face of the growing might of Russia, and of an economic decline which deeply affected the Jews for the worse. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Polish Jews therefore emigrated in small but steady numbers to Germany, where they were given no rights and were subject to humiliation. The partition of Poland toward the end of the eighteenth century brought many Jews under the rule of Prussia, and, incidentally, nearer to Western Europe. Actually, however, it was only from the time of Jewish emancipation in the German states in the middle of the nineteenth century, that emigration to the West opened wide vistas for the Jews. The Jews stood between the peasant and the nobleman in Poland. They form one fourth of the population, they are engaged in all kinds of trades, and so they can call themselves the third estate of Poland. Therefore, our editors of statistical manuals, who apply to everything a French or a German measure, are completely in the wrong when they write that Poland does not have its tiers etat. True, that class of people is sharply separated from the others, and its members are busy commenting incorrectly on the Old Testament. True, this class is outwardly still far from reaching the bourgeois ideal. But all the same, by their number and their standing Jews in Poland have a greater political economic significance than in Germany.

Jewish emigration continued. But the Jews, fleeing from persecution in Western Europe, continued to move along the paths that had been blazed. Jewish pogroms in the West reached their culmination in 1349-1351, during the terrible epidemic of the Black Death, when Jews were accused of plotting the death of Christians by poisoning wells.
Simultaneously, Galician Jews began to move to Vienna as well as to Germany. Many Eastern European Jews fleeing from the Pale of Settlement (that area of the Russian Ukraine, Lithuania and Poland in which the immense majority of Russian Jews were forced to live), also settled in Germany, particularly after the pogroms of 1905. Investigations made in various parts of Germany showed that 10-30% of the employed Jewish population had been born abroad. In the case of Saxony this proportion was 50%. Alsatian Jews, who preferred to live under France following the annexation in 1871 of Alsace Lorraine by Germany following the Franco-Prussian war, settled mainly in Paris. Germany was not the only European country to which Eastern European Jews emigrated. Many went to the great cities of the West. Especially after the pogroms of the 1880s, migration was directed more and more to London. In 1880 there were less than 100000 Jews in England; towards the end of the century, that figure had more than doubled. Paris also became a center of migration for Eastern European Jews. The final destination of both the general and Jewish migrations of the nineteenth century was the Western Hemisphere. The migration of masses of Europeans to great industrial centers and the process of colonizing the New World are closely linked. Together with the export of capital, large numbers of Europeans went to these comparatively still unsettled countries and step by step built up new wealth and prosperity for their old and new fatherslands. At the same time, these 40 million emigrants eased the population pressure in the thickly populated countries of Europe. The immigrants helped to create new means of existence for the quickly growing populations of the new countries, as well as of Europe. Vast spaces of rich and fertile land in North America, Latin America, South Africa, and Australia became populated. The development of navigation facilitated the transport of wheat, meat, minerals and cotton. Europe acquired new sources of cheap food and inexpensive raw materials, and became more and more industrialized. The new countries also served as markets for European industrial production, which, in return, sent to Europe the products of their rural economy. Jews played an important role in this industrial boom of Western Europe.

When Heine wrote these lines in the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Jews were indeed the “third estate” of Poland, a poor and humiliated class. And yet Polish-Lithuanian Jewry, by the virtue of its numbers and religious and cultural milieu, retained its position as the foremost Jewish center until World War I. The new great Trans-Atlantic migration of the Jews to the West, which began late in the nineteenth century, was also but a part of an enormous world-wide movement of peoples. In geography a watershed is the dividing ridge, from which rivers flow in different directions to different seas. Similarly, watersheds are encountered in the wandering streams of humanity. In the nineteenth century, the watershed of migratory currents in Europe passed from North to South—from the Gulf of Finland to the Black Sea, following approximately the line established as the western Soviet border in 1921. If we look at the map we see that to the left of this line migrations go westward, and to the right of it, they go eastward. For a hundred years a gradual shifting of the population was taking place intermittently in Poland and Germany. Beginning with the sixties of the nineteenth century, the movement became accentuated. The exodus of villagers from Eastern Germany flooded Berlin and the industrial Rhine-Ruhr area; the districts with millions of newcomers. A radical change in the ethnic composition of the German people took place and the population of Western Germany was soon outnumbered by the proliferating descendants of Prussian serfs.

The places left vacant by the Germans in Eastern Prussia and other German provinces were occupied by Polish peasants who made up for the so closely linked with the colonization across the Atlantic. Emigration of Jews from Eastern Europe was made possible because of the economic growth of the European trade and industrial centers, which opened a wide field for the enterprise of Jews. But it was the migration to the New World that was most important for Jewish history. Jews have been linked with America ever since its discovery. The expedition of Christopher Columbus was financed by Marranos. The first European to step on American soil was a Marrano, Torres, Columbus’ interpreter of oriental languages. Jews were prominent in the economic development of the New World. During the first centuries, following her discovery however, America could not serve as the place of mass colonization by Jews, or, indeed, for any really large-scale immigration.

We can hardly imagine what migration to America meant to our ancestors. In 1847, of 90000 emigrants who sailed for Canada in British ships, 15000 died en route. In the same year, the Congress of the United States ascertained that, because of the overcrowding of the ships, immigrants frequently arrived in the Port of New York in a poor state of health—many of them so weak that they could hardly walk. As a result, Congress passed legislation regulating the minimum amount of space to be assigned to passengers on deck. In 1860, another law was issued to protect women passengers against the objectionable conduct of the crews.

On the average, 15,000 people migrated annually to the United States around 1820. Their number had increased to more than 100000 by 1890, and by 1905 it surpassed 1 million. The major countries of emigration had also changed with the years. Until 1850 most immigrants came from Great Britain, Ireland and Western Germany. In the next thirty years, Scandinavia, Holland, Switzerland, Eastern Germany, Bohemia and Austria began to furnish immigrants. Beginning with the outbreak of the South Eastern, and Eastern Europe followed suit. The "pull" of the New World was felt further and further away from the shores of the Atlantic.

Jews had been going to America together with other inhabitants of the various countries where they had been living. In the first period, the emigration of the Spanish and Portuguese Marranos and the Dutch Jews took place. Relatively few Polish Jews reached America in the eighteenth century in their flight from the bloody massacres by the Ukrainian Cossacks. They were part of the general and rather small Polish emigration to America. It was then that Kosciuszkto, the future hero of the Polish revolution, came to America.

In the first half of the nineteenth century, Germans constituted the bulk of Jewish immigrants to America, although they too were not numerous. Germany at that time supplied the United States with more immigrants than any country except the British Isles. The special reasons which prompted so many Jews to leave Germany were the prevalent spirit of "Teutonomania," and the reintroduction of anti-Jewish laws after the defeat of Napoleon, and later, the failure of the Revolution of 1848.

The Russian pogroms in the 1880s were the signal for a mass exodus of Jews, a movement which assumed enormous proportions as economic conditions grew worse. The rapid growth of the Eastern European Jewish population in cities within the Pale of Settlement, together with the disproportionately large percentage of small tradesmen and petty middlemen among them with obsolete techniques, limited their opportunities in their places of residence. Competition, which led to pauperization, reached catastrophic dimensions in the 1880s following the forced transplantation of about 1.3 million, or one-third of the total Jewish population from the villages to the towns. In the beginning of the twentieth century, the Jewish craftsmen found it more and more difficult to compete with the rapidly developing big Russian industry. In factories, the mass character only after the United States had become an advanced industrial nation. Then every immigrant could obtain work upon his land. Industrialization was especially significant for Jews, who were comparatively strangers to agricultural life.

93

The desire to accept newcomers in the countries of immigration corresponded with the existing objective conditions for their absorption. The beginning of the period of mass migration belongs to a time, now almost legendary, when emigrants were avidly recruited and sought after. While anti-immigration tendencies in the United States became manifest in the middle of the nineteenth century, the effects of the ever mounting anti-alien agitation bore fruit after the First World War, with the issuance of the quota laws of 1921 and 1924.

In the period from 1881-1914, 27.5 million persons came to the United States. Of these, 2.25 million were Jews. The overwhelming majority of the Jewish immigrants came from Eastern Europe, Russian and Austrian Poland, Rumania, the Baltics, White Russia, and the Ukraine. The last named country lies beyond the watershed. Only the Jewish migratory stream went from there to the West. Christian emigrants from the Ukraine fumed their faces eastward, to the vast expanses of the Russian Empire, Siberia and Middle Asia beyond the Urals.

Earlier, in the first half of the nineteenth century, Russian Jews migrated to the thinly populated region of lower Ukraine annexed by Russia from Turkey. The Tsarist Government in its desire to populate this area, permitted Jews to settle there, but at the same time prohibited their residence in the Russian Interior.

The Russian Pale of Settlement was both a symbol of Jewish lack of rights and a barrier to migration to the East. It was the severest of the multifarious restrictions from which the Jews of Russia suffered until 1917. Millions were forcibly detained within a certain territory, together with the growing non-Jewish population of towns and villages, while the boundless spaces of the Russian Empire remained closed to them. Jewish initiative could have been of much use in the Interior of Russia and her outlying provinces. Indeed, the rapid industrial growth of the country demanded technical as well as commercial workers, but the existing laws permitted only a small and privileged class of Jews to live where they pleased in the Empire. They were university graduates, merchants with large capital, certain classes of artisans and several other privileged categories. The preponderant majority had only one way out—America.

The situation underwent a drastic change during World War I. Accused of espionage by some Poles and reactionary army officers, Jews were exiled from the war zone. During the great Russian retreat, this measure was further extended to the entire Jewish population, in order to depopulate the territory to be abandoned. And so, more than 500,000 Jews whose one ambition had been to get out of the Pale of Settlement, suddenly found themselves forced out of it.

The Civil War of 1918-1920 brought new pogroms to the Ukraine, the most cruel and widespread since the eighteenth century. Masses of Jews fled the pogroms of the armies of Petlura, of the "White Guards," and sometimes, the chastisement of the "Reds," who considered Jews to be a "bourgeois element." In the years 1918-1921, nearly 300,000 Jews emigrated from Russia to the West. During the same time more than 1 million anti-Bolshevik "Whites" of all faiths and nationalities left Russia.

Revolution is often compared to storms. It would be more accurate to compare a revolution to a whirlpool, where normal movement is replaced by a destructive and rapid rotation. As soon as the bloody Civil War had subsided, large-scale internal migrations were resumed. As a consequence of the growing industrialization of the Soviet Union, masses of people moved both to the old industrial centers, and to the Far East. The Soviet Statistical Bureau points out that "a significant transfer of people took place from the Ukraine and Byelorussia (White Russia) to the industrial centers of Russia." Along with this migration, 600,000 Jews from the Ukraine and Byelorussia settled in the Interior, the Ural mountains, Middle Asia and the Soviet Far East between 1920-1939.

Hitler's invasion of Russia gave the final impetus to the Eastward migration of the Soviet Jews. In Latvia and Lithuania, where there was no time for evacuation, practically the whole of the Jewish population was trapped by the Germans. However a considerable part, probably over one million of the total Jewish population of over 2 million of the Ukraine, and adjacent Great-Russian regions managed to escape in time.

Thus over 2.5 million Jews are now living in the territories of the USSR, which the Nazis were prevented from occupying. The Russian Jewish community outside the Pale of Settlement which before the revolution harbored but a small number of Jews, became second in size to that of the United States.

Between the two wars, migrations to the West and overseas were resumed on the Western side of the "watershed." About 350000 Jews, mostly from Poland and Rumania, left for the United States between 1918-1926. The new quota law of 1924 severely restricted Jewish immigration to the United States, because it affected particularly those European countries where Jews were concentrated. Migration to other overseas countries and especially Palestine became increasingly important, but none of these outlets could be compared with the United States. From 1881-1925, Jewish emigration from Eastern Europe attained the figure of 3.5 million. Of these, a little less than 500000 went to Western Europe, and more than 2.5 million to the United States. The remaining 500000 were dispersed outside the European continent.

After 1925, the greatest flow was directed to Palestine, which received over 300000 persons until 1941. Other emigrants were scattered through 42 countries across the ocean. They did not go where they wished, or where there was a better chance to live decency: they went where they were permitted to enter. Generally speaking, the closing of the safety valve of world immigration, which relieved in a large measure population pressure in Europe, contributed greatly to the rise of fascism, and in turn to the present world conflagration.

Every migration is influenced by the dynamics of "push and pull." The tragedy of recent Jewish migrations lies in the fact that they took place under the influence of "pushing" forces only, especially since Hitler's domination. Persecutions created an overpowering desire to emigrate, but opportunities for emigration remained severely limited. The economic crisis of 1929-1932 seriously affected the whole world. Planned migration did not exist, and even the small afflux of foreigners was resented by alien-bating demagogues as an evil to guard against.

Before Hitler's rise to power in Germany and his seizure of Austria and Czechoslovakia, there were about 850000 Jews in those countries. Of these, 450,000 managed to escape before America's entry into the war, while it was still possible to do so. Of those who did escape, 100000 came again under the Nazi rule in the European countries where they had fled. The question of admitting at least some of the millions of European Jews who were directly menaced by threat of Nazi invasion or even afterwards to the United States or any other democratic country was not even raised. They were a sacrifice to the "holy quota." Even the few thousand German, Polish and Russian Jewish refugees who found themselves in Unoccupied France, found all doors closed in their efforts to escape deportation to the ghettos of Eastern Europe.

At the very time when at countless meetings, beautiful phrases on solidarity and the fight for democracy against fascism were being constantly repeated, bureaucrats narrow-mindedly, and sometimes with deliberate intent motivated by inhuman attitudes or fascist sympathies sabotaged the possibility of saving the victims who could still have been rescued. This continued until the doors of Hitler's prisons closed upon those who had been refused asylum by the democracies.

At the same time Hitler is continuing to solve the Jewish problem by migration—forced migration to the ghettos and concentration camps of Poland and Occupied Russia. The motives which determined this policy were many and complicated. The irrational sadistic instincts of the Fuhrer and his followers cannot be discounted. Robbery is the motive for the practice of first stripping the exiles of all their belongings during their deportation and later exterminating them. Another important motive is the intention of the Nazis to make use of Jewish manpower. Until December 1942, the Nazis deported to the East more than 2750000 Jews. These were doomed to die in the ghettos and in concentration camps, together with the remaining one and a half to two million Polish Jews. But deportation to Poland was merely a makeshift as the Nazis transferred Jews en masse to the occupied Soviet areas. Rumanians followed suit. They had already cleared Bessarabia and Bukovina of Jews by deporting 185000 to Occupied Ukraine. By the end of 1942, the Slovaks had deported 70000 of the entire Jewish population of 90000.

At first the Nazis toyed with the idea of creating a "reservation," where Jews would live segregated completely from the "Aryan" populations, or, more accurately, where they would slowly die out. This was the reason for the unsuccessful Lublin Reservation. The Nazis yields children, who continue for 15-25 years to be an originally planned to deport Jews on a world-wide scale after their intended victory in the present war to either Madagascar or the Northeastern corner of European Russia. Peter-Heinz Seraphim, a Baltic German, and Nazi "expert" on the Jewish question, relates with pride how Germany has solved both the Jewish problem and the problem of Jewish migration in her own country. "But," he concludes, "the long wanderings of the Jewish people will not come to an end in the present period; this migratory movement will end only when an inter-governmental and universally binding agreement on the Jewish question will be reached." In other words, if Germany wins, the conquered countries will do as Hitler pleases.

But what will happen when Germany is defeated and rendered harmless? Will the hundreds of thousands of Jews deported by Hitler, and the hundreds of thousands evacuated by the Soviets return "home" to the West? Or, will one part of these forced exiles, Polish, Rumanian, and other European Jews remain where they are now, by their own free will as has already happened in Jewish history? Will they make their present refuge a new fatherland? The answer to these questions depends on the social and economic conditions which will prevail in Eastern Europe after the war. Equally important are the directions and possibilities of post-war migrations. Emigration of Jews and non-Jews from Europe will depend, first of all, on the extent to which the countries across the ocean and Palestine's Mandatory will be ready to accept immigrants. A great deal depends on whether the nations and their governments will understand that the problem of migrations must be solved in the interests of securing world-wide order. The psychology of isolationism must be abandoned for that of international collaboration, and the dread of migrations must be substituted by the acknowledgment of all of the benefits which, when rightly directed, migrations would contribute to the world. [\[60382. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M. Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 05: Immigration, An Asset. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. Differing opinions exist on the cultural and economic role played by immigrants in the life of the country of their immigration. Some think that immigrants are under all circumstances an asset to their new country, because they supply it with ready labor, thus saving the state the expense of training workers. Attempts have even been made to calculate the average cost of "educating" a worker, and, on this basis, also the "capital" which a nation acquires with the entry of every new immigrant. On the other hand, some think that every immigrant is a burden. They say that even if a country is thinly peopled, the needed population can be acquired through the natural increase of its inhabitants rather than by immigration. It is maintained that immigrants usurp the place of the unborn children and grandchildren of the local population and tend to use the free productive forces of the country, which should be reserved for the natives' own descendants. To substantiate their argument, the opponents of immigration cite calculations designed to prove that had the original settlers in some overseas countries not been compelled to face the economic competition of immigrants, they would eventually have produced a population as great as that provided by the continuous immigration. Science refutes both extreme views. It knows that overpopulated countries where immigration would constitute a heavy burden. But it also admits that for an underpopulated country, immigration is the only means of utilizing of its productive forces and assuring a development commensurate with its natural resources. Furthermore, progress can be achieved only through an influx of manpower in places where, because of the natural richness, the means of existence can be increased far beyond the hitherto reached levels, and where the potential possibilities surpass actual production and returns. The eminent German economist, Gustav Schmoller says: "... We should not overlook the fact that the increase of population through immigration... essentially provides trained and capable people, not sucklings... Natural increase is the means of securing world-wide order. The psychology of isolationism must be transplanted by immigrants from country to country. The natural increase of a country's population is possible only when the work of its inhabitants produces the necessary means for the upbringing of their children. Only immediately available manpower, adult and ready for work—in other words, immigrants, can speed the underpopulated country's progress towards a richer future. Immigration can also be of great use even to a well populated country, provided that it is of the right quality. Such selective immigration not only creates the means for its own existence, but also expands the prevailing possibilities, and even prepares the way for a further influx. It introduces and develops new forms of economy. The work and the example set by the new immigrant "bearers of culture," bring ever increasing returns. J.P. Sussmilch, a German economist of the nineteenth century said: "A native subject is generally better than two immigrants." Schmoller replied: "If we think of the Huguenots, the Salzburgers, the Saxons, the Dutch and the emigrants from the Palatinate, this statement can be reversed with equal justice. Immigrants of their kind were worth twice as much as the native subjects, and more."

Civilization spreads by the process of one country borrowing the achievements of another. This can take place only through the medium of people. Adam Smith had already pointed out in the eighteenth century that a number of methods and fields of production were transplanted by immigrants from country to country. We often tend to draw sharp distinctions between the two types of emigrants—the political-religious, namely, people who leave their countries because of religious and political discrimination, and the "economic," those who leave their homes in search of better ways of earning a livelihood. Emigrants of the first type are usually acknowledged to be the superior and the more useful kind. We should not, however, exaggerate these differences. The "economic" immigration does not consist exclusively of people who were incapable of making a living in their own countries because of their own unfitness or shortcomings. On the contrary, immigrants of this type are often the most energetic, the bravest and the most enterprising. The fact that they left their countries proves both that economic conditions there were not satisfactory and that these individuals were sufficiently enterprising to seek better opportunities elsewhere. While it is true in the case of the political and religious emigres that most of them could have made a comfortable living in their original homes, had they been left alone, the fact also remains that much of the persecution is due to envy because of their success in the economic field. How often are politics, religion, and race but a screen for those who aim to be enriched at the expense of the persecuted, or to eliminate economic rivals. While giving due honor to the nations and countries that have helped and protected the oppressed, we should at the same time realize that their motives have not always been entirely altruistic. A cogent consideration was the awareness that they would acquire allies in the fight against the common enemy. Protestant countries admitted Huguenots—fed, clothed and helped them because these refugees were equally as great enemies of the Catholics who drove them out as were the Protestant governments and nations which came to their assistance. French aristocrats fleeing the revolutionary terror were able to find hospitality in the European monarchies, because the monarchs hated the revolution as much as did the emigres.

In the past, people of the same ideological convictions, facing the same enemy, united against him. Help to allies was not merely a humanitarian duty. In was an imperative political reality. Tua res agitur—your own interest is at stake!

Aside from humanitarian motives there was also the desire to obtain certain gains which only refugees could bring. The combining of humanitarian action and sagacious politics brought economic and cultural advantages to many countries.

The best example is that of the Huguenot Protestants. About 250000-300000 of them fleeing from France at the end of the seventeenth century, found a welcome in England, and in 1760 the city of England welcomed about 60000 Huguenot refugees, an enormous figure, if we consider that upon the invitation of Emperor Frederick II Hohenstaufen. In the twentieth century the Jews, Spain experienced a marked economic decline. Antwerp, where the Marranos went, enjoyed prosperity as long as they remained there. When Holland won her independence, the Jews migrated to Amsterdam.

Thus governments, the Church and private enterprise gave the Huguenots support on a large scale. Officers, lawyers and clerks were given governmental jobs, while merchants, manufacturers and artisans obtained generous privileges for trade and work. Those who prophesied that their country would benefit from the influx of refugees, were not mistaken. The Huguenot mass immigration proved to be a brilliant example of the economic history of the countries which admitted them. In one of the Berlin museums there is a painting portraying the arrival of pitiful Huguenots with their bundles on their backs and their household utensils laden on little carts. A few years later, some of these very same pathetic wanderers were occupying leading positions in industrial, trade, military and administrative spheres. For the backward German countries, the activity of the Huguenots proved to be the beginning of a new economic era. But even in more progressive countries such as Holland and England, the Huguenots not only co-operated in the development of the numerous existing trades, but also brought with them new skills and industries, previously unknown in these localities.

The latter immigration refers to the Protestant refugees who had escaped the terror of the Spanish Duke of Alba in Flanders. Welcomed by Queen Elizabeth, they completely revolutionized England's textile industry. As for the Huguenots, it was they who introduced the manufacture of sailcloth which laid the basis for British sea power.

The history of Jewish wanderings shows many similar examples. To enumerate all that the Jews have brought into every new country of their immigration would require a detailed history of their wanderings. In the words of Mark Wischnitzer, a student of Jewish migrations: "It is not true that the Jewish people experienced only the fate of wanderers; wherever they could settle down, they worked and created cultural values."

Jews brought into the new countries not only their culture and art, but also skills and crafts. It is said that the Turkish Sultan Bajazet upon hearing that the King of Spain had decided to exile the Jews in 1492, exclaimed: "You call Ferdinand a wise king—he who has made his country poor and enriched ours!" Whether these words were actually uttered or not, they do describe both the objective consequences of the exile of the Jews, and the reaction of the Turkish Government to it. The reception accorded the Jewish exiles in the Ottoman Empire and the freedom which they enjoyed played an important part in the history of Turkey. A French traveler who visited Turkey in the middle of the sixteenth century complained that, to the detriment of Christian nations, Spanish Jews acquainted the Turks with various inventions in the field of arms, such as artillery pieces, the arquebuse and gun powder. The relations of the Turkish Jews with their co-religionists abroad proved very useful, especially in international trade.

We could compile a very long list of all that the Jewish immigrants did for the economic welfare of different nations. In the sixteenth century they brought silk to Italy, where many of them came upon the invitation of Emperor Frederick II Hohenstaufen. In the twentieth century they brought wherever they settled the artificial silk knit goods industry from Hitler Germany. The emigration of Marranos from Spain to the Netherlands is another outstanding example. After the exodus of the Jews, Spain experienced a marked economic decline. Antwerp, where the Marranos went, enjoyed prosperity as long as they remained there. When Holland won her independence, the Jews migrated to Amsterdam. This small country soon became the center of world-wide trade, and the Jews introduced a new technique of credit, commercial transactions, and of monetary circulation. They were the founders of the Amsterdam stock exchange—the first institution of this kind in the modern sense of the word. Later, in conjunction with the Dutch, they created the London stock exchange after the pattern of Amsterdam, as well as the Bank of England.

The eminent German economist, Werner Sombart, who could not by any stretch of imagination be termed a friend of the Jews, summarizing his research into the reciprocal relations between migrations of Jews and the economic evolution of various countries, said in his work The Jews and Modern Capitalism: "From the first day of its discovery America has had a strong influence on the economic life of Europe and on the whole of its civilization; and therefore the part which the Jews have played in building up the American world is of supreme importance as an element in modern development."

The first industrial enterprises in the American colonies were created by Jews. In Portuguese Brazil, the Marranos founded the sugar industry as early as the sixteenth century. The greatest boom in Brazil's colonial stage occurred when it was temporarily taken over by the Dutch, with the result that Dutch Jews began to settle there. When Brazil once again reverted to the Portuguese, the exiled Jews transferred sugar refining, a most important industry, to the British West Indies.

Our list could be extended to our own days. Well known is the part which the Jews have played in the economic structure in the era of capitalism, a period of private initiative and free competition. But what of the contribution of Jews to economic progress in the present age of transition from individual initiative to regulated economy? The different stages in the economic development of mankind are the logical developments of preceding stages. The Russian Jews who were permitted to leave the Pale of Settlement following the abolition of Tsarism are making important contributions to the economic life of the Soviets. And, whatever one may think of the political and social aims of the Soviet Union and of its economic structure, its citizens have shown themselves more than capable of preparing their country for the bloody struggle of today.

Numerous and important as were the Jewish contributions to trade and industry, and acknowledged as they are even by anti-Semites, we should not overlook the equally important role of Jews in cultural life. The Jewish center in Spain, formed during the Arab period, was a significant factor both in the cultural and economic life of Europe. Not only were Jews middlemen in international trade, but they also constituted the link between the science of the West and East. Together with the Arabs, they preserved the treasures of ancient Greek learning, cultivated it, and passed it on to the people of New Europe. Not only did Marranos finance the first voyage of Columbus but the author of the astronomical tables used by the discoverer of America and his maritime contemporaries was also a Marrano. On the basis of these tables, two Marranos and two Christians invented the astrolabe, an instrument used for computing distances from the equator and indispensable in early navigation.
Here is another example: Beginning with the early nineteenth century, there was a steady influx of Polish Jews to Berlin and to Western Germany. This illustrates the type of creative immigration which is in no way a burden to the existing population. On the contrary, it opens up new possibilities for economic development. Advancing German industry in which Jews actively participated as well as the export of manufactured products, which had been organized by Jews, gave work to millions of Germans. These Jews also contributed greatly to German culture. Nazi "science" in its assiduous genealogical search for Jewish antecedents of famous Germans has proved a point which even the greatest enemies of the Germans would not have been able to assert before, namely, that German culture, in all its aspects from the department store to the Nobel Prize winner, was, in fact not German, but German-Jewish. This fact is now receiving greater recognition as illustrated by the statement of Winston Churchill on 8/21/1940, that "since the Germans drove out the Jews and lowered their technical standards, our science is definitely ahead of theirs."

In conclusion, let us briefly analyze the opinion that immigration has proved to be useful only in countries with no surplus of manpower and no unemployment. We have, however, already seen that this is not always true. In Germany, at the end of the nineteenth century, there was an abundance of manpower but it was the influx of Jews which through the development of various industries, provided work for it. Overpopulation is a relative concept, and should be judged from the point of view of economics. The true criterion of density of population is not physical but economic, and the correlation between the numbers of the population and the means of subsistence should be taken into consideration. A given territory may become overcrowded for a hunting tribe comprising a few hundred people and unable to find the needed game or, for a nomad group of several thousand families and insufficient pasture, whereas the same area could sustain a farming population ten times larger than the nomad group or even a population of a million, if modern Western industrial and agricultural technique were utilized. There have always been underpopulated and overpopulated countries in relation to the existing conditions of production and exchange. Each new influx has always proved useful for countries underpopulated in this sense. Even in overpopulated countries, immigration has been helpful when it has improved economic and cultural standards.

We must not think that creative immigration, which seems to us today so obviously beneficial, was always welcomed in its own days. What becomes clear with the lapse of time could not be foreseen by all contemporaries. There have always been groups of people to whom an influx of foreigners was highly inconvenient. The historian often encounters complaints against Jews and Huguenots lodged by merchants and artisans guilds, with the oft-repeated arguments that foreigners take their bread away, that they compete by underselling and upset the existing price structure. But even in such cases, the local population eventually profited by the immigration. The lowering of prices which produced a large turnover at smaller profits per unit led to a quickened development of trade.

In the new country, across the ocean, the usefulness of immigrants is determined by the practical needs of colonization. The trained agriculturist, the skilled worker, the engineer, the physician—compose a class of immigrants that can advantageously be used in new countries. Let us use as an example the case of the pure scientist. Malthus issues his teachings on population, Darwin builds on it his theory of selection, innumerable research workers adapt it to the domain of practical biology, and the final results are for the tangible benefit of all. Maxwell and Herz develop the science of electromagnetic waves, and Marconi applies it to wireless telegraphy, an invention adapted better organized from the point of view of health and hygiene. As with the others, the chief factor in the growth of the Jewish population eventually profited by the immigration. The lowering of prices which produced a large turnover at smaller profits per unit led to a quickened development of trade.

In the new country, across the ocean, the usefulness of immigrants is determined by the practical needs of colonization. The trained agriculturist, the skilled worker, the engineer, the physician—compose a class of immigrants that can advantageously be used in new countries. Let us use as an example the case of the pure scientist. Malthus issues his teachings on population, Darwin builds on it his theory of selection, innumerable research workers adapt it to the domain of practical biology, and the final results are for the tangible benefit of all. Maxwell and Herz develop the science of electromagnetic waves, and Marconi applies it to wireless telegraphy, an invention adapted better organized from the point of view of health and hygiene. As with the others, the chief factor in the growth of the Jewish population eventually profited by the immigration. The lowering of prices which produced a large turnover at smaller profits per unit led to a quickened development of trade.

Migrant provides most of the answer. And Jewish migration involved a large proportion of the Jewish people over an extensive period of time. Jews went from East to West—from countries with a lower level of civilization to those with a higher level. The other population shift was that from small towns to larger cities, often metropolitan centers, far better organized from the point of view of health and hygiene. The living conditions of the immigrants from Galicia, Rumania and the Russian Pale of Settlement improved rapidly overseas, in the great cities of Western Europe and in the Interior of Russia. Their children lived in surroundings totally different from the poverty their parents had known in their old homes. Furthermore, the death rate in these new places was much lower.

By finding a new country for himself and his family, the emigrant made easier the existence of those who remained behind.
However great the struggle for existence in the towns and cities, competition would have been still fiercer, if many of the competitors had not been constancy siphoned off through emigration. In addition, the emigrants usually aided their relatives at home. Money gifts, however small, judged by American standards, represented wealth in some far away European hamlet. On the eve of World War I, American money orders represented an important factor not only in the economy of the Jewish communities but also in the national economy of a great nation like Italy.

Population increase as a result of emigration is not a permanent trend. The rise in the birth rate among the first generation lasts only until the influence of city life takes its toll. While the prospects for longevity increase both for the immigrant and his offspring, the urban influences on customs and the higher standard of living eventually lead to a fall in the birth rate of the second generation. In time, this decline exceeds the gain made by the lowering of mortality. Then, the natural increase of the population is gradually lowered to zero. Often the tendency leads to a drastic decrease, a point reached among the Jews in Germany long before Hitler’s coming to power.

The end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries witnessed the greatest absolute and relative growth of the Jewish population, which increased by 200000 or nearly 2% per annum. After the last war, the growth of the Jewish population began to slow down and the birth rate to fall. The present war brought about a new development—a rising death rate, due to Nazi policy. Jews suffer from this policy more than any other conquered group. Apart from the terrifically high “natural” death rate in the ghetto, which in 1941 amounted to 8% in Warsaw, the Nazis are carrying out a deliberate and cold-blooded process of extermination of the Jews in Occupied Europe, mainly through outright massacres.

Migrations also have determined the occupational structure of the Jewish people. Their estrangement from agriculture, in which they had been successful in Spain and Southern Europe, and their preoccupation with trade, took place during the Middle Ages. During the later centuries of this period, expulsions of the Jews from Western and Central Europe took place. Under such conditions Jews preferred to have their wealth in cash, jewels and other easily portable assets, rather than in real estate and fixed capital. In Spain, Sicily, the South of France and later in Turkey, Jews were renowned for their skill in various crafts. The monopoly by craft guilds in the German cities of the late Middle Ages drove them out from most handicrafts. They similarly were eliminated from most branches of commerce by the all-powerful Christian merchant guilds.

The stigma of usury which Jews brought with them from Germany still remains a part of the folklore of Christian Europe. In Poland, however, handicraft and commerce were more widely open to them. During the early centuries of their settlement in that country—a boom period in every respect—much of Polish trade was in the hands of Jews, as for instance the export of grain from the Baltic to Flanders. Jewish artisans in Poland, like the Christians, were organized in their own guilds and played an important role in the economy of Eastern Europe.

With the decline in Polish political and economic life came the destitution of the Jews of Poland, Lithuania, White Russia and those parts of the Ukraine which belonged to her. Jews were successful in agriculture, commercial, and especially in commerce, running taverns and petty trades of every description in a country with a steadily declining economy, and exploited and impoverished peasantry. The poverty of the Jews in Poland reached its depths at the time of her partitions at the end of the eighteenth century, when most of them came under the rule of Russia.

Jacob Lestschinsky, the outstanding authority on the social and economic problems of Eastern European Jewry, proves that beginning with the eighties of the last century, emigration has wrought profound changes in the social structure of both the emigrants, and those who were left behind. Jewish artisans were usually the first to set out across the ocean. They were followed by the unskilled. In the United States two-thirds of the newcomers became factory workers, thus exchanging the “independent” poverty of the peddler, who carried all his merchandise on his back, or that of the go-between, who never knew where his next meal was coming from, for the “dependent” existence of the nominally functioning wage-earner. The children of these immigrants have taken full advantage of the opportunities to enter the professions. The picture of great change in the occupational distribution of the Jews of the United States is completed by the presence of 100000 Jewish farmers.

In the Soviet Union, Jews underwent a similar process at a much more rapid pace and in a painfully different way. They experienced the terror and the pogroms in the period of strict and confiscatory Military Communism (1918-1921), the famine of 1921-1922, the NEP (New Economic Policy) period (1922-1925), in which an attempt was made to reintroduce limited private initiative, and the final destruction of the entire traditional economic system in the Pale of Settlement (1926-1929).

Adaptation to the new conditions was difficult. Lestschinsky calculates that in 1928 a million Jews in the Soviet Union were either starving or living on charity and half a million somehow managed to eke out a living by means of prohibited private trade. The constant migration from small towns and villages to the large administrative and industrial centers of Russia and the Ukraine, such as Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Odessa and Kharkov, plunged Jews into a totally new life, and opened for them new ways of earning a living. Immediately after the Bolshevik Revolution, in the days of Military Communism, thousands of Jews began to occupy positions in the government apparatus and in the nationalized trade and industrial enterprises. In the 1920s, emphasis was placed on land settlement as a solution for unemployment among Jews and their “productivization,” with the result that by 1931, 255000 earned their livelihood from agriculture.

It was the Five Year Plan (1928) which introduced mass industrialization among the Jews of the USSR. In 1939, wage-earners constituted one-fifth of all Jews gainfully occupied. Salaried employees, including white collar workers, were even more numerous, constituting one-third of the Jewish population. There were also many Jews in liberal professions—at least a quarter of a million or 17.8%. College professors and scientists numbered 7000. Half of the Jewish population in the Soviet Union are government employees. Still, the occupational structure of Soviet Jews differs considerably from that of the general population. Only 7% of them are individual or collective farmers. The present trend is predominantly towards white collar occupations.

Palestine, the third Jewish center formed in more recent times, is another example of occupational restratification through migration. The typical impulse of Zionism precipitated a “back to the soil” movement. Together with this, Jews in Palestine have created new industrial and trade possibilities in which Jewish workers have found many opportunities. This has meant work and bread for the masses of immigrants who prefer to settle in 39 the cities. The Palestinian Jews have thus acquired the economic structure of a modern and advanced nation.

It is clear then that present migrations have done more than merely rebuild the social structure of the Jewish people. They have changed the whole trend of its life, in both its spiritual and material aspects. Nor should we be surprised at these tendencies, for Jewish history shows many similar developments. Influences from without operated throughout Jewish history. Judaism is a synthesis of interaction of Palestinian and Babylonian cultures. The Jewish center in Spain not only enriched Europe, but also gave the Jewish people new spiritual strength. Many descendants of exiles from Spain still speak Ladino, a Spanish language. The long sojourn of Jews in Germany and special conditions in Eastern Europe, have produced the Yiddish language, the basis of which is German. Polish, Lithuanian and Ukrainian cultures existing in an area in which a new center of Judaism grew up and flourished for centuries, did not have a decisive influence on the Jews, because of the comparatively lower cultural level of the general population. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Polish culture began to exert its influences upon Jews in the larger cities. In the same period, Russian culture also began to make itself felt even more strongly, in the local urban centers and the Great Russian Interior. Immigrants to Western Europe and overseas rapidly adjusted to the dominant civilization of their new homes. But the masses of the remaining Eastern European Jews continued to live their own religious, cultural and economic life.

With the present destruction of the Jewish centers in Central and Eastern Europe, the Jewish communities of the future are now concentrated in America, the USSR and Palestine. In Palestine, Jews are creating their own civilization, the ultimate evolution of which will probably result in some kind of synthesis of the biblical tradition, partially secularized, with Western civilization. Both in America and in Russia, Jews have found themselves in an atmosphere of dominant, all-embracing civilizations. In the United States, the cultural adjustment of Jews, as well as of any other immigrant group, to the American pattern of Anglo-Saxon civilization is hastened by educational, social and business influences. Complete fusion is prevented by social prejudices against Jews on the one hand, and by religious differences on the other. In the Soviet Union, where religion is being continuously weakened both among Jews and Christians, a thorough-going assimilation of Jews to Great Russian culture is taking place—this, in spite of the fact that Jews, like the Russians, Ukrainians and others are officially recognized as one of the many Soviet nationalities, and have their own Jewish national regions, including the autonomous territory of Birobidjan, a state supported Yiddish school system, theatres and libraries. This nationalist factor is powerless in face of the close relations with non-Jews in work, in public, and in everyday life, the prohibition of Hebrew and Zionism and the animosity towards religion, and particularly, the universality of Russian culture, which exerts powerful influences among all the peoples of the USSR.

Despite the differences in the milieu of these three new centers, still in the process of formation, a completely new mental and physical type of Jew, common to all, is emerging. Never perhaps has migration accomplished so complete a transformation of human beings in so short a time. Until the very present, the status of Jews as permanent strangers, members of a persecuted minority, consequences of constant undernourishment, extreme preoccupation with study accompanied by contempt for physical prowess resulted in the formation of the Ghetto-type—weak, servile, and yet capable of undergoing the greatest hardships in clinging to his religious faith. These qualities produced in the modern Jews the capacities which made them the religious dreamers, revolutionary fanatics and martyrs for their faith, national existence and for movements for social equality for all.

We are struck by the appearance of the Palestinian, American or Soviet Jew. In these countries, the young Jew presents a totally different appearance from that of his ghetto predecessor or contemporary. His body is straight, his muscles strong, his expression free and straightforward. He has spent his childhood in the open air and in modern schools, not in the stifling heder (the old style Hebrew restored schools). In a large measure, he earns his living from manual labor, and competes in sports. The Palestinian Jews want to be a nation, like any other, American Jews strive to resemble Americans. The Soviet Jews live the life of the Russian people. They all have ceased feeling the ignominy imposed on Jewishness. And yet, they are Jews, and they react strongly to all that the Germans are doing to their brethren. In Russia this reaction is illustrated by the message of a Gentile Russian poet to the Jewish people: "Rachel, arise from the ashes, and shake off the ancient dust of time. Having destroyed the anguish of the past, look up; the avenger is here, the child of your great love. He is Hersh Levi, the soldier of the Red Army and the descendant of all the proud Maccabeans." [=]

60384. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M.: Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 07: Post-War Emigration Policy. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. The Jewish problem is part of the general problem of post-war reconstruction and Jewish emigration is part of the general question of migration, which will undoubtedly be one of the means of restoring war-devastated Europe. Because it is bound to affect a great number of Jews, the question of post-war migration is especially vital for the Jewish people. We must remember, however, that it is not an exclusively Jewish question, and it should therefore not be treated as such.

60393. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M.: Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 07: Post-War Emigration Policy. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. The Jewish problem is part of the general problem of post-war reconstruction and Jewish emigration is part of the general question of migration, which will undoubtedly be one of the means of restoring war-devastated Europe. Because it is bound to affect a great number of Jews, the question of post-war migration is especially vital for the Jewish people. We must remember, however, that it is not an exclusively Jewish question, and it should therefore not be treated as such.

60393. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M.: Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 07: Post-War Emigration Policy. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. The Jewish problem is part of the general problem of post-war reconstruction and Jewish emigration is part of the general question of migration, which will undoubtedly be one of the means of restoring war-devastated Europe. Because it is bound to affect a great number of Jews, the question of post-war migration is especially vital for the Jewish people. We must remember, however, that it is not an exclusively Jewish question, and it should therefore not be treated as such.

60393. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M.: Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 07: Post-War Emigration Policy. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.: American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April] 1943. The Jewish problem is part of the general problem of post-war reconstruction and Jewish emigration is part of the general question of migration, which will undoubtedly be one of the means of restoring war-devastated Europe. Because it is bound to affect a great number of Jews, the question of post-war migration is especially vital for the Jewish people. We must remember, however, that it is not an exclusively Jewish question, and it should therefore not be treated as such.
These courses, all of equal importance, should be part of the general program of the reconstruction of Europe. Some believe that Europe itself is capable of providing for its entire population by increasing the productivity of her more backward areas. A contrary point of view sees salvation in emigration alone. Both answers are one-sided and oversimplified. In some overpopulated regions, it will be difficult to provide on the spot for the entire population. In such cases, it would be better for surplus populations to seek out more suitable environments abroad. Poland is the classical example. It suffers mainly from lack of land and from the resulting overcrowding of the towns by an influx of landless peasants. No economic solution for Poland, not even a thoroughgoing agrarian reform, can be conceived without emigration playing a part in it.

After the last war, however, migration encountered nothing but short-sighted selfishness and malicious and ignorant treatment in practically every country of the world. The rich countries dreaded the exaggerated danger of lowering their standard of living and tried to stop the entry of the "tired, poor and huddled masses, yearning to breathe freely," described with such pathos by Emma Lazarus and immortalized in the inscription on the Statue of Liberty. The fight against such a mentality goes far beyond specifically Jewish interests. We must understand, once and for all, that immigration must be permitted not only because it is an asset for the country to which it is directed, but also as the first condition in restoring international amity and in preventing war in the future. International relations must be based on collaboration among nations, not on narrow-minded national egotism. Countries possessing natural riches have acknowledged the need for cooperation. Their representatives have declared in the Atlantic Charter that their duty is to make wealth accessible to those nations that have not been so fortunate. Wendell Willkie stressed that "not only must people have access to what other peoples produce, but their own products must in turn reach men all over the world. There will be no peace, there will be no real development, there will be no economic stability, unless we find the method by which the trade barriers hampering the flow of goods are removed."

But peaceful cooperation among nations and the complete harmonization of economic interests will remain utopian, as long as countries will continue to hold tenaciously to their "rights" and bar their unutilized resources to millions of people who need them. Here again is an important corrective in the economic structure of overcrowded countries, and its neglect may have the most serious result in the post-war world.

Of course, emigration is not a panacea for all social evils. It is not even a complete remedy against overpopulation. It is only a safety valve. But if the safety valve is closed, an explosion is sure to follow. Isolationist demagogues have succeeded in deluding the ordinary man into believing that immigration will harm the local population. This attitude is least of all understandable in the United States, a country built by immigrants. The argument that immigration merely results in overcrowding is obviously false when applied to countries with insufficient populations, such as Australia. Careful calculations have proved that the population of that country must be trebled in order to attain a reasonable degree of security and a higher standard of development. As for the countries with "adequate populations"; the influx of new men and women can ease the existing economic lack of "space" by enlarging the means and sources of productivity. We have already illustrated this point by numerous examples. The usefulness of an immigrant arriving with his own capital and opening a new branch of business or industry, thereby helping in part to solve the problem of unemployment, is readily acknowledged. But we should not ignore the usefulness of the immigrant worker which is in no way smaller. In any branch of industry where a scarcity of specialists exists, even one skilled immigrant workman will provide work for a number of local unskilled hands. Skilled immigrant physicians and engineers have immunized entire regions, thus opening up new lands for the productive application of labor.

The selection and training of immigrants are among the most important aspects of migratory regulation. We must endeavor to give to each country the people most needed by it. The principle to be applied must be—the right people to the right places. This will be feasible after the war, because future migration should be organized and regulated on a world-wide scale. It is absurd to think in terms of resuming to the planless and haphazard migration practices of yesterday. In our times, where the trend is in the direction of regulated economy, migrations too, to be effective, must be internationally regulated.

Rational subsidy of migrations must avoid the extremes of the purely charitable and the purely profit-making approaches. Financing of migration ventures which does not take economic factors into consideration is easily transformed into the least rational form of philanthropy. One can point to experiences in Jewish colonization where invested funds produced such meagre results, that the question could be legitimately raised whether the money would not have been better spent on ordinary relief. On the other hand, profits on invested capital should by no means be the only criterion of the success of a migratory or colonizing undertaking.

The noted American geographer and president of Johns Hopkins University, Isaiah Bowman has expressed a similar opinion: "Colonists have always had to be aided. The "proprietors" of the American "plantations" always lost on their investment because the colonists could see only their own hardships and the heavily populated cemeteries in their midst and cared little for mere monetary losses on the other side."

We know of many cases of successful organized migration in which the necessary funds were invested without a desire for immediate profits. In these cases, advantage was taken of the objective conditions of peopling a new country by stimulating and directing the spontaneously growing movement. The economic results obtained were so great that the invested capital appeared trifling. The most outstanding example is that of Siberian colonization before World War I. Colonization in this region reached its climax between 1906-1913, when four million persons crossed the Urals. I.L. Yamzin, a Soviet authority on colonization, who is not at all inclined to emphasize the achievements of the Tsarist regime, admits that "this migration to Siberia, which progressed with the assistance of the Government, has after all created the present economic power of this part of the Soviet Union." The comparatively modest sum of 200 million roubles ($25.00 per person) effected this tremendous transformation.

Another aspect is the character of the organized migration. Hitherto rural settlement was the fashion in migratory projects, both Jewish and non-Jewish. But this trend went in most cases against the stronger tendency of industrialization and urbanization at the expense of the farm. Emigration was further stimulated by a major cause, the mechanization of farming. The rural exodus made itself felt not only in the old, but also in the new countries. Governments of overseas countries and organizations interested in emigration, including Jewish ones, encouraged in every way agrarian colonization. But soon enough, it became evident that the very country chosen for colonization was itself experiencing an incessant How of farmers and their sons to the cities. Propagandists for the "return to the soil" always point to the limitless spaces awaiting the plow and tractor, which would transform fallow land into fields of golden wheat and rye. Stern reality, however, shatters these illusions. On the eve of the present war, corn and other agricultural products could not find enough markets. The problem of marketing was particularly serious in the rural economy of the new lands. The time is gone when agricultural colonization had at its disposal virgin land, which promised a return surpassing that of lands already under cultivation. Now, as Isaiah Bowman says, "most of the pioneer lands that remain are 'marginal' in climate, fertility, and transport." They are, therefore, handicapped in the race for markets.

The predominant economic tendency of our times is industrialization. Young countries, especially, strive to have their own industries in order to obtain economic independence and to exploit their natural resources. If the market for copper is more favorable than that of wheat, copper mining should be pursued for profit, even if this operation is less profitable in the new mines than where it has long been produced. They similarly prefer to have industries located near the sources of raw materials. The younger countries are resentful when they see their flax exported thousands of miles away to be reimported as linen and sold to their own people.

In turn, industrialization and the growth of new trade centers create new markets for agricultural products. Indirectly, therefore, agrarian colonization combined with industry is successful in places where it would have failed had it been planned merely for competition in the world market. This truth has lately been realized by the Soviet Government. With the final cultivation of the fertile and accessible strip of land along the Trans-Siberian railroad, purely agrarian colonization in Asiatic Russia was faced with a shortage of markets. But since the introduction of the Five Year Plan and the industrialization of that region, agrarian colonization received a new impetus because of the needs of the city populations multiplying in the new industrial areas.

We see, therefore, that the problem of planned migration and colonization is closely related to the problem of the industrialization of underdeveloped areas. It is in essence the same problem of men and capital. Young countries, interested in industrialization, require both. They need people, tools and funds for new ventures, employing thousands of men and women.

The burning question—whither shall the emigrants go—is no longer a refugee problem when approached from this pragmatic business point of view. It then becomes a problem of rational redistribution of working power. The international operations of supplying underdeveloped areas with capital and labor should be performed in the interest of both the emigrants and of receiving countries. Emigration organizations, especially the Jewish ones, taking part in these operations, will then no longer need to beg humbly for admission, or knock at closed doors and be supremely grateful for the occasional and fitting opening of the gates to a few hundred people out of a waiting line of hundreds of thousands.

We have indicated only a few aspects of the enormous problem of regulating migration. This problem needs a good deal more careful study both from the general and Jewish points of view. Such studies should deal not only with the control of migrations, but also with their routes and destinations. In the words of Albert Thomas, the founder of the International Labor Organization: "The more thorough our knowledge of the manner in which migration movements naturally and spontaneously develop—ifletto themselves—the easier will it be to regulate and control them by systematic action."

Notwithstanding the many barriers it encounters, Jewish immigration in our time is directed mainly to North America, the Soviet Interior and Palestine. There is also Latin America, with its Jewish population of over 400,000, about half of which is concentrated in Argentina. In face of the trend toward regulated and organized migration, we should not overestimate the significance of the individual infiltration of Jews into the different countries. Much is to be said for the assumption that after the war, Jewish migration will follow this already marked trend. The problem is to give it the planned character of an industrial or industrial-agrarian colonization.

Immigration into Palestine has been a great success, as a result of the combined agricultural and industrial colonization. Nearly half a million Jews have found homes and opportunities in the Holy Land. A large number of them was specifically trained for agricultural and industrial pioneering, mainly through the He-Halutz, an organization of future pioneers, branches of which existed in almost every community with a sizeable number of prospective emigrants. The two forces which determine the intensity of a migration—the "push and pull"—were clear in this case. The "push" forces were the various Jewish persecutions, culminating in the permanent pogrom carried through by the Third Reich. The "pull" forces were the attraction to Jews of their ancient fatherland and the promise of Palestine as a Jewish National Home by the governments. Creative idealism was a major force in the success of the immigrants and investors. Simultaneously, Jewish agricultural and industrial enterprises served as a powerful attraction for the Arabs in the neighboring countries. Bedouins of the desert are becoming townspeople in the cities of Palestine. In times of greatest need for new homes, the immigration of Jews has been grudgingly limited by the British administration and was strictly controlled at the ports of entry; that of the Arabs is neither supervised nor controlled. In their efforts to limit the immigration of Jewish workers, the British employed the excuse of overcrowding and "absorptive-capacity," while at the same time they greatly diminished Palestine's possibilities of absorption of immigrants by cutting off the vast areas of Trans-Jordan, the western part of the Holy Land. In contrast to the workers, Jewish capitalists were admitted more liberally. Under these conditions, the investment of capital by Jews has in some ways worked against the Jewish colonization of Palestine. It could not stimulate the immigration of Jewish workers, which was at times a matter of political expediency. It therefore, stimulated the influx of Arabs. The greater the Jewish economic activity, the larger the Arab proletariat.

Future possibilities of the Jews in Palestine depend on their rights and conditions of their admission into the home promised them. A continuation of the White Paper policy of 1939 would be a serious blow to post-war Jewish migration. In view of the happy experiences of organized Jewish settlement in Palestine, there should be no fear concerning the ability of the Jews to continue successful planned immigration, if given the proper opportunities by the makers of the post-war world.

In other places, the precedents of Jewish agrarian colonization have resulted in a relatively insignificant number of Jewish immigrants. The major problem of post-war reconstruction is the change from the method of subsidizing individual immigrants to that of planning mass resettlement on an agrarian-industrial basis. In Russia, it will be mainly a question of capital needed for the restoration of economic life destroyed by war. Economic and financial planning following victory must provide possibilities for creative work to masses of people, including hundreds of thousands of Jews. These will consist mostly of Polish refugees already in Soviet Asia and other parts of the Russian Interior, as well as Jews from Central Europe deported to the East. In the Americas, too, where manpower is needed, future Jewish immigration will have to be organized. Planning is essential.
Throughout their history migrations have saved the Jewish people and Judaism from extermination. Migrations have always opened new horizons for persecuted and destitute Jews. At the present time, millions of Jews are being murdered by the Germans. But in the three new centers, Palestine, the cross-roads of the British Empire, America, and the Soviet Union—the fate of the Jews is linked with that of the three great nations under whose blows the Germany of Hitler will disappear.

1900: 60764.
1901: 58908.
1902: 57688.
1903: 76203.
1904: 106236.
1905: 129910.
1906: 153748.
1907: 149182.
1908: 103387.
1909: 75551.
1910: 84260.
1911: 91223.
1912: 80585.
1913: 101330.
1914: 138051.

1916: 15108.
1917: 17342.
1918: 3672.
1919: 3055.
1920: 14292.
1921: 119036.
1922: 53524.
1923: 49719.
1924: 49699.

1926: 10267.
1927: 11483.
1928: 11639.
1929: 12479.
1930: 11526.
1931: 5692.
1932: 33801.
1933: 4075.
1934: 30327.
1935: 4837.
1936: 6252.
1937: 11352.
1938: 19736.
1939: 43450.
1940: 36945.

1923: 7421.
1924: 12856.
1925: 13081.
1926: 2713.
1927: 2178.
1928: 5249.
1929: 4944.
1930: 4075.
1931: 9553.
1932: 30327.
60389. American Jewish Committee; Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems; Kulischer, Eugene M. Jewish Migrations: Past Experiences and Post-War Prospects: Part 12: American Jewish Committee: research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems. Pamphlet Series: Jews and the Post War World Number 4. New York, N.Y.; American Jewish Committee, Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems, [April 1943. [Max Gottschalk, Director.] The Research Institute on Peace and Post-War Problems, a special department of the American Jewish Committee, was established on November 1, 1940, as a fact-collecting and planning laboratory on post-war problems relating to Jews. Its work is to investigate, collate and interpret data on the political, economic and social conditions of Jews, everywhere—as an urgent and indispensable preliminary step to post-war planning. The program of the Institute falls into three divisions, as follows: (1) Division on Political, Economic and Social Problems; (2) Division on Migration and Colonization; and (3) Division on Relief and Reconstruction. The published studies and the unpublished memoranda are intended for the use of those who will represent the Jewish communities in the deliberations and negotiations on post-war problems. In addition, the Institute has recently launched an educational program designed to stimulate thought and discussion of these problems among the general public. The activities of the Research Institute are guided by a Committee on Peace Studies set up by The American Jewish Committee and composed of twenty-nine pewns, representing different points of view. A number of outstanding scholars organized in an Advisory Council assist the Institute with advice and suggestions. It is the policy of the Institute to employ the services of outstanding scholars and experts in the United States and abroad in its individual and collective research projects. The Institute also endeavors to cooperate with other existing organizations and agencies, both Jewish and general, engaged in similar efforts. [=]

MOSES MOSKOWITZ, Secretary [in the armed forces], Member of Staff, Research Institute on Peace and Post-War Problems.

SHLOMO BARDIN, Principal, Haifa Technical High School, Haifa Nautical School.

SALO W. BARON, Professor, Columbia University; President, Conference on Jewish Relations.

MRS. ARTHUR BRIN, Chairman, National Committee on International Relations & Peace, National Council of Jewish Women.

GABRIEL DAVIDSON, Managing Director, The Jewish Agricultural Society.

LOUIS FINKELSTEIN, President, Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

MAX GOTTESCHALK, Director Research Institute on Peace & Post-War Problems.

ADOLPH HELD, Chairman, Jewish Labor Committee.

MAURICE HEXTER, Executive Vice-President, The Federationfor the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies of New York City.

ALEXANDER KAHN, Vice-President, American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

BERNHARD KAHN, Honorary Chairman, European Executive Council of the JDC.

ISAAC L. KANDEL, Professor of Education, Columbia University, Teachers College.

MAURICE J. KARPF, Executive Director, Federation of Jewish Welfare Organizations, Los Angeles.

ARTHUR K. KUHN, Former President, American Branch of the International Law Association, Former President of The Judeans.

JACOB LANDAU, Managing Director, Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

CHARLES LIEBMAN, President, Refugee Economic Corp. HENRY MONSKY, President, Bnai Brith.

EDWARD A. NORMAN, President, American Economic Committee for Palestine; Lieutenant, U.S.N.R.

MRS. DAVID DE SOLA POOL, President, Hadassah, The Women's Zionist Organization of America.

JOSEPH ROSEN, President, Agro-Joint; Vice-President, Dominion Zionist Organization of America.

ABRAM L. SACHAR, National Director, Bnai Brith Hilf Foundation Commission.

JOSEPH SCHLOSSBERG, Chairman, National Labor Committee for Palestine.

HARRY SCHNEIDERMAN, Assistant Secretary, The American Jewish Committee.

JACOB SHATZKY, Librarian, New York State Psychiatric Institute.

ALAN M. STROOCK, Chairman, Administrative Committee, The American Jewish Committee.

MORRIS D. WALDMAN, Executive Vice-President, The American Jewish Committee.

MAX M. WARBURG, Member, The American Jewish Committee.

MAX WEINRICHT, Research Director, Yiddish Scientific Institute. [=]

60391. Amiry, Suad; Johnson, Penny. "Jerusalem and the Peace Agenda: Interview: Representing Jerusalem", in Middle East Report, May-June 1993. pp. 22-23. [Amir is coordinator of the Palestinian team for the Jerusalem program at the Smithsonian Institution's 1993 Folklore Festival in Washington DC.] The Festival, which was intended to demonstrate a vision of Jerusalem based on 'parity and equality' was postponed due to lack of funds. The Smithsonian is not taking a political position, but is acknowledging that East Jerusalem has a distinct Palestinian culture by having Faisal Husseini represent East Jerusalem. Since the festival is intended to showcase folklore, the decline of crafts, crippled by high taxes, the absence of tourists, shut-downs and the depressed economy, raises the question of how this should be portrayed. Trying to portray crafts and religious diversity had the tendency to squeeze out women's roles in the city, and domestic crafts were then included: it is hard to portray the less private crafts and lives of women in the Middle East and North Africa. Israel-Palestine
Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas) and Islamic Jihad in December 1992. Since then, more than 100 Palestinians have been shot and killed by Israeli forces, at least 70 in the Gaza Strip. More than 30 were 16 years old or younger. The month of May has already registered the highest monthly death toll since the end of 1992, with up to 24 people shot dead by Israeli forces, up to 19 of these in the Gaza Strip.

Amnesty International believes that many of these killings are absolutely unjustifiable and that some may amount to extrajudicial executions. It calls on the Israeli authorities to take urgent measures to redress this situation and to prevent the death toll at the hands of its forces from rising still further.

Amnesty International is also concerned that the use of massive firepower by Israeli forces against dwellings in which Palestinians suspected of having committed serious crimes—as such participation in the killings of Israelis or other Palestinians—are alleged to be hiding in, may amount to collective punishment.

In May, an Amnesty International delegation composed of a staff member from the International Secretariat and Major Allan Hugstad, an officer in the Danish Army, visited Israel and the Gaza Strip to investigate recent cases of killings by Israeli forces and cases of house destruction. They also discussed the guidelines for the use of firearms and on house destruction operations with Israel Defense Force (IDF) officials. The delegates also requested information on a number of individual cases. [=] 60393. Amnesty International. "Amnesty International: Unjustifiable Israeli Killings in Occupied Territories: Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem WC1X 8DJ, UK, May 31, 1993. p. 6. Cases of particular concern are those of people who were shot dead while apparently not engaging in any violent activity. They include: Rana Abu Tuyur, 11, killed on 12/19/92, during clashes in Khan Yunis while on her way to buy milk; Rizq Fara, 19, shot dead on the same day while standing on his balcony after helping carry Rana Abu Tuyur to a car; Maher Majaideh, 8, shot dead in the street in Khan Yunis on 3/20/93; Raeda Qarrar, 13, shot by a soldier on 4/8/93 while she was standing by the corner of her house; Najah Abu Dallal, a 34-year-old mother of six who died 4/26/93, after being shot in the head on 4/21/93 by a soldier stationed on a tall building while she was standing in a private courtyard; Fouad Temraz, 20, killed on 5/12/93 in Deir al-Balah refugee camp by a single shot to the head also from a tall building nearby; and Faris Kurdi, 18 months, shot in the chest on 5/16/93, during clashes in Jabalya refugee camp while he was taking shelter in a shop doorway.

The IDF has undertaken to provide Amnesty International with information on these cases. The Amnesty International delegation also visited scenes of houses destroyed by the IDF during operations said to be aimed at capturing Palestinians wanted for arrest. The buildings were massively destroyed and had been rendered uninhabitable. Amnesty International fears that the large number of houses damaged in each operation and the extent of the damage indicates that one of the aims—if not the main aim—of these operations is to impose a form of collective punishment on the inhabitants.

This is reinforced by evidence that at least some of the dwellings may have been blown up from the inside after soldiers completed their search and arrest operations. Amnesty International is awaiting clarification of such evidence from the IDF.

Armed Palestinians have been responsible for an increased number of killings of Israeli civilians, as well as of a number of Palestinians alleged to have collaborated with the Israeli authorities, since December. Responsibility for some of these attacks has been claimed by armed Palestinian groups; like the killing of two Israeli civilians and two Palestinians while engaged in a business transaction in the Gaza Strip 5/16/93. Fatah—the main faction of the PLO—and Hamas acknowledged joint responsibility for their deaths. Amnesty International condemns such deliberate and arbitrary killings and appeals to the PLO and Hamas to stop them. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

clashes in Jabalia Refugee Camp while he was sheltering in a shop doorway. The IDF has undertaken to provide Amnesty International with information on these cases. The Amnesty International delegation also visited scenes of houses destroyed by the IDF during operations said to be aimed at capturing Palestinians wanted for arrest. The buildings were massively destroyed and had been rendered uninhabitable. Amnesty International fears that the large number of houses damaged in each operation is testimony to the high number of the inhabitants. The death toll indicates that one of the aims of the operation, not the main aim, of these operations is to impose a form of collective punishment on the inhabitants. This is reinforced by evidence that at least some of the dwellings may have been blown up from the inside after soldiers had completed their search and arrest operations. Amnesty International is awaiting clarification of such evidence from the IDF. Armed Palestinians have been responsible for an increased number of killings of Israelis, as well as of a number of Palestinians alleged to have collaborated with the Israeli authorities, since December. Responsibility for some of these attacks has been claimed by armed Palestinian groups, like the killing of two Israeli civilians and two Palestinians while engaged in a business transaction in the Gaza Strip on 16 May. Faith -- the main faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) -- and Hamas acknowledged joint responsibility for their deaths. Amnesty International condemns such deliberate and arbitrary killings, and appeals to the PLO and Hamas to stop them. [=]

60396. Anani, Rana. "Adroit Rendering of a Shakespearean Classic", in Bilad-Jerusalem Times, August 25, 1995, p. 13. The latest offering from Ashtar, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," opened at the Assirraj Theater in Ramallah on 8/17/1995. Twenty young men and women from various Palestinian cities performed. The play is directed by Peter Braschler from Switzerland; his associate director is Sameh Hijazi, who also translated the William Shakespeare classic into Arabic. The play is the third summer production to have been produced by the Ashtar Theater School. It also marked the graduation of the first group of students who enrolled three years ago when the program began. Ashtar chose this play for its summer production for various reasons, says Iman Anoun, a founding member of Ashtar and the production manager of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Explaining why this play was chosen, Anoun says, "Before we picked the play, we took into consideration the psychological and physiological development of our students and their control over their muscles. The age of our students is the same as that of the characters of the play and, given their age, the themes and problems are very much the kind our students have on their minds." Shakespeare's play, written some 400 years ago (1595-6) represents three incongruent worlds: the world of kings and rich people, the world of the artisans and the mechanics, and the world outlining the realm of a fairyland rich in the secrets of Nature. "All three are amalgamated to form that hazy line that separates dream from fact, nightmare from reality, history from mythology, and the eternal from the transient," says Sameh Hijazi, the translator and associate director. The play was performed using the Palestinian vernacular. "The Arabic language in its formal shape has a certain depth and beauty, but the vernacular creates a closer relationship between the actors and the play on the one hand, and the play and the audience on the other," says Aoun. Even so, Hijazi's translation is an adroit combination of the vernacular and the classical which is just true enough to belong to the universe of this ancient play.

"My attempt to translate 'Midsummer Night's Dream' into Arabic were marked by a mammoth perseverance. I strove to render the beauty of the language while communicating the spirit of the comedy. It is my conviction that the theater should mirror the local vernacular. However, there are some poetic phrases that Shakespeare uses that can be said to be "untranslatable" due to the inherent difference between the Arabic and the English language. Nonetheless, my determination to give sound and sense a pattern mirroring the original text never wavered. While translating the play, Hijazi looked carefully at the origins of each of the characters. Some were drawn from Greek mythology and others originated in the conventional fairy tales found in English and Irish folklore. He asked himself how he was to turn these varied sources and what they stand for into a form closer to the world of the middle East and to that of the Palestinians. "I searched for the motifs, and sought their equivalents in the mythology of the region. Thus the story of Qais and Layla is the story of Pyramus and Thisbe and of Romeo and Juliet, both stories plucked from Babylonian mythology," Hijazi explains. "It was easier with the names of the mechanics who were the artisans contemporary to Elizabethan England. Their names are derived from the work they do. So I gave names in Arabic that are equivalent to the names of their trades in English. The names of the fairies' names derive from the names of some natural elements concocted by the apothecaries of the time. They too received names in Arabic," Hijazi says. The present production is in association with the Maralam Theater of Switzerland. "They have participated in producing all of Ashtar's works since Ashtar was established," says Aoun. A key figure behind the Ashtar program is the Swiss director Peter Braschler of Maralam. "He has added a lot to our theater experiences and to theater education in our country. He has been sensitive to the special circumstances in which we live and has tailored a program to suit our experience and our needs," says Aoun. "We also hope through Maralam to connect with other theaters in the world."

The participants in the present production are first, second and third year students. "Our aim at Ashtar is to bring something of the theater experience to interested students for a period of three years following which they should be ready for work on the professional stage. They can then either join the Palestinian theater movement or continue to work with Ashtar according to a special advanced program for another two years," says Aoun. [=]

60397. Anani, Rana. "Arts & Culture: Stitches in Time", in Biladi: Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), June 16, 1995, p. 14. Alice Aghaarian is a highly qualified seamstress in Jerusalem. After 55 years of cutting and making patterns, she is telling the story of her life. "I was born in Alexandarona, in southern Turkey, to an Armenian family in 1923. When I was 5 months old, my family and I left Alexandarona after the massacre of the Armenians there. We settled in Jarash, a city in northern Jordan, where my father died. When I was 8 years old, we came to Jerusalem and settled here," Alice studied in the school of the Sisters of Resign until she was 13 years old. "Because of the war, I had to leave school. When I got married, I thought of my future so she married me to a wealthy man at the age of 13." Alice had 2 children by the time she reached the age of 18. "By that time I had a better understanding of life. I had realized that I should not depend on the generosity of life for it might betray me." Alice tried to study nursing, but the health center was too far. She also had to take care of her children, so she reconsidered and took a course in sewing instead. "That was in 1946. The course was of high quality and many housewives were joining. We learned how to make French fashions." Alice made a suit jacket and skirt for the first time in her life when she was 18. "The lady was happy with that suit and she brought me many presents. I thought that I was a skillful seamstress and I was encouraged to go through with it as a career. That was my starting point as a seamstress." During the 1948 War, Alice left Jerusalem for Amman with her family. "Every thing was gone and I had to start from the beginning in Amman. I began to work as a seamstress in my house, and soon I had many customers." After 9 months, Alice returned to Jerusalem and she started once again from the beginning. "My family was made up of 8 members and the situation was very miserable after the war. I started my work in this period by making bed clothes for hospitals and clothes for nuns. I insisted on continuing my work." In 1954, Alice took her daughter Haigana out of school in order to help with the sewing work. "The living conditions were hard and I had to help. My mother taught me a skill that will accompany me for the rest of my life," said Haigana. In 1960, Alice and Haigana decided to open their own store, "It was the biggest dress making store in Jerusalem. We used to sell ready made clothes as well as commission work. The business was becoming better and better when the 1967 War started. Again we lost everything. All the dresses in the store were damaged by bombs and bullets. A year after, the store was robbed." Alice and Haigana started once again from nothing. They have almost been able to build up to the achievements they made in the past, but the early 60's was the most successful time of their work. They had 2 fashion shows at the Ambassador Hotel in Amman. "Now the situation is terrible." Alice would like to advise all women that they should work side by side with men. "Women should benefit from every single minute they have. They should teach themselves because life is very hard and women must be well qualified to face it." Now Haigana has followed in her mother's footsteps and she is working hard to fulfill her ambitions in her little store. [=]

60398. Anani, Rana. "Palestine and People Book Review: 'Jerusalem and I Peaceful Memories of Katamon'" in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 30, 1995, p. 14. "Jerusalem and I" by Hala Sakakini is a personal record of the author's childhood and youth in Jerusalem. The author has strong ties to the city in which she was raised. The book discusses the phases of Hala's life in Jerusalem. The book is divided into five chapters: The Windmill and After, The German Colony, Katamon, Away and Letters from Cairo. The chapters are named after the places the Sakakin family lived until 1953. Hala provides the details of her life. She describes her childhood, studies and work as a teacher. The book depicts the social life of a Jerusalem family under the stresses of turbulent times. Hala was fortunate in being born into not only to a wealthy family but also to educated parents. In her youth, few people were able to obtain an education and people chose to work rather than to attend school. Her father Khalil Sakakini was a well-known Palestinian writer. During his life, he devoted himself to the Arabic language and tried to sustain it. He played an important role in education in the Jerusalem schools from the beginning of the twentieth century. He is famous for his book "Al-Jadid," which teaches Arabic to beginners. Her mother was "among the very first Arab girls from Jerusalem to be sent to a boarding school." During the first two years of Hala's life, the family lived in a small house in western Jerusalem which was originally a windmill. Their house was outside the walls of the old city when most houses were still inside the walls. The members of the Sakakin family were the parents, Sari the eldest son, Dumia and Hala the daughters and Aunt Melia her father's sister. Hala does not linger on this period of her life because she was just a few months old and can not remember many of the incidents.

In chapter two, "The German Colony," Hala discusses specific details. Hala and her sister Dumia began going to the school in the German Colony. Because they were only children and their house was too far from school, their parents decided to move to a home nearer to the school. The Sakakin's lived in this house from 1931-1937. Those years seem to have been the most cheerful of Hala's life. Hala was fond of the school in the German Colony. She describes it as unique in its style and method of teaching from traditional schools. Students did not take exams. They only had homework. Hala and her sister Dumia had the opportunity to learn German, French, English in addition to Arabic while at this school. Hala's father played an important role in her life. He always encouraged his daughters to take part in sports as well as encouraging them to read. Hala was very proud of her brother Sari who was studying in the United States in this period. He would send his sisters colored books to encourage them to read. These books were of great importance in forming the habit of reading for both Sakakini sisters. At the end of this chapter Hala describes the problems the Palestinians suffered during the British Mandate—especially during the six month strike of the 1936. The Sakakinis moved in 1937 to a house in Katamon in western Jerusalem where the incidents of the next chapter began. The main incident that Hala concentrates on is the arrival of Sari from the United States. Sari's presence means a lot to Hala, especially after her mother's death. During this period, the Sakakini face tragedies. Sari began to suffer from heart disease. They lost their house in Katamon during the 1948 War when the Jews occupied the city. Hala had lovely memories in Katamon. She describes relationships with neighbors, family, friends and relatives. Their house was daily full of visitors. The visitors were usually friends of her father and scholars and intellectuals. They often discussed literature and recent political subjects. Hala and Dumia attended the American Junior College in Beirut prior to 1948. After two years they were able to join the American University of Beirut. In 1946, Dumia and Hala became teachers. The whole Sakakini family was deeply involved in teaching and education. People lived peacefully with each other in the Jerusalem of Hala's memory. Arabs and Jews were neighbors and friends. Yet, in 1948, the situation turned upside down. The Jews started bombing and killing Arabs. In the end of this chapter, Hala describes from her diary the occupation of Jerusalem and how they were expelled from their city and country under the threat of bombs and gunfire. Chapter four describes the period following their expulsion. The Sakakinis went to Cairo hoping to manage there until the situation calmed down and they would be able to return to Jerusalem. After months passed, the Sakakinis realized that it was just a dream. Dumia worked as a teacher in Ramallah while the rest of the family lived in Cairo. The situation was getting worse and worse in Palestine and "people were feeling hatred towards British as never before." Chapter five consists of letters from Cairo to friends and relatives. The letters show the despair and misery the Sakakinis were feeling away from their homeland. The Sakakinis lived in Cairo until 1953 when Sari died at the age of thirty-nine. Three months later the father died grief-stricken and broken hearted for his son. Hala ends her book by a quotation from Sari's letter to a friend: "What worries me is the moral wrong I see done and condemned everywhere. Not only done and condemned, but even sought after and wished for and planned."[=]

60399. Aoun, Feyez Abu. "Close Association", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 13. Amina Abu Ghnam, who stars in "Sawahel" is one of the best known faces on the arts scene in Gaza. She belongs to those actors who believe in pursuing a career in the arts because of the social message and cultural impact the arts have on society. She has been known to use her own financial resources to ensure the success of a work of art. Involved in the arts since her childhood (she began in school plays) Abu Ghnam has been a familiar face to audiences in refugee camps, towns and cities of the Gaza Strip ever since she performed in "O My Country!" One of the most important phases of her career began when she met director SoudMuhannah. She acted in his first film, "A Cry of Hope" which won awards at the Cairo and Alexandria Film Festivals. She was also in his next film, "Terror Beach" which addressed the issue of drug abuse in the Gaza Strip. She played in the role of the mother. Her third film "Al-Karmel" was also directed by Muhannah. In the early part of her acting career, Abu Ghnam faced many obstacles. In the beginning, her parents and family opposed her choice of a line of work. Only her husband backed her, giving full support to her wish to work as an actress. Eventually, those who tried to stand in her way, changed their mind and became some of her most fervent fans. [=]

60400. Arfa, Orit. "Scaasi: Isaacs Spelled Backward; Designer for the Stars; From Barbara Bush to Jackie O", in Forward (New York), November 22, 1996. p. 14. Born in Australia, Scaasi has become a major fashion designer, as his exhibit at the New York History Society illustrates. He was inspired by his aunt Ida, who was a major figure in the women's international Zionist Organization in the 1930s and 1940s, and who traveled worldwide to raise money for the Zionist conquest of Palestine. Inspired by her sense of fashion, he became a major designer in the United States. His clients included Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, Eleanor Roosevelt, Barbara Bush, Barbra Streisand, Mary Tyler Moore, and Elizabeth Taylor. [TXT]

60401. Aroui, Majed. "Expired Permits: Families Under Threat of Separation," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, July 28, 1995, p. 3. At a time when negotiations between the Israelis and the Palestinians regarding the refugees continue, and when there is talk about the return of hundreds of families to the Palestinian National Authority administered areas, the Israeli Civil Administration department has been putting pressure on Palestinian families where a spouse came from a different country on a visitation permit and remained here though the permits have expired--even though these permits could be renewed. In Kharabita village, twenty-five kilometers west of Ramallah, the Israeli Civil Administration has warned about five families in which a spouse is here on a permit to leave the country. They were given a week to do so. Mervat, wife of Muhammed Injas, age twenty, is a Palestinian woman who came here to marry her cousin, which she did on 1/30/1993. Her husband carries an Israeli military-identity card and they both live in his house. After her permit expired on 2/17/1993, she went to renew it. Her application was rejected and her husband was told to get Mervat out of the village. The Israeli authorities practised harsh methods of deportation at the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s. Hundreds of women whose permits had expired were taken late at night by Israeli soldiers in private cars and transported to the Allenby Bridge. This changed around in 1991 when then Minister of Defense Yitzhak Rabin went to Washington, D.C. and was sharply criticized for inhumane actions. From America he sent orders to change this practice and to allow the women six months in the country—until their status changed and they got their permits. But the Civil Administration continues to subject residents whose spouses are here “illegally” to psychological and practical pressure. They either do not give them permits, or they confiscate their identity cards if and when they apply for permits for their spouses.

Muhammed Injas said that soldiers came with the officer of the Civil Administration to their village and asked about Muhammed’s wife. After that, they confiscated his identity card as a means of pressure on him. Muhammed tried to go and get his identity card but refused to apply for permit because he knew that the answer would be the same. After ten days he went back and forth to the Civil Administration. Finally, he called the complaints department in Jerusalem, who helped him get back his identity card and things remained calm for about a year. A year later, he heard that the Civil Administration was accepting applications, and he went to apply for his wife. But each time they told him that a paper was missing. The officer finally asked him if his wife was in the country and when Muhammed replied that she was, the officer told him he had to get her out, because she was here illegally. The threat was made even more openly when the Civil Administration informed him through the village mukhtar (Israeli-appointed major) that his wife, along with four other women, had to leave the country in mid-June. Thus, the family would be separated, with the wife and daughter in Jordan and the husband here. The husbands are threatened with deportation as well. Yousef Muhammed Abdel Ghani, age thirty-four, was born in the village and studied in its schools. In 1981, he decided to continue his higher education at the University of Jordan in Amman. There he lost his permit to re-enter and eventually lost his identity card. In 1983, he married a woman from his village and had two boys, aged eleven and six and continued to live in Jordan. On 7/30/1994, he came back to the village with a permit, which was renewed twice, but the Civil Administration eventually refused to renew his permit. Every time he was late in renewing his permit, he had to pay a seventy-three dollar fine. Yousef tried to get back his lost identity card, but to no avail. On 6/7/1995, his father was asked to go the Civil Administration where he was told that his son was staying illegally in the country and that he had to leave in a week’s time.

This Israeli policy makes Palestinians disappointed and pessimistic about the peace process. Wisam Taha Injas, another wife under threat of deportation, said that she never thought her life could be subject to such threats and pressure. Yousuf said that what is happening now shows that there is a gap in the peace process—while there is little about the return of those who lost their residency rights, the Civil Administration is practicing the exact opposite policy. The society for the citizen’s rights in Israel has assured these families that the organization received word from the assistant to the judicial advisor of the Israeli government, that they have instructed the Civil Administration to stop using force to deport people. This encourages the people without permits to refuse orders from the civil administration to leave the country. Many of the village mukhtars were informed by the Civil Administration that if those staying illegally in the villages did not leave, no visitation permits will be issued for those villages. With this, hundreds of Palestinian families will be under threat of separation. These families are asking for a solution to this issue, so that they can live in peace. [ ]

60402. Arouji, Majed. “Theatre & Elections: A democrat despite himself”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 13. Script in hand, leaning back in his seat at the Sarraj Theater in Ramallah, director Wahid Abdul Salaam is busy putting the final touches on his latest production. Titled, “A Democrat Despite Himself,” by well-known writer Mahmur Pasha, the production could not be more timely. The leading man is none other than returning Zuheir Nubani, popular for his portrayals of Bedouins in numerous Jordanian TV series. Nubani, who was born near Nablus in the village of Lubn Sharqiyeh, says the play presents a duality: the protagonist is a positive character who strives to come to grips with the problems of the land and the people but he works through a negative model. “There is a message we wish to convey to Palestinians at this time in our history, especially as this is the first time elections are taking place in our country,” says Nubani. “As people working in the theater, we feel it is our duty to help people realize the proper ways by which a legislative council ought to be elected.” High-minded though he made be, the protagonist has chosen to count on his intuition rather than on the political automated system. The theme of the play, this is the erroneous way. He criticizes his ideologically inclined relatives for affiliating themselves with various political factions and configurations, leaving him to fend for himself, despite the enormous amounts of money he has spent on the electoral campaign. Then one of his relatives advises him to pick a quarrel with another family in the hope that his own family will close ranks behind him. The play encompasses many dialectics, evolving through this device the various facets of Palestinian society—both the city and the countryside are represented. The play, which opens Jan. 7, remains an open-ended affair says author Sheqir. “We shall have to wait and see what model will succeed: the one based on family loyalties or on principles that transcend those narrower associations. Should the elections prove that the former, negative model has succeeded, this will then be written into the play, or if the positive triumphs, this will become the ending. It’s a matter of waiting.” [ = ]

60403. Asad, Asad A. “PHRIC Director Jan Abu Shakra: End the Myth of a Kinder, Gentler Israel: Part 1”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), February 22, 1993, p. 16. Believing that a Labor government must be more liberal than a Likud government, and also believing that the atmosphere of peace must be spreading since the Madrid conference, the world community ignores Israel’s spiraling human rights violations in the occupied territories. Meanwhile, Israeli forces have gotten into the habit of using missiles to destroy Palestinian homes collectively, and it doesn’t seem anything will stop them. More and more Palestians are killed with live gunfire, and even children aren’t spared. Worst of all is that Palestinians are asked to concentrate on the faltering peace talks instead of their everyday predicament with the Israeli army. Jan Abu Shakra, director of the Palestine Human Rights Information Center, was asked by Al-Fajr’s Khaled Abu Aker about this situation and about what sort of message will be relayed by human rights organizations to US Secretary of State Warren Christopher this week.

Q: How do you view the unusually high number of Palestinians who have been killed by the Israeli army during the past two months?
A: Since we have been documenting human rights violations for the last seven years we view it as one more inevitable period. We view it as a very high rise in human rights violations in general, and specifically of killings. These are due to the fact that there has been no real change in the overall Israeli policy towards the occupied territories.

In this case, it appears that the immediate cause of the clashes is as a result of the expulsions in December, the consequent crackdown by the occupation forces in general on the population protesting those expulsions. In the long view, we have to see that these two months are not unusual if we look at the last five years of the Intifada as a whole.

I think what has to be stressed particularly during the upcoming visit of the Secretary of State Warren Christopher is that particularly the US believes that the change of government would be a change in policy. Our statistics for the last six months of the Shamir government and the first six months of the Rabin government show that almost in every category of human rights violations, an increase under the Rabin government is apparent].

So this should put to rest the myth, that a kinder, more gentle, more liberal Israeli government is going to change the basic Israeli policy towards the occupation and towards the Palestinians. In particular we, as human rights organizations are making a direct representation to the secretary of state through the Palestinian delegates. [↩]

60404. Asad, Asad A. “PHRIC Director Jan Abu Shakra: End the Myth of a Kinder, Gentler Israel: Part 2”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), February 22, 1993. p. 16. Q: In the beginning of the Intifada, Rabin was the defense minister and it was a time of a high number of killings, breaking of bones, etc. Is there a similarity between the two Rabin eras?

A: There is no question that Rabin has reinstituted his style. He’s the current defense minister, so there is no question that he is reactivating his style of response to the Palestinians—his basically racist attitude towards the Palestinians—but I think it’s very important to emphasize that [the problem] is not any one particular defense minister or any one particular Israeli government.

Israel is the occupier of the West Bank and Gaza. It continues to carry out these basic policies under Israeli law in the occupied territories, and what we have to address is the foundation of the occupation itself. We, as human rights organizations, find ourselves in the position of doing body counts, of releasing statistics that are basically statements in numbers on the tremendous suffering that the Palestinians are continually undergoing.

We don’t see any future in just reenacting these body counts over and over again. What has to be addressed—and the US Secretary of State should be taking a lead in addressing it, as a minimum—that the occupied territories must be recognized as occupied territory by Israel.

Q: Will you deliver such a message to the secretary of state?

A: Yes, we are raising it through an independent letter under the name of human rights organizations, and we also had discussions with the Palestinian delegation to ensure that this very basic issue is the basis for the discussion with the secretary.

Q: Do you think that Christopher should concentrate more on human rights violations than the peace process?

A: First, if he wants a peace process, as we all do, he must solve the human rights breaches of war crime which Israel is committing and demand that these crimes stop before political negotiations begin. The political negotiations must be based on a respect for international law and for the lives and human rights of the people for whom peace is being negotiated.

There can be no peace agreement that is based on a fundamental violation of the principles of international law. One of the basic ones, in this case, is that the Fourth Geneva Convention’s apply to occupied territories as long as they are occupied.

This is a minimum demand. To open a discussion, to reach a peace agreement, we cannot bargain the human rights of people. In the end, if an agreement is reached on paper clearly it could not be an agreement which would last, as long as the basic human rights of Palestinians are being violated. [↩]

A: Geneva Convention Articles 146 and 147 define what are considered grave breaches, and the terms under which any official of government including the defense minister, the prime minister, the chief of staff and the soldiers themselves who are carrying out these acts. It is an obligation of the signatories of the Fourth Geneva Convention to try these people responsible for grave breaches as war criminals. It is a provision in the Fourth Geneva Convention. Israel knows this, the United States knows this. The same principles have been incorporated into Security Council resolutions. I’m not saying anything that is a surprise to anyone. They all know this is the case.

A: What do you think of the new policy regarding the demolition of houses through the use of anti-tank missiles?

Q: I see the destruction of houses by missiles and blowing them us without a demolition order exactly the way I see the policy of temporary displacement of over 400 Palestinians. That is: Israel is playing games with international law and with the international community.

The international community tells them they have to abide by international law. Demolition orders that are collective punishment and expulsion orders are violations of international law. So what does Israel do? It stops issuing demolition orders and expulsion orders, but it carries out temporary displacements which are not expulsions. An it bombs houses and it says it’s for “military necessity,” which is allowed under the Hague Convention. So they are really playing games. [They say:]

“You didn’t like what you called ‘illegal orders,’ so now we’re doing this.”

The international community, and certainly the people’s whose homes are bombed and the people who are expelled, know that they are playing games with international law, and their lives. The international community cannot allow this total lawlessness and total disregard for human life to continue.

Q: As a human rights organization, how do you think these violations can be stopped?

A: ...I think [one thing] is very significant, that is the United Nations Human Rights Commission passed a resolution appointing an emergency rapporteur, or emergency representative, to monitor the human rights violations in the occupied territories. This was a significant step, which was supported by 26 of the 47 state members. The United States voted against it. This is another demand: a special representative assigned by the UNHRC, which should be respected and should have the full cooperation of all these states. In monitoring the situation, [the representative] should develop some kind of steps which will lead to greater action. [↩]

60406. Ashman, Sam. “What Do Socialists Say About Islamists?”, in Socialist Worker, April 14, 1995. p. 5. The press portrays all movements as though they are identical and unified in their fight for a sole cause. This could not be further from the truth. Some Islamist movements seek to change society through peaceful reform and some wage an armed struggle. They vary between those in power and those that are not. In Sudan, Islamists form a highly oppressive government, repressing non-Arabs and arresting trade unionists. Among Palestinians in the Hamas movement, there are arguments about whether to compromise with the Israeli government’s puppet Palestinian state run by Yasser Arafat or to carry on fighting. And while some young militants’ instincts will tell them to back workers’ struggles, their leaders will tell them not to. Socialists do not believe that Islamists are the main enemy. They have not wrecked whole continents in their drive for profit. But we do not believe that they provide any solutions to the problems of the poor and workers either. We therefore oppose state repression of Islamist parties. We oppose any attempts to make them illegal, or to repress, jail and murder their leaders. We will sometimes find ourselves fighting on the same side over issues like opposition to the Gulf War. But that does not mean we support their aims. We oppose any attacks on women’s rights, gay rights or the rights of religious and ethnic minorities. Above all, we see to build independent socialist politics that can win over workers and the poor. We want to prove to them that socialism is the road to liberation, not Islam. [↩]

60407. Association for Support & Defense of Bedouin Rights in Israel. The Bedouin of the Negev: A Threatened Minority. pamphlet. Beersehva, Israel: Association for Support & Defense of Bedouin Rights in Israel, June 1995. Asiah al-Sana’a is baking bread for her family on a vaulted metal disc over an open lire. The dough for the tasty thin Bedouin bread is made out of oil, wheat flour and water. Asiah belongs to the Terabin, a Bedouin tribe from one of the Negev in southern Israel, which is still attached to the traditional lifestyle of semi-nomads. The term Bedouin originates from Arabic and means ‘desertdweller’. Asiah is not married yet. She is living with her family in a small village of 1500 inhabitants. Asiah’s father Suleiman works as an unskilled labourer in nearby Omer, a prosperous
Jewish-Israeli town. Suleiman al-Sana’a still remembers his former home southwest of Be’ersheba from which he and the entire Terabin tribe were expelled by the Israelis upon the 1948 establishment of the State of Israel. Like other Bedouin, some Terabin members practiced seasonal migration, within about a 60 km area, in search of pasture and water for their goats, sheeps and camels. Traditionally they lived in tents, woven from black goatswool, which were cool in the summer, provided shelter during the winter, and could be easily transported on the camel’s back. The tent, divided by a curtain for men and women, was always open to visitors, who were greeted with ‘Ahlan wasahlan’, ‘welcome - make yourself comfortable’ - and a cup of strong coffee.

Before the turn of the last century the Bedouin began to build permanent homes on their land alongside their tents. While there was still migration, some family members remained throughout the year on the land and undertook agricultural projects. They also built dykes to collect rainwater in this normally dry but fertile area. Their land and successful farming practices were, and still are, the pride and wealth of every family.

Homeless On Their Own Land: At the beginning of the 8th century, following the spread of Islam in Palestine, the ancestors of the Bedouin came from the Sinai and the Arabian peninsula to the Negev, where they lived and cultivated almost exclusively until 1948. The Bedouin adapted in a unique way to the desert climate of the fertile northern Negev as well as the southern area, which is unfit for human habitation. Although its dramatic landscape is awe inspiring. With the 1948 formation of the State of Israel some 80% of the Negev Bedouin fled to Jordan, the Sinai and Gaza Strip. The remaining 12000 Bedouin were removed and forced into a reservation near Be’ersheba, which is where Suleiman and his family live today. The Bedouin living in this area are forbidden to cultivate this land. Last year Suleiman built a house of iron-sheets for his family. However shortly after having finished the house he received a demolition order from the Israeli government stating that his house was built illegally and was therefore slated for demolition within the next two years. As an option the Israeli government told Suleiman he could buy a plot in one of the government-planned townships of Tel Sheba designated for Bedouin residence. Suleiman however cannot afford to buy the land and does not want to move away from his relatives and the land on which he has been living for more than 30 years.

Israel Settlement Policies: The fate of the Terabin is an example for the situation of Israel’s 135000 Bedouin, of whom 80000-90000 live in the Negev. While land ownership rights of the Negev Bedouin were unquestioned during the Ottoman period (1517-1918) and the British Mandate (1918-1948), the Israeli state refuses to recognize their legitimate land claims. British sources however from the 1940’s, state clearly that all cultivable land was utilized by the Bedouin. Israeli government policies of separating the Bedouin from their land and concentrating them in seven townships was invented in order to make way for agriculture and future settlements for Jewish immigrants. The Negev is regarded as a prime agricultural area for intensive commercial farming, thus leaving no space for the Bedouin’s traditional cultivation and grazing practices. The plan was made and approved without the participation of the Bedouin people. The government-planned townships lack basic services and infrastructure such as schools, clinics, transportation, shopsands community centers. None of the townships have sewage-systems. Only two townships have an elected district council and the others are run by a delegated Jewish administration. The townships do not provide employment thus the entire Bedouin community is dependent on Israel, where they work as unskilled and low paid laborers. Nearly 40% of the workforce has no permanent source of income and no economic security.

Villages - Threatened by Demolition: The remaining 50000 Bedouin live in “illegal villages” which are not recognized by the Israeli government. They live mainly in simple wooden or iron sheet structures. The people and the animals live in close quarters together, presenting a health hazard. In order to pressure the Bedouins to move into government planned townships, they are denied any assistance. Dirt streets turn to seas of mud during the rainy season. There is no electricity, no telephone lines, not enough schools and no green-areas. Sewage-systems and wastewater disposal are also lacking. Water has to be piped from the nearest carrier of an adjacent Jewish town. In addition, the Bedouin suffer under the watchful eye of the ‘Green Patrol’, a paramilitary unit which was established in 1976 by the Ministry of Agriculture to supervise the “protection” of the nature in the Negev. But their activities are almost always directed against the Bedouin population, pulling down their tents, confiscating their flocks, uprooting their trees. Building of houses outside the seven townships is prohibited by law, therefore all the houses in the unrecognized villages are threatened to be demolished by the Green Patrol. Between 1989-1993, 1300 houses were demolished. In 1994-1995 more than 100 houses. Despite all these hardships, many Bedouin like the Terabin prefer to live in the unrecognized villages, within the community of extended families and on their land were they are engaged in agriculture, however limited.

Social Conflicts: The average age of the Bedouin population is very low: 64% of the Bedouin are under 19 years old. Regarding this fact, education clearly has a crucial role to play. But there are not enough schools and kindergartens, especially for those who live in the unrecognized villages. Some of these children have to travel 50 km to the nearest school. Furthermore these schools suffer from a chronic shortage of manpower and substandard equipment. Many students, especially girls, leave school early. Beside school there are almost no activities for adolescents. Much social change has been experienced by the Bedouin women. Traditionally they were involved in the household and were responsible for the animals. They fetched water, made dairy products, spun and wove the wool for the tents. In their spare time they sewed and embroidered, maintained social relations between the families and arranged marriages. Although the lives of Bedouin women were uninterrupted hard work, women had considerable status in their communities. Nowadays only a minority of women are still involved full time in their traditional pursuits. However the community’s loss of land and transfer to wage-labour lessens the importance of women’s work and consequently their social status has been reduced. Girls receive little education beyond primary school, especially when they are required to travel long distances to the next school.

Health Hazards: There are limited primary health care services provided by a few mobile clinics for the scattered population in the unrecognized villages. As a result, only 30% of the Bedouin children are immunized and two-thirds of the women do not receive any prenatal care. The majority of the Bedouin are compelled to travel a long way to Be’ersheba in order to receive medical attention. The infant mortality rate among the Bedouin population is 23 per 1000 live births - compared to 10 per 1000 in the Jewish population in the same area. Many medical problems such as diarrhoea, bronchitis, pneumonia and other childhood-diseases can be traced back to poor living conditions in the villages.

Commitment for the Negev Bedouin: The Association for the Support and Defense of Bedouin Rights in Israel was founded in 1976 as an independent organization to defend the Bedouin rights in Israel. The common objective of the members of the Association - Arab and Jewish Israelis - is to achieve full equality for all citizens of the State. In particular the organization defends the legitimate claim of the Bedouin to their land, access to water and the right to raise animals. To achieve this aim the Association provides legal advice and legal aid, including law suits. Another objective of the Association is to improve the social and educational situation and to lay the foundations for a better future by implementing social and educational programmes for students in addition as literacy courses for women. A rural clinic is in a planning stage. The Association is also fighting for the religious rights of the Bedouin who lack mosques and cemeteries. An important part of the organization’s advocacy work is trying to influence government policy. A recent governmental plan for the Negev, submitted in 1994, continues to ignore furthermore the existence of the unplanned villages. It seeks to improve 11 sites for the 300000 Jewish inhabitants of the Negev in addition to the 114 existing sites. At the same time, it does not allocate sufficient land for the 90000 Bedouin residents of the area. The Association has filed an objection against this plan and collected hundreds of signatures. The Association has prepared an alternative Beersheva, Israel; tel: 00972-7-231687.

He was in excellent health, and complained of no disease.

Bedouin community. Association for Support & Defense of Bedouin Rights in Israel (New York), May 3, 1993. p. 6. After Israeli authorities announced that former mayor of al-Bireh, Abdul Jawad Saleh, would be returning after 20 years after the expulsion. While my father was away, my brother Maher was martyred as a result of a bomb explosion in Beirut.

My brother Nasser and I did not get to see our father till 13 years after the expulsion. While my father was away, my brother Maher was martyred as a result of a bomb explosion in Beirut.

I am very happy that the expellees are returning, especially my father. And now I wish all our expellees to come home, the recent ones and those of yesteryear.

Q: How does your grandmother feel now that she knows her son is coming back?
A: My grandmother is now 88 years old. Time has taken its toll. Since news reached her that her son would be coming back, she has been visiting us every day. Her health has improved and her spirits have gone up. All those years while her son, my father, was in exile she tilted the land. Over and over she would say, "This piece of land belongs to Abdul Jawad; he is bound to be back some day to plough; till and seed it himself."

Q: Will your father settle in al-Bireh?
A: My father refused to allow his children to grow up abroad while he was in exile. He taught them to live in their native land. This was his way of showing his attachment to the land and to his country. He also refused to own property abroad, so as to assure that his bond with his native land remained intact.

My father was mayor of al-Bireh at the time of his expulsion. His position strengthened his bonds with his fellow citizens. For 20 years, the only sentiment equal to his longing for his country was the pain of exile he had to bear.
and dismayed over the action of the Norwegian government. We call every child accompanied by his mother and another relative. While we city of peace, Al-Quds Al-Sharif, WILPF Palestine is greatly surprised Pediatric section of the hospital and found four children per bed and under the brutality and humiliation of Israeli Occupation. From the holy urgent demand of the families and associations in Jenin, we went to the country to another enduring harassment and poor health. In 1977 the 43 children in the ward and consequently the children are forced to punishment over the subsequent years in exile, forced to move from one ward of Jenin Hospital. The families said that there are only 11 beds for that she is in need of an operation on her leg as a result of wounds handicapped and cannot walk unassisted, and doctors are of the opinion surrender and accept slavery, or leave. [=] issue was whether to send her back to Germany or not. He further added public opinion for the protection of the Palestinians under the occupation, Al-Sayeh's appeal, did not study its human or judicial aspects. The only the justice of our people's cause. You must also mobilize international

Norwegian Minister of Justice declared that the authorities, in reviewing are the conscience of your states and peoples, to promote awareness of the history and struggle of the Palestinian people. He commented that the organizations, you have an historical and active role to accomplish. You WILPF had great hopes that the spirit arising from the Oslo Agreement, which Norway historically required being at the Civil Administration for three or four days. Thus, the holy places are under Israel's mercy.

Ministry of Justice, International NGOs, and women's and human rights organizations. Al-Sayeh's case was discussed at the World Summit for Social Development, Copenhagen, 3/1995, and to a lesser extent at the Beijing World Conference for Women. WILPF had great hopes that the spirit arising from the Oslo Agreement, which Norway historically required being at the Civil Administration for three or four days. Thus, the holy places are under Israel's mercy.

The Israeli authorities partitioned the occupied territories into different zones in order to bypass Jerusalem, the heart of the area. So, if you have to go from Bethlehem to Ramallah - usually 20 minutes travelling time - you now have to spend more than two hours to travel to Jericho, then to Telbe.

The UN Security Council ordered unanimously the return of the 413 expelled by Israel to Marj az-Zuhour eight months ago; but Israel till now is adamant not to abide by this decision. Furthermore, the United States not only did nothing to compel Israel to abide with the UN resolution but encouraged her to find means to escape the implementation, making a suspicious package refused by the expellees themselves.

The negotiations, which have been going on for nearly two years, produced no tangible result, owing to the fact that the United States is acting not as a mediator, but a full partner of Israel.

Therefore, dear brothers and sisters of the non-governmental organizations, you have an historical and active role to accomplish. You are the conscience of your states and peoples, to promote awareness of the justice of our people's cause. You must also mobilize international public opinion for the protection of the Palestinians under the occupation, who are suffering heavily while the Zionists aim to compel them to surrender and accept slavery, or leave. [=]

60412. Ballas, Mohamed. "Four Children to a Bed in Jenin Hospital", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 19, 1996. p. 12. Families in Jenin have expressed their concern about the shortage of beds in the pediatric ward of Jenin Hospital. The families said that there are only 11 beds for the 43 children in the ward and consequently the children are forced to sleep four to each bed. They called on President Yasser Arafat, the PNA, the Health Ministry and human rights institutions to put an end to this tragedy. They are worried that the overcrowded conditions will lead to the spread of infectious diseases among the children. Depending to the urgent demand of the families and associations in Jenin, we went to the Pediatric section of the hospital and found four children per bed and every child accompanied by his mother and another relative. While we were in the emergency department, one of the residents told us that he had to take his sick two-year-old child out of Jenin's government hospital and take him home because of the situation, even though he needs treatment to keep him in good health. His parents said that keeping him in the children's ward was too dangerous to his health due to the overcrowding. Mohammed Abu Ghali, speaking for the hospital administration, said the principle of the hospital was to accept only those who had health insurance. He renewed his demands to the Ministry of Health to hasten the building of the new government hospital in Jenin. Abu Ghali also called upon the residents of Jenin to understand the situation as the administration has no "quick-fix" solutions to the problem. The maternity ward suffers from a similar problem. There are only 13 beds yet there are 400 live births per month, which has meant that there are two women to each bed.[2]

60413. Bar-Yosef, Arinoam; Shahak, Israel [trans]; New American View. "The Jews Who Run Clinton's Court: Most Interesting Aide", in New American View-News and Informed Commentary on the Pro-Israeli Lobby in America, Vol. 9(14), October 1, 1994. One of the most interesting Jewsi from the Israeli point of view, who has been barely exposed to view till now, is Rehm Emmanuel, Clinton's senior adviser in charge of coordinating special projects in the White House. His office is located next to the famous Oval Office. Rehm won extra points from his boss last week, when he succeeded in passing the law for combatting crime. He has become an expert at communicating with Congress and has already had many successes, the most prominent of which was the ratification of NAFTA. Now he is immersed in the passing of the health bill. Last Thursday his office was in shambles and he strode around it like a typical saba [a native-born Israeli], simultaneously conducting a lively conversation with me, studying the protocols of the debate held at the time by the Senate and watching the report of Wolf Blitzer (also a Jew) on CNN and being updated by his secretary and three aides on the positions of the senators regarding the vote. "Do you prefer to meet over the weekend or early next week, after this whole nightmare is over?" I asked him. "That would be a real relief," he replied. The following day, after the law passed by one vote, I called to congratulate him: "If you want to come, you have to do it now. The president decided to take a vacation and told us that whoever wanted to enjoy the summer should also take a vacation. So I'm on my way, leaving on Sunday morning." Even then he was not calm but nervously fidgeting in his chair. He has a face that is more suitable for an Israeli tourist than for a senior official in the US administration. "You know, Rehm Emmanuel is a name that would not be out of place in the Tel Aviv phone directory," I told him. A large, warm smile spread across his face. "Of course Auerbach. We opened the first phoneline here in Tel Aviv and in Jerusalem. My father changed his name after my uncle, Emmanuel, was killed in Israel's War of Independence [1948-49]. My father was then a member of Etzel [Irgun] commanded by Begin, and it was customary to change names in the underground. Yes, he is still a warm Likud supporter, but he also admires Yitzhak Rabin, since he admires whoever becomes prime minister as a result of the last Israeli elections. After that war he came to America, studied medicine and met my mother who was then a social work student. I was born in Chicago." Rehm and his two brothers received a warm Jewish education. "You know, we studied at a Jewish school and had private Hebrew teachers. My first visit to Israel was three days after the Six-Day War. My father said then that we had to go to Israel. I was eight years old, but I remember it as if it were this morning. The Arabs were completely defeated. There was such a joy and it was so very exciting. There were high hopes that as a result the Jews will enjoy freedom and peace. Since then I continued to visit Israel every summer until 1972. Then I began my studies. When I matured I went into politics, the pastimes of an American youngster. "What meaning does the connection to Israel and to Judaism have to you today?" "Since 1972 I did not visit Israel, until 1991. Then the Gulf War broke out and missiles landed in Tel Aviv. I immediately volunteered for one month service in the Israeli army, through the 'Overseas Volunteer Unit.'" [translator's note: By special permission of the US administration, which is not often mentioned in the US media for reasons clarified in this article, American Jews can volunteer to serve in the Israeli army and some of them often do so, especially during Israeli wars. The number of US Jews who rushed to volunteer in the Israeli army during the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, and who helped it to besiege Beirut was quite big, but since the Israeli censorship banned any mention of them, they were "invisible" to the US media. No other army enjoys a similar privilege. The service of the US Jews in the Israeli army is not supposed to include combat duties, but only such things as helping to repair tanks. Some of it certainly takes place in the territories, including the Golan Heights.] What I did then to help the Jews was not much. Naturally, it was not combat service. But we helped as much as possible and the main thing was that we were there. Does that answer your question?" Perhaps the most intriguing thing that happened to me personally in the course of the past year, since I have been posted in Washington, was the meeting with organized American Jewry. The best place to see them as they are, the place where I always came each year to admire them, is the annual convention of the pro-Israeli lobby AIPAC [American Israel Public Affairs Committee]. This is the place not only to feel the pulse of American involvement in the Middle East, but also where I felt that somehow it helps me to ignore the deep distress inherent in the feeling of loneliness of living in a state located in the heart of so many hostile Arabs. I always asked myself what was the value of the Jewish experience in America as far as Israel is concerned. Did the identification with Israel derive from a deep sense of a common Jewish fate or was it one of the tools of the local community to garner power for achieving equal rights in a mixed society comprised also of many emigrants and members of various faiths? Was Jewish power in the US a phenomenon which will decrease or increase? Were the intermarriages of Jews with gentiles threatening to weaken the Jewish power in the US? Or, so I was sometimes afraid, were American Jews building a new Jewish cultural center that would compete with Israel? [2]

60414. Barzak, Ibrahim. "Palestinian Says Israelis Shot Deaf Boy; Officials May Be Barred After a Week of 'Crazes'," in Seattle Times, June 23, 1997. p. A9. Outside the heavily fortified Morag settlement of Jewish extremist militias, wild gunfire by the settlers shot and seriously wounded a deaf Palestinian boy. The Israeli government is planning travel restrictions on 20 Palestinian officials that it blames for widespread Palestinian disgust with recent Israeli brutality. In Hebron, 14 Palestinians were wounded by rubber bullet fire by Jewish soldiers and stun grenades; those protests spread to Nablus. Israel Radio hysterically reported that one Israeli woman settler was struck by a stone allegedly thrown by a Palestinian. [TXT]

60415. Batrawi, Walid. "Features: Arab Villages Suffer Through Water Shortages While Nearby Settlements Flourish," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 22, 1995, p. 7. In the early hours of each morning, the women of Marda village near Nablus head to the only spring to collect water which they take to their homes on donkeys. Instead of gathering in stone allegedly thrown by a Palestinian. [TXT]
the committee for the development of the village said, "At the beginning of the occupation, we asked the Israeli authorities to install water pipes to the village, but they refused. I think the main reason for the refusal is political. When the village union was formed, we were asked to coordinate with figures from other villages. When we refused, we were asked to coordinate with the village mukhtar who was working for the Israeli authorities. We refused this as well. We have been denied water ever since. "I feel that the water issue should not be negotiated, since it is the source of life. He asked the Palestinian negotiators not to concede a single drop of water because it is the natural right of the Palestinian people.

Iman, a housewife, was standing in her kitchen watching the purification process: the water is boiled. She said that, as a housewife, she finds it very difficult to do chores in the house since water is very scarce, and the demand for it is very large. Iman wishes she could lead a normal life, like other women, just doing the household chores without also having to collect water each day and then boiling it as well. The children, men, women and elderly of the village of Marda look with disgust, anguish and envy up to the mountain top and the settlement of Ariel, with its red rooftops and luscious green gardens. They look with envy when the gates to the swimming pool open, and kids run and jump into the pool and bathe in its cold waters in the scorching sun, not caring what happens to kids their age down in the Arab village below. Just a few meters from the swimming pool sits Mimi Cohen, age thirty-eight, drinking a cup of coffee and blowing the smoke of her cigarette, watching one of her workers cleaning the sidewalks with a hose. Mimi laughed when I asked her if she suffers from any water shortage. "As you can see, we do not have any problems regarding water. We use as much as we need and then pay for what we consume," Mimi said. On a table close by sits the mayor of the settlement and Likud Member of Knesset, Ron Nachman. He considers the water issue in Israel one of the most difficult cases, and denied what the inhabitants of Marda village say regarding theft of water by the settlement. "What those lousy Arabs say is all lies, and they come up with such stories to ruin our image with the general public, and you journalists believe them," Nachman said. He added, "The Arabs have no rights to the water, and what reaches Judea and Samaria is water from the Golan region. And there is an equation we should not forget: Those who own the land, own what is above and below it, so if oil is found under this land, it belongs to its owner."

Nachman rejects any concessions the Rabin government would offer the Palestinians, saying that if the Israelis give the Palestinians more water, it will destroy the Israelis. "If you give something to someone, then you acknowledge the rights this person has, and the Palestinians do not have any rights to this land, and I do not think that one day I will acknowledge that they do, no matter what the circumstances are," Nachman said. "The next war in the Middle East is not going to be from Hafez Assad, Saddam Hussein or Yasser Arafat, but the dispute over water," he added. The water issue is a big part of the negotiations going on in Eilat, and there are newspaper reports which claim that there is slight progress and that an agreement may be reached between the two parties. Abdel Rahman Tamimi, head of the Palestinian Hydrology Group and a member of the negotiating team said that the water issue is one of the most complex issues and requires a firm position from the Palestinians. "Israel controls 83% of the water sources, and 73% of the West Bank's citizens do not have running water. Thus, the inhabitants of about one hundred and eighty-nine villages in the West Bank have to use primitive methods to collect water which threatens them with an environmental disaster," Tamimi said. Tamimi said that the Israeli consumption of water is five times that of the Palestinians, while the latter pays three times more for consumption. He blames the Israelis for the water shortages from which Palestinians suffer and considers control of water and not the distribution process to be the problem. Marda is only a good example of what many Palestinians suffer due to water shortages. The settlement of Ariel is just an example of people enjoying the abundance of water. Will the inhabitants of Marda and their Palestinian brethren one day enjoy water in abundance, or will they remain dry, envying the exorbitance of water their neighbors have access to?=" 60417. Beinart, Peter; Rosin, Hanna. "AIPAC Unpacked: The Real Story of Tom Dine", in New Republic, September 20, 1993. pp. 20-22. After 13 years as the boss of the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), executive director and chief lobbyist Tom Dine was quoted by journalist David Landau as characterizing the Orthodox as 'smelly'. Six days later, after a dunciation of Dine's comments by Rabbi Moshe Shere of Agudath Israel, Dine's resignation was requested: one day later he provided the resignation. Since 'it is rare to have more than one yarmulke on the board', the decision is seen coming more from wealthy backers of the lobby than from the Orthodox.

60416. Batsh, Madja; Vitullo, Anita. "Jerusalem and the Peace Agenda: Profiles: Growing Up in Jerusalem: Two Women's Stories: Madja Batsh", in Middle East Report, May-June 1993. pp. 17-18. [Madja Batsh is a 34-year old journalist in cinematography in the USSR. She stills lives in the Muslim Quarter. Her house is surrounded by the overhead 'security' walkways used by Jewish militants to intimidate Palestinians. Batsh, who has been an outspoken critic of the North Palestinian Authority, has had her house seized in the area.] Batsh grew up as a 'hasan sabi' [tomboy], her father, who had been a wealthy merchant, lost his stores and went bankrupt after the 1948 war; he became a construction worker and always refused to accept a refugee card that would entitle him to relief aid. Attending school after the 1967 war was difficult because the only neighborhood school was destroyed and only rebuilt in 1977. She went to a school, but teacher turnover was high: once her Hebrew teachers was sometimes by Israeli troops in the classroom. Going to work in Israeli owned plants, she was cheated on her wages: the plant that produced cloaks for Jews visiting the Wailing Wall held back half the wages promised. Once the city neighborhoods were like a big family: now criminals and drug addicts are moving in, and families are leaving to escape the crowding.

Dine was in many ways a victim of his own success: the officers who voted to remove him were, after all, all his own cadre. In 1980, when Dine assumed leadership of AIPAC, its had a staff of 24, in 1993 that had grown to 158; paid membership grew from 8000 to 55000, and the budget grew from $1.7 million to $5.5 million. The organization was long overseen by Dine's hand-picked underling Arthur Chotkin. Former Henry Seigman, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, observes that there were longstanding tensions with the 'Gang of Four': past presidents on the board of directors: Mayer Mitchell, Robert Asher, Edward Levy Jr., and Lawrence Weinberg. The beginning of the end came when Dine conceded management authority to Howard Kohr. Ironically, despite Labor's victory in Israel and the advantages for aligning the major Israeli lobby in the US with Israeli policies, the Gang of Four remained staunchly Likudist. Tensions have been growing between Israel and AIPAC: the statement by Amb. Itamar Rabinovitch to the 7/1993 AIPAC Policy Conference that 'peace might require some compromises' was despised by AIPAC. Even worst, Dine has even stated that he does not need AIPAC to continue in its role as an intermediary for and agent of the Israeli government in its relations with the White House. After Rabin criticized AIPAC in 1992 for '"making too many enemies'. AIPAC spokesman Toby Dershowitz denounced the Prime Minister as 'naive' and condemned him for since he 'doesn't know how important AIPAC is'. Dine had been something of a moderate, even though he barred American Friends of Peace Now from joining the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, Peace Now was Washington director Gal pressberg noted that AIPAC and Peace Now had been able to work together. As pressure grew on Dine for being 'too liberal', Orthodox members of the Conference of Presidents demanded a new requirement of the head of AIPAC: that he not be intermarried outside the Jewish Race (Dine was married to a non-Jew). However, with Dine gone, AIPAC seems adrift, and has had to release eight staff members due to a fundraising shortfall.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

------------

Founded in 1985, by focusing on Israel as the central interest of the US in the Middle East in a manner that 'resonates with the anti-Arab and Islamophobic premises of the conventional wisdom on Middle East affairs, the Washington Institute for Near East Policy (WINEP) had become, by 1/1989, the NGO with the greatest influence over US Middle East policy. During the Persian Gulf War, WINEP operatives were a major source of pro-war sound bites, op-eds and canned quotes in the mass media; when th Madrid Conference started, the CNN 'expert commentator' was WINEP chief Martin Indyk. WINEP emerged in 1988 with its study 'Building for Peace': six members of WINEP would become members of the Bush Administration: Lawrence Eagleburger became deputy (later Acting) Secretary of State; Dennis Ross became head of the State Policy Planning and one of James Baker's aide on Middle East policy; Richard Haass became the NSC staffer on the Middle East; Harvey Sicherman became speech writer for Baker; and Francis Fukuyama ('History is Over') and John Hannah joined Ross's staff. A WINEP formulated post-Gulf War policy for the US in the three years after the Saddam invasion was made by Indyk, Marvin Feuerwerger, Geoffrey Kemp, Dov Zakheim, Charles Hill, Daniel Pipes (of the rightwing Foreign Policy Institute), Laurie Mylroie; Patrick Clawson (previously at IMF, now editor of the Foreign Policy Institute's Orbis); as well as Democrats: Michael Mandelbaum (foreign policy advisor to the Clinton campaign), Stuart Eizenstat (member of WINEP board of directors; chair of the 1992 Democratic Party Platform Committee); a member of the executive committee. Indyk left AIPAC to create a 'more credible' pro-Israeli foreign policy advocate, during a period of tense relations between the US and Israel. All the State Departments that worked to rebuild those relations (Peter Rodman, Eagleburger and Charles Hill) later became regular WINEP associates. Rep. Les Aspin, Walter Mondale, Sen. Sam Nunn, and Sen. Daniel Inouye. Thus WINEP was positioned to capture Middle East policymaking under the incoming Clinton Administration, just as it had captured the Bush Administration. The role of WINEP continues the down grading of area expertise in the US government, as 'strategic policy' ideology was seen as more important than knowledge of the region being targeted.

The major backers of WINEP are Barbi Weinberg (former president of Jewish Federation Council of Greater Los Angeles, and of two Hollywood Hadassah branches) and Martin Indyk (former deputy director of research for AIPAC). Fundraising from Jewish-Americans provides the $1.2 million annual budget of WINEP: contributors include Weinberg, the Blinken Foundation, the Lynde & Harry Bradley Foundation, the Koret Foundation, the Meyerhoff family and Soref family; named after the nearby town - include the camps of Yibna, Shabura, Weinberg, the Blinken Foundation, the Lynde & Harry Bradley Foundation, the Koret Foundation, the Meyerhoff family and Soref family; as well as Democrats: Michael Mandelbaum (foreign policy advisor to the Clinton campaign), Stuart Eizenstat (member of WINEP board of directors; chair of the 1992 Democratic Party Platform Committee); a member of the executive committee. Indyk left AIPAC to create a 'more credible' pro-Israeli foreign policy advocate, during a period of tense relations between the US and Israel. All the State Departments that worked to rebuild those relations (Peter Rodman, Eagleburger and Charles Hill) later became regular WINEP associates. Rep. Les Aspin has used his growing ties to WINEP to argue that he is an expert on Middle East policy, and in 1991 traveled to the Middle East twice accompanied by Indyk as an aide. Mylroie in the early 1980s was avidly pro-Iraqi as she promoted an Israeli-Iraqi rapproachment through Orbin, the day on which four young men were killed in the center of the market. Out of the market began to throw stones at the border policemen. Witnesses of the police post in Rafah. There, a number of youths stand with a slingshot and stones?) There are no seatbelts, no rules. Everyone is in a hurry. The skull-capped soldier points his gun at them. Afterwards, his friend appears and and unceremoniously throws stones from the roof onto the crowded street below.

The southern refugee camps - generally known as "Rafah," named after the nearby town - include the camps of Yibna, Shabura, Brazil and others. They are unique in their high level of politicization and organization and managing even today to bring large numbers out into the streets for confrontations with the military. Here, the residents say, tongue in cheek, we count those who are out of prison, not those inside.

The southern refugee camps - generally known as "Rafah," named after the nearby town - include the camps of Yibna, Shabura, Brazil and others. They are unique in their high level of politicization and organization and managing even today to bring large numbers out into the streets for confrontations with the military. Here, the residents say, tongue in cheek, we count those who are out of prison, not those inside.

Mylroie in the early 1980s was avidly pro-Iraqi as she promoted an Israeli-Iraqi rapprochement through Orbin, the day on which four young men were killed in the center of the market. Out of the market began to throw stones at the border policemen. Witnesses of the police post in Rafah. There, a number of youths stand with a slingshot and stones?) There are no seatbelts, no rules. Everyone is in a hurry. The skull-capped soldier points his gun at them. Afterwards, his friend appears and and unceremoniously throws stones from the roof onto the crowded street below.

The southern refugee camps - generally known as "Rafah," named after the nearby town - include the camps of Yibna, Shabura, Brazil and others. They are unique in their high level of politicization and organization and managing even today to bring large numbers out into the streets for confrontations with the military. Here, the residents say, tongue in cheek, we count those who are out of prison, not those inside.

Mylroie in the early 1980s was avidly pro-Iraqi as she promoted an Israeli-Iraqi rapprochement through Orbin, the day on which four young men were killed in the center of the market. Out of the market began to throw stones at the border policemen. Witnesses of the police post in Rafah. There, a number of youths stand with a slingshot and stones?) There are no seatbelts, no rules. Everyone is in a hurry. The skull-capped soldier points his gun at them. Afterwards, his friend appears and and unceremoniously throws stones from the roof onto the crowded street below.

The southern refugee camps - generally known as "Rafah," named after the nearby town - include the camps of Yibna, Shabura, Brazil and others. They are unique in their high level of politicization and organization and managing even today to bring large numbers out into the streets for confrontations with the military. Here, the residents say, tongue in cheek, we count those who are out of prison, not those inside.
ambulance on the way to Khan Yunis. In the first wave of bullets, some 50 residents were injured. The confrontations continued when a large military force arrived in order to enforce a curfew. Locals claim, and this is supported by the version of events supplied by UNR.W.A. personnel, that another 30 people were injured by live ammunition and rubber bullets [In actuality, these are metal bullets covered with rubber.]. The confrontations continued until 9:20 p.m., when the military finally succeeded in enforcing the curfew. Hundreds of residents from nearby Khan Yunis rushed to the town's Nasser Hospital in order to give blood for 80 victims injured in the massacre. [–]

60421. Ben Efrat, Roni. “Gaza: Trees That Feed the Fire, Part 3”, in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 22. On that same bloody day Ta‘alat Lafi, a 25-year-old trade union activist, was standing near his house when he heard shots from the market and he went to take a look. He spotted a Border Police jeep passing by and then a second jeep in which he discerned the soldier inside pointing him out to another soldier. This second soldier shot him in the head. Ta‘alat was taken to the Shifa Hospital at 6:45. However, a Civil Administration officer named Kobi delayed him at the checkpoint for 30 minutes. Ta‘alat submitted a complaint against the I.D.F. through the Al Haq organization. Today, as he lies at home, the left half of his body paralyzed, he raises a number of questions: A week before the incident in the market, a group of soldiers came to his house accompanied by the same Civil Administration worker, Kobi, who was in charge of searching for “wanted” Palestinians. They conducted a search of his house, asked after a relative who was on the “wanted” list and at the same time overturned furniture and spoke roughly to his brother’s wife. Ta‘alat rebuked the soldier for speaking rudely. Three days later he was summoned to the Civil Administration. Kobi threatened him and told him, “I’ll show you. . . .” Was the target practice of those two soldiers in the jeep and the delay at the checkpoint merely coincidental? [–]

60422. Ben Efrat, Roni. “Gaza: Trees That Feed the Fire, Part 4”, in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 22-23. Ta‘alat’s history is that of an activist. He carries a green identity card [A green I.D. card prevents its bearer from entering Israel.]. Since ’87 he has spent three periods of 6 months each under administrative detention. He has twice been interrogated for periods of 48 and 30 days respectively without confessing to anything. Ta‘alat married a year ago and now has a baby boy. It is hard to know whether he will ever be able to function fully again. From Shafla he was transferred to the Tel Hashomer hospital where the bullet was removed from his head. He lay in a regular ward and maintains that he was given excellent treatment by his doctor. The nurse, on the other hand, made his life miserable. “Communists threw you to the dogs” By some miracle she was able to express in words what the soldiers do in practice to the local residents every day. The family of Sami Abu Samhadana who is awaiting deportation and who is imprisoned at the Ketziot Camp, one of the cornerstones of the southern camps. You cannot go there for even the most fleeting visit without visiting the home of Rukiya and Aza Abu Samhadana. We were informed that the mother, aged 62, and the father, aged over 80, were staging a sit-in at the Red Cross. The Ketziot prisoners are in their fifth day of hunger strike and there are reports of tear gas being fired into the camp. While we are getting settled on the broad veranda with its potted plants and creepers, the parents arrive. They show no signs of fatigue or analysis of the ideological challenges faced by, and the strategies used to, the Ketziot prisoners. On the other hand, insisted that Sami was continuing to lead the Strip from prison. He concludes, “That’s Likud - they believe in Bush not Allah!” Although Rukiya and Aza have welcomed the peace talks they say that peace is not just around the corner. Rukiya is willing to bet that it will be another ten years before peace is achieved. Her prophecy contains no sigh, nor trace of weariness. [–]

60424. Ben Efrat, Roni. “Gaza: Trees That Feed the Fire, Part 6”, in Challenge, May-June 1992. p. 23. Two days after my visit to Gaza there were reports of mass demonstrations in the Nusseirat and Jabaliya camps. Twenty people were wounded. The residents were protesting the nightly curfew enforced in the strip from 21.00. I was reminded of the words of a former prisoner whom I met: “All that the Intifada needs is trees and matches.” If the trees are the residents who sacrifice their lives, their bodies and their freedom in order to live as human beings, then the match is the occupation. This has been the story day in, day out. For 25 years. For 9125 days. [Translation: Yehudit Keshet] [–]

60425. Berkowitz, Sandra Jean. Challenging Holocaust Ideology: ‘Jewish Women Call For Peace’ (Israel, Palestine, Intifada, Jewish Women’s Committee To End The Occupation Of The West Bank And Gaza, Tikkun Olam). University Of Minnesota. Dissertation. 183pp. AAC 9422288. [Advisor: Campbell, Karlyn Kohrs] As tensions between Israelis and Palestinians increase, erupting into violence on both sides, many US Jews find themselves in a very difficult situation. On the one hand, they want to assure the safety and security of Israel, while on the other, they witness through the media the brutal Israeli military reaction to the Palestinian uprising, or intifada. This study is a critical rhetorical analysis of the ideological challenges faced by, and the strategies used by a US Jewish women’s peace group, the New York-based Jewish Women’s Committee to End the Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza (JWCEO), who advocate a negotiated, two-state settlement of the Israeli/Palestinian conflict. Gaining support for negotiation and a two-state settlement is more difficult than merely explaining the nature of the occupation. [–]
equating negotiated settlement with disloyalty, the JWCEO, through silent vigils and the pamphlet, Jewish Women Call for Peace, argues that a negotiated, two-state settlement is most humane, most rational, and most consistent with Jewish beliefs. The arguments of the JWCEO embrace and embody the concept of tikkun olam, a progressive, historically based belief in the need to heal and repair the world. The discourse of the JWCEO offers a glimpse into how the obstacles created by Holocaust ideology can be overcome through a revised vision of liberalism embodied in the process of tikkun olam. For students of discourse, this analysis illustrates a useful approach to the study of Jewish rhetoric. Additionally, this study advances our understanding of the rhetorical dimensions of ideology. [Reprinted with permission of Dissertation Abstracts, 1999-2000, v.49, n.13, p.13169.]

60426. Berry, Jessica. "Shoe, Textile Production in Palestine: Hebron Factory Strives for Women's Self-Sufficiency", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995, p. 11. Take some leather made in Hebron or even Tel Aviv, a team of about 12 Palestinian women and you have 250 leather uppers for shoes every day. A venture inspired by Nora Kort of Jerusalem's Catholic Relief Services. This small factory has been operating for about a year. The aim is to give Palestinian women a chance to work and given them better social standing. The project seems to be succeeding. A handful of women from all over the West Bank and Gaza are working furiously, eight hours a day, to produce these leather uppers which are then sent to an Israeli factory in Tel Aviv that attaches the soles. The shoes are then either exported or sold locally. "Speed and quality are of the essence," says Lyda Araj, Israeli President of the Women's Initiative Committee for Development. "If they (Israeli dealers) see the work is not good and we can't get our work there on time, they will just forget us. We are under a lot of pressure." Shoe factories are nothing new to Hebron. About two-thirds of the town makes shoes. The manufacturers range from small family businesses to bigger factories. But the committee in Hebron which has started this new group has grander ambitions. Suher Beder, 35, who has been training now for about a year, wants eventually to set up her own shop. She is not allowed to leave the group for another two years, as part of the training deal, but after that she will try to go it alone, adding that she will take most of her inspiration for designs from catalogues. The group also provides security for some women, who would otherwise probably stay at home. The youngest of the party, nineteen-year-old, is glad of the chance to work, and says she will never leave. "This fulfills all my demands for the future," she says. Israeli dealers pay seven shekels for a pair of leather uppers. This is cheap, perhaps half of what they would pay Israeli workers, according to Araj. But Araj adds she expects the factory to be independent by about $1996, when the women will be able to make the complete product. They must wait until then as the machine tools cost money and are very large. She says the group still needs another $80000 for more machines and simply for running expenses. Most of the money comes from an Australian humanitarian foundation called World Vision. The machines are bought from Italy and Germany. "We hope to be wearing our very own shoes made entirely by us next year," says Jamjoun Abu Al-Abed, the group's manager. [↩]

60427. Bishara, Azmy; Yakutiel, Oman; Amirav, Moshe; Habash, Assia; Dakkak, Ibrahim. "Jerusalem and the Peace Agenda: Jerusalem Voices", in Middle East Report, May-June 1993, pp. 28-31. Azmy Bishara (philosophy teacher at Birzeit University): notes that the city has no meaning for her, dismissing as 'stone-fetishism' the myth that every stone has meeting. She notes that Israeli ideology has prevented archeology and historiography into theology to reshape Jewish and Palestinian history. Bishara notes that in response Arab leaders have built countermyths that are no better. However, the myths of Jerusalem have meaning for hundreds of millions of Jews and Muslims. Jerusalem is really only the area inside the old walls: the Israeli settlements are meaningless. The questions of the theology of the 'Heavenly Jerusalem' are irrelevant if the binational nature of the real city can be addressed. Oman Yakutiel (deputy mayor of Jerusalem) sees Jerusalem as the focus of all Israeli hopes and fears: so Jerusalem is the only 'Israeli city' in which the Intifadah has taken place. There has been discrimination in construction and land use: in a perio that saw no new Palestinian housing, 150000 Jewish residents were added beyond the Green Line. There is a deliberate policy to push Palestinians out of the city. Inevitably, there must be 'some kind of Palestinian-Arab sovereignty' over East Jerusalem which will provide the basis for a sustainable urban future.

Moshe Amirav (member, Jerusalem City Council, responsible for engineering, roads and transportation): all plans for Jerusalem based on compromise have failed because they have never discussed sovereignty. He suggests a two-state, dual capital status for a Jerusalem three times as large and including ten Palestinian and ten Israeli municipalities. Central functions such as planning, the judiciary, education and health would be shared responsibility.

Assia Habash (head, Early Childhood Development Center, Jerusalem): notes that the Old City is being demolished, and all traces of Christian and Muslim Palestinians are being erased. Only a humane solution based on coexistence can secure future for the city that transcends national claims.

Ibrahim Dakkak (president, West Bank Engineers Union; founder, Arab Thought Forum in Jerusalem): Jerusalem has been a Palestinian city for centuries. Jerusalem is essential for any independent Palestinian state. There will be no solution to the question of Jerusalem until the international community ends its 'indifference' to Israeli disrespect for UN resolutions. A depoliticized and demilitarized city can be the center for a two-state solution. [TXT]

60428. Bishara, Ghassan. "Arab & Diaspora News: Experts say Mideast at historic point, Part 1", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Times, December 1, 1995. p. 11. "We hope to be wearing our very own shoes made entirely by us next year," says Jamjoun Abu Al-Abed, the group's manager. [↩]

Meanwhile, the American president has inherited in recent times. We have never been in a better position than we are today to bring about a solution to the conflict," says former Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy. "What is urgently needed in the process now is some success for all of the delegations to deflate the naysayers."

Murphy, a senior fellow for the Middle East at the non-partisan Council on Foreign Relations, moderated an April 16 briefing on the peace process at the National Press Club. He was joined by Judith Kipper, senior program associate for the Middle East Forum; Raghida Dergham, senior diplomatic correspondent for the Arab daily Al-Hayat; and Ow Nuri, Washington bureau chief for the Israeli daily paper Haaretz.

Murphy, in assessing how the Clinton administration is likely to handle the upcoming round of talks, said President Clinton and Secretary Christopher "have talked of playing a full partnership role, but I don't think you're going to see that in reality until negotiations are seriously engaged. I think the United States...is being careful until it sees the directions they are ready to move in."

Kipper said she agreed with Murphy that President Clinton "has been handed a good hand," but pointed out that if the participants are not seriously intent upon moving the process forward, "much more serious situations" are demanding US time and global concern and "the US could lose interest."

"I think there is a lot of helpfulness, but we shouldn't confuse the negotiation process with the larger crucial and historic issues that are taking place in the region," Kipper warned.

She said the geopolitical race in the Middle East, where "60 to 70% of the people are under the age of 20, is between democratization and extremism," despite the innumerable volatile and sensitive issues and problems confronting parties to the peace process. "Ultimately, the greatest threat in the region today is the lack of democratization in regimes that do not represent their people," Kipper underscored.

While direct talks "are a nice idea," Kipper said, "it is unlikely that present talks will be successful without the direct, hands-on mediation of the United States.”[=]

Mama Aysha, the Palestinian woman who came to Washington in 1949, died last week at the age of 93, leaving no children of her own, but a splendid history and many friends and admirers who will miss her deeply.

Mama Aysha--as Aysha Abul Hawa was known to many people in Washington and even to those who visited Washington for only a short while--reached people through the two best-known avenues: her serenity and warmth, and her ability to satisfy their stomachs.

Her Palestinian-Arab demeanor made people comfortable at her restaurant on Calver Street, off Connecticut Ave., and her smashing arabic food--with Palestinian flavor--made them come back for more. Mama Aysha, as a result, became one of the most identifiable Arabs in this very famous and often stuffy town.

For an Arab to have lived or even passed through the capital without knowing who Mama was, revealed a gap in that person’s education and Arab identity, and exposed a weakness in his/her familiarity with what is really important here.

Mama Aysha’s Calver Cafe became a must-see for people in this busy city, especially people with some connection to the Middle East. Though not very fancy, Mama Aysha’s restaurant radiated warmth and friendliness; the food was authentic and very good. Mama Aysha made it herself.

People also remember that, in the late ’70s, when the Palestine Information Office was allowed to open in Washington, D.C., Mama Aysha’s became the staff’s favorite watering hole. Receptions were often held at the restaurant, where the political talk about Palestinian was mixed with Palestinian food prepared by a true Palestinian woman.

Mama, with her white headdress, was always in the restaurant sitting quietly at one of the tables; she never said very much, yet when she did, everyone would listen.

Aysha Abul Hawa hailed from At-Tur village, just outside of East Jerusalem. Because of the nature of Washington as the capital of the federal government, millions of Americans come to serve here, only to leave after a few years. In many ways, Mama Aysha may have been one of the few people who could claim residency of the capital for such a long time—44 years.

Thus, her passing away attracted the attention of media ranging from the Washinton Post to Al-Majal, a magazine run by the US Information Service. [=]

The Young Women’s Christian Association in East Jerusalem celebrated the graduation of 141 female students enrolled in courses in management and secretarial skill; health care and community service; and home economics and sewing 12/10/1994. The opening speech was delivered by Doris Salah, general secretary of the Young Women’s Christian Association in Palestine. She emphasized the crucial role the YoungWomen’s Christian Association is dedicated to playing in the advancement and improvement of the status of women in society. The association is concerned about women, not only as the cornerstone of all students and women, and it will always be there to cater to the needs of women who want to participate in building their society and ensuring a better future.

Another type of advancement and improvement of the status of women in society. The association is concerned about women, not only as the cornerstone of all students and women, and it will always be there to cater to the needs of women who want to participate in building their society and ensuring a better future. The Young Women’s Christian Association is currently working on starting new advanced courses in secretarial work and computers.

One of the graduates, Rania Abu Sara, delivered a speech on behalf of the graduates, in which she thanked the teachers, the parents and the associations for providing such opportunities and support. She added that the Young Women’s Christian Association was not only a place where they studied different courses to help them start a professional life, but it was also the place where they actually learned a new way of life; one where self-respect, love and awareness come before anything else. Linda Jarayseh, coordinator for the community health workers at the Young Women’s Christian Association said, “Although I have worked in different places, this is the place where I feel I belong and can give most. I feel that my students benefit a lot from the courses they take, since they learn to handle their houses, children, parents and above all themselves.” Maha Shatarah, age twenty-seven, is one of the graduates of the home management and dressmaking course. “At first, I enrolled in the Young Women’s Christian Association to fill my time. But when I started the dressmaking course, I found out that I was really good at it and enjoyed it a lot. I decided to continue to learn dressmaking at the Young Women’s Christian Association for another year, and now I have become quite professional.” When asked why not make a profession out of dressmaking, Shatarah replied, “My parents do not want me to work in a dressmaking factory because women do not get fairly paid. But we are thinking of starting our own dressmaking family business.” Sahar Khateeb, age twenty-two, is one of the business course graduates. “I have benefited a lot from the one year secretarial course I took at the Young Women’s Christian Association. Of special benefit were the computer and the business administration courses,” she said. Khateeb is currently working as a secretary at the Bir Zeit-Palestine Pharmaceutical Co. She said, “I was employed at the same place where I was sent by the Young Women’s Christian Association for training. I feel quite comfortable in my work, but I wish the Young Women’s Christian Association would offer more computer courses, especially ‘Windows.’ It would also be of great benefit if we could get more advanced courses in secretarial and business management work.” [=]
Democracy" (West Virginia). In the main these caucuses directed their struggles against the lack of union democracy and the corruption of the union leadership, like the Tony Boyle case. Through genuine rank and file organizations with good mass membership, these caucuses are led by reformists, and would-be union bureaucrats, or in the case of Miners Democracy, by a bourgeois lawyer! These caucuses are usually national or industry-wide, but very seldom, if at all, lead and develop local, or for that matter national, mass struggles against issues facing the rank and file. At the end of every issue is the would-be union bureaucrat or reformist crying: "Elect me and I will get things done!" These caucuses are nevertheless progressive to the degree that they do challenge the class collaboration of the union leadership, but are weak in the sense that the reformist leadership and the basic programs have not and cannot make any essential changes in things or develop the worker's consciousness to a higher level. [4]

60432. Black Workers Congress. Black Liberation Struggle, the Black Workers Congress, and Proletarian Revolution: Why We Need a 'New' Communist Party and the Role of a Black Communist Organization: The Role of the Black Workers Congress, Part 2. Pamphlet. Detroit, Mich.: Black Workers Congress, 1974, pp. 38-39. On the other hand, some say because we are a "national form" we cannot be a communist group. They try to compare us to the Jewish "Bund" in Russia. They would like us to liquidate ourselves and join their "multi-national" form or group. Again, we would like to make clear we are for the fusion and unity of all Marxist-Leninists into one Communist Party. This is the only basis on which we unite - multi-national forms" are not the multi-national party. All Marxist-Leninist organizations will have to "liquidate" themselves (we like the word "unite" better) if they intend to be members of the party, not just the "national forms." Prior to the party, no particular "form of communist organization" is higher or "lower" than any other (that is, unless some groups think they are the party already?!) - all are affected with the same narrowness and amateurishness one has, but whether or not one is willing to openly and resolutely admit its short-comings and to move towards genuine unity, away from the path of isolation and sectarianism to the path of uniting on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the building of a new, genuine, revolutionary Communist Party. Only such a party (national in scale, Bolshevik-type) can lead the working class and its allies to power and socialism and guarantee the complete emancipation for the Afro-American, Puerto-Rican, Chicano, Asian, and Native American (Indian) peoples. Only such a party can liberate women from their age-long oppression and guarantee them full equality with men in the struggle. Only such a party can release the full energies of the youth and allow full play to their ambitions and talents. In words, only such a party can bring proletarian revolution to America. [4]

60433. Blankfort, Jeffrey, Speech Presented At The ALA New Orleans-ALA Forum, Part 1. June 27, 1993. We are only a few days short of an historic anniversary, a day on which I hope I can join you in celebrating your "independence." I'm not referring to July 4th, but to the evening of last July 1st when the ALA, meeting in San Francisco, declared its independence from the peculiar, special relationship that exists between Israel and the United States that has kept our institutions, both public and private, from speaking critically of Israel. On that day the ALA delegates, having heard a moving and factual presentation by Israeli journalist Michal Schwartz, overwhelmingly approved two resolutions. The first protested long-standing Israeli censorship policies of which Schwartz, herself, had been a victim, and the second, criticized the threatened expulsion of Palestinian librarian Omar al-Safi from the Israeli-Occupied West Bank. Data was presented documenting the acts of censorship by the Israeli government against both Palestinians and Israeli dissidents that violate Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. They included: (a) the banning of publications and books; (b) the harassing, imprisoning and expulsion of journalists; (c) the closing of universities, research institutions, libraries and the censoring of communications by phone and fax.ALA's actions were consistent with position it has taken in past years, targeting countries such as South Africa, Chile and the former Soviet Union, for practicing censorship and stifling intellectual freedom. But Israel is another matter. Consequently, it is the ALA that is now in the process of being censored. And that censorship is being orchestrated by the Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'rith, an organization that presents itself as America's predominant champion of civil liberties. It is happening, ironically, at the same time that the District Attorney of San Francisco is preparing to file charges against the ADL on the basis of illegal spying activities that its agents carried out against some 12000 individuals and nearly a thousand organizations in the Bay Area and around the country. Surveillance was not only not limited to Arab-Americans and pro-Palestinian activists, - the majority of groups spied upon have nothing to do with Jews or the Middle East. Nor could they, by any stretch of the imagination, be considered "anti-semitic" or "extremist." In May, the district attorney's office released over 700 pages of documents relating to the case. Among them was a list of the groups monitored by a long-time ADL operative, Roy Bullock and a moonlighting San Francisco policeman, Tom Gerard, both of whom had also been working for the South African government and the FBI. But this was only the tip of the iceberg. It was apparent from the documents and other information secured separately, that the ADL has been operating a clandestine espionage network in cities all across the United States, serving, in the main, the interests of Israeli intelligence, and to a lesser extent, the FBI and the apartheid regime of South Africa. Though the ADL vociferously denies any ties to any foreign intelligence agency - maybe they don't consider Israel foreign? - a letter from its then national director, Benjamin Epstein to another B'Nai B'rith official, Saul Joffes, written in 1961, would indicate otherwise: "As you know," the letter reads, "the Anti-Defamation League for many years has maintained a very important confidential investigative coverage of Arab activities and propaganda... Our information, in addition to being essential for our own operations has been of great value and service to both the US State Department and the Israeli government. All data have been made available to both countries with full knowledge that we were the source." The ADL's link to Israeli intelligence, was reaffirmed several months ago when a Palestinian-American, Mohammed Jarad, a Chicago resident whose name was in the ADL files, was arrested in Israel shortly after his arrival, and accused of raising funds for Hamas. ADL's spying activities have been assisted by national and local law enforcement agencies with which it has enjoyed a term a long-term, if uneasy relationship. The ADL has enlisted the services of police and sheriffs departments in a number of major US cities in order to receive unauthorized personal information on individuals the ADL has selected for surveillance. One of the categories of groups spied upon, identified by Bullock as "pinko," included virtually every African-American, Latino, Asian-American, Native-American, Gay and Lesbian, solidarity, environmental, anti-nuclear organization in the Bay Area, a number of weekly newspapers, the local public TV station and more than 20 labor unions.

On the list, for example, were the NAACP, the United Auto Workers, the Japanese-American Citizens League, the Centro Legal de La Raza and SANE/Freeze. It also included Jewish and Israeli organizations that have been critical of Israeli policy from Americans for Peace Now to Friends of Yesh Gyuvi and the International Jewish Peace Union. One of the organizations listed in the files, the respected Asian Law Caucus, immediately canceled a joint program on hate-crimes it had scheduled with the ADL, expressing dismay that it had been the subject of the ADL's spying. Rather than apologize, the local ADL accused the group of showing bad faith. A special category in Bullock's files was devoted to the African National Congress, whose expressions of solidarity with the Palestinian struggle and its on-going criticism of the Israel-South Africa military alliance made it a natural target for an ADL espionage. Rather than apologize, the local ADL office released over 700 pages of documents relating to the case. Among them was a list of the groups monitored by a long-time ADL operative, Roy Bullock and a moonlighting San Francisco policeman, Tom Gerard, both of whom had also been working for the South African government and the FBI. But this was only the tip of the iceberg. It was apparent from the documents and other information secured separately, that the ADL has been operating a clandestine espionage network in cities all across the United States, serving, in the main, the interests of Israeli intelligence, and to a lesser extent, the FBI and the apartheid regime of South Africa. Though the ADL vociferously denies any ties to any foreign intelligence agency - maybe they don't consider Israel foreign? - a letter from its then national director, Benjamin Epstein to another B'Nai B'rith official, Saul Joffes, written in 1961, would indicate otherwise: "As you know," the letter reads, "the Anti-Defamation League for many years has maintained a very important confidential investigative coverage of Arab activities and propaganda... Our information, in addition to being essential for our own operations has been of great value and service to both the US State Department and the Israeli government. All data have been made available to both countries with full knowledge that we were the source." The ADL's link to Israeli intelligence, was reaffirmed several months ago when a Palestinian-American, Mohammed Jarad, a Chicago resident whose name was in the ADL files, was arrested in Israel shortly after his arrival, and accused of raising funds for Hamas. ADL's spying activities have been assisted by national and local law enforcement agencies with which it has enjoyed a term a long-term, if uneasy relationship. The ADL has enlisted the services of police and sheriffs departments in a number of major US cities in order to receive unauthorized personal information on individuals the ADL has selected for surveillance. One of the categories of groups spied upon, identified by Bullock as "pinko," included virtually every African-American, Latino, Asian-American, Native-American, Gay and Lesbian, solidarity, environmental, anti-nuclear organization in the Bay Area, a number of weekly newspapers, the local public TV station and more than 20 labor unions.
on the recently assassinated ANC leader Chris Hani when he visited the West Coast in 1991. And what was equally predictable, every anti-apartheid organization was in his files. ADL officials have tried to distance the organization from Bullock, saying he was a private contractor and it didn't know everything he was doing, even while paying his legal expenses and keeping him on the payroll. Well, technically, not on the payroll. They used to send the checks to a Beverly Hills attorney, and he would write the check. The argument that the ADL "just didn't know" hasn't found many buyers. Yehuda Lev, founder and associate editor of the Jewish Journal in Los Angeles, recently wrote: "I have enough common sense to know that a 40-year relationship between client and agent should result in some knowledge, each about the other. The official explanation, that Bullock was "an independent contractor," holds no water. "That may affect his Social Security payments and tax deductibility, but an employee of a firm for four decades is more than a freelance researcher." (Jewish Journal, April 30-May 6) Has the ADL expressed contrition? Not for a moment. In force. What they are saying, in effect, is that you and your fellow members lack the wisdom and the right to criticize Israeli policies financed by their tax dollars. In fact not only do you and your fellow members lack the wisdom and the right to criticize Israeli policies, but, says Foxman, American Jewish critics of Israel, such as myself, don't have it either. That right is reserved for Israeli Jews. Many of whom, ironically, are justifiably scornful of American Jews who blindly support Israeli policies and politicians. (According to Foxman, writing in an article published in a number of America's Jewish newspapers earlier this month: "the ability of American Jews to be effective on the American scene is directly related to the perception of our support for Israel and criticism of Israeli policies will play into the hands of Israel's enemies... Israeli democracy should decide: American Jews should support. " This is not a partisan policy," writes Foxman. "It is intended to support whatever party is in power in Israel and is particularly necessary when individuals might not agree with the policies of a particular government. ") (No. California Jewish Bulletin, 6/4/1993) That first part of that sentence is patent nonsense. He assumes that American Jews must incorporate uncritical support of Israel into everything they do, whether fighting for better health care or teaching in the public schools. The last part is somewhat frightening, but revealing both of the man and his organization. Since Foxman places no limit on what the policies of a particular Israeli government might be, one must assume that he believes that American Jews should be ready and willing to support anything from mass expulsion and mass murder to providing weaponry to South Africa and the "death squad" generals of El Salvador and Guatemala - if and when a particular Israeli government so decides. And to a large extent, the majority of American Jews, have long ago internalized Foxman's dictum, which leads us to another highly sensitive area where the censorship surpasses that protecting Israel. And that is the Holocaust.

At a time when a gigantic museum memorializing the Jewish victims of Nazism has just opened in Washington DC and another is about to open in Los Angeles, there are several aspects of that tragedy which remain largely hidden from the American public - as opposed to Israel where discussion of the Holocaust is not freighted with the degree of emotion as it is here. The first hidden aspect is the pre-war collaboration between the main-stream Zionists in Palestine and the Third Reich. The second was the apparent indifference to the fate of European Jewry, to the point of sabotaging Jewish rescue efforts, by mainstream Zionist officials both in Palestine and the United States. And the third was the collaboration during the war by certain Jewish officials appointed by the Nazis to supervise the ghettos of occupied Europe. Although well documented, the horrible truths contained in that sentence, have been suppressed and censored by almost every means possible. Let's begin with the case of Hannah Arendt, arguably one of the foremost Jewish philosophers of the 20th century, and a leading writer on totalitarianism and anti-semitism. In 1963, Viking Press published her book on the trial of Nazi war criminal Adolph Eichmann, titled "Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil." In several pages near the middle of the book, she described in sufficient detail, the role of the Judenrat, the Jewish Councils appointed by the Nazis, to carry out, with the assistance of Jewish police, whatever orders came down from the local Nazi commandant, including the roundup of their fellow Jews for the gas chambers. She also, in a sense, wrote herself out of existence. Arredt concluded that without such Jewish organization, there "would have been plenty of misery but the total number of victims would hardly have been between four and a half and six million." (P. 111). The reaction in the Jewish community was vitriolic and unforgiving. Artzy-Ben Abadi suffered the Jewish equivalent of "excommunication." Her name no longer appeared by her book at press.

Two years earlier, another book, even more troubling, suffered a worse fate. The author was Ben Hecht, whose play, Front Page, written with Charles Farrel, was, at one time, a must for high school drama classes. Hecht was a powerful writer, and an ardent Zionist. So much so that he joined the Irgun Zvai Leumi, which most Jews, in Palestine as well as America, considered as a terrorist outfit. Hecht was a passionate lover of the Jewish people and when he learned of a trial that was to occur in Israel in which the Labor government was taking side of a Jew who had collaborated with the Nazis against a Hungarian Holocaust survivor, he decided to cover the trial and write a book about it. He would add to it his own experience with the part that the mainstream Zionist leadership had played in sabotaging Jewish rescue efforts. The name of the book, appropriately, was "Perfidy," published by Julian Messner. I searched for it for years, until finding it in a private library in 1990. For those who wish the details, I will be happy to answer them in the question period, or at campuses across the country, when they could not be stopped, were New York's two leading black newspapers and the city's black radio station. One need not agree with or defend any or all the individuals or organizations listed within the booklet to understand how the publication has been seen in sectors of the black community - as yet another step by the ADL and its allies to control the direction of African-American politics by calling those who criticize Israel, the pro-Israel lobby or the extent of Jewish political influence as being, automatically, "anti-Semitic." To publicly criticize Jewish political power is bound to make almost everyone uncomfortable, even me, and I think it is excessive. Particularly, because that power is in the hands of a relatively small, increasingly reactionary segment of the community. I also think the Christian right has too much power. What does that make me?

Arthur Hertzberg, a distinguished historian and rabbi, has an observation that gets us off the hook. Writing in the June 24th New York Review of Books, the current issue, he has this to say: "The Jewish establishment has been asserting for a generation that it wants political power beyond its numbers, and it has been getting it. Why is it anti-Semitism if non-Jews are aware of this desire?" Or Jewish critics of the Jewish establishment, I hasten to add. Within the Jewish community, the lobby's control over Congress is admitted, even bragged about. A clear example was provided by Morton Kondracke, a long-time Israel supporter, when he quoted an unnamed pro-Israel Congressmen in the New Republic back in 1989. The congressman, explaining why there was no debate on the issue of aid to Israel, told Kondracke: "If there were a secret ballot, aid would be cut severely. It's not out of affection that Israel gets $3 billion a year. It's from fear that you'll wake up one morning and find that an opponent has $5000000 to run against you." (New Republic, August 7-14, 1989). What we can see from this is a very different type of censorship than what we have been talking about, but a form of censorship none the less. When the subject is Israel, I am afraid, it has no limits. One black scholar, Prof. Fred Dube, found out the hard way back in 1983 when he was teaching at the State University of New York at Stoney Brook. For a summer school a member of the African National Congress and a former prisoner of the apartheid regime, offered as an optional subject for a term paper, the question of Zionism as a form of racism. Whether or not Zionism is a form of racism is something which few supporters of Israel will debate. Those who consider it to be racist, at least in practice, are automatically considered to be anti-Semitic, as if Zionism can be equated with Judaism. Despite the fact that Dube received support from a large segment of the university's Jewish student body, New York's Jewish establishment demanded his head and Governor Mario Cuomo delivered it. Dube was not rehired. A frequent target of ADL's "political correctness" is Palestinian-American professor, Edward Said. Said, a professor of linguistics at Columbia University, has been recognized as a spokesperson for Palestinian aspirations in the US and has served on the Palestine National Council. He also has been critical of the PLO and is a firm advocate of a just settlement between Israelis and Palestinians. To the ADL, he is the face of the enemy. When he is scheduled to speak on a college campus, the pro-Israel campus "truth squad" is there to greet him and his audience. This is how Said described one such event: "They stood at the door of the auditorium and distributed a blue leaflet which seemed like a program, but it was, in fact, a denunciation of me as a "terrorist". There were quotations from the PLO, and things that I had said were mixed in with things they claimed the PLO had said about murdering Jews. The idea was to intimidate me and to intimidate the audience from attending." "The issue," according to Prof. Eqqal Ahmad, "is not one of Jew versus gentile. There is a silent covenant within the academic community concerning Israel. The interesting thing is that the number of prominent Jews who have broken the covenant is much larger than the number of gentiles." Four of those Jewish professors came to the assistance of a group of San Diego High School teachers last year, when the teachers were asked to review 13 world history texts and recommend two for use during the 1992-1993 academic year. The first choice of the 19 teachers who volunteered for the project was one titled "World History: The Human Experience," co-authored by Mourir Farah and Andrea Karls. Now in its third edition, it was first published in 1985 and has been adopted in Florida, Georgia, New Mexico and right here in Louisiana. At a meeting where the teachers gathered to discuss their choices, they were surprised to find representatives of the ADL who raised vehement objections. The ADL's regional director in San Diego, Morris Casuto, charged that the text "leans over backward to provide a flattering portrait of Islamic civilization." The teachers were, in turn, encouraged to adopt what had been their fifth choice, a book entitled "Perspectives on the Past," by Larry Krieger. In a crude attempt to convince them to change their choice, the teachers were given copies of an anonymous letter to the school board that began: "I am a young and very enthusiastic world history teacher..." and went on to pan "The Human Experience" and laud Krieger's book. The teachers were "floored" that the board would treat an anonymous letter with respect. "We all resent [the letter's] anonymity, said one of the teachers. It weakens the case."

To the rescue eventually came the four Jewish scholars, all professors of Middle East history: Don Peretz, of the State University of New York at Binghampton, Joel Bein of Stanford, Zachary Lockman of Harvard and Nron Mezvinsky of Connecticut State. The four wrote to the school superintendent expressing their anger over the ADL's tactics. "Frankly and simply stated" wrote Prof. Mezvinsky "I am antagonized as a scholar, teacher and Jew by the charges made against this book by the ADL." Several Catholic professors also came to the defense of the book and the ADL finally backed off. It was a rare victory. Speaking of anonymous letters, one has been used to challenge the holding of tonight's forum and to intimidate the ALA. A lengthy "letter to the editor." apparently planted in a number of Jewish newspapers throughout the country denouncing this forum and alternately signed, "Jewish Taxpayer," "Concerned Jewish Taxpayer" and "Concerned Librarian" warns that: "since public libraries are funded chiefly by local tax dollars... and if the ALA cares more about the welfare of libraries and librarians than about political posturing, it will not want to imperil its constituents' survival by antagonizing the taxpayers who support them." (Washington Jewish Week, June 3). In other words, censorship through blackmail. That the anonymous letter writer raises the issue of taxes seems to be the ultimate chutzpah. While deep cuts are being made in every domestic social program, when our schools have trouble merely functioning, our libraries are gasping for breath just to stay open, and librarians are losing their jobs, Israel will continue to receive its $3 billion dollar "entitlement" plus another $1.5 billion "off-budget," plus another 2 billion of its $10 billion package of loan guarantees, all taken from our tax dollars.

Finally, let's take a look now at what has been happening in Israel and the West Bank and Gaza since the ALA passed its resolutions. The May 7th issue of the Israeli paper Hadashot contained a summary of a report by the French organization Journalists Without Borders, which was originally based, among other things, on publications issued by the Israeli human rights organization, B'tselem. Their report found Israel topping the list of democratic states which violate freedom of the press. To the ADL, he is the face of the enemy. The report not only vilified the oppression of Palestinian newspapers and journalists is considerably harsher. Of the 300 Palestinian journalists working for foreign media their in 1992, 18 were in detention. Since the beginning of the intifada through the end of last year, 150 Palestinian journalists were arrested, 35 were given green identity cards, preventing their entry into East Jerusalem and Israel and others were expelled. Since the first of the year, here is a sample of what has been happening. In January two American photographers were arrested while taking pictures in the Shati refugee camp in Gaza On the same day, Palestinian journalist Mashid Arabeed was shot in the knee by an Israeli soldier while filming a confrontation with Israeli troops in Khan Yunis. A newspaper report by Reuters the other day said he had been shot again, the fourth time he has been shot four times. On January 21, three Palestinian journalists were arrested and held for 11 hours while filming confrontations between Palestinian demonstrators and Israeli troops in Jabalya camp. On January 24, Members of Israeli intelligence stormed into several Palestinian press offices and gave the owners written requests to report to the military government's office. On January 28, Marwan Ghoul, a cameraman for the Reuters was arrested in Gaza while filming confrontations with Israeli troops in Jabalya camp. On February 6, he was again arrested in Gaza City, along with his brother, Ashraf, and Taher Shreiteh, also with Reuters. They were accused of being in a restricted military area. After interrogation, they sent to the Ansar II detention center in Gaza. Shreiteh had been one of the 415 Palestinians expelled to Lebanon, but was returned when Reuters appealed in his behalf. He was recently honored by the Washington Press Club. On the same day a photographer for British TV was shot in the leg again with a rubber bullet and held in custody while soldiers fired on protesters in Gaza City. Recently On March 27, the three were again arrested, and sent to the Ansar II detention center.. On March 30, Israeli authorities ordered the Hebron-based Al-Zahra press service shut down for six months after seditionist material had been found on the premises. On May 12, Israeli soldiers raided Ghou's office and confiscated its contents. They also took his identity card and that of a colleague.

The issue that the ALA should be deliberating here is not the question of Israeli censorship; that was decided last year. The question is whether this organization, one that is dedicated to the freedom of opinion and expression, and the widest circulation of information, is going to allow itself to be silenced. Evidently the answer rendered by the ALA Council is yes. The council's vote today to rescind the resolution on censorship validate is an act of cowardice and subservience to those forces of thought control and censorship I have just described. The ALA Council has become yet another "Israeli Occupied Territory." The ALA membership will have an opportunity to take a monumental act of moral courage Monday night by reaffirming the resolution when it comes before the membership meeting. If it fails to do so, this convention will have provided another sad footnote in the annals of censorship. That is the decision that you are your colleagues are going to make. I trust you will make the courageous choice. [Jeffrey Blankfort was invited as a speaker at the ALA convention by the Task Force on Israeli Censorship & Palestinian Libraries, head by David Williams of the Chicago Public Library.]
indeed, the all the way to Apion--but her tone is trenchantly post-modern. How dare the deity prefer Abel's sacrifice. Dr. Spock would never have approved, and Johnnie Cochran in his closing statement undoubtedly would have told the jury to "send a message" to the ultimate authority figure by acquitting Cain. Schwartz settles feminist scores by playing up episodes like David's rape of Tamar. A describable act, surely, but in what other sacred text is a rape victim allowed to speak out against her rapist? The book praising and justifying such kindred bodies. It is to promote the ideals which the Jews have carried forward through thousands of years of persecution and by much sacrifice. We must learn to realize that our sacrifices have enhanced the quality of our achievements, and that the overcoming of obstacles is part of our attainments. Men differ in ability, however great the average ability of the Jews is, but every single Jew can make his own contribution to the Jewish way of life. Every single one of us can do that for himself. Every one of us can declare: "What is mean is not for us." We bespeak what is best, what is noblest and finest in all civilization. This is our heritage. We have survived persecution because of the virtues and sacrifices of our ancestors. It is for us to follow in that path. It is the Jewish tradition, and the Jewish law, and the Jewish spirit which prepare us for the lessons of life. In Palestine the younger generation is taught that heritage and as a result they live for the highest and best of what life is and what it may be. To my mind, in order that the world may gain from what is best in us, we should aid in the effort of the Jews in Palestine. We should all support the Zionist movement, although you or I do not think of settling in Palestine, for there has developed and can develop in that old land to a higher degree, the spirit of which Mr. Aaronsohn speaks. With our assistance the Jew there will develop to fullest manhood and manfully perform his fullest duty to his people and to his country. You ask what the Young Men's Hebrew Association can do? It can do much. It can achieve almost anything worthwhile if its members respond to this hope, if they live in the spirit of our highest traditions, if they are resolved to make new records for a people distinguished for its great lives. [=]

60436. Brandeis, Louis; Zionist Organization of America. Brandeis on Zionism: A Collection of Addresses and Statements By Louis D. Brandeis: Part 07: To be a Jew. District of Columbia: Zionist Organization of America, 1942. [This is one of Brandeis's earliest speeches on Zionism. It was delivered on 5/18/1913, before the Young Mens Hebrew Association of Chelsea, Mass. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]]

FORTNIGHT AGO it was my privilege to spend the evening with one of the most interesting, brilliant and remarkable men I have ever met. He is the son of a poor Roumanian Jew who migrated from his native land thirty-two years ago to take up his residence in Palestine, the land of his fathers. The son, who is now at the head of the Jewish Agricultural Experiment Station in Palestine, is Aaron Aaronsohn. He made what is considered one of the most remarkable and useful discoveries in recent years, and possibly of all times. He discovered what is known as the wild wheat,* the plant which botanists, all over the world, had been trying for years to locate. There is a hope that, by reason of this discovery, the food products of the world may be immeasurably increased in quantity; that it may be possible to extend the area of wheat culture by utilizing land long believed to be unfit for that purpose because of the lack of moisture. He told us that it was his persistent efforts to improve the fertility of Palestine which had led to the discovery of the wild wheat, a feat which has impressed the Government of the United States and which may mean much for the future of Palestine. He related another story even more remarkable than the first. We were discussing the series of unpleasant occurrences in New York City, to which a Jewish name was connected last year. [The reference is to the murder in 1912 of a certain Hermann Rosenthal by gangsters acting under the instructions of police lieutenant Charles A. Becker, who as involved in police graft in connection with gambling houses. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] Then Mr. Aaronsohn told us that in Palestine, in the little communities which have grown up in the last thirty-two years and now number 10000 Jewish souls, not a single crime was known to have been committed by one of our people during all that time. In our conversation I asked him: "How do you account for that fact?" He answered: "I account for it as follows. Every member of those communities is brought up to realize his obligations to his people. He is told of the great difficulties it passed through, and of the long years of martyrdom it experienced. All that is best in Jewish history is made to live in him, and by this means he is imbued with a high sense of honor and responsibility for the whole people. You will find in the children," he added, "none of the weakness, none of the servility, which they or their parents had when they came to Palestine." What is being achieved in Palestine can perhaps be achieved only there in the fullest degree; but the lesson applies to the Jews all over the world. We have our obligations, the same noblesse oblige. Our traditions are the same. They have been transmitted also to us. We have not applied them in the same Association and was published in the first issue of the Menorah Journal (1/1915) of which Justice Brandeis was then a consulting editor. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]

In their self-governing colonies, over forty in number, ranging in population from a few families to some 2000, the Jews have pure democracy, and since those self-governing colonies were establishing a true democracy, they gave women equal rights with men, without so much as a doubt on the part of any settler. And women contributed, like the men, not only in the toil of that which is narrowly called the home, but in the solution of broader and more difficult problems. [=]

60438. Brandeis, Louis; Zionist Organization of America. Brandeis on Zionism: A Collection of Addresses and Statements By Louis D. Brandeis: Part 17: A Call to the Educated Jew. District of Columbia: Zionist Organization of America, 1942. [This challenge to the educated Jew was delivered at a conference of the Intercollegiate Menorah Association and was published in the first issue of the Menorah Journal (1/1915) of which Justice Brandeis was then a consulting editor. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]]

WHILE I was in Cleveland a few weeks ago, a young man who has won distinction fulfills the bench told me this incident from his early life. He was born in a little village of Western Russia where the opportunities for schooling were meager. When he was thirteen his parents sent him to the nearest city in search of an education. There, in Bialystok, were good secondary schools and good high schools; but the Russian law, which limits the percentage of Jewish pupils in any school, barred his admission. Educational opportunities for Jews in Tsarist Russia were restricted by two orders of the Minister of Public Instructions, issued in July, 1887. They limited the proportion of Jewish students in the universities and secondary schools to 10%. And finally, the Jewish capacity for hard work was also a product of Jewish life, a life characterized by temperate, moral living continued throughout the ages, and protected by those marvelous sanitary regulations which were enforced through the religious sanctions. Remember, too, that amidst the hardship to which our ancestors were exposed it was only those with endurance who survived. So let us not imagine that what we call our achievements are wholly or even largely our own. The phrase “self-made man” is most misleading. We have power to mar but we alone cannot make. The relatively large success achieved by Jews wherever the door of opportunity was opened to them is due, in the main, to this product of Jewish life, to this treasure which we have acquired by inheritance, and which we are in duty bound to transmit unimpaired, if not augmented, to coming generations. But our inheritance comprises far more than this combination of qualities making for effectiveness. These are but means by which man may earn a living or achieve other success. Our Jewish trust comprises also that which makes the living worthy and success of value. It brings us that body of moral and intellectual perceptions, the point of view and the ideals, which are expressed in the term “Jewish spirit; and therein lies the truly striking fact that the spirit of the Jew was much more than an education. It included that combination of qualities which enabled and impelled these three men to give, and the boy to seek and to acquire, an education. These qualities embrace: first, intellectual capacity; second, an appreciation of the value of education; third, indomitable will; fourth, capacity for hard work. It was these qualities which enabled the lad, not only to acquire but to so utilize an education that, coming to America, ignorant of our language and of our institutions he attained in comparatively few years the important office he has so honorably filled. [The reference, according to Rabbi Solomon Goldberg, is to the late Judge Manuel Levine (1881-1939), former Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the Eighth Ohio District. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] Whence comes this combination of qualities of mind, body and character? These are qualities with which every one of us is familiar, singly and in combination; which you find in friends and relatives; and which others doubtless discover in you. They are qualities possessed by most Jews who have attained distinction or other success. In combination, they may properly be called Jewish qualities. For they have not come to us by accident; they were developed by three thousand years of civilization, and nearly two thousand years of persecution; developed through our religion and spiritual life; through our traditions; and through the social and political conditions under which our ancestors lived. They are, in short, the product of Jewish life. Our intellectual capacity was developed by the almost continuous training of the mind throughout twenty-five centuries. The Torah led the “People of the Book” to intellectual pursuits at times when most of the Aryan peoples were illiterate. Religion imposed the use of the mind upon the Jews, indirectly as well as directly. It demanded of the Jew not merely the love, but also the end of God. This necessarily involved a study of the Law. The weaker ones passed either out of Judaism or out of existence. That struggle persecution was to lead a constant struggle for existence. That struggle was so severe that only the fittest could survive. Survival was not possible except where there was strong will, a will both to live and to live as a Jew. The weaker ones passed either out of Judaism or out of existence. And the Jewish capacity for hard work was as product of Jewish life, a life characterized by temperate, moral living continued throughout the ages, and protected by those marvelous sanitary regulations which were enforced through the religious sanctions. Remember, too, that amidst the hardship to which our ancestors were exposed it was only those with endurance who survived. So let us not imagine that what we call our achievements are wholly or even largely our own. The phrase “self-made man” is most misleading. We have power to mar but we alone cannot make. The relatively large success achieved by Jews wherever the door of opportunity was opened to them is due, in the main, to this product of Jewish life, to this treasure which we have acquired by inheritance, and which we are in duty bound to transmit unimpaired, if not augmented, to coming generations. But our inheritance comprises far more than this combination of qualities making for effectiveness. These are but means by which man may earn a living or achieve other success. Our Jewish trust comprises also that which makes the living worthy and success of value. It brings us that body of moral and intellectual perceptions, the point of view and the ideals, which are expressed in the term “Jewish spirit; and therein lies the truly striking fact that the spirit of the Jew was much more than an education. It included that combination of qualities which enabled and impelled these three men to give, and the boy to seek and to acquire, an education. These qualities embrace: first, intellectual capacity; second, an appreciation of the value of education; third, indomitable will; fourth, capacity for hard work. It was these qualities which enabled the lad, not only to acquire but to so utilize an education that, coming to America, ignorant of our language and of our institutions he attained in comparatively few years the important office he has so honorably filled. [The reference, according to Rabbi Solomon Goldberg, is to the late Judge Manuel Levine (1881-1939), former Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of the Eighth Ohio District. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] Whence comes this combination of qualities of mind, body and character? These are qualities with which every one of us is familiar, singly and in combination; which you find in friends and relatives; and which others doubtless discover in you. They are qualities possessed by most Jews who have attained distinction or other success. In combination, they may properly be called Jewish qualities. For they have not come to us by accident; they were developed by three thousand years of civilization, and nearly two thousand years of persecution; developed through our religion and spiritual life; through our traditions; and through the social and political conditions under which our ancestors lived. They are, in short, the product of Jewish life. Our intellectual capacity was developed by the almost continuous training of the mind throughout twenty-five centuries. The Torah led the “People of the Book” to intellectual pursuits at times when most of the Aryan peoples were illiterate. Religion imposed the use of the mind upon the Jews, indirectly as well as directly. It demanded of the Jew not merely the love, but also the end of God. This necessarily involved a study of the Law. The weaker ones passed either out of Judaism or out of existence. That struggle... particularly effective in promoting democratic ideals among the Jews, because of their deep-seated community feeling. To describe the Jew as an individualist is to state a most misleading half-truth. He has to a rare degree merged his individuality and his interests in the community of which he forms a part. This is evidenced among other things by his attitude toward immortality. Nearly every other people has reconciled this world of suffering with the idea of a beneficent Providence by contemplating for the individual. The Jew, however, has looked toward his own present ills by regarding this world as merely the preparation for another, in which those living righteously here would find individual reward hereafter. Of all nations, Israel "takes precedence in suffering"; [cf. Leopold Zunz, Die synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters, Berlin, 1855, p. 9, and Idem, The Sufferings of the Jews During the Middle Ages (Engl. trans.), New York, 1907, p. 19. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] but, despite our national tragedy, the doctrine of individual immortality found relatively slight lodgment among us. As Ahad Ha'am so beautifully said: "Judaism did not turn heavenward and create in Heaven an eternal habitation of souls. It found 'eternal life' on earth, by strengthening the social feeling in the individual; by making him regard himself not as an isolated being with an existence bounded by birth and death, but as part of a larger whole, as a limb of the social body. This conception shifts the center of gravity of the ego not from the flesh to the spirit, but from the individual to the community; and concurrently with this shifting, the problem of life becomes a problem not of individual, but of social life. I live for the sake of the perpetuation and happiness of the community of which I am a member; I die to make room for new individuals, who will mould the community afresh and not allow it to stagnate and remain forever in one position. When the individual thus values the community as his own life, and strives after its happiness as though it were his individual well-being, he finds satisfaction, and no longer feels so keenly the bitterness of his individual existence, because he sees the end for which he lives and suffers." [From "Flesh and Spirit," in Selected Essays by Ahad Ha'am, Transl. from the Hebrew by Leon Simon, Philadelphia, 1912, pp. 146-47. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] is not that the very essence of the truly triumphant twentieth-century democracy?

Such is our inheritance; such the estate which we hold in trust. And what are the terms of that trust; what the obligations imposed? The short answer is noblesse oblige; and its command is twofold. It imposes no less important duties upon us in respect to our own conduct as individuals: it imposes the movement which is destined to lead to the solution of the Jewish problem. Zionism points the way to a solution, because it will enable the Jewish people to help them, selves and thus be also of greatest service to the world, Zionism will make it possible for Jews to put an end to wholesale misery and not merely alleviate it. I interpret your presence here as an expression of your faith; as testimony to your interest; as a present ills by regarding this world as merely the preparation for inheritance do less than the Irish, the Serbians, or the Bulgars? And must we not, like them, have a land where the Jewish life may be naturally led, the Jewish language spoken, and the Jewish spirit prevail? Surely we must, and that land is our fathers' land; it is Palestine. The undying longing for Zion is a fact of deepest significance, a manifestation in the struggle for existence.

The establishment of the legally secured Jewish home is no longer a dream. For more than a generation brave pioneers have been building the foundations of our new-old home. It remains for us to build the super-structure. The Ghetto walls are now falling. Jewish life cannot be preserved and developed, assimilation cannot be averted, unless there be reestablished in the fatherland a center from which the Jewish spirit may radiate and give to the Jews scattered throughout the world that inspiration which springs from the memories of a great past and the hope of a great future. The glorious past can really live only if it becomes the mirror of a glorious future; and to this end the Jewish home in Palestine is essential. We Jews of prosperous America above all need its inspiration. [–]

THIS GREAT ASSEMBLY manifests the essential unity of the Jewish people. Those who are in this crowded hall, together with those who have failed to gain admittance, constitute a large part of the Jews of Massachusetts. You it testify by your presence to your great interest in the establishment of the legally secured Jewish home which is destined to lead to the solution of the Jewish problem. Zionism the way to a solution, because it will enable the Jewish people to help them, selves and thus be also of greatest service to the world, Zionism will make it possible for Jews to put an end to wholesale misery and not merely alleviate it. I interpret your presence here as an expression of your faith; as testimony to your interest; as a promise to aid in carrying forward the Jewish ideals; as a determination to realize the Jewish hope of the twentieth century, Realization demands of you, of course, much more than expressions of sympathy. It demands action, and since you are Americans, we expect from you that you bind yourselves together by organizations into an effective body. By so doing you will not only manifest indomitable will; you will fashion the indispensable instrument for achievement. Stand up, each and every one of you, and be counted. Join the Zionist Organization and shoulder your part in this great movement. Only by bearing your part can you be true to the Jewish people, just as you can be true to the American Government only by doing your share. No American, man or woman, may shirk when a great cause is to be striven for and won. Such is our duty as Jews and as Americans. By battling for the Zionist cause, the American ideal of democracy, of social justice and of liberty will be given wider expression. By such action the manhood and womanhood of American Jews will be made manifest to the world. By concrete action, the prayer of twenty centuries will be made to come true. The great Herzl was right when he said in his Altheimul, "If you wish it, it is no fable." Dreams may be made into realities. [Altheimul (Old-New-Land) is the name of a utopian novel by Theodor Herzl, published in German in 1902. Its title was suggested to the author by the Altheimul (old new synagogue) of Prague, Czechoslovakia. An English translation of this work appeared only as late as 1941. (Old-New-Land, Altheimul, Translated by Lotta Leversohn, New York, Bloch ] [Note added by Zionist Organization of America.]}
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

60440. Brandeis, Louis; Zionist Organization of America. Brandeis on Zionism: A Collection of Addresses and Statements By Louis D. Brandeis: Part 36: Realization Will Not Come As a Gift. District of Columbia: Zionist Organization of America, 1942. [The following address was delivered before the New England members of the Palestine Labor Zionist Movement, communities, frequently held through the month of March, by the wandering fund raiser. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]]

I AM GLAD that, besides some older Zionists, we have sitting here many others, men and women who are far younger. For it is through these younger folk, aided by the older, that we shall find the full realization of our plans. To some of you it may seem that our progress has not been rapid, but when you compare where we are today, and where we stood ten years ago, when I first spoke to Boston Jews about Palestine, you will see how long a way we have traveled. Ten years ago the Homeland was a dream, a dream for which realization seemed so far. Then, we could do little more than hope and prepare ourselves for realization. Five years ago, with the Balfour Declaration, that dream began to take on the shape of opportunity. Now, for over four years the opportunity has been ours. The question is merely whether we shall take hold in that earnest, effective, and intelligent way which will make out of that opportunity the realization of our fondest dream. We know that much has not been done, but we know very much that has. What has been accomplished is not merely providing opportunity. The first steps toward the achievement of realization have been taken. We have found in the Land not merely an open door, but a country in which all is possible which had pictured to ourselves as desirable. It is now four years since de Haas and I went together to Palestine. I had read much about it, heard much about from those who had been there, and reasoned much about it. But it was only by going there that I could convince myself in fullness how much was open to us and why we should endeavor to work out the problem, not as a dream, but as a beautiful reality. I found difficulties, but the difficulties were inviting because in respect to everyone of them solution seemed to be possible. To my mind, there is nothing about the Palestinian problem which the we cannot solve, if they will to solve it. To solve it, we must have the superhuman effort of extraordinary individuals. We need only the everyday earnest effort which we are making, and by which we are achieving successes in other fields of activity all over the world. If the persistence, devotion and ingenuity, readiness of self-sacrifice and self-control which have given Jews high station individually in every branch of human activity and in every country on earth is practiced by those who go to Palestine, and is manifested by those who have an interest it, there is nothing worthy which cannot be realized there. None of the pictures which have been painted exhaust the possibilities that actually exist. But realization will not come as a gift; and it will not result from the mere giving of money. It must be earned, earned by effort, earned by a persistent, active desire to have and to hold that which lies before us. Some are making that effort on the fighting lines and are taking part there happily and effectively in the upbuilding of Palestine. Some who have gone from America have played a most creditable, as well as interesting part in that effort. Many of you know what the Hadassah Medical Unit has been doing. It undertook to make health possible in Palestine. And it was not a difficult problem. For the lack of health was largely due to malaria. Happily, science enables us to grapple with this disease which had devastated many countries of the world for thousands of years. We know how to rid a land of it. It is a perfectly simple thing, a thing as simple as the removal of typhoid which once was a curse in so many of our cities. The Medical Unit, in connection with others, undertook to eliminate malaria. It did so not only because malaria interfered with the joy of life, but because it is the disease which interfered most with self-support and the building up of the country. There remains some malaria in parts of the country. But that problem is being grappled with and in a very few years Palestine will be one of the healthiest countries in the world. For otherwise all the conditions in Palestine are conducive to a healthy life in body as well as soul. Men may go to Palestine now and settle there with the assurance that they will be able to work there as well as in any part of the world. To have been assured, within four years, the elimination of malaria is a great achievement. For hard work is the stuff of which Palestine must be built. Not Halukkah gifts [Halukkah, the Hebrew word for distribution, was the system for rendering relief and support to those Jews who came to Palestine to pray, study and die. It was usually distributed by the Kolelim system for rendering relief and support to those Jews who came to Palestine to pray, study and die. The funds for this purpose were obtained from various groups, and through the medium of voluntary contributions from the wandering fund raiser. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]], whatever their nature, but the ability to make men self-supporting is the prime requisite. They must develop themselves and their families in the course of the development of their country. For immigrants into Palestine to become self-supporting is, in some ways, more difficult than it was for those coming to America, or going to Canada, or Australia, or South America. It is more difficult for this reason. America and Canada, South America and Australia were new countries with virgin soil. Palestine is a new-old country, old in having suffered for centuries from abuse. Its wonderful trees had been destroyed. Its water-courses had suffered from the destruction of trees. Its fertile land, no longer protected by the trees, had been washed away by the flow of the waters. Thus Palestine presents a new situation. I mean new to those minds are accustomed to such things as the frontiersman, going out to build his hut with his own hands, with the expectation that next year, or the year after, it will be superseded by something better. Palestine not like that. You must build homes for people and they must be built substantially, of stone, or cement, at a considerable cost. The slight structure which frontiersmen built in other countries is not feasible. So we have in Palestine the housing problem.

We have had in Palestine another problem which was very serious. The cost of living is very high; higher there in many ways than here. The war made it so, with its great influx of gold through Egypt. Jews coming there from different parts of the world, largely impoverished, came thus into a country in which the cost of the bare necessities of life was great. We were, therefore, confronted with this problem: How can we make it possible for these people coming to this sparsely settled land, to supply themselves with homes and get a living from farms which they must first make ready for cultivation? In many places in Palestine you must make the land as well as raise the crops on it. Moreover, it will be seven years from the time you plant your orange trees before you get a return. Just as water is necessary for irrigation, credit is necessary there to enable people to conduct their business operations, to become self-supporting. We turned our minds, therefore, to devising instruments through which credits might be extended to deserving men and women, not as gifts, not as charity, but to enable them to make a living. The Palestine Cooperative Co. [The assets of the Palestine Cooperative Co. have been taken over by the Palestine Economic Corp. [Note added by Zionist Organization of America compilers.]] undertook to deal with that question in two ways. To provide loans to cooperative societies of producers or consumers and to provide building loans for those who undertake construction. These are examples of the kind of things the Palestine Development Council wishes to promote. It wishes also to aid in the development of the Rutenberg project, the called hydro-electric plan for harnessing the Jordan to provide the country with power and irrigation. Everything that we have undertaken to do has been directly in the line of production, in the effort to make men and men effective, to give opportunity to the individual as the Mandate has given an opportunity to the Jews of the world to make Palestine a Homeland. Our prime endeavor is to encourage initiative. It is not our brains, but the brains of the hundreds of thousands of Jews who are to go to Palestine, that will build up that country. What we are endeavoring to encourage is not anything new. It is exactly the thing which Jews are doing throughout the world. Those of us who do not wish to go, or not, may also have a vital part in the building of Palestine. But it cannot be done merely by giving or investing money. To have a vital part we must add to investment a willingness to take the trouble to learn what the needs of Palestine are and how they are being, or should be, met. To achieve for Palestine what the American Jew can do for it and for the American Jew what Palestine can do for him, we must make the development of the Homeland a part of the daily thought of the Jew. here are ample means of acquiring knowledge about it, and the happenings in that new-old land can be followed with the absorbing interest with which we follow the growth of a child. We are not asking you to give. We expect you to get a return on your investment, a return in money. But the greatest return which you will get is in the joy you will have in watching the development of the country. And when good fortune leads you to Palestine, and you see what Jews are doing there, what Jewish life really is, what it means to be a Jew in a Jewish country, then you will get satisfactions which will make you regard your cash dividends as negligible. Make it your business to know what is going on there; know what has been achieved there. Confirm and enrich your knowledge, if it lies within your power, by visiting the country and seeing things for yourselves. If you do that you will enjoy the greatest experience of your life. [a]

60441. Branigan, William. “‘Schindlers List Fuss in Philippines: Censors Object to Sex [while Filipinos are indifferent to the political purpose of the movie, they object to sexual intercourse, breasts and orgasm scenes, finding the movie to be pornography; in the Philippines, the film has been mocked as ‘Schindlers Lust’],” in Seattle Times, March 9, 1994, p. A19, [TXT]

60442. Brauchli, Marcus; Johnson, Ian; Lachica, Eduardo. “Money Flap Undercuts Chinese Lobbying; FBI Warning on Donations Also Could Hurt Corporate Campaign; For Years, Corporate America, Along With Some Academics and Retired US Officials, Have Been Urging China To get Down in the Trenches And Start Fighting For Its Interests in Washington,” in Wall Street Journal, March 11, 1997, p. A19. A year ago Jiang Zemin established an institute to lobby the US Congress, which has long been perceived by the Chinese as the center of hostility to the China in the US government. This group, the US-China Educational Foundation, has $30000 month budget for lobbying, and was backed by American International Group, Boeing Corp., General Electric Co., General Motors Corp., IBM Corp., and Motorola Inc., all of which have significant economic interests in China. The institute retained Edelman Public Relations Worldwide of New York. The Chinese are widely seen following the model of the Taiwanese, who have long provided vast amounts of money to American politicians, as diverse as Sen. Jesse Helms and Pres. Bill Clinton. Xinhua Press Agency stated that reports that China has bribed the Democratic National Committee and members of Congress as “ill-motivated fabrications”. [b]

60443. Brenner, Lenni. “Jews and Israel U.S. Jewish Establishment and Zionism: An Identity Crisis By Lenni Brenner”, in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, October-November 1995. The Israel-Diaspora Identity Crisis: A Looming Disaster is a recent pamphlet by Isi Leibler, of the World Jewish Congress governing board. It is typical of a strange genre of Jewish establishment handwringing spawned by the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey. Leibler bemoans the “eventual disappearance of...perhaps even a majority of Diaspora Jews.” He writes that “It may well be too late for anything to halt that slide to oblivion [because] at least half the Diaspora’s Jews are not affiliated with any form of institutionalized Jewish activity.” In reality, however, world Jewry isn’t disappearing or in crisis. It is thriving. American Jewry is the richest religious or ethnic grouping in the country and Diaspora Jews are the most educated stratum in the world. It is the Jewish establishment and Zionism that face “catastrophic decline,” not the Jews. The NUPS counted 3.2 million American households containing one or more present or former Jews, coming to 8.2 million individuals. Of these, 4.2 million were born Jews who considered themselves Jewish by religion. Another 185,000 were Jews “by choice,” with about 70% of these formally converted. Another 1.1 million “secular Jews” are born Jews unaffiliated to any religion. Rolled together, these are considered the “core Jews,” the clientele of organized Jewry. The survey also counted 1.3 million people of Jewish descent following a non-Jewish religion. Some 210,000 personally had adopted another creed. Another 415,000 adults were raised from birth in another religion. Additionally there are 700,000 youngsters under 18 with a core Jewish parent but raised in a non-Jewish faith. Another 1.35 million Gentile adults lived in these households. Some were roommates. Others were sexual partners "without benefit of clergy." The rest were spouses of core Jews. About 69% of married Jews lived with another born Jew or convert to Judaism. But the 31% married to Gentiles is dramatically up from a mere 8% in 1970. And the percentage continues to rise. The intermarriage rate between Jews and Gentiles has increased from 1889-1990 was 32%. Moreover, in our feminist age, the percentage of spouses who converted to Judaism dropped to 9% by 1990. Only 25% of the children under 18 in mixed marriages were being raised as Jews. 45% were raised in another religion and 30% without any religion. According to Steven Cohen, an establishment sociologist, “The vast majority of mixed-married Jews will have non-Jewish grandchildren." Most people marry someone they meet in their neighborhood, or at work or school. Since the onset of massive suburbanization, most Jews don’t live in Jewish neighborhoods. With anti-Semitism in free-fall, Jews are found throughout the economy. “College is a disaster area for Judaism, Jewish loyalty and Jewish identity”: Highlighting the Jewish establishment’s intractable problem is an assessment by Irving Greenberg of the National Jewish Center for Learning & Leadership, that “college is a disaster area for Judaism, Jewish loyalty and Jewish identity.” One study, David Singer's "A Profile of the Jewish Academic," bluntly declared that “Jewish professors...regard themselves as academics first and as Jews second.” A June 16, 1995 article on Hillel, B’nai Brith’s student arm, in the Jewish Telegraphic Agency’s Daily News Bulletin, reports that “of the more than 400000 Jewish students...only about...12.5% are involved in any Hillel activities....25% are so alienated from Jewish life that they can be counted out." With the patronage of billionaire Edgar Bronfman, Hillel hopes to reach the rest. But these students, a bulwark of socio-economic liberalism, are not about to join an outfit with Paine Webber Reception Centers, as at Harvard's Hillel house. Zionism to the rescue! The establishment hopes to send 50,000 teenagers per year to Israel to find their roots. This year they spent $1 million on subsidized tours. “An increase over 1994 of fewer than 500,” was the result described in “Can't Give a Ticket to Israel Away,” in the July 27 Jerusalem Report. The richest Americans, Jews are the most traveled. But “only 20%...have ever visited Israel,” says an Israeli Ministry of Tourism official. “Without an agreement with a synagogue or youth movement,” teens “don't think much about visiting.” That is only part of the explanation. The Reform movement is the country’s largest Jewish sect. Its rabbinical students must spend a year in Israel. Yet, according to Cohen, “much of the Reform public doesn't share the passionate involvement...that has come to characterize the...institution.” Only 3% of Reform parents had “a sizable interest” in their children settling in Israel. Non-Orthodox Ceremonies: Zionism’s Reform rabbis never stop talking about “prophetic Judaism” and its “passion” for “social justice.” But none is a prophet “in his wrath.” This year a delegation went to the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem to conduct a mixed-gender service. However the Daily News Bulletin for March 17 reported that the Reform rabbis submitted to performing it “at the Wall’s southern flank, the area the Israeli government...seems to have unofficially designated for...ceremonies of the non-Orthodox.” They met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. He evaded dealing with the fact that in Israel Reform rabbis can’t perform legally valid marriages or divorces. And then they did nothing. Their Israeli cothraughts were outraged: “Sometimes I feel that there is no real commitment to build a Reform movement in Israel,” Rabbi Meir Azari said “as other Israeli Reform rabbis nodded their heads in agreement.” These Americans know that mobilizing their congregations to fight seriously for their movement’s rights in Israel will only increase their congregants’ alienation from Zionism. But, as long as they don’t have their rights, preaching Zionism to their ranks is wasted lung power. Their youth resolve pro-Zionist Reform’s dead-end contradiction by voting with their feet, i.e., overwhelmingly opting for biological assimilation. An American Jewish Committee poll conceded that only 22% of American Jews still think of themselves as Zionists, while 32% put distance between themselves and Israel. But the dramatic reality behind those numbers is that the world’s Jews are moving in two directions. Most, especially the youth, are exploding away from Jewish identification, at greater or lesser speed, while a minority are imploding into a fanatic swarm. Recently a U.S. friend of Ariel Sharon punched dovish Israeli Communications Minister Shlomot Aloni, a woman who endorses Arab-Jewish marriages. The International Rabbinical Coalition for Israel contains elements who New York’s Forward says “have even suggested that the assassination of Prime Minister Rabin or Foreign Minister Peres would be hallowedly approved.” Even Leibler warns that relying on pilgrimages to Israel “as the panacea for all the Diaspora’s ills is somewhat naive.” Baruch Goldstein, “the murderer from Kiryat Arba,” came from Brooklyn, only to be “nurtured in Israel’s religious society.” Some Zionists dread this polarization. They don’t want to be locked up in a “community” that consists only of themselves and these wackos. Reform’s Albert Vorspan says that “many liberal Jews are beginning to ask themselves painful questions….Am I more connected to a Lubavitch chasid, a racist JDL hoodlum, or a rabbi who panders to Pat Robertson than I am to a Christian who takes social gospel seriously?” But don’t wait for such “moderates” to break with the ultra. Most will remain joined-at-the-temple to the crazies by their mutual belief that the Jews of the world are one nation. By now, even the most conservative will ask why Washington still gives Israel billions per year if the majority of Jews never give Zionism a single penny. But didn’t Mark Twain truthfully jest that “the United States does not have a hereditary criminal class, except for Congress?” The Forward has quoted sociologist Cohen as saying that “if money matters, Jews count a hell of a lot and Israel-oriented Jews give a disproportionate amount to presidential candidates.” To be sure, opposition to Arab nationalism, anti-Semitism and concern about Islamic fundamentalism have been augmented at times by “statesmen” to justify patronage of Zionism. But ethno-religious demagoguery is the black-lung disease of democracy. No one should be “shocked, shocked” that, in a capitalist society, pandering to the chauvinism of the richest stratum in the country became a central leitmotiv of our politics. The only thing that is unique is the fact that today’s Jews are the “beneficiaries” rather than the victims of the opportunists. On the June 28th first anniversary of his death, Menachem Schneerson, the late Lubavitcher rebbe, was given the Congressional Gold Medal, America’s highest civilian award. In an accompanying message, Bill Clinton welcomed the opportunity to “recognize a revered leader who was a great moral inspiration…to people of all creeds and faiths.” Newt Gingrich praised Schneerson for living his ideals. (His “ideals” included opposition to restoring any land to the Palestinians.) Orthodoxy is only 6.8% of American Jewry, and even the majority of Orthodox reject the widely-held Lubavitcher notion that Schneerson was the messiah. The movement disguists most other Jews.

Yet there was no secularist or assimilationist opposition when the bipartisan trashmouths praised this oboecamus, in gross violation of at least the spirit of the First Amendment’s separation of religion and state. Overwhelmingly Democrats, these “liberals” take such “Jew-wooling” as “just politics.” Jewish chauvinism has no coercive statepower over Jews here. Therefore few feel any obligation to combat it. Zionism is avoided rather than opposed. Except for a tiny minority of old leftists, campus radicals, and some others, Zionism is frowned upon because it has nothing rational to offer Jews, rather than because it oppresses Arabs. Once they opt out of Jewish separatism, most youth have no more interest in the Middle East than their Gentile peers. Nevertheless principled agitation by those of us—Jew, Gentile, atheist and believer alike—who worship the First Amendment’s anti-establishment clause can reach those bright Jewish kids, and their Gentile colleagues. We have religious peace because we have separation of religion and state. We can convince them that the people of Israel/Palestine are as entitled to that same peace. But the only time that country will ever see it is under a new, secular Arab-Israeli regime that separates religion and state, exactly as we do here. Then our politicians—unworthy heirs to Jefferson and Madison—will not be able to get away with slipping domestic Zionist money into their campaign coffers, and sliding billions out of the taxpayers’ pockets to put it in the hands of an Israeli theocracy. [Lenni Brenner is the author of Jews in America Today, The Iron Wall, and the new AET White Paper The Anti-Defamation League’s National Director is Crazy Like a Foxman, all of which are available through the AET Book Club. [=]

60445. Bronner, Ethan. “Israel Shifting To Army Built On Pay, Not Patriotism”, in Seattle Times, September 2, 1994. p. A3. [TXT] The Israeli Defense Forces will switch to an all profession military. Already, it is rejecting many from obligatory duty and investing its funds in more advanced weapons systems. This will lead to far-reaching changes in the Israeli society: where workforce discrimination was legally enforced against anyone who was not in the military [such as most Jewish women and all Palestinian Israeli citizens]; failure to have served in the military meant that an Israeli could never obtain a job. Amram Mitniza, former military planner and now mayor of Haifa, notes that the military must abandon its old socialization role and begin preparing for the new round of wars that Israel will fight. Alex Fishman, a military analysts at Maariv, claims that, ‘Israel’s society is growing less idealistic and people want to be paid for what they do. We are adopting, even if we don’t admit it, the military culture of the West.’ [sic: he fails to observe that no military in world has conducted a generation long occupation of a country unprecedented brutality: this played a key, if unacknowledged role in the erosion of ‘Zionist idealism’.] At the same time, youth groups such as Nahal (‘Fighting Pioneer Youth’) established by Ben-Gurion to seize and settle Palestinian lands, and to inculate the value system of the ‘Zionist settler-farmer-soldier’, which established 85 permanent Jewish-only settlements, is nearing collapse since few youth want to join it anymore. [TXT]

In the vast desert of works supposedly portraying the reality of the Middle East, Kamal Boullata’s Faithful Witnesses is a refreshing oasis. How does art flourish in an atmosphere of tension, fear and repression; when there are long strikes and long curfews; when schools are closed and fathers unemployed; when one is surrounded by the dead, the wounded and grieving? Through their carefully drawn pictures, Palestinian children narrate the story of their daily existence under Israeli military occupation, their visions of the past, and their hopes and dreams for the future.

The book is a collection of 75 paintings in color made by Palestinian children aged 4 to 14 years, most of whom were born and raised in refugee camps in the Occupied Territories. It is 120 pages in length and contains 66 black and white photographs and 6 folkloric illustrations, supplemented by columns of textual commentary by the author in English, French and Arabic. It is a beautiful hard-cover book, attractively assembled and clearly reproduced.

The book is loosely divided into three spheres of Palestinian reality. The first group of paintings deals with traditional pastoral life and visions of the ancestral landscape in bloom. Their titles convey their context: “Spring in Hebron,” “Church in Jerusalem,” “The Harvest,” “Picking Lemons,” “A Walk in Grandfather’s Olive Grove,” “Planting the Land,” “Ploughing the Land.”

For example, 14 year old Majdi Sarray’s “Picking Oranges” is typical of the way in which children pay close attention to detail. Each blade of grass is separately drawn, each orange on the tree, as well as in the baskets, is a distinct entity. Each of the four fruit pickers is an individual, three are in traditional Palestinian dress. A horse and wagon wait to transport the fruit to market, a rock having been placed under the wheel to prevent any unwanted moving. The viewer is struck also by the deep rich colors used in this and other paintings, suggesting a fertile landscape.

One might ask why the children paint such a fertile landscape when they actually live in a blanched, arid, treeless refugee camp? When life is harsh, memory is a comfort and protection. They hear stories from their elders about a better time and place long ago and they... listen. The oral tradition is strong and is still passed on, from one generation to another. Through art, these children can be transported into the past.

"Women at the Village Fountain" by Ahmad Zaiti, 13 years old, is a beautiful, neat and delicate painting of women in Palestinian dress, with pitchers on their heads and arms, coming to draw water. The wells are mauve colored, the village proud in the background, each house brown and geometric, every stone clearly in place, with a mosque standing in its midst. All are sunk in an earth of lush green—the color and energy of simple life.

Many children drew pictures of weddings, not unusual considering the central position of the wedding in Palestinian culture. Love between a man and a woman often becomes a metaphor for the Palestinian's love for his land. [x] 60446. Brumm, Anne M. "Palestinian Children Recreate Their World": Reviewing a new collection of children's drawings from the Occupied Territories: Part 2", in Challenge, January-February, 1992. p. 40. The second section of Faithful Witnesses contains paintings dealing with various aspects of the Intifada and life under occupation. One of the most moving and unforgettable pictures (which also appears on the cover) is "Tear Gas in My Eyes," by 8 year old Sahar Mansour. A young girl is desperately covering her burning eyes with both her hands. Her mouth is parted in a scream that we can almost hear. Three tear gas bombs have exploded around her. Three boys are falling backward with their arms in the air. (Have they been captured?) Her skirt is in the colors of the Palestinian flag. The artist even remembered to put red bows at the end of the pigtailed and on her head. Each boy is dressed in a different design and color. Sahar has used the colors of rose, red and orange in an effective combination to convey the illusion of pain, suffering and hell.

Another young artist, Valentina Affif, 11 years old, has also harnessed the power of art to tell her story. In the picture, "The Day of the Strike," all the shops are heavily boarded up with padlocks. The children are on one side. Several hold Palestinian flags, and some have stones. Each has a different color and style of clothes and hair, but all courageously face the armed soldiers pointing their guns at them from the other side. Black smoke rises from the tires burning in the middle.

Valentina repeats this configuration in "Confrontation in the Road Between Qalqilya Refugee Camp and an Israeli Settlement." Only now, two of the children have been shot and lie motionless in the road. In the background looms a large prefabricated high-rise Israeli settlement, complete with TV antenna and yellow electric light seen burning through all the windows. On the near side, an olive grove thrives. A helicopter and a bright sun look down on the tragedy.

This same artist shows three Israeli soldiers arresting a young man and woman. Both are handcuffed, and the man is blindfolded. In a similar scene, family members plead with the soldiers as two women are taken for interrogation. These are the basic themes and motifs which are repeated most frequently by the children. Some relate several stories in one picture, as, for example, Ahmad Awad, age 14, in "Checking the Identity of the Man Returning From the Supermarket, Blindfolding Another and Beating a Third." What is unusual in his picture are the dark depressing shades of brown, black, gray and ghostly white.

A few chose to portray other events. For example, Iyad Barbbar, age 11, in "Confiscation of a Piece of Land" paints three armed men pointing their guns at them from the other side.
various social sectors of the society as well as women's rights." Hanna Siniora, head of the European-Palestinian Chamber of Commerce, is widely regarded as a high profile member of the Palestinian community. He has contributed to the community in various ways, among which are his former capacity as editor-in-chief of Al Fajr newspaper, publisher of The Jerusalem Times, and a founder-member of the Islamic-Christian Council. Siniora divides his campaign program in two; the political and the social. His political program includes building strong Palestinian State with Jerusalem as its capital, and improving the lives of Jerusalemites and making them an integral part of the Palestinian state. The practical side of Siniora's campaign are divided into the following areas: (a) To build an industrial zone in Jerusalem that will create more jobs for the Palestinian labor force. (b) To address the issue of increasing rents in Jerusalem. (c) To get Palestinian youths involved with the community and make more resources available to them. One issue is to improve existing sports stadiums and build new ones. (d) To address the issue of infrastructure relative to Jerusalem and its outlying rural areas. [=]

60449. Bukhari, Ahmad. "Intifada Anniversary", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 8, 1995, p. 1. This week Palestinians mark the 9th anniversary of the popular uprising known to history as the Intifada. It began in the Gaza Strip on 12/9/1987. It is also known in Arabic as the Revolution of the Stones. According to the Ramallah-based human rights organization, the Mandela Institute, 1538 Palestinian men and women have been killed to date; over 5000 are still in prison, and 873 houses have been demolished by the Israeli authorities in punitive measures. Tens of thousands have been wounded. Those who died in confrontations with the Israelis are considered martyrs. [=]

60450. Bukhari, Ahmad. "Palestine and People: Sorcery in Palestine," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, July 28, 1995, p. 14. One of the oldest professions in the world, common in the days of the pharaoh, persists in this modern era. The practice of magic by quacks and swindlers in the West Bank and Gaza who claim to cure the sick and to know the unknown is widespread. What is hard to explain are the educated individuals with university degrees who wait in line to solve the mystery of who robbed them, or be cured of impotence because they want to have a child. Sessions sometimes cost hundreds or even thousands of shekels. Sorcery thrives because of the increase in social problems and disappointments. Sorcerers claim they are capable of curing almost any problem, and use different methods depending on the individual and the problem. Despite the fact that the monotheistic religions forbid resorting to sorcery, many wait for their turn to be deceived. Furthermore, quacks often perform their acts in the name of religion. Claiming to be guided and inspired by supernatural forces (jinn), they are quick to fill their pockets. A well known local sorcerer, who agreed to be interviewed only under the condition that his true identity and location not be revealed, said that he "learned and inherited the profession through watching my father and great grandfather perform." Most of his customers are women. They request cures for an impotent husband, for release from seclusion, or to prevent a husband from marrying a second time. He says that "When the woman is in my presence, I can understand her personality and exact psychological dilemma and help her resolve it." Other clients are the victims of robberies or thefts. He claims to be able to identify the location of the thief in any part of the world. Amazingly, even policemen request his assistance in resolving mysteries and recovering stolen items.

He concedes, however, that there are cases which can't be resolved, such as illnesses and diseases, and most cases dealing with lunacy. He also uses plant concoctions "derived from mothernature" which are "bought from pharmacies or perfume vendor shops and mixed together to create the medicine needed." An example, used in cases of female sterility, uses the patient's dried blood by mixing it with tea which is then given to the husband to drink without his knowledge. He further claims that "I contact the outside world, the world of demons," who assist him with his work. Usually patients come to him after losing faith in doctors, and at times, they are referred to him by the doctor. Patients come to him from the West Bank, Gaza, and Israel. In the context of religion, his practice is condemned. The scholar, Sheik Ismail Al-Gamal, the head of Islamic Waqf, says, "In religious terms, we believe sorcerers and quacks are doing the devil's work. It's forbidden and the penalty for this behavior is death as the Prophet Mohammed said, 'Whenever sorcerers are found, they should be put to death.'" He also stated that, "Those who consult the sorcerers, priests, and fortune tellers believe in them are not my followers." Al-Gamal says that sorcerers and quacks whose work depend on demons and divinities such as the claim to bring departed loved ones closer are wicked. The Prophet stated, "These words are based on sleight of hand, smooth talk, and a great deal of lying, and if one's lie incidentally becomes truth, the lie is repeated a thousand times." The Holy Quran reiterate ins these sayings. "When there has come to them a Messenger from God/confirming what was with them, a party of them/that were given the Book reject the Book of God/belonging their backs, as though they knew not/and they follow what the Satans recited/ over Solomon's Kingdom. Solomon disbelieved not/but the Satans disbelieved/ teaching the people/ sorcery, and that which was sent down/upon Babylons two angels, Azza and Maru they taught not any man, without they said,"We are but a temptation; do not disbelieve." (Al-Bakara/The Cow Verses 95-97, the Arberry translation.) Parallel to Islam, Christianity considers sorcery blasphemous. Father Aden Samara, the secretary of the Latin Patriarchate said, "[t]hat the Bible has condemned the act of sorcery in all its forms because it blasts the name of God. God has forbidden assistance through the demons. Do not request assistance from or turn to quacks." In Revelations 8:21, sorcery is condemned, and those who resort to it receive endless punishment. "Hell would rot those who commit the acts of sorcery." The apostle Peter in Galatians 20:5 warns us that sorcerers and those who deal with them will be forbidden to enter the Kingdom of God. [=]

60451. Bukhari, Ahmad. "Samih Khalil: Presidential Candidate", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 22, 1996, p. 7. Samiha Khalil (Um Khalil), 70, is a prominent Palestinian figure in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. She is what Palestinians call a true fighter and nationalist. A member of the Palestine National Council, she established the Palestinian Women's Union in 1952 and the Inaash Al-Usra Society in 1965. As soon as the nominations opened for prospective candidates in the forthcoming Palestinian legislative elections, Samiha Khalil expressed her desire to stand for the presidency, to compete with President Yasser Arafat. She told The Jerusalem Times that she decided to stand after holding a number of consultations with her supporters. "I hope to win, but in case I don't, it will be enough for me that I raised my voice high as a Palestinian woman, demanding the fulfillment of the dreams of Palestinians at home and abroad. I believe that women, like men, are fully entitled to lead the Palestinian people and that women will be able to do it just as well." Khalil added that since the Palestinians are clamoring for democracy, she took the decision to stand with the conviction that her candidacy would strengthen the democratic base, thus helping to show the world that Palestinians could, indeed, rise to the challenge. Um Khalil pointed out that her membership in the Palestinian National Council did not forbid her from standing as a candidate for the presidency, and that she was not thereby obligated, according to the Palestinian Election Law, to resign her post. As for her political agenda, Khalil said that she was still preparing it, focusing on a number of essential issues like Jerusalem, settlements and the right of return. She pointed out that, in case she wins, she will form committees to address the issue of infrastructure relative to Jerusalem and its outlying areas: (a) To build an industrial zone in Jerusalem that will create more jobs for the Palestinian labor force. (b) To address the issue of increasing rents in Jerusalem. (c) To get Palestinian youths involved with the community and make more resources available to them. One issue is to improve existing sports stadiums and build new ones. (d) To address the issue of infrastructure relative to Jerusalem and its outlying rural areas. [=]
Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 24, 1995, p. 12. Unbeknownst to many, regional director of the Arab Bank in Palestine, Shukri Bishara, is also a Tai Kwan Do expert. A fifth dan black belt, the highest of them awarded by the International Union of Tai Kwan Do in Korea, Bishara told "The Jerusalem Times" Sports Reporter Ahmad Bukhari his advice for young Palestinians. Question: What is Tai Kwan Do? Answer: The term divides into three parts: tai, the kick; kwan, the punch; do, the philosophy behind both kick and the punch. Al-Lo these three techniques to the art of Korean origin developed. It is also known as the art of the wrist and foot. Question: What is the difference between Tai Kwan Do and Karate? Answer: All sports concerned with the art of self-defense are branches of the same tree. Each part has its own characteristics. For instance, Tai Kwan Do depends more on the foot than the hand, and a number of moves that characterize it. Karate, on the other hand, depends on one or two moves. You can see this every time you watch a karate performance. This does not make Tai Kwan Do superior to karate. What makes the difference is the performer in action. Question: What other sports do you practice besides Tai Kwan Do? Answer: I have been involved in many of the arts of self-defense. Jujitsu and Aikido during my residence there. I have five dans (black belts) in Tai Kwan Do from the International Union in Korea. Question: Being the regional director of the Arab Bank in Palestine, how do you find time to train in your busy schedule? Answer: I trained in France during my long stay there. My teacher was Kim Yung (a ninth dan black belt, the highest level). Unfortunately, I cannot train as much today because of a lack of training facilities in Palestine. I do simple, basic exercises at home to remain supple. I call upon the Ministry of Youth and Sports to set up facilities in Gaza and the West Bank, at least one center in each.

Question: Now that you are back home, do you intend to share your experience with young sports people in Palestine? Answer: Most certainly, especially considering that Tai Kwan Do will be officially integrated into the Olympic Games of the year 2000. At the moment, Tai Kwan Do masters appear as guests and observers. Since we Palestinians have been accepted to become an official team in the Olympic Games, we must devote time during the next five years to get into shape if we are to have a chance of success in the competition. Question: How would you like to tell young Palestinians about Tai Kwan Do? Answer: Palestinians are a great people with plenty of potential in the field of sports. Let us remember who faced the Israeli army during the Intifada. The Children of the Stone. They faced a highly sophisticated army with nothing but their tai (kick) and their kwan (punch). In other words, they touched the basis of this art of self-defense. If anyone, this generation has a right to be given the chance to earn it thoroughly and take gold medals in the Olympics of the Year 2000. Question: How do you manage to keep so fit and supple at your age? Answer: My daily exercises with special attention to the way of breathing during the exercise itself. Tai Kwan Do is good for everyone; it knows no age difference. It benefits all—young and old. It contributes to an upright posture and teaches the ways of patience. Question: Is Tai Kwan Do a sport for men only? Answer: No, this is a game for everyone. Especially women who are in danger of being exposed to embarrassing situations where they might need to resort to the arts of self-defense. Besides, it is good for their mental health and physical well-being. —

60453. Bukhari, Ahmed. "Swimmers Fish for Future", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, June 23, 1995. p. 12. "The idea of establishing a Palestinian Union for Swimming is very old and the arrival of the Palestinian National Authority has helped to realize its creation," said Suleiman Al-Lo, a Palestinian swimming coach. Palestinian swimmers from the West Bank and Gaza Strip were asked to attend a meeting at which the union was finally created. Al-Lo said that more than 70 athletes met in Jerusalem and held general elections to form a board of trustees. He was elected chairman. Al-Lo, a coach at the YMCA for 25 years, thinks there are a lot of excellent Palestinian swimmers but, they lack access to adequate and modern training facilities. There is a lack of good centers and clubs with appropriate pools for training. Some centers, like the YMCA in East Jerusalem, closed their pools. The YMCA closed 10 years ago for financial and social reasons. "As an administrator and a professional coach, I can say that if Palestinian swimmers were provided with more and better facilities at centers and clubs - more pools, they might send swimmers to the Olympics by the year 2000," he said. Al-Lo revealed that the Israeli Union of Swimmers offered money to some Palestinian swimmers, such as Zeina Hanan Ashrawi, to compete internationally with the Israeli team, but that they refused the offer. Asrabi is considered one of the best Palestinian women short distance swimmers. He added that the Israeli occupation prevented many swimmers from the West Bank from entering Jerusalem to get their training - whether at the YMCA in East Jerusalem or West Jerusalem. Al-Lo hoped that the YMCA in East Jerusalem would reopen its doors and pool to Palestinian athletes again. He announced that there will be swimming courses held at the American Colony Hotel, Beit Hanina, Jabal Al-Mukabbar, Ramallah and in Hebron. He called on parents to encourage their boys and girls to attend these intensive courses in hopes of discovering more talented swimmers. — peaceful society without militarism, sexism, and racism. Therefore we support the Israeli "Women's Organization for Political Prisoners" and also claim the unimpeachability of the right to asylum in our country. We are shocked about the terrible fact that there are men who hate strangers and promote racism, killing people from abroad. Hence we are gathering signatures against such hostility and against rescinding the right to asylum. One of the most exciting and inspiring events prior to our existence was the ceremony in Amsterdam on 4/9/1995, where the Nobel Peace Prize was bestowed upon Israeli Women in Black. We greatly rejoiced and admired the courage of those women who accepted this reward although it came from German hands. We talked together about our experiences and sang together with much enthusiasm, "We Shall Overcome." The climax of this memorable meeting was a Jewish Palestinian Palestinian-German Festival of Culture and Peace that we celebrated artists told together with many people on the following day in the Stollwerk building in Cologne. Jewish and Palestinian artists told stories, sang, and danced. Then many people danced together in a merry mood. It was the fulfillment of a dream that we had dreamt for a long time. We hope so much that we shall have other opportunities to celebrate similar festivals. In addition, we are fighting for some other initiatives. I mention the campaign against the dreadful mass rape of women in ex-Yugoslavia as one of the most important actions in previous weeks, but I can describe that another time. I want to add just one thing: We do not stand as a silent vigil, but we distribute information material and hold discussions with passers-by. Some people are very aggressive and insult us with vulgar words and gestures, but most identify with our aims. This is a very encouraging sign for us! We are very glad that the groups of Women in Black are increasing all over the world. We greet you in solidarity! [=]

60455. Canaan, Suzanne. "Opinion: Open Letter to Bill Clinton", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), August 16, 1993. p. 5. Dear Mr. Clinton, I am a 16-year-old Palestinian born in Australia. My parents were among the more than 900,000 Palestinians (80% of the Palestinians) dispossessed from Palestine in 1948 by the underground Jewish terrorist organizations of the time: Haganah, Stern Gang and Irgun. When you were campaigning for your election, I was, as a Democrat myself, happy and hopeful that you would win the election, as were my parents. We thought that you would bring a fresh foreign policy based on the right of all people to self-determination and freedom, including the Palestinian people of course, and you would oppose all occupation and aggression by any state, including Israel. In short, we thought that you would bring decency and respect to the New World Order and change the hypocritical image of the United States. But to my great disappointment, I cannot understand why you are so blind to the suffering and oppression of the Palestinians. I recently saw you standing between Mr. de Klerk and Mr. Mandela and heard you praising Mr. de Klerk's wisdom and determination in moving to dismantle apartheid and "his courage in asking his people to give up something that they have which is not fully legitimate so that they can live together in real liberty." You can imagine that I could not but make an analogy with the Palestine-Israel conflict. I do not like the idea of being disappointed again and seeing another president of hypocrisy governing the most powerful country on earth. I do not see why you shouldn't invite President Arafat and Prime Minister Rafin to America. You know that Israel cannot challenge its breadwinner and main protestor, the United States, and that you don't need to bombard the hell out of Tel Aviv, as the United States did with Iraq, to force Israel to comply with UN Security Council resolutions regarding its occupation of Palestinian and Arab territories. I still hope that you will be, as we say in Australia, a fair-dinkum president - a president who will go down in history as an honorable president who forced Israel to stop the killing, oppression and dispossession of the Palestinian people and brought a just peace to the Arab, Palestinian and Israeli people in the Middle East. [Suzanne Canaan lives in Manuka, Australia.] [=]

the doubt to members of one's own group and devalue the intentions of those outside the group. Those who are officially recognized as oppressed are allowed to do things that would otherwise be seen as oppressive. [e.g. Israeli eviction of the Palestinians is excused because of the hostile experience of the Holocaust; Palestinian terrorist reprisals are excused because of the extreme brutality of Israeli occupation/repres...]

The security forces deployed in Jericho and arrived at the Liaison Bureau in Balu' where documents were signed by the Israelis and Palestinians declaring Ramallah and Al-Bireh, Palestinian territories. Abu Jaber told Al-Quds that while the area was closed to Israelis for 72 hours, inhabitants and other visitors were free to move about the cities. The Palestinian forces were greeted by the warbles of women, traditional dances and cheers from the crowd. Many sang or chanted slogans of support as the security forces entered the city. The official ceremony to mark the hand-over, scheduled to have taken place on 12/28/1995, was postponed until 12/29/1995. According to the Voice of Palestine, President Arafat will arrive in Ramallah on 12/29/1995 to take part in the festivities. [ ]

60459. Cary-Webb, Aimee. "Ramallah Liberated", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 29, 1995, p. 1. 12/28/1995, 150 Palestinian police arrived in the cities of Ramallah and Al-Bireh to ensure internal security before the arrival of the remaining Palestinian forces at 10:00 p.m. that evening. Brigadier General Haj Ismail Abu Jaber, acting as President Arafat's envoy declared the two cities liberated following the Israeli withdrawal 48 hours earlier. As agreed, the number of Palestinian Security forces numbered 1200, all of whom were present by 11:00 p.m. The security forces deployed in Jericho and arrived at the Liaison Bureau in Balu' where documents were signed by the Israelis and Palestinians declaring Ramallah and Al-Bireh, Palestinian territories. Abu Jaber told Al-Quds that while the area was closed to Israelis for 72 hours, inhabitants and other visitors were free to move about the cities. The Palestinian forces were greeted by the warbles of women, traditional dances and cheers from the crowd. Many sang or chanted slogans of support as the security forces entered the city. The official ceremony to mark the hand-over, scheduled to have taken place on 12/28/1995, was postponed until 12/29/1995. According to the Voice of Palestine, President Arafat will arrive in Ramallah on 12/29/1995 to take part in the festivities. [ ]

60460. Cary-Webb, Aimee. "Sports: East Jerusalem YMCA Gets a New Lease On Life", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, March 24, 1995, p. 12. Plagued by financial difficulties since the early 1980s, the East Jerusalem YMCA sports department is slated to open its doors again this June with an array of programs. The sports department of the "YM", as it is known to local residents, was closed in 1986, partially re-opened and subsequently closed again in December 1987, following the outbreak of the Intifada. The YMCA was first established in the West Bank with the arrival of the International Committee of the Red Cross in 1949. At that time, its first facility in Jericho was no more than a tent with a handful of volunteers ministering to the needs of the community. In conjunction with the ICRC, the YMCA ran nurseries and vocational training courses. The training courses were aimed at instructing unskilled workers in the areas of carpentry, metal work, upholstery, sewing and mechanics. The East Jerusalem facility opened its doors in 1963 and served the community without fail until the early 1980s. After the invasion of Lebanon in 1982, however, the tourist industry dropped off, and the first indications of financial strife became apparent. In 1986, an assessment of the available financial resources was made. It was discovered that there was a huge budget deficit due to the overwhelming costs of the association's sports teams. The teams were supported solely by the YMCA hotel's profits and could not be shouldered any longer. Although all the sports activities were terminated, education classes and lectures continued until the start of the Intifada when the YMCA's programs ended completely. It was during this hiatus that the decision to renovate was made. The 24-year-old building was allowed the need of repair. The renovations would be expensive, and the money would have to be raised. The association turned to its donors for additional funds. Of the incoming contributions, the bulk have come from abroad, from charitable organizations, churches and individuals who believe in the YMCA's commitment to community activities and public support. The first priority has been major maintenance and renovation projects like the repair of the 52-year-old water and electric systems. These have been in dire need of restoration since the onset of the financial crisis. According to YMCA sources, the swimming pool and other facilities will be repaired with the help of the YWCA in Sweden. The YMCA is focusing on swimming activities, since the pool was the one and only indoor swimming pool open to the public throughout the year in the West Bank. Restoration of the basketball and handball courts are next on the agenda. There are plans to hold sports training courses to instruct coaches and players in a variety of sports, including basketball, volleyball, handball, swimming, squash and football. The YMCA will work in conjunction with the Palestinian Sports Ministry to train coaches and staff. Clubs from all over the West Bank can then be staffed. The YMCA's assistant general secretary, Jack Sa'id, told The Jerusalem Times that the association hopes to reopen its sports department in June or July, provided the renovations are complete. Sa'id said that the re-opening will be in phases. By June, the swimming pool, new sauna, changing rooms and playgrounds, as well as the courts will be finished. The organization then hopes to implement new sports and educational programs gradually. The YMCA expects to resume all of the activities that have served the community for decades, added Sa'id. It also hopes to maintain good relations with the Palestinian Sports Ministry and enjoy their cooperation in instituting some of the projects. When asked how he sees the role of the YMCA, Sa'id said, "During the late 1960s and 1970s, we played a very important role in Palestinian society since we lacked any kind of government. We shouldered the responsibility of coordinating adult and youth programs. Our main priority right now is the pool," he said. "We are focusing also on women and children activities. Afterall, our programs always focused on children." He was quick to add that the YMCA is a place for everyone: men, women, seniors and children. "If there is a need, we are there." Sa'id himself joined the YMCA as a student on the basketball team, then as a summer day camp volunteer. The YMCA sent him to New York for training after high school, and he has been part of the organization ever since. Sa'id remarked that what has kept him part of the YMCA for all of these years is his feeling about the institution and its mission. "I feel that this institution is serving the community, like the children and young people... The YMCA does a great job of giving chances to all, so everyone can benefit from the programs. I believe in the principle of the YMCA: to develop mind, body and spirit." Remarkable on the geographical areas encompassed by the programs. Sa'id said, "Our work extends to every city, town and refugee camp in the West Bank." [ ]

60461. Cass, Connie. "Democrats Reveal Rewards For Donors; White House Defends the System [of selling offices]", in Seattle Post-Intelligencer, April 15, 1997. p. A3. Under subpoena by Congress, the White House and Democratic National Committee has released some 10000 pages of additional campaign contribution documentation. One large body of documentation concerns the routine sale of high public office by the Clinton Administration: the White House defended the exchange bribes for public office as simply a routine part of the American political system of government. Among those who purchased their offices in the federal government are: (1) John Huang, then an executive with Lippo Bank in Los Angeles, for a position in the Commerce Department (he later moved to the Democratic National Committee; (2) Arthur Levitt, proposed as ambassador to Germany or Mexico or as a member of the National Economic Council, was instead made chairman of SEC; (3) Erskine Bowles purchased the position as administrator of SBA, and now is White House chief of staff; and (4) the systematic sale of key ambassadorships in return for campaign contributions Alan Blinken (Belgium), Donald Blinken (Hungary), Clay Constantinoi (Luxembourg), and Thomas Siebert (Sweden).

Documents also detail how the number two official at the NSC, [reported Zionist activist] Nancy Sonderberg worked a 1984 Democratic gala to party with John Huang and James Riady of the Lippo Group. In addition, the White House sold rides on Air Force One; some purchasers were Tommy Boggs (lobbyist), Vernon Jordan (lobbyist), Dan Duffy (lobbyist), John Sweeney (union leader), Lane Kirkland (union leader), Richard Trumka (union leader), Paul Montrone (CEO, Fisher Scientific International), Richard Blum (husband of Sen. Dianne Feinstein, with significant investments in China), and three men who provided "jobs" to Webster Hubbell after he left the White House in disgrace (Truman Arnold, Texarkana petroleum distributor; Bernard Rapoport, Waco insurance executive; Wayne Reaume, Washington lawyer). Even the foundation set up to convert ClintSon's birthplace into a shrine has acknowledged fundraising activities in Asia. [TXT]

Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine. "Conference on the Palestine: Part 1: Introduction," in CPAP Newsletter, June 1994. For four days, from 12 to 15 May, Palestinian intellectuals, political leaders and activists exchanged ideas about the emerging Palestine, within the context of a conference organized by the Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine and Birzeit University. More than thirty speakers addressed the conference, in order to encourage wide popular participation, convened in different locations in the West Bank and Gaza. The conference began with an opening banquet in Jerusalem on 12 May. Keynote speaker was Haidar Abdul Shaf (see infra for a summary of his remarks), and Palestinian poetess Fadwa Tuqan recited some of her poetry. The following three days, about thirty-five panelists and discussants addressed the spectrum of issues and concerns of contemporary Palestinian society and politics. Panels convened the first two days at Birzeit University dealt with the transitional period, continuity and change in Palestinian society, the state and civil society, and the participation of women in politics. The final day of the conference, panels convened at Shawwa Cultural Center in Gaza dealt with pluralism and political parties, and with issues of special concern such as Jerusalem and Jewish settlements. The conference, by bringing together a large number of leading Palestinian intellectual and political leaders, and by creating an opportunity for the free exchange of ideas about matters of great concern to the Palestinian people, attracted wide popular attention and participation. Its panels were followed by vigorous debate between panelists and participants, and its proceedings were well covered by the local media. [↩]

Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine. "Conference on the Palestine: Part 2: Elections Key to National Salvation," in CPAP Newsletter, June 1994. In his opening statement to the conference, Dr. Hisham Sharabi, representing the Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, said that the Arab defeat in the war of 1967, and Israel's occupation of the rest of Palestine, diminished the scope of the struggle from one over Arab rights in Palestine to a dispute over the future of the West Bank and Gaza. To save what remains of their cause, he said, the people of Palestine need to take back control of their fate. The proper instrument of this change is democratic elections, because it is through such elections that the Palestinian people exercise self-determination, replace a paternalistic leadership with a modern democratic political system, plant the seeds of a new legitimacy, ensure equal status for women, and in brief transform Palestinian society to a pioneering society in the Arab world. Even though elections at this stage are for a council of limited authority, they will be crucial to the Palestinian future because they will demonstrate fitness for self-determination and independence. The success of the Palestinian people in organizing free and democratic elections will be the key to national salvation. [↩]

Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine. "Conference on the Palestine: Part 3: Conference Reports," in CPAP Newsletter, June 1994. The Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine will publish, as part of its Special Reports series, selected papers presented at the conference on the Palestinian future. The publication will be announced when it becomes available. [↩]

Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine. "Conference on the Palestine: Part 4: Fait Accomplis Do Not Have to Be Accepted, A Speech By Haidar Abdul Shaf," in CPAP Newsletter, June 1994. Former head of the Palestinian delegation to the Arab-Israeli peace talks, Dr. Haidar Abdul Shaf, was main speaker at the opening banquet of the joint Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine/Birzeit University conference on the future of Palestine. He spoke on 5/12/1994 in Jerusalem. The following is a brief summary of his remarks.

The Palestinian people today are deeply divided and are in a "wait and see" mode, waiting for further developments to unfold. Instead of being prepared for eventualities, they wait for them with a sense of anxious resignation. What they need is a new consensus to enable them to cope with new challenges. A careful reading of the Oslo and Cairo agreements between the PLO and Israel makes it clear that our fate is no longer in our hands, because the agreements concede Israel's contention that it has rights in the occupied Palestinian lands and shake us with constraints from which it will be difficult to shake free. The Palestinians need to rely on themselves. In the past, we relied too heavily on the support of regional and global sympathizers, and neglected our own sources of strength. The recent PLO-Israel agreements impose an accomplished fact and face us with new and more serious challenges. They also face us with the urgent task of devising a national response and a new program of action. A national dialogue is needed to restore unity around a strategy to deal with the challenges and the dangers we now face.

What is to be done?: The Palestinian national response should be guided by the following elements:

1. Reaffirmation of the rights to self-determination and the right of refugees to return. This is the criterion against which everything, including the Oslo and Cairo agreements, should be measured.

2. Israel's claims that it has rights in the occupied Palestinian territories are invalid and illegal and have been rejected by the international community. All "facts" created by Israel on the basis of these claims, such as settlements, are illegal and detrimental to peace.

3. The fact that agreements reached are accomplished fakses not mean that the Palestinian people are obligated to accept such accomplished facts if they violate their legitimate rights.

4. The fact that the Oslo agreement postpones negotiations on the fate of settlements to the ultimate status phase does not mean that Israel is permitted to continue settlement activity. What the agreement says is that the fate of existing settlements will be decided in future talks; it does not say that until then Israel is free to continue this illegal activity.

5. The Palestinian people have the right to continue to resist the occupation as long as there are no agreements to insure their national rights. Every people under foreign military occupation has a legitimate right to resist it. The PLO leadership should insist on the immediate end of all settlement activity, and it should organize and mobilize Palestinian resources to put in place a competent system of administration. Both are necessary to rid the Palestinians of Israeli occupation and to protect the Palestinian future. [↩]

Chandler, Adam. "American Library Association Buries Israel Censorship Issue: Pro-Israel McCarthyism," in Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, September-October 1994, pp. 15, 87-88. A four-year battle within the 56000-member American Library Association (ALA), in which B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League took a leading role in activating thousands of Jewish librarians to attend conventions and revolve a resolution condemning Israeli censorship of Palestinian libraries, appears to have ended at this year's annual conference in Miami. The ALA's Social Responsibilities Round Table (SRRT) Action Council voted 17 to 1, with 1 abstention, in a 30-minute closed meeting, to abolish the Israeli Censorship and Palestinian Libraries Task Force (ICPLTF), and to prevent Action Council member David Williams from serving out his three-year term. The vote at the June 24-29 ALA conference followed accusations that the Chicago librarian used the organization as a platform for "anti-Semitism" and harassment of other Action Council members. Williams was purged through the passage of two resolutions. The first, titled "A Resolution on the Restatement of Certain Ideals of ALA's Social Responsibilities Round Table," may be applied to any Action Council member. The second, "A Resolution on David Langlois Williams and his Position Within the Social Responsibilities Round Table of ALA” specifically calls for the abolition of the ICPLTF, which Williams chaired. Officially, the ALA has an open meetings policy. The reason given for the closed session was the personal nature of the charges. The resulting decision transferred the issue of intellectual freedom and Israeli censorship of information from or about Palestinians to another SRRT committee. The Social Responsibilities Round Table was created in the late 1960s to move progressive the ALA units, few have engendered such acrimonious debates among members as has the SRRT. In recent years, SRRT has been criticized by conservative ALA members for such actions as organizing the cancellation of ALA conferences in cities that pass homophobic legislation. However, the level of controversy over the Israeli censorship issue was unprecedented. It became the catalyst for a movement to centralize control by the ALA Council over all positions taken by the Association and its affiliated committees. The votes during the ALA’s Miami convention resulted largely from pressure placed on the ALA over several years by pro-Israel activists both inside and outside the organization. While members of the SRRT Action Council said it was Williams’ uncompromising insistence on advancing his position that brought about the decision to abolish the task force he chaired, Williams saw it as a case of “blaming the victim.”

“Blaming the Victim”: Williams first forced the issue of Palestinian intellectual freedom onto the ALA’s agenda in 1990, when he was attacked by members of the Chicago Jewish community, including B’nai B’rith’s Anti-Defamation League, over a bibliography he had compiled for the Chicago Public Library about the Arab-Israeli conflict. [Robert I. Friedman, “The Jewish Thought Police: How the Anti-Defamation League Censors Books, Intimidates Librarians, and Spies on Citizens,” Village Voice, 27 July 1993.] At the ALA’s 6/1992 convention in San Francisco, after receiving extensive documentation (including Information Freedom and Censorship: World Report 1991, co-published by the Art 19 organization and the American Library Association) detailing the existence of censorship and other human rights violations in the Israeli-occupied territories, the ALA Council took a stand. It adopted a resolution that “calls upon the government of Israel to end all censorship and human rights violations in the Occupied West Bank and Gaza, and in Israel itself; encourages the Israeli and Palestinian peoples in the quest for a peaceful and just solution of their conflict; and ensures that ALA members to develop ways to support librarians, journalists, educators and others working for peace, human rights and freedom of information and expression in the Middle East.” The ALA resolution also noted the “special relationship” between the US and Israel “as the recipient of the largest amounts of annual US aid per capita.” During that conference, one SRRT meeting was nearly canceled when hecklers tried to shout down Michael Schwartz, an Israeli journalist and peace activist who sought to describe her own experiences with Israeli censorship, and her arrest by Israeli authorities. At the same meeting, fire alarms were set off, apparently to prevent panel members from presenting the issue to the ALA membership. A second resolution also was passed at the San Francisco meeting protesting the then threatened expulsion of Omar al-Safi, a Palestinian librarian living in the West Bank. At that 1992 conference, however, during one of the SRRT meetings, a difference between two proponents of the anticensorship resolution led to problems within the Social Responsibilities Round Table itself, and perhaps planted the seeds for this year’s purge. Williams challenged a phrase in the proposed ALA resolution’s preamble: “Whereas Israel considers itself to be a democracy established with the express purpose of creating a safe haven for the Jewish people.” Williams questioned the use of “the” in the phrase “the Jewish people,” calling it a capitulation to Zionism—in that it refers to the Jewish people of the world as one nation. Sanford Berman, an activist Minnesota librarian, questioned Williams’ motivation. Williams says he attempted to pursue a dialogue with Berman on the disagreement over the following two years, but the Minnesota librarian declined to discuss the matter with him.

The ALA Had Passed Resolutions Condemning Violations in Other Countries: Proponents of the 1992 resolution pointed out that the ALA, the world’s oldest library organization, established in 1876, had passed resolutions condemning violations in South Africa, China, the former Soviet Union, and the United Kingdom, among others, but none had created as much controversy as the resolution involving Israel. Opponents of the resolutions said it was diverting too much attention from more pertinent library issues. Williams contended the reason the issue was consuming so much of the organization’s time was due to unremitting opposition it engendered. He cited, for example, what he referred to as the “anti-Israel lobby” that during the time an ad hoc ALA committee was established to study the documentation on Israeli human rights violations. The self-appointed chair of the committee declared that the documentation was too biased, and that the uniqueness of Israel had not been taken into account. At the 1991 convention the ALA Council deleted the term “occupied territories” from an SRRT written resolution because an ALA Council member believed such terminology constituted “Israel bashing.” After the resolution was passed in San Francisco, a campaign was mounted to persuade the ALA to correct its “mistake.” At the ALA’s Denver conference in 1/1993, members of the Anti-Defamation League who arrived to persuade the ALA to rescind its resolution were given ALA membership badges. “ADL representatives arranged with the ALA Executive Office to have the customary guest registration fee waived, and were outfitted with membership tags instead of guest convention badges,” Williams recalls. Surveillance and intimidation by the ADL members included writing down the names of participants in meetings pertaining to the Israeli censorship issue. As SRRT coordinator Stephen Stillwell described one such incident, “An ALA member, who identified himself as a member of the Anti-Defamation League, took hold of my convention badge, pinned to my sport coat, so that he might copy my name and affiliation down correctly, an action which I found rather threatening.” The ADL campaign against the resolution and its proponents took place at a time when its long-time spying operation, which included compiling files on persons who attended political meetings the ADL deemed hostile to Israel, was revealed through a San Francisco police investigation. Another intimidation tactic the pro-Israel lobby used was a threat to mobilize a nationwide campaign against public library funding sources if the ALA continued to “target” Israel. The campaign began with a 450-word letter sent to and published by numerous Jewish community weeklies around the country. It was accompanied by a letter from Concerned Jewish Taxpayer, “Jewish Taxpayer,” “Anonymous Librarian,” or “A Librarian Whose Job Would Be Jeopardized By Identification.” Whether or not this was the work of the ADL or another group or individual is unknown. As published in the May 27 Chicago Sentinel, the letter said in part, “If the ALA cares more about the welfare of librarians and “Citizens” Village Voice, 27 July 1993.] At the ALA’s 6/1992 convention in San Francisco, after receiving extensive documentation (including Information Freedom and Censorship: World Report 1991, co-published by the Art 19 organization and the American Library Association) detailing the existence of censorship and other human rights violations in the Israeli-occupied territories, the ALA Council took a stand. It adopted a resolution that “calls upon the government of Israel to end all censorship and human rights violations in the Occupied West Bank and Gaza, and in Israel itself; encourages the Israeli and Palestinian peoples in the quest for a peaceful and just solution of their conflict; and ensures that ALA members to develop ways to support librarians, journalists, educators and others working for peace, human rights and freedom of information and expression in the Middle East.” The ALA resolution also noted the “special relationship” between the US and Israel “as the recipient of the largest amounts of annual US aid per capita.” During that conference, one SRRT meeting was nearly canceled when hecklers tried to shout down Michael Schwartz, an Israeli journalist and peace activist who sought to describe her own experiences with Israeli censorship, and her arrest by Israeli authorities. At the same meeting, fire alarms were set off, apparently to prevent panel members from presenting the issue to the ALA membership. A second resolution also was passed at the San Francisco meeting protesting the then threatened expulsion of Omar al-Safi, a Palestinian librarian living in the West Bank. At that 1992 conference, however, during one of the SRRT meetings, a difference between two proponents of the anticensorship resolution led to problems within the Social Responsibilities Round Table itself, and perhaps planted the seeds for this year’s purge. Williams challenged a phrase in the proposed ALA resolution’s preamble: “Whereas Israel considers itself to be a democracy established with the express purpose of creating a safe haven for the Jewish people.” Williams questioned the use of “the” in the phrase “the Jewish people,” calling it a capitulation to Zionism—in that it refers to the Jewish people of the world as one nation. Sanford Berman, an activist Minnesota librarian, questioned Williams’ motivation. Williams says he attempted to pursue a dialogue with Berman on the disagreement over the following two years, but the Minnesota librarian declined to discuss the matter with him.

The ALA Had Passed Resolutions Condemning Violations in Other Countries: Proponents of the 1992 resolution pointed out that the ALA, the world’s oldest library organization, established in 1876, had untangling the problems Palestinian libraries face from the larger context of the history of Israel. There is little doubt, however, that his insistence on launching a broad attack on Zionism contributed to the collapse during the 1993 conference of the coalition that had supported him. “There was consensus that David had abused his position as Task Force chair,” said Mark Rosenzweig, an ICPLTF member. “He organized programs that were inappropriate.” As an example, Rosenzweig cited an appearance in New Orleans by Jeffrey Blankfort, who spoke about the history of Zionism and role of the ADL in American politics during the 20th century. [Blankfort was one of the individuals who first investigated and reported on the ADL spy operation.]

The sketch of Zionist history that Blankfort presented included the Zionist/Nazi collusion reported by scholars such as Lenni Brenner and Edwin Black as an example of history that has been suppressed in the US. Rosenzweig complained that the structure of that history has been appropriated by neo-Nazis. He maintained that, in any case, it was outside the context of a discussion about intellectual freedom in the occupied territories. Blankfort disagreed, saying that the theme of his talk was how Israeli censorship in the occupied territories has spread into the US, using proxies like the ADL to stifle free expression in organizations like the ALA. “There has existed for many years, across virtually the entire American Jewish political spectrum, a ‘circle the wagons’ mentality that measures the reporting of history, or news events in general, by a single standard: whether or not ‘it is good for the Jews,’” Blankfort said. Using such criteria, the telling of some of the ugly truths about Jewish history is considered dangerous because of the possibility that it will be used by anti-Semites to promote Holocaust revisionism and denial. “This, on the face of it, is patent nonsense,” Blankfort said. “If Jews collaborated with the Nazis, whether it was from opportunism, to save Jewish lives or simply out of fear, it might provide a more nuanced understanding of how the Holocaust was carried out, but it would hardly disprove it.”

A Coalition Divided: After its 1993 defeat at New Orleans, the coalition of progressive librarians that originally worked to pass the resolution condemning Israeli censorship was divided. On one side stood those who believed there was little else that could be done within the ALA. On the other side stood Williams, frustrated by the refusal of his colleagues to agree that the ADL and other pro-Israel activists had succeeded in defining the parameters of acceptable speech, even an organization premised on the defense of intellectual freedom. SRRT members Mark Rosenzweig, Elaine Harger and Stephen Stillwell believed Williams did not understand the conservative nature of an organization such as the ALA—a conservatism, they said, that has nothing to do with the pro-Israel lobby. While they talked about starting over to build cooperation with other groups, Williams attributed the New Orleans resolution to the “consensus terrorism” of “hard-line Zionists.”

In 12/1993 Sanford Berman circulated a letter stating the case for disbanding the Israeli Censorship and Palestinian Libraries Task Force and reassembling it outside of the ALA without Williams. That letter, presented during the closed hearing in Miami, blamed “confontational language” used by Williams for the success of opponents of the ALA condemnation of Israel in mobilizing “hundreds of Jewish librarians...from New York City and elsewhere to pack the annual membership meeting” in 1993. Berman’s letter enumerated other complaints against Williams and argued that since the PLO-Israel peace accords, there no longer was a need for the same level of attention on the issue within the community of progressive librarians. Berman claimed that Williams’ presence in SRRT damaged its credibility within the ALA. The dispute within the SRRT became even more personal on 5/25/1994, when Williams angrily accused Mark Rosenzweig, who had lost his job two years earlier after he organized a panel discussion on Palestinian culture at the New York Public Library, of “treachery” and “completely caving in to the Zionist lobby.” In the weeks following Williams’ verbal attack on him, Rosenzweig and two other librarians, Al Kagen and Sanford Berman, drafted a resolution titled, “Resolution on the Censure of David Williams and the Abolition of the SRRT Task Force on Israeli Censorship and Palestinian Libraries.” That resolution, bluntly accusing Williams of making “anti-Semitic statements,” was used as the basis for the two passed in Miami, abolishing the ICPLTF and banning Williams from holding a leadership position in SRRT for three years. The complaints by the three librarians against Williams fell into two categories. He was accused of abusive language and tactics in advancing his views, making coalition-building impossible. He also was accused of continually referring to the presence of a powerful Zionist lobby and taking a highly critical view of Zionism rather than limiting the breach of Palestinian rights. Whether those complaints and of Williams’ views, it is certain that without him the issue of Palestinian intellectual freedom would never have reached the ALA agenda, much less become the subject of an ALA resolution in 1993.

In his zeal to defend the ALA condemnation of Israeli censorship, there seems little doubt that Williams alienated potential allies, and thus perhaps inadvertently helped pave the way for the unprecedented revocation of the resolution in 1993. Unfortunately, this leaves the prestigious 56000-member organization standing four-square in favor of Israeli censorship of information about the Palestinians, their history and their culture. Whether this embarrassing situation is reversed, or allowed to continue, now becomes the responsibility of those “progressive” librarians who decided in 1994 that they could best serve their goals without David Williams. At stake is the right of American librarians and of librarians anywhere to present all sides of the history of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute without fear of McCarthyite retribution from those who would suppress all but their own views. In 1993, under strong and confusing outside pressure, America’s librarians renounced that right. The reality of 1994, it appears, is that they have given up the fight to regain it. [Adam L Chandler is a graduate student in the school of Library and Information Science at Louisiana State University. He presently is working on a master's thesis about the ALA’s resolution on Israeli censorship and human rights violations.]
revolution in Nicaragua, land was redistributed, empowering the population after generations of exploitation by landholders. A mother from one of these cooperatives describes a visit from a group of contra freedom fighters: ‘Five of them raped me at about five in the evening... they had gang-raped me every day. When my vagina couldn’t take it anymore, they raped me through my rectum. I calculate that in five days they raped my 60 times’. Such testimony is not permitted in the US media. It may rendered that can never appear. Then they cut into her chest and took out her heart. The men had their arms broken, their testicles cut off, and their eyes poked out. They were killed by slititng their throats, and pulling the tongue out through the slit.

After visiting the region, the chairman of Americas Watch and Helsinki Watch said, ‘There can be no doubt, on the basis of what we heard and saw, that a planned strategy of terrorism is being carried out by the Contras along the Honduran border’, therefore ‘the US cannot avoid responsibility for these atrocities’. Why do the New York Times and other US news agencies refer to such butchers as ‘the democratic opposition’? Most of the Contras are former members of the Somozas National Guard. CIA chosen spokespersen for the Contras said ‘by mid-1984, 46 out of 48 of the contra commandantistes were former National Guardsmen’. Chamorro testified to the World Court saying, the Contras ‘would arrive at an undefended village, assemble all the residents in the town square and then proceed to kill -- in full view of the others -- all persons working for the Nicaraguan government, including police, local militia members, party members, health workers, teachers and farmers’.

In El Salvador in 1980, the Archdiocese of San Salvador counted 6862 murders of ‘Persons of the popular and progressive sectors killed for political reasons, not in military confrontations, but as a result of military operations by the Army, Security Forces, and paramilitary organizations coordinated by the High Command of the Armed Forces’. The New York Times and other media conglomerates in the US portrayed the death squads as rogue right-wing elements, the evidence does not substantiate this, from the vice-chairman of Americas Watch and Helsinki Watch: ‘death squads were never apprehended or prosecuted; they operated with impunity during curfew hours; they passed police checkpoints without challenge; the security forces sometimes blocked streets to permit death squads to operate without interruption; uniformed forces sometimes conducted joint operations with nonuniformed death squads; bodies were dumped in heavily patrolled areas; death squads had access to good intelligence; the volume of death squad killing was adjusted in response to pressure on government forces; and so on’. To investigate the death squads is therefore to investigate the fabric of military and economic power in El Salvador; given that the goal of US policy makers is to maintain the present economic order, justice cannot be pursued. In the media, numbers of atrocities are always reduced, by an order of magnitude if necessary, and atrocities are always in past, conditions are always improving. A congressional delegation visited the El Salvador-Honduran border in 1981, and reported the following: ‘The Salvadoran method of ‘drying up the ocean’ involves, according to those who have fled the violence, a combination of murder, torture, rape, the burning of crops in order to create starvation conditions, and a program of general terrorism and harrassment’; ‘children around the age of 8 being raped, and then they would take their bayonets and make mcinemat of them’; ‘the army would cut people up and put soap and coffee in their stomachs as a mocking. They would slit the stomach of a pregnant woman and take the child out, as if they were taking eggs out of an iguana’. That is what I saw. The horror increased when Reagan took power. In 1983 Ronald Reagan gave his Presidential Certification, decrying how progress was being made in ending torture and abuses of human rights. Human rights abuses in Central America are directly correlated to the level of US involvement.

In Guatemala, a 1984 British Parliamentary investigative team reported: ‘The grim statistics summarizing Guatemala’s political reality -- 100000 killed since 1960, 100 political assassinations a month in 1984, 10 disappearances a week, 100000 orphans, half a million displaced -- barely reach the North American, let alone the European newspapers’. A witness describes the 7/1982 massacre in Finca San Francisco: ‘Finally they brought the last child. He was a little one, maybe two or three years old. They stabbed him and cut out his stomach. The little child was screaming, but because he wasn’t dead yet, the soldiers grabbed a thick, hard stick and bashed his head. They held his feet together and smashed him hard against a tree trunk. I saw how they flung him hard and hurt his head. It split open, and they threw him inside the house’. A 1963 USAID Vietnam report states: ‘The ultimate target is the human mind. It may be that the statement that has never appeared for expression may be extinguished, but it still remains the critical target’. A sample of Reagan spokesmen/apologists for the terror employed by the US government: Stephen Bosworth (1982); Melvin Levitsky; Elliott Abrams; Edward Fox.

John Loftus, a man who investigated Nazi war criminals for the US Justice Department argues that Nazis brought to the US after the war after WWII have ‘connections to ‘US operations in Central America’. The neo-Nazis of Argentine have been regularly employed by the US in Latin America. Israel has played an active role providing arms and training to regimes, exporting some 1.2 billion dollars worth of arms in 1982 alone. The Rios Montt regime in Guatemala thanked Israel for its assistance in bringing them to power in 1982. The fact that Nazi war criminal Klaus Barbie helped to move arms to Israel after an embargo was placed on the Jewish state after the 1967 war created the moral environment in which moralist Elie Wiesel finds it possible to refuse to acknowledge Israel’s role in exporting terror. One of the problems with US policy in Latin America is the dominance of agribusiness interests who strive to use the region as an export resource to the US market. 60468. Churchill, Ward. “Native America: Another Dry White Season; In Jerry Mander’s ‘In The Absence of the Sacred: The Failure of Technology and the Survival of Indian Nations’: The Solution Emerges As But Another Part of the Problem”, in Z Magazine, October 1993. pp. 43-48. Jerry Mander’s work (Sierra Club, 1992), which proports to address the question of technology and indigenous peoples, is a thinly veiled Eurocentric monologue (while he notes a score of important native thinkers, he quotes almost entirely none of them; preferring, for example, the fraudulent writing of Carlos Casteneda; only 16 of 305 citations in the work are to Native Americans), Mander broadly criticizes moderntechnology (citing the chairman of RJR Nabisco Corp, who who looked forward to the day when Arabs and Americans, Latins and Scandinavians will be munching Ritz crackers as ethusiastically as they already drink Coke or brush their teeth with Colgate). Mander juxtaposes the hideous technological future to Indians, whether in the Philippines [sic] or in Canada. While he accurately catalogues many of the challenges facing Indians in North America. However, underlying Mander’s argument is the idea that Whites embody the cerebral element of society, while non-Westerners embody the physical role: hence, if the problems of technological society must be overcome, it will be by Eurocentric intellectuals who appropriate non-Western beliefs and ideologies. Mander also has very clear gaps in what he considers to be legitimate struggles by indigenous peoples, rejecting all US Indians struggles by AIM and rejecting the Palestinians. His complete censorship of some indigenous peoples struggles eviscerates his arguments, and requires him to suppress all discussion of AIM and its related organizations (International Indian Treaty Council; Women of All Red Nations), since the outspoken mutual support of the PLO and AIM is unacceptable to Mander. This forces Mander to misattribute the statements and ideas of AIM that he reproduces; Mander is in turn forced to distort the history of support given by Earth First, Rainforest Action Network, Friends of the Earth, and Earth Island Institute, by deleting the key role played by AIM National Chair John Trudell’s coalition building. Since Mander opposes Palestinian human rights, he is forced to twist and distort the political history of contemporary Indians, in order to downplay the role of AIM. Mander’s underlying ideology of appropriation of the ideas of non-Western peoples and his Zionist race hatred of Palestinians and any who spport their struggle for human freedom degrades his thinking to the level of a crass, new age opportunism. Mander’s embrace of Zionism with a ‘ruthless consistency’ leads him to a ‘concious and willful’, systematic and fundamental distortions in his thinking that discredits him and transforms his thinking into mere opportunist manipulation. [TXT]

60469. Claude, Patrice. "Jerusalem’s Orthodox Jews Win Right to Exclusive Buses", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, March 27, 1994, p. 15. The Orthodox Jews in Jerusalem has self-segregated themselves, and have strict gender segregation. They reject any contact with impure women. In order to preserve the strictest gender segregation, the municipality will now provide separate buses for the Orthodox Jews, to protect them against the general climate of ‘immodesty’ in Jerusalem. The entire city will pay for the special buses for the Haredim to be provided by Egged Ltd., the municipal bus line. Some critics observe that this is precedent for racial segregation of Jews from Palestinians on buses. [TXT]

60470. Cockburn, Alexander. "Beat The Devil: Michael Lerner", in Nation, December 25, 1996, p. 816. The ‘fearlessly’ smarmy prose of [Zionist] Michael Lerner is again emerging as a mass-media-marketed intellectual fashion. Returning to his status as a lite intellectual-celebrity after his quest for a racial pure Jewish breeder-girl in New York, he is now offering an effortless and painless ‘paradigm shift’ without political content. Significantly, most Americans are entertaining a quest for a paradigm shift but rather a ‘secure job at wages sufficient to keep them and their families alive, on a diet other than Fritos and soda’. In Lerner’s advertising campaign of ‘awe-inspiring vacuity, Lerner purrs: ‘We want to make America more productive and efficient by transforming every institution so that it tends toward the creation of loving and caring human beings... [in] a politics of meaning [that] is more like feminism than a specific political program...’

60471. Cockburn, Alexander. "Spy Networks I: the ADL", in Nation, May 3, 1993, p. 582. The ADL spy and intimidation scandal on the West Coast has been essentially ignored in the eastern press. Roy Bullock, ADL spy and FBI informant, along with former SFPD inspector Tom Gerard, were part of a national spy and intimidation campaign run from ADL New York. They targeted people and groups ranging from Rep. Ron Dellums, to Earth Island Institute, United Auto Workers, Jews for Jesus, and Act Up. Bullock was particularly important as a liaison between ADL and scores to hundreds of local police departments, and arranged indoctrination trips to Israel for American police officers, where they would be trained and briefed by Mossad and the Israeli secret police, Shin Bet. Bullock also marketed information of dissidents to foreign governments such as South Africa, who purchased information of Los Angeles Times journalist Scott Kraft, as well as on anti-apartheid activists. One interesting document discovered by ABC report James Barnford was a 7/7/1961 letter from ADL director Benjamin Epstein to Saul Joffe, which states: “Our information, in addition to being essential for our own operations, has been of great value and service to both the United States State Department and the Israeli government. All data have been made available to both countries with full knowledge to each that we were the source”. Bullock who may be a closet Gay, was drawn try to help rescue detainees from the hands of the soldiers, sometimes with the help of Mossad and the Israeli secret police, with a kufiyeh and joined the youths stoning the soldiers. “In recent days of the uprising...”

60472. Cockburn, Alexander. "The ADL Spy Probe", in Nation, May 31, 1993, p. 727. There are continuing fears that political muscle will shut down the investigation of the ADL spy and intimidation network case being built by San Francisco District Attorney Arlo Smith. As the investigation starts to focus on senior ADL officials such as Irwin Suall, the ADL tries to defend its spy network by claiming it was targeting neo-Nazi and World Trade Center bombers. In the story by Robert Friedman in the Village Voice (5/11/1993), he falsely claims to have broken the story and takes the credit for others’ research. Friedman also allows Chip Berlet (Political Research Associates) to dismiss the importance of the ADL spy network, noting: the ADL “is a group whose leaders, at least, consistently defend the actions of Israel against critics, which is entirely inappropriate”, and “is a group that maintains an information sharing arrangement with law enforcement. Again, there is nothing wrong for a group to do that”. Cockburn concludes: “Berlet argues that it was some malign synergy between such ADL functions that led to trouble. In effect, he ‘OK’d the ADL’s venomous smearing of critics as anti-semites and then makes the amazing statement that there is nothing wrong with illegal acquisition and dissemination of privileged government information about individuals.” [TXT]

60473. Cohen, Na’ama. "The Soldiers Won't Be Able to Face Us Any Longer": Youths of Issawiya Exchange Views on Three Years of Intifada", in Challenge, January-March, 1991. pp. 14-15. Seven young people from the hard core of activists in the Jerusalem village of ‘Issawiya are gathered to speak of their lives and dreams, three years after the outbreak of the Intifada. Fatma, Suzanne, Ibrahim, Jasser, Khaled,Yousef and Ahmad—none of them are used to talking about themselves with strangers. Activities like organizing the village and confronting the army don’t leave much time for questions about the nature of the Palestinian state, the schools of the future, etc. The social changes, generated by the Intifada are described in simple, unpolished language. The two women in the group, Fatma, 30, and Suzanne, 22, arrived at the meeting out of breath. In the neighborhood they had come from, they say, soldiers had fired tear gas without provocation because they had found graffiti on the walls. The women, both unmarried, are active in a women’s committee and participate in the discussion without hesitating. Fatma was detained for 21 days in the Russian Compound. Her companion has not been arrested yet, but hopes to be so that she can go through what her friends and relatives have. “It’s a learning experience, she says. The presence of the two brings up the question of the role of women in the Intifada. Like everyone else, Suzanne would participate in the clashes with the army in the early days of the uprising. Only at the beginning was I afraid of the soldiers. From the moment I joined the demonstration, I felt nothing but anger at what they were doing to us. That's it. I'm not scared anymore. Not long ago her anger was kindled when she saw a little girl who had been injured by a tear gas canister fired into her house. She covered her face with a kufiyeh and joined the youths stoning the soldiers. “In recent months there have been many masked women throwing stones,” she says. “You can't tell the difference anymore.” “The organized women began by visiting the families of detainees and trying to help,” Fatma explains. “The people have stopped being surprised when they see a woman wandering around in a distant neighborhood at night. It’s become recognized.” After that, we would go to the Russian Compound to visit the prisoners. Slowly but surely the group of women expanded, so that by the time of the al-Aqsa massacre we could immediately organize two busloads of women to help. Women also take part in demonstrations and try to help rescue detainees from the hands of the soldiers, sometimes even grabbing them from inside the jeeps. “When I ask Jasser, 16, whether his sister participates, he shakes his head and says he does not allow her. “She helps with other things. I can’t stand it when the soldiers get rough with our girls, hitting or cursing them.” The women give him a look of disappointment. Ibrahim, a slightly older boy, explains: “Not all women participate equally. Each one has to overcome the resistance in her own home and to educate her father and brothers. It’s an individual battle which each woman fights according to her ability. It takes time.” When the Palestinian state is established, will the women -return to the home, as happened in Algeria? Fatma answers as one who has already dealt with the subject. The women in Algeria only participated in the national struggle. They weren’t organized in women’s organizations beforehand, and they didn’t conduct a social struggle to liberate women as we have. We won’t submit to any attempts to shut us up in the kitchens when we have our state.” In ‘Issawiya, the Intifada began on December 8, 1987, immediately after residents heard news of the traffic accident in Gaza, which killed four Palestinians and sparked the...
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

 uprising. It hasn’t stopped since. Even in the quiet months which preceded the al-Aqsa massacre, clashes with the army were a daily occurrence in the village. Why here? “Because of the army’s provocation,” they answer in unison. Yousef believes it was a political decision to eradicate the Intifada in Jerusalem. The army would enter the village daily, detain residents, stand them against the wall and check their papers, make arrests, fire tear gas and rubber bullets, breed, without provocation. In October of this year, a total of earth were placed at the village’s entrances in an attempt to blockade it. Teachers couldn’t reach school, despite a promise from the army that they would be able to pass, and workers couldn’t get to their jobs. Eventually the villagers scaled the earth barricades and began removing them by hand. The army arrived and fired tear gas and bullets indiscriminately. This was when Suzanne masked her face for the first time. “Specifically because we are Jerusalemites they give us rough treatment, and we repay them in kind,” explains Yousef.

The question of Jerusalem elicits a lively discussion. Ibrahim says that when there is a Palestinian state, Jerusalem will have a united municipality. Jasser asserts that Jerusalem should indeed be united and all Palestinian. “We don’t want Jews,” he says, adding quickly, “but we’ll give equal services to everyone.” Yousef’s position seems more carefully considered. He believes Jerusalem will be the last problem to be solved, and will require deliberations within an international framework. “It will be divided again, but there will be economic and administrative relations and access to holy places,” he says. Perhaps in the distant future it will be united, but not right away. Opinions also differed over the increase in stabbings in recent months. “I’m happy with it,” says Khaled, the youngest of the group. “Just like they kill us, we’ll kill them.” Jasser too would support a policy of stabbings were it discussed among militants, because of the absence of documentation and the difficulty of proving an occurrence in the village. Why here? “Because of the army’s provocation.” Yousef takes a different view. He points out that stones are never thrown at Hadassah, an Israeli hospital which borders the village, because residents value the equal medical treatment they receive there. Ahmad stresses the importance of international legitimacy, asking the other members of the group why the Palestinian national movement stopped hijacking airplanes. “We have the Palestinian peace initiative and we are struggling to see it realized.” Ibrahim takes a different view. He points out that Knifing members of the armed forces—yes. Settlers—yes. But plain October 1987, have been operative. Whatever the commission’s recommendations of the Landau Commission Report, published in 1987, have been operative. Whatever the commission’s intentions to be charitable, we may say they were to limit the use of torture—its effects have been the opposite. Long-standing legal controls were swept away, not by changing the law but by high-level administrative fiat. Israeli law clearly prohibits the use of force by public servants and rules as inadmissible in court confessions obtained by force. The commission gave the Shabak what it wanted: the stamp of “kosherness” to carry on what they were doing anyway. The background and recommendations of the Landau report are by now well known. The commission was appointed to investigate the implications of the scandalous case of Izzat Natshe, an Israeli Circassian army officer who was sentenced to 18 years in prison in 1982 based on a confession of treason that had been obtained by force. The investigation found that the Shabak had regularly committed perjury for 16 years by lying about the conditions under which confessions were given. However, the commission recommended against prosecuting these law-breakers, regarding them as “ideological criminals” who had been fulfilling the noble mission of protecting the state. The report devotes more space to the record of false testimonies than to the interrogation methods themselves, which it said were “largely to be defended.” The message to the Shabak was apparently that, while the use of torture was acceptable, there needed to be a way to make it sound like something else to avoid lying in court. This was the latent function of the most notorious of the commission’s recommendations: to approve methods of “non violent psychological pressure” to extract information and, when these fail, the “exertion of a moderate amount of physical pressure. A still-secret section of the report describes methods used in the past and provides exact operational guidelines for the techniques now permitted. The report deserves more detailed attention than I have space for here.
Legal critics have rejected its attempt to adapt the "necessity defense" so as to give agents of the state advance permission to use physical force to extract information. Political critics have concentrated on the twisted reasoning which defines virtually every captured (Palestinian) suspect as a terrorist or an enemy of the state.

Any act of "political subversion—not only placing a bomb, but being a member of a political organization or even flying a Palestinian flag—has been considered as an enemy who is not entitled to normal rights and against whom special means" are permitted. The legal criticisms appear in a special edition of the Israeli Law Review (Summer 1989), and I have summarized the broader issues in an article in New Outlook (September 1990). The subject will be widely covered in a report that Dafna Golan and I are preparing for B'Tselem. It will include an analysis of the forms of ill-treatment and torture based on the experiences of 40 Palestinians interrogated during the last two years. The issue is now also being dealt with by the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, which was founded at the end of 1989. We understand that human rights violations like torture cannot be abolished until the overall political situation is transformed. But in the meantime, something must be done. Our task today is to raise public awareness by breaking the barrier of silence formalized by the Landau Commission. We work on three fronts: educational activity, for example a joint public symposium we organized in co-operation with the Association for Civil Rights in Israel in June 1990; individual casework, such as collecting complaints from lawyers and human rights organizations, taking them to the authorities and publicizing the evidence; and efforts to make public the secret part of the Landau report, possibly by filing a suit with the High Court of Justice. This legal submission does not have much chance of success. Israel does not have anything like a constitutional "right to know" or a Freedom of Information Act. But surely there is a political right to know what is being done in the name of the public good. There is no other supposedly democratic country in the world where there exists a secret handbook for interrogators which provides detailed guidelines for bypassing national law and violating the spirit of all international norms and human rights declarations. The material gathered by the committee and other human rights organizations paints a grim picture. The use of prohibited practices—prolonged sleep deprivation, hooding, forced standing with hands and legs bound, prolonged binding in the "banana position," intense beating for days on all parts of the body, etc.—has become routine. Women detainees in particular are subject to sexual harassment and threats. The only cases that break the barrier of secrecy involve false confessions which are later brought to light, and deaths in detention in which the interrogators "go too far" or the detainee is driven to suicide. One example of the former is Ismail Gholu, who in December 1989 was tortured in the Russian Compound to force him to confess to a murder which he had no connection. For as the latter, only one of the five cases of death in detention in the last three years has resulted in a criminal prosecution. Logically, such abuses can square with the secret parameters of the Landau report in only two ways. Either they are within the bounds of the permissible, in which case they should not be, or they lie outside, in which case the responsible Shabak agents should be brought to justice. We cannot know which applies until the secret is exposed. Stanley Cohen is a professor of criminology at the Hebrew University. He is a member of the Public Committee Against Torture in Israel. [=]

60475. Collins, Liat. "Briefs: No Evidence Yemenite Children Were Harmed [in investigation of disappearance of 65 of 505 children carried out by Judge Moshe Shalghi]. The Yemenite community maintains the children missing between 1948 and 1954 were stolen and adopted by holocaust survivors."

60476. Committee for a Free Palestine. Lebanon: The Price of Blood: Part 8: The Price of Blood. Pamphlet. Eugene, Ore.: Committee for a Free Palestine, 1976. Against the background of a rising death toll which is estimated to have reached almost ten thousand during the year of conflict in the Lebanon, the most bloody and savage atrocities of the war were inflicted on the defenseless inhabitants of the Karatina district of Beirut when Phalangist gunmen seized the city slumland area. Karantina epitomizes the other face of Lebanon; hidden beyond the skyscraper buildings of the international hotels, multi-national companies and the apartment blocks of the Lebanon’s wealthy, lies the poverty and degradation experienced by the Muslim poor. As the Phalangists seized Karantina, more than two hundred civilians were massacred. Among those were the cold-blooded murder of the Muslims were Martin Meredith and Donald McCullin of The Sunday Times. Donald McCullin recalls: "The first killing I saw I took for a random event. I was running through the alleys with the Phallange forward line. Two men came out of a house with their women and children. The women and kids were driven away. I ran after them to photograph and as I came back I saw the two men falling. They had been shot at point-blank range. "Then in the centre of the ghetto, I saw a man shot in front of a wrecked bus. He was middle-aged, obviously a civilian. the man who shot him had an M-16, and he threatened to kill anyone who took pictures. As he spoke, I saw a woman lying face-down beside the dead, middle-aged man. I took them to be husband and wife—they were close together, and had a few possessions scattered around them. Someone had set the woman's clothes on fire. I began to assume this was part of a pattern."

The following day McCullin returned to Karantina, and his eye-witness account resumes: "As soon as we got into the area, we saw bodies everywhere. Not only men had been massacred, but women as well—though no children as far as I saw. There were bodies hanging half-out of windows, or in the middle of the street. There was a man lying beside his dog, who had been shot with him. In the eleven years I have been covering wars I have never seen so much human carnage. I suppose Martin and I must have seen seventy bodies. And we did not look into houses, or everywhere they could have been." [=] there will be some technological bias by camera, by the culture itself. So why don't we control this? she wondered.

Issa Bishara, deputy chief editor for the group, told Al-Fajr that although everybody is trying to do their best, two weeks is not sufficient for such training.

"We need more time," Elsomiry agreed. "Although we are working from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., we need one or two more months." [c]

The report was a joint publication of the Israeli branch of Defense of Children International (DCI), a Geneva-based Non-Government Organization, and Israeli Mental Health Workers for the Advancement of Peace (IMUT), Entitled "Palestinian in the Occupied Territories," the study details the human-rights violations perpetrated against children in the occupied territories. These include the killing of 42 children under the age of 16 years since the beginning of the year, health issues, school closures and family reunification.

At the Knesset meeting, Israeli psychologists, an Israeli pediatrician, as well as representatives of DCI described the severe psychological and physical damage suffered by Palestinian children due to the military actions taken by the Israeli government. "Damaging children should ring all the alarm bells in our society," said psychologist Rami Bar-Giora. "If it doesn't we are regressing to other intolerable periods of history. It damages the child who is hurt, and almost certainly, the children that the victim will eventually bear."

The psychologists, members of IMUT, spent one day in the Gaza Strip to witness first-hand the effects of human rights violations which take place on a daily basis, and to talk to Eyad Sarraj, director of the Gaza Community Mental Health Program. They reported to the caucus that Palestinian children are suffering from a number of symptoms, including stuttering, bedwetting and anxiety after watching or being victims of violence.

The Israeli pediatrician, who preferred to remain anonymous, asserted that many more children are dying than those cases reported in the press. He claimed that these are not the ones who die directly, but rather indirectly, due to reasons such as the military closure, which prevents most Palestinians from entering Jerusalem to receive necessary medical treatment.

She also related stories of children who were not able to take their dialysis treatment or who could only spend half the necessary time on the dialysis machines. She explained that this is due to the unavailability of such machines in the occupied territories and to the increased amount of time needed to reach Jerusalem because of the current transportation problems and checkpoints. [c]

Leaders of the caucus--Knesset members Benny Temkin and Naomi Chazin (both Meretz) and Yossi Katz (Labor)--said they would raise the issues in the report with Maj. Gen. Danny Rothchild, the Defense Ministry coordinator of activities in the occupied territories. [c]

60480. Cook, Mary C. "Youth Dead After Less Than 24 Hours in Israeli Custody", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly, June 21, 1993. p. 9. Nayef Fdeili died after spending less than 24 hours in Afula police station, four miles south of Nazareth. Arrested 5/29/93, the 22-year-old youth from the city of Tiereh, inside the "green line," was found dead in his cell 5/30/93. According to prison authorities, the youth committed suicide. However, Fdeili's family, suspicious of the circumstances surrounding Nayef's death, requested that the pathologist of their choice perform the autopsy at Abu Kbir Forensic Institute in Tel Aviv. Their request was refused by the Israeli authorities. The autopsy was performed soon after his body was discovered and the youth was buried 5/31/93. "The signs I saw on my son's body force me to accuse the authorities," Hasan Fdeili, the young man's father, cautiously told Al-Fajr in a phone interview. "We saw signs of beatings under the left ear, on the left shoulder, right jaw and lower stomach," he continued. "The results [of the autopsy] haven't been issued; I think they're playing games," the father said, alleging that autopsy reports rarely take more than two weeks to be issued. According to one of the lawyers hired by the family, Onor Avraham, autopsy reports from Abu Kbir Institute usually take two months, although the Fdeili's were told they would be given special treatment. The young Fdeili had a record of criminal activity. As a youngster, he served 51 months for robbing a bank. Another court case was pending against him at the time of death. The family has requested that there be an investigation into the cause of his death, and the case is now in Afula Court, the attorney told Al-Fajr. No hearing date has been set. A committee of lawyers in Tiereh was also formed to investigate the youth's mysterious death. One of the members of the committee, Mazen Da'a, told Al-Fajr that he believes that "Fdeili didn't commit suicide. He was near the police; he didn't have time to make such a decision. Such a decision needs time." Knesset member Hashem Mahameed (Hadash) visited the family just days after Fdeili's death to lend his support. He filed an enquiry with the Israeli Minister of Police, Moshe Shahal, asking for the exact details surrounding Fdeili's death. Mahameed told Al-Fajr that "regardless of what [Fdeili] did or didn't do, I want to investigate this." The MK expects a reply about a month from now. Fdeili, who was employed as a construction worker inside Israel, leaves behind his parents, four brothers, two sisters and many questions. [c]

60481. Cook, Mary C. . "Culture: Palestinian Fashion Helps Israelis Find Their Roots: Part 1", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993. p. 11, 15. Seven passengers were needed to fill up the Israeli taxi before it could leave for Tel Aviv. And it wasn't long before the car was full--oddly enough with four passengers from the West Bank including myself.

Feeling slightly uneasy after the recent rash of killings, both Arab and Jew, Lutfi Abu Omar and I set off for a new adventure in Ramat Gan, a suburb of Tel Aviv.

The Abu Omar family has had a shop in the Christian Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem for the past 17 years. Lutfi, the current shopkeeper, specializes in traditional Palestinian dresses and old photographs.

After a young Israeli student from the Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Fashion visited his shop this winter, Abu Omar received an invitation from the head of the Department of Fashion Design at the school to make a presentation about the traditional dresses worn by Palestinian women 60 or more years ago.

When I heard of the invitation, my curiosity took over, and I asked to be included. How would a class of young Israeli students react to a Palestinian shopkeeper teaching them about fashion?

Upon our arrival, we were extended a warm welcome by Ayala Raz, head of the department, and shown to a small auditorium. The students slowly trickled in and settled themselves in the uncomfortable auditorium chairs while Abu Omar prepared for the presentation.

It is forbidden for a Palestinian girl to make a relationship with a strange man, he explained in the beginning of his presentation. In order to tell people about herself, she translated her feelings into embroidery work.

In the past, Palestinian girls began to learn the art of embroidery at the age of five or six. They learned about the patterns and their meanings, as well as the meaning of the colors of thread to be used. Red meant hell; green meant paradise; gold meant personal pride.
Sarit Mondshein, the young Israeli woman who initiated the contacts, served as the model. Mondshein, with her long, dark hair and dark eyes could easily pass a Palestinian. And as she donned each piece of the costume—dress, shawl, face veil and jewelry—she was transformed into a traditional Bedouin woman of the Negev. Even her classmates and teacher were astonished at the transformation.

Pointing at her dress, Abu Omar explained the significance of each section of embroidery work. The zigzag pattern at the bottom of her dress described the relationship they young seamstress had with her parents and grandparents, as well as member of her own generation. The roses meant she had a love for people. [=]

60482. Cook, Mary C. . “Culture: Palestinian Fashion Helps Israelis Find Their Roots: Part 2”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993. p. 11, 15. Previously, men were able to determine a girl’s character by the colors of her dress and the design and colors of the intricate needlework. Today, Palestinian women scarcely pay attention to these old traditions and choose the patterns and thread colors as they like, said Abu Omar.

While our model stood on stage in the dress traditionally sewn by single women, Lutfi brought out another dress: red and blue embroidery on black material. This was an engagement dress. “This dress shows people she’s not available,” he continued. By wearing such a dress, it saves the family and potential suitors from possible embarrassment.

Finally, he pulled out the wedding dress, which was a bright display of colors and patterns, once again on black. According to Abu Omar, this particular dress portrayed a happy woman who was filled with pride.

At the time of her marriage, a young woman used to don the face veil, which enhances her beauty, he explained. And as we saw with Mondshein as she modeled the veil, it intensified her attractiveness while adding an air of mystery.

A face veil is always decorated with coins, Abu Omar continued. If a man was poor, he gave his bride 369 coins to sew on her veil. If he had an average income, he gave her 963 coins, and if he were wealthy, he gave her 9690 or 9630 coins.

According to Islam, God has 99 names. “They like to use denominations of this number as protection against the evil eye,” he pointed out.

Our model was now completely covered; only her hands and eyes showed—a lovely picture in her bright colors and veil.

Such clothing accomplishes three things, said Abu Omar. It makes the woman more beautiful; it shows she is following her religion, Islam; and she gives people some idea about herself.

On a sadder note, a dress for widowed or divorced women was brought out. A large part of the dress, starting from the hem, was covered with blue embroidery.

“It takes her five to six months to finish the bottom part of the dress. During this time, she can decide if she wants to marry again,” Abu Omar explained. This decision she then incorporates into her embroidery on the breastpiece and sleeves of her dress, once again using bright colors and patterns explaining her intentions.

The next dress Mondshein modeled was what is known as a Heaven and Hell dress. “Fellahin [countrymen] and villagers use different kinds of embroidery work from the Bedouins,” Abu Omar said as he pulled out the 120-year-old dress that used to be popular in the Silwan area of Jerusalem. [=]

60483. Cook, Mary C. . “Culture: Palestinian Fashion Helps Israelis Find Their Roots: Part 3”, in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993. p. 11, 15. Once again he explained that the red stripes of the dress meant hell and the green stripes meant heaven. The breastpiece was done odio in orange which signified that nothing can be perfect except for God. The color was also used to ward off the evil eye.

Abu Omar concluded his presentation explaining that during the time of the British Mandate 65% of traditional costumes disappeared.

“Some of the most important pieces are gone,” he maintained.

The Israeli teacher didn’t find it strange to be asking a Palestinian shopkeeper to her class. She said it was “natural to know about culture and tradition.”

I asked Mondshein the same question. She replied, “We don’t care about Palestinians and Jews, we want to know about the clothes—fashion. We don’t know anything about our roots in Israeli fashion. These are Palestinian dresses; it’s a part of the fashion of Israel because they are part of us, after all. There is no way to differentiate between the people.”

Her friend and classmate, Gili Gur, explained how she and Mondshein had gone to visit Abu Omar’s shop in the Old City. “It was great, very interesting. We didn’t have enough time to ask all the questions we wanted to ask.”

She added that she was sorry she could not visit Jerusalem more often, but she doesn’t feel comfortable there. She explained, “We’re Israeli; they don’t like us. We bought some little things in stores, and they looked at us like this is not our place. They didn’t act like we were in our own country.”

She continued, “I think it shouldn’t be like that; we should go there more. We should speak with them a little bit more and say that we are not enemies. We can live together.”

As for Abu Omar’s motives for giving such presentations, he insists it’s not the business. “Much more important is to prove who we are as a Palestinian nation. If you want people to know who you really are, you have to look for two things that are most important—the culture and tradition.”

He added that the dresses are “one of our papers to prove that we are the owners of the land.”

Why travel all the way to Ramat Gan? “[The Israelis] are my enemy. They occupied my territory, but I have to listen to their side, to their excuse. who knows, maybe I will succeed in changing their minds.

“We have to be close to each other to understand each other.”

What does he tell his children when he comes back from such excursions? “I prove to them that not every Israeli is a fanatic, or a terrorist, or a bad person. Like us, in the Palestinian nation, there are good people and bad people—every society has the same thing.” [=] elementary and preparatory schools, feeding into the Jordanian system of secondary education. Students who want to complete their secondary education must go to government or private schools, after which they can go to Jordanian universities. Examination results in the UNRWA schools are significantly better than in other schools in the West Bank.

(8) There are three training centres. The Ramallah Women’s Training Centre was the first residential centre of its type in the Arab world. Funded by a private donation, it was closed down for a while because of lack of funding. The centre undertakes teacher training for the elementary cycle, and vocational training. 60% of the places are allotted to inhabitants of the West Bank and 40% to Gazans. The Ramallah Men’s Training Centre undertakes teacher-training for the elementary cycle, again with 60% of the places for West Bank inhabitants and 40% for Gazans. Both centres offer accommodation for those who need it. The Kalandia Training Centre undertakes trade courses and semi-professional/technical courses. The former type are designed for those coming out of preparatory school; the latter for post-secondary level. Courses last one or two years. Again, the 60%/40% quota system operates.

(3.2) Briefing at UNRWA headquarters: The main part of the briefing was taken up with explanations of how the present unrest is affecting UNRWA services. It was stressed to your rapporteur that the violence had now become routine, most not being reported by the media.

(a) Health services: The injuries are in three main categories. Firstly, there are injuries from beatings—bruising and bone fractures. There were stories of patients being beaten inside hospitals. Secondly, there are the effects of tear gas. Gas canisters are imported from the United States, Canada and Austria. They are thrown by hand, shot from guns or dropped by helicopter. Often they are used indoors, in homes schools, clinics and hospitals. Many of the canisters have marked on them: “Not to be used indoors. May cause death.” Tear gas causes not only tears, but confusion, suffocation, convulsions, vomiting and paralysis; it is thought to have a causal connection with bleeding, premature birth and abortions in pregnant women. In one night of trouble in Arrub camp, six abortions occurred. Old people and children are the worst affected by the gas; several babies have died from asphyxiation. The long-term effects are not known. There is also some evidence that gases other than tear gas are being used, given the range of effects, although this might be the result of the excessively high concentration of gas during the clashes.

(b) Relief services: The welfare programme operates on the Western pattern, where counsellors undertake home visits to assess people’s needs. The situation at present prevents this from happening. Occasionally, welfare workers have met with hostility, through the desperation of those they seek to serve. There is also a growing shortage of food in people’s homes, either because they cannot get out to buy it, or because they do not have enough money as a result of the strikes. The UNRWA welfare services have been transformed into emergency services—an “Emergency relief programme”, based on food donations from the EEC, individual countries, organisations and individuals, including Arab Israelis, has been established to attempt to relieve hardship which is inevitably increasing as curfews and other restrictions prevent refugees from going to work and earning.

(c) Education services: West Bank schools (including those in east Jerusalem) were closed from early February 1988 to late May 1988 on the instructions of the Israeli authorities. UNRWA education services on the West Bank were therefore immobilised completely. All children in the camps were affected by this, about 40% of the total camp population.

(3.3) Program in the West Bank: After being fully briefed by the Director of UNRWA operations in the West Bank, it was largely confirmed that the Israeli authorities have cut down UNRWA’s money for education and health services, your rapporteur was taken to camps in Bethlehem, near Hebron, and to a hospital in Jerusalem.

(a) Dheisheh camp: This camp dates from 1948 and now houses 7000 refugees, mostly from the area west of Hebron. It has been a trouble spot since well before the uprising, lying beside the road on which Israeli settlers drive to Hebron. The effect of the current situation in the occupied territories was immediately apparent in a way quite different from what your rapporteur saw in Syria and Jordan. Along the road is a tall wire fence, most of which was put up by the Israeli authorities before December 1987, as a measure against stone throwing from the camp at Israeli cars. Where UNRWA itself had put up a fence against this, the Israelis have put up a second, bigger one. The camp has three main entrances, two of which have been blocked since 8/1987 and 12/1987. This renders garbage collection by the municipality of nearby Bethlehem very difficult, and causes congestion on the one remaining passable road in the camp. The director of the UNRWA camp (a Palestinian) welcomed your rapporteur and explained that the inhabitants felt as though they were living in a cage and were deprived of their fundamental human rights. The first visit was to a supplementary feeding centre, run as part of the health services. Normally, food distribution is restricted to those under 6. Now, it is open to all under 10, and they are permitted to take food away for their families too. The children used to stay to eat, but now they go straight back to the safety of their homes. Children were in the streets, there being no school. Older children were not in evidence, keeping away from army patrols. There were open sewers in the streets, supplementing the system of cesspits. Your rapporteur was told of attacks by the military, which occur more than weekly. There were the remains of road blocks, reconstructed nightly to slow army progress down as warnings are passed around the camp. There are about ten cases of permanent disablement in the Dheisheh camp, some of which are organised to be responsible for this. There were also accounts of attacks by settlers. In 6/1987, armed settlers raided the camp, smashing windows and shooting holes in roof-top water tanks and solar heating systems (common in the area). This has happened more than once, and the army stands by while the trouble continues. Your rapporteur was then shown a sealed house belonging to a man who had served two years of a ten-year sentence. His family, meanwhile, makes do with half the house inaccessible. Finally, a visit was made to the youth activities centre, closed five years ago because it was suspected as a centre of political activism.

(b) Arrub camp: This covers the same area as the Dheisheh camp, but the population is smaller, about 5000. The camp is more isolated from local towns and villages. Two days before the visit, an eleven-day curfew had just been lifted; there had been two two-hour breaks in that time. The UNRWA office telephone had been cut off during the curfew, and there had been no electricity between 5 p.m. and midnight each day. The curfew followed clashes on 2/27/1988, during which two young men were killed, the second and third inhabitants of the camp to have died. The camp has two entrances, one of which was blocked more or less permanently; when the other is blocked there is no access for vehicles to the camp. There were piles of garbage by the road. Pending an agreement with the municipality of nearby Hebron, most rubbish is incinerated at present. In the streets there were UNRWA employees wearing tunics marked with a large “UN”; this is to afford protection following army attacks in which UNRWA employees have been casualties. Arrub camp has a lively youth centre with facilities for basketball, a games room and a library. The young people built it themselves, and it is now run by an autonomous committee. In the latest elections, religious young people took all the places. It was explained that Islam is seen as a positive way of representing Palestinian values and... had nothing to do with religious fundamentalism. The committee organises community work, for example, helping old people out in the camp. Before departing, a visit was made to the family of one of the deceased. The imam of the mosque spoke with pride of their martyrdom for a just cause, the rights of the Palestinian people. It was emphasised to your rapporteur that the Palestinians were a peace-loving people who respected the rights of property and religion. They said they recognised the rights of the Jewish people and wished them no harm. But they wanted their rights to be respected as well and suggested that the original United Nations partition plan of 1947 should be implemented.

(c) Hebron: The outskirts of the town were totally deserted; a strange sight in the Orient. Debris and litter covered the streets, and all the shops were closed. From the road, a school converted into a detention centre could be seen. Hebron is the only town in the occupied territories with a Jewish settlement in the middle of it; it houses twelve families, Jews prepared to live in the midst of enormous hostility as pioneers claiming the Greater Israel (Eretz Israel). Next to the Arab market-place is a memorial to an Israeli that had once been killed there, and on the other side of the market, overlooking it, a large apartment block is being constructed for more settlers. The settlements, designed to be as close as possible to the site where Abraham settled, are placed in the most provocative positions possible. Your rapporteur visited the huge Herodian edifice over the tomb of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebecca, Leah and Jacob, which is a mosque on Fridays and a synagogue on Saturdays. It was noon on Friday—prayer time; after prayers is often a time of trouble. Soldiers were everywhere, along with some armed settlers who happened to be taking a stroll in the area at the time.

(d) The Maqassed hospital, east Jerusalem: Your rapporteur was greeted by Dr. Hani Abdeen, who gave a clear and sensitive description of the hospital's work and the type of injuries most common at the moment. The Maqassed hospital has one of the best views of Jerusalem outside the city, from on top of the Mount of Olives. It was opened in 1967 and is run like a district general hospital, funded by the Gulf states through the "Islamic Charitable Society". Very acute cases are still referred elsewhere, to Israeli hospitals. Israel has a system of private health care and health care insurance; many of the beds, however, are heavily subsidised by the Arab charities which fund the hospital. There are 26 doctors and about 200 nurses, all of Palestinian origin. Since 12/1987, the staff have been under great strain, both physical and psychological, in response to the large number of casualties and the nature of the injuries. By the time of the visit, they had had about 600 casualties—160 people suffering from gun-shot wounds, a number of severe beatings, and a large number of tear-gas victims—usually coming in only on an outpatient basis. The Maqassed hospital generally only takes more serious cases. Most cases get health care free of charge, 50% paid by the hospital and 50% by UNRWA. Dr. Abdeen emphasised the future problems that the medical services would have to face after the initial emergency is over. There will have to be a major rehabilitation scheme with special premises and a multidisciplinary and highly skilled staff. Some 40 people have been permanently crippled and many more have suffered physical damage with long-term effects. Following the briefing, Dr. Abdeen took your rapporteur to the wards to visit some of the patients and to see X-ray photographs of the effects of M16 bullets. Visits were made to several wards with young men in bed with various limbs in plaster. One young man had been shot twice in the leg with M16 bullets, and then beaten up and his arm broken. In one ward were several paralysed patients. One of these was paralysed from the neck down, having been shot and then run over by a reversing Israeli truck. Kafirs (traditional Palestinian head-dress) adorned the rooms and the pillows, to show that spirits had not been daunted despite the injuries suffered. [=] 60485. Crawford, Myles. "Hebron Simmers," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 6, 1995, p. 3. Hebron has not been quiet since the Taba Accords were signed. Thousands of Israeli settlers opposed to the peace agreements were bused in from their West Bank enclaves to hold a demonstration in the streets of Hebron 9/28/1995. Four cars belonging to Palestinian residents were vandalized and nine Palestinian houses were stoned during the day. The streets of Hebron were deserted and the shops were closed in compliance with a Hamas and Islamic Jihad Movement sponsored strike on 9/28/1995. The Egyptian Ambassador to Israel, Muhammad Basiouni, toured Hebron 10/1/1995. Mayor Mustafa Natshheh accompanied the ambassador. He said that Egypt supports the Palestinian position and demanded that the settlers be moved from the city so that the Israelis could be treated as other Palestinians. He said the people wanted their rights to be respected as well and suggested that the original United Nations partition plan of 1947 should be implemented.

60486. Crawford, Myles. "Palestine and People: Book Review of Prescription for Disability Laws", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, August 18, 1994, p. 14. "The Human Rights of Persons With Disabilities" by Angela Gaff (Al-Haq, 1994) pp. 140. No price stated This publication is a departure for Al-Haq. The Ramallah based human rights organization has published numerous titles addressing the Israeli occupation. This monograph maintains the concern with human rights, but addresses a matter of more universal concern—the rights of persons with disabilities. The disabled population of the occupied territories was substantially increased by the Intifada. The plight of the disabled is the subject of considerable concern among Palestinians. However, Angela Gaff's work shows that there is a legal vacuum which any new Palestinian legislative authority should fill. Gaff is an English solicitor who has worked with Al-Haq for three years. She initiated the Disability Project there. She is a member of the Steering Committee for Women's Justice and Law, and is currently engaged in work on Children's Rights. Gaff's monograph is not an expose about discrimination in Palestinian society, a phenomenon presumed to exist at no more virulent a level than in any other society. It is rather an examination of applicable law, and offers suggestions as to what laws would be progressive. Gaff begins by choosing her definitions from the most aggressive wing of the disability rights movement. The precise definitions of "Impairment," "Disability," and "Handicap" are perhaps most important for what they imply or declare about the causation of these conditions. This is to say that disability can be seen as a construct of attitudes and environmental barriers, and not a function of an individual's limitations. She chooses to posit that the environment is not a norm, but a variable which society should fashion to meet the needs of as many of its citizens as possible. From this conception of the problem flows a thorough plan to restructure society for the benefit of the disabled.

International law regarding the rights of persons with disabilities is surveyed. It is quite progressive, but utterly toothless. Gaff's work shows that there is a legal vacuum which any new Palestinian legislative authority should fill. Gaff is an English solicitor who has worked with Al-Haq for three years. She initiated the Disability Project there. She is a member of the Steering Committee for Women's Justice and Law, and is currently engaged in work on Children's Rights. Gaff's monograph is not an expose about discrimination in Palestinian society, a phenomenon presumed to exist at no more virulent a level than in any other society. It is rather an examination of applicable law, and offers suggestions as to what laws would be progressive. Gaff begins by choosing her definitions from the most aggressive wing of the disability rights movement. The precise definitions of "Impairment," "Disability," and "Handicap" are perhaps most important for what they imply or declare about the causation of these conditions. This is to say that disability can be seen as a construct of attitudes and environmental barriers, and not a function of an individual's limitations. She chooses to posit that the environment is not a norm, but a variable which society should fashion to meet the needs of as many of its citizens as possible. From this conception of the problem flows a thorough plan to restructure society for the benefit of the disabled.
explains the distinction between conventions or covenants signed by nations, and mere declarations or recommendations by United Nations’ organizations. Declarations only suggest standards, covenants are nominally binding but no actual sanctions are available before any forum against a state which contravenes a covenant that it signed. Suffice it to say that a fair bit of human rights protection for persons with disabilities can be extrapolated from those covenants which, in their agglomeration, constitute the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Also Gaff notes that the United Nations’ Declarations on the rights of retarded and disabled persons respectively, as well as three International Labor Organization Recommendations provide extensive details as to how nations might advance “non-discriminatory” societies in which persons with disabilities are assured “equal enjoyment” of access to jobs, education, services, and other things. Gaff explains how the Israelis have neglected the health system of the territories, and how this contravenes the Fourth Geneva Convention which the Israelis refuse to acknowledge as binding or even guiding as respects health care. The rates of the Israeli General Health Insurance program available to inhabitants of the territories are prohibitive for most, and not one rehabilitation center was built by the authorities during the twenty-eight-year occupation. Disability law in Israel is a mixed bag. Israel lacks a comprehensive or consolidated statute on the rights of the disabled. There is no provision specifically forbidding discrimination against the disabled in Israeli law, nor any mechanism for redress against such discrimination (inssofar as a prohibition of it might be construed from various legal sources.)

However, Israeli law does provide for education of the disabled in the “least restrictive environment,” and for their “systematic teaching and treatment.” The Israeli Social Security system is admirably civilized and well-funded. It includes, along with disability pensions, subsidies to help the disabled buy modified vehicles, and allowances to pay for nursing help. There are also laws providing for tax breaks and housing subsidies for persons with disabilities, and a public health system which provides hearing aid and prosthetic devices. The issuance of building licenses are contingent upon agreement to make the buildings accessible to the handicapped. Municipalities can provide vocational rehabilitation if their budgets permit it. Many of these considerable virtues are incorporated in the suggestions for a Palestinian consolidated statute. Gaff’s model includes: 1) A right to damages or reinstatement for discrimination in employment, education or services; 2) A requirement that the Israeli government place on employers that they “reasonably accommodate” disabled employees unless doing so imposes an “undue hardship;” 3) An imperative that Palestinian universities and schools be rendered accessible, and a guarantee of a right to education in the “least restrictive environment” whenever possible; 4) requirements for reserved seating on public transportation, and an aspiration to fund the installation of wheelchair lifts and curb ramps; 5) A Social Security system (like Israel’s); 6) a right to have access to cultural and political events facilitated by sign language interpreters and Braille publications; 7) A right to have the legal system provide “signers” and Braille as well; 8) Grants for adjustments to housing to make it accessible and accessibility conditions for building licenses enforced by monitoring and fines; 9) A campaign to raise awareness to combat the shame families feel which often inhibits the lifestyles they make available to their disabled members; and 10) A vocational rehabilitation system. Gaff’s prescriptions depart from the Israeli model and add features from American law which are more radical. Her goals are clearly laudable. Furthermore, the survey of basically ineffectual international law standards on these matters serve to demonstrate that her position is shared by some respectable company.

However, the “Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990” also requires that employers reasonably accommodate disabled employees, and otherwise make their accommodation by society a matter of right. It is expected to revolutionize the American legal industry. Gaff’s suggestions might have the unfortunate effect of fostering litigation. The American legal system is justly criticized for placing undue emphasis on individual rights as opposed to advancing communal resolutions of problems such as disability. The notion that the disabled should have a right to accommodation which they can enforce against employers should be carefully examined. Palestinians evince genuine concern for their disabled. It might be more fruitful to add incentives to bolster these sentiments, rather than to place the interests of the disabled and their potential employers in conflict, especially in the very communitarian Palestinian context. The most interesting section of this work is all too brief. The question of how disability and discrimination are defined deserves more examination before the Palestinian state embarks on a policy designed to ameliorate the lot of persons with disabilities. Budgetary constraints should also inhibit early efforts, lest a reach that exceeds grasp discredits the efforts. The status of the casualties of the Intifada, however, should surely be used to raise public awareness, and advance a progressive and humane vision of Palestinian society by such a law as this monograph prescribes. [=]
Jackson came to the defense of the Nation of Islam when its New York mosque was stormed by the New York Police, and in 1975 gave Farrakhan seminal political advice. Ironically, the silence of the press on the Nation of Islam, which is characteristically a rather closed community, led Farrakhan's attacks on Jewish leaders to be magnified in the press, while Farrakhan's attacks on Black leaders to be ignored: this distortion by the press made it seem as if Farrakhan focused on Jews while in fact Farrakhan attacked Jews and Blacks almost equally throughout. At the same time, Jackson had his problem with Jews, since Jackson had openly advocated peace between Israel and Palestinians, and peace talks between Israel and the PLO in 9/1979, a viewpoint that Jews vigorously resisted for another generation. In his 1984 presidential campaign, Jackson was wounded constantly by [Israeli-funded] Jewish Defense League goon squads, the Anti-Defamation League (Brnith League) conducted a covert national smear campaign against Jackson as an 'anti-semite,' and the New York Times staged almost daily attacks on the Jackson candidacy. However, typically politically motivated attacks on Black leaders by the White or Jewish press backfire. Then on 1/25/1984, Jackson was reported to call New York Hymietown: this lead to a firestorm of attacks on Jackson, and false charges against Black reporters that they had tried to protect Jackson from the charge (the only reporter who reported on the comment, Milton Coleman, who is Black): a speech by Farrakhan in which he threatened Coleman was edited by MacNeil-Lehrer NewsHour to demand Coleman's death; this was followed by a report on ABC's Nightline in which several Farrakhan speeches were edited together to create an even more threatening image. Immediately, the US Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois started an investigation on Farrakhan, but no charges would ever be brought because speeches used in the news media, and upon which the investigation was based, were simply manufactured by the media and were false. Journalists raced to extract derogatory sound bites from Farrakhan: Don Hayer of Chicago-Sun Times would quote Farrakhan as saying: [the creation of Israel was] "an outlaw act," and that Israel had not had peace because 'she will never have any peace structured on injustice, lying and deceit and using the name of God to shield your gutter religion under His holy and righteous name'. While this immediately brought denunciations by President Reagan, VP Bush, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks, Democratic candidates Walter Mondale and Gary Hart, there is no evidence that Farrakhan's remarks: rather Don Hayer merely fabricated the remarks. Farrakhan did say: They quoted me right on my statements where Israel is concerned. I did say Israel is an outlaw state and those that aided andabetted her coming into existence, taking the land from the Palestinians, that was a criminal act and they are criminals in the sight of Almighty God. That's exactly what I said." However, there was considerable outraging that Farrakhan labeled Israel as an outlaw state and that Farrakhan was accusing the US of war crimes for aiding in the creation of Israel. Finally, on 6/28/1984, Jackson disavowed Farrakhan.

Freed of his role in the national political forum, Farrakhan criticized Jackson for his apologies to Jews noting: It was foreign affairs that brought out fathers into slavery. This was one of the reasons I disapprove of Jesse Jackson apologizing to you. He apologized to you for the Hymie remark. What does he have to apologize for? Must he apologize for his association with his brother? And then you, with your pious, hypocritical self: We'll see if he's gonna do better now. But you know you won't run that game by me, will you? When have the Jews apologized for being involved in the slave trade that caused 100 million Black lives to be lost? When have you apologized? You didn't make any apology for that, did you? Y'all know how to read don't you? You better go read them. They put it all on the Arabs, as though Jews didn't have a part in it. You didn't apologize. You didn't apologize for putting my brothers and sisters to live in housing or apartments, charging them the highest rent for nothing. You didn't apologize for setting up liquor stores, though you don't drink too much yourself, feeding my brothers and sisters alcohol. You don't apologize. You don't apologize for sucking the blood of our poor people [so] that you might live well. You don't apologize for seducing a 19-year-old girl [Vanessa Williams, the first Black Miss America] and making her take off her clothes. You don't apologize. You don't apologize for selling her nude pictures to make a profit for yourself. You don't apologize for destroying the girl and her future for a profit. You don't apologize for your connection with South Africa. You don't apologize.' [TXT]

"Those diaries are cuckoo, let me tell you."—Syndicated columnist Bob Novak.

"His behavior has been despicable."— Eleanor Clift, Newsweek.

"He has no shame at all."—Kate O'Beirne, National Review.

"This guy didn't deserve the charity that he got."—Morton Kondracke, Roll Call.

Those comments, gleaned from two television talk shows, CNN's "Capitol Gang" and NBC's "McLaughlin Group," on 9/9/1995, only a day after Oregon Senator Bob Packwood's tearful announcement that he was resigning "for the good of the Senate," will serve as the political epitaph of one of the most revolting American political figures of this or any other century. Packwood's announcement followed by a day the recommendation of the Senate Ethics Committee that he be expelled and marked the end of an almost successful three-year campaign to head off just such an expulsion motion. It also ended one of the longest, closest and least reported relationships between any member of Congress and Israel's American lobby, dramatically illustrating two facts about that lobby and its congressional supporters. The first fact is that members of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Israel's principal Washington lobby, pledge openly that their support for a candidate will be based not upon questions of character, integrity, party affiliation or religion—but solely upon whether that candidate adheres to AIPAC instructions in voting for foreign aid for Israel and against arms sales to other Middle East countries. AIPAC dramatically redeemed that pledge when, as charges of sexual harassment and corrupt practices engulfed Packwood, his financial support from individual AIPAC donors continued, and Israel's supporters in the media visibly slowed and almost stopped backing Packwood's campaign for his expulsion. The second fact revealed by the drama is that eventually even the unsentimental support of what presidential candidate Pat Buchanan calls "the most powerful lobby in America" could not protect Packwood. It's a lesson worth pondering by some other unsavory congressional figures whose connections to or interests in their own constituents have lessened as their ties to AIPAC have strengthened.

Packwood first was elected to the Senate in 1968 when, at age 36, he was known as the "boy wonder" of Oregon politics. He visited Israel in 1971 and wrote of his first view of Jerusalem, "It was dawn as we flew over in a small plane, and the city glistered golden in the early morning sunlight." (His reference to Israel's "golden domes" in his rambling farewell speech was a reminder to Jewish supporters of the symbolic relationship that began with that trip 24 years earlier.) From that time on he began courting Jewish campaign donations with such AIPAC instructions in voting for foreign aid for Israel and against arms sales to other Middle East countries. AIPAC dramatically redeemed that pledge when, as charges of sexual harassment and corrupt practices engulfed Packwood, his financial support from individual AIPAC donors continued, and Israel's supporters in the media visibly slowed and almost stopped backing Packwood's campaign for his expulsion. The second fact revealed by the drama is that eventually even the unsentimental support of what presidential candidate Pat Buchanan calls "the most powerful lobby in America" could not protect Packwood. It's a lesson worth pondering by some other unsavory congressional figures whose connections to or interests in their own constituents have lessened as their ties to AIPAC have strengthened.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

146

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================
rely on his good judgment, superb political and legislative skills, energetic leadership and friendship. He has been part of the pro-Israel forces in the Senate since the days of Sens. Jacob Javits (R-NY), Henry 'Scoop' Jackson (D-WA), Hubert Humphrey (DMN) and Clifford Case (R-NJ).

To him it was a matter of 'we' and 'us,' not 'you folks.' "Just how effective such appeals were both for the "Bob Packwood in 1999" committee, which raised $58,290 in 1993, and the Packwood Legal Defense Trust Fund, which collected $279000 in the first nine months of that year, were revealed by some of the names and contributions listed on the defense fund's filings to the Federal Election Committee. Among them were former Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations chairman Lester Pollack, $9,000; former AIPAC chairman Robert H. Asher, $5000; former AIPAC chairman Lawrence Weinberg, $2000; and national capital area pro-Israel activist Stuart E. Eizenstadt, former President Jimmy Carter's domestic policy adviser who currently holds a Clinton administration ambassadorship in Europe, $10. Strangely, throughout the increasingly desperate campaign on his behalf by the lobbyists he alternately served and exploited over the years, Packwood, the compulsive diarist, continued to dictate statements incriminating many of them into his current diaries even as he altered entries in the diaries of previous years which had been subpoenaed by the Senate ethics committee. In the end, Packwood stood virtually alone, deprived of the support of the wife he first betrayed and then divorced, estranged from his two children, abandoned by the lobbyists he so casually implicated, and finally forsaken by the Senate colleagues he had disgraced. Long ago Senator Packwood chose a vanity license plate for his personal automobile to symbolize his loyalty to the most powerful of the special interests upon which he had based his political career. Over the years that symbol evolved into both the personal credo and an unwitting prophasey for this most shameless of senators. It reads, "MASADA." [—]

60490. DC; ITA. Pakistan: Economic News. IMI-930210. District of Columbia: International Trade Administration, February 10, 1993. [This article is derived from a telegraphic report dated 2/10/93, prepared at the American Embassy - Islamabad. It discusses recent economic and commercial developments from Pakistan.]

ANTIBOYCOTT COMPLIANCE: Firms are reminded that the Export Administration amendments of 1977 and Export Administration regulations (15 C.F.R. Part 369) prohibit certain forms of compliance with foreign boycotts, including furnishing information or entering into or implementing agreements. This document or subsequent aspects of this transaction may involve conditions or requirements compliance with which is prohibited. Violators of US antiboycott law are subject to severe penalties including fines, imprisonment and revocation of export license privileges. Firms are further reminded that any United States person receiving a request for the furnishing of information, the entering into or implementation of agreements, or the taking of any other action which furthers or supports restrictive trade practices or boycotts must report such receipt to the Department of Commerce, in accordance with 15 C.F.R. 369.6. Information concerning US antiboycott laws and how to comply with them is available from the Office of Antiboycott Compliance, Room 6098, US Department of Commerce, Washington, D.C. 20230, (202) 377-2381 and from the Office of General Counsel, Room 1010, US Department of the Treasury, Washington, D.C. 20220, (202) 568-5525.

AMEMBASSY ISLAMABAD

Subject: Pakistan Economic/Commercial Highlights - 1/1993

Overview: The Finance Minister has Revised Downward His Estimate Of 1992 Gdp Growth To 5.5%. Inflation Has Dropped Back To Single Digits (Annual Average Basis), But Depreciation Of The Rupee Accelerated, As The Trade Deficit Continued To Narrow. On The Political Scene, Tensions With India Persisted In The Aftermath Of The Recent Sectarian Clashes In That Country. On The Other Hand, The Domestic Political Temperature Eased, With The Government And The Opposition Making Overtures To Each Other. Opposition Leader (And Impeachable Nawaz Sharif Foe) Benazir Bhutto Surprised Everyone By Accepting The Chairmanship Of The Foreign Affairs Standing Committee In The Iji-Dominated National Assembly. Other Developments: (a) A "Pm's Award" For Private Exporters Was Established (b) The Government Of Pakistan (Gop) Raised Duty On Palm, Soybean Oils (c) Foreign Firms Seek Joint Venture Partners To Manufacture Spinning Machinery In Pakistan. (d) Usaid Funds Program To Attract Foreign Investment To Pakistan US And Pakistan To Negotiate Pl-480 Agreement 3m Plans Manufacturing Unit In Pakistan (e) Pak Domestic Auto Production Falls Sharply -- But Chrysler, Daewoo Group Plan New Assembly Plants (f) U.S Firm Wins Consultancy Contract For Pnsc (g) Pak Firms To Import Cotton From CiS (h) Kse Registers Depository Company (Para 19)

Macro Overview: Finance Minister Calls Half-Yearly Performance Mixed: (1) In His Pny 1992-93 Mid-Year Review Of The Economy (I.E., For The July-December 1992 Period), Finance Minister Sartaj Aziz Revised Downward The Gop's Estimate Of Gdp Growth For 1992 -- To 5.5% -- Weaker Than 1991's Performance Of 6.4%. He Blamed The Devastating September 1992 Floods And The International Recession For The Downward Revision. Sartaj Said The Federal Budget Deficit Target Ceiling Of 4.8% Of Gdp Will Be Exceeded Because Of The Same Factors Affecting Gdp: Higher Outlays And Weaker-Than-Projected Revenues Associated With The Floods And The World-Wide Growth Recession. However, He Does Not Expect The Gop Will Miss The Deficit Target By Too Wide A Margin. (Comment: Other Observers Are Not So Sanguine. End Comment.) He Noted Continuing Problems On The Revenue Side, With Government Revenues Increasing Only 7.0% In The First Half Of Pny 92-93, Against The Targetted Growth Rate Of 25%. The Minister Added That The Gop Intends To Limit To 15% Monetary Expansion For The Remaining Six Months Of The Current Fiscal Year (I.E., 1-6/30/1993). (2) According To The Finance Minister, The External Sector Has Performed Well In The First Half Of The Current Pakistani Fiscal Year: The Trade Deficit Narrowed By 17% As A Result Of A 12% Increase In Exports And Only A 2.0% Rise In Imports. In Addition, Foreign Exchange Reserves And Remittances From Pakistanis Abroad Were Up 23% And 13% Respectively, During The July-December Period. Sartaj Is Hopeful The Expected Bumper Wheat Crop Will Offset The Losses From The Reduced Cotton Crop, Damaged By Last Fall's Record Floods. (3) On The Political Scene, Tensions Between Pakistan And India Persisted, The Continued Fallout From The Destruction Of The Babri Mosque In India By Hindu Extremists In December. However, Relations Between The Nawaz Sharif Administration And The Main Opposition Party (Ppp), Led By Former Pm Benazir Bhutto, Eased Somewhat Following Bhutto's Acceptance Of A Major Parliamentary Post Offered By The Ruling Party: That Of Chairperson Of The Standing Committee On Foreign Affairs. The Month Also Saw The Unexpected Death Of One Of The Key Players Of The So-Called Power "Troika", As Chief Of Army Staff (Coas) General Asif Nawaz Succeeded To A Heart Attack. He Has Been Replaced By A Relatively Unknown Figure, General Abdul Wahheed. The New Coas Has Pledged To Continue To Support Pakistan's Democratic Institutions.

CPI Inflation Rate Down Slightly: After Entering Double Digits Last Month (10.4%, Annual Average Basis), Inflation, As Measured By The Consumer Price Index, Dropped Back To Single Digits -- 9.9% -- In December. On A Month-To-Month Basis, The Cpi Was Up 0.3% Over The Previous Month.

Trade Deficit Continues To Narrow: Pakistan's Trade Deficit For 7-12/1992 Narrowed To $1249 Million, $259 Million Less Than The Deficit Recorded During The Same Period A Year Ago. Merchandise Exports In The 7-12/1992 Period Were Up 11.6% Over The Same Period Last Year, While Imports Increased Only 2%.

Rupee Depreciates Further: Devaluation Of The Rupee Vis A Vis The US Dollar Accelerated In 1/1993, As It Fell 1.2% (Paisas 60490. DC; ITA. Pakistan: Economic News. IMI-930210. District of Columbia: International Trade Administration, February 10, 1993. [This article is derived from a telegraphic report dated 2/10/93, prepared at the American Embassy - Islamabad. It discusses recent economic and commercial developments from Pakistan.]
Forex Reserves Down Slightly: Pakistan's Foreign Exchange Reserves on January 21 Stood at $846 Million, Equivalent to About Five Weeks Worth of Imports. The Reserves Are Down From $1036 Million a Month Ago.

New Policy Initiatives: PM Announces Export Incentive Awards: To Motivate the Country's Export Sector, the Gop Has Established the Prime Minister's Award for Top Achievers in Six Export Categories. The Award Will Carry a Cash Prize of Rs, 1 Million (About $38,000) and Will Go to Exporters Who Demonstrate: (1) Highest Overall Exports; (2) Highest Exports of Engineered Goods; (3) Best Export Publicity; (4) Highest Unit Value in Textiles; (5) Introduction of New Export Products; and, (6) Highest Exports of Agricultural Products.

Duty on Palm, Soybean Oil Raised: The Pak Economic Coordination Committee (Ecc) Announced January 13 an Increase in Import Duties on Palm and Soybean Oil of, Respectively, Rs 500/Ton and Rs 1,000/Ton. The Ecc Justified the Increase on the Fluctuations in the International Price of These Commodities.

US Aid for Foreign Investment Initiative: The U.S. Agency for International Development (Usaid) Recently Executed a Grant Agreement with the Foreign Investment Advisory Service (Fias) to Support a Gop Program to Attract Foreign Investment to Pakistan. Fias is a Joint Facility of the World Bank, the International Finance Corp., and Miga that Has Collaborated Extensively with Usaid Worldwide. Fias Will Provide Expert Advice and Other Services to the Newly-Established Pak Investment Board (Plb) to Promote and Facilitate Foreign Investment in Pakistan.

Business and Industry Highlights: (1) Joint Venture on Manufacturing of Spinning Machinery: Two Leading Manufacturers of Textile Machinery from Japan and China Are Reportedly Negotiating with Pakistani Manufacturers on a Joint Venture to Produce Spinning Machinery in Pakistan. Toyota Tsusho of Japan and Shanghai Textile Machinery of China Have Supplied One-Third of the Six Million Spindles Now Operating in the Pak Spinning Industry. Competitors from Taiwan and Germany Are Also Vying for the Pak Market, Where Annual Demand is Currently One-Half Million Spindles. (2) 3m to Establish Manufacturing Unit in Karachi: 3m Representatives Recently Visited Pakistan to Begin the Process of Establishing a Small-Scale 3m Manufacturing Unit in Pakistan. 3m Current Exports to Pakistan, But Has No Direct Investment Here. The Plant Will Be Located in Karachi. (3) Daewoo Plan New Assembly Plants: According to Gop Sources, Total Domestic Auto Production Declined Sharpin 1991-92 -- to 99,000 Units. From 140,000 Units a Year Earlier. Most Observers Attribute the Decline to a Fall-Off in Production at State-Owned Plants Slated For Privatization. (4) On the Bright Side of the Auto Picture, Chrysler Representatives Recently Visited Pakistan to Explore the Feasibility of Establishing, as a Joint Venture, a Jeep Assembly Plant in Karachi. If the Project Goes Forward, the Plant Would Initially Produce 2,000 Units Annually, Eventually Increasing Production to 7,000-8,000 Units. (5) At the Same Time, Daewoo Motor Co., an Affiliate of South Korea's Daewoo Group, Will Reportedly Establish an Auto Assembly Plant in the Special Industrial Zone at Port Qasim, Near Karachi. The Group Signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the Gop to Establish 24 Industrial Units, Including Textile Make-Ups, Autos, and Engineered Goods. Daewo's 1,600 Cc Taxi Version Is Now Being Imported Under the Prime Minister's Employment Promotion Scheme for the Transport Sector. After Suzuki and Toyota, Daewo's Would Be the Third Largest Auto Assembly Plant in the Country.

US Firm Wins Consultancy Contract for Pnsc: The Gop Has Selected an American Firm, Mercer Management Consulting, to Advise the Gop on the Privatization of Pakistan National Shipping Corp. (Pnsc) and the National Tanker Co. (Ntc), a Subsidiary of Pnsc. Cotton Export Target Unlike To Be Achieved; Industry Seeks Imports from CIS: Punjab Secretary of Agriculture Shazad Pervaiz Has Reportedly Said That the Cotton Export Target of 2.5 Million Bales for FY-92/93 Will Not Be Achieved Because of Production Losses from August's Floods and a Cotton Leaf Virus Attack. According to the All-Pakistan Textile Mills Association (Apmta), Members of Apmta Would Like to Import One Million Bales of Medium Staple Lint Cotton from the Central Asian States Because of Local Shortages.

KSE Registers Depository Company: The Karachi Stock Exchange (Kse) Has Registered the Central Depository Company of Pakistan With the Corporate Law Authority. Once Operating -- in About a Year -- it Will Handle Most Transfers of Shares Electronically and Thereby Substantially Reduce Back-Room Delays. Although Details Are Still Under Negotiation, CitiBank, the International Finance Corp., Kse, and Several Other Institutions Are Likely to Participate in the Firm. Monjo. [s]
6. Requests that Palestinian women in the occupied Palestinian territory be assisted in developing small-scale industry and creating vocational training centres;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to monitor the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the mission of experts [See E/CN.6/1990/10] in order to improve the situation of Palestinian women in the occupied Palestinian territory;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue his investigation of the situation of Palestinian women and children and to report to the Commission on the Status of Women at its thirty-sixth session on the implementation of the recommendations and conclusions contained in the report of the mission of experts.” [12th plenary meeting 5/30/1991.] [=]

60492. DPR. “Economic & Social Council Adopts Three Resolutions and One Decision Relevant to the Question of Palestine: Resolution 1993/15: Situation Of and Assistance to Palestinian Women”, in DPR, July 1993. At its substantive session of 1993 held from 6/28 to 7/30 at Geneva, the Economic & Social Council adopted the following:

"The Economic & Social Council,

Having considered with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the situation of Palestinian women in the occupied territory [E/CN.6/1993/I0:] and previous reports concerning the situation of Palestinian women inside and outside the occupied Palestinian territory,

Recalling the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women, in particular paragraph 260 thereof,

Recalling also its resolution 1992/16 of 7/21/1992 and its other relevant resolutions,

Deeply concerned about the additional suffering of women and children living under occupation,

Expressing special concern about the tragic situation of the Palestinian women in the occupied Palestinian territory, which has been dangerously deteriorating at all levels,

Deeply alarmed by the deteriorating condition of Palestinian women and children in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, as a result of the continued Israeli violation of Palestinian human rights and oppressive measures, including collective punishments, curfews, demolition of houses, closure of schools and universities, mass deportation, confiscation of land and settlement activities and denial of family unification, which are illegal and contrary to the relevant provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 8/12/1949 [United Nations, Treaty Series, vol. 75, No. 973].

(5) Requests the Secretary-General to assist in and review the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the mission of experts.” [12th plenary meeting 7/8/1993.]

(60493. DPR. “Part 05: Plenary Discussion B: Plenary 3(1): Strengthening Civil and Social Structure”, in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. (76) Dr. Eyad El-Sarraj, Director of the Gaza Community Mental Health Programme, described the situation in Gaza after the implementation of the Cairo Agreement had begun as safer, more secure, and happier. Before, there had been a campaign of terror, Palestinians against Palestinians, in addition to the difficult economic situation, poverty and unemployment. At the same time, he stressed that the occupation had not ended, and that the settlements were still there.

(77) He said that the Palestinian society was basically patriarchal and tribal and had been collectively traumatized. These were important characteristics because they would bear on the future of the Palestinian community, and because they had to do with authority, democracy and leadership. Because of the lack of democracy, Palestinian society had reached a devastating stage.

(78) Palestinian society had developed characteristics of “victim psychology”, which in many ways was a mirror image of the Jews, of the Israelis. Characteristically, the Palestinian community had become helpless and dependent on its aggressor and paradoxically defiant. For centuries, Palestinians had been alienated from the authority and had cultivated many methods of manipulation. But now was a new era in which Palestinians had to identify with the authority, and that had to be learned collectively.

(79) He went on to say that in the past seven years about 88000 Palestinian youths had been jailed and according to the International Red Cross Committee in Gaza, 75% of them had been systematically tortured. About 60000 Palestinian children in Gaza, below the age of 15, were suffering from some emotional problems that were the direct result of trauma at the hands of Israeli soldiers. They needed psychiatric intervention and other forms of therapy, in particular to break the cycle of violence that was being perpetuated from generation to generation.
Figure 60493. Percentage of the 80000 Palestinian Children Jailed in The Gaza Strip Reported By The International Red Cross Committee in Gaza To Have Been 'Systematically Tortured'.

(80) He expressed the view that funding, power and authority should not be centralized in the hands of the Palestinian Authority but should be shared with the Palestinian non-governmental sector. That was not a question of confrontation but rather a question of building a new culture in which NGOs could contribute to the Palestinian Authority as much as the latter could contribute to the democratic experience and development of the country. There would be no building of a Palestinian society without democracy and participation.

(81) Ms. Zahira Ramal, Coordinator for Women's Affairs Technical Committee, aid that NGOs would have an important role to play in the construction of a civil society. She emphasized the importance of construction and development as the Palestinian self-rule government would have the responsibility of proving that the agreements would lead to an improvement in living conditions. She called upon the donor countries and the World Bank to fulfil their promises.

(82) She stressed the importance of building a civil society in an environment that did not motivate such a society. The Authority had to prove to its own people and to the international community that positive and visible changes were taking place concerning human rights and democracy.

(83) She called for the participation of the whole community in fulfilling the need for a quick and sustainable development. That implied that NGOs and the private sector should be encouraged to continue their role in providing services for the Palestinian people. This would contribute to a healthy environment and a constructive competition.

(84) Democratic education was also required. There would be a need to establish organizations whose basic role would be to explain and teach the principles of democracy and the ways of democratic participation and to observe any violation. Various organizations of that kind had emerged recently, women's organization most prominently.

(85) Ms. Kamal called upon the international community and United Nations agencies: to ensure that Governments would keep their promises for support, accelerate the peace process and its implementation; to support the Palestinian NGOs to enable them to perform their tasks; to promote institutional-building; to provide training for the observation of the democratic process in all aspects, especially in the training of women cadres; to support the Palestinian economy and encourage the establishment of relations with counterparts in different countries; and to observe the implementation of the Agreement on the part of Israel. She called upon NGOs to ensure, through peace watch groups, that Israeli activities during the interim period did not endanger the forthcoming negotiations for the final period, especially with regard to settlements and East Jerusalem.

(86) Mr. Norman Cook, Director of Non-Governmental Organizations, Canadian Partnership Branch of CIDA, described the special relationship between the Canadian Government and the Canadian NGO community and stated that in 1994, 27% of all Canadian development aid had been managed effectively by some 400 NGOs; that percentage was likely to grow over the next few years. The trend was towards increased partnerships with the NGO community was growing throughout the donor community and Governments everywhere were coming to recognize the key role of NGOs in securing and advancing democratic development.

(87) Mr. Cook added that the relationship between the NGO community and the Government of Palestine was the product of this work. He emphasized the importance of defining a framework and a strong contractual relationship between NGOs and the Government and engaging in a process of consultation.

(88) Mr. Cook said that NGOs should be able to establish their autonomy vis-à-vis the Government. They should be prepared to share costs and not become overly dependent. That was true not only in Canada, but also in the United States and in the Palestinian territory. It was also important to establish and encourage partnerships with NGOs in developing countries, in order to make better selections and to develop the right criteria for overseas funding.

(89) He pointed out that 27% of Canadians had their origin in developing countries, including a fair number of Arabic-speaking Canadian Muslims and Palestinians. That fact was beginning to be reflected in the membership and funding base of Canadian NGOs interested in the region.

(90) He encouraged the emerging Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian NGOs to work in a consultation process and on the development of an appropriate framework for ensuring a healthy working relationship. Canadian and North American NGOs should be supportive of both the framework and the consultation process. He stressed the importance of issues concerning women and youth for future assistance programmes. [=

60494. DPR. "Part 06: Plenary Discussion B: Plenary 3(2): Development and the UN System: (a) Promoting Human Rights", in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. (91) Ms. Janice Abu-Shakrah, Director of PHRIC, focused her presentation on how NGOs could more effectively use the United Nations system to promote human rights, both in relation to human rights violations under Israeli military occupation and in support of the State-building process that would promote and protect human rights. In particular, she made the following suggestions: (a) To utilize the human rights treaty-monitoring bodies to expose Israeli violations of human rights by producing alternative reports or critical appraisals of Israel's reports to those bodies, e.g., the Committee against Torture, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women; (b) To begin to address the legacy of occupation with a view towards achieving corrective justice and restitution for the victims of human right violations through, e.g., the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture and the mechanisms dealing with issues like impunity and compensation for gross human rights violations; (c) To explore and utilize the multiple avenues for guidance and technical assistance relevant to issues of self-governance such as development and promotion of a constitutional process, election awareness, human rights training for the police and other civil servants and the development of human rights education programmes in the schools and for the general public and other areas; (d) To utilize the Special Rapporteur and working groups of the Commission on Human Rights on a wide range of issues, not simply as depositories of reports, but as active consultants in exploring ways to direct NGO strategy and to influence policy formation. (92) She described how PHRIC and other NGOs were preparing an alternative report to the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, focusing on Israeli forces of forced eviction and the creation of homelessness, against Palestinian residents of Jerusalem. In her view, that use of the human rights mechanisms could also be an effective means for organizing local and international campaigns utilizing the NGO network advocating Palestinian human rights and for empowering NGOs. [=

60495. DPR. "Part 10: Annex I: Statement of Affirmation Issued By The North American Coordinating Committee for NGOs On The Question of Palestine", in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. (1) The American and Canadian organization participating in the Eleventh United Nation North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine reaffirm our commitment to a the Palestinian people in implementing the national and individual right recognized by United Nations resolution 194. These rights include the right to self-determination and to statehood, the right of refugee to return or to be compensated and the right to territory and property confiscated, seized or annexed in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention. We affirm as well the right of victims of torture and maltreatment to compensation and to access to effective... programme aimed at their rehabilitation.

(2) We note with alarm continuing Israeli settlement activity in occupied East Jerusalem and its environs, the continuing confiscation of Palestinian land in the Wet Bank and the continuing use of torture and of other repressive measures by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory. We further note the grave and deteriorating economic situation in Gaza and the Wet Bank. For the sake of peace and human decency, these issues must be addressed by the international community.

(3) We are hopeful that the establishment of the interim Palestinian self-governing authority in Gaza and Jericho will prove to be an historically significant step toward the implementation of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination within the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem. We urge the speedy replacement of the Israeli occupation by that self-governing authority to expedite a process toward a just and lasting peace between Israel and the Palestinian people.

(4) We believe that the interim arrangement established in accordance with the Declaration of Principle requires renewed commitment to moral, political and material support for the Palestinian people. We support the Palestinian people’s effort to establish civil society and democratic institutions in territory till under Israeli control. We look forward to the time the Palestinian people’ right to self-determination is fully exercised, marking the end of Israeli occupation. Until that time, we recognize we must continue to provide humanitarian assistance and other means of support for the human and political right of Palestinian. We will join with Palestinian and Israeli colleagues in effort to end Israeli practices of torture, its establishment of illegal settlements, and its maintenance of these settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem.

(5) We reaffirm our commitment to support and work with those in Israel seeking an end to the occupation and a just and peaceful resolution to the conflict based on the principle of international law, the Charter of the United Nations, and the achievement of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, primarily the right to self-determination. We further affirm the partnership that has emerged between the United Nations Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the organized NGO communities in North America and internationally.

(6) We believe that more of our work should now focus on development which empower Palestinian to build civil society within the occupied Palestinian territory. We also believe that we should continue to promote respect for human rights and to support the full implementation of the right to self-determination within the Wet Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem. We are especially mindful of the need of Palestinian children who comprise over 50% of the Palestinian population in the occupied Palestinian territory. We are disturbed by the extent to which they have been targeted physically, educationally and emotionally. We are fully aware of the importance of addressing their social need in order to build civil society and establish real peace in Palestine.

(7) Finally, we pledge to develop and expand our networks to offer all possible assistance in helping to achieve these goals. [-]

60496. DPR. “Part 11: Annex II: Workshop Reports: A. Workshop I: Economic Development”, in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. (1) The workshop on “The Palestinian women’ experience in development” combined with the NACC Standing Committee on Mobilizing Women discussion, recognize the importance of the many contribution of Palestinian women living under occupation and in the diaspora, especially their active and participatory role during the intifadah, with the realization that the Israeli occupation continues to exit. It also recognize that the “Palestinian woman” experiences in the struggle for national rights overshadowed the issues of social development and rights.

(2) Reaffirming the belief in and commitment to support Palestinian women’s development in social, cultural and economic sector of her society, and human right monitoring, the workshop and the Standing Committee: (a) Expresses deep concern about the gender-based discrimination and victimization of women under Israeli occupation and in various sectors of Palestinian society; (b) Strongly urge the full participation and representation of Palestinian women in all sectors of Palestinian society which include social, economic, cultural and political decision-making and policy confirmation; (c) Strongly support the development of enhanced working partnerships between women and men in all realms of institution- and infrastructure-building and among North American and international NGO; (d) Urge all United Nation agencies and NGOs to support the protection and development of project that enhance the improvement of Palestinian family Life during the transitional period; (e) Support the development of an NACC Women’ Resource Directory (electronic mail database) which would include the specific area of individual women’ expertise/specialization with the purpose of information sharing and strengthening the development of women’s educational/leadership abilities in all sector of society; (f) Urge NACC and all relevant United Nation agencies to ensure that the World Bank and other donor nation honour their pronouncement to the Palestinian people; (g) Pledge to ensure that an equitable representation of women’s social and national right issues are included in future United Nations and NACC forum on the question of Palestine. [-]

60497. DPR. “Part 12: Annex II: Workshop Reports: A. Workshop I: Economic Development”, in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. (1) The workshop on “The Palestinian women’ experience in development” combined with the NACC Standing Committee on Mobilizing Women discussion, recognize the importance of the many contribution of Palestinian women living under occupation and in the diaspora, especially their active and participatory role during the intifadah, with the realization that the Israeli occupation continues to exit. It also recognize that the “Palestinian woman” experiences in the struggle for national rights overshadowed the issues of social development and rights.

(2) Reaffirming the belief in and commitment to support Palestinian women’s development in social, cultural and economic sector of her society, and human right monitoring, the workshop and the Standing Committee: (a) Expresses deep concern about the gender-based discrimination and victimization of women under Israeli occupation and in various sectors of Palestinian society; (b) Strongly urge the full participation and representation of Palestinian women in all sectors of Palestinian society which include social, economic, cultural and political decision-making and policy confirmation; (c) Strongly support the development of enhanced working partnerships between women and men in all realms of institution- and infrastructure-building and among North American and international NGO; (d) Urge all United Nation agencies and NGOs to support the protection and development of project that enhance the improvement of Palestinian family Life during the transitional period; (e) Support the development of an NACC Women’ Resource Directory (electronic mail database) which would include the specific area of individual women’ expertise/specialization with the purpose of information sharing and strengthening the development of women’s educational/leadership abilities in all sector of society; (f) Urge NACC and all relevant United Nation agencies to ensure that the World Bank and other donor nation honour their pronouncement to the Palestinian people; (g) Pledge to ensure that an equitable representation of women’s social and national right issues are included in future United Nations and NACC forum on the question of Palestine. [-]
Follow-up:
(6) Committee Chair Leila Diab disseminated a package of information on the Committee and its proposed projects. Included was a directory of all those who participated in Committee meetings and workshops at Toronto, as well as a copy of the Committee resolution. A sample questionnaire for NGOs interested in inclusion in the women's electronic-mail database was also created. The Committee planned to finalize the questionnaire and to disseminate it in order to gauge interest in the project. [=] 60499. DPR. "Part 17: Annex III: Report of Standing Committees: D. Human Rights and International Law", in Eleventh United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Held in Toronto, Canada 7/6-8/1994. New York: Division for Palestinian Rights, July 8, 1994. [Facilitator: Peter Lems.] (12) During meetings and workshops throughout the Symposium, it was discovered that many people were unaware of the available resources and networks comprised of Palestinian and Israeli human rights organizations. Committee members resolved to produce a resource paper which would enable interested parties to contact producing material both internationally and within Israel-Palestine.

(13) As a follow-up, the NACC Standing Committee on Human Rights and International Law has completed its resource directory for human rights organizations. It is available through the NACC office and through Committee Chair Peter Lems.

(14) Two major themes emerged as pressing human rights issues in the occupied Palestinian territories. First, Committee members outlined a one-year campaign around the status of Jerusalem. The initial step would involve the development of a platform on the ground among Palestinian and Israeli organizations. This platform would then serve as the basis for an alternative report examining Israel's compliance with the covenant of economic, social and cultural rights. The Committee set a specific timeline for these first steps to be taken by 11-12/1994. Once local organizations helped North American NGOs identify important issues, international NGOs working in Jerusalem would be approached for support. Second, an international campaign would begin in 1/1995, and the alternative report would be presented before the Committee in 5/1995, in conjunction with Israel's own report on its compliance with the guidelines of the covenant.

(15) A campaign on behalf of women and children prisoners was also suggested. The campaign would not ignore the thousands of other Palestinian political prisoner, but would highlight the fact that those vulnerable groups had been ignored in the negotiating process. Women prisoners had not been released following the signing at Cairo on 5/4/1994 of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement, in accordance with the stipulations regarding prisoner release. [=]

(2) Canadian Autoworkers' Social Justice Fund: Tony Wohlforth, 205 Place Court, Willowdale, ON M2H 3H9 Canada.

(3) Canadian Council of Churches: Robert Assaly, 40 St. Clair Avenue, East Toronto, ON M4T 1M6 Canada.

(4) Centre d'études arabes Pour le développement: Jawad Squalli, 3680 rue Jeanne-Mance, Bureaux 450 Montreal, Quebec H2X 2K5 Canada.

(5) Episcopal Church - USA: Jane Wolfe, 815 Second Avenue, New York, NY 10017 USA.

(6) Methodist Federation for Social Action: Shirley Stevens, 76 Clinton Avenue, Staten Island, NY 10301 USA.

(7) Near East Cultural and Educational Foundation: James Graft, 106 Duplex Avenue, Toronto, ON M5P 2AJ Canada.

(9) Palestine Human Rights Information Center - International; Peter Lems. 4201 Connecticut Avenue, NW, Suite 500 Washington, D.C. 20006 USA.

(10) Presbyterian Church - USA: Victor Makari, 100 Witherpoon Street, Rm. 3412, Louisville, KY 40202-1396 USA.

(11) Union of Palestinian American Women: Leila Diab, P.O. Box 2164 Bridgeview, IL 60455 USA.

(12) Union of Palestinian Women Association in North America: Maha Jerad, P.O. Box 29110, Chicago, IL 60629 USA. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

(3) Dr. Anis Al-Qaq, Member of the Coordinating Committee for NGO on the Question of Palestine in the occupied Palestinian Territories and Member of various medical and civic organization, including the Dental Association in the West Bank (Chairman in 1985-1990), Palestinian Medical School Committee, and the Executive Committee of Higher Education Council in the Occupied Territories.
(4) Mr. Naseer Aruri, Professor of Political Science at the University of Massachusetts in Dartmouth.
(5) Mr. Aaron Back, staff member of B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Centre for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, and editor of the B'Tselem Human Rights Report.
(6) Ms. Phyllis Bennis, radio and print journalist based at the United Nations.
(7) Mr. Norman Cook, Director of Non-Governmental Organizations, Canadian Partnership Branch of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).
(8) Mr. Francis Duboi, Senior Programme Officer, Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People of UNDP.
(9) Mr. Mervyn M. Dymally, retired Congressman, United States House of Representatives.
(10) Mr. Larry Ekin, Chairman of the North American Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (NACC) and Director of Outreach for the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC) in Washington DC.
(11) Dr. Eyad Rajab El-Sarraj, Director of the Gaza Community Mental Health Programme.
(12) Zahira Kamal, Coordinator for Women's Affair Technical Committee, and Project Manager of Women in Development, a programme funded by UNDP.
(14) Mr. William Lee, Chief of the Liaison Office of UNRWA in New York.
(15) Mr. Peter Lems, Director of the Paslehtine Human Rights Information Centre (International).
(16) Mr. Johan Nordenfelt, Director of the General Assembly and Trusteeship Council Affairs Division of the UN Secretariat.
(17) Mr. Marc Perron, Assistant Deputy Minister, Africa and Middle East Branch, Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade of Canada, and Chairman of the Multilateral Working Group on Refugees.
(18) Mr. Jawad Sgalli, Chairman of the Board, Centre d'études arabe pour le developpement.
(19) Workshop Moderators and Resource Persons: Janice Abu-Shakrah; Federico Alassia; Robert Essawy; Phyllis Bennis; Aaron Back; Jean Couturier; Leila Diab; Eyad Rajab El Sarraj; Sameh Hassan; Zahira Kamal; Sarah Kaminker; William Lee; Peter Lems; Victor Makari; Nancy Murray; Taleb Salhab; Peter Wirth; Tony Wohlforth; Rhonda Zahnare.

60504. DPR. “Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine is Held In New York From 6/30-7/2/1993”, in DPR, July 1993. The Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine on the theme "Building for Peace and Palestine: Priorities for the Second Decade of the NGO movement", was held at United Nations Headquarters in New York from 6/30 to 7/2/1993 in accordance with General Assembly resolution 46/74 A of 12/11/1992. The Symposium followed the thirty-third United Nations Seminar, which took place on 6/28-29/1993. The Symposium was attended by representatives of 56 NGOs from the United States and Canada, 7 as observers. Also present were a number of governmental and intergovernmental observers as well as representatives of United Nations specialized agencies. H.E. Mr. Alcibiades Hidalgo Basulto (Cuba), Vice Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, chaired the opening and closing sessions of the Symposium. The opening session was addressed by the Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations, who read out a message from Mr. Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Mr. Larry Ekin, Chairman of the North American Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (NACC), served as Moderator of the Symposium. The Rev. Ibrahim Ayad, President of the Palestine Committee for NGOs, addressed the closing session. Five plenaries were established. The first considered the main topic of the Symposium "Building for peace and Palestine: priorities for the second decade of the NGO movement". Statements were made by: Mr. Don Betz, Chairman of the International Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine and Vice-President of University Relations at Northeastern State University, Oklahoma; Mr. Paul Findley, former Member of the United States House of Representatives; and, Mr. Asmi Bishara, Professor of Philosophy at Bir Zeit University. The second plenary was entitled "Rights, resources, refugees: the need for protection". Papers on this subject were presented by Mr. Jonathan Kuttab, a human rights lawyer and Director of the Mandela Institute for Political Prisoners in the West Bank; and, by Mr. Muhammad Hallaj, Director of the Centre for Policy Analysis on Palestine and a Member of the Palestine National Council. At the third plenary, entitled "Ending the occupation: a prelude to peace and security", presentations were made by Ms. Koni Ben Efrat, an Israeli peace activist, a founding member of "Women in Black" and also a member of the editorial staff of Elter/Challenge magazine; Mr. Muhammad Hallaj; and Mr. Atif Kubursi, Professor of Economics at McMaster University, Canada, and adviser on refugee issues to the Arab League and Minister of External Affairs of that country. The fourth plenary heard reports and recommendations from the five workshops of the Symposium and the seven standing committees established by NACC to strengthen NGO coordination and cooperation. Workshops were held on the following topics: Media skills and stereotyping; The Clinton Administration and the United States Congress: assessing the opportunities; Assumption protection: United Nations and the Fourth Geneva Convention; Seeds of a new society: the welfare of women and children; underoccupation; and Refugees and invisible transfers. The standing committees took up the following themes: government and public policy; human rights and international law; material aid and economic development; media and public education; mobilizing religious organizations; mobilizing labour; and mobilizing women's organizations. The fifth plenary, entitled "NGO priorities for the second decade", heard statements from: Mr. Don Betz; s. Mia Adjali, Director of the United Methodist Office for the United Nations; and, Mr. Jim Graft, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Toronto and Vice-Chairman of NACC. The participants elected a new Coordinating Committee for the North American region and charged it with preparing a final report to guide NGO action for the future. The full report of the Symposium will be issued in due course as a special bulletin of the United Nations DPR. [=] launched in Amman, Jordan, during the Arab Regional Preparatory Conference for the Fourth World Conference on Women on 11/5/1994. Women in a traditional Palestinian society had limited or no access to formal resources, services or political power, according to the report. They were restricted to the private world of their homes and to household-related activities, while men earned income outside the home and made important decisions. With the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, a significant part of the Palestinian population was dispersed as refugees, displaced persons, migrant workers and political exiles. Today, an estimated three million Palestinians live abroad, while only two million live in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Women became wage earners, fighters, refugee camp workers and heads of household.

Currently, women head almost 40% of the households in the West Bank. The report identifies three priority areas for action:

1. Governance -- women have had no representation in the local municipal administration and village councils -- the only form of self-government in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. 'Attempts should be made to raise the consciousness of municipal authority representatives and village councils to introduce the mechanisms for responding to women's needs,' says the report. 'The first and foremost policy action regarding the establishment of the Palestinian civil service should be a proclamation that it will be an equal opportunity civil service,' it states.

2. Human Resources Development -- human resource development for women both in vocational and training facilities, tends to focus on skills in traditional areas, including sewing, typing and hairdressing. 'As economic opportunities expand, it is essential that women have access to diversified training,' says the report.

3. Economic Participation -- the economic contribution of Palestinian women is often overlooked because of low economic participation rates and small or no remuneration in the agricultural and service sectors, where women are mostly employed. During reconstruction, 'it is essential that systems being put in place take into account women's economic role and ensure that women are included in the economic rejuvenation.' Credit facilities, which play a role in this process, should be accessible to women. The report calls for partnership between men and women if Palestinians are to succeed in their quest for independence and prosperity. 'History is full of examples demonstrating that, while women actively participate in pre-independence political struggles in various parts of the world, they are often excluded from public life once independence is attained,' says the report. It concludes that Palestinian people and their leaders can either seize the opportunity to build a society based on equal and full partnership or risk losing the vital contributions of one half of the population. At the Crossroads: Challenges and Choices for Palestinian Women in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip is published in English by UNDP. It is available free from UNDP, Gender-in-Development, Room: DCI-2032, One United Nations Plaza, New York, N.Y. 10017, Tel. (212) 906-5091.[c]

60506. DPR. "UNICEF Executive Board Adopts Resolution Calling For Assistance To Palestinian Children", in DPR, May 1991. At its 1991 regular session, held New York from 4/22-5/3/1991, the Executive Board of UNICEF adopted the following resolution:

1991/15. Assistance to Palestinian children: On the recommendation of the Programme Committee, The Executive Board, Recalling the Convention on the Rights of the Child of 1990 and the Declaration and the Plan of Action of the World Summit for Children, and the stipulation therein pertaining to the children living under difficult circumstances, especially those living under occupation, Having studied the report on the programme development in the iddle East and North Africa contained in document E/ICEF/991/10, Taking into consideration the difficult conditions of Palestinian children, Concerned by the deteriorating situation in the region, Affirming the need to intensify assistance to Palestinian children and women, Requests the Executive Director of UNICEF to continue to urgently assess the situation of Palestinian children and women and to provide funds commensurate with the expanding needs of these children and women, and to report to the 1992 session of the Executive Board on implementation." [c]

60507. DPR. "UNRWA Deplores Expulsion of Four Palestinians From Gaza and Offers Them Assistance; Protests To Israeli Authorities Against Mistreatment of Staff", in DPR, May 1991. The following press release was issued by UNRWA on 5/21/1991 (see PAL/1763):

"The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) said today that it was ready to offer assistance to four Palestinians from the Gaza Strip, including two UNRWA staff members, who were expelled to Lebanon by the Israeli authorities on Saturday, 18 May. The UNRWA has deplored the expulsion of the four men, who are all Palestine refugees registered with the agency. Two of them, Hashem Mohammad Dahan and Jamal Abu Halab, are UNRWA employees. The Agency's Field Office in Lebanon is being asked to assist the two staff members, as needed, and to do what it can for the other two men. The four were handed over to the international Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in the Beqaa Valley east of Beirut on Saturday after being expelled by the Israeli army. The UNRWA has reiterated its regret that the Israeli authorities have continued their policy of expelling Palestinians from the occupied territory, which it considers a violation of international obligations. As a humanitarian agency responsible for the welfare of the Palestine refugees, UNRWA said it would do what it could to assist the men and their families." On 5/22/1991, the following press release was issued by UNRWA (see PAL/1764):

"The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) has formally protested to the Israeli authorities in the occupied Gaza Strip against two incidents in which two UNRWA international staff members were struck and abused by Israeli border police. The incidents occurred on Friday, 17 May, in the Shaboura quarter of Gaza's Rafah refugee camp when UNRWA staff attempted to intervene with Israeli border police contingents who were mistreating camp residents. In the first incident, an UNRWA international staff member was insulted and pushed and his Palestinian assistant was slapped in the face and briefly detained in a military vehicle. A border guard later pushed the international staff member and struck him in the mouth. The second incident occurred later the same day when another UNRWA international staff member approached a group of border police who were beating three refugees. A border police officer insulted the UNRWA staff member and some of the border guards prodded her with their rifles. In a written protest to the Israeli Civil Administration in Gaza, UNRWA said it was 'very concerned about the increasing number of assaults on its staff by members of the border police.' The Agency said such were 'incompatible with Israel's obligations to facilitate UNRWA's tasks. The UNRWA has asked for an investigation into the latest incidents.' [c] 60508. DPR. "UNRWA Deplores High death Toll in Occupied Territory and Continued Closure of Schools in the West Bank", in Division of Palestinian Rights, April 1989. VIENNA, 20 April (UNRWA) -- The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) which looks after Palestine refugees has deplored the increased toll of civilians killed by security forces in the Israeli-occupied territories over the past week and expressed disappointment that schools in the West Bank are not to be allowed to reopen for at least another month. The Commissioner-General of UNRWA Giorgio Giacomelli, said at his Vienna office today: In the past week, at least 13 Palestinians, including a 13-year old girl and five boys aged between 10-15, have been shot dead by Israeli forces in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. This heavy toll, caused by such incidents as the border-police raid on Nahalin village in which many were killed or wounded by gunfire, represents a marked increase over casualties in the preceding weeks. As a United Nations humanitarian agency, we deplore this loss of life and call for a halt to the use of lethal firepower against civilians young and old. Figures compiled by UNRWA show that 30 Palestinians have been killed and at least 237 wounded by army gunfire since the end of March.

From the beginning of the Palestinian uprising through 15 April, 442 Palestinians were killed and nearly 25000 wounded by the security forces, the furies show.

Schools to Remain Closed: Meanwhile, the Israeli authorities have extended for another month -- through 19 May -- the military orders which have kept virtually all schools in the West Bank closed continuously since 21 January. These include 90 UNRWA-operated schools with 33000 refugee pupils aged 6-15. The only exceptions to the closures are schools lying within Jerusalem municipality, which include eight UNRWA schools for refugees. West Bank schools have been open only sporadically since 2/1988, and have not been allowed to make up time lost in the last school year", Mr. Giacomelli said. "If we cannot reopen before the end of next month and are not allowed to remain open through the summer months, a whole school year will be lost. The UNRWA has repeatedly called for schools to be reopened to allow Palestinian children to exercise their basic right to education. This may also improve the climate in the area. Interim arrangements to enable children in the first three years of school to continue some basic educational home have been barred by the Israeli authorities" (see PAL/1706) [=]

1) To work in partnership with Palestinian women's institutions;
2) To respect the goals, objectives and priorities set by Palestinian women's organizations;
3) To support Palestinian women's programmes;
4) To educate the North American public on the reality and struggles of Palestinian women and confront stereotyping Arab women;
5) To bring about commonalities among women in areas of human rights, violence against women.

Rawia Bishara stressed the need to identify priorities of Palestinian women under occupation such as economic cooperatives, child care centres, while Najat Khellil drew attention to the fact that women's institutions and their objectives change according to the political context in which they work. Ms. Khellil called on NGOs to support women's self-reliance projects that attempt to disengage from the Israeli occupation, such as frozen vegetable factories, health-care services, training agricultural workers and providing support for women's vocational training centres. Rabib Hadi urged NGOs to support Palestinian community survival while aiding long-term projects by helping in family sponsorship programmes, as well as publicizing cases of Palestinian women prisoners and supporting cultural workers; and to pay special attention to women's health by providing medical equipment such as mammography machines to hospitals in occupied territories. [=]

60510. DPR. Ninth United Nations North American NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine. Held in New York, 6/24-26/1992: Part 16: Annex II: Workshop Reports: Workshop 5: Supporting Palestinian Institution Building: Action Proposals (Consensus), DPR, June 26, 1992. (1) Publishing a resource directory that includes all Palestinian women's organizations; (2) Publishing a resource directory that includes North American organizations that work in support of Palestinian women; (3) Organizing specialized fact-finding North American delegations to visit occupied territories and determine needs of Palestinian women, including options of sending professional volunteers, i.e., health care, art, agriculture. (4) Donating books, magazine subscriptions and other relevant literature to women's study centres in occupied Palestine. (5) Increasing media outreach highlighting Palestinian women's reality and concerns. (6) Calling on all United Nations agencies to provide protection for Palestinian community's survival in the occupied territories. (7) Utilizing NACC Fax Tree to alert NGOs about urgent cases of women being tortured. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

==============================================================================

Organization of the Islamic Conference.

Other organizations havina received a standing invitation to participate in the session and the work of the General Assembly as observers and maintaining permanent offices at Headquarters: Palestine. [-]

60521. DPR. Ninth United Nations North American Seminar on the Question of Palestine (Thirty-Third United Nations Seminar): Priorities. For United Nations Action: Part 11: Panel II: The United Nations and the Promotion of the Economic Development of the Occupied Palestinian territory, Including Jerusalem: Ms. Lee O'Brien. Held in New York, 6/28-29/1993. DPR, June 29, 1993. (48) Ms. Lee O'Brien, Research Officer in the West Bank for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), focused her presentation on the current situation of the Palestinians in the occupied territory, and the implications of it for development and relief activities. She pointed out that since the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, patterns of daily life has been overturned. Coming on the heels of the Gulf crisis and its impact on Palestinians, the closure had brought economic disaster by dividing the occupied territory into four isolated regions which were cut off from each other and from Israel, where tens of thousands of Palestinians had previously found jobs and markets. Local and international institutions serving the Palestinians from East Jerusalem, including UNRWA, had found themselves cut off from their clientele. During the first month of the closure the loss of income of those who used to work in Israel had reached an estimated $2.7 million a day.

(49) She continued by saying that the social and economic consequences were already evident in a dramatic decline in purchases of consumer goods, as well as for inputs for industry and agriculture, and a partial return to a barter economy. One immediate concern of UNRWA was the potential effec of a prolonged closure on health conditions, particularly of small children. Medical experts feared a rise in the incidence of growth retardation among children under three years of age. There would be more children suffering from malnutrition and there could be an increase in child deaths. In response to that concern, UNRWA had been carrying out food distribution, not only in refugee camps but also in towns and villages. However, UNRWA's donated food stocks were insufficient to meet the demand that would arise if the closure continued. She emphasized that it was difficult to believe that in the midst of a delicate peace process, UNRWA, which had evolved over the years into a general provider of quasi-governmental services such as education and health care, should once again have to plan for possible relief operations on a huge scale.

(50) Despite a significant expansion of UNRWA services over the past five years, the socio-economic conditions in the occupied territory were rapidly deteriorating, which made UNRWA's services to relieve hardship even more vital. With needs rising so fast as to risk outstripping the resources available, there was a profound sense of unease about the future. Current conditions in the occupied territory called for maintaining a balance between meeting emergency needs for income support, basic needs for education, health and social services, and the ongoing structural needs for hospital care, environmental health and job creation. UNRWA was doing its best to meet rapidly expanding emergency and basic needs while keeping sight of the importance of addressing structural needs for the socio-economic advancement of Palestinians in the occupied territory. [-]

a settlement it would be impossible to end the Arab-Israeli conflict which was the "last residue of the cold war". [=]

60526. DPR. Sixth United Nations European Seminar On The Question of Palestine (Twenty-Eighth United Nations Seminar): Part 11: Panel I: The Intifadah: The Safety and Protection of the Palestinian People In The Occupied Palestinian Territory: Mr. Mikko Lohikoski*. Held in Madrid Spain, 5/27-30/1991. DPR, May 1991. (14) Mr. Mikko Lohikoski (Finland), Chairman of the European Co-ordinating Committee for Non-Governmental Organizations on the Question of Palestine, wondered whether a peace process could be initiated in the aftermath of the Gulf War. In June 1990 though moderation was already giving way to extremism on both sides, it had been unimaginable that such a major financial transactions and access to external markets.

42. The direct relationship between the establishment of new settlements and the eviction of the Arab population posed a threat to the survival of the Palestinian people and undermined the current peace process. One of the most effective means to guarantee the protection of the Palestinian population in Gaza and the West Bank lay in the hands of the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention, particularly under article 1. 43. Mr. Raii Sourani (Palestinian), Director, Gaza Center for Rights and Law warned that international complacency at a time when the human rights situation in the occupied territories was rapidly deteriorating was a serious cause for alarm. The number of Palestinians killed or injured by the Israeli security forces had risen to unprecedented levels during the first year of the Rabin Government. He added that a large number of those killed were minors with more than thirty per cent being under ten years of age. 44. The international community should take steps that would ensure respect for the human rights of the Palestinian people. The High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention must, in accordance with their obligations under Article 1, ensure respect by Israel of its obligations under the Convention as an occupying power. He also observed that after 26 years, Israel was alone in insisting that the Fourth Geneva Convention did not apply to the territories it had occupied since 1967. 45. Israel regarded the Gaza Strip as a labour reservoir and had prevented the development of the infrastructure of the occupied territories by placing restrictions on the freedom of movement of persons and capital and on the use of land including restrictions on financial transactions and access to external markets.

46. He called for the implementation of Security Council resolution 681 (1990) of 12/20/1990 which had requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations to monitor and observe the situation of Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation and to report on the first week of 3/1/1991 and every four months thereafter. He then referred to Security Council resolution 799 (1992) of 12/18/1992 which had
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

demanded that Israel, the occupying Power, ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied territories of all those who had been deported. The resolution had also requested the dispatch of a representative of the Secretary-General to consult with the Israeli Government in regard to that serious situation and report to the Security Council.

47. Mr. Avigdor Feldman (Israel), a human rights advocate from Israel, called upon the United Nations, as the organizer of the International NGO Meeting, to take upon itself the task of assessing Israel's civil society during the period it had occupied the West Bank and Gaza. He observed that Israel had developed a fascinating dichotomy of the coexistence of a democratic regime alongside an oppressive one under the same administrative and legal authority. In a democratic civil society NGOs were expected to serve as monitors and a buffer that prevented the national deterioration of the society through oppression of others.

48. In light of the continued occupation, he had on occasion entertained doubts regarding the independence of the Israeli legal system, whether it acted as an organ of the state or of the civil society. The courts' proper role was one of shielding the citizen against oppression and arbitrariness of the government.

49. There was no written research on Israeli courts and their decisions regarding the occupied territories. Furthermore, there appeared to be no information available on the holding of Palestinian detainees without trial and whether that action was contrary to international and Israeli law.

50. The failure of Israel's legal system during the occupation was a partial expression of the general failure of its civil society. He expressed the hope that the Palestinian community, which was in the preliminary stages of formulating its own civil society in the occupied territories, would learn from the Israeli experience and create a society that would stand firm against all state oppression.

51. Mr. Mohammed Ali Taha (Israel), Secretary, Association of Arab Writers in Israel, said that the Israeli occupation forces had murdered hundreds of Palestinians since the beginning of the intifadah and thousands of children had become crippled. He reported that according to official Israeli estimates, 1,506 Palestinians had died from the beginning of the intifadah up to 7/1993. In addition, approximately 100,000 had been wounded, although a large number of wounded had never sought medical assistance for fear of being arrested or tortured. Also during that period 426 houses had been demolished and 486 persons deported.

52. Palestinian children were among those who suffered the most in the occupied territories. Nearly 232 children had lost their lives from the beginning of the intifadah until 6/1993 and 38 of them were killed during the first half of 1993. Data provided by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) showed that every fifth male child in the Gaza Strip had been wounded and the total number of children wounded was 227,577. Reports indicated that more than half of them had been wounded as a result of being beaten or shot by Israeli forces.

53. He called for the protection of the Palestinian population from attacks on life and physical safety, from disablement and from physical and psychological torture. He also called for the protection of the right of ownership and the prohibition of the confiscation of property, protection of cultural and religious institutions, protection of the natural resources and the protection and return of antiquities that had been looted.

54. Mr. Hussein Abu Hussein (Israel), an advocate, outlined the history of systematic discrimination by Israel against Arabs living within its borders. He said that the policy of discrimination against Arabs was directly related to the Jewish nature of the State of Israel, and to the way in which the Israeli Constitution had been written. Arabs did not have the right to adequate representation under Israeli law.

55. Israel was a Zionist State built on the ruins of the Palestinian people; in Israel, there were two communities, Jewish and non-Jewish. Jews had national rights, others did not.

56. He said that the international community, through the United Nations system, should undertake measures to encourage Israel to recognize its Arab community as full citizens with legal rights.

57. The upper limit of the solution of the Palestine question proposed by the Arabs was the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside the State of Israel with its 1948 borders.

58. In conclusion, he observed that Arabs in Israel were at times considered strangers, the land of their fathers and forefathers while at other times they were considered to be citizens, albeit of a lower status. He also pondered whether the position of the Arab citizens of Israel would not be better served through population exchanges between Israel and the Palestinian state, whereby the Arab citizens of Israel would be transferred to the Palestinian state and the Jewish settlers in the occupied territories would be returned to Israel.
Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People had emphasized mobilization of support for the achievement of a comprehensive, just and peaceful solution to the question of Palestine. 91. In conclusion, he recommended the adoption of an NGO Development Code of Practice (DCOP), as originally proposed by the ECCP-NENGOOT, that could include development strategies, methods, monitoring, documentation and evaluations.

92. Ms. Ruth Cohen (Israel), Member, Association of Women for Peace, said that the Israeli peace movement had been inactive and despondent. Although not in agreement with the negotiating positions in the peace process of the current Israeli coalition Government, the Peace Now movement was obliged to support the Government.

93. She referred to a new group “Gush Hashalom” (the Peace Block) within the Israeli peace movement, which believed in the creation of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel, direct negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization, withdrawal from all territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including East Jerusalem, withdrawal from South Lebanon and total equality between Jews and Arabs within Israel.

94. She concluded that in her view the Peace Now movement ought to oppose the policies of the Rabin Government as if there were no peacemongering and also be opposed to the Israeli position in the peace negotiations as if there was no Rabin Government.

95. Mr. James Graff (Canada), President, Near East Cultural and Educational Foundation of Canada, said that in 1989, almost every country in the world had voted for a United Nations-sponsored international peace conference on the Middle East. Momentum had grown throughout Europe and among United States allies to free Palestine from 22 years of Israeli colonization and oppression.

96. Since then, the momentum for Palestinian statehood had sustained several shocks, among them, the Gulf crisis and war with its disastrous consequences for Palestinians and for the Palestine Liberation Organization; the initiation of a United States orchestrated peace process biased towards United States and Israeli objectives in the Middle East, and which ignored the United Nations and relevant United Nations resolutions and principles, while also excluding Europe from any significant role; and the election of a new United States Administration which in Mr. Graff’s view was more sympathetic to the people of Israel than the preceding ones.

97. He observed that the international NGO movement was threatened with dissolution because of the financial crisis that had forced the ICCP office in Geneva to cease functioning.

98. He urged the international community to continue to press for an independent secular, democratic Palestinian state in the occupied territories with Jerusalem as its capital unless the Palestinian community, through its leadership determined otherwise.

99. Furthermore, he did not believe that it was for the NGO movement to decide whether the Palestinians should participate or not in the current peace process. A major focus on promoting government involvement in the development of economic infrastructures in the occupied territories was needed. In addition, special assistance was also required with the educational, social and psychological needs of the Palestinians in the occupied territories. Throughout this process the expertise of the various Palestinian technical committees should be fully utilized. [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

covensants and resolutions, in particular the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the relevant United Nations resolutions, and show that Israel is still pursuing its aggressive schemes and policies, despite the regional and international changes which stress the universality of human rights and their role in making those changes.

Mr. Chairman, Sisters and Brothers. Although the peace negotiations on the Middle East and the Palestinian question, which started in Madrid in 10/1991, are nearing the end of their second year, they have unfortunately reached deadlock. Hence, you are well aware, dear friends, of the importance of delivering the peace process from the critical situation into which they have driven it. The causes of that critical situation consist of the attempt by Israel and, unfortunately, the United States Administration, to alter the bases and terms of reference upon which the peace process has rested since the Madrid Conference, and until the present. There are the initiative of President Bush as well as the two letters of invitation and assurances which provide for the principle of exchanging land for peace and the application of resolutions 242 and 338, that is to say, the withdrawal by Israel from all the occupied Arab and Palestinian territories, including the holy city of Jerusalem, the guarantee of the legitimate political rights of the Palestinian people and the guarantee of security for all in the region. The tenth round, however, has reached a dead end. The American Administration has sent two delegations to the region, one headed by Mr. Dennis Ross, and the second by Mr. Christopher, the Secretary of State. We were hoping for a breakthrough which would bring the negotiation process out of that dead end. But the United States Administration has submitted to us a paper which we have refused, because of the way in which that Administration has dealt with the issues raised, such as the exclusion of Jerusalem, the non-inclusion of the issue of settlements, the disagreements over geographical jurisdiction, the treatment of the occupied Palestinian territories and the early handing over of functions in the occupied territories. All that has not facilitated the creation of a climate which would advance the peace process, especially at a time when the economic conditions in the occupied Palestinian territories have been rapidly deteriorating because of the economic blockade and isolation imposed by Israel, as well as the financial blockade imposed on the PLO and the Palestinian people. Here we are embarking upon a new round of negotiations. We have therefore suggested a proposal to break this deadlock. It consists of an effective disengagement on the Palestinian front in Eriha and Gaza, in association with the solution in the rest of the occupied Palestinian territories, including the holy city of Jerusalem. We have also called for a direct dialogue between the PLO and the Israeli Government, as well as the resumption of the dialogue between the PLO and the United States Administration. We are confident that you will continue to undertake your important actions and efforts in standing by our people in their just struggle for the establishment of a just peace through termination of the Israeli occupation, restoration to and exercise by our people of their inalienable national rights and the provision of economic support to our people in order to lift the siege and starvation imposed upon them. I thank you and wish you every success in assuming your noble and humane tasks and in your effective solidarity with our Palestinian people. [ Tunis, 8/18/1993. ]

60530. DPR. Tenth United Nations International NGO Meeting On The Question of Palestine: Part 15: Annex IV: List of Participants and Observers: Participants and Observers: Participant NGOs. Held on 8/25-27/1993, at Austria Center, Vienna, Austria. Fund For The Development Of Technological Education In The Arab Sector Of Israel; Fundacion Argentina Para El Tercer Mundo (FATEM); General Union Of Palestinian Women (GUPW); German-Palestinian Association (Deutsch-Palestaenische Gesellschaft); Greek Committee For International Democratic Solidarity; Instituto De Estudios Polocmos Para America Latina y Africa (IEPALA); International Association Of Democratic Lawyers; International Forum;

International Union Of Students;
International Youth & Student Movement For The United Nations (ISMUN); Jerusalem Press Services;
Latin American Centre Of Workers (Confederacion Latino Americana De Trabajadores); Ligue Internationale Pour Les Droits Et La Liberation Des Peuples;
Malaysia-Palestine Solidarity & Friendship Association (Persatuan Seliaikan Dan Persahabatan Malaysia-Palestine);
Medical Aid For Palestinians (MAP-UK);
Medical Aid For Palestine (MAP-Canada);
National Conference Of Black Lawyers (USA);
National Society For Mental Health;
Near East Cultural And Educational Foundation (NECEF). [=]

60531. DPR. Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 01: Introduction. Held in New York, 6/30-7/2/1993. DPR, July 2, 1993. (1) The Tenth United Nations Regional NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine was held under the auspices of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People at United Nations Headquarters, New York, from 6/30-7/2/1993, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 47/64 A of 12/11/1992. The theme of the Symposium was “Building for peace and Palestine: priorities for the second decade of the NGO movement”. (2) A total of 56 non-governmental organizations (NGOs) from Canada and the United States of America, 7 of them as observers, participated in the work of the Symposium. Nine panelists as well as 20 workshop facilitators and resource persons made presentations. The opening and closing meetings were chaired by H.E. Mr. Alcibiades J. Hidalgo Basulto (Cuba), Vice Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. The Symposium was moderated by Mr. Larry Ekin, Chairman of the North American Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine (NACC). Ms. Colleen McGuire and Ms. Nancy Murray moderated individual panels. The work of the Symposium was organized in five plenary meetings as well as workshops.

(3) At the first plenary, entitled “Building for peace and Palestine: priorities for the second decade of the NGO movements”, presentations were made by Mr. Don Betz, Chairman of the International Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine and Vice-President of University Relations at Northeastern State University, Oklahoma; Mr. Paul Findley, former member of the United States House of Representatives; and, Mr. Asmi Bishara, Professor of Philosophy at Bir Zeit University. (4) At the second plenary, entitled “Rights, resources, refugees: the need for protection”, presentations were made by Mr. Jonathan Kuttab, a human rights lawyer and Director of the Mandela Institute for Political Prisoners in the West Bank, and Mr. Muhammad Hallaj, Director of the Centre for Policy Analysis on Palestine and a member of the Palestinian National Council.

(5) At the third plenary, entitled “Ending the occupation: a prelude to peace and security”, presentations were made by Ms. Roni Ben Efrat, an Israeli peace activist, a founding member of “Women in Black” and also a member of the editorial staff of Etgar/Challenge magazine; Mr. Muhammad Hallaj; and, Mr. Atif Kubursi, Professor of Economics at McMaster University, Canada, and advisor on refugee issues to the Minister of External Affairs of Canada. (6) The fourth plenary heard reports and recommendations from the five workshops of the Symposium and the seven standing committees established by NACC to strengthen NGO coordination and cooperation (see annexes II and III). (7) The fifth plenary entitled “NGO priorities for the second decade”, heard statements from: Mr. Don Betz; Ms. Mia Adjali, Director of the United Methodist Office for the United Nations; and Mr. Jim Graff, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Toronto, Vice Chairman of NACC. [=}
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

60532. DPR. Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 10: Plenary Discussion: Plenary II: Rights, Resources, Refugees: The Need For Protection: Mr. Muhammad Hallaj. Held in New York, 6/30-7/2/1993. DPR, July 2, 1993. (34) Mr. Muhammad Hallaj said that since the beginning of the Madrid peace process, the plight of Palestine refugees had been relegated to the exclusive context of multilateral talks which address regional issues and regional cooperation. To place the refugee issue in such a multilateral context suggests, to Mr. Hallaj, that it might well be proposed at some time that Palestinians be settled outside their own homeland. (35) He said that during the second round of talks, the Israeli delegation had urged that the issue of family unification be deleted from the agenda. The Israeli delegation had not attended the first round when the item had indeed been included and remarked later that had they been there, they would not have allowed its inclusion. (36) In his view, the particular allocation of the refugee subject for discussion during the peace process makes its clear that Israel had not yet reconciled itself to the fact that the refugee question is central to the negotiation process in that while this is a national political question, it has nevertheless a tragic humanitarian component. (37) The Palestinian refugees should not be thought of as people living in camps on the outskirts of towns but instead should be viewed as fragments of a shattered nation. Unfortunately, the tendency to consider their plight as a humanitarian rather than a political issue still persists. (38) Regarding related activities of NGOs, he stressed the importance of public education. He suggested that in the United States, the process of informing the public about the Palestinians might not be as formidable as it appeared. A recent opinion poll had indicated American support for the Palestinians’ right of return to their homeland. [=]

60533. DPR. Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 25; Annex II: Workshop Reports: Workshop 4: Seeds of a New Society: The Welfare of Women and Children Under Occupation. Held in New York, 6/30-7/2/1993. DPR, July 2, 1993. Goals: (1) To reach out to women’s groups, i.e. denominational women, human rights (women and children), the League of Women’s Voters, to educate and to raise consciousness. (2) To maintain communication between women's groups in a minimal way. (3) Identify other women's groups not specifically interested in Palestinian issues. (4) Appeal to other women’s groups when Palestinian women are the target. Strategy for action: Assist in giving notice of groups coming from Palestine to itinerate North America many NGO groups would keep sponsor events. (5) Participate in the Women’s Directory. (6) Develop a fax tree for this Standing Committee. [=]

60534. DPR. Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 32; Annex III: Reports of Standing Committees: (v) Mobilizing Women’s Organizations. Held in New York, 6/30-7/2/1993. DPR, July 2, 1993. The objective of this committee is to act as a line with NGOs in North America for the purposes of: (a) Outreach: coordinating and facilitating programmes, special projects and other activities in relation to women’s concerns and issues; (b) Developing educational materials for a future database on Palestinian women and for a resource centre; (c) Monitoring the media regarding negative stereotyped images of Palestinian women; (d) Linkage between Palestinian women inside and outside of Palestine through coordinated action-oriented programmes and delegations; (e) Overseeing the social, cultural and economic needs of Palestinian women, via specific project coordination. [=]

60536. DPR. Tenth United Nations North American Regional NGO Symposium On The Question of Palestine: Part 37; Annex VI: List of Participants and Observers: Participant NGOs: Part 2. Held in New York, 6/30-7/2/1993. DPR, July 2, 1993. Methodist Federation for Social Action; Middle East Fellowship of Southern California; Middle East Justice Network; National Association of Arab-Americans; National Committee for Independent Political Action; National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA - Middle East Office; National Lawyers Guild (Middle East Committee); NECEF (Near East Cultural & Educational Foundation of Canada); Palestine Aid Society; Palestine Human Rights Information Center - International; Palestine Solidarity Committee; Palestinian Federation of Women’s Action Committees; Palestinian Mother & Child Care Society; Partners for Peace; Pax Christi (International); Presbyterian Church-USA; Save the Children Federation; Union of Palestinian American Women; Union of Palestinian Women’s Associations in North America; United Nations Association-USA; Women's International League for Peace & Freedom; World Muslim Congress; World Organization of Jews from Islamic Countries; World Peace Council. [=]
peace activist; a founding member of "Women in Black" and a member of the editorial staff of Etgar/Challaneh magazine; Mr. Don Betz, Chairman of the International Coordinating Committee for NGOs on the Question of Palestine and Vice-President of University Relations at Northeastern State University, Oklahoma; Mr. Asmi Bishara, Professor of Philosophy at Bir Zeit University; Mr. Paul Findley, former member of the United States House of Representatives; Mr. Jim Graff, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Toronto and Vice-Chairman of NACC; Mr. Muhammad Hallaj, Director of the Centre for Policy Analysis on Palestine and a member of the Palestine National Council; Mr. Jonathan Kuttab, human rights lawyer and Director of the Mandela Institute for Political Prisoners in the West Bank; Mr. Atif Kubursi, Professor of Economics at McMaster University, Canada, and advisor on refugee issues to the Minister of External Affairs, Canada. [\=]

60538. DPR; UN. United Nations African Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Dakar Senegal, 8/30/1993-9/3/1993: Part 11: Panel I: Towards A Just Solution Of The Question Of Palestine: (A) The Current Situation In The Occupied Palestinian Territory, Including Jerusalem: Dr. Ahmad Yaziji. DPR, November 1993. 18. Dr. Ahmad Yaziji (Palestinian), a medical doctor in Gaza, recalled at the outset that the population density in the Gaza Strip was among the highest in the world, amounting to more than 1800 persons per square kilometre. He emphasized that the demographic explosion had led to a severe deterioration in public health and countless health problems. As a result, clinics received more than 8000 patients per day, for whom proper services could not be provided owing to overcrowding and the lack of diagnostic facilities and medicines. He cited the negligence and indifference of the Israeli authorities to public health in the territories, in addition to the acute shortage of water in many parts of the Strip. The level of salinity and organic matter in the water supply of the Gaza Strip was increasing. Studies had shown that there would be no suitable drinkable water in five years. Outside of refugee camps, sewers leaked into the streets, giving residential areas the appearance of sewerage swamps and posing threats of typhoid and intestinal problems. Waste was left to accumulate in residential areas, around houses and in public squares where it caused countless health problems. Severe environmental pollution was caused by many primitive industries which had been banned in Israel as well as by antiquated vehicles and by the lack of trees. As a consequence the residents of the Gaza Strip were suffering from such problems as high blood pressure and diabetes, as well as from contagious diseases. Diseases caused by parasites were widespread and some 80 per cent of the children were afflicted by worms. Gum and tooth disease was widespread among children. The incidence of asthma was increasing both quantitatively and qualitatively, owing to the frequent exposure to tear gas. Various degrees of malnutrition were also widespread, affecting about 50% of children under five years of age. He pointed out that hospital facilities were insufficient. For example, in the Gaza Strip, there was one hospital bed for every 2000 persons, one doctor for every 1000 persons and one nurse for every 7000 persons. The health insurance scheme was costly and the population lacked the means for enrolment. Hospital equipment and buildings were poorly maintained. Most clinics had only a limited number of rooms, and those were poorly equipped. There was no school medicine except for some basic vaccinations at the beginning of each year. There were no programmes for the elderly or the chronically ill. There were no public mental health programmes. He went on to say that the Israeli military practices had become more violent and deadly during the intifadah. It was estimated that 70% of the persons injured by the army in the Gaza Strip were shot, in violation of international standards, by live ammunition, the kind that exploded in the body. The use of gas grenade and tear-gas against women and children had left babies dead, children blind and had caused miscarriages. In addition, the conditions in the detention camps had left thousands of Palestinians with deterioration of physical and psychological problems. He said that the only solution to the health hardship was the end of the occupation and the transfer of authority to the Palestinian people in a Palestinian State. [\=]

60539. DPR; UN. United Nations African Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Dakar Senegal, 8/30/1993-9/3/1993: Part 13: Panel I: Towards A Just Solution Of The Question Of Palestine: (A) The Current Situation In The Occupied Palestinian Territory, Including Jerusalem: Eitan Felner. DPR, November 1993. 19. Mr. Eitan Felner (Israel), researcher for B’Tselem (the Israeli Information Centre for Human Rights in the occupied territories), said that the preceding year had seen some improvements in the human rights situation in the occupied territories. House demolitions had ceased, procedures for family reunifications had been eased and prison conditions had been partially improved. In other areas, however, the human rights situation had drastically deteriorated. The deportation of 415 Palestinians in 12/1992 without trial or conviction was an example of collective punishment that was prohibited under international law. The closure of the West Bank and Gaza had resulted in many human rights violations. More than 115000 Palestinian workers had no means of supporting their families. Whole areas were effectively isolated from each other. House demolitions in search of wanted persons were another form of collective punishment. He deplored the steep increase in the killing of Palestinian children and held the security forces responsible for it, in particular, their deliberate policy of opening fire in circumstances in which soldiers were not in life-threatening situations. He said that those disturbing statistics prompted B’Tselem to launch its first public campaign to raise awareness and action on the issue, using new strategies to break through the indifference of the Israeli public. He pointed out that the Israeli public had become inured and unresponsive to the deaths of Palestinian children and had developed fixed modes of justification and rationalization to distance themselves from addressing this issue. The campaign's immediate goal - to bring the issue to the forefront of public debate - had been achieved beyond expectations. There was a Knesset debate, television and radio programmes, broad newspaper coverage. The ultimate goal, however, had not been achieved, to enact changes in policy and bring an end to the killing of children. In conclusion he said that an eventual solution should be based on the recognition of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of every individual, Israeli and Palestinian alike. [\=]

60540. DPR; UN. United Nations African Seminar and NGO Symposium on the Question of Palestine, Dakar Senegal, 8/30/1993-9/3/1993: Part 23: Panel III: Towards Self-Determination And Statehood: (A) Palestine - Dynamics Of State-Building; Latif Dor. DPR, November 1993. 29. Mr. Latif Dor (Israel), Secretary of the Committee for Israeli-Palestinian Dialogue, emphasized that the basic component for a State-building mechanism was a national and popular consensus on the main objective, the establishment of an independent Palestinian State. That consensus was proved by the outbreak of the intifadah. Its persistence to the present showed that despite the enormous economic burden that the Palestinian people did not consent to the exchange of their legitimate national rights for improved living conditions and that they were prepared to bear further sufferings in order to achieve those rights. The intifadah had helped strengthen the mechanism for the building of the State. It had rebuilt the Palestinian society through social and political organization and by the building of social and economic institutions, by the formation of the national leadership and by its universal character. During the intifadah the Palestinian people manifested material sacrifice and cooperation, the revival of the household economy, self-reliance, assistance to families in distress, compliance with the instructions of the national leadership, an increased number of benevolent societies, the reclamation of land following the return of a large number of workers from their jobs inside Israel, a reduction in crime, the inoculation of a spirit of solidarity and social cohesion, and an enhancement of the status of women. Women had participated effectively in all fields and had laid firm foundations for the Palestinian State. He pointed out that another basic component of the mechanism for the building of a State was the human capacities of the Palestinian people. It had highly qualified personnel in all fields and specializations, such as planning, medicine, industry, education, etc., which in time of peace could compete with Israel in economic and social development and could reach a peak of productive innovation. He also stressed that the mechanism for building a State required the organization of international sympathy and support, mobilizing international public opinion. He concluded by elaborating on the positions and activities of the peace movement in Israel. His objective was to acquire the support of the Israeli society and to work for two States for two peoples, i.e. an independent State of Palestine alongside the State of Israel. [=]

163

60544. DS. "Israel and the Occupied Territories: Respect for Human Rights: Section 3: Respect for Political Rights: The Rights of Citizens to Change Their Government", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO. February 1995. Citizens have the right and ability to change their government peacefully, Israel is a parliamentary democracy, with an active multiparty system representing a wide range of political views. Relatively small parties, including those whose primary support is among Israeli Arabs, regularly win seats in the Knesset, or Parliament. Suffrage is universal for adult citizens. Elections are by secret ballot. There are no legal impediments to the participation of women and minorities in government, but they are underrepresented. Eleven women, and 6 Arab and 2 Druze citizens serve in the 120-seat Knesset. Two women are in Cabinet, and 2 Israeli Arabs are deputy ministers. [=]

60546. DS. "Israel and the Occupied Territories: Respect for Human Rights: Section 5: Discrimination Based on Race, Sex, Religion, Disability, Language or Social Status: Children", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO. February 1995. The Government has a strong commitment to the rights and welfare of children. While there is no pattern of societal abuse against children, the Government has legislated against sexual, physical, and psychological abuse of children and has mandated comprehensive reporting requirements to ensure close attention to the issue. Child prostitution has been reported in isolated cases and has been promptly dealt with by appropriate authorities. The police, educational, and social welfare officials are responsible for monitoring cases of abuse and administering victim treatment programs. Civil rights groups have expressed concern that female genital mutilation continue to be practiced among the Bedouin in the Negev region. It is not known if the practice is common. [=] women's advocacy groups report that women routinely receive lower wages, are promoted less often, and have fewer career opportunities than their male counterparts. The adjudication of personal status law by religious courts means that women are subject to restrictive interpretations of their rights regarding marriage and divorce (see Section 2.c.). Women are subject to the military draft but may not serve in combat positions. There was heightened concern in 1994 over violence against women. Women's advocacy groups estimate that as many as 40 Druze or Bedouin women may be killed each year by male relatives for 'family honor' offenses. A survey conducted by one women's group indicated that some 200000 women suffer from domestic violence each year, and that 7% of these are battered on a regular basis. A special session of the Knesset was held on 8/31 to discuss violence against women. The Government condemns such violence and has helped to open 6 shelters for battered women and has plans to open several others. According to a 1991 law, a district or magistrate court may prohibit access by violent family members to their property. Women's groups cooperate with legal and social service institutions to provide reports of 2266 cases of rape. [-]

60547. DS. "Israel and the Occupied Territories: Respect for Human Rights: Section 6: Worker Rights: (a) The Right of Association", in Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1994. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, and the Committee on International Relations, United States House of Representatives, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 520B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. Joint Committee Print. District of Columbia: GPO, February 1995. Workers may join and establish labor organizations freely. Israeli Arabs may establish their own unions but have not done so. Most unions belong to the General Federation of Labor in Israel, or Histadrut, or to a much smaller rival federation. These organizations are independent of the Government. About 70% of the work force are members of Histadrut's trade unions; still more are covered by Histadrut's social and insurance programs and collective bargaining agreements. Histadrut members democratically elect national and local officers and officials of its affiliated women's organization, Na'amot, from political party lists. Plant or enterprise committee members are elected individually. The right to strike is exercised regularly. Unions must provide 15-days' notice prior to a strike unless otherwise specified in the collective bargaining agreement. However, unauthorized strikes occur. Strike leaders even those organizing illegal strikes -- are protected by law. If essential public services are affected, the Government may appeal to labor courts to order back-to-work orders while the parties continue negotiations. Strikes in 1994 were concentrated in the public sector, and included a 12-strike by the Academics' Union that forced the closure of 3 universities, and 4 days of work stoppages by employees protesting privatization of the national telephone company. Significant work stoppages also took place in the defense industry. Unions are free to affiliate with international organizations. Following the signing of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement in May, representatives from Histadrut and Palestinian trade unions formalized their ongoing dialog. Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip who work in Israel may not join Israeli trade unions or organize their own unions in Israel. Palestinian trade unions in the occupied territories are not permitted to conduct activities in Israel (see Section 6.a. of the annex). However, nonresident workers in the organized sector are entitled to the protection of Histadrut work contracts and grievance procedures. They may join, vote for, and be elected to shop-level workers' committees if their numbers in individual establishments exceed a minimum threshold. Palestinian participation in such committees is minimal. Labor laws apply to Palestinians in East Jerusalem and to the Syrian Druze living on the Golan Heights. [-]

60548. DS. "Near East and North Africa: Israel and the Occupied Territories: Part 04: Respect for Human Rights: Section 1: Respect For The Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from: (c) Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment", in Country Reports On Human Rights Practices For 1993. Report Submitted To The Committee on Foreign Affairs, US House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, By the Department of State, In Accordance With Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) Of The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, As Amended. February 1994. Although Israeli laws and administrative regulations prohibit such practices, there are credible reports of abuses of Palestinian detainees. (see the occupied territories report for a discussion of mistreatment of prisoners from the occupied territories incarcerated in detention facilities located in Israel.) Incarceration facilities in Israel and the occupied territories are operated by one of three authorities, the Israeli Prison Service (IPS), the national police, and the Israel Defense Forces. Although the conditions vary greatly among the facilities, all are monitored by various branches of the Israeli Government and members of the Knesset, the International Committee of the Red Cross, and many human rights organizations which have access to the prisons, police jails, and IDF camps. Generally, inmates are not subject to physical abuse by guards, food is adequate, and prisoners receive basic necessities. Security prisoners are subject to a different regime, even in IPS facilities, and as a class they are often denied certain privileges given to prisoners convicted on criminal charges. In general however, the most severe problem in all facilities is overcrowding, even among facilities run by the IPS. IPS prisons conform to general international standards which permit inmates to receive mail, have televisions in their cells, and receive regular visits. Prisoners can receive wages for prison work and benefits for good behavior. Many IPS prisons have religious and drug-free wards and educational and recreational programs. Police detention facilities are intended for short stays prior to trial, but due to chronic overcrowding and slow scheduling for court dates, police detention facilities can become de facto jails for several months. Inmates in these centers frequently are not accorded the same rights and living conditions as prisoners in the regular IPS facilities, and some of these can fall below generally accepted minimum international standards. For example, the Abu Kabir police detention facility in Jaffa has approximately 662 inmates for 466 beds. Prisoners awaiting transfer can be confined for months under these conditions. One US citizen has been confined in a cell with 11 prisoners and 8 beds. He was unable to bathe for over a week. Violence is common in the Abu Kabir facility with weapons made by prisoners from such items as bed legs spoons, and pens. There were also reports of mixing juveniles with adults as well as pretrial offenders with convicted prisoners. Prison conditions in the IDF detention camps, which are limited to male Palestinian security prisoners and are guarded by armed soldiers, do not meet minimum international standards and threaten the health of the inmates. The camps use unheated outdoor tents even in severe weather conditions, mix minors and adult prisoners, restrict family visits, and contain minimal recreational facilities. Poor health care in Ketziot prison has resulted in a petition, filed before the High Court in September by a human rights organization composed of medical professionals, to close the camp unless medical conditions are improved. According to the Government, the petition concerning Ketziot, due to be heard at the end of the year, was postponed to 3/1994. [-]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

a manner disadvantageous to the Palestinians and, to a lesser extent, Kurds. Under Lebanese citizenship law, only Lebanese males may transmit citizenship to their spouses and children. Lebanon refused to admit 419 Palestinians deported by Israel on December 17, 1992. The deportees remained in an ineffective no-man’s land between Israeli and Lebanese controlled territory inside southern Lebanon. The Government turned a blind eye to the supply of relief material to the deportees, despite a ban on such activity. By the end of 1993, all of the deportees had returned to the Israeli-occupied territories except for about 15 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. [–]

60554. Daraghmeh, Muhammad. “Nablus Decries Violence”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times. April 14, 1995. p. 2. A 20000-person spontaneous demonstration emerged from the funeral of Ghassan Fursan Aghbar on 4/6/1995. Aghbar, 19, is the sixth Palestinian to die in the Nablus region in the past two months because of personal and tribal confrontations. The demonstration erupted in protest against the rise of violence in the region. Aghbar’s death was the result of jealousy. His cousin had been seen talking to a young woman at An-Najah University several times. Unfortunately, she had a secret admirer, who then warned Aghbar’s cousin to stop speaking to the woman. When Aghbar’s cousin refused to be ordered about, the admirer decided to teach him a lesson, gathered a gang of youths from the Sahali and Olawi families, and went to a shop where they expected to find the cousin. Instead, they found Aghbar. When Aghbar discovered the reason for their visit, a quarrel broke out and Aghbar was stabbed to death. His funeral was held two days later under cover of a mourning strike organized by the Islamic and nationalist factions. The funeral then developed into a full-scale demonstration as participants expressed their frustration with the growing violence in their area and wanted to put a stop to it. As further manifestation of community desire, a delegation of 50 local notables, led by the Islamic-Nationalist Faction Coordinator for Nablus Hussam Hajowi, traveled to Jericho just prior to the funeral to meet with the head of Preventative Security in the West Bank Jibril Rajoub. They discussed the deteriorating situation in Nablus and called on Rajoub to ensure that the perpetrators be punished. Rajoub promised the citizens his full support, saying his men would locate and prosecute the killers. Community leaders are organizing a similar delegation to President Yasser Arafat in the coming weeks. [–]

60555. Dash, Joan. Summoned to Jerusalem: The Life of Henrietta Szold: Part 1 of 2. Jewish Publication Society of America. New York: Harper & Row, 1979. [The author acknowledges the research assistance of the Central Zionist Archives, Jerusalem, Henrietta Szold Archives, Hadassah-Palestine, Zionist Archives & Library, Jewish Collection of the New York Public Library, the University of Washington, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and Hadassah.] Henrietta Szold grew up in the household of her father Rabbi Szold: while he was once anti-Zionist, believing that America could be the land where Jews could be free, the discussions he had with the Russian Jewish emigrants of the 1880s convinced him, and young Henrietta, that America had no meaning for the Jews and that Zionism was their destiny. In autumn of 1893, she, with her father and Harry Friedenwald, became members of the Zionist Association of Baltimore, one of the earliest Zionist groups in the United States answering the call of Theodor Herzl (who had embraced Zionism with the promise of all Jews to Christianity); in return for an end to anti-Semitism, leaving Herzl and his organizers the last Jews on Earth (p. 31)). Henrietta worked for a while at the Jewish Publication Society became a federal judge believed that the only real purpose of his role as a judge was to advance Zionism; he would organize a trust that would turn a blind eye to the supply of relief material to the deportees, despite a ban on such activity. By the end of 1993, all of the deportees had returned to the Israeli-occupied territories except for about 15 deportees who reportedly elected to remain outside the occupied territories to avoid imprisonment. [–]

60556. Rajoub promised the citizens his full support, saying his men would locate and prosecute the killers. Community leaders are organizing a similar delegation to President Yasser Arafat in the coming weeks. [–]

Still obsessed with Ginzburg and his “childish” breeder wife, Henrietta became the secretary of FAZ; she began to work in the tiny offices that housed FAZ, the Jewish National Fund and the Yiddish newspaper Dos Yiddishe Folk; at the same time she indexed the first ten volumes of the publications of the American Jewish Historical Society. When Mrs. Ginzburg had a child, Szold was hospitalized in Maryland, and required six months of convalescence. In 1911, the network of tiny women’s Zionist groups (Hadassah Study Circles, Daughters of Zion) had dwindled: Henrietta was determined to build a new national Zionist women’s group, with Hadassah as the nucleus (the first chapter would be called Daughters of Zion, Hadassah Chapter); she became chairman [sic] and carried forward the old Hadassah treasury of $19.16. Henrietta decided that the mission of Hadassah would be to bring modern health services to the Jews of Palestine. The hiring of the first two Jewish nurses for Palestine was coupled with the organization of chapters in Baltimore, Cincinnati, Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia (1912-1913). The outbreak of WWI would end the nursing project. In 1915, Henrietta got the unexpected support of Julian Mack; the first American Jew to become a federal judge believed that the only real purpose of his role as a judge was to advance Zionism; he would organize a trust that would allow her to devote her work to Zionism fulltime for the rest of her life. The organization of the American Zionist Medical Unit (AZMU) in 1916 required heroic fundraising efforts (with estimated costs of the project rising from $3000, to $30000, to $450000 in 1918) but its deployment was postponed until the British and their Arab allies liberated Palestine. In 1918, the announcement of the Balfour Declaration swelled the FAZ to 120000 dues-paying members; it was reorganized in that same year as the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA). In Palestine, chafing under the direction of the Zionist Commission, the AZMU organized health services. In 1920, Henrietta moved to Palestine.

Enroute to Palestine, she was electrified by reports that a pogrom was “killing all the Jews” in Jerusalem. Had begun: the Holocaust would claim six Jews [note: six Palestinians also died but are omitted in this report]. In 1920, the Yishuv numbered 64000, or 10% of the population. The uncertain management of the expansion of the Yishuv was in the hands of Jewish Agency. Because of oil, the British in Palestine were anti-semitic: “It was oil. Only oil.” (pp. 144-145) [sic?]. Henrietta always dismisses the concerns of the Palestinians, who feared the destruction of their community by the Jews, by observing, “people do not always want to have good done to them by others”. (p. 147) [sic?] In 1920, Sir Herbert Samuel, a fanatical Zionist, became the British High Commissioner of Palestine: he dedicated himself to creating a Jewish Palestine and he was indifferent to the Palestinians. In what is described as his “determination to do justice to both sides”, he supported unlimited immigration for Jews into Palestine and established Hebrew as an official language; he freed from prison all Jews who had organized anti-Arab riots, including Vladimir Jabotinsky (pp. 156-157); so even handed was he that his galas at Government House were essentially Zionist gatherings. Meanwhile, the loss of a sense of urgency had seen ZOA membership in 1919 fall to 25000, and funds for the expansion of the Yishuv had diminished. In 1921, Wizo came of age: it had told the Muslims and Christians of Palestine that Palestine was no longer theirs and rejected the legitimacy of their communities in Palestine: he would follow that up with a statement that the Jews, and only the Jews, had the right to be in Palestine; at the same time, Jewish terrorist networks were building arms stockpiles and started training. Only riots by Palestinians led Herbert to slow the rate of Jewish immigration (actually only requiring that Jewish immigrants not be impoverished). In 4/1921 Chaim Weizmann came to New York, the “Jewish city”, accompanied by the Zionist Albert Einstein, to establish the $100 million Palestine Foundation Fund, Keren Hayesod, to expand. The Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) under Louis Lipsky turned on Hadassah and tried to destroy while keeping its membership of 10000 within ZOA (ZOA had 30000 members including those of Hadassah): he was forced to compromise, which allowed AZMU to remain autonomous of the Zionist Commission. Henrietta returned to the United States in 1923-1926; she helped rebuild Hadassah and raise its membership to 20000; and in 1925 selected the new director of AZMU, now renamed the Hadassah Medical Organization (HMO). When she returned to Palestine, the Jews were 121000 in a population of 800000 (about 15%); the Yishuv had mainly grown through emigration from Poland. By 1927, the Great Depression gripped Palestine: Jewish unemployment was 8000 (that is, negligible), every Zionist organization was deeply in debt, and while few Jewish immigrants were entering Palestine, many Jews were emigrating. She won two portfolios in the Zionist Commission: Health and Education. She immediately turned to reform the school system, which was poorly developed and divided into three mutually hostile ideological camps: Mizrachi, General Zionist and Labor Zionists (Poale Zion); ultimately the International Zionist Executive in Berlin would reject all her educational reforms and even today there are two educational systems in Israel. After the 1926 ZOA convention, its membership declined to 18000 in 1929; at the same time, Hadassah membership grew to 27000 in 1932.

The 1929 Zionist Congress was attended by Henrietta, as well as by Albert Einstein, Leon Blum, Louis Marshall, Felix Warburg, Sir Herbert Samuel and Lord Melchett. In the same year, Palestinians believing that it was the goal of the Jews to conquer Palestine and establish a Jewish state, staged riots that left 133 Jews dead, and 116 Palestinians dead: forever remembered as the worst pogrom against the Jews in the history of Palestine. A British White Paper saw the root of the problem as the unlimited Jewish emigration into Palestine and the unlimited purchase of land by Jews: seen as blood libel, the report led Weizmann to resign as chairman of the World Zionist Organization (WZO). Henrietta responded by becoming a willing conspirator in the development of armed Jewish terrorist groups. In 1931, Henrietta returned to Palestine, after being elected to the Vaad Leumi, the National Assembly of the Jews of Palestine. She continued her work by systematically working the charities of the entire world to win assistance for the pitiful Jews of Palestine, and reaped new revenues from the Palestine Endowment Fund, established by Justice Brandeis and Judge Mack to advance the Jewish conquest of Palestine. [TXT] remain in Germany; they would be resettled as platoons of 50 on kibbutzim and would work from their first day in Palestine; after two years, they would be allowed to create their own Jews-only settlements. (pp. 240-241, 244) When Henrietta return to Palestine, the Jewish Agency had created the German Bureau; subordinate to it was the Youth Aliya Bureau: she was offered the director of the bureau but she rejected it, still doubting the wisdom of the program. Her first request for 500 certificates was completed with 350, and the young German-Jewish youth came to Palestine through the Youth Aliya, British officials in Palestine allowed Polish Jews to pour into the country without being counted. In 1935, the scale of the Youth Aliya demanded its own offices. In the same year she went to the Zionist Congress in Switzerland, and was offered $100000 over the next two years by Hadassah for the Youth Aliya. After she gave her speech on the Youth Aliya, a speech in which she stated the political purposes: she was right, the whole announcement was to be a form of "emotional blackmail against the rigidity of Great Britain". However, she did make the announcement. The scheme, called the Childrens Aliya, crumbled: granted only 500 certificates for immigration of children who had blood relatives in Palestine, almost half had already fled Germany when transport could be arranged; after some years of fruitless decline, the Childrens Aliya was absorbed into the Youth Aliya. (pp. 273-274) Henrietta refused pleas from Polish Jews to allow them to use some of the certificates she had in hand to evacuate their children, believing German-Jews to be far more important for the Yishuv. Similarly, an incident with Rumanian-Jews (many were overage and had entered with forged passports) led her to end any efforts to transport Rumanian-Jewish children to Palestine. (p. 275) At the same time, far more Jewish children were being brought into Palestine illegally that the Youth Aliya was handling (although once in Palestine the Youth Aliya often absorbed the illegals into its infrastructure); Greeks vessels brought 2400 illegal Austrian-Jewish and Czech-Jewish children in 12/1938 alone. In 1935, the Gestapo assisted the Youth Aliya by supplying exit permits and visas "both invalid"? [7] to Jews who traveled in very large numbers to Palestine in the inadequate ships of the German Danube Steamship Line. (p. 276) But events were moving very quickly now: Hechalutz preparation camps continued to operate in Germany and Austria, but more were opened in Holland, Denmark, Sweden and England. Especially serious was the decision of the British to limit Jewish immigration to Palestine to 75000 in the next five years to prevent the Jewish subjugation of the Palestinians: the author comments, rather illogically, that the Jews were sacrificed for "Arab oil."

The start of the war saw the work of the Youth Aliya shift again: a transport of 31 Zionist youth were moved into Holland, and then to the North Wales Gwyrch Castle of Lord Dundonald, a support of the Orthodox Youth Aliya; a transport of 400 were stranded in Trieste but places were found for them in Yugoslavia; Zionist youth in Prague were moved to Denmark; Zionist youth in Berlin were shipped to Norway and Sweden. Even after the start of the war, Nazi officials allowed the next transport of 347 Zionist youth to Denmark. Nazi authorities informed the Youth Aliya that they would allow all Jewish children in Nazi Germany (and Austria) to go to Palestine, and the British offered her 1000 more certificates that she requested. Moving through closed borders and nations preparing for war, all those for whom there were certificates in the summer of 1939 were moved to Palestine [sic: no number is given]. (pp. 280-281) In 1940-1941 the text seems to indicate that 700 more Zionist youth left Germany for Palestine. (p. 282) The course of the war caused more disruptions: a company of 200 Zionist Polish-Jewish youth, expelled from Germany into the wasteland between the borders had somehow ended up in Lithuania, walking behind the advance of the German army: although there were immigration certificates for them, there was no clear route to Palestine. In 11/1940, the Turkish government granted 733 transit visas for platoons of Zionist youth organized in groups of 50: the first came from Denmark (via Sweden, Finland, USSR which had granted unlimited travel rights for Zionist youth on route to Palestine), Turkey and Syria; later groups came from Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Lithuania.

In Spring 1941, the Youth Aliya flows from Germany dwindled to small groups coming through Turkey. Henrietta reoriented the introduction she had built to re-educating Oriental Jewish (e.g., Moroccan, Georgian, Yemeni) children. In 1941 Vaad Leumi accepted her plan to used funds from Hadassah (eventually $70000) to improve the quality of life of Jewish children in Palestine. In fall 1942, some 14000 Polish Jews, among the one million Polish Jews deported to Siberian concentration camps by Stalin, straggled into Iran, and made their way to Tehran; Henrietta immediately tried to set up the transport of 600-800 Polish Jewish children in Tehran to Palestine. In 12/1942, the first 700 Polish-Jews in Tehran were moved via Karachi to Palestine on a British troopship. She died in 1943: she never married and had no children.

60557. David, Victoria. "Mothers in Chains: Part 1", in Challenge, March-April, 1992. p. 32. Victoria David, an Israeli of Yugoslavian origin, was sentenced to three years imprisonment in January, 1990, on security charges. Because she is Jewish, prison authorities insisted on holding her with criminal prisoners in Neve Tirza prison rather than with women political prisoners in Hasharon Prison. David was granted parole and was released on January 6, 1992. In Neve Tirza, she met Itisar Al-Qaq.

When I remember Intisar, I remember a beautiful, smiling, serene young woman. I only came to see her as a tragic heroine after I learned of all she had suffered since her arrest on November 11, 1989. She had been found in the Old City with a molotov cocktail in her bag, and was sentenced to three years in prison.

I met Intisar in August, 1991, when she was transferred to the Neve Tirza Prison for Women Criminal Prisoners where I had already been confined for a year and a half. The two of them Intisar and her small daughter Wattan ("homeland" in Arabic), entered my life like two rays of sunshine. In their congenial presence, I suddenly felt I had a new lease on life.

Everything I learned about Intisar's past, I learned from her stories. Intisar Al-Qaq, age 22, was a student of social work from Silwan (East Jerusalem). At the time of her arrest, she was in her early months of pregnancy. She was held in solitary confinement in the Russian Compound Detention Center, with her hands and feet manacled. Even when examined by a gynecologist, she remained cuffed hand and foot. She was transferred to the Sharon Prison, and was denied examination by a gynecologist for five months. She was also denied access to an eye specialist. She later suffered permanent hearing-loss from this medical neglect.

On June 3, 1990, experiencing strong contractions, she was taken from prison to the hospital with her legs and hands manacled. There, she was literally chained to the bed frame. Her leg shackles were only removed when she was placed on the delivery table. Later, one hand was freed to permit an intravenous infusion, and the other hand remained shackled to the table throughout the delivery. Immediately after the birth, her legs were chained again, this time to the bed. She remained shackled in this manner for the entire three days of her stay in the hospital. Once, when she needed to go to the bathroom, it was discovered that the guard had taken the key home with him. So Intisar had to wait three hours until the key was returned.

Back in prison, both Intisar and her daughter Wattan faced harsh conditions. Their diet was very poor: they lacked sufficient protein, fresh vegetables, and fruits. The prison did not provide such basic needs as diapers, milk, and baby food. The baby was allowed to have only a few toys and was locked in the cell for long hours. In prison, Wattan was beenphotographed only once, by a prison guard. The family was prohibited from taking her picture. During their bi-monthly visits, Intisar's family was not allowed to kiss or hug Wattan, and could only watch the sun set behind the walls of Jerusalem.

Intisar made an effort to locate me immediately after she arrived. When I saw her loving face, I felt that we were old friends. She was very affectionate and kind to me. After a year and a half, deprived of any friendly human communication with inmates, I was pleased to be with her. But at the same time, I was very sorry that she and her daughter were forced to share my agony: being confined with criminal prisoners and drug addicts and dealers. These prisoners harassed and cursed Intisar, calling her a murderess and terrorist-the same way they had been harassing me. Eventually, some of the other prisoners also behaved nicely toward Intisar. But when a Jewish inmate tried to carry Wattan in her arms, the other Jewish women prisoners warned her to keep away from the murderess' daughter. Wattan, who had been used to being showered with love and affection by everyone in the Sharon Prison, was now miserable and bewildered by the atmosphere of hate.

One of the few advantages of Neve Tirza was that visitors could be seen, spoken to, and touched directly without the mesh-wire that existed in the Sharon. However, starting October 25, this omission was rectified; during our visiting hours, a mesh-wire was set up for both of us.

After serving two thirds of her sentence, Intisar requested reduction of her sentence by one third. Because a baby cannot be held in prison after the age of two, a parole would spare the separation of mother and child. The request was rejected on October 11, yet the reasons for the refusal were classified. Her lawyer appealed. The appeal was rejected again, at the second hearing on November 21. Intisar was told that she would soon be taken to the hospital for surgery on her ear. She was also informed that there was nobody who could take care of her baby while she was gone. Lacking any alternative, Intisar gave the baby to her husband to take home. The separation was very difficult for both mother and child. As soon as Wattan was gone, on December 12, Intisar was returned to the Sharon Prison. Since I expected to be released soon, I was glad that at least Intisar was taken back to her friends in the Sharon.

I often remember Intisar and Wattan and the time we spent together. I feel that those months with them healed my soul after a long period of loneliness, and prepared me to leave prison with self-confidence, in a reasonable mental state. But it grieves me to hear of the pain that their separation caused them. Wattan still does not understand her plan to used funds from Hadassah (eventually $70000) to improve the quality of life of Jewish children in Palestine. In fall 1942, some 14000 Polish Jews, among the one million Polish Jews deported to Siberian concentration camps by Stalin, straggled into Iran, and made their way to Tehran; Henrietta immediately tried to set up the transport of 600-800 Polish Jewish children in Tehran to Palestine. In 12/1942, the first 700 Polish-Jews in Tehran were moved via Karachi to Palestine on a British troopship. She died in 1943: she never married and had no children.

60558. David, Victoria. "Mothers in Chains: Part 2", in Challenge, March-April, 1992. p. 32. The reason behind the transfer of mother and child, was a hunger strike organized by prisoners in the Sharon Prison, protesting the punishment of a fellow prisoner, A'ida Jamhour. A'ida had been beaten for singing songs about wattan; her songs had a dual meaning, referring both to the child and to her homeland. When the guards tried to separate Intisar and Wattan from the group, in order to spray the latter with tear gas, Intisar refused to budge. A'ida was later taken to Neve Tirza Prison and confined in a punishment cell. A few days later, Intisar was also moved to Neve Tirza—to the general wing, where I was already confined.

Like my friend Intisar Al-Qaq, those Palestinian women will never lose their capacity for maternal love.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

---

The data presented above demonstrates the major facets of the sexual division of labour in Israeli society. The inferior position of women in this division of labour is also reflected in the political power positions which women occupy in Israel. The capacity of women to effect change is circumscribed, too. In spite of the fact that Israel has had a woman Prime Minister there have been no more than two other ministers, and there has never been any appointed the position of deputy minister. Today there is no woman in government. The proportion of women in the Knesset is 8%, higher than many other parliaments, but lower than in previous years. There are few women in local government—one as a head of a local authority, and only one in twenty of local assembly seats. No woman has been mayor. One member of the Supreme Court, and the same number in the county courts, is female; there are none in the labour courts. In the civil service, only 17% of the higher positions are occupied by women, most in the health and welfare ministries; and no woman has become ambassador in the crucial business of external diplomacy. In the political parties, the proportions of women in the higher levels of activity are small; the socialist parties being the more generous (existence of a separate women's organization also affects these figures). In the trade unions only one about ten of representatives are women (in a third there are none), while in the Histradut assembly 14% of delegates are female. Throughout Zionist history women did organise in separate associations within the different streams of the movement. Most of the female members of the Knesset arrived there as a result of being active in those organizations, of which the main ideological role has been to reconcile the inherent conflicts between Zionism and the accomplishment of women's emancipation, and to co-opt women's struggles into the national ones. The lesson that participating in a national struggle does not necessarily lead to women's liberation is one which can be applied to the situation of women in many Third World countries. However, in other respects, Israel is different. In spite of the fact that Israel is situated in the Middle East, presenting itself as a product of a national liberation struggle and is poor in national resources, Israel is no part of the Third World. The flow of economic, political and human resources pouring into it enabled it to undergo a rapid course of development which makes its social and economic structure more similar to the industrialized 'Northern' countries.

The sexual division of labour in Israel has a pattern therefore, which has a lot in common with sexual division in other capitalist societies. Overall women participate less than men in the labour market; have less education; earn less money; have fewer positions of authority, and to a great extent their participation in the labour market is affected by, as well as reflected in, their role in the domestic domain. Some of these divisions are more emphasized than in Western societies as a result of the existence of traditional groups, which impose additional ideological and material blockages to women's employment. Furthermore, the sexual division is affected by other social divisions in Israeli society which cut across it, especially the joint ethnic/class structure which has evolved in Israel since its establishment. The sexual divisions of labour are sharper at the bottom of the class ladder, mainly because women of the higher classes can substitute their domestic duties and child (bearing and) rearing by other women.

However, the sexual division of labour in Zionist Israel cannot be fully understood in those terms. Its dynamics are dictated to a great extent by the specific demands of the Zionist endeavour imposed on women to fulfill their two primary roles: National reproduction; 'Manning' the rear.

Women are bearers of the national collectivity, delineating its boundaries and reproducing it over time, and as such they are controlled, economically and ideologically. But beyond this reproductive role, in Israel they have an acceptable productive one: to fill, in the ever fluctuating (mostly expanding) Zionist endeavour, positions which Israeli men cannot fill, as they are engaged in the economic and political, often military, forefront. One cannot understand the specific dynamics of the sexual division of labour in Israel without taking into account first, that Zionist Israel has been since its conception a war society; and second, that it has been dependent, for economic, political and human power on supplies from the Jewish Diaspora. The amount of pressure and differential emphasis put on Israeli women to fulfill their national reproductive and productive roles have depended a great deal on the state of play in the Zionist endeavour at various stages. In the last few years, probably more than ever before in Zionist history, Israeli women found themselves under pressure to fulfill both their roles at the same time, and more intensely.

These conflicting pressures, together with the ideological echoes from the growing international feminist movement, have brought a creeping awareness to many Israeli women that all is not well, unlike the smugness of ten to fifteen years before. However, feminism is a tiny and condemned minority among Israeli women, at the same time that Zionist women's organizations have been active in bringing legislation for the aim of women's equality (as opposed to women's liberation) which is constructed in such a way as not to challenge any of the constraints which Israeli women find themselves in. The Israeli feminist movement is confused, torn between the few who understand and relate the problems of women's position in Israeli society and the Zionist mode within which it exists, and the majority who refuse to challenge it. It is not coincidental that the 1980 Israeli feminist annual conference exploded around a proposal of some socialist feminists to express solidarity with the struggle of Palestinian women against their oppression, nor that one of the biggest 'feminist' outrages in the last few years have been of women who protested against the release of religious women from service in the army, avoiding their national duty. The clearest expression of the fear Zionism women (as well as men) have for the feminist movement, can be found in an article by a Member of the Knesset, Tamar Eshel, a leader of the Zionist women's organization Na'amat, and a strong lobbyist for women's equality legislation: "We, unlike feminists..."
emphasise the importance of the family cell... we do not think that one can take an ideological goal and apply it blindly without considering the general public... an extreme change as the feminists demand will split up the people at the time where it struggles for its mere existence"... Marsha Friedman the Israeli feminist who quotes this article, rightly points out that the same argument was used in the 1930s to object to giving voting rights to women... Perhaps the blindness is in other eyes. Without examining the basis and shape of Zionism, of which they are such an instrumental part, women will not be able to assert themselves in Israeli society, where both tradition and modernity seem to block women's true equality. [↩]

60561. Davis, Nora Yuval. Israeli Women and Men: Divisions Behind the Unity: Part 1: Introduction. Pamphlet. Change International Reports: Women and Society. London: Calverts Press, N.D. [1990?]. A great deal of myth has been attached to Israel in general and to Israeli women in particular, even though in the last few years alternative interpretations have begun to emerge. The picture of Israel as one great egalitarian Kibbutz, and of Israeli women as smiling girls with an orange-box on one shoulder, and a gun on the other, still persist however. Moreover, many feminists have sought in Israel a positive model of women's liberation, whether from a poster of Golda Meir as a feminist heroine or in women being drafted into the army. An Israeli woman has been thought to represent a model of a woman who has come to occupy an equal place in society by being fully, and equally, involved in the realization of nationalgoals. Examination of the reality reveals a 'very different, if complex, reality. The state of Israel was established in 1948. Set in a corner of south west Asia, Palestine, traditionally revered as the 'original' Jewish homeland—and of significance to both Christianity and Islam, its derivatives—it is primarily a product of the European Zionist movement. Physically perched in the Third World, Israel looks to the West for security and friendship. Although established as an exclusively Jewish state, aiming to gather world Jewry into Palestine, to date less than a quarter of world Jewry actually lives there. The bulk of the present 3.8 million persons migrated to Israel after it was established in 1948 (and a further quarter of a million have left again). The unique history of Israel's social and political formation before date has as great an influence on the status of women as the later years. Continuous external conflict and internal demands for fighting power drew women into military and economic action early on, and still largely determine the relationship of citizen, female and male, to the state. The special relationship between the Jewish religion and the Israeli state in turn still largely determines the legal and social relationships of men and women to one another. The transformation of Israel from a scattering of agricultural settlements into a modern, urban, capitalist welfare state of 7992 square miles (excluding the occupied territories) is the third dimension to women's position in Israel today. [↩]

60562. Davis, Nora Yuval. Israeli Women and Men: Divisions Behind the Unity: Part 1: Production and Reproduction: The Links. Pamphlet. Change International Reports: Women and Society. London: Calverts Press, N.D. [1990?]. The most distinct characteristic of women in the Yishaw was their scarcity. Their ratio to men was 1:2.5 up to 1:5 in the early Kibbutzim and colonizing work brigades. This scarcity was at a time when most Zionist immigrants were young and single, or childless couples, and thus, there was very low ratio of dependents to economically active adults. It was Jewish mothers in the Diaspora who were mostly fulfilling the reproductive function and thereby an unintentional international division of labour was created. Another distinctive characteristic of many of the pioneer women was that they aspired to join the men in realising the Zionists dream by fulfilling jobs which were considered important. As Golda Meir described it: "Rights— they had in abundance; (they struggled) for equality in duties... road construction, hoeing in the fields, house building or guard duties... and not be condemned to kitchen work...". But condemned to kitchen work they usually were. The demographic characteristics of the early Aliyot minimised domestic labour but did not cancel it out altogether and women were allowed to fill jobs in the productive sector only if there were enough other women to fulfill the domestic duties. Ada Maimon in her memoirs described a discussion in one of the early Kibbutzim when one of the men suggested bringing 'non-ideological' ones to the kitchen. There was no suggestion that men might take on any domestic labour duties when women were around to do it, although in the primitive conditions of the time, kitchen work usually involved hard physical labour. There is debate on the extent that this rigidity of the sexual division of labour originated mainly from traditional prejudice or was a result of competition with the local Palestinian population. What is clear, however, is that the collectivization of the Kibbutzim and work brigades developed in order to organise the necessary domestic labour and was effectively and to release more people for the cut-throat competition with the Palestinian laborers on the land. These were more used to the local conditions of labour, and had extended families and villages as supportive networks enabling them to survive as seasonal workers and as cheap labour. Whatever the reasons, the reality was clear. Sistxist attitudes prevalent among the settlers in the collectives were reinforced by the Zionist form of colonization. Kibbutzim and other collectives, numbers of members were men, persistently refused to accept more than a limited number of women—just enough to maintain the necessary services. Some had women only as hired help. The women in Degania—in the early years before this collective became a Kibbutz—were not considered members with equal rights. They were not registered in the annual contract made with the Palestine Office (of the Zionist movement), as were the male members, nor received the monthly salary which the Office paid to the men both in Degania and in neighboring Kineret. When the women demanded to be included in the contract the retort was that 'women work for the men, not for the Palestine Office of the Zionist movement'.

The status of individuals within the group was directly correlated with their earning ability; which, in turn, was measured against the productivity of the Arab male wage labourer. The arbiters were employers, such as the mandatory authorities in public works or Jewish farmers (early settler landowners), who had little or no stake either in the successes of Zionist enterprise or in the achievement of equality of women. The collective fear that 'women's work will cause a defect', induced by the Palestine Office which provided financial support—and shared by women members—was reinforced by the plain fact that women's wages were lower than men's. In consequence, the sexual division of labour found its use in the economic battle, as much as the military, against the local population. The combatant forces at the 'front' were the all-male Jewish collectives, contending with Arab wage laborers. The women formed auxiliary forces in the 'rear' to match the challenge of the Arab extended families. As in the military sphere, women could enter jobs previously filled only by men, but this did not cancel out supposedly natural sexual division of work, nor, in real numbers was it ever more than symbolic. In towns and cities, where the more traditional Jewish population lived, the employment of women was even smaller. Within the pioneer community women's work was concentrated in a very narrow range of occupations, mainly services. A survey from that period (1922) included 2,500 women workers of whom 1,600 were in towns and only 900 in agricultural settlements. The main work places of women were as cooks, in laundries, in kindergartens, in schools, as nurses, as office clerks and as domestic help. This distribution shows a remarkable similarity to the present occupational distribution among Jewish women in Israel. Only 447 women in the 1922 survey worked in the productive sector, of these, only 53 worked in construction. The similarities in patterns of women's employment in the 1920s and in contemporary Israel are, however, very misleading. Not only is the degree and mode of economic production very different in contemporary Israel, but also the social status of women who now fill those jobs would most probably be very different from those who filled them then. Before statehood the economic activity that took place in the
Women in the Middle East and North Africa

Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Jewish sector was basically a primary economy aimed at colonizing the country; it was not yet a capitalist economy, although it followed patterns that were developed in capitalist countries, and with money supplied from them. It was only towards World War II that considerable numbers of people with their own capital migrated to Palestine, and only after the statehood of the large scale immigration of Oriental Jews, that the change occurred. As Swirsky and Bernstein describe, most of the new Oriental Jews received no education or were given cheap, mostly secular or religious schools, which played an integral part in the transformation of the Israeli economy from its primary stage into a capitalist economy. At the same time the class system of the new Israeli society was created, in which Oriental Jews occupied a specific place. As a result of the Oriental immigration, women, as so often happens, were pushed out of the labour market. This process had started already earlier in the economic crisis of the 1940s. The Histadrut (the Jewish Federation of Labour Unions) had passed a resolution that, at a time of unemployment, only one person of each household should work—a seemingly socialist resolution which had a major regressive impact on women’s right to employment. This shift was enhanced by the increase in the more traditional population and the growing number of children. In 1955 only 26.5% of Israeli women had jobs. The trend changed after the mid 1960s when immigration virtually stopped, and by 1979 34.9% of Israeli women were employed. The change over the period was even greater among married women, from 21.7% in 1955 to 38%.

The economic development of Israel in the 50s and 60s involved the expansion of ‘mixed farm’ agriculture, the export of citrus fruit, industrial farming (like cotton), massive building programmes and the development of industries that were mainly labour extensive, like textiles, diamonds, chemicals, metals and minerals. The class structure that emerged from this development involved the following categories: the government initiatory bureaucracy; owners of industrial estates (including Kibbutzim), bankers and ownership groups at whom government financing was directed; a wider stratum of engineers, technicians and skilled workers; a wide stratum of unskilled or semiskilled workers. The first three categories were composed mainly from western Jews—veterans and newcomers—and in the fourth category the Oriental Jews predominated. With the passing of time more Oriental Jews have moved up to the third category and Palestinian workers have become an increasing proportion in the first. The government initiatory bureaucracy had a key role in the development of the Israeli economy. Most of the funds invested in Israel continued to come from outside contributions and loans, mainly from world Jewry. They invested the money both out of Zionist sympathy and to reach the long-term subsidies promised by the government. To a great extent it is valid to call the Israeli economy state capitalist, both because the largest economic enterprises were in the direct ownership of the public sector (the government and the Histadrut) and because major investment in the private sector was controlled and directed by the state. The bourgeoisie that developed mainly after 1967 grew under government patronage. In the aftermath of the 1967 war significant changes were brought to Israel. For the first time Israel directly ruled a great number of Palestinians in the occupied territories who came to be a major economic factor, providing cheap labour in almost all unskilled jobs (and thus transforming Israel to an economy more similar to other colonial societies). This was accompanied by growing power among the bourgeoisie—one of the factors which brought the right wing Likud party to power in 1977. The capitalization of Israel as well as the growing heterogeneity in class and ethnic composition deeply affected the sexual division of labour. The extent to which women now participate in the labour market, and the occupations they choose and fill are highly dependent on class, with education as a major factor, and origin. The gap that exists between the educational level of men and women in Israel influences access to jobs. (This gap is even larger in the non-Jewish population, whose general educational level is lower). This discrepancy concerns not only the duration of study but also its direction. In professional secondary schools, for example, 54% of boys study technical professions but only 7.2% of girls participate in these streams. On the other hand 39% of girls do clerical studies, home economics and/or professional child-care while not a single boy participates in these courses. Differences can be found also among various university courses—there are more men in the natural sciences and more women in humanities. The academic level of girls who go to professional secondary school is lower than that of the boys who choose to go to this type of school. More girls than boys go to academic secondary school (this tendency is specific to the Jewish sector only) and beyond the age of 10 that outnumber boys in academic education. Three out of ten university places are filled by women. The educational factor affects patterns of work, pay and the actual contents of their employment. Generally, those women who are employed are concentrated in occupations which require higher levels of education than those of most men who can be found at the top and the bottom of the range of education. This relates to the fact that women’s ability to participate in the labour market is affected by her level of education, as one measure of her socioeconomic status in a way men’s does not.

Women are engaged in much more part-time work than men. Only 14.8% of the male working population have part-time jobs, in comparison to 40.1% of women workers. These percentages are especially high among those working in services and agricultural (47.8% and 41.8% respectively) but it is also very common in academic circles and among professionals (43.0% and 45.4% respectively). Another significant difference is in their employment status. only 0.9% among women are employers (in comparison to 5.8% of men) and only 4.5% are self-employed (in comparison to 14.1% of men). Only 8% of the managers are women and in general there is an imbalance of power between men and women (an imbalance which is reflected strongly in the political sphere as well). This imbalance also shows itself in the gap that exists between women’s and men’s average salary. Even when comparing income per hours (and thus neutralizing the fact that many women receive only part-time income for part-time jobs) we find that by 1979 an average man received £58.4 per hour and an average woman received £45.8. A Government Report on Equality suggest that the sexual income gap is larger between married women and married men. The gap in income is not uniform in all levels of income It is widest among industrial workers, and the narrowest among managers.

Daphna Izraeli found that 75.1% of Israeli women are engaged in ‘feminine’ occupations and 78.9% of the men are engaged in ‘masculine’ occupations. Only 13.1% among the working population work in jobs which belong to the other sex. Only in one occupational group (academic and scientific) are both women and men represented to the same extent (8.5%-9%). Women are also concentrated in a small number of occupations. Some 43% are concentrated in 28 jobs where they constitute at least 70% of employees, and 22% work in 10 in which they constitute more than 90% of the employees. Most of the ‘feminine’ occupations were extensions of traditional feminine roles in the house (cleaners, nurses, teachers), and there are also areas in which women concentrate in suboccupation (pediatricians among doctors, family sociologists etc). Other ‘feminine’ occupations are those which require patience and delicacy which are thought to be feminine characteristics (like typists and delicate electronics assembly). Clerical work is the largest occupation filled by women. Daphna Izraeli also found that in Israel, as in other countries, the salaries are lower in relation to the educational level required for ‘feminine’ occupations (ie in which there are at least 45% of women among the employees) than in ‘masculine’ professions (in which there are less than 25% of women). The finding is consistent at all educational levels. Thus, although women’s educational standard is expected to be higher to enter the labour market, most of the ‘feminine’ occupations open to them are below the average income. Men in ‘feminine’ jobs also earn less than men in ‘male’ jobs, but the opposite is not true. Women in ‘male’ occupations still usually earn lower income for ‘mixed’ professions in Israel, unlike other countries, have similar characteristics to ‘feminine’ ones.

The participation of Arab women in economic activity is even less, and at still lower occupation levels than both Jewish women (including those of Oriental origin) and Arab men, but their participation is fast growing. The government report mentions that 8.5% of Arab women were employed in 1977, which had grown to 15% by 1979. One of the major reasons for this growth has been the establishment of workshops, mainly for the garment industry which enables Arab women, who are socially inhibited from leaving their villages, to become gainfully employed. One way in which Arab women do work outside their village is by going in groups led by a Rais to the workplace (be it in agriculture, industry or services—the three main areas where Arab women are employed). Usually Arab women are lowest paid and receive the least work, high wages are reserved to Occidental (western) women (they are primarily bread winners who have the responsibility of keeping their menfolk). Most Arab women, however, work as unpaid ('unproductive') labour in their villages both in their homes and in the family fields, where these still exist. Arab men mostly work outside their villages as skilled and semi-skilled laborers and are concentrated in building, industry and agriculture. The segregated areas of employment are not unrelated to one another. The participation of Jewish women in the service sector releases Jewish males to work in the industrial productive sector; Palestinian women's labour releases Palestinian men to work in certain areas of production; the supportive labour of both Jewish women and Palestinian men allow Jewish men to work in security-related industry, and to spend two months a year (on average) in military service. This presents another manifestation of the basic division of the 'rear' and 'front' pattern. The fact that Palestinian men have come to occupy a place in this system, rigidifying women's 'feminine' occupation, has had its drawbacks from a Zionist point of view, as became apparent in the 1973 war. The prolonged mobilization of most of the male population brought the economy to a standstill which was further aggravated by the inability of the un mobilised women to take over, even temporarily, many of the 'male' occupations due to lack of skills. Since 1973 there has been a growing demand that concerted effort be made by the state to diversify women's occupations so that they can substitute better for men during emergencies. As will be shown regarding the army, the growing strain on human resources may bring about less sexually stereo-typed division of labour and a redefinition of 'rear' and 'front' in the economy.

The involvement of women in paid employment is, as elsewhere, also determined by their marital status and reproductive role. At the time of the Yishav, the main reproducers were the Jewish women in the Diaspora who bore and reared people for immigration to Palestine. Immigrants children, born in Palestine, were known as Sabras (a nickname, derived from the common cacti grown in Israel), mostly worked outside, soft inside...) and were seen as the hope and the future of the Zionist movement—the New Jews, who would grow up without the distorting effects of the Diaspora. Collective childrearing in the Kibbutzim did not mean their neglect, on the contrary, it occupied a central ideological position that combined with traditional emphasis on the family. Numerically, however, they were negligible until the 1940s. In some early Kibbutzim the general assembly had the power to approve whether or not the community could afford children. This changed when the British limited immigration. Ben-Gurion coined the concept of Aliya Pnim, 'internal immigration', that replaced the immigration of Jews from abroad. Women were urged to become mothers in fulfillment of their national role. After the establishment of the state, special financial and honorary rewards were given to mothers of ten children, and at a later stage Natality and Demographic Committees were established in order to encourage women to reproduce. The issue became more important from the late 1960s when Jewish immigrants ceased to be the main childbearers, and special child benefit programmes to encourage a higher rate of birth (3 or more) were accompanied by vigorous propaganda. (Although in the last few years they have lost a lot of their real economic incentive with flooding inflation).

The main motive in encouraging Jewish women to reproduce is to supply enough human power to ensure the continuing superiority of Zionism. Part of the need is merely numerical, producing, what M.P. U. Avnery has called 'A psychology of rabbits'. Golda Meir is known to have said that her sleep was disturbed at night thinking about the Arab babies being born every minute. This does not relate only to the surrounding states, but to the Palestinian minority within Israel, which has one of the highest rates of reproduction in the world. A secret memorandum, 'Handing the Arabs of Israel', submitted to Prime Minister Rabin in 1976, was leaked to the newspaper Al-Hamishmar. Its author, Israel Koenig, Northern District Commissioner for the Ministry of the Interior, and as such in charge of Arab affairs in Galilee, pointed out that 'the rate of natural growth of the Arab population is 5.9% per annum, in comparison with 1.5% for the Jewish population... On this basis, by 1978 the Arabs will constitute 51% of the population in the northern district... Their growth in Galilee is dangerous to our very control over the district...'. The report purported to evaluate, and suggest ways to counteract this threat. One telling proposal was that 'the government should find a way to neutralise the granting of allowances to Arab families with many children, which could be done either by linking it to economic status or by taking (the administration of) these allowances away from the national insurance and transferring them to the Jewish Agency... for Jews only'. The government did find a way: child allowances are given to all the citizens of Israel (as betting a democratic welfare state) but those 'who have had a relative in the Israeli army' get more and the overwhelming majority of the Palestinians are not recruited. The Jewish families which, for various reasons (which include extreme religious orthodoxy), do not have a relative who has served in the army, get added benefits direct from the Jewish Agency. Here, as in many other instances (for example, ownership of land), the dual ruling mechanism of the state and the Jewish Agency help to keep a subtle 'apartheid' system in Israel without seemingly offending the 'universal democratic' functioning of the state. In the same way young Jewish couples get other state help, such as in subsidies for accommodation, which are not available to the Palestinian citizen. However, the issue is more sophisticated. Policy-makers are aware that the supremacy of the Zionist movement over its enemies is very much a function of technological supremacy, as well as of an efficient and committed national, and military, body. This notion is coupled with racist undertones not only towards the Arabs, but also towards the Oriental Jews. The oft quoted Golda Meir exclaimed at the beginning of Russian Jewish immigration to Israel in the 1970s that at last 'real Jews' are coming to Israel again.

Strong ideological pressures act upon Occidental and education, as well as the more religious, to bear children. Israel is a wholly family based society. Perez and Katz quote an international comparative study showing, that taking the three measures of familiarity—rate of marriage, rate of divorce and birth rate—Israel is among the highest in the world. Women of Oriental origin have the higher number of Jewish births (3.2 in comparison with 2.1 of Occidental women), but in general Israeli women have a high number of children, and the rate is rising— in 1977 the average number of children per family in the Jewish population was 1.7, while in 1979 it was 2.4. Mothers of 30-34 years-old have numbers of children (2.9 per family) which are highly atypical in capitalist societies, including those with 13 or more years of schooling. This is unlikely to mean that Israeli women bear children consciously for 'national reasons', but it does reflect a public climate which pressures and approves large numbers of children. Corresponding to this rise in the overall birthrate, less domestic help is available. The second generation of Oriental women, having some educational qualifications, usually prefers other types of jobs. If work in service accounts for half the work performed by Oriental women who migrated to Israel before 1948 and 42.1% of those who arrived before 1954, it now accounts to only 16% of women who were born in Israel of Oriental parents. Satisfactory alternatives to domestic help in child rearing are not available. Most of the Jewish children in Israel have been born by Oriental Jewish mothers. Continent of origin and level of education are the best indicators in predicting the number of children for Israeli women. The same indicators are those which predict women's employment later. Israeli or Occidental in origin with a high level of education, characterize most of the Jewish Israeli women workers. These show that while clerical work seems to be the 'feminine occupation' that cuts across continent of origin, the professions seem to be reserved to Occidental (western) women, and services to the Oriental.

This division of occupations brings us to the issue of exchangeability. Domestic service by nature is a substitutive female occupation; it releases some women to work outside their home as other women fill their tasks in the home (presupposing also that childcare is solely a female responsibility). The statistics show that the more children the woman has, the less likelihood that she will have domestic help. If she is employed at all, the chances are that she works as a domestic help elsewhere—a part-time job that requires no qualifications. The conditions for full-time employment in the capitalist labour market are contradictory, because of the problem of domestic labour and childcare, unless the community or state supply services. The collectivization of domestic labour in the Kibbutzim supplies such services, but the Kibbutzim contain only 3% of the Israeli population. In towns, the normal pattern is for private domestic help, which poses a long-term problem. There are many contradictory tendencies and constraints on prospects for change. The Government report on the position of Israeli women reports that in 1977 there were 600 full day nurseries which took care of 32000 children, half of whom had priority for social and familial reasons, about one fifth of the children of working mothers. Most of the children of under school age are in 5 hour day nurseries or at home. Young school children also finish primary school at midday, and only 45 schools in Israel have a full study day, with 80% of their pupils from needy families. There is a chronic shortage of afternoon and school holiday centres. Transforming this system to a more satisfactory one would demand investment which is not thought to be available in the present state of the Israeli economy, in the face of the military budget demands. At the same time, the demand for women's labour has been rising, partly in common with other capitalist countries and partly with the development of the technology and microelectronics. However, other factors are more specific to Israel. In the first place, the end of the Jewish mass immigration, which put pressure on women to reproduce children, also put short term pressure on them to occupy places in the labour market. The Palestinian labour force, for political reasons and education cannot supply this reserve. Lastly, during the last decade the number of men (aged 14 and over) in the Israeli civil workforce went down drastically—from 80.1% in 1955 to 63.9% in 1979. Part of this phenomenon is due to the rise in level of education in secondary schools and universities, but part is the growing need of military manpower since 1967. It is not a result of a growing involvement of men in domestic duties. It is a common observation that even in traditional societies many women find that they are required to be 'superwomen': to continue to fulfill all their traditional domestic roles in addition to their new ones in the labour market, and even some other tasks associated with male roles. The pressures put on women in the future may indeed demand their transformation into such beings—unless it breaks them or the system breaks first. [–] 60563. Davis, Nora Yuval. Israeli Women and Men: Divisions Behind the Unity: Part 1: Women as Constituted in Israeli Law: Tradition and Modernity. Pamphlet. Change International Reports: Women and Society. London: Calverts Press, N.D. [1990?]. The juridical arm of the function of women is within the sphere of the family and home, out of which they gain the vote. Interestingly, even after the establishment of the state, Golda Meir was prevented from becoming the Mayor of Tel Aviv, as the religious parties claimed that only men, according to the Halakha (the religious code) can be heads of political bodies. Nowadays a woman has actually accepted her as a Prime Minister with the rationalization that in Israel the Prime Minister is only 'the first among equals'. However, there has never been a female mayor in Israel. The text of the declaration of independence in 1948 rejected discrimination on grounds of sex, along with religious and racial discrimination. This document was later stated by the Israeli Supreme Court to be of declarative value only, and not legally committing. Israel has no written constitution, and instead it was decided that the Knesset should gradually legislate a series of Foundation Laws, which would have the status of secular constitutional law. In 1951 a general secular law (not a Foundation Law) on equal rights for women was passed. It is not coincidental that the female Knesset member who proposed this law eventually abstained from voting, for the text was modified extensively. An amendment had excluded the important section on marriage and divorce from its jurisdiction, keeping them exclusively in the preserve of the Rabbinical Courts.

In 1975, an attempt was made to pass in the Knesset a Foundation Law of women's equality. This proposal failed, and the then Prime Minister, Itzhak Rabin of the Labour Party declared that such a law would never be allowed to pass. Today there is discussion about another proposal for a Foundation Law on civil rights, which should include a clause which secures sex equality. This proposal has more chance of being passed. The difference between these two proposals is that the first would have invalidated any law which contradicted its spirit, whereas the present proposal has a specific clause stating that this law will not invalidate any prior legislation. In other words, the proposed civil rights Foundation Law will, if passed perpetuate any legal inequality which exists now. As such, the acceptance of this Foundation Law would change the present situation in Israel very little. Secular laws which do constitute women as different from men are basically similar to those which are found in Western welfare states. Elizabeth Wilson has already shown that various laws which relate to women in the welfare state of Britain constitute her not as a person, but as a mother, who bears and rears children as future workers and citizens. Hilary Land has shown another dimension: taxation laws, for example, constitute women primarily, not as mothers but as wives—whose income (if any) is perceived basically as a secondary part of the family income. Social benefits are calculated accordingly, reinforcing women's dependent status. In Israeli legislation the position is similar. Even when a law seems to grant special privileges (rather than additional duties) for women, these privileges are based on the global view that the primary function of women is within the sphere of the family and home, out of reach of such law. A typical example is the law of women's labour (1954). This forbids, among other things, nightwork for women. The principle that guided the legislators, according to the lawyer A. Azmon in his (government publication) legal guide, is that 'nightwork might have a damaging physiological effect, especially on women who usually carry the responsibilities of domestic labour and taking care of children'. There is now growing opposition to this law, not so much against the assumption behind it, but because it has been proven that in reality this law blocks women from entering and progressing in careers. It also lacks any practical protective value, as virtually every employer who needs women's work at unsocial hours—in hospitals, on telephone switchboards, or in factories which work in three shifts—can get the necessary exemption. Another clause forbids women from working in certain jobs which are considered dangerous, for example, with certain minerals or dust. The worry is less for the women, than for their reproductive value. Some of the jobs are forbidden only to pregnant women, while others are forbidden to women who are of reproductive age (to 45), regardless of personal plans concerning children This law does allow special rights to women workers before and after giving birth. Employers are not allowed to fire pregnant women, and they are entitled to leave after birth and during breast-feeding. In addition women are allowed to take unpaid leave after a child's birth for up to a year. No paternity leave or opportunity for parental leave is given.

The national insurance law similarly relates to women as those solely responsible not only for bearing children, but also for rearing them. Women are given a special birth grant, and later receive the children's allowances directly. The national service law releases women from army service once they marry or are pregnant. National insurance for the old-aged and dependent relatives, and income tax relate to women as wives. Married couples are now given the right to enjoy pensions and insurance benefits of their spouses even if they did not pay for themselves, and the tax law applies both to common-law marriage and valid marriage, as long as one of the spouses is not married to someone else. This issue, recognizes persons only as parts of a family rather than as independent human beings. In 1974 and 1976, income tax law was changed to allow women not only to report separately, if they so wish, and also to have the right to look through their income tax files. Previously this was forbidden, because their reports are kept in their husbands' files, and only the person on whose name is on the file was allowed to study its contents. Another controversial law constitutes women not as wives or mothers, but basically as weaker, or more delicate creatures than men: the state service law of 1970 which determines that women must retire at 60, and men at the age of 65 (although the average life-span of women is longer than that of men). Opponents of this law claim that it blocks the progress of women to top positions, usually arrived at in the final years of a career. Only in the civil service do women retire, like men, at the age of 65. A specially interesting clause in the law permits widows and war bereaved parents, who are physically eligible, to continue and work until the age of 70. In addition to this several other secular laws have been passed which attempt to secure the legal equality of women. One deals with equal pay for female and male workers (dating from 1964), which states that male and female workers should receive the same wage for the same work. In 1974 this law was changed so that male and female workers will receive equal pay for work 'which is basically the same'. This addition was necessary, for many occupations became sex-defined (which is especially easy in Hebrew, as every noun and adjective are gender defined). The law of property relations between husbands and wives (1973) requires an equal division between the spouses of a $D$ property acquired during the marriage when it terminates. However, this law does not commit the spouses if they choose to take their case to Rabbinical Courts (which have a parallel authority to the civil courts on these issues). This is an important example where sex equality has been limited for the benefit of traditional religious law, incorporated into state law. The principle of equality in law between men and women applies, unless otherwise specified, to all state laws. These have been developed to emphasise the principle of equality in areas where social reality deviates sharply from it. Thus there does exist an important, but only partial, dimension in Israeli legislation which constitutes women as persons and as equal members of society.

The only area of law where there has been significant change in the law's attitude to women in the last few years, has been related to abortion. For many years abortions were illegal in Israel, although usually nobody was prosecuted. An abortion was therefore dependent on a woman's means. In 1976 a law was passed which allowed women who received the formal agreement of a 3 member committee (composed of two doctors and one social worker, at least one of whom is a woman) to have a legal abortion. The accepted grounds for an abortion were related to the physical health of the mother, the pregnancy being a result of forbidden (incestuous) relationship, or the social-mental position of the woman. When the Likud party came to power (in 1977) it changed the social clause under the pressure from the religious parties, who had made it a condition for signing the coalition agreement. The influence of religious legislation, both in text and practice is demonstrated again.

In 1981 another law was passed, originally inspired by the recommendations of the government committee on the position of women in Israel. The law of equal opportunities in employment has been accepted with disappointment by the same lobby that exerted pressure for its adoption. It lacks 'teeth' to enforce its application, and does not stop the social restrictive privileges of women's work, like forbidding night work for women or giving exclusive maternity leave. Most importantly, it continues the practice that only directly involved, individual workers (rather than pressure groups or trade unions, as in the USA for instance) can complain about discrimination. In the past this has almost totally prevented women from using the law, being afraid of the label 'trouble-maker'. Interestingly enough, those cases which did make it to the courts, which can be counted in single numbers found the judges sympathetic.

The main area in which religious legislation is exercised is that of family law marriage and divorce are dealt with exclusively by the religious courts, and in the other areas, like guardianship of children and property, they have autonomy authority parallel to that of the secular courts. Muslim and Christian courts deal with the non-Jewish citizens of the state, but for reasons of space only the Rabbinical court with authority over the majority Jewish population will be discussed here. The judges in the Rabbinical Courts are civil servants appointed by the president on the recommendation of an appointments committee whose composition and authority are anchored in secular law, and it can be supposed that women can be appointed in future. One of the law of equal rights for women states that women should have equal access to professions regulated by law. Not so one of the qualifications for appointment to judge of the Rabbinical Court is rabbinical ordination, for which, by religious law, any woman, no matter how knowledgeable she may be, is unfit precisely because she is a woman. The religious laws prevent women from appearing as witnesses in Rabbinical courts (in practice, some women have appeared in religious courts other than as marriage witnesses, but their sex can be given as a reason for devaluing their testimony). Women are also prevented from participating in elections of chief rabbis or municipal rabbis, from sitting on religious councils, and from participating in elections to those councils, despite the fact that these bodies are state financed and that these prohibitions have no authority in the secular law. The legal code of the Rabbinical Courts is the orthodox Halacha as summarized in the Shulkan Aruch, crystallised in the seventeenth century but based on an ancient code from the second, if not before. Judaism, being a religion which puts the emphasis on following certain practices than belief in certain dogmas, has instructions and directions to follow every moment of the day. The general attitude of the religious code towards women is that which applies to an inferior being. It includes the equation of women to dogs and pigs, and a daily prayer of the Jewish male rejoices, 'Blessed be thou that did not make me a woman'. It also forbids women to study or lead prayers (an instruction perpetuated by St Paul in Christianity). For a considerable time around women's monthly period they are thought to be impure and sexually untouchable. Religious observation as a matter of personal choice is not our concern here. However, in Israel these religious orientations are devoutly followed by the judges of the courts which have exclusive power in the determination of the Israeli Jewish family, with far reaching implications for the relations between spouses; parents and children; issues like legal representation of children in the family courts; and issues like inheritance. The judges' personal status as members of the Israeli Jewish community is important in determining how they will decide in family matters. Women cannot divorce their husbands unless the latter agrees. A woman cannot divorce her husband unless the latter agrees. The law of equal opportunities in employment has been accepted with disappointment by the same lobby that exerted pressure for its adoption. It lacks 'teeth' to enforce its application, and does not stop the social restrictive privileges of women's work, like forbidding night work for women or giving exclusive maternity leave. Most importantly, it continues the practice that only directly involved, individual workers (rather than pressure groups or trade unions, as in the USA for instance) can complain about discrimination. In the past this has almost totally prevented women from using the law, being afraid of the label 'trouble-maker'. Interestingly enough, those cases which did make it to the courts, which can be counted in single numbers found the judges sympathetic.

The main area in which religious legislation is exercised is that of family law marriage and divorce are dealt with exclusively by the religious courts, and in the other areas, like guardianship of children and property, they have autonomy authority parallel to that of the secular courts. Muslim and Christian courts deal with the non-Jewish citizens of the state, but for reasons of space only the Rabbinical court with authority over the majority Jewish population will be discussed here. The judges in the Rabbinical Courts are civil servants appointed by the president on the recommendation of an appointments committee whose composition and authority are anchored in secular law, and it can be supposed that women can be appointed in future. One of the law of equal rights for women states that women should have equal access to professions regulated by law. Not so one of the qualifications for appointment to judge of the Rabbinical Court is rabbinical ordination, for which, by religious law, any woman, no matter how knowledgeable she may be, is unfit precisely because she is a woman. The religious laws prevent women from appearing as witnesses in Rabbinical courts (in practice, some women have appeared in religious courts other than as marriage witnesses, but their sex can be given as a reason for devaluing their testimony). Women are also prevented from participating in elections of chief rabbis or municipal rabbis, from sitting on religious councils, and from participating in elections to those councils, despite the fact that these bodies are state financed and that these prohibitions have no authority in the secular law. The legal code of the Rabbinical Courts is the orthodox Halacha as summarized in the Shulkan Aruch, crystallised in the seventeenth century but based on an ancient code from the second, if not before. Judaism, being a religion which puts the emphasis on following certain practices than belief in certain dogmas, has instructions and directions to follow every moment of the day. The general attitude of the religious code towards women is that which applies to an inferior being. It includes the equation of women to dogs and pigs, and a daily prayer of the Jewish male rejoices, 'Blessed be thou that did not make me a woman'. It also forbids women to study or lead prayers (an instruction perpetuated by St Paul in Christianity). For a considerable time around women's monthly period they are thought to be impure and sexually untouchable. Religious observation as a matter of personal choice is not our concern here. However, in Israel these religious orientations are devoutly followed by the judges of the courts which have exclusive power in the determination of the Israeli Jewish family, with far reaching implications for the relations between spouses; parents and children; issues like legal representation of children in the family courts; and issues like inheritance. The judges' personal status as members of the Israeli Jewish community is important in determining how they will decide in family matters. Women cannot divorce their husbands unless the latter agrees. The opposite is not true. If a woman is driven to leave her home, she can be declared a 'rebel' and lose her rights to maintenance or guardianship of her children. If the Rabbinical Court finds that she has had a lover, she must divorce her husband and will never be allowed to marry her lover. Any children born to her of that relationship will be declared 'bastards' and will not be allowed to marry other Jews 'for ten generations' (and may not redeem themselves even by religious conversion as non-Jews can). Bastardy is also the fate of children of Jewish mothers who married and divorced in civil ceremonies in other countries— the marriage holds by colnot but the divorce does not. The children are considered to be the progeny of a married woman but not by her husband—and therefore bastards. Vulnerability to blackmail can occur in women. These decisions meant the women in the Palmach continued to go out to the front with the men, but their desirable role in the battle was defined as auxiliary, such as nurses, drivers, and signalers. In the later phases of the war, the Palmach began to develop more specialized units for women, such as medical corps and signal corps. By the end of the war, women accounted for about 15% of the Palmach's fighting force.

The question of women in the military continued to be a topic of debate after the establishment of the State of Israel. The 1948 constitution of Israel, which was the provincial constitution at the time, did not explicitly allow women to serve in the military. However, the military commanders were allowed to recruit women for auxiliary roles. Over time, the role of women in the military expanded, with women serving in combat units and taking on roles that were previously limited to men. For example, in the 1970s, women began to serve in elite commando units.

The legal status of women in the military varied depending on the country. In some countries, such as the United States, women were allowed to serve in combat roles, while in others, such as Israel, women were limited to auxiliary roles. The legal status of women in the military continued to evolve over time, with debates continuing about the role of women in the military and the extent of their rights and responsibilities.

In conclusion, the role of women in the military has evolved significantly over time, with women taking on increasingly greater roles in combat and auxiliary roles. The legal status of women in the military has also evolved over time, with debates continuing about the role of women in the military and the extent of their rights and responsibilities.
A totally different military experience was given to the women from the Yishav who volunteered (despite the ambivalence of the Yishav) to the British army during World War II, and served in the units of ATS and WAAFS. This volunteering was within the policy of the Yishuv during the war with the Nazis which was summed up by Ben-Gurion: "We shall fight the war as if there is no White paper, and shall fight the White paper as if there is no war". The 4000 women who volunteered in the British army served as part of the ATS (Auxiliary Territorial Service, commonly known as the WAAFS). It was the first time that women from the Yishuv had served in a regular army, and the ATS became to a great extent the model on which women's role in Zahal (the Israeli army) was later shaped. Unlike the Hagana and Palmach, the female roles in women in ATS were clearly defined, organizationally and functionally. Women were separated from the men and organised in units of 50-60, living in special quarters in big army bases from which they used to go out to their daily duties. Women in ATS were kept clearly away from combat roles as well as from the front. They worked as drivers, in offices, stores, hospitals, and communications. As auxiliary forces, they were also partly prohibited from tasks which were open to British women, for example, from acting as registered nurses or doctors, or, for a time, from driving ambulances (even though they were driving 3 ton lorries). Another dimension of female activity in the war was very small in numbers, but highly significant symbolically. A special unit of the Palmach, composed of 25 men and three women, went out on a secret mission for the British, and were parachuted behind the enemy lines in Europe to help in the escape of British war captives and Jewish refugees conquered Europe. Two of the women, Hana Senesh and Havia Reich, and seven men were caught, tortured, and executed. The memory of their heroism became a symbol both of national sacrifice and the equal heroic participation of women from the Yishuv in the war.

The 1948 war, which was the reaction of the Arab world to Israel's declaration of independence, marks the transformation period from the Yishav to statehood. One facet of this was the conversion of the Hagana and the dissenting organizations into a regular army, and of women's role within it. The first stage of the war, about six months, concentrated mainly on controlling roads, which were crucial for transferring supplies and forces to different settlements. During this stage women's participation was the most active. In many cases, they did not stay in the bases or outposts, but fought with the men. Women were in war combat roles as snipers, accompanying convoys, and so forth, but mostly in auxiliary roles as signalers, nurses and so forth. Women in combat were perceived ambivalently, on the one hand they were under constant pressure to prove themselves as good and hard as the men, and on the other hand, even when it was admitted (as was very often the case) that they were as good, they were considered distracting, causing special worries concerning their fate (as women) if captured by the enemy. At a later stage, the army ceased to be voluntary and became a regular standing army, recruited nationally. As the military expanded and the balance of power changed in favour of Israel, the differentiation between the roles of men and women grew wider. An explicit instruction was given to take women away from the front (which still did not mean complete safety, because of the small size of the country, but did decrease their chances of being captured alive by the enemy). The roles of women in the bases and outposts were basically administrative, secretarial, training, cooking, cultural and education (by teaching Hebrew to the new immigrants who had volunteered from abroad to join the fighting forces).

The modern Israeli military combines the services for land, sea and air, and is known as Zahal. Chen, the Women's Corps defined as one of the goal-oriented command units of Zahal, emerged from the debate between those who wanted to adopt the model of the British army, and those who wanted to adopt the model of the Hagana-Palmach. One of the basic disagreements concerned the extent to which women should be kept in separate corps, as they had in the British army, or in mixed ones, as in the Hagana-Palmach. The solution, and its name, was a compromise. It is not coincidental, however, that from the establishment of Chen, until 1970, all the commanding officers were ex-ATS officers. The name first suggested was Auxiliary Women's Corps, but the name Chen, Women's Corps, was finally adopted, both because its initials in Hebrew meant 'charm' (a feminine characteristic, emphasised in the corps) and because dropping the 'Auxiliary' gives it a more egalitarian connotation.

All the women in Zahal formally belong to Chen, but their membership of the corps is more diffuse than the relationship of the men to their units. This is because most of the women in the army are under the command of male officers. They are not sent out to do specific jobs in the army, not as a result of the decisions of Chen, but as a result of manpower decisions taken by General Headquarters and other command units, which are all headed by men. The senior officers of Chen only fill advisory capacities in General Headquarters and the different branches and command units of the army. As Shif and Haber sum up 'the synthesis was crystallized between senior officers (in Chen) as consultants, and junior officers as commanders (in the 1960s)'. The power of command of the junior officers in Chen relates to the two areas exclusively under Chen authority: basic training and jurisdictional authority. Every woman who is recruited to the army undergoes a course of basic training, which usually takes about three weeks. In this course she is trained in physical fitness, usage of personal arms, and given lectures on various topics from Zionism to cosmetics, and most of all, in adjustment to military discipline. Exclusive jurisdictional authority over the women soldiers rest with Chen officers, who alone can judge women accused of any military offence (although most complaints come from the males under whom they are working). In addition, Chen offices in big army bases would usually be responsible for the separate living quarters of the women soldiers (women in Zahal are not allowed to live in places where separate showers and minimal facilities are not available) and for the guard duties of female soldiers. The myth of women's equality in the Israeli army leans heavily on women's military activities during the pre-state period, but even that was largely fiction. During that period the separation of duties according to sex was more fluid, but nevertheless existed, at least for most women who participated in the military activity. The illusion of equality is due to two central facts. When there were no separate female units, divisions were often informal in nature, from Hashomer to the Palmach, an informality which indeed allowed for an easing of both unwritten and declared rules keeping women away from combat activity. The nature of the military struggle before and during the establishment of the state was such that the essential feature, keeping women in the rear and men in the front, could not be fulfilled. For the war took place in territory where people actually lived, so women's guard duty was immediately necessary. Only when the two zones of war separated because the war zone widened, did women's participation at the front become the exception rather than the rule. Flexibility allowing for exceptions virtually disappeared once Zahal was established, due partly to the crucial effect that the British army, as a model of a 'proper' army, had on the build-up of Zahal in general, and Chen in particular. From then on, attributing of jobs by sex began to determine the role which a person would fulfill in the army. This does not necessarily mean that all the military categories are determined exclusively as male or female. During the years, the range of specific tasks women (and men) have carried out in the army has changed with the development of new military techniques and factors, entailing a corresponding change in the overlap of female and male roles. The crucial factor is that each task, at a different point in time, is defined as open to either males and/or females, as a deliberate characteristic of the job description. In spite of the changes in the actual roles, the attribution by sex is not random. One of its crucial determinants is that of the division between front and rear. This distinction is much more important than the combat/non-combat role division. Modern (missile determined) warfare makes the distinction more relevant than ever before. Zahal was defined, from its establishment, as a major state 'melting pot' process where the socialization of the soldiers of various Jewish origins should take place, in order to transform them into the desired model of 'the Israeli'. This process has been aimed mainly at the male soldiers, because females whom the army calculated would need special, intensive care (19% of women in 1976/77) were not recruited at all. Yet the actual educational and welfare work in the army is carried out by women—who come from higher socio-economic strata than the men. The result is that, while the female officers are usually found in inferior power positions to men who come from similar backgrounds, they appear in power and ‘patronage’ positions over the lower levels of Israeli male soldiers.

Recently a new area of labour has developed in the army. This is delicate industrial work, whether in mechanics or electronics. This type of work, unlike operational tasks, used to be done by men and has become part of the functional ‘rear’ as the front expanded; but, in some of its specializations, it is a new market for labour emerging from technological innovations in sophisticated armaments. As in other countries, in both military and civilian labour markets, women were thought to be suitable to fill these jobs—with the patience and delicacy of touch required. However, this type of labour may also profoundly change the patterns of female participation in the army as (for almost the first time) it involves women in occupations requiring longer training periods, which in turn might affect not only the length of service of women, but also their present dispensability at the front in times of emergency.

Other social divisions in Israeli society which cut across the sexual division persist. Zahal is not a universal microcosm, and are specific to it. In operation, the law of national security service which recruits Israeli men and women to the army refutes the supposed universality of recruitment. The law of 1969 states that every Israeli citizen or permanent resident has to enter the regular army: as a man, between the ages of 18-29, and a woman between 18-26 (unless they are medical doctors or dentists, in which case they can be called up until the age of 38). Nevertheless, in the year 1976/77, only just over half of Jewish women in that age group were recruited, and it seems that the percentage has been smaller since, for legal changes on the procedure of releasing religious women from the service were passed by the conservative Begin government. The 48.5% who were not called to serve in the army can be divided as following: 2% were released for medical reasons; 0.5% for administrative reasons; 18.5% for religious and conscientious objection; 8% married before recruitment age; 0.5% were dead or otherwise unavailable; 19% was unsuitable for personality reasons or education. The proportion of women who are Israeli citizens or permanent residents and who do not serve in the army is even higher if we remember that all non-Jewish women (who constitute about 15% of the female population in Israel proper, within the pre-1967 borders) are not called to serve in the army.

Also most non-Jewish male citizens do not join the army; the few exceptions are those who are members of smaller ethnic minorities with a history of persecution by other Palestinians and considered loyal to the Zionist state. The women of the Druze or the Bedouins are not kept out of the army because they are thought to be security risks, but because, firstly they come from conservative religious backgrounds where it is traditionally believed women should continue to live at home until they marry; and secondly, the army is not interested in female soldiers under a certain educational level (unlike the case of men) which the overwhelming majority of these women do not obtain, even if their families would have been willing to release them for duty. Within the Jewish population, it is again religious-conservative homes and insufficient education, which leave about two-fifths of women outside the ‘universal’ recruitment of women to the army. The majority of these come from families who did not join the voluntary military forces of the Yishuv Those who did were mostly secular, of Ashkenazi (Western or Occidental) origin, and had a secondary school education. Jewish men who were not recruited to the army also come from the same social background, but the proportion who were not recruited overall however, comes to less than one tenth. Israeli law does not recognise ‘conscientious objection’ as legitimate grounds for men to be released from serving in the army. Those very few who insist are usually taken to prison for a while, and then released mostly on ‘medical’ grounds. Extremely religious men have their service in the army postponed as long as they studied in Yeshivot (high religious educational institutes) and often end up avoiding service altogether. By contrast, women are legally recognized in the security service law as eligible for release from service for ‘religious and conscientious reasons’. In order to be released they used to have to appear before a committee and bring two witnesses, to prove that they were religious (ie did not travel on the Sabbath and ate only Kosher food). In the coalition agreement of 1977 (which was later passed as an amendment to the security service law) it was agreed that a ‘genuine declaration’ of ‘religiosity’ would suffice, and the confirmation of a committee was no longer needed. (This step evoked a great deal of opposition especially from non-religious women, who were afraid that their burden, especially in the reserve service, would increase). It is important to emphasize that the release of women on religious grounds was a concession to the religious parties who had objected, to any females in the army for fear of their ‘moral corruption’. Women released from service were originally supposed to work in alternative civil service, but this has never been enforced and only a negligible number volunteer to do so, mainly in hospitals.

The second large category of women who are released from serving in the army are those whom the army decides are ‘qualitatively’ unsuitable. The qualities required include a knowledge of Hebrew, a minimum level of education and a certain level of performance in psychotechnic tests. (Anyone with a criminal record is not recruited to the army either). The release of soldiers on these grounds is much higher among women than men (as men are given, unlike women, an opportunity for complementary education within the army), but the result is that one fifth of women who are recruited are classified as ‘officer’ quality, in contrast to only one tenth of male recruits.

The third category of women released from regular military service are those who have already started to fulfill their reproductive role, women who marry, pregnant women (including those who want to have an abortion) or women with children, are all released even if they are in the middle of their service. Only women in the small professional army are allowed to serve when they have families.

The women whom Zahal does not recruit to the regular army (apart from a small extremely religious Ashkenazi group) mostly come from the ‘Second Israel’; the direct implication being that they should not take part in the process of social integration intended for their men. Zahal is far from being the perfect ‘melting pot’ which Ben-Gurion dreamt it would be. Class and cultural distinctions are well reflected within the internal stratification of the army. However, Zahal does (and before 1973 even more so) invest a lot of resources in order to educate and acculturate the men, for ideological reasons—but also to motivate them for the constant confrontation with Israel’s neighbors, which is rooted in the way both nation, and state were established. Confrontation and the small size of the nation have created a need for a maximum mobility of people in and out of the army under the slogan of ‘there is no alternative’. The demands of the army must be met with human power and investment, creating a strong symbolic identification between the people and the state, with the army as a major mediating mechanism. This close relationship was ‘purest’ in the Yishuv period when the voluntary character was greatest, although Zahal was succeeded in conserving it even with the great changes in population composition. Yet this mediating mechanism is largely between the state and men. Women constitute a minority in the regular army, a smaller minority in the professional army, and they almost take no part in the Reserve. While women do participate in the socialization process as teachers and welfare workers, the process itself is directed towards the men.
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

==============================================================================

Clerical-65%

Technical-35%

Figure 60564. Composition of Military Occupational Specialties To Which Women Are Assigned in the Israeli Army (1977-1978 data).

The female roles in Zahal basically belong to the rear. Once rear-front differentiation exists, even when the 'front' is defined as the field of the settlement and the 'rear' as its infrastructure, the front becomes the male domain and the rear the women's. Even the government committee on the position of women in Israel, aspiring to promote more sex equality in the army recommended 'to open all the roles, with the exception of fighting roles in the front, to women's service'. Since the 1948 war, women have not been allowed to remain at the front once an emergency has been declared, and the front actually exists, thus it was stressed by the authorities that the three women soldiers who were killed during the 1967 war met their death by staying at the front, disobeying explicit orders. The rear and the front do not constitute static categories; specific geographical or functional areas; they are redefined in each specific situation. Once the front expands, the rear follows suit and women will be allowed to fulfill tasks which were forbidden to them before, in order to release men to new duties at the front. There is a partial overlap between being at the front and fulfilling combat roles. Face-to-face fighting is both combat and at the front. But the mere use of arms, or driving a tank, is a combat role, although it does not necessarily have to take place at the front. (Thus women in the British airforce in World War II were gunners, but still remained in the rear, while women who train other soldiers to drive tanks fill a combat role, but one which is still a part of the rear functions.) The need for humanresources from within Israel's tiny population in the last few years has opened more combat roles to women, but this opening has not damaged the basic principle of the front-rear sexual division in the army. The length of service of women in Zahal has usually been 18-24 months, which is 4-6 months shorter than that of the men. They are then obliged to serve in the reserve army until they are pregnant, married, or reach the age of 24 (previously 26). At various stages, though, this reserve status was used more in principle than in practice, unless the women had a specifically necessary military skill. Some women do continue to serve in the professional army, but they constitute less than one tenth of its composition and are concentrated usually in the lower ranks. The salaries of female soldiers are identical to those of men at the same rank, as are their welfare benefits (although until recently, there was some discrimination in favour of male soldiers). Out of 850 military categories recognized by Zahal in 1980, women were engaged in only 270 (data from 1977/78 speaks of about 709 categories open to men and 210 to women). About half of these were clerical. According to Ann Blum, the actual proportion of women soldiers who were engaged in clerical duties was 65% while the other 35% were engaged in technical, mechanical and operational duties (Shuly Eshel, though, claims that the percentage of women in the first category is much higher). The overwhelming majority of military tasks in which women are engaged present a mirror image of the roles women mostly occupy in the civilian workforce. A major category of women's work in the army is, as in civilian life, that of office work. Here too, women are found in positions inferior to that of men from the 'mere consultative' character of the few senior women officers, to the common private, or even sergeant secretaries under male authority.

Another aspect of the work of women soldiers dispersed in the different units is suggested by the name of the women's corps—Charm. While the subject of sexual relationships is formally ignored (except in the case of a soldier becoming pregnant and the fact known to the military authorities, when the usual practice is to discharge her from the army), implicit sexual relationships are formally encouraged. A central demand from the women in the army is to 'raise the morale' of the male soldiers and to make the army 'a home from home'. During the basic training of women, they are coached to emphasise their feminine characteristics and their neat appearance and they receive cosmetic guidance to help them in this respect. In the words of Zahal spokesman, 'Chen adds to Zahal the grace and charm which makes it also a medium for humanitarian and social activities'. The emphasis on the feminine essence of the women soldiers immediately puts them in a position of inferiority to the men soldiers, inferring that women are there for the men's sake, to make them happier and make their service more humane. Office work usually expands beyond the duties of typing, filing or telephoning. Only in February 1981 the military attorney came out with a judgement that coffee-making and floor washing are within the legitimate duties of military secretaries. Power relations between the boss and his clerk are often translated into sexual relationships (again, not unlike the civilian life). Here, however, in addition to the common imbalance of power between boss and secretary, the boss has the added strength of his military authority. It is true that in questions of military discipline, women can be judged only before Chen officers, which may sometimes put a brake on the power of the superior officer, but complaints can only come from the boss, and unlike in the civilian labour market, resignations not accepted. However, when women fill jobs in the areas of education and welfare, it also gives them certain ambivalent duties and powers, where their feminine role is like that of a mother, rather than that of wife or mistress. The reason for women's reduced, 'rear' national military function, is that motherhood—reproduction of the future national military force—is perceived as their primary duty. Lesley Haselton quotes M.P. Geela [Geula] Cohen, an ex-member of the dissenting organization, Lehi [Irgun Gang] as saying: 'The Israeli woman is an organic part of the family of the Jewish people and the female constitutes a practical symbol of that. But she is a wife and a mother in Israel, and therefore it is of her nature to be a soldier, a wife of a soldier, a sister of a soldier, a grandmother of a soldier; this is her reserve service. She is continually in military service'.

It is not accidental that the attitude of the State of Israel to widows, parents and orphans of war is very different from that of other nations. Lea Shamgar shows how society perceives in their loss an active national contribution on their part which they gave in their own right. The State, owing them a debt of honour, attempts to reward them, via the Ministry of Security, by attempting to replace their dead relative symbolically and practically. The war widow accepts a salary from the state, with other privileges which do not bear any relation to the income of her husband before death, but are those of a senior government officer.
It used to be a common in Israel to say to a pregnant woman: ‘Congratulations! I see you are going to bring soon a small soldier into the world!… Motherhood—and of boys in particular—is definitely a military role. [–]

The Zionist movement first arose in the context of the problem of European Jewry at the end of 19th century and early 20th, displaced from their traditional places and mode of existence and facing the rise of modern anti-Semitism. It was only one of many solutions to persecution which were suggested during this period (others included immigration to the ‘New World’, Bundism, Communism, orthodoxy and more) and until World War II it constituted only a minority movement. The Zionist movement sought a solution to the ‘Jewish problem’ by accepting the anti-semitic assumption that Jews had no place in European society. This was done in striving to ‘normalise’ the Jewish people by establishing anation-state of their own. The appeal of Zionism at least until the 1930s was mainly to young, single petit-bourgeois people, mostly men, who could afford to leave their families and emigrate to Palestine, and as such was basically a male European colonisatory movement. Unlike other nationalist movements, the Zionist did not organise the people where they lived in order to gain independence and liberate themselves from the colonizers. Instead it mobilised its members to emigrate or to support others to settle in another country and conduct the struggle there. As a result, the Zionist movement developed an international organization, the Jewish Agency, which supplied the economic, political and human resources for its ‘spearhead’ in Palestine, and continued to do so after the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948. The community that formed in the period before statehood is known as the Yishuv. Although dependent on the rulers of the country (the Ottoman Empire, and from World War I the British Mandate) and influenced by the Arab-Palestinian sector, it developed into a highly autonomous entity which evolved most of the functions of an independent state: political, military, economic, welfare and even tax collection.

Jewish migration to Palestine, especially since the second Aliya (wave of immigration) was very different from that to other parts of the world. Rural Jewish settlements were also established in other places like South America and North Africa, but it was only in Palestine that there was a deliberate attempt to establish an autonomous Jewish society where Jews would fill all positions. Production (especially agricultural) was seen as the crucial factor in transforming the Jewish people into a ‘normal’ one. Jews were to enter occupations which they had been denied for centuries. Jewish colonization was therefore different from other colonial patterns: rather than making exploitative use character, in the essential sense that, it was never the country of its anti-semitic assumption that Jews had no place in European society, and no longer there (having fled, or been expelled during the war), but the character of the Jewish population itself changed dramatically. The immigration from Europe (210,000 in 1949) was then of refugees rather than of ideologues, while the overall majority of newcomers were not from Europe at all but from other countries in Asia and North Africa. People displaced as a traditionally tolerated religious minority (like the Christians) by the widening conflict between Zionism and Arab nationalism. These immigrants, the Oriental (or Sefardi) Jews, often arrived as whole communities rather than as individuals, with a cultural and political background very different from that of the European (Ashkenazi) immigrants. If their immigration was ideologically motivated, it was mostly from vague messianic reasoning rather than secular (or socialist) Zionism, but it has had a profound effect on the social structure within Israel. The dominant political and economic positions remained, mostly, in the hands of those who came in earlier Aliyot, through a careful strategy of control and distribution of those resources that had been allocated by the Zionist movement for the absorption of the immigration. At the same time, Israel was transformed from a primary colonisatory industry into an industrial capitalist one, where the Oriental Jews constituted the majority of the new working class. The Palestinians who had remained in Israel continued to be dispossessed of their lands and were under local military government. Eventually, in the 1960s they began to be integrated into the Israeli economic system, at the bottom of the working hierarchy. After the 1967 war, the Israelis directly ruled a great, and growing, number of Palestinians for the first time. The Palestinians in the occupied territories came to be exploited as a major source of unskilled labour, adding a more colonial flavour to the process of land dispossession which continued. Throughout these transformations, Israel has kept its Zionist character, in the essential sense that, it was never the country of its inhabitants alone, but constituted itself as the state of the Jewish people wherever they are. This is expressed not only in the Law of Return which gives automatic right of citizenship to every Jew, but in the continuation of the dual ruling mechanism of state and international Zionist movement. These continue to control large amounts of funds raised among the Jewish communities abroad and distributed into endeavors of importance inside Israel. One effect, for example, is that Palestinians are legally banned from membership of kibbutzim, because they exist on lands belonging to the Jewish National Fund (often transferred to it from the state which originally confiscated the land from the Palestinians) which asserts in its constitution that only Jews may live and use these lands.

The character of Israel has been also determined by the relationship between the state and the Jewish religion. Zionism has presented itself to a great extent as a modern alternative to the Jewish religion as a mode of Jewish existence. However, the detachment could never be complete. In the traditional Jewish way of life, religion and national culture could not be separated. The Zionist movement needed the Jewish religion to legitimize the claim to Palestine as Jewish land and to secure recognition within world Jewry in order to represent itself as the legitimate representative of the Jewish people inwardly and outwardly (as when the Israeli state claimed compensation in the name of... of the Jewish people from West Germany for the Holocaust under the Nazi). Moreover in a country which has never had a majority party in its Parliament, the Knesset, the significance of the smaller minority parties is enormous. The most sought after coalition partners for government have been the religious parties which thus wield power disproportionate to their size. The relationship between religion and state has strong symbolic elements (in public ceremonies and monuments) recognition and state funding for religious institutions and places of worship (including salaries), the enforcement of religious practices (kosher food and recognition of the Sabbath), and the autonomous operation of Rabbinical Courts in the area of personal law. For women the relationship between religion and state has had especially far-reaching implications. The one expendable political bargaining point has been equality between the sexes. The special characteristics of Israel as a Zionist State, Jewish exclusivity, immigration, colonization, constant confrontation, incorporation of traditional religious elements as well as the specific ethnic/class formation which took place during the process of the transformation of Israel into a capitalist society—have profoundly influenced the specific development of the sexual division of labour within the Zionist Yishuv and Israel. While many characteristics of this sexual division can be found in other capitalist societies, there exist certain dimensions and emphases which are specific to the Zionist mode. [=]

60566. Dayan, Arie. "The Debate Over Zionism and Racism: An Israeli View", in Journal of Palestine Studies, Spring 1993. pp. 96-105. In 1987, there was outrage in Israel when the UN voted that Zionism is a form of racism; when the UN repealed that declaration in 1991 there was indifference in Israel. Of course, the intervening years had seen Kahane elected to the Knesset, Rehavam Ze'evi in the cabinet (he sole goal is the deportation of all Palestinians from the Occupied Territories). Now in Israel, an Israeli Arab can suddenly find that his taxpayer records have been reassigned to the West Bank, according to some new, secret racial criteria. In almost every aspect of the Israeli government and Israeli services, there are 'Arab departments'. While in Israeli Jews frequently argue it is impossible for Jews to be racists, and that the Holocaust makes it impossible to be racist, others argue that there is no 'vaccination' against immorality. So the Israeli government is systematically forcing all non-Jews from one sector of Jerusalem after another, and is systematically forcing all non-Jews from the Galilee: this is simply racism. While Israel played a key role in drafting the International Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, by 1966 Israel refused to support the convention, since Israel policy discriminates against non-Jews for the advantage of Jews in every possible manner. Many laws of the avowed 'Jewish state' give special rights to Jews and Jews only: the Law of Return allows only Jews the right to immigrate; only Jewish communities receive certain kinds of government subsidies; and the Jewish Agency and Jewish National Fund are operated only for the benefit of Jews. However, Israeli scholars such as Prof. Yusel Gourani at Tel Aviv University argue that the Judaisation of Galilee, the discrimination of the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund are proper and legitimate. By contrast lawyer Avigdor Feldman simply believes that Israel has implemented a full apartheid system in the Occupied Territories: he cites 42 murders of Palestinians by Jewish settlers, noting that in only 3 Jews were ever even charged, with an average sentence of 14 months; by contrast, when a Palestinian kills a Jew, the minimum sentence is 20 years, and the norm is life imprisonment. Jews in Kiryat Arba pay 556 shekels on an income of 4000, while Palestinians in Hebron pay 2174 shekels on an income 4000. Meron Benvenisti simply notes the Occupied Territories have become a vast work camp. Discrimination against Israeli Arab children is systematic: 53% of Arab children live with more than two persons per room (2.8% for Jews); one Arab social worker for 5000 Arab children (1:1500 for Jews); 16.7% of Arabs fail to finish high school (5.5% of Jews), 23.7% of Arab children attend nursery school (53.1% of Jews); 14.8% of premature Arab infants die (8.2% for Jewish babies). Legal discrimination is the basis of the Jewish state, which was founded and factories.

60567. Deeb, Leila; WFS; Women's Feature Service. Press Release: Palestine: Arafat's Challenger Wants To Be His Partner. Women's Feature Service: IGC News Desk, January 12, 1996. 72-year old Sameeha Salameh Khalil has become the first person to run for presidency against Yasser Arafat. She does not believe, though, that she is running against him, but rather for the office of prime minister of the Palestine National Authority. From her perception, Arafat will remain president and chairman of the Executive Committee of the PLO.

The PLO, (the Palestine Parliament in exile which includes the Executive Committee and the Palestine National Council), has been allowed to set up an autonomous government under Israeli occupation. This government will be called the Palestine National Authority. The PLO will remain as a political organization, and the PNA will have its power dissolved into the PNA. Elections for the PNA will take place 1/20/1996. Though Palestinians call this a presidential election, Israelis see it as the election of the president of the legislative council. Altogether, 700 people are running for the 89 available seats in the PNC; 22 are women.

Some people feel that Khalil is too old to run for office, and criticize her lack of plans to back up her proposals. Due to this, even feminists, like Amal Khreisheh, will not vote for her. Khalil says she wants Palestinians to have total sovereignty of the land, but shows no method or plan of how to carrying this out. The General Union of Palestinian Women has tried to get Khalil to run for a different seat, such as in the legislative council, where they believe she will have a better chance of winning and will be able to direct her energies.

A major issue on Khalil's platform regards women. Khalil believes that society should strengthen women's positions by increasing their accessibility to the labor market and higher incomes. She does not want to accept any more vocational training aid from UN organizations, but would rather get materials and capital for income-generating projects. One of Khalil's own income-producing projects for women involves the production of traditional Palestinian embroidery, where fabric and needles are more desired than training.

Though she hasn't received a lot of public support for her political campaign, Khalil believes she will still win. [TEXT]

60568. Deutsch, Yvonne. "Towards a New Feminist Political Culture: Women Must Oppose the Principle of War: Part 1", in Challenge, March-April, 1991. p. 30. Since January 1988, we have been standing in Paris Square in West Jerusalem protesting the occupation. We have exposed ourselves to hostile reactions, taunts of "traitors" and "whores." We stood there every Friday, even at the most difficult times, when Palestinians' despair and helplessness led to outbursts of terrorism against Jews.

And now—war. And now—we are silent.

We have been living under the dark shadow of war for two weeks, an overwhelming experience. It requires all our emotional strength to hold on and to defend our children and loved ones from terror and madness. We are all familiar with the feeling of anxiety and disquiet which seizes us as soon as night falls. No less difficult is the knowledge that a Jerusalemite's experience of this war is deluxe compared to what those in Tel Aviv are going through.

There is not one word in the media that we can identify with. Alienation from the reality created by the rulers of the world and the male establishments is growing deeper. We are exposed to a cynical attitude which are specific to the Zionist mode. [=] bombardment, and pictures of Palestinians from the territories and the refugee camps in Lebanon, whose world was destroyed by fire Israeli lads.

Once again we feel like innocent victims. The pain of those whose homes were destroyed is my pain too. But I have strong reservations about participating in the "national celebration" of our self-image as victims. I will only join that consensus when I am convinced that the Israeli government is developing a real peace policy which the Arab world is not responding to. Meanwhile, peace activists from the Israeli International Center for Peace in the Middle East are defending the war, and Peace Now has denounced the European peace movements which denounce every war. I am convinced that the terrible experience of destruction and loss should be prevented everywhere and at any cost.

What should we, the women's movement, do?

So far, the only consensus we have reached has been on the issue of opposing the occupation. We must continue this opposition even now, while—under the cover of war and the popularity enjoyed by Israel—a cruel curfew is being imposed on the residents of the territories, destroying their economic and medical infrastructures. People have reached the brink of hunger and have lost their sources of livelihood. The sick do not receive medical treatment and people are crowded together in small rooms for many days, and risk being charged with violating the curfew if they venture into their yards. Now more than ever, we must publicly oppose the atrocities which nurture the existential threat of transfer, on the one hand, and destroy any potential for moderation and coexistence among the Palestinians, on the other. All of us must recognize the fact that Israel has with its own hands pushed the Palestinians into supporting a false messiah, Saddam, and therefore our anger and protest should be directed towards the policy of the Israeli government.[=]

60569. Deutsch, Yvonne. "Towards a New Feminist Political Culture: Women Must Oppose the Principle of War: Part 2," in Challenge, March-April, 1991. p. 25. As a women's peace movement, we must also reach consensus on opposing the rules of the game by which we choose to play. From our personal experience of pain, fear and anxiety, it is our duty, now more than ever, to publicly address the population with a clear message against war. Not only against the current war, but against the use of war, destruction and annihilation to achieve political and economic aims. We must come out with a clear message of opposition to the principle of war.

In addition, we must present an alternative to the ruling political culture by forming a women's political culture—a culture of peace.

Women in Black is more than a forum for political and personal expression, a means to fulfill a personal duty which cleanses the conscience and does nothing else. It must be seen, along with the other women's groups working for peace, as a movement that presents an alternative to existing political frameworks. We have the duty to adhere to values which safeguard life and are loyal to continuity. We must strive to create a culture of peace as a counterbalance to the culture of war. In contrast to the wall of apathy constructed by Israel, we must find ways to integrate into the region in which we have chosen to live. We must connect to the culture of women which exists in this region in the sphere of personal and family life, and which is relegated to a secondary role in history. We must transform it, in the spirit of feminist critique and for our political-cultural needs, into a women's political culture which will carry weight in the decision-making process in society.

Translation: Rayna Moss

Yvonne Deutsch, a social worker, is an organizer of Women in Black in Jerusalem and a founder of Women in Peace.[=]

This article is dedicated to the memory of Lil Moed who worked with us in creating feminist peace activity.

"It is a natural reaction to hate those who have made us suffer. It is also a natural reaction to inflict pain because one has suffered pain, and to justify it ideologically. In this small land both our peoples are stuck in a fatal embrace. I believe that our finding peace is potentially for the greater unfolding of life. In order to fulfill this potential, we all need to become more fully human which, to me, means activating our capacity to understand the suffering of others through our own, and to transform pain into healing." [A quote from an open letter (Jerusalem Post 1/14/88) to Bashir Khayri, who was deported by the Israeli authorities in 1/1988.]-Dalia Landau.

In 1/1988, a month after the outbreak of the Intifada, the Palestinian uprising, ten women, long time leftist activists against the occupation and in favour of solidarity with the Palestinian people, held a demonstration against the occupation, dressed in black, in a central Jerusalem square. Within a few weeks additional groups, of what is known today as "Women in Black," organized themselves throughout the country. At the same time in Tel-Aviv a group of feminist women activists organized slide shows in a central street of the city which showed the army's brutality against the Palestinians in the territories. The exposure to the realities of the occupation was important then, when information still did not flow at all to the media. [The Israeli government periodically closes off the territories to press coverage, as it did then and did again during the Gulf War, until the end of 4/1991.]

During that year several women's peace groups were established and at the end of the year, after a Feminist Response on the Occupation conference, in order to become a meaningful force in Israeli society, a nationwide coalition--"Women and Peace" was formed. [Women in Black, Shani--Israel Women against Occupation, women for women Political Prisoners-Jerusalem, Peace Quilt Project, Democratic Womens Movement, WILPF. Women to Women, Women for Coexistence and independent women.]

In12/1989, within "1990: Time for Peace" women--Israelis, both Jewish and Palestinian, Palestinian women from the territories, European and American women, and women from the Palestinian Diaspora--held a conference and peace march from West Jerusalem to East Jerusalem. They demanded an end to the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. They spoke out in favour of respect for human rights and a two-state solution--Israeli and Palestinian--and called on the Israeli Government to negotiate for peace with the PLO, the Palestinian people's representative. [The Israeli part of this event was organized by women and Peace.] This was a very big success and raised many expectations and hopes for a change in Israeli society.

During the third year of the Intifada (1990) Israeli women [From the Women and Peace coalition together with Reshet--Israel Women Peace Net.] were working together with Palestinian women [From three Palestinian womens committees; Federation of Palestinian Womens Action Committees; Union of Palestinian Working Committee; Womens Committees for Social Work.] for a joint political event that was to take place at the end of the year. The event was intended to be a political breakthrough creating alternative ways of trying to reach a solution to the conflict between the two peoples.

Zionism and the establishment of Israel as a Jewish state is regarded by many Jews as the political solution to the Jewish problem of suffering from persecutions. It became especially urgent after the Holocaust when Palestine, later Israel, became the homeland of many Jewish refugees. The ideal was to create a new Jew which would be the antithesis of the weak and helpless Jew of the Diaspora. In the process of shaping a common national sentiment and identity the Jewish people did not succeed at merging into the region nor becoming an integral part of it. The Jewish historical lack of existential security, combined with the history of the establishment of the state and the Arab reaction to it, made the Israeli Jews develop, again, a ghetto mentality. We did not succeed in freeing ourselves from the Jewish-outside-fearful mentality and no matter how strong we are in terms of military strength, we still hold an internal self-image of weakness. Today we are occupiers and aggressors but we feel as though we are occupied. This state of mind and psychology of the people, which is very well used by the politicians, makes it difficult to undertake protest activity against Israeli military actions, against the oppression of the Palestinian people, and to hold solidarity actions with them.

With the Intifada, one could see a sizable awakening in the scope of the solidarity activity and it was no longer the sole patrimony of marginal avant-garde groups. The majority of the activity was carried out by women, be it in the "mixed" groups where they had an important organizational role, or in the women's groups which were set up in the first two years of the Intifada. There are precedents for this political phenomenon of women's groups involved in peace activity--beyond simply the women's issues. For example during the War in Lebanon in 1982, a group of feminist women organized protests against the war. [Women Against the Invasion of Lebanon.] This development is part and parcel of a worldwide development of women's activities in favour of peace.

We can clearly see the influence of feminist consciousness which creates a new and critical definition of military. This influence was possible in Israel partly because of an increasing lack of confidence in the army that started after the 1973 war [in 1973 Israel was taken by surprise by the Egyptian and Syrian attack; confidence in the army's capacity to defend the State was questioned, the myth of the all capable army was shattered and this created a crisis in Israeli society.] and came to a peak in the war in Lebanon, which was regarded as a war of choice. [In Zionist history, Israel goes to war only when it has no choice because of the Arab states; in this case this dubious apologia could not be used.] Since the late seventies and the early eighties we have also witnessed the beginning of a new personal and cultural preoccupation with the Holocaust. [The breakdown of the Israeli heroism made it possible to deal with the emotional meaning of being the victims of the Holocaust.] The emotional aspects of dealing with mourning and loss create the potential to relinquish the need for compensation. The inconsistency between the inner self image of a weak and persecuted person on the one hand, and military power on the other hand causes the army to have, apart from the role of defense in a war situation, a further destructive role of compensating for the feelings of helplessness, weakness and vulnerability. The military becomes a symbol of the Jew's independence, a source of national pride and the main source for acquiring status in the Israeli society.

Five years after the creation of the first feminist women's peace group with the advent of the Intifada, a meaningful Israeli women's peace movement was developing. There are many explanations for this phenomenon but I will mention only two of them:

1. The main reason is to be found in our marginality and in our being outsiders. We are the "other" with respect to all that involves the army. This grants us our relative freedom to express our views since we are not to be found in the midst of the conflict of the men who "shoot and cry." [An expression which criticizes people who take an active part in the oppression of the Palestinians, yet feel that they have to justify their actions by expressing their personal hardship when applying those same oppressive acts.] That certainly also facilitated the development of a relationship with the Palestinian women who know that we do not take an active part in the oppression of the Palestinian struggle and that we are involved in peace activity.

2. The Intifada clearly uncovered the army's role as an oppressing force and as destroying the false but still believed image of the enlightened occupier. It strengthened the scepticism with respect to the morality of the army and brought to the fore the fact that we can no longer ignore the Palestinian problem.

Gates and barriers were opened and women of different nationalities, religious, class, professional and personal identities met and spoke peace. The meetings were moving and of a special quality and strength. During the Peace 3/1991 even the sceptics among us were overwhelmed by the power of the experience and the discovery of the special strength of women when they work together. However during the mutual process of discovery there were many signs of lack of trust and suspicion.

Our lack of existential security created a significant barrier in the process of bringing together the two peoples and this was apparent in the meetings between the Israeli and Palestinian women. Many women, even among those who protested against the occupation, have difficulty in feeling solidarity with Palestinian women or with the Palestinian people. The Palestinian men's gestures of satisfaction, upon seeing the deportees who were deported from a day's work in Israel caused confusion among the Israeli women. On the one hand they found themselves isolated by their own society and, on the other hand, they were recipients of encouragement from the Palestinian society. It is a difficult experience since the main reason for their protest is concern over the quality of Jewish society. Those same women found it difficult to relate to a Palestinian woman who recounted the horror of the deportees, who were deported because of political activity. The initial response was one of identification with the official military explanation, accepting and believing an anonymous response which is "ours" rather than believing that same woman who was recounting the story of her deported husband. "Clearly, they did something against the security of the State, otherwise they would not be deported.

Experiencing the increasing lack of faith in the military authorities is a painful process because we all were brought up on the myth of the defending and moral army. Women can say that they would have liked to be pacifists and at the same time recount with pride that their son is serving in one of the elite units of the army. To belong to the army means to belong to the people and State. And for many of us, being ex-refugees, or immigrants, it is difficult to undergo the process of cutting the umbilical cord with the Israeli society. It is difficult to discover that the feeling of belonging within us is no longer as significant as it was, and that perhaps for the building of a different and peaceful future we must also seek other sources to root our feeling of belonging.

The process of political and feminist consciousness raising and change of attitudes is linked to a painful process of questioning existential problems of self-determination, belonging, alienation, womanhood, manhood, the attitude toward the army, war, peace, justice, violence, and nationalism. These questions of beliefs, values and identities were open to the women, in varying degrees, according to personal security and self-identity, and according to our age and social class.

Political activity at the time of crisis of identity and values combined with active emotional dealing with those issues represents the oneness of the political and personal. We raised in the public consciousness subjects of emotional and political significance, and this is in line with our belief in the destructive effect of the split between the personal and the political, a split which enables the existence of the evil within us. Aside from raising the subjects of women's role in peace making and the influence of occupation on women's lives, we also raised subjects like racism, prejudice and fear as obstacles to peace. [For that reason and as women, we also must discuss our attitudes towards the army both on a personal and public level. This is one of the most difficult subjects to deal with and we had--so far--not dared to discuss it publicely."

Within this maze and confusion there are among us those who have a vision of creating a political culture of women--and we have to commit ourselves to a culture of peace.

Culture, or political culture, cannot be created out of a vacuum. It must have links with those aspects of the women's culture—that exist in the private sphere and the backyard of history—which are relevant for creating a peace culture. We have the role of exploring that culture of women and adjusting it to our political and cultural needs, while creating changes according to feminist criticism.

For example, in the ancient Jewish literature, written towards the end of the fifth century [Lamentations Rabba, which is a text of lamenting that was read and preached on the day of mourning for the fall of the temple. I was introduced to the story by Galith Hasan-Rokem.], we can find the following story: "Rabbi Shimeon ben Lakish said: God may be likened to a king who had two sons. He became enraged against the first of them, took a stick and thrashed him so that he writhed in agony and died—and the father then began to lament over him. He later became enraged at the second son took a stick and thrashed him so that he writhed in agony and died; and the father then exclaimed: "No longer have I the strength to lament over them, so call for the mourning women and let them also lament over them."

One can see a dichotomy in the response of men versus women in the face of loss and an unbearable, traumatic reality. Men tend to have anger that leads them to kill, while women are more capable of containing these emotions. The lament may contain protest, but we do not see here the outrage of the women in response to the terrible killings."

"Women in Black" has been the most significant protest movement since the beginning of the Intifada. In 6/1990 there were 30 different vigils all over the country. The choice (consciously or not) of the black dress can be interpreted in different ways according to the cultural context. According to the above mentioned story, and also in western culture, it is connected to mourning and lament. [Dalia Sachs brought my attention to the fact that in some cultures black is a symbol of strength.] But it must be pointed out that in our case, as women in black, we not only mourn over the killings, but we express our anger and protest about the occupation while connecting it to the meaning of violence and killing in concrete daily life. In the need to create a feminist political culture with which we can identify, and in the transformation of the role of the lamenting women to the Israeli culture at the end of the 20th century, we do not satisfy ourselves with the role of lamenting and containing the pain but instead seek ways to influence the grass-roots level and the political system as a whole. We do not settle for the social role of lamenting and of accepting the madness of killing. We do not accept the existence of a women's culture in the backyard of history, and are struggling for a change in which our world vision will be of political significance in the decision making. [According to anthropological research, in hunting and gathering societies there existed separate social organisations for men and women, but the men would not envisage going to war without first receiving the women's explicit agreement.]

In the different women's organizations, in the meetings and dialogues that have developed among women there can be potential for the building of solidarity and sisterhood among women.

Some of us see the occupation and the national conflict as delaying the advancement of the women's struggle in their society. However, a peaceful political solution is not only seen as a stage along the road toward cooperation between Israeli, Palestinian and Arab women, it is also one way of dealing with the role of women in our societies. The hope is that the joint experience between Israeli and Palestinian women will develop trust among the women of the area and will eventually lead to the development of a sense of common gender identity that will have a significant influence for social change in the region. We also hope that we, the women, will find the way to deal with the challenge of creating a peaceful life in the area. Today the national identification of both sides does not let us challenge publicly every issue that should—like the essence of war and armed struggle—be discussed for the purpose of creating a Women's Peace Culture. It does not let us work together on women's issues. A political solution to the national conflict is only a step that will free us from the restrictions of this reality. Hopefully, it will enable Palestinian, Israeli and Arab women to commit ourselves to non-violence, which is crucial in creating peace culture.

Following the crisis in the Gulf and the disappointment of many Israelis in the Palestinian reaction of supporting Saddam Hussein, the Israeli peace movement lived through a crisis, and the level of activity was lowered. At the same time, and also in view of the general feeling of helplessness regarding the political developments in Israel in particular and in the Middle East in general, the number of women in black vigils grew smaller. The political developments in the area also played a significant role in the development of the relationship between Israeli and Palestinian women. After long months of common political work, we not only failed in organizing a common political event for 12/1990, but our relationships also almost reached a dead end. A year after “1990—Time for Peace”, the world leaders started a war. We found ourselves prisoners of a war that is not ours. The culture of war—or militarism—had its victory over the culture of peace.

In days of war, because of the direct threat on Israeli, most of the women found it difficult to continue standing in the open expressing opposition to the occupation. In Jerusalem and Tel Aviv some of the women returned to the vigil only after three weeks had passed. During the war, more than ever, we had to go to the streets with our message, not only against this specific war but against all war, against the principle of war and destruction. During this time of war many of us had to spend more time with our small children. We tried to keep our sanity in the microcosms of our families and protect our children and ourselves from the terrible fear. We lived under the fear of destruction and were exposed day and night, through the media, to the terrible war which was used as a legitimate means to achieve political and economic goals. We had to take out to the public sphere the alienation, the disgust, the fear, the anguish and the effort to develop a culture of peace within our homes.

Since the war, the Palestinian people are going through new measures of oppression under the Israeli occupation. In effect the Israeli government has created two large ghettos for the Palestinians, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Exit from the territories is by special permit only; on the whole only those Palestinian workers who are essential to the functioning of the Israeli economy are issued such permits. And the territories have no adequate economic infrastructure to cope with the influx of labour, this being due to a deliberate colonialist policy over the past 24 years.

The Israeli peace movement (including the women's movement) still has not recovered from its crisis and there is a clear regression in the scope of the activities. Today (5/1991), only 11 vigils continue to stand every week and many women feel burnt out and helpless. During the last three years we have dedicated our political activity in Israeli society to changing attitudes among Israeli women. Now apart from continuing this trend, some of us think that political change will occur only under international economic and cultural pressure.

We are also looking for ways to continue our political relationships with the Palestinian women. In the middle of the month, an Israeli, Palestinian and International women's peace conference was held in Geneva. [This conference was postponed from 12/1990 to 5/1991.] But there is a strong feeling that in many respects we are in regression compared with the near past.

For the creation of peace culture inside the Israeli society we must deal both emotionally and politically, with painful basic issues, which the Israeli-Jewish society tends to repress, and which are connected with the establishment of the Jewish state. The exposure of the truth, as well as learning to deal with it, has to be a main issue in creating a culture which is supposed to be in touch with the needs of the peoples of the whole region.

The Israeli society should be aware of the price Palestinians paid, and are still paying, for the self-determination of the Jews. In the process of consciousness-raising concerning the meaning of the establishment of the Jewish state for the Palestinians, and their view of it as the catastrophe of '48, we must become aware of the fact that on the basis of this historical development, we have the duty to create a culture of peace in the area. It is not the right of "bleeding heart liberals," but the duty of a people whose self-determination brought destruction and pain upon others.

As mentioned above, the creation of the Israeli identity, as a contrast to the Jewish diaspora identity which was seen as humiliated and helpless, did not succeed in freeing us from our self image as weak and persecuted. The continuation of having an inner image of being persecuted and humiliated, while at the same time developing a militaristic culture, creating a feeling of belonging to the society on the basis of army service, and viewing the army as a "holy" institution, is a danger to our society's mental and social health. The army is not perceived by Jewish Israelis as a necessary evil in a reality of danger or war, but as an institution with political, social and economic power, which defines social values and priorities and forms the main origin of status and belonging in Israeli society.

In the present political situation, in which even western societies argue for the need of values of peace but have not yet chosen to... stop the reliance upon weapons, it is difficult to put forward a unilateral demand of destruction of all weapons and the investment of military resources in social development, although in the utopian political view this should be the attitude. It should very clearly be the ideological-cultural demand of the women working for peace, social justice and freedom. But it should be emphasized that women from the so-called developed countries should have the main responsibility for it.

It's in the 40 years of its existence, Israel has not succeeded in integrating itself in the region, and has contributed to the creation of alienation and hate between itself and the Arab peoples. It estranged itself to the development needs of the Arab peoples and the third world, and allied with the western world, which relies on economic exploitation of the "third" world. In creating an alternative culture of women, we must ally ourselves with the need of the peoples, in particular with the women's needs in the area in which we live. We must break the alienation and ignorance and get in touch with Arab feminist women and women's culture which is often hidden behind the veil.

It is a grave mistake of Israeli feminism to rely only on western feminism, which suits our personal self-determination needs. We, the women with feminist consciousness, must get in touch with Arab feminism and strive to create a feminism which will grow out of the region and which will develop itself from the women's culture existing here, and which will be suitable to the needs of women in the Middle East. We must stop turning our backs on the region in which we are living and we must break the wall of estrangement which helps the hate towards us grow. Our loyalty should be to the eastern region in which we are living, and we, the women, must be the bridge between west and east or between north and south.

I wish to express my thanks to Sherna Berger Gluck for her useful remarks and to Andre Rosenthal for the translation of the article into English.

This article is from Walking the Red Line, Israelis in Search of Justice for Palestine, edited by Deena Hurwitz, forthcoming from New Society Publishers (Philadelphia, PA and Santa Cruz, CA).

Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30. [t=]

Bernadette Devlin-McAliskey is a long time Irish activist and former Member of Parliament for Northern Ireland. This speech was made in England in 10/1991, at a meeting on "Women, War and Resistance--Ireland and the Middle East."

I like being called a community activist. I think it's a very important title actually. I'm going to stick with that one. It very much reflects the difficulty that we face when we are asked, what are our roles?

"Community activist" I think is a great word because it covers a multitude of sins and all our activities. My personal role in coming here is one example. Sometimes I just look at myself, knowing the plane's leaving and knowing the hundred and fifty things that have to be done before you get wherever you are going. Some of them include wondrously exciting things for conferences, like getting a copy into a paper if you're writing an article, but they also include making sure that your son's P.E. kit is washed, dried and in his bag because he's going to forget to take it to school if you're not there. Ordinary things like that.

It also includes a fear, a fear that all of us have in the back of our minds: fear when we're away from home. You don't know what's happening at home and you may not be away for a very long time, but you don't know who will be living when you get back home. You know what's happening, in that general term; you know the struggle goes on. You know that while you're away, people's houses are being raided, that somebody is being arrested. In the back of your mind is a belief that somebody's going to ring and leave a message to say that you personally have to go home. It may not be your child, it may not be your son, it may not be your husband, it may not be your sister, but it's going to be somebody's.

In the midst of that, with your hundred and fifty different jobs, when somebody asks you what you're doing, it's very hard to define--for the purposes of discussions and discussions and discussions and discussions--what you are. When people say 'what do you do in Ireland?', I can only say that I live in it. My life does not divide into compartments in terms of radical, active, trade union, revolutionary, pacifist or whatever kind of aspect of women's struggle I'm supposed to be involved in.

It is my life. It is the life of all the women here on this platform. In many ways at a certain level it's the life of all women; just all women struggling in any society to survive. But I think when you put your finger on it, if we're going to work together as women, to build coalitions, build networks and links whereby our power and unity can have effect, then I think we have to be very clear about a number of things.

Same War, Different Strategy: There are differences between all of us. So let's talk about some of you down there. And I think the first difference that has to be understood is that while we are all women together with a common struggle, some of us are women in countries which are exploited by imperialism and some of you are in the countries which are the imperialist exploiters. This makes a very fundamental difference in your experience and history and our experience and history. It makes a crucial difference, I think, in our conceptions of peace and war.

Like all the other women up here, I don't know peace: I've never seen it. My mother never saw it, my grandmother never saw it. It is a commodity that has never been available in Ireland. So I don't know what peace is. Just as city children who have never been to the country cannot claim to describe things that are outside their experience.

So when people talk to me about peace, I have to be very clear about it. I have to be very clear about what it is you're asking for. I know what struggle is. I know sometimes I think that life for us in Ireland has possibly been one long funeral over the past twenty years. When somebody comes along and asks me about 'Is there not a nonviolent way of dealing with this question?', I get very angry. I feel like hitting them with a violent punch in the face. I want to say that in a very sisterly way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad way of course; I'm not going hit anybody, but it instantly produces that in me, you know? These are words that are used, and somehow or another this question--that it has to be peace because it's popular in the broad
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

personally, but I think it's important to remember that there is a difference between us.

We are women of oppressed countries and when we talk to our sisters in struggle and to women in the oppressing country, when we talk about coming together to deal with war--which we all hate--to deal with building a better society which is not dependent upon aggression, it has to be clearly understood that it is not acceptable that we get a position half way between us, and you; where we can meet and be women together and do 'sisterly' things...

It has to be on our turf and I'm not saying that in any kind of sectarian or divisive way. If we are dealing with the reality of war, if we are dealing with the reality of oppression and how it affects women then I do not want to hear in workshops or anywhere else--because my patience has run out with it--I do not want to hear people telling me how one of the best things women could do is refuse to fight in the war, or that women could spearhead passive resistance to war.

If I choose because of the history of my own culture to behave in a certain way, don't tell me you know a better way of doing it. I am capable of learning for myself and I am capable of choosing for myself: If I want to dress in the manner of my culture or yours, that is my decision. And while you're at it, don't make an issue about whether my war, or my position is right or wrong.

You can do it, I think that's right. That is a luxury you have here in the city of London; it is a luxury you can undertake in the city of the oppressor but it is not luxury or token for us. It is not a luxury or token for any of our people to light candles in the streets of Belfast for peace because we have more important things to do and we cannot take the risk of someone shooting the flame out of the candle while we're holding it.

So the option of adopting that position is simply not open to us. If we want to talk about how women deal with war, trying to advise women in a war how they can avoid being in that war should not be in the picture. We can't avoid war; we're born into it. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

60572. Dickie, Peter. "Israel Breaks Promises on Prisoner Release," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 13, 1995, p. 1. According to Israeli sources, 882 Palestinian prisoners have now been released. Of those, 507 were political prisoners. The rest are non-political criminals. Sufian Abu Zaydeh, a member of the Palestinian negotiating team, commented, "We had agreed that the files of ordinary criminals should be handed over to the Palestinian police so that they could decide who would stay in prison and who would be released. The Israelis have acted independently." Issa Qaraqe', President of the Palestinian Prisoners Association, echoed this sense of betrayal: "The Israelis have simply broken their promises." He explained that while no exact numbers had been specified in the second agreement, the criteria for release had been very clearly spelled out and agreed upon. All women prisoners should have been released during the first stage, but the Israelis had reneged on this promise. Qaraqe' continued, "The Israeli side is interpreting the criteria as it likes." The agreement contained nothing about the signing of papers submitting political activity or expressing support for the peace process. Although the Israelis have dropped their insistence on the latter clause of the oath, they are still demanding that prisoners renounce violence by presenting them with a paper containing the former clause. According to Qaraqe', no prisoner so far has agreed to sign. The Mandela Institute also condemned the requirement to sign the oath as a violation of human rights. The women prisoners have shown solidarity by refusing to accept their release without the inclusion of the four women denied amnesty by Israeli President Ezer Weizman. It has been reported that the four demanded death sentences so their compatriots could be released. [=]

60573. Dickie, Peter. "No Prisoner Release Before November," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 6, 1995, p. 1. Palestinian women prisoners are still waiting for their release. According to the Oslo Two Accords, signed in Washington 9/28/1995, all women prisoners were to be freed, without exception. Since then Ezer Weizman, the Israeli President, has told Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin that "I will not issue an amnesty to those prisoners who killed Jews." Weizman was referring specifically to three Palestinian women prisoners Abeer Al-Weheidi, Rula Abu Daho and Mai Al-Ghussein. All are serving life imprisonment. According to the president to issue an amnesty to the prisoners of the Jews the Israelis could comply with the Accords. Realizing the difficulty of persuading Weizman to revoke his veto, Rabin settled for agreeing to resolve the problem in a Knesset session on 10/5/1995. But according to Abdel Khader Al-Khatib of the Palestinian Prisoners' Society, Rabin has since made a deal with General Ilan Biran, Commander of Central Division, that the ultimate decision on the three will rest with the General, since the women were originally tried and convicted in military courts. This deal was, moreover, qualified by Muhammed Abdel Hamid, Director-General of Press Affairs at the Palestinian Ministry of Information, who informed "The Jerusalem Times" that the Israelis may be considering an exchange deal, whereby, Israeli prisoners who had been involved in killing Palestinians would be released in exchange for three women involved in killing Israelis. While the Palestinian National Authority rejects the idea of linking the two issues, and argues this move by the Israelis would undermine Israeli criminal law, the Palestinian National Authority would not, ultimately, rule out such discussions. The agreement on prisoner release made in Tabia was that over a period of three to six months, a total of three thousand prisoners would be released in several phases, beginning with women. However, there were several restrictive conditions insisted upon by the Israeli side. To begin with, a proportion of the total would consist of ordinary criminals, rather than those imprisoned for political reasons, and were thus the crux of the matter.

The releases, Abdel Hamid explained, would take place in two stages. Yet the first stage was dependent upon a further condition: it would include the women, but would not begin until the beginning of the implementation of redeployment. When asked when that would be, Abdel Hamid replied, "Sometime in November." The second stage of releases should take place before the elections. The final condition insisted upon by the Israelis was that not a single prisoner who had taken part in a "military operation" would be eligible for inclusion in the first batch of three thousand releases. Their cases would not be discussed until after the elections, but before the commencement of the final round of talks, and possibly earlier. A new point of contention has, however, emerged. According to Abdel Hamid, any prisoner involved in a military operation since Oslo, that is, any Palestinian accused of killing an Israeli since September of 1993, is also excluded from the above list. The Israelis are not willing to negotiate at all on the release of such prisoners. Neither are they willing to consider the release of Sheikh Ahmad Yasser, the spiritual leader and founder of Hamas. As to the question of the release of those Arab pan-nationalists held in Israeli custody--mostly from Iraq, Jordan, Syria and Yemen--no decision has as yet been reached, though there was hope that some eleven to sixteen Iraqis might soon be freed. If they can't return to Iraq," said Abdel Hamid, "the Palestinian National Authority would welcome them here." [=]

If we want to talk about how women deal with war, trying to advise women in a war how they can avoid being in that war should not be in the picture. We can't avoid war; we're born into it. [Reprinted with permission of Peoples Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, CA 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

60573. Dickie, Peter. "No Prisoner Release Before November," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, October 6, 1995, p. 1. Palestinian women prisoners are still waiting for their release. According to the Oslo Two Accords, signed in Washington 9/28/1995, all women prisoners were to be freed, without exception. Since then Ezer Weizman, the Israeli President, has told Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin that "I will not issue an amnesty to those prisoners who killed Jews." Weizman was referring specifically to three Palestinian women prisoners Abeer Al-Weheidi, Rula Abu Daho and Mai Al-Ghussein. All are serving life imprisonment. According to the president to issue an amnesty to the prisoners of the Jews the Israelis could comply with the Accords. Realizing the difficulty of persuading Weizman to revoke his veto, Rabin settled for agreeing to resolve the problem in a Knesset session on 10/5/1995. But according to Abdel Khader Al-Khatib of the Palestinian Prisoners' Society, Rabin has since made a deal with General Ilan Biran, Commander of Central Division, that the ultimate decision on the three will rest with the General, since the women were originally tried and convicted in military courts. This deal was, moreover, qualified by Muhammed Abdel Hamid, Director-General of Press Affairs at the Palestinian Ministry of Information, who informed "The Jerusalem Times" that the Israelis may be considering an exchange deal, whereby, Israeli prisoners who had been involved in killing Palestinians would be released in exchange for three women involved in killing Israelis. While the Palestinian National Authority rejects the idea of linking the two issues, and argues this move by the Israelis would undermine Israeli criminal law, the Palestinian National Authority would not, ultimately, rule out such discussions. The agreement on prisoner release made in Tabia was that over a period of three to six months, a total of three thousand prisoners would be released in several phases, beginning with women. However, there were several restrictive conditions insisted upon by the Israeli side. To begin with, a proportion of the total would consist of ordinary criminals, rather than those imprisoned for political reasons, and were thus the crux of the matter.

The releases, Abdel Hamid explained, would take place in two stages. Yet the first stage was dependent upon a further condition: it would include the women, but would not begin until the beginning of the implementation of redeployment. When asked when that would be, Abdel Hamid replied, "Sometime in November." The second stage of releases should take place before the elections. The final condition insisted upon by the Israelis was that not a single prisoner who had taken part in a "military operation" would be eligible for inclusion in the first batch of three thousand releases. Their cases would not be discussed until after the elections, but before the commencement of the final round of talks, and possibly earlier. A new point of contention has, however, emerged. According to Abdel Hamid, any prisoner involved in a military operation since Oslo, that is, any Palestinian accused of killing an Israeli since September of 1993, is also excluded from the above list. The Israelis are not willing to negotiate at all on the release of such prisoners. Neither are they willing to consider the release of Sheikh Ahmad Yasser, the spiritual leader and founder of Hamas. As to the question of the release of those Arab pan-nationalists held in Israeli custody--mostly from Iraq, Jordan, Syria and Yemen--no decision has as yet been reached, though there was hope that some eleven to sixteen Iraqis might soon be freed. If they can't return to Iraq," said Abdel Hamid, "the Palestinian National Authority would welcome them here." [=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

In their mythologized personal-institutional memory, JDL members characterize the early period of the movement (1968-1969) as a period of heroism in the absence of fame. By 1969, members recall that every effort of the JDL was accompanied by vast media attention; after 1969 the JDL’s handling of the media was so sure that it could craft media campaigns into clearly designed "events".

The JDL was established in spring 1968 by a tiny group of Orthodox Jews to confront: (1) "crime in the streets", (2) "black anti-Semitism"; (4) “liberal do-nothing city government”, and (4) "changing neighborhoods". The undisputed leader of the JDL was Rabbi Meir Kahane (Executive Director of Center for Political Studies, associate editor of Jewish Press, member of Brit Trumpeldor and on the National ExecutiveBoard of Bnai Akiva; worked as Michael King with Rabbi Joseph Churba (rabbi and professor at US Air University at Maxwell AFB in Alabama) as ‘researchers’ under contract with the Air Force to fight the antiwar movement through their July Fourth Movement), although Bertram Zweibon (General Counsel, and president of Progressive Republican Club, chancellor of Knights of Pythias, member of board of Alumni Association of Emanuel Brotherhood at Midtown YMHA, and active delegate to National Council of Young Israel), and Morton Delinsky were also important at the beginning. Even as the JDL grew its members expressed a sense of marginality to the traditional Jewish establishment: Bnai Brith (founded 1845), the Anti-Defamation League (founded by Bnai Brith in 1913), the American Jewish Committee (founded 1906), American Jewish Congress (founded 1918), the Federation of Jewish Charities (founded 1917). The JDL founders (middle-aged and lower-class) and members shared disdain for the "establishment Jew", and would later establish the basis for the new goal of becoming the “natural guardians of the Jewish world”; naturally, JDL women accepted their role as inferior servitors of the JDL male race-exemplars.

The JDL first jelled during the New York City teachers’ strike, when the proto-JDL rallied to fight the attempt of the school system to bring more Black teachers in the teach Black students: actually, the role of the JDL was rather small in the actual dispute, but its first strident fight against "anti-semitism" was magnified in the retelling. The actual point of contention was the dismissal of 19 personnel, almost all Jews, who opposed a Ocean Hill-Brownsville school decentralization project. The JDL insisted that "decentralization" was a camoflage for anti-semitism, since it would replace a "merit system" in which the superior Jews would inevitably dominate, with a system based on the inherently anti-semitic premise that children of some non-Jewish ethnic group might benefit in any way from having teachers of their own ethnic group. The JDL articulated its response to this menace to the Jewish Blood/Jewish race by concluding that "the non-Jew eternally rejected the Jew but the Jew had become weak; the Jew had accepted the role of patsy and weakening." Later, this ideology would be extended beyond Blood, when the JDL became Zionist, by adding the demand for the "Land" of Palestine to become the race-home of Israel: thus, the concept of the Jew as the hated and persecuted victim race (many JDL members joined in fear of programs sweeping America) would become transformed into the ideology of the "New Jew" built on the unity of Blood and Land.

In 1970-1971, the JDL gathered international prominence for its anti-Soviet terrorism, an institutional transformation that further mythologized the early years.

By Fall 1968, the JDL listed over 1000 members; by the end of 1969 the JDL had 6000 members. The JDL formed chapters throughout New York City and many chapters were set up outside the city. The peak membership reported was 15000 in 1972, worldwide. Growth of the organization was ad hoc, and although there was some effort to formalize the organization, little of it was implemented. The JDL spawned a number of splinter groups (in Boston chapter head Marvin Antelman broke away and set up the Jewish Survivalist Legion), campus chapters, units in Canada, France, England and Belgium and an international headquarters in Israel. The JDL remade itself into a youth movement by 1970, and had summer camps in the Catskills in which JDL members studied weapons and anti-semitism.

The growing campaign of JDL terrorist attacks on Soviet facilities in New York, coupled with a surge in Zionist activism among Soviet Jews, led to an international campaign in support of the emigration of Soviet Jews to Israel, championed by the JDL (along with its front group, Student Activists for Soviet Jews), with protests in New York, Rome, Tel Aviv and Washington DC. In 6/1970, 30 JDL members were arrested for attacking the Amtorg offices in New York; in 11/1970 pistol-wielding JDL members in Montreal and an 11/1971 there was attacks on Intourist and Aeroflot and a Soviet cultural center; one JDL member was arrested for planning to hijack and Arab airliner; Dr. M.T. Mehdi of the Action Committee on American-Arab Relations was attacked. In every case, telephone called claimed the attacks and chanted JDL slogans; JDL spokesman endorsed the terrorist attacks but stated that there would be further such attacks. In 1972 JDL members attacked a Soviet mission with sniper fire, and a JDL bombing of the Sol Hurok Enterprise and Columbia Artists (which booked Soviet performers) led a dozen injuries and one death. Kahane immediately began to shift the JDL from a US-based movement to an Israeli-based organization in which aliyah was the central element of its ideology, replacing he now obsolete call to "stay and fight". In late summer 1971, the JDL opened its International Office in Jerusalem, and Revisionism was embraced (Revisionism was an anti-socialist Zionist movement that was explicitly modeled on Italian fascism). This new alignment followed a long period of symbiotic growth and development of JDL and Betar chapters in the United States, and represented a new rejection of the Jewish Establishment, now seen as including the American Jewish Committee, Synagogue Council of America, and World Zionist Organization. In 1972, the JDL undertook its first event in Israel, a march, joined by many young Jews (including many from Kiryat Arba) demanding Jewish settlement in the heart of Hebron. Although failing to establish a JDL school in Jerusalem, due to financing problems, JDL training courses in anti-semitism were established there. In autumn 1972, Kahane founded the Haligta Party, but failed to win a Knesset seat in the 12/1973 election. [Jewish Identity Center, Jewish Identity Movement] member of the Chaya was the scholar, or race ideologist whose purpose was to call on people to renounce their Americanism. The scholar of the Chaya was very consciously contrasted to the degenerate intelligence programs of the Anti-Defamation League or the American Jewish Committee. However, the structure of the Chaya squad made organization and coordination difficult, especially since JDL members were often contemptuous of bureaucratization. This did, however, promote further institutionalization of the JDL (fostering the movement in 1971-1972 "toward valorized collectivity"), and the transition to focusing on Chaya radically shifted the focus of each JDL member on making the individual decision to emigrate to Israel. Ultimately many JDL members would emigrate to Israel. With Kahane in Israel, the JDL members would re-characterize themselves as individual fighters; this would be emphasized by a motto at the JDL Identity Center: "Meir Kahane cannot be silenced for we are all Meir Kahane". JDL women's groups, one of the many sub-groups that emerged in the early 1970s, were restricted to "female projects". [Jewish Identity Center, Jewish Identity Movement]

60576. Donnelly, John. "Manhunt Frees Abandoned Wives From 'Anchors'," in Arizona Daily Star, November 20, 1995, No. A1, A10. Rabbi Shlomo Klein has emerged as the top manhunter in Israel in his pursuit of Jewish husbands who refuse to give their former wives the right to remarry. Under Jewish law, such women are termed 'anchored' since they are unable to marry again, and are unable to bear legitimate children. In one holy episode, Rabbi Klein identified a missing husband in Florida: he arranged for a Jewish prostitute to seduce and seek marriage with the man, and demand that he divorce as a precondition for marriage: once the divorce was made the prostitute disappeared, but the former wife was freed. He has stalked Jewish husbands from Australia, to France, from India to New York City, to the rainforests of South America, disguised as a Catholic priest, an Arab, or a newspaper boy. As an official of Israel, the rabbi has access to not only the court and police records of Israel, but of all other police agencies worldwide. [TXT]

60577. Downs, Jere. "Their New Life On The West Bank Is Worlds Away From the United States; They Were Raised As Arabs In America; Now They Are Americans Living On The West Bank", in Seattle Times, May 12, 1996, p. A3. [TXT] The Rasheed family, after decades of saving, returned from Washington state to build a villa on the West bank. The transition for their three daughters was especially difficult. They settled in Deir Dibwan, a village of 8000, mainly Palestinian-Americans; some 30000 Palestinian-Americans now live on the West Bank. One adjustment has been getting used to the arrogance and brutality of Jewish settlers, who routinely threaten non-Jews (the girls once had to jump into a ditch to escape a crazed, automatic rifle armed Jewish settler). As American girls, they never believed their parents' description of Israeli brutality, since American news programs on television always played down Israeli violence toward Palestinians. [TXT]

60578. Drew, Christopher. "How Donor With Asian Ties Knitted Access and Success", in New York Times, February 22, 1997, pp. A1, A8. Johnny Chien Chuen Chung (born in Taiwan, now an American citizen) has donated $391000 to the Democratic National Committee since mid-1994. His firm, Automated Intelligent Systems Inc. gave $91000 in 1994, $175000 in 1995, and $125000 in 1996. His photograph with Bill and Hillary Clinton grace billboards throughout Beijing for the beer company he represents. Chung has set up an import-export company with the beer executive Chen Shizeng. The campaign contributions come from the $3 million in consulting fees Chung has received in the last three years, his lawyer Brian A. Sun notes. Chung was very active in fundraisers, including a $25000 a plate fundraising dinner at the home of Steven Spielberg (Chung paid $125000 for five people at that party); Chung donated $20000 at a party-fundraiser for Clinton hosted by Lew Wasserman on behalf of his client Leung Chush-fat, a Hong Kong businessman. Chung also worked for Hong Kong real estate developer Li Jing Wei. Chung started to give contributions after meeting John Huang, but states that Huang never solicited money from him.

Answer: At this stage we are only preparing ourselves. Preparation is also important. We have no intentions of doing anything if we feel that there is no national consensus in support of the action. More importantly, we need the agreement of the rabbis. Without this we cannot move. Permission can be given verbally or nonverbally. We don't need an explicit word.
Question: In the event of withdrawal, will there be an attack against soldiers?
Answer: We are fighting so that there won't be any withdrawal. I am not willing to speak of withdrawal, even as a possibility. With the help of God, everyone will understand eventually that such language is only harmful. But if you are referring to our cell, we are doing everything possible to avoid arriving at that day. I also don't believe that Rabin will evacuate settlements. Rather, his method will be to undermine their foundation from a socio-economic and public perspective, to choke them. And after autonomy there will no longer be any Jews in Judea, Samaria, [sic] or the Gaza Strip. Then the Arabs will be able to establish their terror state without any problems. [=

Answer: Think what you want to think. The delegation members have a lot of enemies, not just from our side. And as you know, every difference in opinion among the Arabs ends at the point of a gun. It is obvious to all of us that the delegation does not represent the Palestinians. Their representatives are Hams; they are the ones who rule the streets. The whole story of the delegation is the imagination of the government, the Americans, and the PLO.
Question: Do all the members of the Palestinian delegation appear on your hit list?
Answer: Both the members of the delegation as well as activists from other movements. We can make the original attack, after which they'll continue all by themselves. No one will cry over the reciprocal destruction of Palestinians, just like no one gets upset about the killing of a collaborator. After they have finished killing each other, we will be able to find worthy partners for real negotiations for peace and living together.
Question: Can you elaborate on those people who are on your hit list?
Answer: First of all, we are not necessarily talking about killing anyone. An attempt on someone's life is enough for people to get the hint. There are a lot of people, and obviously we won't be able to get to all of them, and there is no need for it. We have to attack the ones who are the most prominent among them. I am not aware as to the direction of the other teams. As far as my team goes, at the beginning we considered going after Zahira Kamal, of the Democratic Front, or Hanan Ashrawi, but for the time being, she has a low preference and so we are working on something else now.
Question: Did you give up Ashrawi for any particular reason?
Answer: The truth is that from the very beginning we didn't feel comfortable with the idea of attacking a woman. This feeling became stronger after we followed her around for a while. Suddenly the target is

189
Palestinian Weekly, June 21, 1993. p. 15. Question: What do you have on Ashrawi?
Answer: This is the fruit of tailings which lasted for a number of weeks, between large intervals. I know, for example, which car she travels in, how many windows she has in her house, and even the color of her front door. In this type of work it is important to become familiar with the habits of the suspect; i.e., who are the people surrounding him?

Question: And what is your impression of her?
Answer: Surprisingly, she seems to me to be quite sociable, in contrast to the image which she demonstrates on television. She has a lot of friends going in and out of her house. During the first time that we tailed her, we sat and waited near her house for a long time. Nothing happened. Later on we realized that she hadn't even been in the country. During the next tailing period, we waited for half an hour, and then she came out. It was the first time that I saw her in flesh and blood, and to tell the truth, I was really excited. I remember that there was a mist on the lens of the binoculars from all the perspiration.

Question: And you didn't have any confrontations with her security people?
Answer: What security people? We never saw them at all. . . .

[=]

Answer: The press makes me laugh when it comes to this issue. Every week there is another article about settlers buying guns illegally. This is nonsense. Every settler has a license and can get a gun. And most of them have. Others get weapons from the army.

Question: But if you are planning to carry out an attack without leaving a trace, the only way is to get illegal weapons that aren't registered in your names.
Answer: Look, none of us has any dealings with criminals who sell stolen weapons. We don't know any, and we aren't interested in being in contact with such people. Today they sell to you, tomorrow they sell to the Arabs. Aside from this, anyone who tries to buy weapons from a criminal will be quickly caught by the Shabak, because every criminal will eventually get caught. And we know about the kind of deals the Shabak makes with them. They are the last ones to keep a secret. . . .

Question: Tell me about your armed training.
Answer: For years this control was enforced by the hermetic closure of the Arab educational system. There were many instances in which qualified young people who were suspected of certain political activity or involvement were not hired as teachers. (Even now it is unclear where 25 percent of Arab 3-year-olds attend kindergarten, as opposed to 96 percent of Jewish children of the same age. The situation is only exacerbated by the shortage of teachers and the poor physical condition of the schools. The significance of this bleak picture is no longer in doubt.

Yet only part of the problem can be described in terms of figures and statistics. It is important to remember that there are additional, no less important problems afflicting Arab education. The educational system in the Arab sector is a primary means for state control over the Arab population. The control exercised is ideological and educational in character and is enforced through "intellectual terrorism" (as defined by the late Dr. Sami Mari). The basic motivation for this control is an intense suspicion, lack of trust, and refusal to accept the capability of Arabs in Israel to make their own decisions as to the content and quality of their children's education. For many years this "intellectual terrorism" consisted of creating an atmosphere of fear and intimidation so as to discourage free expression by teachers whose opinions did not coincide with those of the mainstream Israeli establishment.

The objectives of Arab education, which even now remain poorly defined by the state, are designed to answer the needs of the Jewish majority at the expense of the Arab minority. The Ministry of Education's underlying policy regarding educational content is intended to enforce control to keep the Arabs loyal to mainstream Zionist ideology (and not merely to the State of Israel from a security perspective), and to impede any expression of Arab national identity.

For years this control was enforced by the Ministry of Education's underlying policy regarding educational content is intended to enforce control to keep the Arabs loyal to mainstream Zionist ideology (and not merely to the State of Israel from a security perspective), and to impede any expression of Arab national identity. The Ministry of Education's underlying policy regarding educational content is intended to enforce control to keep the Arabs loyal to mainstream Zionist ideology (and not merely to the State of Israel from a security perspective), and to impede any expression of Arab national identity.

60584. Eady, Elias. "Working On Both Fronts: Part 2", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 20. The principle function of most of the key figures responsible for Arab education is the perpetuation of state control and prevention of change or new initiatives. The need for such control reflects the underlying suspicion and security considerations which prevail in the Ministry of Education, which envisions the granting of independence to Arabs in educational matters as a danger to state security.

However, the employment of control and repression is not confined to the establishment. The educational approach within the Arab family and school (in ways quite unrelated to the establishment) is also one of control and repression. When the time comes that we, Arabs in Israel, want to define our educational objectives, we will need to ask ourselves just what type of person we envisage as the product of our educational system. Our society remains highly authoritarian in character and is unreceptive to self criticism. Teachers, parents,
The desired change can be brought about by working on both fronts at once: struggling against the establishment’s discrimination and control over the Arab educational system, and at the same time, working for change in our own norms of self-directed control and repression.

Translation: Howard Shippin.

60585.
Eady, Elias. "Working On Both Fronts: Part 3", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 39. In short, liberation from the state policy of control is a precondition for change, but is insufficient in itself, as internal societal substitutes can easily appear and accomplish the same task.

60586.
Efrat, Roni Ben. "Mothers' School Opens In Majd al-Krum: Never Too Late to Learn: Part 1", in Challenge, May-June 1993. p. 30. As I am speaking with Fatmeh, neighbors arrive. Among them are Amneh and Itaf, both of whom have registered for the school, and Najia, who is learning to read and write in another course. “When I finish my course, I will join yours,” she says proudly. A lively discussion develops. Fatmeh says that most mothers of poor students will not admit to their children’s weaknesses. “I am not ashamed,” she says. “What good will I do my child by denying his problem?”

The women have many complaints about their children’s education. Amneh finished four years of school. Her four children are poor students. They go to school “as laborers go to work,” she says. They sit in class and come home without learning anything, just doing time. “The teachers work with the good pupils and neglect the poor ones,” Fatmeh adds. “From year to year the gap grows, and the children just lose all interest and flunk. There’s no bigger delight than being proud of one’s children,” she continues. “And why do I have to boast of my learned brother, or brother-in-law? I want at last to be proud of myself!”

“So, we’ll see you in school within a couple of hours?” I ask Fatmeh. “So soon!” she exclaims, and rushes back to her dough.

Dawlat Khataileh, a mother of five children, aged 3 to 16, is 32 years old. She left school when she was 13. Her mother was ill, and Dawlat, being the eldest daughter, was the obvious victim of the situation. No one told her to leave school, but seeing as she was absent every two days to help with the housework, she did not see much point in continuing. "I just felt that this was what I was expected to do,” says Dawlat. Asma, her 14-year-old daughter, expresses what can only be understood as the views of a new generation: "Mom should have persisted. She shouldn't have given up." Dawlat is one of the lucky women in the Mothers’ School. Both her husband and children support the idea.

Issam, a teacher volunteering for the educational committee of the Mothers’ School, spoke to me about the high drop-out rate among schoolgirls: “They tend to blame themselves and say that they didn’t like school. But the truth is that in the old days, school was a horrifying and tormenting experience. Children were beaten if they didn’t know the answers. They usually didn’t understand the lessons because the material was totally irrelevant to their lives. Compounded with the economic hardships and lack of awareness from the parents, drop-out was not viewed as such a bad alternative.”

60587.
Efrat, Roni Ben. "Mothers' School Opens In Majd al-Krum: Never Too Late to Learn: Part 2", in Challenge, May-June 1993. p. 30. The desired change can be brought about by working on both fronts at once: struggling against the establishment’s discrimination and control over the Arab educational system, and at the same time, working for change in our own norms of self-directed control and repression.

The desired change can be brought about by working on both fronts at once: struggling against the establishment’s discrimination and control over the Arab educational system, and at the same time, working for change in our own norms of self-directed control and repression.

1992, the organizations began to discuss ways in which to overcome the low level of achievement in public schools while simultaneously involving the family and community in the issue. The educational committee from the Al-Baqa center started to prepare the groundwork on two levels. Following the results of the national survey, the committee sought to develop a curriculum that would upgrade the poor results in mathematics and reading comprehension. Through surveys distributed among the children, it became clear that there was a direct correlation between the parents’ educational level and the achievements of their children. From this finding, the committee developed the idea of training mothers to help their children. According to the concept, mothers who lacked sufficient schooling would be given the opportunity to return to school and become actively involved in molding their children’s future. The Mothers’ School was designed to include study of mathematics and reading comprehension, twice a week for a total of six hours, with instruction by professional teachers in the area. An additional enrichment program was planned to include monthly lectures, open to the community, on issues of education (learning and behavioral problems, the role of the parent vis-a-vis the school, etc.), and bimonthly educational field-trips related to different educational endeavors (such as Haifa University, Women’s Study Centers).
they must make a change which isnothing less than a revolution. Suddenly it wasn't only the responsibility of the children and the school but also that of the mothers themselves. Mothers who were open to the idea organized house meetings. Discussions were very lively, although many fears were raised. "At my age, going to school again?" "How will I get all my housework done?" "Won't people talk behind my back, hinting that it's something else I'm looking for?" "After all the effort, can I be of real help? Why does my son need an education if the only job opportunities he is offered in Israel are manual labor?" Discussions went on for nine months until the first group of 20 women registered, and suitable teachers were found.

On April 24, a modest celebration was held in Al-Baqra Center in honor of the opening of the school. Guests included the mothers who had registered, their husbands, and people concerned with education. Speeches were made, a play was performed, and the project was explained and praised. But, today, after the celebration, the hard work has begun. At one o'clock, fourteen women actually left their homes and house chores, all carrying a pencil and two notebooks (one for Reading Comprehension and the other for Mathematics) and sat on the benches, elbows on the tables. I recognized Dawlat, Anneh, and Itaf among them. Fatmeh was missing. Perhaps it was her bread.

1. Statistics regarding education in the Arab and Jewish sectors provided by the Arab Follow-up Committee on Education.

2. The Al-Baqra center, established in Majd al-Krum in the summer of 1992, sponsors activities related to Palestinian culture and serves as a community center with a progressive orientation.[=]

60589. Efrat, Roni Ben. "Rehumanizing the Expellees: 45 Days in a Tent: Part 4", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 8. Every evening the tent became an open forum. Serious questions were asked while sweet tea was passed around in disposable plastic cups. Should there be an appeal to the High Court of Justice? Should the Palestinians make their return to the peace talks conditional on the expulsion issue? People expressed their disappointment with the Rabin government and debated whether the Arab parties ought to withdraw their support. These evenings were attended by a broad spectrum of personalities, including Arab members of the Knesset, heads of Arab municipal councils, representatives of the Palestinian delegation to the peace talks, laborers who arrived from their villages after a day's work, rabbis, Jewish peace activists, and students.

A small generator-powered black and white television was turned on for all news programs and political features. The camp was granted media coverage during its activities.

In addition to demolishing stereotypes and suspicions on both sides, the tent became an address for all citizens who wanted to express their protest against the expulsions. A continuous stream of peace organizations and residents of Arab villages have arrived at the tent, bearing fruit, cakes, and food. Each evening a volunteer from "Women in Black" has arrived with a steaming pot of soup. The tent visitors' book was quickly filled with meditations, comments, and words of gratitude from the visitors. Many activists from Meretz have visited the tent and registered their opposition to the position of their representatives. One of them wrote: "As a member of the Citizen's Rights Movement (Ratz), I am dismayed to be in the midst of such dark times for which my party is partly to blame. Be brave and strong and know that most of the members of the Citizen's Rights Movement support your struggle."[=] 60590. Efrat, Roni Ben. "Rehumanizing the Expellees: 45 Days in a Tent: Part 5", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 9. The camp's around-the-clock activities (practically on Rabin's doorstep) and icy conditions were not so different from those experienced by the expellees themselves. They represented an act of solidarity and a challenge to Rabin's declaration that "I have no compassion in my heart for the members of Hamas in Marj al-Zohar." It is probable that Rabin's rigidity on this humanitarian issue caused the first crack in his wall of support. As television coverage from the expulsion camp continued, both Israelis and the world learned more about these "terrorists" who had been blindedfold and dumped onto an arid hilltop between Lebanese territory and the Security Zone. It was revealed that many of them were teachers, internationally known lecturers, doctors, merchants, and religious leaders, including the Imam of the al-Aqsa Mosque (the third holiest site in Islam).

Religious members of AJCAD, including the Rabbis for Human Rights and Christian clerics, contributed to the easing of the anti-Islamic delirium. In a joint meeting of clergymen, which was held in the tent after the Muslim Friday prayers, they formulated a common declaration, demanding that the expellees be returned.

The most effective way of breaking down barriers of ignorance was for members of the expellees' families to appeal to the public directly. On January 20, AJCAD declared a women's day of solidarity with wives of the expellees. Jewish and Arab women's organizations from Israel and the Occupied Territories were invited to participate. The mere appearance in West Jerusalem of some fifty wives from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, dressed in traditional clothes, helped to explode the image of terror and recalcitrance which has been affixed to Hamas. In a striking show of solidarity, hundreds of women streamed into the protest camp from villages in Galilee, the Triangle, and the Negev. It was a sea of white scarves. For many of the women, this was the first demonstration in their lives. Emotions were stirred when Ghada Jarar, wife of expelled religious scholar Bassam Jarar, appealed to the wives to be strong and weep when they are alone, not before their children. A week later, children of the expellees were invited to the tent to draw pictures for their fathers. About one hundred and fifty children came. For most of them, this was their first time in Israel. They sat shyly on the ground outside the tents, hesitant before the blank pages. With all the television cameras and Jewish activists distributing paper and crayons, how could they draw freely? But when they were asked to write their fathers' names on the page, the atmosphere changed. Thinking of their fathers, who would receive the drawings, enthusiasm blossomed. Many asked for another sheet to draw for an uncle, who was also an expellee, or for a neighborhood child who couldn't come to the event. The colors of red, green and black (the colors of the Palestinian flag) were in high demand and images of the tent and the Koran were prominent. Many women discreetly added messages for their husbands.[=] little enthusiasm: “Right or wrong, the PLO is what we’ve got, and we’ll support it.”

A blasphemous thought enters my mind: in whose hands does the fate of the Palestinians lie? - in those of the current PLO leadership, or in the hands of these bullet-scarred young men?

Translated by Stephen Langfur.[\]

60592. Efrat, Roni Ben. “Women Must Become a Political Force: Dr. Galit Hasan-Rokem - a founder of Women’s Network for Peace”, in Challenge, May, 1990, pp. 20-21. Last May a number of political academic and feminist women were invited to a women’s Conference in Brussels. Among those invited were MK Shulamit Aloni, Yael Dayan, MK Nava Arad, Prof. Galia Golan, Prof. Naomi Hazan and Rachael Oustrovitch. The organizer of the conference, Simone Susskind, also invited prominent Palestinian women, leaders of women’s organizations in the Occupied Territories and independent Palestinian women.

Although the discussions did not result in total agreement, far-reaching understanding was achieved, enunciated in a number of clauses which make up what later came to be known as the Brussels Document. As a result of the conference a new women’s movement emerged in Israel the Women’s Network for Peace (WNP), which led to a new level of cooperation between Palestinian women’s organizations and a sector of Israeli women close to the establishment. I spoke with Galit Hasan-Rokem, one of the founders of WNP.

Galit Hasan-Rokem is a poetess and a lecturer in the department of Hebrew literature at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. One of her latest poems is titled What Are You Thinking Of There, Maha Nassar. It was written while one of the leaders of the women’s organizations in the West Bank was imprisoned in the Russian Compound detention center in Jerusalem. It is hardly likely that Galit Hasan-Rokem would have written a poem like this before the intifada, and difficult to imagine that she would have immersed herself in such intensive political activity had there been no intifada.

“Like many radical women, my name could be found in countless petitions. I would also participate in demonstrations, but no more than that. I reached practical political activity only after the intifada: first in Women in Black, then Lecturers Against Occupation, and finally the Women’s Network.

“I began to develop an awareness that there was an urgent need for the situation to be changed. I looked for a framework which would not be marginal, which would be able to reach broader groups. If I had looked for a framework which suited my exact views, I would have found myself active in an extremely limited group.”

Addressing women inside the Israeli establishment on the active, because they didn’t have a framework suitable to their social situation WNP has focused on what may be called changing positions. Positions change at every meeting, every visit, every personal acquaintance with the violation of human rights and every personal contact with human suffering. Not that there was no access to such information before the intifada, but during the past two years, Israeli society has become ripe for absorbing the information.

“Peeking into the composition of the WNP, into the salons in which they meet, does raise several questions. Is it possible that the only thing that has changed is that today, being in the network is “in”? Perhaps what has happened is that many women previously hesitated to become active, because they didn’t have a framework suitable to their social background, and now the network offers them such a framework? Possibly. But this is not a sufficient answer. One must still answer the question: what has happened that Israeli women, who formerly would never have met or exchanged one word with a Palestinian woman, will now get into an Arab taxi and travel to a refugee camp in Gaza? Why was this not legitimate yesterday, and the few women who did it were called ‘Arab lovers’, while today it is acceptable."

One possible explanation, according to Rokem is the change in the attitude of the Palestinian National Council in Algeri (November 1988). “It is impossible to ignore the fact that the PLO representative in Cairo denounced the sabotage of the Israeli tourist bus on the way to Cairo. That is one side of the coin. Another contributory factor is the tiredness of wars combined with intensified longings for peace in Israeli society.

Another factor is the cooperation with the Palestinian women, and their readiness to work with us the way they do, their immense devotion towards developing dialogue and understanding between the two peoples. They are signalling to the Israeli women who come to the meetings, that it is really important to the Palestinians, and by that they strengthen the repudiation of the Israelis.

We have relations with Palestinian women who represent most walks of their people. For them, as well as for us, it is very important that there should be similar representation on our side. The aspiration for symmetric representation rises especially because we are speaking about political action for an aim which is both shared and the most dear to us - peace".

A certain tone of urgency is evident in her speech when she analyses the political changes which are taking place in Palestinian society: "The feeling is that if the political change they have gone through during the intifada will not bear fruit, the implications could be very severe. However", she adds with a smile both mischievous and confident, "I believe that there will be a political solution within the next few years. The moderation of the Palestinians' positions, the forming of a more representative and organized peace force within the Israeli establishment, along with international pressure, will begin to have an effect.[=]

Miriam Mari is the Arab woman most often interviewed in the Israeli press. This fact was a little discouraging to me. In my interview, I wanted to explore subjects with her which lay far beyond the boundaries established by the commercial Israeli press for anyone who is not exactly "one of us;" here she would probably be defined as a true natural wonder (the woman who 'did it') or as someone's wife.

Our conversation lasted for three and a half hours, and it was far from anything I had anticipated. When Mari described scenes from her childhood, she did so with pain and pride. When she referred to the present regime in Israel and to the subject of education, which is closest to her heart, she spoke with rage, mixed with a determination to struggle for change. When we discussed the status of Arab women in Israel, she exhibited an understanding and sensitivity beyond any I have ever experienced. When I entered the "Dar el Tifel el Arabi," a spacious Arab-style building on the border between old and new Acre, I found Miriam Mari busy arranging packages of books which had just arrived from the publishing house. They were part of an educational series for children about Ramadan which included poetry, stories, games and descriptions of customs. This series was born in their center, which devotes effort to creating materials that will appeal to Arab children, using their own language, their colors, and the smells from their mother's kitchen. This brought me to my first question. [=]

60594. Efrat, Roni Ben. Interview: "Building a Class of Women Leaders: Interview with Miriam Mari, Part 2", in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 19. Question: Miriam, you describe yourself as an educator, and you say that education is inseparable from politics. What do you mean by that? Answer: When we speak of education in its formal sense, we refer to its policies, its philosophy, its objectives, and to the way it shapes the character of an entire generation, for the present and the future. This is a very politically-oriented task. Every society has its own idea of where it wants to go. It is not by chance that every country has numerous teams of experts who sit and think and plan and check every word and every letter down to the last detail. It is correct to say that when a country designs the education system for its younger generation, a harmony usually prevails between the goals of the state and the curricula which it formulates for its students. But, in the case of a national minority, the matter becomes much more sensitive. The education which an Arab child receives in the state of Israel is not an "Arab education" but rather "an education for Arabs." In essence, these are two entirely different things. Education for Arabs is education which seeks to impress upon Arab children the idea that they are a minority. This is an education which has been deprived of its cultural content. It impedes the thinking of the student and empties words of their meanings. What Arab children learn is not relevant to their lives, either in a national context or simply as human beings.

For example, I read the following sentence in a Hebrew-language textbook for fifth-grade Arab children: "A young Bedouin woman fell in love with an Arab, and that caused her death." In one short sentence we have already determined that a Bedouin is not an Arab; the terrible threat has already been conveyed to all young girls; and Arab society has in fact been divided up into sects: Christian, Arab, Bedouin, Druze, etc. I ask myself, does such a text for fifth-grade children exist by chance? It should be noted that this book was written by Arabs - to show that Arabs, too, can adopt an attitude that serves the interests of the Jewish majority. Essentially, this is what I call education for Arabs. [=]

60595. Efrat, Roni Ben. Interview: "Building a Class of Women Leaders: Interview with Miriam Mari, Part 3", in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 19-20. The Arab history which we were taught dealt with the period before Islam, the Jahiliya, and with the Islamic era. We liked the Islamic period very much, because it was familiar to us; the names and stories were familiar; it touched us. But Arab history ended with the establishment of the state. Here begins the history of the land of Israel, and we could never understand what this place was. Did it belong to us? To them? Everything was one big enigma. The Palestinian issue simply did not exist. As a child, I recall an incident in school when were asked to fill out questionnaires stating our father's country of origin. I wrote that my father was born in Palestine. They returned the form - it was really frightening - and demanded that I write that my father was born in Israel. But he was born at the end of the last century, before Israel existed! It was clearly a political matter, but I didn't understand politics. For me it was simply a matter of logic.

And that was the atmosphere in which we lived. We grew up during the period of the military government (imposed on the Arab population between 1948 and 1966, ed.) We lived in the shadow of some abstract, distant super-government. It controlled our lives, and we were not even allowed to express what was our own truth. Parents were afraid, and teachers were even more afraid. This government was thought of as something very foreign and cruel, with many eyes to observe our deeds and our thoughts. Until 1965, we weren't even allowed to live outside the ancient walls of the old city of Acre. Beginning at a certain hour, we were under curfew; we were in a kind of ghetto. This is how it was and those of my generation grew up. And today, when I look at myself and at some of my friends, I see us as a minority which has succeeded, despite everything, in emerging out of the shell in which we have been placed and distancing ourselves from the message conveyed to us, both overtly and implicitly, that without the goodwill of the government we would not be able to bring an end to our passivity. We are some of the few who dared to test the theories against the reality and to draw the necessary conclusions.[=]

60596. Efrat, Roni Ben. Interview: "Building a Class of Women Leaders: Interview with Miriam Mari, Part 4", in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 20. Question: Is the "Dar el Tifel el Arabi" one of these conclusions? Answer: (bursting into laughter) Here you've caught me redhanded. Yes, I can proudly say that this center was established by women who have arrived at an awareness of the distorted education system and have tried to accomplish two things at the same time: to say, yes, it is possible to do things alone, it is possible to do them differently.

Developing self-confidence is not sufficient; it is necessary to impose upon our children an educational content which will be relevant for them. I always tell our women educators that the children constitute half of the present and all of the future, so we have a heavy responsibility. We are working to create a generation of self-aware and self-confident female Arab kindergarten educators. That is the only way they will be able to convey to the children a confidence in basic human values - in the respect towards the unique identity of every Arab society in particular. We do not foster chauvinism, but we certainly do seek out the best qualities of Arab culture, those same qualities which have been completely eliminated from Arab education. The Ministry of Education is not happy with the direction we are taking, but we are not willing to waste our energy on futile struggles with them. We realize that the Ministry's recognition of our curricula is important and can enable us to act more freely, but the recognition and appreciation of our own society for our programs is even more important to us. Our response to this need is our
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

Three centers for training kindergarten teachers, in Acre, Ar’ara, and Jaffa. [=]

60597. Efrat, Roni Ben. Interview: “Building a Class of Women Leaders: Interview with Miriam Mari, Part 5”, in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 20. Question: In your studies, you claim that in the decades since the Naqba [This term, meaning holocaust in Arabic, is usually described as the result of the 1948 war.] the Arab woman in both the city and the village has secluded herself, adopting a very conservative way of life. By so doing, she has strengthened the authority of the men, who were forced to confront the newly established Zionist regime. Can the withdrawal of these women be considered a form of protest? Today, in retrospect, how do you regard the results of their reaction?

Answer: It was more a natural response to what was happening in the aftermath of the Zionist occupation than a conscious political act. In 1948, we were faced suddenly with a foreign element which was unfamiliar to us. We Arab women were afraid of it and didn't know how to relate to it, so we isolated ourselves from it. The veil (hijab) was an example of this reaction. Many women who did not cover themselves with the hijab before 1948 have since begun to wear it. This process of strengthening both the family unit and male authority also sprang from the new reality imposed on Arab society. Families were divided and scattered; mothers were unable to be with their children; entire families were broken up. My family is one example. My father stayed here, and my mother and all the children went to Lebanon. Afterwards, when my father received permission to bring us back, my two brothers who were over sixteen were not allowed to return with us. They became refugees because they were young men. [=]

60598. Efrat, Roni Ben. Interview: “Building a Class of Women Leaders: Interview with Miriam Mari, Part 8”, in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 21. Question: To what extent is the Arab sector model of a women’s organization influenced by the model of organized women in the Jewish sector? And what are your feelings regarding the need for an Arab women’s movement in Israel?

Answer: Certainly, the various groups are directly influenced by what they see around them. I wouldn't like to speculate as to whether this phenomenon is positive or negative. I can only say that from my experience, if the influence does not undergo modifications, the result will be terrible. Our groups will become simply imitations and will not evolve in ways which suit our needs. I am not ashamed to admit that our organization, the Acre Arab Women’s Association, has undergone a similar process. Our group began to take shape in 1975. I returned from a stay in the United States, my whole way of working influenced by what I had seen and learned: concepts of self-realization and methods of lecturing. In Acre, we women would sit in discussion groups for hours, even though this was completely foreign to our tradition. It was total imitation. But through our mistakes, we understood and rectified the situation.

As for the need to unite all the groups of Arab women, to bring all the various groups together as one coordinated unit, that is unquestionably important. I am convinced that a moment will come when all our attempts to change the situation and provide answers to our problems will consolidate us into one force. We should never forget that a complete sentence consists first of letters and only later of words. [=]

Answer: This is a very difficult question to answer. I am drawn to Scheherazade, the mythical heroine of “A Thousand and One Nights.” The stories she tells the king are actually tales of confrontation between the weak and the strong. At first, notice is paid to the stories she tells the king. But suddenly, attention turns to the personality behind the stories, her astounding character, her ability to survive, her prowess in confronting the forces of tyranny. She overturns her relations with the king. The situation changes from one in which she is dependent upon him to one in which he becomes dependent upon her and her stories. He is captivated by her inner beauty, her imagination, her sagacity. As I see it, this symbolizes female inner strength, the creativity of women, their ability to survive, and their unique way of dealing with situations without violence. [Translation: Elana Wesley] [=] Abortion is legal in Israel under certain circumstances: if the physical or psychological health of the mother is in question; if the mother is not married; or if she is under 17 or over 40 years old. Under pressure from conservative forces, the Knesset eliminated a provision admitting “social distress” (e.g. economic hardship) as a legal justification for abortion in 1978. Groups such as Na'amit, the Histradrut women's organization, are now worried that the recent erosion of abortion rights in the US will be taken as a kind of precedent, encouraging ultra-Orthodox forces in Israel to push for additional restrictions on the availability of abortion. As it is, legal abortions must be approved by a committee including a doctor and a social worker; it is now being proposed that the committee should include a religious authority. Although the Jewish Halacha defines life as beginning when the fetus is actually born, Orthodox policy is against abortion at all stages of pregnancy.

Women with enough money can get (illegal) abortions in private clinics; the cost is about half of an average monthly salary. The less affluent are dependent on the committee process, and frequently must lie in order to get approval. Women are not prosecuted for illegal abortions (although doctors are, if an abortion causes injury or death). Within the Arabic population, women who have abortions are socially persecuted.

Neither the problem of "unwanted children" nor the issue of "quality of life" are much discussed; the general feeling is that childbearing should be encouraged because "we need soldiers for the army." Adoption is regulated by government authorities. While contraception is generally available, it is not encouraged by the government. Contact: The Israel Feminist Movement, 82 Ben Yehuda St., P.O. Box 33041, Tel-Aviv, Israel 61330. [Reprinted with permission of People's Translation Service, P.O. Box 14431, Berkeley, Ca 94712; Tel: (510) 549-3505. Subscription rates are US$17/year; Canada and Mexico US$20/year; Overseas US$20 surface, US$35 airmail; institutional US$30.] [=]

60602. Elharar, Yitzhak. Photograph: "Indian Orphans Find a Home [Malyankar orphans, aged 10 to 19, were brought to Israel from Pali, India by American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, where they were met by their aunt].", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, September 17, 1994. p. 5.[TXT]

60603. Emery, Lulu Dubini. "Letters to the Editor: Save Mount David", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, February 24, 1995, p. 5. I found it disheartening to read in your 1/6/1995 issue about the possible closure of the Mount of David Crippled Children's Hospital in Bethlehem because of lack of funds ("Donor fatigue hits hospital.") This institution has given hope and strength to many children whose lives would otherwise have been confined to a wheelchair, if they could afford one. What I find more disappointing is the squabbling that continues regarding who is going to run the place. Unfortunately, all this bickering is taking a big toll on the children who as usual are the victims. Even if this predicament is solved, there is a larger on-going problem that needs to be addressed. It is frightening to think about what is happening to innocent children born with congenital deformation or those who acquire the crippling disease of poliomyelitis because of the lack of vaccination. Some children develop these abnormalities because their mothers failed to receive prenatal care during their pregnancy. What I find encouraging is that a good number of these cases could be prevented if the health care system in Palestine invested in a full-scale program of health education and disease prevention. Preventive care is a right that should be mandated for every pregnant woman as early as six to eight weeks into her pregnancy. Proper nutrition, hygiene, social and psychological counseling, and detection of certain blood and heredity diseases could all be dealt with at early stages. Pregnant mothers, especially those in distant villages, should be brought to the prenatal clinic for early follow-up care. They might be enticed to come to the clinics by being offered extra nutritional foods: milk, cheese or other high nourishment determined by their initial assessment. Another way of making the visit more appealing would be to issue coupons that could be redeemed at specified grocery stores contracted by the health ministry with the agreement that these coupons be used strictly for nutritional foods recommended by a dietician.

Mothers should be convinced of the importance of prenatal follow ups by showing them printed or videotaped educational materials. They should be encouraged to have annual checkups after delivery to prevent uterine and breast cancer and other avoidable diseases. Caring for the baby should start while the baby is still in his or her mother's womb and should continue through childhood. Babies and children should have periodic well-baby checkups starting from two weeks and to continue at intervals of every two months for the first year when the intervals may vary depending on the needs of the child. Follow ups on the child's immunizations schedule would go up to the time of kindergarten. Numerous physical and mental retardation could be corrected if detected early. Thousands of dollars could be saved rather than spending it on handicapped children. Needless to say, the outcome corrected if detected early. Thousands of dollars could be saved rather than spending it on handicapped children. Needless to say, the outcome could be a healthier society. The health department should work in concert with the school system to make it mandatory for a child to have physical checkups, including dental care, screening for tuberculosis and a health assessment prior to starting kindergarten. I would highly recommend that a school nurse be assigned to every school. The nurse's duties would be to maintain a healthy population among school children. The school nurse would assist the doctor during his or her periodic visits to the school as part of the non-going health maintenance of the school children. The nurse would access the psychological needs of the children and initiate referrals as needed. Again, children and parents should be rewarded for compliance of the physical, dental and immunization follow up appointments. The types of rewards would be limited only by the ingenuity of the case provider. Not only should parents and children be rewarded, but also the clinics and the schools themselves. There would be acknowledgement of those staffs showing statistics of high compliance rates. Needless to say the biggest reward of all is to have a healthier and happier society.

In my humble opinion, I can't see how we can fill the classrooms with children and educational materials if many of them are unhealthy and unable to attend in the first place. How are we to expect adults to show up at work and perform up to standards if they are unhealthy? We need to start somewhere, with the little ones. They are the future, so let's make it brighter for them. As the Arabic proverb goes, "He who has health, has hope, has everything." [Lulu Dibuni Emery, a graduate of Friends Girls School in Ramallah and the Jordan School of Nursing in Amman, is a registered nurse in the Los Angeles County Department of Public Health Services]. [x]

60604. Epstein, Mendel, Rabbi. "Chained: The Agunah Saga: Welcoming a New Era With a New Attitude", in Jewish Press (New York), June 14, 1996, p. 8. The new government in Israel is like a new marriage, and advice for both Netanyahus' government and a new married couple is the same: (1) have a dress code (if housewives want to be respected they should dress like businesswomen); (2) control your rhetoric, calling settlers ‘dzeukin’ (insects) is not helpful; (3) institute education that will teach the civic virtues that will lead to the welcoming of Moshiacl. Yet, Israelis are being asked to forgive Arab terrorist Jew Killers. Mr. Rabin should study the decorum of Jacqueline Kennedy after the assassination of her husband; she is free to leave Israel. [TXT]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

world and by struggling together against colonialism, imperialism and Zionism, and for a world of parity, equality and a world free from exploitation and all forms of oppression. [=]

60606. Eslim, Abdul Latif. "From the River to the Sea—We've Got It Covered: Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation, Reporting from Palestine", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, March 24, 1995. p. 9. [Abdul Latif Eslim, a member of the Palestinian National Authority, described building our own television network, and every Palestinian should take pride in our accomplishments. In the past, we could not give an accurate portrayal of Palestinian life as there was no Arab television willing to reflect a genuine image. Whether the image of the Palestinian was distorted willingly or reluctantly, it hurt us. How can we now start to abolish millions of images of Palestinians that were formulated in the minds of people all over the world? The mission is difficult and the resources limited. However, we are determined to do it with our newly born, independent television. We have collected all kinds of Palestinian documentaries and films, some dating from the beginning of the century, in order to choose the programs that suit the current political situation. We realize that our new television network needs help. Therefore, we have signed agreements with various Arab television companies to provide us with programs, documentaries and films. We are keen to have films and documentaries with a cultural character. We are blessed with a professional staff capable of running Palestinian television successfully. Many went to European and Arab countries to undergo intensive courses. There were also some courses here in Palestine. We made an agreement with the American Cable News Network to let us broadcast weekly two minute news summaries from Palestine. We will report about events in the occupied territories to the American public. We are interested in participating in all Arab and international festivals. Our attendance at the Second Arab Television Festival held recently in Cairo was to get acquainted with various television broadcasting methods of farming gave rise to a strengthening of the merchant class. This was accompanied by an influx of European Jewish settlers that brought with them capitalist means and aspirations. Thousands of landless peasants were forced to migrate, looking for work and shelter in the cities.[=]

60608. Espśnioly, Nabila. "Palestinian Women In Israel: Changes and Challenges: Part 2", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 29. The proletarianization of the peasant class disrupted traditional extended-family structures. Dependence of the landless peasant family on wage labor increased, resulting in a strengthening of the nuclear family and a decline in the importance of the hamula. For the first time, Palestinian women became social/political activists and established charitable societies in the major cities; Haifa, Acre, Jaffa, Nablus, and Jerusalem. In 1929, after years of local activity, they convened the first women's conference. During this period, women from among the poorest classes were involved in various forms of militant struggle, especially during the revolution of 1936-37, yet mainly on an individual rather than an organized basis.

The increasing participation of women in public activities was cut short by the 1948 war which destroyed the social fabric of the Palestinian people, scattering them among the Arab countries and throughout the world. More than 480 villages were totally destroyed and 75 percent of the Palestinian population (750,000) fled or were forced to leave, becoming refugees. The 150,000 Palestinians who remained in Israel (40,000 of whom were turned into refugees in their own land) were forced to overcome the upheaval and survive under new circumstances. Thus began a process of great change. During the first eighteen years (1948-1966), Palestinians in Israel lived under a military government, undergoing further proletarianization and impoverishment. Palestinians were forced to leave their scattered family, and segregrated from Jews through the military laws which controlled every aspect of their daily lives. Large-scale land confiscation left the majority of the Palestinians without the basic means of subsistence.

Palestinian families struggled to survive under the new circumstances. Many men took jobs in the Jewish factories, thus constituting the cheap labor reservoir of the Israeli economy. Regarded with suspicion by Israeli society as a whole, oppressed in the work place, controlled 24 hours a day by the military government, their land snatched from under their feet, and unrecognized as a people with national rights, Palestinian men felt threatened and powerless. For many men, their response was a heightened adherence to the concept of 'ard (family honor). In the new threatening circumstances, Palestinian men found home to be the only realm in which they felt secure, and their family, especially its female members, to be the only domain in which they could exercise control.[=]

60609. Espśnioly, Nabila. "Palestinian Women In Israel: Changes and Challenges: Part 3", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 30. The difficulties Palestinian women experienced at home were further exacerbated by the hardships suffered under the military government, such as restriction of movement; here women were the most severely affected. Palestinian women lost the mobility hard work had earned them in previous generations. Owing both to societal pressures and military orders, women were forced to stay at home and were not able to participate in family economic production; the only domain that remained for them to play a role was the domestic sphere in which men asserted their power. Thus the role of former peasant women shifted its focus from an agricultural, productive role in society to a reproductive role.
within the family. This new role for women is clearly reflected in the fact that only one women’s organization, the Democratic Women’s Movement, was established during this period, organizing Jewish and Palestinian women within Israel around political issues dealing with peace and equality. (All the charitable societies which had existed since 1905 then vanished.)

Palestinians barely had time to adjust to the change brought about by the abrogation of the military government when they were faced with the 1967 war, bringing with it an increased demand for Israeli products and increased employment opportunities for women as well as men. This process led to a change in the status of women. If we add to it the renewed contacts with the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories and the impact of the Palestinian national movement and the struggle against the occupation, the result was women’s growing awareness of nationality and class-based discrimination against them, with a subsequent increase in political activity.

This increase in activity has been manifested in the increased participation of women in the labor market, the rise in their level of education, as well as their more active role in wider social and political life, especially after 1976. This enhanced awareness led to the creation of new women’s organizations, both local and national. Most of the national women’s organizations that were created were affiliated with political parties and were not fully independent women’s movements. On the local level, women’s organizations largely functioned as charitable bodies, thus continuing the bourgeois approach of offering help rather than organizing women to struggle for their rights.

In the nineties, we, Palestinians in Israel, are witnessing the beginning of new forms of women’s activism and organization which exist side by side with more traditional organizations. Palestinian women in Israel are trying to find ways in which to organize independently as women and tackle issues specific to women; they are no longer satisfied with their secondary role as the female counterpart of overwhelmingly male-dominated political organizations. In meeting this challenge, they are encountering the rise of fundamentalism and the ongoing societal conservatism which leads to gender discrimination at home, in the work place, and in the political sphere. This new generation of women activists includes mainly young, educated women who are promoting a new approach within the Palestinian society: i.e. women working together and independently on women’s issues. Such women’s organizations are struggling towards self-definition. Some, while clearly articulating their feminist orientations, still operate within structures which reflect the hierarchical systems they are working to change.[8]

60610. Espanioly, Nabila. “Palestinian Women In Israel: Changes and Challenges: Part 4”, in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 30. This presence of both traditional and “modern” women’s organizations reflects the changing and diversified consciousness among Palestinian women. While they may differ on the definitions and priorities they assign for the challenges facing Palestinian women in Israel today, they together face, along with men, the task of preserving their Palestinian identity in Israeli society, while at the same time struggling to be treated equally as Israelis. These seemingly conflicting dynamics make the situation of Palestinians in Israel unique.

Facing and dealing with this complexity is the main challenge for Palestinian women in Israel today. On the personal and social level, some of these challenges are similar to those facing many women in the world: the need for a new division of roles in the family; women’s difficult double burden of full-time jobs both in the home and outside; and the need for new systems of child care. Women must understand that the myth of the “superwoman,” both working outside the home and having sole responsibility for household and children, is impossible to achieve and that it functions to prevent women’s development and to obstruct their career. Palestinian women also need to protect their social achievements such as the right to education, marriage at a suitable age, and marriage to partners of their choice. Unfortunately, Palestinian society in Israel is witnessing a growth in the number of young brides.

Many Palestinian women who can’t handle the double burden leave their jobs or take half-time positions, especially after marriage. A disproportionate number of women work in unskilled labor, such as the textile industry, in small unorganized workshops in inhuman conditions, earning less than the minimum wage. Rural women, who are usually categorized as housewives, constitute some 80 percent of the seasonal labor pool. Although only 7 percent of the Palestinians in Israel are working in agriculture, 80 percent of these are women.[9]

60611. Espanioly, Nabila. “Palestinian Women In Israel: Changes and Challenges: Part 5”, in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 30. Palestinian women are, for the first time, breaking social taboos and speaking out about physical, sexual, and psychological violence against them in the family, including incest and rape. The concept that there is no rape and incest in this society is erroneous. Of course, in order to change prevailing societal attitudes and refrain from blindly copying western feminist models, there is a need to address and consider the cultural specifics of the problem.

Beyond the personal and social sphere, women should be encouraged to participate in political action - to make the leap from self-realization in the personal sphere to realization in the political and public domain, overcoming societal norms and attitudes. Thus far, women have begun participating in political activities and organizations, but largely passively. Participation at the more active level of decision-making has been very limited. Without making this transition, women will neither be able to further nor to maintain their achievements in the personal/social sphere.

Many of these political challenges are, of course, common to all Palestinians in Israel, both women and men, namely the effort to obtain recognition for Palestinian self-determination in an independent state alongside Israel. The other major objective of struggle, in many ways complementary to the first, is to obtain equal rights as citizens of Israel without losing Palestinian identity.

Palestinian women in Israel need to create new feminist models for conflict resolution, based on mutual understanding and respect, for the good of both men and women. And part of this struggle reflects common goals for both Jews and Palestinians in Israel, who should be encouraged to work together to achieve their objectives. Finding the correct balance between women’s struggle against male domination and conservatism on one hand, and the struggle against the discrimination and oppression of Palestinians both in Israel and in the Occupied Territories on the other, is the interrelated dual challenge facing Palestinian women in Israel today. [Nabila Espanioly is a clinical psychologist and the coordinator of Al-Tufula Pedagogical Center Nazareth Nurseries Institute.[10]

60612. Farah, Jaafer. “A Co-existence Organization Struggles To Continue: Two Neighborhoods for Two Peoples: Part 1”, in Challenge, November-December 1992. p. 28. During the last five years, Shutafut (Partnership)[1], in cooperation with other organizations[2], has coordinated a summer camp in Haifa for young Jewish and Arab children. Yet this may have been the program’s last summer in operation. Shutafut may be forced to shut down due to a lack of financial support - a problem which is not simply incidental to the program’s status as a Jewish/Arab co-existence project.

In previous years, the camp met in The French Carmel, a middle class Jewish neighborhood on the outskirts of Haifa. Yet during this past summer the program was moved to Hadar in central Haifa. Because Hadar is one of Haifa’s few mixed neighborhoods, sponsors of the program considered it a more suitable location. The move was made in order to resolve the problem that arose during previous summers; after the children returned to their uni-national neighborhoods, there was little opportunity to nurture the connections established during camp. By moving the camp, it was hoped that the children would continue meeting together throughout the year, not just within the framework of the program.

Most of the children who play together on the street or in the summer camp do not know that it only recently that Hadar has become a mixed neighborhood. Indeed, most of the Arab and Jewish parents of Shutafut campers would prefer to live apart. However, because very few new buildings are currently under construction in Arab neighborhoods and because many of the older buildings in these areas have been destroyed or condemned, young Arab couples have been forced to seek housing outside their traditional neighborhoods. Hadar was thus a very appealing choice, due to the decline in rental or purchase prices in the neighborhood and its close proximity to the city center.

Most of Hadar's Jewish residents seemed to resent this encroachment but did so silently, not through active animosity towards their new neighbors. Yet Arab and Jewish children playing together in the local school playgrounds and in backyards around the apartment houses brought the new reality home to the parents. According to Amir Mahoul, coordinator of the Shutafut Program, one indication of this progress was the fact that most Jewish and Arab families on the Hadar agreed to send their child to the Shutafut summer camp last summer.

Outside of Hadar, more and more schools and neighborhoods that were once mixed now have uni-national populations. For example, the Kriyat Eliezer High School was at one time an integrated school, but demographic changes took place in the early 80s. Eli-Motanai, the demographic make-up of Kriyat Eliezer changed. Once a mixed population, the Halissa neighborhood is quickly becoming entirely Arab. And Wadi Nisnas has long since lost its Jewish residents.[=]

60613. Farah, Jaaafar. "A Co-existence Organization Struggles To Continue: Two Neighborhoods for Two Peoples: Part 2", in Challenge, November-December 1992. p. 28. Most of those families who move out of Haifa's few remaining mixed neighborhoods do so because of the low level of community services which the Municipality provides. According to the neighborhood committee of Halissa, one of these mixed neighborhoods, the Municipality is reluctant to make improvements in the neighborhood even when residents pave the way with their own efforts. Several years ago, for example, the Committee organized a neighborhood campaign to help build a playground, to barricade dangerous buildings, and to clean up the streets and yards. When the Haifa Municipality refused to assist in any fashion, the Committee turned to the Nazareth Municipality, 25 miles away, from whom they received all the equipment and supplies they needed.

The spokesperson for the Haifa Municipality recalled this incident but claimed that "the residents asked to use the equipment on the Sabbath which violates the feelings of those who are religious." However, even this response pales in comparison with other statements made by other Municipal officials. In a recent newspaper article Mosche Statman, Assistant Mayor of Haifa in charge of education, contended: "Arabs must not be permitted to live in Jewish neighborhoods. Morally, it is better that Jews lose some money in order to sell their houses to a Jew and not to an Arab." These remarks are especially striking in the city that prides itself on being the symbol of coexistence between Jews and Arabs. Statman urged the government to set up a special agency charged with purchasing vacated homes before they are sold to Arabs. The Assistant Mayor's statements not only caused a furor but led to the cessation of municipal coalition talks with Ratz. Statman later denied making these remarks.

The changes in population taking place in Hadar have been followed for some time by researchers at the University of Haifa. In 1980 Professor Banuch Kipnis reported that between 1972 and 1983 its Jewish population declined by 17 percent. Twenty-five percent of the remaining Jewish population were retired citizens. Since 1986 there has been a steady increase in the number of young Arab families who live in Hadar.

The Haifa Municipality responded to the Kipnis report by granting a 100 percent exemption from city taxes in the first year for a young couple living in Hadar and a 50 percent reduction in their second year. Yet this policy was only implemented when hundreds of Russian immigrant couples began to rent or purchase apartments in the neighborhood and was clearly not intended to benefit the area's original tenants. Hadar quickly and dramatically changed into a heterogeneous neighborhood - young and elderly people alike, Arab families, and Jews of both European and Middle Eastern origins. Today, passers-by can hear Hebrew, Arabic, and Russian spoken when walking down any of Hadar's streets.

The Municipality was unprepared for the rapid demographic changes taking place in Hadar. In the words of Devorah Kalkin, co-director of Shutafut: "This neighborhood has practically no playgrounds for children or youth. No one assists the residents in obtaining jobs, nor is there a neighborhood committee. We are trying to fill this vacuum by assisting the residents to organize themselves to live together."[=]

60614. Farah, Jaaafar. "A Co-existence Organization Struggles To Continue: Two Neighborhoods for Two Peoples: Part 3", in Challenge, November-December 1992. p. 29. Established in Haifa over twenty years ago, Shutafut has a long history of working for coexistence between Jews and Arabs in Israel. The organization began its work by conducting meetings between Jewish and Arab students and teachers. Yet over the last few years, Shutafut has concentrated its efforts on community work in the mixed neighborhoods in Acre and in Haifa's Halissa and Hadar neighborhoods. As funds decreased and as demographic changes took place in Hadar, Shutafut redirected its activities to serve the needs of the area's older Jews, newly married Arab couples, and Russian immigrants.

Shutafut is providing an alternative form of community assistance. The summer camp is but one such service. There is also a youth club where adolescents and adults can hear lectures about cultural and political topics. Courses in Hebrew have been attended by over 350 Russian immigrant adults. And every afternoon Shutafut's four rooms are filled with children playing in the game center or participating in art classes.

During the Gulf War, Shutafut reopened its doors long before the area's schools. Since it was not safe to remain for an extended period at the Shutafut Center, Hawla Abu Bakra, an educator and activist, initiated the idea of constructing kits for children with games and other educational activities. Some 1800 kits were distributed to Hadar's Jewish and Arab children. After the war the children continued to come to Shutafut for after-school activities. A committee of parents initiated art, photography, yoga, Arabic, and Hebrew courses for children, youth, and adults.

Given the growing trend towards separation between Jews and Arabs, the primary challenge that Shutafut has taken upon itself is to create positive experiences in coexistence. One would expect that the Municipality would support the efforts of Shutafut, but until now it has provided little or no help. Indeed, if the residents of Hadar had their own funds, they would pay for a portion of the costs of the organization's activities. But given that most of the Russian immigrant and Arab families have limited resources, Shutafut must provide these services on its own.

Under the Likud Administration, the Ministry of Education did not support Shutafut's activities, claiming budget shortages. The Haifa Municipality has also refused to provide support despite the surrogate services that Shutafut provides. The New Israel Fund (NIF), which has been a primary supporter of Shutafut during the last few years, has also recently rejected its request for aid on the grounds that NIF is only able to support organizations for a limited number of years.

Shutafut's Board of Directors is working hard to obtain funding from the government and from foundations abroad. If monies are not forthcoming by January, however, the Municipality may achieve what some argue it is seeking - the closure, due to lack of funds, of one of the oldest organizations in Haifa committed to coexistence.

1. Attorney Rali Zreik and Dr. Devorah Kalkin of the School of Education at the University of Haifa are co-leaders of Shutafut. The organization currently has approximately 200 Jewish and Arab members.

2. Leo Baecck and The Israel Beautification Society. [Translation: Peter Lemish] J'aafar Farah is a journalist who writes for the Haifa weekly newspaper "KoBo."[=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

the Zionist invaders and the size of the huge destruction and losses, as well as the great material damages they inflicted on the South, its people, its land and the signs of life in it. These are the facts and figures about the aggression, but they are only preliminary figures, since they do not include the damages and losses in the regions which Israel handed over after its so-called withdrawal to fascist gangs, those regions where UN troops have not entered until now. Hence, these figures cannot be considered compromising a comprehensive a report that encompasses all the results left over by the war which Israel launched against people, houses, schools, places of worship, villages, towns, fields and plantations. In spite of that, they gave a clear picture of the Zionist terrorism which was exercised in the South. What do these facts say? The invaders manifested their racist, fascist hatred against peaceful civilians. It can be said they killed in their air raids, in the shelling of their tanks and in their collective massacres civilians only. They left behind more than one thousand bodies [Reuter News Agency quoted the International Red Cross, giving the figure of 1000 killed, but a UN report on 3/19/1978, four days after the war started, gave the figure 700 killed until then.], most of which were bodies of old people, children and women. A large number of these victims were not killed by air raids or shelling, but directly by invading soldiers. In the town of Al-Khiyam alone, they killed more than 50 persons including old men and women in one massacre. In the massacre of Adloun, perpetrated by a seaborne Israeli commando unit in an area not reached by the military invasion, 17 southern refugees, mostly women and girls, were killed, in addition to children whose ages ranged between a year and a half and 13 years. In Rashaya el-Fokhar, they entered a church and perpetrated inside it a massacre against the inhabitants who took refuge there away from the barbarism of the invaders.... In the village of Abbasiya alone, they destroyed the houses over their inhabitants, killing 140 persons. If these "samples" of atrocities give a picture of Zionist fascism, they indicate on the other hand the failure of the aggressors to meet face to face the fighters who resisted their invasion with courage. So they resorted instead to the killing of innocent people. These "samples" also reveal Israel's aims in forcing the largest number of the inhabitants of the South to emigrate, and in uprooting them from their land and villages. In the course of organized killing and terrorism, Israel committed a very large number of premeditated crimes, not only during the military operations, but after the ceasefire, and even after the UN troops took up in positions in the occupied areas. Most of the acts of torture and kidnappings to which the inhabitants in the occupied villages were subjected had taken place after the lapse of a few days on the occupation of those villages. Testimony to this is what happened in the villages of Ain Be'al, Bazourieh, Barashit, Nakoura, Bint Jbeil, Kuleia, Jibnin and others - where kidnappings took place, ending mostly in assassinations and barbaric torture inside Israeli jails. Most of the operations, in which houses were blown up and plantations burned, took place at intervals that followed the aggression. In Bazourieh, for instance, scores of houses were blown up after the lapse of eight days of the entry of Israeli troops to the village. The same case applies to Abbassiya, where 150 houses were blown up. After more than one month of their invasion, the Israelis were burning fields and plantations in Rashaya el-Fokhar and Khoraybe with their phosphorus bombs. The same things happened in Ibl el-Saki.

The thefts and acts of looting directly committed by the Israelis are but evidence of Zionist "civilization." Those acts took such wide proportions that even the Israeli news media could not keep silent on them. And in their attempt to minimize these scandals, "Haartz" newspaper published in Tel Aviv says, "The Israeli soldiers looted moderately... they only stole whatever their pockets and sacks could take, such as transistor radios, small valuables and old relics.... As to big thefts," Haarts says, "they were committed by unruly and undisciplined elements from the rear units." So the front units were for killing and massacres, and the rear units were for theft and looting. In the case of scores of trucks loaded with stolen goods and with "big" thefts, there were some that belonged to high ranking officers of the Israeli army. The "scooched earth" policy applied by Israel in the areas of the occupied South was clearly demonstrated by: complete disappearance of villages from geographical existence, and the elimination of all their landmarks, such as Ghandourieh, Abbassiya, Izziyeh, Kantara, Deir Hanna, Bayyada and others. - complete and premeditated destruction of more than 2500 houses and partial destruction of more than 6200 houses. - complete destruction of more than 50 schools, and damaging and looting of all the schools in other villages that fell into the enemy's hands. - damaging and putting out of operation 10 hospitals and medical centers, including the comprehensive hospitals which existed in the undeveloped South, which was always disregarded by the Lebanese State. - destruction of olive presses and fuel stations and other installations, especially water and electricity networks. In the several villages, the invaders closed down artesian wells after looting their motors in addition to water pipes. - destruction and looting of more than 20 places of worship, including churches, mosques and (Shiite) Husseiniyas. In the course of this policy, Israel undertook to change the landmarks of South Lebanon, graphically and from the inhabitants' point of view, either by constructing military roads for its vehicles on the remains of obliterated villages, or by building airports for its military helicopters, or by setting up emplacements for its artillery and military bases in place of trees and plantations.

The losses which the Israeli invasion caused to the agricultural wealth of the South exceeds, according to preliminary estimates and figures, one billion Lebanese pounds. For in addition to damaging tens of thousands of dunums of cultivated land and to damaging and destroying more than 15000 olive, almond, fig, orange and banana trees, the invading troops bulldozed and destroyed large areas of cultivable land in a way that made the land quite unusable. These results which the Israeli invasion made a point of achieving, including the emigration and dispersal of more than 27000 refugees, reveal Israel's final objectives in turning the South into an uninhabited region, making it lose its national identity in order to facilitate Israeli expansionist ambitions. In the following pages, there are statements and figures about the losses and damages based on an investigation made by a mission from the Lebanese "An Nidaa" newspaper that visited the South, on a report by the Higher Relief Committee (set up by the Lebanese government in 1975to relieve and help the victims of the Lebanese civil war), on a report by the UN Office for Refugee Affairs, and also on certain statements and figures released by the International Red Cross Committee in Lebanon. [1]

60616. Farhat, Albert [compiler]; Saleh, Hanna [compiler]. Sun Rises from the South: The Israeli Aggression Against South Lebanon, Facts and Testimony: Testimony. Beirut, 1978. p. 16-17, 22-23. Munira Saleh, a refugee from Hani: "A woman, in her seventh month of pregnancy, was killed with a bayonet piercing her stomach. And an old man was burned after he was wrapped in blankets." ("An Nidaa" newspaper, 3/22/1978) Hassan, a 12-year old boy from Bint Jbeil: "I saw our house on fire and my comrade in school dying in front of me. I ran away without taking anything with me. I left behind my books and my toys, my bed and my desk." ("L'Orient-Le Jour" newspaper, interviewed by Desiree Alki, 4/12/1978) David Hirst, correspondent of the "Guardian" newspaper writes: "...Israeli soldiers were talking to me and to my colleague of the United Press and the 'Voice of America' softly and gently. Then they became criminal and vicious when they saw one villager shaking. It seems that to the Israelis everyone is a disguised terrorist. The officer in charge of the soldiers asked us, 'Were there any civilians killed during the shelling?' So we pointed our fingers towards a village under whose debris an old woman was lying. We answered him that only civilians had been killed; all who had been killed were civilians." Captain Ouzi Dayan, relative of the Israeli Foreign Minister, replied when he heard our story, 'I don't like to tell you this, but I was the one who gave the order to shell the school,' and he pointed to a Centurion tank and said, "This is the tank which shelled from a distance of 1200 meters." (David Hirst in a report from the village of Hedatha to the "Guardian") Khalil Abu Zeid, a refugee from Zawtar: "The planes were shelling Taybeh and after that we could only see thick clouds of smoke covering the sky of the region. My son was looking after our three cows, and the enemy rained on him with 500 mm automatic fire. He was saved as if by miracle. The enemy also directed its fire against children running in the village’s square. I saw with my own eyes 5 civilian cars running on the Alman road northwards. Israeli planes chased them and fired their shells at them, killing all their 40 passengers.” ("As Safir" newspaper, 3/25/1978)

Youssef Saadeh, Mukhtar (headman) of Ibl el-Saki, says, "What can I say as you can see they have left nothing. They broke down the school and pulled the church. The old woman lies in finding the time to destroy more dunums) and dug trenches around the village (also about 10 dunums). In any case, whatever we do we still support the joint forces and are proud of them.... But why did they destroy the school...this is the teacher standing here. Ask him how the school was." The school teacher said, "The school was one of the best government schools in the region, and had 325 students enrolled. Its large library was looted and not a single book left in it... This is a shame." The Mukhtar then began speaking again: "We lost 20000 olive trees...what a loss! The age of every tree was not less than 50 years and some of the trees were 400 years old. The more the olive tree gets older the more fruit it bears." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/21/1978) "Aziz Hawi from Sarifa (15 years) said, "The Israelis were throwing down ‘reservoirs’ which would explode. They threw down pens and exploding toys. When Kamal el-Din, who is of my age, picked up a toy, shining like gold, it exploded in his hands, and he was killed in his leg and eyes. Hussein Awad was also hit and had a broken leg. So was Ali Eid (10 years) and his condition is grave." (Testimony received by Zahra Mirl of "An Nida" newspaper, 3/20/1978)

The correspondent of "An Nahar" newspaper Sa'id Meallawi: "Rashaya el-Fokhar was subjected to a total annihilation attempt. Neither the people, nor the church or houses or trees were saved. What the airforce’s shells forgot, the Israeli bulldozers remembered, and wiped out the towns landmarks. There is no road to Rashaya and anyone going there should infiltrate. Mountainous paths are not easy to cross. Anyone entering Rashaa would have to pass along the cemetery path where the dead bodies’ smell spreads, and where some bodies appear wrapped in blankets. They are thought to belong to the victims of the church shelling two days before the occupation. After that, you see a destroyed jeep left over by the Israelis near the fountain at the entrance of the town. You see the traces of the battles and the remains of artillery shells and certain roadblocks.... The asphalted road is filled with debris, while commercial stores and even complete streets have disappeared. Even churches were looted and shelled and electricity poles stretched on the street far away from their positions." ("An Nahar" newspaper, 4/17/1978)

Suleiman Sheddis says, "In Ibl el-Saki there are 300 houses, 90 of which have become uninhabitable. Most of them have brick roofs; 100 houses were either mined or blown up, and the rest destroyed. Ibl el-Saki used to yield a yearly crop of 100 oil Kantars. The olives and the oil are gone, and 3 artisan wells are out of use." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/21/1978) Wafika Hammoud told us, "They were not satisfied with destroying, but they bulldozed the ruins. They want to hide the traces of their crimes. We lost four killed. Three of my nephews were taken away to Israel, and we know nothing about them." ("An Nida" newspaper, 4/25/1978) Weizmann's testimony: Eizer Weizmann, the Israeli Defense Minister, told Knesset members of the Halkoud bloc during a heated session on 3/21/1978, in the wake of the criticism directed against the failure of this war: "The war in South Lebanon developed in a way from the town of Bint Jebeil said,"I was surprised. I didn't know it was under the deris after their house fell on them. The Israeli shelling from river course. This took place in the presence of the UN troops. (Report from Jamila Hussein in Hasbaya to "An Nida," 5/27/1978) Massoud Jarada (75 years, Rashaya el-Fokhar, said, "On the morning of 3/15/1978, the Israeli attack began. I went out with my wife and the town's inhabitants to take refuge in the church, hoping Israel would not shell places of worship. What happened was that the shelling was concentrated on the church - where the people took refuge. The shelling was fierce, and the people started running out of the church. The Israeli tanks and armored vehicles who stayed in there were the aged people. "After the shelling ceased, the search for the lost persons began. I could not find my wife. On that sad day many people died, and we found their bodies inside the church and outside it. My wife's body was found burned inside the church." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/17/1978, interview made by Diab Kursali) The priest Marouni, in the Maronite bishopric in Tyre, said, "The attack was very fierce. There are still persons of the Mufid family under the debris after their house fell on them. The Israeli shelling from gunboats was also directed against the nuns’ schools of St. Joseph and the Bishara Church...." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/23/1978, interview made by Ahmed Mantash) Zainab Kansou (11 years) said, "Israel drove us away from our houses after she destroyed half of them with her planes. I don't like her at all. When the bomb was falling I would open my mouth in order not to die from the pressure. Until now, the buzz of planes is still in my ears." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/22/1978) A woman refugee from the town of Bint Jebel said,"I was surprised. I didn't know it was the war until the paratroopers landed in the streets of the village. They killed my husband and my brother without my knowing how. I didn't see them. The tanks in the streets ordered the inhabitants to come out of their houses with their hands up. They did. But Khodor did not heed the order and ran towards his house. A tank followed him and ordered him to come out with his hands up. Khodor came out with his hands behind his back. The tank fired its gun at him and Khodor fell at the doorstep of his house. Later, masked men came to search the men and their bodies for signs showing they had participated in fighting against the Zionists. Afterwards, bullets started raining, I do not know who among the men died." ("An Nida" newspaper, 3/28/1978) [1] 60617. Farraj, Hamdi. "Grandmothers Star in 'Nana'". in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, August 18, 1995, p. 13. Four female directors from the lot of land near their house. She made her cupbard a coffin for the bones. Poor mother of Darwish, she buried Darwish who was torn up in pieces." (Interview made by Alawi Sobh, "An Nida" newspaper, 3/29/1978) Engineers say that mines are not always the worst problem. They are usually of the type directed against groups, and they are planted in areas that become occupied and in places where they may be seen. They are usually of the type to destroy military vehicles and weapons. However, they explode. Israeli troops planted around 5000 or 6000 mines of the ‘mice-trap’ type, and 2000 of them were rendered ineffective. "The real problem is the presence of a number of rockets, shells and cluster bombs spread at random in the different parts of the region. French engineers have already exploded 2889 cluster bombs, 856 rockets and shells, and defused 2172 mines. Engineers say there are still enough unexploded mines and shells that would make a whole unit busy for several years." ("An Nahar" newspaper, 7/6/1978, from the "weekly report of the UN troops command in Lebanon about the work of the French engineering unit specialized in finding and defusing mines and planted bombs in the regions of Juwyaya, Qhandouriyeh, Arzoun, and Hadathehhra") Hajj Abdel Hassan Wafa, Mukhtar of Bazounia, said, "Israel came with her missiles and planes, and the shelling of the town went on for three and one-third hours.... When they occupied the southern part of the town, large numbers of tanks and armored vehicles entered. We had never seen such a thing before. The Israelis began searching the houses, putting everything in disorder.... Eight days after their entry into the town, they blew up 10 houses, looted commercial stores and stole 40 chairs from the Husseiniya." ("An Nida" newspaper, 5/21/1978) The fire which Israeli occupation forces caused by firing phosphorus bombs at the forests and plantations of Rashaya el-Fokhar was extended to the plantations of Ibl el-Saki, Khiyam and the Hasbani river course. This took place in the presence of the UN troops. (Report from Jamila Hussein in Hasbaya to "An Nida," 5/27/1978)
The Palestine Police arrested him. Although the woman, Vivian Dalou, was detained in Jericho after a female friend, who had been married to an oil worker, was arrested. If he is found innocent and after a Jericho merchant signed a $3000 deceleration, the defendant is released without explanation on 9/12/1994 without ever appearing before a court. Despite this he has been told his file with the Palestinian authorities remains open and the issue unresolved. However, no trial date has been set and legal action is still pending. [=

06019. Franji, Imad; Juma, Talat. “Rafah Border Town With a Historic Role”, in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, September 8, 1995, p. 8. The historic city of Rafah is Palestine's southern gateway to the world. Invaders who attacked Egypt from the north, or Palestine from the south, were usually met at Rafah. Today, Rafah is a city with a population of more than one hundred and twenty thousand refugees living in camps in an area of less than fourteen square kilometers. According to Pharaonic documents from the year sixteen hundred BC, Rafah was considered part of Gaza. It was a main station on the way to the coastal road during the period of increasing Egyptian influence inside Palestine after the Hyksos were defeated by the Pharaohs. Rafah was later the point separating Egypt from Greater Syria. Throughout history it had vital strategic importance to many civilizations. Geographically, Rafah is located in the southwestern corner of Palestine. South of the city is the Egyptian-Palestinian border. West is the Mediterranean Sea. North is Khan Yunis. East is the Green Line that separates Gaza from the 1948 borders of Palestine. The width of the city from this border to the sea is eight kilometers. 60% of Rafah’s inhabitants live in camps. The best known camps of Rafah are Al-Shabara and Al-Hogab. The Shabara camp of Rafah is the most heavily populated sector of the city. It has a population of forty thousand—the most densely populated refugee camp in the world. The rest of the refugees are scattered throughout the new Rafah neighborhoods of Tel As-Sultan—population 15000, located on the coastal area beside the Israeli settlements. It was built in 1974 to absorb the increase in population. It has a few schools, two clinics, two doctors and public services. Another quarter was built in the mid-seventies on the previous location of the Brazilian Brigade of the United Nations' forces which had the task of securing the ceasefire line. The quarter known as Al-Brazil currently has a population of 10000. Despite the increase in population, there are only four clinics and no hospital. Half the clinics are administered by UNRWA. Currently, UNRWA is building a hospital east of Rafah and Khan Yunis city near the Muraj district. The hospital will have three hundred and twenty beds and is being financed by the European Community. Abdul Hadi Dahier, the head of Rafah Municipality has declared that Rafah needs another hospital inside the city.

Rafah does not have any post-secondary educational institutions, except for two vocational training centers which belong to UNRWA and a women's workshop. “This is as a result of the Israeli occupation and their refusal to build any institution or college for higher studies,” Dahier said. Sports clubs are the domain of charitable societies. The Phoenician Educational Center was recently built after the arrival of the Palestinian Authority. Economic and commercial activity has been decelerating. Factors behind this are the decrease in available agricultural land and in manufacturing capacity. Only small-scale factories exist in Rafah, unlike the rest of the Gaza Strip where there are many food producing factories. Rafah's economy boomed when Sinai was occupied by Israel. Rafah was a market for inexpensive Egyptian goods. From there, these were distributed to the rest of the Palestinian
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

 territories. Like other Gazans, Rafah laborers have worked inside the Green Line. Ever since Israel decreased the numbers of labor permits, Rafah's economy has been suffocating. Agriculturally, Rafah still has a large area of agricultural land on which citrus fruits, vegetables, olives and almonds grow. But due to the shortage of housing space, agricultural land was used to build new housing districts, especially in the eastern part of the city. Currently, on the eastern side of the city an airport has been built on seven thousand acres of agricultural land. New, successful agricultural products were introduced in Rafah. Flowers are now exported to Israel, Europe and Russia. This has reduced citrus production, previously the leading agricultural product. Rafah has many humanitarian institutions that provide different social services to the inhabitants, such as the Islamic society, the As-Salah Islamic society, the Young Muslim Men and Women's society, which provides services to orphans and families of the martyrs. The Rafah Charitable Society contributes various social services to the needy.

Rafah has a wide range of mosques. Islamic historians described Rafah as a city with abundant mosques and a large market. Currently, there are more than fifty mosques scattered in between the camps. The most prominent are Al-Awda, Al-Huda, and Bilal Ben Rabah mosque. Mosques played a major role during the Palestinian Intifada. Many confrontations with the Israelis during the Intifada occurred in the areas surrounding the mosques. Christians in Rafah are a minority, and there are no churches. Yet it is believed that a church from 1484 and have never been able to return. Palestinians moved to Bak’a since it was empty and land was cheap; there were still hyenas there. The city had a mixture of peoples, with Christian and Muslim Arabs, and Jewish communities strictly segregated. Jews never stopped at Palestinian stores, even though Palestinians stopped at Jewish stores. She lived for two months in a new home, before it was seized to become part of the Jewish settlement of Biker Haim; the Jewish owned Egged Co. bus went past her door but Palestinians were not allowed to ride on it. The partition of Palestine by the UN was immediately followed by Jewish attacks on the Palestinian neighbors: many families were butchered in their sleep by Jewish bombing attacks. Hearing of the massacre in Deir Yassin, she and her husband fled to Bethlehem, then returned to the Old City. Her relatives, all from Jerusalem, can oly visit the city of their with Israeli permission.

The Canada Camp inhabitants suffered as a result of the Israeli-Egyptian Peace Accord. Due to where the border was set between Egypt and Israel, the camp was divided--half in the occupied territories and the other half in Egypt. Later, in 1989, the Egyptian and Israel governments agreed that thirty-five families a year would get compensation of eight thousand and five hundred dollars and a piece of land in Tel As-Sultan quarter. The compensation was later increased to twelve thousand, but in 1992 both the compensation and the return of the refugees was halted. The Palestinian Authority has agreed with the Canadian government to finance the repatriation of the returnees. This year seventy families hve returned to their homes. Currently, two hundred and fifty families out of five hundred and seventeen have returned. The Swedish village, located on the shore in the far southwest of Gaza lacks basic services. There is no electricity, water, road, or educational institution. It was built by the Swedish Government in 1964. It has a population of nine hundred--mostly fishermen who lived in caves on the seashore. The village is remote from other Palestinian locations, but is surrounded by the Rafah settlements. It cannot build new buildings or rebuild because this is prohibited by the Israelis. Rafah Crossing, the only crossing from Gaza to Egypt, is open twenty-four hours a day for Israelis, Palestinians and foreigners. The Rafah Municipality is administered by a city council. Abdul Hadi Dahier, the head of the council said, “The Rafah Municipality has organized a series of projects and studies, but we are awaiting finances for implementation.” He added that PECDAAR had begun building roads, sidewalks and parks. The Rafah Municipality cooperates with European municipalities and through the Med training group it has been possible for municipal employees to attend computer training programs so that computerization of the municipality’s administrative apparatus can be implemented. [2]

60621. Freij, Jamileh; Vitullo, Anita. "Jerusalem and the PeaceAgenda: Profiles: Growing Up in Jerusalem: Two Women's Stories: Jamileh Freij and Majda Batsh", in Middle East Report, May-June 1993, pp. 15-17. [Jamileh Freij was born in 1930 in Bak’a, West Jerusalem; her family had lived for 15 generations in the Old City before building in West Jerusalem; yet they were refugees in 1948 and have never been able to return.] Palestinians moved to Bak’a since it was empty and land was cheap; there were still hyenas there. The city had a mixture of peoples, with Christian and Muslim Arabs, and Jewish communities strictly segregated. Jews never stopped at Palestinian stores, even though Palestinians stopped at Jewish stores. She lived for two months in a new home, before it was seized to become part of the Jewish settlement of Biker Haim; the Jewish owned Egged Co. bus went past her door but Palestinians were not allowed to ride on it. The partition of Palestine by the UN was immediately followed by Jewish attacks on the Palestinian neighbors: many families were butchered in their sleep by Jewish bombing attacks. Hearing of the massacre in Deir Yassin, she and her husband fled to Bethlehem, then returned to the Old City. Her relatives, all from Jerusalem, can oly visit the city of their with Israeli permission.

60622. Frisby, Michael K.; Kunz, Phil; Simpson, Glenn R. “Green Giant: How Clintonites Built Fundraising Machine of Breadth and Power; Two Boston Donors End Up With Presidential Access and a Deal With HUD; Meetings in the Ward Room”, in Wall Street Journal, February 7, 1997, pp. A1, A6. Boston businessmen Alan Leventhal and Fried Siegel met with Pres. Bill Clinton in a scheme to become owners of HUD's energy efficiency program: they reasoned, correctly, that Clinton would sell their firm Energy Capital Partners the $200 million HUD program and they were right. They collected $3 million for Clinton, and Leventhal and his family personally paid in $185000. In return, Energy Capital Partners was granted an absolute monopoly on the program (with all money to be put up by the Federal National Mortgage Association); in a precedent breaking move, HUD regulations detail the monopoly in federal regulations and grant the monopoly by name to Energy Capital Partners and Siegel. In buying the program through Clinton's good offices, the two had routine access to the White House, enjoying coffees in the White House, and romping through diplomatic events such as the 1993 signing of the peace agreement between Rabin and Arafat, and state dinners for Russian Pres. Yeltsin and South Korean Pres. Kim Young Sam. Siegel and Leventhal deny that there was any connection between their cash payment to Clinton and the unprecedented monopoly on HUD energy conservation programs.

Former Deputy White House Chief of Staff Harold Ickes notes that there was no particular oversight on who was able to buy access to an educational institution. It was built by the Swedish government in 1964. It has a population of nine hundred--mostly fishermen who lived in caves on the seashore. The village is remote from other Palestinian locations, but is surrounded by the Rafah settlements. It cannot build new buildings or rebuild because this is forbidden by the Israelis. Rafah Crossing, the only crossing from Gaza to Egypt, is open twenty-four hours a day for Israelis, Palestinians and foreigners. The Rafah Municipality is administered by a city council. Abdul Hadi Dahier, the head of the council said, “The Rafah Municipality has organized a series of projects and studies, but we are awaiting finances for implementation.” He added that PECDAAR had begun building roads, sidewalks and parks. The Rafah Municipality cooperates with European municipalities and through the Med training group it has been possible for municipal employees to attend computer training programs so that computerization of the municipality’s administrative apparatus can be implemented. [2] marketing, the number of major DNC donors rose from 3500 in 1994 to 33000 in 1996 (Mark Middleton added 2000 names alone). The White House fundraising database would grow to 300000 names (the database included the Clinton-Gore re-election campaign's National Finance Board list and the Democratic National Leadership's list of financial supporters). Typical of the blending of responsibilities was Huang's simultaneous dual role as DNC fundraiser and official of the Commerce Department (raising $15000 while at DC in the summer of 1995). Huang was a ruthless milking of Johnny Chung: his frequent visits to the White House, driven by his 'crush' on Hillary, became so numerous (ultimately about 50) that even the DNC balked: so Hillary's office arranged his visits and maintained their steady bilking of the man, netting a total of $300000 in campaign contributions from him. Finally, Chung's lack of agreement. This includes passages such as, "Moreover, the debt now essentially illiterate. Maj. Elie Shazar, spokeswoman for the Israeli military government office in the West Bank village of Salfit over to the Palestinian office arranged his visits and maintained their steady bilking of the man, among the issues that will be debated at the conference. Among the speakers at the conference will be Hanan Ashrawi of the Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizen's Rights who will address the opening plenary session; Cheryl Carolus of the African National Congress who will join a session on Approaches to Governance; and Hillary Clinton who is scheduled to address the session titled Strategies for the Future. Participation from the US is expected to number 5000. The official US government delegation, headed by UN Representative Madeleine Albright, has been posturing as a leading defender of human and women's rights in the world. [...]" 60624. Geilman, Barton. "Orthodox Jews Go Beyond Splitting Hairs Over Wigs", in Seattle Times, May 19, 1995. p. A3. For six months there has been an intense national campaign in Israel against wigs, which as seen as a sign of wantonness in women. The controversy revolves over the question of whether a woman can wear a wig to cover her 'naked hair' in public. While the ultraorthodox Gur Hasidic sect believes wigs do cover a woman's nakedness, other ultraorthodox firebombed and burned the wig shop run by a woman member of the Gur Hasidic. There is a broad alliance against the satanic wigs, ranging from Ashkenazi groups like theModestians to the 'most distinguished living Sephardic rabbi'. Head coverings are required for women in order to display their sexual purity and to avoid 'tempting men' at times when women are ritually unclean. As one message on a wall in the segregated ultraorthodox Jewish neighborhood reads: 'When the Messiah comes, the first thing he will do is eliminate the wig. A woman who wears a wig is preparing herself for hell'. [TXT] 60625. Ghazali, Said. "300 Palestinians Released; Delays, Confusion Mark Initial Hours of West Bank Pact", in Seattle Times, October 1, 1995. p. A9. Israel released 300 political prisoners and handed one military government office in the West Bank village of Safliit over to the PLO. The releases were confused by delays, and the Israeli refusal to release four women political prisoners, despite a clause in the agreement that all female detainees are to be released. Some released prisoners, such as Sami Zahran who served seven years for possession of a weapon, stated that they did not consider their signing of a oath that prevents them from ever using violence, even in self-defense, to be valid. [TXT] 60626. Ghazali, Said. "Palestinians Face Crumbling School System; Rebellious Students Must Work With Old, Outdated Materials", in Seattle Times, September 1, 1994. p. A16. The new school year in Gaza Strip and the West Bank (still under partial occupation) will be the first school year in 27 years in which Palestinians have had control of the education of their children. However, under Israeli control, the education infrastructure was destroyed: schools are crumbling and obsolete; textbooks (when surviving) are outdated, being as old as 30 years; and the entire school system for 600000 has virtually no computers. In addition, a whole generation was shut out of the schools by Israeli Army infrastructure was destroyed: schools are crumbling and obsolete; textbooks (when surviving) are outdated, being as old as 30 years; and the entire school system for 600000 has virtually no computers. In addition, a whole generation was shut out of the schools by Israeli Army Seattle Times, September 1, 1994, p. A16. The new school year in Gaza Strip and the West Bank (still under partial occupation) will be the first school year in 27 years in which Palestinians have had control of the education of their children. However, under Israeli control, the education infrastructure was destroyed: schools are crumbling and obsolete; textbooks (when surviving) are outdated, being as old as 30 years; and the entire school system for 600,000 has virtually no computers. In addition, there is a refusal of Druze students to participate in the schools by Israeli school closures and by demonstrations: a whole generation of Palestinians is now essentially illiterate. Maj. Elie Shazar, spokeswoman for the Israeli army, that controlled the schools for a generation stated that the Israelis had no responsibility for the condition of the schools. [TEXT]

60629. Ghusayni, Hafez S. Letter: “Tragic Incident In Israel Is Not Typical of All Druze Peoples”, in San Diego Union-Tribune, December 29, 1995, p. B13. [Escondido] I am outraged after reading an Associated Press story, ‘A Matter of Honor: Druze Justice’ in the 12/25/1995 Union-Tribune about a woman slain by her brother at Daliat al-Karmel, Israel. The article casts the Druze as backward, old-fashioned and savage people who continue to resist change in our modern times. This is unfounded, untrue and represents irresponsible and provocative reporting. There are Druze communities all over the world, including the United States and San Diego. Among our women are doctors, lawyers, engineers, business people and government officials; several of them are married to non-Druze. To categorically highlight as Druze justice the attitude towards the sacred values of the people of Israel and toward people who continue to resist change in our modern times. This is Rabbis of the United States & Canada, June 14, 1996. p. 81. Honorable Benjamin Netanyahu, Prime Minister of Israel, Jerusalem: Our best wishes and warm congratulations on your being elected prime minister. May you lead the State for many years to come and guide it to a true peace. We hope that your election will bring about a historical change in the attitude towards the sacred values of the people of Israel and toward peace in our Holy Land. We expect your Honor to make all efforts to lead
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

the state within the framework of the observance of the holy Torah, and the sanctity and purity of Israel, and not to accept Reform or Conservative marriages, or Reform or Conservative conversions. While we pray from the depths to the Guardian of Israel that He watch over our borders and annul the counsel of our enemies who plot to annihilate and destroy-Heaven forbid-the people of G-d, we have to warn and sound the alarm against any attempt to desecrate our diadem, the holy Sabbath, the crown that adorns the nation of Israel from the time it became a holy nation thousands of years ago. Also, to stand guard against autopsies, to watch over Kashrut, and more. We pray that you pursue in your endeavor and close with a prayer to G-d that he reveal His spirit from heaven and spread wings of peace over our Holy Land and may we merit everlasting redemption. [Rabbi Zvi Meir Ginzberg] (=)

The campaign had begun 7/11/93 and was to last through 8/19/93. “Now the main problem in terms of human rights is related to the situation in Lebanon. We also feel that right now that is what all the Israeli public and international media is concerned about,” said campaign leader Eitan Felher.

In condemnation of the disregard for open-fire regulations and the unprecedented number of Palestinian children killed from 12/9/92 to 6/8/93, BTselem had organized several actions, most important of which was a discussion in the Knesset 7/22/93 among members of Meretz, Labor, Hadash, the Arab Democratic Party and the Likud.

No agreement was reached by the groups. Felher told Al-Fajr, “It is not enough that people discuss. In the end, there must be some concrete steps.”

“The main purpose of the campaign - changing the policy so that the killing will be stopped - has not been achieved yet,” he noted.

He explained that the activities will resume when the situation in Lebanon calms down. [=]

60634. Glausiusz, Josie. “The Undivided and Eternal Capital, Part 3”, in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 13. What does “peace” mean to Adnan al-Afandi, a Palestinian construction worker from Dheishe refugee camp who, just two weeks before Jerusalem Day, stabbed two youths in Jerusalem’s Mahane Yehuda market with a kitchen knife? What does it mean to Bella Freund, an ultra-orthodox mother of eight, who protected him from being beaten to death by a lynching mob? After stabbing the two youths, who were lightly injured, al Afandi was set upon by the merchants of the market, who beat, kicked, and cursed him until Freund used her own body to shield him from the attacks of the crowd, who screamed at her, calling her a “leftist” and a “whore.” The daughter of Holocaust survivors, she later explained that she hated violence and felt that she had to take a stand. “I knew that if I didn’t cover him they would Lynch him. . . I just had to prevent any bloodshed.”

Jerusalem Day, 1992. All over the city, Jewish youth are marching. From Silwan, “City of David,” settlers pour into the Old City, flags in their hands, guns slung over their shoulders. From the Rabbi Kook Yeshiva, bleeding ground for a generation of right-wing religious nationalists, Bnei Akiva youth parade down to the Western Wall, singing and dancing. From sites outside the city, new immigrants, many of them Ethiopian, walk “in the footsteps of the fighters” towards the City Walls.

Thousands of Jewish teenagers march past the Damascus Gate, dressed in blue and white, each with a blue and white flag, standing directly in front of them, triumphant, seeing no evidence of an Arab East Jerusalem, no culture, no religion, no people, other than their own. [=] 60635. Glausiusz, Josie. “The Undivided and Eternal Capital, Part 4”, in Challenge, July-August, 1992. p. 13. Jerusalem Day, 1992. Tens of thousands of young people are gathered at the Western Wall Plaza, transforming it into a vast political rallying ground. All the nationalist parties are here, each faction with its own banner and slogan. Moledet (Homeland) is here: “There’s Only One Homeland,” as is Hategiya (Renaissance): “There’s a Trustworthy Right,” the National Religious Party: “Right On Your Side,” the Likud (Unity): “One Big Likud Against All the Left,” and the the ubiquitous Victims of Arab Terror. One factor unites them all: they carry the same bluer than blue, whiter than white flag. There are other banners: “Expulsion of Incliners = Security,” and “Prepare for the Coming of the Messiah.” Helicopters circle overhead, as border police sitting astride the Western Wall train their binoculars on the crowd. In vain does a harassed official appeal to the throng to remove their political banners, claiming that “this event has taken place for five years’ running, without any whiff of politics.” . . . He is universally ignored.

Jerusalem Day, 1992. Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, addressing the delirious, chanting crowd at the Western Wall, declares, “One is Jerusalem, our eternal capital, and it will never again be the capital of a foreign nation.” Jerusalem is unified, but for whom? [=]

4/22/92: Zakaria Qabilan (23) from Khan Yunis (Gaza) was shot dead by undercover soldiers in an armed clash.

5/8/92: Ahmad Aboushi (14) was shot dead by soldiers in Jenin.

Fatmeh al-Khawaja (70) from Sheikh Radwan neighborhood (Gaza City) died after inhaling tear gas which had seeped into her home following clashes with the army in the neighborhood.

4/29/92: Khalil Khamaysheh (18) from Yamoun (Jenin Area) was shot and killed by the army after it was claimed that he had pointed a gun at soldiers.

Jawad Rahal (25) from Arrabeh (Jenin Area) was shot and killed by the army.

5/2/92: Anton Shoumali (22) from Beit Sahour, was shot dead by border police after they claimed that he had attempted to attack a border policeman.

5/3/92: Majed Nahal (14) from Jabalya Camp (Gaza) died of wounds incurred during confrontations with the army on 4/30/92.

5/4/92: Basem Awwad (17) from Deir al-Balah (Gaza) was shot dead by the army.

5/5/92: Zakaria Mustah Allah (44) from the Shajâ'yeh Quarter of Gaza City, died of injuries sustained after he was shot by soldiers.

Ahmad Barakat (25) a detainee in Ansar III, was shot dead by the army. It was claimed that he had attacked a prison guard.

5/6/92: The entire Occupied Territories were sealed off for two days as Israel marked the 44th anniversary of the establishment of the State.

5/8/92: Mahmoud Al-Shalaldeh (23) from Sallam village was shot dead by an Israeli soldier.

It is not enough that people discuss. In the end, there must be some concrete steps.”
permit.
5/13/92: Bilal Ghanem (20) was shot dead by undercover soldiers in Imateen Village (Nablus). Hanadi Abdallah, a six-year-old girl from Imateen Village (Nablus) was hospitalized after being severely beaten on the legs by soldiers.
5/14/92: four soldiers severely beat Tawfiq Badarna (50), the Principal of Ya’abad Boys’ Secondary School (Jenin), after he attempted to stop soldiers from beating a student.
5/16/92: Israeli settlers from Ariel Settlement uprooted eleven olive trees from Kifel Kharris Village (Nablus).
5/17/92: Khail Abu Tayhem (23) from Rafah Refugee Camp (Gaza) died of gunshot wounds sustained on 4/1/92, when soldiers pursued youths and opened fire in a crowded market.
350 olive trees in Skakah Village (Nablus) were uprooted in order to expand Ariel Settlement. The trees belonged to the sons of the late Hassan Al.
5/19/92: 60 settlers rampaged through Hussan Village (Bethlehem) throwing stones, shouting “Death to Arabs,” and firing into the air.
5/22/92: Mahmud al-Barghouti (18) from Beit Rima (Ramallah) was shot dead by soldiers who opened fire without warning from a military jeep.
5/23/92: Settlers cut down 20 grapevines belonging to Othman Al-Jibari (70) in Wadi Al-Ghus near Kiryat Arba settlement.
5/24/92: Yassir al-Hasanat, Marwan al-Zayjih, and a member of the Qandeel family were killed, and another serious injured in armed clashes with soldiers in the Sabrah neighborhood of Gaza City.
5/25/92: Ahmad Abu Rihan (19) from Deir al-Balah (Gaza) was shot after he stabbed dead Rabbi Biran from Kfar Darom. In the wake of the attack, curfew were imposed on Deir al-Balah and surrounding villages, and settlers carried out revenge attacks on a school and set fire to greenhouses in Deir al-Balah. The entire Gaza Strip was sealed off by military authorities. [=]

60638. Glausiusz, Josie; Feinberg, Michael. “Sixty Days in the Occupied Territories, 4/15/92-6/15/92, Part 3”, in Challenge, July-August, 1992, p. 2. 5/25/92: The Israeli military sealed the family home of Fu’ad Amran in Nussereit refugee camp (Gaza), after he stabbed an Israeli girl, Helene Rapp, in Bat Yam two days before. Twelve people were displaced.
5/27/92: Najiyeh Zakarneh (60) from Qabatiya (Jenin) was shot dead by soldiers who were chasing youths through Jenin market.
During confrontations in Rafah City (Gaza) soldiers shot Ahmad al-Liawayi (10) in his back. He was taken to Nasser Hospital in critical condition.
5/28/92: Hani Arqawi (24), and Omar Hassan (25), from al-Yamoun, were shot dead by an undercover unit in an apparent mistake. The two were known to collaborate with the Israeli authorities.
5/29/92: Ahmed Addawi (34) from Khuras Village (Hebron) was in critical condition after two Israelis threw an object at his car, causing a collision with another vehicle.
5/31/92: The city of Jerusalem was closed to Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as Israelis celebrated Jerusalem Day.
6/3/92: Israeli authorities bulldozed 110 dunums of land, planted with olive trees and vegetable crops, in Dura (Hebron District). The land belongs to Khalil Arafah (70) and Kamal Arafah (68).
6/4/92: Hawad Howabrah (24) from Arroub Refugee Camp (Bethlehem) was shot dead in Bethlehem’s Manger Square after stabbing an Israeli soldier there.
6/5/92: Israeli authorities uprooted 300 olive trees in Beit Urr al-Tahata (Ramallah) on the pretense that the trees were planted on “state land.” The trees belong to Mahmoud Saleiman.
6/6/92: Israeli authorities fenced off 70 dunums of land, planted with hundreds of almond and olive trees in al-Mouruj (Tulkarem). The Qa’dan family, who owns the land, were notified the same day.
6/7/93: Mohammad al-Zamara’a (25), Mohammad Amjad (18) and Rashed Shaheen (19) were shot and injured at a military checkpoint near Halhoul, after soldiers stopped and asked them for their identity cards.
6/9/92: Tawfiq Ali Sbeihat (45) from Rumaneh Village (Jenin) was shot dead when he opened a window to investigate noises outside the house. His family suspects that he was killed by an undercover unit, who mistook him for a member of the Black Panthers.

Israeli authorities confiscated 94 dunums of land in Beit Urr al-Foqaq (Ramallah), near Horon Settlement. [=]

The words of Dr. Ruchama Marton, a Tel-Aviv psychiatrist and chairperson of the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights, which she established five years ago. “Tomorrow I am going to Nablus and I feel very protected and secure. Maybe I am repressing something, perhaps. But I think that we all, that is, all of those Israeli women who are involved in human rights work in the territories, feel a thousand times more secure than the soldiers who are wandering around there in fear, with guns and shields mounted on their jeeps.”

Dr. Marton is one of the handful of Israeli women who go into the West Bank and Gaza Strip on a regular basis, in spite of the danger that it involves. “The passage from here to there is like travelling from one continent to another,” says Marton.

Dr. Ruchama Marton, 50, mother of one son and one daughter, lives in a private house in the suburbs of Tel Aviv. For many years she worked as a psychiatrist in various hospitals throughout the country. She now has a private practice. She had been involved in a variety of left-wing groups but had never visited the territories and always maintained a separation between her political and professional life.

In her opinion, her involvement as a physician in the Association of Israeli-Palestinian Physicians is not political but rather the preservation of the laws of humanity and the provision of reasonable medical assistance. “When the Intifada began, we heard all sorts of rumors, and I wanted to know what was really happening,” Marton relates. [=] 60640. Golan, Smadar. “Israeli Scene: Working with Physicians for Peace, Part 2”, in Al-Fair Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993, p. 11. “The decision to enter the Strip and see these things from up-close also stemmed from my personal acquaintance with Haidar Abdul Shafi, who today is head of the Palestinian delegation to the peace talks, and one of the best physicians in Gaza. I recruited a few friends in the profession, physicians specializing in various fields, and in 1/88 we went down to Gaza. Up until that point I had been in Gaza very few times, and I certainly had never been in any of the hospitals in the city. We went into Shifa Hospital and the sights were very shocking. It is a very small hospital, filthy, with very meager medical equipment... the helplessness of the professional staff... and a horrible stench. Men and women, young boys and girls - children were practically on top of one another: terrible overcrowding, with entire families in the corridors in a state of hysteria. We saw endless lines of people with broken arms and legs, and gunshot wounds.

“We left the hospital in a state of shock. On the way back, a sort of group dynamic developed. ... Among all what was said, an opinion arose to the effect that we, as physicians, can and need to continue to be active in the preservation of basic human rights - at least on a medical level. So, after many evenings spent sitting by the telephone and dialing colleges, about 100 physicians were gathered together, after about two months, and we founded the association.”

The association’s agenda includes the struggle to guarantee reasonable medical treatment for the residents of the territories, to secure tolerable work conditions for Palestine physicians, and the struggle for humanitarian health conditions for prisoners and detainees.

In her meetings with people in the medical professions and leaders in the territories, Marton tried to impress upon them the importance of establishing a system for providing mental health care. "In every home there will be someone who returns home from prison, and he is going to have problems with his/her partner, and his/her parents, and they will need to be provided with suitable professional assistance."

"After those laws, they really began to change their method, and were prepared to consider the establishment of centers for mental health, but they were only concerned with women and children. A little more time passed and they were ready to admit that the men also had problems." [=

60641. Golan, Smadar. "Israeli Scene: Working with Physicians for Peace, Part 3", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), July 12, 1993. p. 11. Marton says that the Gaza Community Mental Health Program has been active for more than a year. The center was established by Dr. Eyad Sarraj, a psychiatrist who participated in the establishment of the association. "He gathered money from abroad and set up a serious clinic. For the time being, it is almost the only center, which provides residents in the territories with treatment for mental problems. The Civil Administration doesn't think that there is a need to contribute one penny to the subject.

"In the West Bank there is only one hospital for the mentally ill, but it is small and dreadful, and only the most serious cases are hospitalized there."

Question: How open are the Palestinians to discussing their problems with you?

Answer: It took some time, but I acquired many friends among the residents of the territories, and I can talk with them just like I talk with people in Tel Aviv.

"I don't do psychiatric work in the territories. If I am asked to provide psychiatric aid then it is usually in the form of first aid: if someone can't fall asleep at night, I can give them a relaxant, and if someone is in a state of anxious panic, I can give him some medication to lower the level of anxiety.

Question: In addition to the health problems, have you witnessed such aspects of life as free or leisure time?

Answer: Those are two words that they [Palestinians] do without: "leisure" and "free" time. In Gaza, in addition to the present closure, there has been a [nightly] curfew in place for many years.

What are we talking about here? About a cafe? Theater? A lecture? Spending time with friends? Forget about it. Day after day, week after week, month after month, there's no involvement in culture, both for security and political reasons.

[This article was originally published in Olam ha-Ishah on July-August 1993 as "Walking Between Stones and Rubber Bullets"]; [=

60642. Goldberg, Nicholas. "Identity Vexes Israel, Jews Living Elsewhere; Yesterday The Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States & Canada Said The Reform and Conservative Branches "Are Not Judaism At All! Who is a Jew?", in Seattle Times, April 1, 1997, p. A3. The question of "Who is a Jew?" remains bitterly contested, with many inter-racial couples in Israel, still facing the stigma of having their race noted as "Christian" in their state-issued racial identity papers. One husband, sons and brothers being imprisoned, wounded or killed, for inter-racial couples in Israel, still facing the stigma of having their race husbands; the effects, economic and psychological, on families of these violations - the effect on families of deportation of women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B'Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada. Some women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.

Within the Israeli-Palestinian context, targeted violations are not the most significant feature of women's oppression. Few women have been deported as political activists and none during the Intifada; no women have been killed by Israeli death squads; of deaths by army gunfire (including death squad killings, B’Tselem lists 49 women out of 749 people, as of 4/3/91; out of some 14000 or more Palestinian political prisoners, WOFPP estimates that some 50-60 will be women; UNRWA estimates that only a small percentage of the 50000 injuries it has documented since the Intifada began are to women. The indirect effects of these violations commonly emerge as part of Israeli strategies for expansion; Palestinians appear in this context simply as obstacles. For this reason it is extremely hard to effect these violations simply by pointing to the suffering they cause and the illegality of that suffering. Without either changing the largest goals of the group in power or exercising sufficient restraining force upon those goals it is impossible to relieve the suffering of the victims. This problem also exists with regard to collective measures where the suppression of protest is seen as a "necessary" element in maintaining existing power relations or where collective measures are imposed without regard to actual resistance activities.
effective in those contexts. Many violations in the second and third groups occur within homes or with regard to homes. In a society where women largely remain at home, this means that the greatest burden of these violations falls upon them, not only with regard to the importance of the violations to them but also because they are responsible for mediating the effects of the violation on the whole family.

During curfew, for example, the heaviest burden falls upon the women, who often mediate between the officers, who resent being forced to remain in the home and retain the final authority in it, and the children, whose frustrations, lack of understanding and real needs must all be dealt with. Even the best relationships, under conditions of relative lack of hardship, suffer intolerable strain. For poor families, under crowded conditions, with shortages of food, water, cigarettes and even soap, life can be a literal hell. In remote areas people, especially children and the elderly, can die from lack of access to essential medical care. In Rafaat village, near Tulkarm, for example, eight people, five of them infants under 12 months old, died during the Gulf war curfew. One 3-year-old girl with meningitis was finally given permission, after a two-day delay, to reach the hospital in Nablus, but died there. Conditions under curfew vary depending upon the location (city, village, refugee camp); the size of the family; the number of people in it; the adult-to-child ratio; the availability of food (including powdered milk for babies); the access to medical treatment; the relationships with neighbors; the long-term concerns with unemployment and lack of money; the general relationships among people; and the presence or fear of soldiers. Except for the shortages of essentials, the climate of terror (especially in refugee camps and crowded, poor areas of cities) and the direct fear of soldiers entering (which, one person in the Old City of Nablus suggested, may sometimes be welcome as a distraction from the boredom, frustration and quarreling), women’s experience of curfew is bounded by what is going on within the household: by the need to take care of her husband, children and extended family; to manage what resources are available; to mediate quarrels; and to maintain order and cleanliness. The climate of terror pervades everything but itself becomes invisible. What exists are the details of ordinary life, lived under extraordinary circumstances. Women are called upon to compensate at the family level for an assault directed against the community itself.

House demolitions belong to both the second and third categories of violation, depending partly upon the reason given for the demolition. According to PHRIC almost 1800 Palestinian homes had been destroyed or sealed between the beginning of the Intifada, 12/9/87, and 11/30/90. Slightly over one-third of them were destroyed or sealed as collective measures against families whose sons (usually) had been involved in resistance activities. The rest, except for three destroyed by settlers and some 70 destroyed in the process of destroying other homes, were destroyed because they were built without licenses. Living conditions for families whose homes have been destroyed can be expected to deteriorate dramatically. Many people live in tents afterwards, sometimes for years, with no running water, electricity or privacy. Furniture and clothing are often lost along with the house. They are often not waterproof. Even where families move in with relatives it is normally under very crowded conditions, producing stress for both families. "We simply don't know how to talk about these things," said one woman, a member of an activist family whose home had been destroyed in 1988. The home had been built, stone by stone over a period of years, by a brother released from prison in 1983. When the house was destroyed the young woman was not at home; she had gone to pay condolences in Ya'abad village, near Jenin, following the death-squad killing of unionist Ahmad al-Kilani there. She was watching the Hebrew news on television when she saw her mother screaming. The house was being destroyed as collective punishment for a brother who had been arrested. The brother had a small apartment on the roof. At 2:00 a.m. hundreds of soldiers surrounded the house, woke the family and told them to remove their furniture. The family refused to take furniture. The mother was unable to walk from shock and was forced to crawl out of the house. Outside she sat on the ground and screamed uncontrollably. The father was unable to speak for days after the demolition.

A sister-in-law, the wife of the brother who built the house, refused to leave and demanded that the house be demolished over her. Although she was visibly pregnant, soldiers hit her on the stomach to force her to leave; finally they dragged her outside with her husband, tied them both up with rope and left a soldier with a gun pointed at them while they demolished the house. Years later the mother has not recovered. She has frequent periods where she wanders aimlessly in the streets talking to herself. Intense reactions to the demolitions of houses, even years later, are not uncommon. Many people report that they have been unable to sleep for months or normally for years following demolitions (curfew and house demolition fieldwork in coordination with the Palestinian Federation of Women’s Action Committees, General Secretary Zahira Kamal). The 24 years of Israeli military occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip have witnessed steady deterioration in the human rights situation, deterioration accelerated by the Intifada and now by the Gulf war and its aftermath. For women, this deterioration has been most strongly marked by the increase of violations in the second and third categories, violations which are not responses to direct acts of resistance but are grounded in the larger political relationships between the two communities. In this sense there can be no significant improvement in Palestinian women’s human rights situation without some form of national liberation.

This does not mean that work on these issues can be suspended in favor of work on political transformation. To begin with, a major function of human rights work is to expose the necessity for changes in power relations by revealing the cost of political and ideological systems to the people who pay the price for them. Work on these issues is thus work on this transformation. Second, political transformation will not necessarily have a positive effect on the human rights situation unless it is directed to do so. The violations themselves must be made a center of focus if essential social transformation is to accompany liberation. Third, human rights are not a relative concept. They are by definition what all human beings, without exception, are entitled to expect from whatever social and political environment they find themselves in. Work on them cannot fairly be suspended in favor of any other kind of work. Fourth, and most important, human rights are considered absolute not only because they represent the minimum conditions for habitable human existence but also because they represent the minimum conditions for the development of human life and human conscience. People maturing in and adapting to the current Palestinian human rights situation cannot be expected to understand what life in an ordinary or human environment entails. This is a potentially very dangerous situation. The violations which affect women most strongly are at the center of these issues, particularly at the issues of development and personality formation. Work on these violations and issues is an urgent human rights task. Note: Beth Goldring is codirector of Sanabel Press Services, Jerusalem. This article is condensed from a longer article which will appear in a forthcoming book from the Institute for Arab Women’s Studies, Washington, D.C. [↩]

60644. Gomez, Berta. "Palestinian Women Seek to Enhance Gains Made During Intifada", in Bilad-Jerusalem Times Palestinian Weekly (Occupied Territories), May 6, 1994, p. 9. Palestinian women’s groups have succeeded in placing their concerns on the agenda of the broader Palestinian leadership but are far from realizing their goals, believes one scholar.

"The voices of Palestinian women are increasingly being heard," Joost Hilterman, project director of Middle East Watch, said during an 4/22/1994 lecture at the Middle East Institute in Washington, DC.

"There is clearly a new discourse" among Palestinians, and their national leadership is beginning to recognize "that women’s issues simply can’t be wished away," he said. "But it is still at the level of discourse. It is not on the level of concrete gains—yet.

Palestinian feminists are wary of the so-called "Algeria syndrome," in which women, who were once encouraged to participate in revolutionary activity, are pressured to resume their traditional roles following independence, he said. "This syndrome remains very real today for the Palestinians."

Palestinian women are thus drafting new laws governing divorce, inheritance, domestic abuse and sexual harassment, in the hope that those amendments will be accepted by the Palestinian authority that will govern the West Bank and Gaza Strip following the Israeli military withdrawal, he said.

Hilterman, the author of a 1991 book titled "Behind the Intifada: Labor and Women's Movements in the Occupied Territories," said he had not done on-site research in the occupied territories since 1990.

Consequently, his lecture focused on the history of the Palestinian women's movement beginning with its inception in the 1920s as an offshoot of the Palestinian national movement.

In the early years, the activists were usually the wives of prominent Palestinian nationalists, and the two movements were "entirely intertwined," Hilterman said.

He argued that while women benefited from their association with the broader nationalist movement, their concerns were generally subordinated to the overriding national agenda: "The modern women's movement has not entirely shaken off [its] past as an essentially elitist movement that remains closely linked - and to some extent dependent - on the Palestinian national movement."

Beginning in the late 1970s and early 1980s, however, the movement grew as women activists began to mobilize grass roots support. "Since the 1970s, there has been an attempt both from the bottom up and from the top down to mobilize the so-called masses of the population," Hilterman said.

The movement also benefited from women's growing access to education and employment opportunities, and from the fact that women were highly visible combatants in the Intifada, the stone-throwing movement against the Israeli military authority in the occupied territories which began four years ago.

"Women were basically running the street affairs" during the Palestinian Uprising, and this activism gave the women's movement "a legitimacy and a profile" that it had previously lacked, Hilterman noted.

Those trends were reinforced by the emergence of women like Hanan Ashrawi, the former spokeswoman for the Palestinian delegation to the Middle East talks. As one of the most visible participants in the peace process, she quickly became a symbol of the modern Palestinian woman. Other women as such Zahira Kamal and Su'ad Ameri, made names for themselves as members of the "technical committees" that are planning the functions of the new Palestinian authority.

"They have gained some political power and some political space for themselves...and maybe opened the doors for others to follow," Hilterman said of Ashrawi, Kamal and Ameri. [-]

60645. Gonzales, Mike. Nicaragua: Revolution Under Siege: Postscript: 2/1985: There are Elections...and Elections. Chicago, Ill.: International Socialist Organization; London: Bookmarks, June 1985. On 11/4/1984 free elections were held in Nicaragua for the first time in history. They were held under intense external pressure, but were generally acknowledged to be open and honest: 85% of the Nicaraguan electorate voted. Two days later less than half that percentage of the voters in the US gave Ronald Reagan his second term as president. The Nicaraguan elections were given little attention in the popular press. Yet the day after the US election the 'discovery' of a supposed shipment of Russian arms to the Nicaraguan port of Corinto was given banner headlines throughout the world. As a news story it proved highly suspect [Spokespersons for the Pentagon and the CIA later acknowledged that the Russian and Bulgarian ships rumoured to be carrying MiG fighters (an allegation later disproved) had been constantly monitored for three months before the sudden announcement to the press a few days after the Nicaraguan elections].—but it gave a clear indication of future US attitudes to Nicaragua. In the run-up to the elections, Reagan had made great play of his commitment to 'democracy in the region. Early in 1983, a new organisation entitled the 'Democratic Community' was set up under US auspices by the military governments of Guatemala and El Salvador, supported by the government of Honduras—again effectively controlled by the military. The Democratic Community was a short-lived and transparent device, intended to provide a democratic facade for a military operation in Central America. The elections of 1984 in Guatemala and El Salvador served a similar function. They were intended for the eyes of voters in the US, on the one hand, and to preempt the elections that had been announced in Nicaragua on the other. In both Guatemala and El Salvador lists of opposition candidates were published alleging death threats to them and their families. In Guatemala the election of General Mejia ensured the continuation in power of a military caste which had ruled since the mid-1950s. Report after report, by Amnesty International among others, had shown the military regime guilty of the hideous and sustained torture of its political opponents. US arms sales to Guatemala had been suspended in 1979, after a group of peasant protesters had been burned alive on military orders in the Spanish Embassy in Guatemala City. Nonetheless the Guatemalans continued to receive their arms, through Israel and South Africa. Before the elections, Reagan had nominated a paid lobbyist for the Guatemalan military, Richard Stone, as his special envoy for Central America. Now the elections provided sufficient evidence for the renewal of US relations with Guatemala—with as its backdrop a pompous public debate in the Guatemalan Congress between the military government and its loyal opposition, an extreme right-wing coalition led by Mario Sandoval, an acknowledged racist and admirer of Adolf Hitler. The presidential elections in El Salvador were in many ways a more important test. For four years a mass resistance movement, the FDR-FMLN, had been able to present their candidacy, for fear of its being posthumous. Whatever his political label, Duarte, as presidential candidate. The reasons were many—and none involved rejection of the violence and extremism proudly and publicly sustained by d'Abuisson.

Unlike other Christian Democrats elsewhere in Latin America, Duarte was prepared to denounce the Nicaraguans, claiming they were responsible for the resistance in El Salvador. In elections which, as all observers agreed, were characterised by the terrifying of the population, open corruption and large-scale abstention in the areas controlled by the resistance, Duarte was elected president. No opposition candidate to the left of Duarte had been able to present their candidacy, for fear of its being posthumous. Whatever his political label, however, Duarte's programme was familiar. Despite his well-publicised meetings with the leaders of the FDR-FMLN, he prosecuted the war against them with the same vigour as his predecessors. US aid to his government, raised on the grounds of Duarte's new democracy, was controlled some 40% of the country. Despite massive US financial and material aid to the Salvadoran military, which included the training of more than 15000 special 'counter-insurgency' troops, the resistance was still able to inflict major defeats on the Salvadoran armed forces. One reason for this was that the Salvadoran government did not have political control over the army. This lay with the extreme right-wing Arena Party and its leader Roberto d'Abuisson—the organisation that had gunned down Archbishop Oscar Romero in 1980. Likewise members of the paramilitary Treasury police had murdered four US runs returning to missionary work in El Salvador. The US therefore favoured the ex-mayor of the capital and Christian Democrat, Napoleon Duarte, as presidential candidate. The reasons were many—and none involved rejection of the violence and extremism proudly and publicly sustained by d'Abuisson.
democratic. Just before the vote he announced his sudden conversion to the cause of the Contras! In calling elections, conducting them democratically, and allowing universal participation, the Sandinista government had called the US government's bluff. Despite Reagan's efforts to prove the elections illegitimate, the fact is that the results gave overwhelming victory to the FSLN. [The election results were: FSLN 66.9% of the vote; Democratic Conservatives (PCD) 13.9%; independent candidates (PLI) 9.7%; Sandinista Revolutionaries (PPSC) 5.7%; Nicaraguan Communist Party (PCN) 1.5%; Pro-Moscow Communist Party (PSN) 1.3%; revolutionary left (MAP) 1.0%. Assembly seats: FSLN 61; PLI 14; PL; PPSC 2; PSN 2; MAP 2. Of the 1.5 million registered voters, 1.2 million cast their votes.] Both in the presidency and in the Assembly. If Reagan denounced the poll, it was because the wrong side won.

Yet it was clear that US policy-makers recognised from the outset that the FSLN would win an overwhelming victory, and that there was no internal political alternative that could win mass support away from the Sandinistas. On the other hand, it was also clear that the Contras had failed to achieve their promised short-term objective of creating a 'liberated area' in Zelaya province, in the north of Nicaragua. The Contras remained divided between the forces around Eden Pastora, based in Costa Rica, and the remnants of Somozas National Guard, operating out of Honduras. They enjoyed massive direct US Government and CIA support, as well as the protection of a Honduran army swollen by the 5000 US soldiers involved in what has come to seem a permanent military manoeuvre called 'Big Pine'. But the Contras had succeeded in causing havoc along the northern border, terrorising the frontier population and forcing the Sandinistas into enormous expenditure to defend the border against their attacks. In the long term, this was their objective anyway: to use the threat of invasion, incursions into Nicaraguan territory, sabotage against crops and machinery, as the spearhead of economic attrition. There can be no doubt that the elections were a propaganda victory for the Sandinistas. At that level, they were less a mark of progress towards socialist democracy than a plebiscite, successfully demonstrating the scale of support for the FSLN. This was obviously important if Nicaragua was to retain the support of some of the more liberal regimes in Europe and Latin America, support which was so important to Sandinista eyes. But by late 1984 these 'progressive' regimes were already fading in their support. The realises of world economic recession and the powerful disciplines of the world market had already turned the attention of the Mitterrand government in France towards its own austerity programme, while the Spanish government of Felipe Gonzalez also began to distance itself from the Central American arena. Spain was prepared to send only a low-level diplomat to attend the inauguration of Daniel Ortega as president of Nicaragua in 1985, despite official Nicaraguan protests. The only national leader who did attend was Fidel Castro of Cuba. Yet for all the concessions made by the Sandinistas, the elections did nothing to redress the economic or social costs imposed by the activities of the Contras, nor to win more active economic or military aid from outside Nicaragua. Both directly and indirectly the elections and the concessions that accompanied them were an expensive gesture. This was, then, one more drain on the Nicaraguan economy, but not by any means the greatest. The government acknowledged, for instance, that the cost of Contra activity during 1984 was well over a thousand lives, a billion dollars damage to sabotaged installations, a severe impact on all areas of production, and a probable shortfall of around 25% in anticipated national production levels. More important, a growing proportion of the national budget was now devoted to defence. The government itself estimated this at 25% of government spending, while other observers suggested the figure was far higher. [See, for example, Peter Pringle writing in The Observer (London, 3/2/1985) p. 13.]

60646. Goodstein, Laura. "PM Benjamin Nyeanyahu Wows His Closest Friends", in Manchester Guardian Weekly, July 21, 1996, p. 13. Netanyahu's rally in New York with his Jewish supporters exemplified the 'nutty' for Netanyahu that has enraptured New York City. He arrived to meet with the leaders of the powerful Reform and Conservative Jews, who "stand by the choice of the Israeli electorate" despite current difficulties with the zeal of the Orthodox in Israel. Selling 3200 seats at the Sheraton New York. Hotel almost immediately, Michael Miller, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council gloved: "I've never seen anything like this in my professional career. In three business days it was sold out". The 1.5 million Jews in Greater New York are the largest concentration of Jews in the world outside Israel: while few have any real knowledge in Israel, they are fierce and unscrupulous zealots in the Israeli-Zionist cause. Judy Balint of the extremist right-wing, anti-peace Coalition for Jewish Concerns-AMCHA applauded his 'apolitical' approach to emphasizing Jewish racial solidarity. As Netanyahau noted: "The great task of Zionism today is to reinforce Jewish identity" and he urged the indoctrination of hundreds of thousands of Jewish youth worldwide in Zionism and Israelism. Netanyahau demanded that all of Jerusalem be a Jews-only city. Such rhetoric left David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee noting that Netanyahau was a "statesman... with intellectual vigor and good humor". The speech at the Sheraton followed a meeting with the heads of 400 Jewish organizations. [TXT]

60647. Gordon, Evelyn. "Briefs: Equality Before the Divorce Law [Knesset Law Committee has said sanctions for refusing to divorce should apply to both sexes, while reviewing a bill allowing rabbinical courts to sanction husbands.], in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, December 3, 1994. p. 4. [TXT]

60648. Gordon, Evelyn. "Briefs: Female Police Unit to Arrest Women [Police Minister Moshe Shahal will set up a women's unit for arresting women, following charges of police brutality by Kiryat Arba resident Anat Cohen who charges that when arrested for videotaping brutality she was not allowed to take her nursing baby, was abused, and had force used against her sons.], in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, October 29, 1994, p. 2. [TXT]

60649. Gordon, Evelyn. "Court: Backers of Shas Deal Must Defend Pact", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, October 22, 1994. p. 5. The High Court of Justice has given Shas, Labor, Rabin and Attorney-General Michael Ben-Yair 14 days to explain why a deal that calls for a blanket agreement for legislative changes to keep the religious status quo is not illegal. The agreement was challenged by Tsomet, the Movement for Quality Government in Israel, Amatai-Citizens for Good Government, attorney Ze'ev Welner, Conservative and Reform movements and SHIN.

60650. Gordon, Evelyn. "Court: Gov't Must Defend Stand on Surrogate Motherhood", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, November 26, 1994, p. 24. The High Court of Justice has given the government 45 days to defend its stand that surrogate motherhood should be illegal. The action is in response to a lawsuit filed by 25 couples who cannot have children. They are represented by Amnon Ben-Dror.

60651. Gordon, Evelyn. "Family Courts to Be Set Up", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, December 3, 1994, p. 5. A new bill will set up family courts to deal with marriage, divorce, abuse, and child issues. The courts are the idea of Justice Minister David Liba'i and Supreme Court President Meir Shamgar.

On 12/9/93, around 11 pm Mahmoud Ibrahim Satri died in the Nasser Government Hospital in Khan Yunis. Mahmoud was not yet three months old. One month earlier, on 11/11/93, Salman Abu Kashef died in the Nasser Government Children's Hospital in Gaza City. Salman was three months old. The death of these two infants is appalling, especially considering the fact that a relatively simple operation could have saved their lives, an operation that could not be performed in the Gaza Strip but could have been done in an Israeli Meanwhile, the infant was hospitalized in the Nasser Government Children's Hospital and a week later, on 11/8/93, permission was granted for referral to an Israeli hospital. A few hours earlier, Salman Abu Kashef had died.[=] 60653. Gordon, Neve, "Gaza: The Deaths of Three Babies: Part 2", in Challenge, March-April, 1994. pp. 19-20. Unlike Salman Abu Kashef and Mahmoud Satri, the case of Sami Abu Ajweh was brought to the attention of PHR while he was still alive. Sami, the eighth child of Mustafa and Najah Abu Ajweh, was born on 8/26/93. For years the Civil Administration health insurance had been deducted from Mustafa's salary. This insurance is supposed to guarantee comprehensive medical treatment for all members of the family. Thus, when Sami was one month old and suffered from continuous diarrhea (up to twenty times a day) and loss of weight, he was hospitalized in the Nasser Government Children's Hospital in Gaza City at no additional cost to his family. The doctors diagnosed his condition as a general failure to thrive.

After 45 days in the hospital, during which his situation failed to improve, Sami's father asked the attending doctor, Dr. Sami Abu Dalfa, to refer the child to an Israeli hospital. However, Dr. Dalfa refused to give him the necessary referral, stating that it would damage his credibility to send a baby with diarrhea to an Israeli hospital. Not knowing what to do, Mustafa asked a neighbor for advice. The neighbor suggested that he take the infant to the Augusta Victoria Hospital in East Jerusalem.

Sami was hospitalized in the Augusta Victoria Hospital for one week, and then for one more week in another Palestinian hospital, Maqassed, also in East Jerusalem. At Maqassed the family had to pay for the hospitalization. Doctors in both hospitals could not diagnose the cause of the baby's ailment and decided to refer him to the Israeli Hospital in Ein Karem, West Jerusalem. Meanwhile, the infant's condition continued to deteriorate, and he developed an infection in his eye. After a few days he lost the sight in his left eye.

With letters of referral from both Augusta Victoria and Maqassed Hospitals, Mustafa returned to the Nasser Government Children's Hospital. There, after he managed to convince the head of the children's department and the director of the hospital to sign the referral papers, the Civil Administration finally gave him the letter ensuring financial responsibility for hospitalization in Israel, in accordance with his government medical insurance policy.

The commitment was for one week (11/19/93-11/26/93), but by the middle of the week, on November 23, the doctor in Hadassah Hospital determined that the infant would not be ready to be released since his condition was still precarious. The Civil Administration refused to accept financial liability for continuing hospitalization in Hadassah. A month later, on December 22, Sami was released from Hadassah Hospital after his condition had been stabilized and he had begun to gain weight. A bill for 18,000 sheqels was sent from Hadassah to the Abu Ajweh family.

In the matter of payment, the Civil Administration in Gaza has responded to pressure from PHR and paid the bill. But on 1/12/94 the infant was again hospitalized in the Nasser Government Children's Hospital due to diarrhea and weight loss. Again the hospital doctors and the civil authorities refused to refer him to an Israeli hospital. On January 21 did the civil authorities accede to PHR's demands and transfer the child to Hadassah Ein Karem, and then only after his weight had dropped from 4.5 to 3.25 kilograms in ten days. The child was cared for in the pediatrics department, and on January 26, when his medical condition had stabilized and he had begun to gain weight, he was released, with an appointment for a checkup scheduled for February 8.

As the date of the appointment approached, Dr. Muhammad Arafat of the Nasser Government Children's Hospital refused to give the father referral forms for Hadassah Hospital. On February 9, Sami was hospitalized for the third time in the Nasser Government Children's Hospital and within a number of days his weight dropped from 4.5 to 3.5 kilograms. He was now six months old! Again, Dr. Dalfa stubbornly refused to refer him to an Israeli hospital. On February 13, PHR turned to the Civil Administration for the third time, demanding that the infant be referred to an Israeli hospital, and the referral was forthcoming.

At the same time, PHR called Dr. Rajda Shawa, the director of... the Nasser Government Children's Hospital, and asked her to sign the referral papers. Dr. Shawa refused to sign the referral papers "because the Civil Administration did not have the funds." PHR explained to Dr. Shawa that according to the Fourth Geneva Convention the occupying regime is responsible for the health of the population under occupation and that financial considerations were irrelevant. Only on February 15 did the doctors at the Nasser Government Children's Hospital sign the referral papers and send them to the Civil Administration. The referral was, however, delayed because Dr. Lebanon was absent.

At this point PHR asked Knesset member Naomi Chazan to intervene on behalf of the infant. Chazan called the head of the Civil Administration, Brigadier General Dubi Gazit, and within an hour received a promise that Sami would be transferred to an Israeli hospital. The infant was not transferred. This time, the pretence was that Hadassah Hospital did not have vacant beds. Although the Sha'arey Tzedek Hospital in Jerusalem agreed to hospitalize the child, the doctors at the Nasser Government Children's Hospital and the Civil Administration claimed that the referral papers were good only for Hadassah. The following day, Thursday, February 17, Sami died at 7:00 pm.

The Israeli role in the deaths of these infants does not alleviate responsibility from the Palestinian doctors involved. The doctors displayed faulty medical and ethical judgement and failed to show responsible concern for the distress of the infants. Their medical neglect was such as to constitute criminal negligence and was a violation of the Hippocratic oath. But the practices of Palestinian doctors is an issue which Palestinians themselves need to confront, particularly with autonomy imminent.

As the occupying power, the State of Israel is directly responsible for the death of these infants as stated in the Fourth Geneva Convention. The question of which patient is referred to an Israeli hospital and which is treated in Gaza, often meaning who will live and who will die, is a question which Israeli occupation has dictated. The Israeli authorities pass the immediate weight of judgement onto Palestinian doctors by making their jobs under Civil Administration Health Officer Dr. Lebanon contingent on the arbitrary guideline, "Cardiological and oncological problems yes, cleft palate no." The decisions of Palestinian doctors are directed by the Israeli occupation.

Responsibility for these infants' deaths also rests with the Israeli public. During twenty-six years of occupation, Israel has obstructed the development of the health system in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. In the course of this period the number of hospital beds has declined from two per thousand residents to one bed per thousand, while in Israel the number of beds is now six per thousand. The health budget per person in Israel is approximately 500 dollars per year, while in the territories it is between 18-23 dollars.

It is not by chance that doctors cannot perform an operation to repair a cleft palate or obstructive jaundice in the Gaza Strip. In Israel, Europe and North America these operations are considered relatively routine; in the Gaza Strip whole spheres of medicine such as oncology, hematology, pediatric cardiology, and problems resulting from metabolic disorders are still either nonexistent or else function only partially and inadequately, and are dependent on experts and medical equipment in Israel.

The deaths of these three infants are an apocalyptic forecast for the health system in the Gaza Strip with the inception of autonomy. The health system, one of the first institutions to be handed over to the Palestinian authorities, will still be completely dependent on Israeli medicine. Nonetheless, the Israeli government may take the opportunity to divest itself of any responsibility for the health of inhabitants of the territories. In an instant, the historic obligation of the State of Israel for the hundreds of thousands of lives under its jurisdiction would be erased, and the profound injustices perpetrated during 26 years of occupation will only continue.

For Israel to do this would not only be criminal and unjust, but would widen the gap between the two peoples. Therefore, the government of Israel must support and assist the autonomy government in setting up the Palestinian health system until it is able to function independently, not only because it is the right thing to do and a legal responsibility, but also because only thus, through the healing of the Palestinian health system, can a bridge be constructed between the two peoples. Translated by Elana Wesley. [ ]

60654. Gowing, Nik. "Hate, Hate, Hate, Hate: Palestinian Hate", in MacNeil/Lehrer NewsHour, December 17, 1983. This poor quality does not detract from the lucid and poignant description of the plight of Israeli soldiers forced to kill Palestinian children every day. The report on Gaza stated over and over again that the Palestinians are filled with hate, while Israelis are filled with infinite benevolence. At one point the voice over stated 'hate, hate, hate, hate' (while showing videos of crowds of impoverished Palestinians) to emphasize that Palestinians are filled with a sub-human and causeless hatred. The reporter stated that the Gaza economy is undeveloped when it was conquered in 1967, blaming all economic problems on Palestinians and their hate. The report stated that Gaza needs Israeli employment and hence Gaza must be an economic colony of Israel forever. The report described the necessity for Israelis to oppose Hamas terrorism, while showing video footage of Israeli soldiers machine gunning Arabs and hunting down children. Gaza is described as 'ghastliness' incarnate, which the news story indicates is a product of mindless Palestinian hate for a benevolent and compassionate Israel. As Nik Gowing charted in monotone: hate, hate, hate, hate. [Report purchased by MacNeil/Lehrer from ITN] [TXT]

60655. Green Party (Canada); Green Party (British Columbia). OFFICIAL POLICY of the Green Party of British Columbia and the Green Party of Canada in British Columbia. Adopted by the Green Party Political Association of British Columbia in General Meeting 1985-1994: Part 09: Federally Focused Policies: Foreign Affairs. Vancouver: Green Party (Canada); Green Party (British Columbia), 1994. Foreign Aid: POLICY CONVENTION, 1990: (a) Whereas, globally, many societies and the bioregions in which they live face major problems such as over population, limited financial resources, poor health and nutrition, severe pollution, oppression, lack of education, environmental destruction; and (b) Whereas the Greens policies and philosophies on human rights, ecology, economics, environment, development, government, population, health, and education are directed to all persons on a global scale; and (c) Whereas it is the desire of the Greens to have all persons and bioregions on a global scale enjoy the same quality of life that we desire for ourselves and our own bioregions; (1) Resolved that the Greens strive to provide, wherever possible, feasible, and appropriate, educational materials, technical, social, and economic expertise, financial and material resource s to societies or local communities in need of assistance to overcome the above mentioned problems which would allow them to live a good quality, environmentally sound lifestyle; and (2) Further Resolved that all expenditures of time, resources, and finances be in effective in achieving worth while goals and be carefully monitored to ensure maximum benefit; and (3) Further resolved that all expenditures of time, resources, and finances be in keeping with the policies and goals of the Greens; and (4) Further resolved that all expenditures of time, resources, and finances be in keeping with the needs and stated desires of those receiving the assistance.

East Timor Policy: (a) Whereas East Timor was invaded by Indonesia on 12/7/1975; and (b) Whereas 250000 East Timorese (one third of the population) have been killed since 1975; and (c) Whereas the United Nations general assembly has called for the removal of Indonesia from East Timor; (1) Be it resolved that the B.C. Greens support the removal of Indonesia from East Timor; (2) Further be it resolved that the B.C. Greens support self determination for East Timor; (3) Further be it resolved that the B.C. Greens support a moratorium on aid, arms sales and investment beneficial to the Indonesian government until its withdrawal required by the treaty [sic: the Israeli abrogation of the treaty was unilateral and dictated only by Israeli goals] and poignantly described the plight of Israeli soldiers forced to kill Palestinian children every day. The report on Gaza stated over and over again that the Palestinians are filled with hate, while Israelis are filled with infinite benevolence. At one point the voice over stated 'hate, hate, hate, hate' (while showing videos of crowds of impoverished Palestinians) to emphasize that Palestinians are filled with a sub-human and causeless hatred. The reporter stated that the Gaza economy is undeveloped when it was conquered in 1967, blaming all economic problems on Palestinians and their hate. The report stated that Gaza needs Israeli employment and hence Gaza must be an economic colony of Israel forever. The report described the necessity for Israelis to oppose Hamas terrorism, while showing video footage of Israeli soldiers machine gunning Arabs and hunting down children. Gaza is described as 'ghastliness' incarnate, which the news story indicates is a product of mindless Palestinian hate for a benevolent and compassionate Israel. As Nik Gowing charted in monotone: hate, hate, hate, hate. [Report purchased by MacNeil/Lehrer from ITN] [TXT]
Burma/Myanmar Policy: (a) Whereas the brutal dictatorship of Ne Win began in Burma in 1962; and (b) Whereas the current State Law & Order Restoration Council (SLORC) government is practicing a "scorched earth" war against the Burmese minorities; and (c) Whereas over 500,000 Burmese have been forcibly relocated, 30,000 have become political prisoners, and tens of thousands have been killed and tortured in the last three years; and (d) Whereas Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League for Democracy (NLD) won over 80% of the vote and 392 of 485 seats in the National Assembly in the May 1990 multiparty elections, (1) Be it resolved that the Greens call for SLORC to resign as the Burmese government and d allow for the peaceful transfer of power to the democratically elected NLD; and (2) Further resolved that the Greens support economic sanctions against Burma until SLORC transfers power to the NLD.

Tibet Policy: (a) Whereas Tibet was invaded by the People's Republic of China in 1950; and (b) Whereas more than 1.2 million Tibetans have died between 1950-1983 under Chinese military rule; and (c) Whereas Tibetan Buddhism has been repressed and over 6000 monasteries and temples pillaged and destroyed; and (d) Whereas Tibet was an independent nation after 1912; (1) Be it resolved that the Greens recognize Tibet as an independent state. [ed-The Green Party has no position on Palestinian human rights.] [=]

On January 13, 1991, the distribution of defense kits to Israeli citizens was extended to residents of rural localities, including towns and villages in the Occupied Territories, who had not been included in the initial distribution. There were said to be another 173,000 kits available in army storerooms for the Palestinian population of 1.7 million, but these were of the type suitable only for adults over the age of 15. None for children, none for babies; in any case, none were given out. After four weeks of Iraqi missile attacks and in a state of uncertainty about the future direction of the Gulf war, the vast majority of Palestinians still have no protection. As of the week of February 10, about 60,000 of the available kits had been distributed, according to the army.

What happened? Were we taken by surprise—either by the war or by the existence of the Palestinian civilians under our protection? Israel has, in fact, been preparing for the possibility of chemical attack for more than 20 years (Michal Sela, Davar, February 10, 1991). Between 1970 and 1987, a special levy for the purchase of gas masks was imposed, through the National Insurance payments, on Israelis and Palestinians from the Occupied Territories registered to work in Israel. Four years ago, the Civil Defense authorities announced that there were 4.5 million gas masks in Israeli storerooms in case of an emergency. At that time, the co-ordinator of the Civil Administration, in answer to a reporter's question, stated that there were no gas masks for the Palestinian population. When asked the same question after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, and after sufficient time to correct the oversight, a similar answer was given: We are responsible for the security of the inhabitants of the territories and we will take care of this in the future...

The hospitals (in the West Bank) have been prepared to treat casualties.

During the period of tense preparations in Israel that followed the invasion, while the citizens of Israel were wrapping their houses in plastic and trying out their masks, the army spokesperson came up with a variety of responses to the same question: negligible chances of a missile attack in the Occupied Territories; the danger of shabab using the masks against tear gas during demonstrations; the impossibility of fair distribution if there weren't enough masks to go around.

When the army finally gave in to the political pressure of the settlers and distributed masks to Jews in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the excuses were thin. On January 13, 1991, attorney Lynda Brayer, representing a private petitioner from Bethlehem, moved the High Court of Justice to order the distribution of defense kits to all inhabitants of the territories. On January 14, the court ordered the state to immediately distribute the 173,000 available kits to adults living in the belt around Jerusalem and in areas close to the Green Line. The court further told the state to make every effort to procure kits for all inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, including the special kits for children, and to distribute them as soon as they were received.[=] Palestinians are not only lacking masks. Those who get masks do not even get the full kit provided to Israelis, which also contains powder for mustard gas and syringes of atropine for nerve gas. It took 12 years of preparation to ready these kits for the Israeli population, Zach admitted, and after all, the government only started preparing for the Palestinians five months ago. However, he failed to explain how it is that, without 12 years' advance notice and without collecting any special levy, there were enough masks with all the necessary contents and including those for children and babies—for every Russian immigrant who had landed in Israel until now, and for every tourist in an Israeli hotel.

In addition to contributions of gas masks from various foreign philanthropic groups, the leaders of the European Community have made it known to Israel that they have a surplus of masks, 2 million in Switzerland alone, available at a low price. Israel has preferred not to take notice of this offer, and, when questioned, Zach stated that foreign masks were often “not of high enough quality.” According to the Association of Israeli Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights, who have been active on this issue, there is no way of verifying whether even those gas masks which were received as donations from abroad ever left the army storerooms in which they were deposited.

There really are many explanations. But you only have to ask your neighbor to hear the real explanation, which a senior army official gave, off the record, to some foreign journalists: “The Arabs don't deserve gas masks. Certainly since their support of Saddam Hussein they don't!” Such is the final status of moral development in Israel.[=]

60659. Green, Judith. “Murder in Beit Sahour: Investigation Calls Settler Killing of 14-year-old ‘Premeditated’: Part 1”, in Challenge, March-April, 1991, p. 26. Another family tragedy was played out recently in the West Bank town of Beit Sahour, another Palestinian child killed “by mistake” by an Israeli civilian, another attempt to disregard the testimony of eyewitnesses who happen to be Palestinian in favor of the version given by the suspect himself, supported by vague and second-hand statements by neighbors from his settlement. Because of the close personal relations which have developed between Beit Sahour and Israeli peace activists, an on-site investigation of the incident was conducted by a team which included Israeli lawyers, the team's findings, accompanied by signed affidavits, were presented to the military coordinator for the West Bank, Gen. Dan Rothchild, and the government's legal advisor, Yosef Harish. Perhaps the investigation and its implications are behind the unusual attention paid to the incident on Israel's television news, which presented slightly different accounts of the event every night for a week Following are excerpts from the report submitted by the peace activists.

In fact there has been an increase in incidents in which settlers injure residents in the territories, while exploiting the standing orders of the army and local authorities in order to camouflage their crimes. These same settlers are using weapons—given to them by the army for self-defense—to carry out acts of vengeance and punishment on the residents, without any relation to the actual level of danger at the time. It is superfluous to say that the investigation of the circumstances of each incident of shooting on the part of the settlers is by nature complicated and difficult for the security forces.

It is our impression that the settlers specifically exploit periods of increased security tension, with the full awareness that it will be difficult for the military authorities to carry out their investigation during such periods, and thus they will be able to avoid their criminal responsibility. Moreover, even when an incident of shooting is investigated, and the criminal nature of the incident is revealed, the authorities exhibit great tolerance toward the settlers, beginning with a definition of the crime which goes easy on the perpetrators, and including “package deals” which offer absurd punishments. The entire process serves the goals of the settlers—at least the extremists among them, whose approach is that the more the situation deteriorates, the better.

On February 18, 1991, at 6:35 p.m., 14-year-old Salam Muslah, the only son of his parents and the oldest of five children, was shot inside his house in Beit Sahour. At the time of the writing of this report (on February 22, 1991), the police had succeeded in arresting a man, a Jewish settler from Tekoa, as a suspect in the crime. Various reports, the source of which is unclear, were published in the media concerning the event, suggesting that the shooting took place against the backdrop of an attack on the assailant by residents of the area, or at least of the blocking of the road with stones.[=]

60660. Green, Judith. “Murder in Beit Sahour: Investigation Calls Settler Killing of 14-year-old ‘Premeditated’: Part 2”, in Challenge, March-April, 1991, p. 26. The undersigned visited the scene of the crime on February 21, 1991, looked over the house of the victim and its environs, and spoke with eyewitnesses to the event. The testimonies were cross-checked with the evidence in the field (signs of shooting, the location of the shooting and the injury) and with the information provided by a doctor who was present at the autopsy. All the evidence and the testimonies fit together well and point toward a firm and trustworthy account of the chain of circumstances. The incident itself began when the assailant was travelling from Jerusalem to Tekoa settlement along a back road. Right after the intersection with Beit Sahour, the assailant came upon several medium-sized stones strewn across the road. Since the stones were placed near the intersection, which in itself required slowing down, there was not—and was not expected to be—any direct collision with the stones.

Surrounding the place where the stones lay—to a distance of 50-70 meters—lies an open field on which it would be easy to discern figures, if there were any. In addition, the area is lit by a large security street lamp. All the witnesses state clearly that there were no other people present at the time of the incident, other than the assailant, and that there was no stone-throwing... This version is supported by the fact that there were no signs of the vehicle having been struck, and that the driver got out of his car immediately after stopping.

The driver stopped his car beside the stones lying on the street (about 5-6 in number), got out of the car, fired two shots in the air, and then removed the stones with his foot. After clearing the way, he leaned his gun on the car and fired directly toward the houses to the north. First he shot at the water tanks and porch of the house next to that of the victim, and afterward he fired at the lit window of the victim's house. It was reasonable to suppose that it was possible to see the people in the house from the outside.

The shooting was a single round (about 6 bullets), and that it was aimed at a specific target is clear, both from the position of the assailant when he fired, and from the resulting hits (except the first two shots, which were fired in the air). It is also absolutely clear that, at the time of the shooting, the assailant was not being attacked with stones, since the whole surrounding area was empty (among other factors, curfew had already been in force for two hours). The houses are quite far off and beyond the striking distance of stone-throwers. Even if the assailant had mistakenly thought that stones were being thrown at him, certainly after firing in the air and clearing the road of stones, he could no longer have honestly thought that he was being attacked. From this moment on, the assailant obviously and without doubt acted in such a way as to damage property and people, deliberately and illegally...

After the shooting was over, he got back into his car and started to drive slowly in the direction of Tekoa... As far as the undersigned know, he filed no report of this shooting or of any other incident; in fact, he attempted to cover up his part in the event. It is reasonable to assume that the shouts of the family after the shooting, which summoned all of the neighbors within a radius of 200 meters to the house of the victim, were within earshot of the assailant.[=] women and in the brain of the victim) and shells...

In spite of promises made by high-ranking officers to the family members of the victim and to public figures, and despite the readiness of the family—quite unusual in the territories—to allow an autopsy and formal burial of the victim, the family was only allowed to hold a sparsely attended funeral (limited to 20 people) after midnight. The breaking of this promise and the aforementioned limitations were seen by the family as insulting, and caused great anguish and bitterness. By the family as insulting, and caused great anguish and bitterness. The family—quite unusual in the territories—to allow an autopsy and formal burial of the victim, the family was only allowed to hold a sparsely attended funeral (limited to 20 people) after midnight. The breaking of this promise and the aforementioned limitations were seen by the family as insulting, and caused great anguish and bitterness.

We are apparently faced with an event of a criminal and cruel nature, in which an armed assailant deliberately fired in the direction of a house that was well lit and full of people, without being threatened by any kind of danger and, in fact, for no reason. If the supposition is correct, which seems most probable in the face of the event, that at the time of the shooting, the assailant saw the people within the house, one cannot avoid charging him with premeditated murder. In any case, we are talking at least about manslaughter...

Compiled and translated by Judith Green [=]

60662. Greenberg, Joel. "As Settlements Grow, Palestinians Talk of Coming Explosion", in New York Times, November 15, 1996, p. A6. Israelis continue to absorb more Palestinian lands in the West Bank, with massive government funding pouring bulldozers into expansion of Jews-only settlements such as Qiryat Sefer. The acceleration at that settlement set off a series of protests by Palestinians that led Israeli soldiers to machine gun unarmed Palestinian protesters, killing one. Atallah Amira. Amira was summarily executed for holding up a sign that stated "No Peace With Settlements". Throughout the West Bank, the acceleration of the expansion of Jews-only settlements has created deep discontent among the powerless Palestinians. In 9/1996, Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai authorized 1800 new Jews-only apartments in Qiryat Sefer. Subsequently, 2000 additional housing units in Jews-only settlements have been authorized by the Ministry of Defense. The government has also authorized the long stalled privatization through sale of 3000 apartments. Amira's wife, eight months pregnant notes: "We are not afraid, and we will keep on fighting. Even if they kill us by the hundreds we won't budge." [TEXT]

60663. Greenberg, Joel. "For Gazan Intissar Al-Wazir, her Return Breeds Hope", in New York Times, August 4, 1994, p. A5. Wazir has returned to Jericho after 30 years in exile: she is the widow of Khalil Abu Wazir (Abu Jihad), a PLO leader who was murdered by an Israeli death squad. Mrs. Wazir has been named Minister of Social Affairs; she notes that she was the first woman to join Fatah, in 1959. She stated having a monotheistic religion with its own sacred scripture, laws, ceremonies, squad. Mrs. Wazir has been named Minister of Social Affairs; she notes that she was the first woman to join Fatah, in 1959. She stated having a monotheistic religion with its own sacred scripture, laws, ceremonies, and even its own calendar. It is not a sect, as many people believe, and the community comprises of about five million members in more than 230 countries and dependent territories. According to the information published by the office of public information in Haifa, where the Baha’is are headquartered, the central theme of the founder of their faith, Bahá’u’lláh’s message is that there is one single race and that the day has come for its unification into a global society. Bahá’u’lláh wrote that the “Earth is but one country and mankind its citizens.” When their founder came to Haifa, he revealed the “Tablet of the Carmel” from the slopes of the Carmel, and from that time the mountain became the site of its headquarters. In 4/1987, new plans were unveiled to build nine monumental terraces from the foot of Mount Carmel leading up to the Shrine of the Bab and another series of nine similar terraces leading down from the ridge of the mountain. According to their Deputy Secretary General, Murray R. Smith, who sent me information via the excellent technology of the fax, only four residential buildings on Baha’i property will be demolished, among which is Renno’s.

“They are defacing an important part of Haifa and disfiguring an important part of the Palestinian character,” said Renno. According to Renno, the houses belong to Palestinian refugees who left in haste in 1948, and since the issue of Palestinian refugees has not been discussed yet in the peace negotiations, such houses should not be touched. Renno believes that the Bahá’ís are changing the course of history.

60664. Greenberg, Joel. "Israeli Court Gives Childless Wife Right to Embryos, Citing the Claims of Maternity", in New York Times, September 13, 1996, p. A6. In a "landmark decision" the Israeli Supreme Court upheld the absolute right of a Jewish woman to be pregnant. An estranged wife won the right to have frozen embryos implanted against her husband's wishes since the imperative to reproduce supercedes any ephemeral individual right. Judge Sala Dorner wrote: "A woman's right to be a parent prevails over the husband's right to not be a parent. Askenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau applauded the breeding imperative, noting: "...the court even had pity on the egg. The right to excellent technology of the fax, only four residential buildings on Baha’i property will be demolished, among which is Renno’s.

60665. Habash, Dalia. "Ancestral Homes Pulled Down for Baha'i Gardens", in Al-Diwan-Jerusalem Times, April 14, 1995, p. 8. The Israeli government has come up with some pretty good excuses in the past few decades of the occupation to justify house demolitions. We have come to accept many of them, often for the mere fact that if we did take the Israeli government to court, we would definitely lose, because they hold the law in their hands. Many see their life savings crumble in front of their eyes in just two minues. These are just some of the different methods of harassment used by the Israeli state. The only way Palestinians can highlight their losses is through media coverage. 1948 was a disaster for the Palestinians, and this is how it is referred to in the annals of history. That year, over 450 Palestinian villages were systematically destroyed by the Israeli Zionist movement and resulted in mass migrations of Palestinian refugees either in their own land, or in other people's lands. Many led to Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and other countries, and resided in refugee camps, thanks to UNRWA and other foreign institutions! According to Nicola Issa of Haifa Municipality, in 1948 Haifa's Palestinian population numbered about 3300. Today, there are between 28000 to 30000 Palestinians in Haifa - 10% of whom are original Haifa residents, the rest Palestinians who fled to Haifa after their homes were destroyed or confiscated by the Israelis, thus becoming refugees in their own land. But what happened to the houses that were not demolished, many in the big cities of Haifa, Jerusalem and Jaffa? Who took them and lived in them? Many were taken by Israeli contracting companies which were created to oversee property belonging to 1948 Palestinians. They often destroyed any land and house documents which proved that the houses belonged to Palestinians. Others were rented out to Israelis who came to settle in Arab houses. Many Palestinians returning from the diaspora found out that their houses had been occupied by Israelis - thus destroying the beautiful memories the original inhabitants had while they were living in the diaspora.

This happened to one man, who lived on memories of his ancestral home in Haifa cherished by his parents and grandparents. Before coming to Jerusalem in 1994, Samer Renno met a woman in Washington, DC, who told him that she had lived in his grandfather's house. In mid-4/1995, Renno came to Jerusalem, and aided by directions from the woman, and a map drawn by his father, he set off for Haifa, in the hope of finding his grandfather's house - the house the Rennos fled 46 years earlier, as the Israelis were coming in. He found the house and knocked on the door. It was answered by a foreigner who claimed to be a Baha'i volunteer. So Renno, like many other Palestinians, found the house in which his ancestors lived, but inhabited now by foreign volunteers who had no claim to the land of Palestine, let alone houses. A couple of months ago, Renno found out that his grandfather's house was slated for demolition in early 4/1995. Why? Because the Baha’i, who now claim they bought the house, had plans for Mount Carmel, at the bottom of which the house lies. The Baha’i faith is a monotheistic religion with its own sacred scripture, laws, ceremonies, and even its own calendar. It is not a sect, as many people believe, and the community comprises of about five million members in more than 230 countries and dependent territories. According to the information published by the office of public information in Haifa, where the Baha’is are headquartered, the central theme of the founder of their faith, Bahá’u’lláh’s message is that there is one single race and that the day has come for its unification into a global society. Bahá’u’lláh wrote that the “Earth is but one country and mankind its citizens.” When their founder came to Haifa, he revealed the “Tablet of the Carmel” from the slopes of the Carmel, and from that time the mountain became the site of its headquarters. In 4/1987, new plans were unveiled to build nine monumental terraces from the foot of Mount Carmel leading up to the Shrine of the Bab and another series of nine similar terraces leading down from the ridge of the mountain. According to their Deputy Secretary General, Murray R. Smith, who sent me information via the excellent technology of the fax, only four residential buildings on Baha’i property will be demolished, among which is Renno’s.
accepted," Renno said a day after coming back from Haifa, having seen his grandfather's house taken apart piece by piece by Baha'i workers. The Baha'i have used all means possible to secretly acquire the Palestinian properties. The temptation of large sums of money led a few Palestinian owners, tenants, as well as Israeli owners, to sell their properties. Similar measures are also being implemented in cities and towns inside the "green line." Renno says it is the responsibility of the Palestinians in Haifa to stand up to the Baha'i actions and protect the properties from destruction. "The houses belong in most cases to '48 refugees, therefore, it is the nationalist responsibility of those that remained in Haifa to safeguard the memories of those Palestinians until their return becomes a reality," reiterated Renno. As for the Haifa Municipality, it is not included in the plans, but they have full information about the details. For them, somebody other than themselves are foeking up the money to beautify their city and attract more tourists in return, thus booming their economy. It is claimed that about $250 million will be spent on Baha'i projects, so why would the Haifa Municipality complain? On the contrary, Issa said that they are facilitating the project. In the same breath, Issa, a Palestinian from Haifa, said that the project will destroy the Arab existence in Haifa. Even though Issa is a member of the municipality, he and the Christian Orthodox community in Haifa have been trying to acquire land adjacent to Baha'i land to build a Christian Orthodox church. But just because it is so close to the Baha'i land, and even though the money to buy the land, the mayor or the Arab police directing traffic, superseding the traffic light and rendering the change of colors meaningless. The driver clearly notices that the traffic lights are not functional and that the movement of traffic from all sides is interconnected. For those that have not been up-to-date with the latest news, try to buy the jerricans in the car - one for water, in case the car heats up, and the other for gas, if you did not make it to the gas station on the way and thought that the gas in your tank would take you all the way to Jericho and back. A thermos of coffee to keep you awake while you are waiting for the traffic to clear up to grant you passage to Jerusalem would help. I do not recommend playing cards or backgammon, because there is not enough space. The Americans invented this great game called Trivial Pursuit, a challenging question-answer game, which might keep the kids not only entertained but also informed. For the record - it takes exactly seven minutes, including stops at the traffic lights, to drive from Beil Hanina to Jerusalem in the middle of the day. When the police overrule the lights, it takes between 45 minutes to an hour. [-]

60666. Habash, Dalia. "Driven Mad by Traffic Apartheid," in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 25, 1994. p. 13. In most countries in the world, the issue of discrimination is rarely brought up when discussing traffic jams. But not in this country! Here these issues are interconnected as those commuting to and from Jerusalem every morning know too well. Let me explain what I and hundreds of other commuters face every morning. First, those of us who live beyond the roadblock in Beit Hanina, north of the city, have to wait in line to get our identity cards checked. Many people drive their children to school, who can consequently see their elders humiliated daily by soldiers not yet old enough to shave. After a long wait at the roadblock, the driver shifts into first and zooms toward Jerusalem, only to hit the traffic jam in the next community, Shuafat. There, the wait seems endless. Parents and kids alike start nagging, foul language spills forth from the mouths of otherwise cautious and conscientious parents. For those not familiar with curses in Arabic, suffice it to say that it is much more dramatic than in English. The line of cars advances one meter every 10 minutes. By the time the driver reaches the first traffic light in Shuafat, at the beginning of the French Hill, the honking starts. One can clearly see a member of the Israeli police directing traffic, superseding the traffic light and rendering the change of colors meaningless. The driver clearly notices that the traffic cop allows more cars through the junction from the settlement road of Ma'ale Adumim, Pisga Zeve and Neve Yacov. It is not a matter of 10 or 12 extra cars, but more like 300. The traffic director does not care if the law, but of course, it still has to be approved by all sides - including the Arab existence in Haifa. Even though Issa is a member of the municipality, he and the Christian Orthodox community in Haifa have been trying to acquire land adjacent to Baha'i land to build a Christian Orthodox church. But just because it is so close to the Baha'i land, and even though the money to buy the land, the mayor or the Arab police directing traffic, superseding the traffic light and rendering the change of colors meaningless. The driver clearly notices that the traffic lights are not functional and that the movement of traffic from all sides is interconnected. For those that have not been up-to-date with the latest news, try to buy the jerricans in the car - one for water, in case the car heats up, and the other for gas, if you did not make it to the gas station on the way and thought that the gas in your tank would take you all the way to Jericho and back. A thermos of coffee to keep you awake while you are waiting for the traffic to clear up to grant you passage to Jerusalem would help. I do not recommend playing cards or backgammon, because there is not enough space. The Americans invented this great game called Trivial Pursuit, a challenging question-answer game, which might keep the kids not only entertained but also informed. For the record - it takes exactly seven minutes, including stops at the traffic lights, to drive from Beil Hanina to Jerusalem in the middle of the day. When the police overrule the lights, it takes between 45 minutes to an hour. [-]

60667. Habash, Dalia. "Elections--Is There a Deadline?", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, March 24, 1995. p. 7. Elections. We are all hearing about them, and they were supposed to take place in November of last year. But like everything else in the Middle East, things take time, and everything seems to get postponed "until further notice." But what are elections? Who can vote? Who can run? Where can people register to vote? All of these questions are running through people's minds, but there is no one to give them a clear answer. Actually, no one will be able to give the people a clear and definite answer until the election law is finalized. Members of the EU are currently working with the Palestinian Electoral Commission in Jericho to put the final touches on this election law, but of course, it still has to be approved by all sides - including Israel. However, the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs has already begun awareness workshops in the Gaza Strip and West Bank to give the people an idea about the electoral process and what they can do in preparation for the eventuality of elections. NDI, based in Washington, D.C., opened its office in East Jerusalem last February. Its work is mainly concentrated around elections in newly formed democratic countries. Its aim is to promote, strengthen and maintain democratic institutes in practice. NDI does not strengthen any individual political party, and it makes its services accessible to everyone. In November, NDI carried out a two-week pilot program on the electoral process for women in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. According to NDI Program Coordinator for Women's Affairs Midaela McDermott, the second phase is designed to be a year-long program
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

where NDI would begin work with the women it has returning from the first phase. This phase, which has not yet begun, is designed to target about fifty women a month (twenty-five from the Gaza Strip and twenty-five from the West Bank) who could attend the series of workshops given by international women on specific aspects connected with elections; these women in turn would reach out into the community to increase awareness among about 5,000 women a month. As part of the first phase, in November, NDI brought over four women to the US from Egypt, Romania, Poland and the US to provide general information to Palestinian women on how to become involved in elections and politics. McDermott said that about two hundred women attended the session held in Gaza, Hebron and Nablus. After talking to the women and receiving their evaluations, McDermott found that women were interested in workshops in two main areas: one, how women can prepare themselves and other women for candidacy, and specific steps they could take in the absence of an election deadline; and two, how women could convince other sheltered women about the importance of registering and having the right to vote, and also providing them with information on the electoral process. This phase continued in March when NDI held another series of workshops in the same two areas, and invited two of the international women to return for them. Natalia Barboro, a political party organizer from Poland, and Karen Woodall, a community organizer from the US, as well as Hellen Ellis, an elected councilor in the UK who joined the two, presented the workshops to the women. Two sessions were held in the Gaza Strip, one for university students and the other for professional women. On the first day of the workshops, about fifty university students attended from the two main universities in Gaza -- Al-Azhar and the Islamic University. The second day was devoted to professionals, many of whom are active in various women’s committees. Each workshop was divided into two sessions. The first was on how to organize women to convince other women to register and vote, and how to identify an issue and raise an awareness campaign for the purpose of pressuring candidates or elected decision makers. The second session was on how women can prepare themselves and others to become involved and run as candidates. In Gaza, all the women came out with positive comments, and many were ready to start their own election campaigns. Participants also got a nice surprise when Saeb Erekat, head of the Palestinian Electoral Commission, came in from a meeting in the next room to distribute their certificates to them. In Hebron, the workshop was held at Al-Rahma College for women, and was opened with a welcoming speech by Ismail Shabbaneh, head of the college’s board of trustees.

He stated that women in Palestine in particular and in the world in general have struggled hard in order to achieve and affirm their identity and obtain their rights. “The women in Palestine has achieved indisputable success and progress in the political and social realms in the last few years, and at this college we help them to attain that,” Shabbaneh said. McDermott thanked Shabbaneh and the staff at the college for housing participants and participating in the workshops. She said that it was a great opportunity to participate in the first elections. The workshop in Hebron was attended by 12th grade high school students, university, college students and professionals. According to one of the women, the workshops are very beneficial, and she hopes that they will continue. The NDI workshops were not run in the traditional manner of internationals coming to the West Bank and Gaza Strip, convinced that they alone knew everything and came only to teach the Palestinian women their way. On the contrary, the internationals arriving for the program came just to share their personal experiences from their own countries with Palestinian women. After all Palestinian women have a long history of involvement in the political process, and do not need to be told or taught how to become politically involved. Some of the Palestinian women have been active in elections in their committees or universities, so it is on the governmental level that they need to become adequately oriented. “I get as much as they do from these workshops,” said Woodall. “It is very important for women to hear that there are others in the world going through the same struggles as they are,” she continued. Woodall conducted the Awareness and Convincing Workshop with Ellis, while the one on becoming candidates and election campaigns was run by Barbara. [–]

15: Osama Hamid (25) from Tufah, Gaza, and Husam Baqari (20) from Sheikh Radwan, Gaza, died from IDF-inflicted gunshot wounds.
16: Ashraf Khalil (18) from Jabalia Refugee Camp, Gaza, died from gunshot wounds sustained when he attempted to attack an IDF soldier with an ax.
22: Ellyahu Levin (25) and Meir Mendelovitch (32) from Bnei Brak, Tel Aviv, were shot dead by Palestinians near Betunia. They were driving to the Ofra settlement, north west of Ramallah.
24: 16-year-old Nihad Ibrahim Abu Hjejeh, from Istia village, died in Maqassed Hospital from IDF-inflicted gunshot wounds he received two years ago.
Ahmad Muhammnad Qawqas (19) from Beit Ummar died from gunshot wounds after special forces shot him during demonstrations marking the three year anniversary of the death of Jamal Adi.
25: Lt. Col. Meir Mints (36), commander of the special units for hunting“wantedpersons,” was fatally wounded in a military jeep by gunshots sustained during a Hamas ambush in Gaza. He was the highest ranking officer killed in the Occupied Territories since the outbreak of the Intifada.[–]

3: Abbas Khader Saiid (18) of the Jabalia Refugee Camp died from gunshot wounds sustained during a confrontation with special forces. Farid Asha’rawi (17) and Fadel Rihan (17), both from Jabalia, were shot dead by IDF soldiers in separate incidents after throwing stones.
5: Iyad Abdul Karim Hinnawi (20) was shot dead by soldiers after throwing stones.
6: Imad Abdul Kallab (20), a university student from the Gaza Strip, was shot dead after stabbing and lightly wounding a soldier, Ilan Gabai, in French Hill, Jerusalem. Kallab stabbed the soldier, stole his machine gun and fled toward Shu’afat Refugee Camp. He was killed during an IDF pursuit.
14: Amjad Shubaneh (20), Farid Al-Ju’beh (22), Amjad Abu Khalaf (20) and Muhammad Saile Saleh (22) from Hebron were killed after being pursued by IDF troops. The four Hamas members were hiding in a house which the IDF blew up using Lau missiles and explosives. The pursuit started after the four shot at soldiers, wounding one, in front of the Islamic College in Hebron. A curfew was imposed on Hebron.
Gregori Feizi (38), from Ashkelon, was stabbed to death in a garage at the Erez roadblock by Muhammad Antar Salem (22), a member of Hamas from the Rimal neighborhood in Gaza, who was then shot dead by IDF soldiers.
19: Muhammad Husam Fanun (20) from Hebron died at Hadassah Hospital-Ein Kareem after being shot in the head the day before by IDF troops. He was in a mourning procession for the 4 martyrs killed on January 14.
Ayyoub Muhammad Al-Qaq (15) from Mezaria Nubani near Ramallah was killed by Israeli troops during clashes in Ramallah. He was about to throw a Molotov Cocktail.
21: Moshe Baker (60) was stabbed to death in Tel Aviv by three Palestinians from Khan Yunis who worked in his orchard. The three were arrested at the Erez Roadblock in the Gaza Strip.
30: Hisham Robin Saqa (22) was killed by an explosion, the cause of which remains unknown, in his house in the Askar Refugee Camp near Nablus. Three others were wounded. [–]

FEBRUARY

2: 11-year-old Iman Yusef Qarshali was seriously wounded when she was shot in the face by a border policeman. They were firing at a car full of young men which they had been pursuing.

Offer Grinboim, Igor Shreivman and Haim Shak from the Kiryat Arba settlement were seriously wounded by gunshots while driving home.

3: Salim Muafi (24), a Fatah Hawks leader from the Shabura Refugee Camp, the Gaza Strip, was killed during an armed clash with IDF soldiers.

5: Khairi Abdel Jabbar Hamdan (27) from Bal’a village, Tulkarem, died from gunshot wounds sustained when soldiers hred at him from a helicopter as he was walking in the mountains. According to the villagers, Hamdan was mentally retarded. The IDF claims he was wanted and pursued by soldiers after refusing to stop his car.

12-year-old Adnan Souri of Jabalia Refugee Camp was shot dead by IDF soldiers during clashes in the camp.

10: Ilan Sudri (23), a taxi driver from Yishvivyah, the Negev, was kidnapped and killed by members of the Islamic Jihad near Ashkelon.

Naftali Sahar (74) from Rehovot was killed in his orchard when a Palestinian worker attacked him with a heavy object.

13: Noam Cohen (28), a General Security Services (GSS) officer, was shot dead when his car was ambushed by members of Hamas in Betunia, near Ramallah. Two GSS staff were wounded.

14: Fares Abu Thakar (17), from Rafah and a member of the PFLP militant wing, the Red Eagles, died in hospital from gunshot wounds he received during a clash with undercover units.

22 Palestinians were killed, including two 16 years old or younger.

8 Israelis were killed, including one GSS agent and one soldier

Compiled by Dalia Habash from the Arab and Hebrew press.[=]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

60674. Hamad, Haitham. "Arabs, Israelis Skirmish in Hebron; Clashes Between Palestinians and Jewish Settlers Are a Painful Reminder That Hebron Is the Main Obstacle In the Way of an Israeli-PLO Agreement On Expanding Autonomy on the West Bank," in Seattle Times, September 13, 1995, p. A8. After Jews from the Beit-Haddassah attacked the Kurtuba Elementary School for Girls in Hebron, the Israeli army attacked Palestinian villages with rubber bullets and manned the rear of the city, imposed a curfew on Palestinians. Eleven Palestinian infants and toddlers were overcome by the tear-gas when the Israeli army attacks a Palestinian daycare center with chemical weapons. Israel demands the right to control the city of 120,000 Palestinians so as to insure the illegal settlement of 450 Jewish militants in the heart of the Palestinian city. The clash developed as a Jewish Israeli woman entered the playground to seize and destroy a Palestinian flag. When she was resisted, a gang of automatic rifle armed Jewish men of the Kach terrorist cult stormed the school: eight Palestinian girl students aged 5-7 were hospitalized from the clash [only Jews are allowed by Israel to have arms]. Jewish settlers vowed the extermination of Palestinians in the city, calling mass-murderer Baruch Goldstein a 'Saint'. [TXT]

60675. Hamlin, William. "1948 Abu Shusha Massacre Uncovered", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, March 24, 1995, p. 2. Two researchers, Fahum Shalabi and Nauf Yacoub, from the Birzeit Center for Research and Documentation of Palestinian Society have produced documentary evidence that in May 1948, Jewish troops destroyed the village of Abu Shusha near Ramle, murdered sixty villagers and expelled all of the survivors. The report, based on testimonies of former village residents now living in various refugee camps, and Israeli records are especially timely because the issue of Palestinian refugees is currently under discussion in the peace talks. Israel has repeatedly denied that it ever used violence against Palestinians during the 1948 war which led to the creation of the state of Israel, claiming they left voluntarily. This argument is used to justify their refusal to classify the Palestinian victims of the 1948 war as refugees with the right of return. The village was first attacked 5/14/48, one day before the British Mandate officially ended. Seventy villagers armed with rifles put up resistance, but the Jewish units succeeded in taking the village. The surviving men were expelled, but the women hid in three nearby caves and remained there for several days. Their hiding places were exposed when one of their number was arrested while searching for food, and forced to lead the invaders to the other women.

Once discovered, the women set about burying the dead. Sixty bodies of male villagers, strewn throughout the village, were buried in a few large trenches. The Birzeit researchers have documented the names, ages, and burial places of the dead. The researchers were told that the Israeli troops later expelled the women from the village. On 5/20/1948, the women were ordered out of their houses and gathered in the village square. They were faced by two lines of Israeli soldiers who told them to walk east, out of the village. After the expulsion of all the residents, the village was demolished. Ruins were visible until 1978, when the area was cleared of rubble and forested. Researcher Shalabi said that many residents of refugee camps have similar stories to tell. He hypothesized that, like a select number of other villages, Abu Shusha was chosen for extermination as a warning and deterrent to surrounding villages. [=]" Psychological thing, because I think women have had enough—maybe it's genetic memory—or being told that they're not up to scratch where men are concerned. I think that a woman has a subconscious drive to excel." During the early years of her career, she had some problems with "...men [who] were very uncomfortable with a young female university graduate who they thought was competing with them." "For a long time, I didn't realize what was happening behind my back," she said. "I grew up in a family in which we were told there was a difference and that men or boys were better than women or girls"—an attitude "not very common, but [which] exists, especially in Palestine." "I think circumstances...have forced Palestinian women to be more in the middle of things. Even in peasant society, women have participated in everything, particularly the Intifada—I don't have to go over all that. Women had to come to the forefront. And I hope now with the Palestinian state that women will have equal rights, equal opportunities, and equal duties," she said. [=]

60677. Harb, Shuruq Ahmad. "Palestine and People: Notes from a Palestinian Girl," in Blandi-Jerusalem Times, September 22, 1995, p. 14. Shuruq Ahmad Harb was in the eighth grade when she wrote this letter to the "Journal of Women in Culture and Society" at Chicago University. The editors of this magazine had asked her to write because they wanted their readers to hear from a Palestinian girl. Shuruq is now fifteen years old, she lives in Ramallah and is in the tenth grade at the Friends School. "The Jerusalem Times" interviewed Shuruq, who said, "I wrote this letter two years ago. I felt that I needed to write to express my feelings, and I wrote that letter in order to breathe. Writing is one of my hobbies. I also like riding my bicycle, drawing and having adventures. I like challenging boys and proving to them that we (girls) can do everything. My ambition is to be a woman who will enter a field in which no Palestinian woman has made a mark." As any girl does, I always thought about my future, I thought of being a lawyer, a president, and the wife of a handsome man. I thought it was easy to make your dream come true, but today, I feel it is hard. Not only because being a teenager is hard, but because I feel that other teenagers and I have to think about the future of our country. I feel that we must grow up in order to finish something important—something we might not want to do, but that is our job to finish. This is the way things happen here and all over the world. Our parents give us their thoughts, their prejudices, and their goals so we can complete them. When I think about the last seven years, I think about all the people I have met. I look to them for answers to my questions, but then I realize that I am not the only person here who wants to know how things are arranged. Time passes quickly, but our designs last forever. They last for our children's children. These few sentences may give you an idea of what I am going to write. I want you to understand more than a couple of words; I believe that the life of every human being is important, but I want to know how people waste something important if I am created to give and to love people.

Today when I think about all the things, lots of questions come to mind: What do people mean when they say words like peace, hope, love, and happiness? How do people think about each other? What is the purpose of producing a new generation if it is only going to continue the war and the destruction that the former generations have begun? If the purpose of living is only to destroy, I would rather be dead, but I think God it is not. My people have always had a goal and a good reason for living. We always hoped to have our own state by any means necessary. Today, peace is the way to achieve our independence. The word peace meant a lot to me before today. To me it meant love, to share, and to live comfortably with other people. Today, I feel peace is different. I feel it is just a process to end a political problem. To those who might disagree with me, I ask: Up to now, how many problems have been solved by applying the political meaning of the word peace? None! Why? It is because of the way we use things. We use each other. We use weapons. We use things with beautiful meanings—but we use them all to achieve our goals by destroying any other meaning. Tell me how many times have you slept satisfied with what you have done? Maybe a few times, but tell me: Do you want your children to sleep in the same way? If not, then give your children the right to love each other instead of the obligation to hate each other. You might hate your enemy, but you love your children. So make peace for them, for the future, instead of making peace to achieve your goal in the present. My situation is not very different from that of other teenagers. I look around me and I see how hard life is here. I want to scream to make all the politicians see what I see. All I can see is fear among the people. They do not know what is happening or what is going to happen. We used to know what was happening because we were told everything, and everything came from us. I do not know why exactly but I feel that Palestinian teenagers are trying to create something new—something to help us fight our fears.

What we want is for Palestinians to be one body as we were before, and that is what we are working on. This is our goal. It may be the same as our parents' goal, but it is different at the same time. They were looking for independence as the state of Palestine, but we are looking for independence as the people of Palestine. We are looking for the things Palestinians have in common. These things will pull us together because they are related to our past and dreams. When we can put all these common things together, then we will think about the future—a future that gives us all our rights as Palestinians. If we could change the present, we would be happy. Unfortunately, we cannot, but we know that the future is in our hands. It could be the way we want if we work together and forget the sexual, religious and racial differences among us. Palestinian girls think about sexual differences as a problem. They know that someday they will grow up to be women, and they also know that Palestinian women worked hard and gave a lot during the Intifada, and that they were respected for it. They also rose in our society as active members. We girls today respect this, but we still think that the Palestinian woman has only worked as a mother and not as a woman. What I mean by that is that we want our society to know and understand that we can be more than mothers. We can do what men do if we are given the chance. We have minds and ideas which can help build our country when it is beginning a new life. What we want to be is more than an organization that calls for women's rights. We want the best for every Palestinian girl. We want to participate more in our society, and that's why we want to be educated so we can face life depending on ourselves. To make this available to every Palestinian girl, we must work together. We must make each girl believe in herself and in her rights. Our mothers worked a lot to make things easier for us. They always gave us a push forward. Years before, things were different, but our mothers coped with the difficulties of life and made a beginning for Palestinian women. Today, things have changed, but the goal of making Palestinian women the best they can be is still there for us to work on. I really believe in my mother and the other women who worked so hard. I think that if they had given a chance, they would have done more.

I see in my society a few strong women who deserve to be respected, not because of how they look, but because of what they are. These women encourage and influence girls of my age. Having them among us strengthens my belief in myself. However, the problem is that there is no place to go to. There is no place in which to hang out. This problem particularly affects young girls who eventually have no knowledge of life except for being at home cooking and keeping the household. How can we meet with other people or communicate with the outside world? If it were in my hands, I would fill this place with clubs and activities for young girls, but unfortunately, it is not. All that I can do right now is to try to prepare myself to make a difference for my children. Our situation is but one of many, but you and others could help end these difficult situations by making others see the fact and by telling them that there is no rest for you or for others if war, hatred, racism, hunger, and illness exist on earth. We want peace and you want peace, but let's work together to make real peace. [=] 221

60678. Harwood, John. "Political Treadmill: For California Sen, Dianne Feinstein, Fund Raising Becomes Overwhelming Burden; It Consumes Feinstein's Time and Forces Her to Rely On Special Interests; The Campaign As Corporation," in Wall Street Journal, March 2, 1994, pp. A1, A5. For her re-election campaign, Dianne Feinstein must plan on raising $22000 per day; she will need an estimated $10 million for her re-election campaign in California (in the last election, her TV advertising budget was $700000 per week). She has already spent more than $30 million in elections, including her failed gubernatorial bid in California. Her projected revenues make her election campaign among the 5% of largest US corporations: leaving her to dubbed ironically Feinstein Inc. Feinstein's likely opponent, GOP Rep. Michael Huffington, is seen as a serious challenge due to his personal fortune of $75 million. Feinstein, whose husband has a $50 million real estate empire in California, accuses Huffman of trying to buy the election with his wealth, even though she used her family wealth to obtain a critical $3 million in loans in her 1991-1992 election. Feinstein's intense fundraising effort is run by Priscilla Burton (with a $1200000 annual salary), apotropaic of Alan Cranston fundraiser Joy Jacobson. Feinstein sets aside Friday for cold-calling for money and races around the country to raise money: within days of winning her Senate seat, she raised $500000 at south Florida luncheons hosted by pro-Israel activist, businessman Monte Friedkin. Similarly, her campaign manager Duane Garett held a quick reception that raised $100000, and even admission to her birthday raised her $300000. Using her status as a woman to raise money, she received $500000 from the Hollywood Women's PAC (including Roseanne Arnold who gave $1000) and has tapped Walt Disney Co. executive Kate Bartolo for $100000 from her network of friends: Emily's List will back her financially, after providing her with $500000 in 1992 (using a bundling technique that Feinstein has advocated banning). Lobbyists Cassidy & Associates raised $10000 for Feinstein at a breakfast; California agribusiness threw a $500000 fundraiser for her in Modesto to gain her favorable attention (Terres Unsoeld, daughter of Rep. Jolene Unsoeld (D, Wash), notes there is a fine line between influence peddling and taking money in return for a key vote.) [TXT]

The emphasis on gimmicks does not start in the classroom. Student: What position of power are you talking about, maximizing the disadvantages.

I also frequently discovered that the criterion for the success, or failure, of a seminar is the amount of fun the students have had. Therefore, if the students report a "fun" day, which included gimmicks way if we had been the physician...

Doors of schools were thrown open to the many democracy loving bodies and human rights conscious students, who would act as tutors and be well paid for their dedicated and thankless work. Teachers within the formal school structure were free to leave their pupils during the education sessions for democracy to enjoy a leisurely cup of tea or coffee in the unexpected intermission - by courtesy of school associations.

Although I am no novice in this field, I am frequently surprised by the indifference of teachers and the nonchallenge of educators towards the educational procedures in the classrooms. Since these activities are condensed into one day with four to six lessons, many teachers try to impress their pupils that the really important things lessons and examinations - are being replaced by a much less serious happening.

I also frequently discovered that the criterion for the success, or failure, of a seminar is the amount of fun the students have had. Therefore, if the students report a "fun" day, which included gimmicks and games, the chances of being again invited to the same school are much better.

I do not know whether one can expect students to absorb new values or new points of view during the course of a one-day seminar, or even to discuss and assess the issues presented to them. However, it is rare to encounter a team which regards that as a measure of success or failure.

The emphasis on gimmicks does not start in the classroom. The marketing - obtaining the school's agreement (and budget) for education for democracy becomes more difficult from year to year. The school's position is that Meir Kahane is no longer a member of Knesset; the issue has become somewhat banal, and "just between you and me, there is a leftist-political element in your education for democracy".

We reply that there is no such thing, no way; after all, we are all veterans in the halls of the Ministry of Education and adapt ourselves to the current 'central issue' this year, it may be the Hebrew language, next year it may be absorption of immigrants.

Then when they ask about the connection between education for democracy and the Hebrew language, and we reply that in fact we do not have much to do with Hebrew, but language and politics go very well together, and that there are subjects, such as identifying demagoguery, propaganda and methods of news reporting which are closely tied to democracy, while we silently thank providence for not making the central issue Yiddish literature.

And when the green light is finally given and we arrive in a classroom to implement project Democracy, the following scenario, which was actually enacted in a prestigious Jerusalem school, may take place:

Place: a classroom.

Cast: 20 raucous students, a tutor who knows none of the students, a teacher not present, but who will perhaps come in during the course of the session.

Action: After introductions have been made all round, there is a role play. In the game, a career-mad physician is required to convince a terminally-ill patient that he should undergo new treatment. The treatment which entails considerable danger, might save the patient's life, but is equally likely to exacerbate his condition. As the physician is primarily motivated to promote the treatment which he has developed, he plays down the aggravated danger to the patient and avoids mentioning them as much as possible. While he does not actually blatantly lie, the physician does not consider it his duty to tell the whole truth.

The rules of the game require that he convince the patient with the use of as few sentences as possible. Obviously, the patient does not realize that he is being manipulated, because he is concerned only with being cured.

One student plays the role of the physician and the others are patients. They have to indicate to what extent they have been convinced to undergo the new treatment. The educator stops the game periodically after the physician has uttered a few sentences, to enable the class to examine what has been said.

Almost all of the 'patients' are 'convinced' or tend to be convinced by the physician. But after all the facts have been revealed, the 'patients' find that they have been misled. They claim that had they known all of the details they would not have been convinced, at least not so easily. [=]

Educator: Well, you are probably angry with the physician for having misled you.

Student: Why should we be angry with him?

Educator: Because you relied on him to guide you in what to do for your benefit, and he not only failed to tell you the whole truth, but used you to promote his personal interests. You were merely a tool...

Student: I think each one of us would have acted in the same way if we had been the physician...

Educator: What do you mean, in the same way?

Student: I mean emphasizing the advantages of his offer and minimizing the disadvantages.

Educator: Meaning that the truth and the patient's interests, which are one and the same thing, are of least importance? Would you agree to anyone in a position of power exploiting that power to promote only his interests? What about the truth? Is that not important?

Student: What position of power are you talking about,
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

anyway?

Educator: The physician's knowledge and being in a position to offer help to another person constitutes the basis of his power. The power comes from the patients' willingness to assign their lot to an authority, rather than depend on their own judgement, on the assumption that their interests are identical.

Student: But what choice do we have? Do you want us not to rely on physicians?

Educator: I would like you to first rely on yourselves; to be aware that only you can be your own judge. Certainly, a physician's duty is to leave the final decision to you, after all possible alternatives have been presented to you.

Student: Besides, physicians are prohibited from lying, because they took the Archimedes oath.

Student: Hippocratic.

Educator: The game is just an example. The exclusive authority which we willingly give to physicians about what is done to our bodies is nothing compared with what we willingly offer politicians and retired generals about what is done to our lives.

Uproar, shouts, one voice is heard: If everyone decides for themselves there will be anarchy.

Student: Aren't politicians part of the people?

Student (excitedly): And if someone, let's say Rabin or Sharon, was in the army, does that make him incompetent? They know better than you or me what war is and what has to be done!

Educator: But what if you are in favour of peace, if you believe that knowing how to fight is not your first choice in a list of characteristics for the ideal politician? Remember that what enabled the physician to fabricate was that he was in possession of important data and you were not.

Student: But why should politicians or senior military officers lie, or not present the whole picture?

Educator: Why not?

Student: I don't understand how politicians and members of the government can lie. They are not like the physician, who studied for many years and know many things that I don't.

Student: That's nonsense. They have all kinds of facts and data from satellites, the Mossad, the Foreign Ministry, secret committees, and at each government session they get a report from the Chief of Staff. So it's obvious that they can conceal information or not give the public the whole truth, if it does not suit their ideology.

Educator: Although you appear to be saying contradictory things, you are both right. The government can lie because there is a kind of consensus that military data is relevant only for formulating society's path. However, in my view, that data should serve - not determine - our values and interests, our needs and wishes. We know what is good for us as much as the greatest military expert.

Student: I also think that WE should determine our strategies and leave only the tactics to the "experts". Besides, there is something which I believe is called the 'public's right to know'.

Student, turning angrily to educator: Are we talking about democracy or making leftist propaganda?

Calls: That's right! that's right!

Educator: Alright, who will volunteer to promote rightwing propaganda?

Angry student: Before you start talking about rights and before you gang up on senior officers, it is important to remember that not only WE live here, but the ARABS also! Are Arabs entitled to rights? If we give them rights will they stop hating us? I do not think that it is good to lie, but the public does not have to know everything. In my view, anything that can help security is the truth. You talk about "interests", "needs", "wishes", but I think that all of these are included in Zionism.

Educator: Our subject is, on one hand, the falseness in presenting a partial picture of reality. On the other hand, the game demonstrated the tendency to blindly depend on "authorities", who in turn rely on knowledge presented to them. Thus we delegate to them immense power which comes at the expense of judgement and responsibility which we could and should have assumed ourselves. The answer is that the connotation of democracy is participation by human beings in determining society's path, values and lifestyle. That, at any rate, is how I interpret democracy. The PERSON is an aim, not a means. If we allow a handful of security people to determine our path, especially in the light of controversy regarding the term "security", we will establish a form of aristocracy.

Angry student: You intentionally ignore the fact that there are Arabs here who want to destroy us. With all due respect to democracy, this is not Holland!

Educator: You do not understand, because in your view democracy is merely a form of political procedure, having nothing to do with the spectrum of society. I am trying to indicate a much broader view of democracy...

The bell rings.

The students raise weary eyes. They had been told there would be games, but someone forgot to tell them that there would also be discussion. From looking at them, it is obvious that the the past 50 minutes were very difficult for them.

The annual hour devoted to learning all about democracy is over. See you next year.[=]

60681. Hilal, Rashid. "Women call for equal opportunity", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, January 5, 1996, p. 1. A Women's rights march was held in Ramallah Jan. 3. A number of women candidates in the elections for the Legislative Council including Hanan Ashrawi and Zahira Kamal. The demonstrators called for equal opportunities for men and women in the coming Palestinian Legislative Council. Their slogans read, "Women rights are human rights," and "No democracy without treating women equally." Islah Jad, a member of the Women Issues Team and a lecturer at Birzeit University, said the 22 women candidates represent a relatively small percentage out of the overall total of 700 candidates. "It is not logical that women are half the population, to have only a 2-3% in the Legislative Council," she said. The demonstration, which was permitted by the Palestinian police, was transformed into a festival at the Friend's School where more than 11 candidates gave speeches. Participants agreed women played an essential role during the Intifada and that they will be the backbone of the future Palestinian state. Hassan Abu Libdeh, head of the Palestinian Center for Census and Statistics and a member of the Election Center Commission, said the number of women voters exceeded that of men in Jerusalem, Ramallah and Tulkarm. Rawya Shawwa, a Palestinian journalist and writer from Gaza standing as an independent candidate, said her electoral program is embodied in her writing: "Some candidates invite voters to lunch at their houses while others give donations to charitable societies in an attempt to guarantee the people's votes." [=]

60682. Hoagland, Jim. "Arafat Game: Win By Losing", in Arizona Daily Star, January 8, 1994. p. A17. Jim Hoagland advances a remarkable analysis on Palestinian-Israeli diplomatic relations based on the racial inferiority of Palestinians. He argues that Yasser Arafat has spent his political life winning with losing hands, since 'weakness can be an asset for the Legis-

Educator: The game is just an example. The exclusive be games, but someone forgot to tell them that there would also be discussion. From looking at them, it is obvious that the the past 50 minutes were very difficult for them.

The annual hour devoted to learning all about democracy is over. See you next year.[=] wearing a black skirt and a black blouse. Are you a Woman in Black or someone dressed in black who just happens to pass by? Are you one of those women who wears black every Friday and protests against the occupation, or are you an anonymous Jerusalemite hurrying to a nearby supermarket, and only chance has brought you to this square at this particular hour? Maybe you wore your black skirt by sheer chance, you were really planning to wear your colorful trousers, but a splash from your morning cup of coffee stained them? You seem to be in a hurry. You also look a bit worried. Perhaps there will be a long queues in the supermarket and you really only need two small things - Chinese frozen peas and homogenized milk. Would you like to know why it is important for you to stand with us, at this place, for one hour?

It is 13:05. Ten women are already standing by the stone, carved with the words France Square. In spite of its official name, Jerusalemites have been calling it Women in Black Square for a long time. The woman standing beside you is Genya. She is now 80 years old. Genya usually sits in the shade during the hours when the heat is at its worst. But on Fridays she wears a wide brimmed hat and stands on the low stone edge which surrounds the square, holding a black hand-shaped sign with the white words No to occupation glued onto it. Motorists much younger than her pass by and curse her. There she stands, an elderly woman in the square, silently expressing a moral political stance and a red-necked taxi driver is shouting at her - "You should be screwed, all of you, one by one."

Fourteen-year-old Yaël stands beside Genya. She is among the youngest and most persistent at the vigil. Yaël has already become accustomed to obscene expressions from passing drivers and even harassment from her contemporaries - who shout and throw empty cans, eggs, fruit and garbage from windows of passing busses at the women standing in silent dignity.

Genya, Yaël, Aviva, Gila, Hagar, Nechama, Polly, Hila and another hundred women who stand here today express protest, disgust, anxiety and shock at the occupation and its fruits. Each one experienced a personal moment when the decision to join the Women in Black vigil matured in her heart - in a bus or at a social event, or watching television.

One woman became a Woman in Black when she discovered that she didn't have the courage to defend an Arab in a city bus. Another joined after a close friend of her son's committed suicide. She linked the suicide to the complicated and ambivalent attitude of her son's age-group regarding service in the army.

There was an item in the newspaper today about sixty babies in a refugee camp in Gaza being injured by inhaling gas that "was discharged" from a hand grenade thrown by an Israeli officer into an UNRWA clinic where babies are vaccinated. People to stop talking about "giving back" territory, proposing instead the "Golda Meir" (4). Moshe definitely scored a maximum Golda by urging "We are all Skolnick" to its alleged rightful owners," he complains "you will be asked to prove to the complicated and ambivalent attitude of her son's age-group regarding service in the army.

During the first vigils, the support you will feel coming from the lungs of infants gives you the shivers. Perhaps that's your moment of joining other women, who through various experiences, have become sisters in the struggle against the occupation. Perhaps you, too, will become a Woman in Black every Friday and stand in the square, with the Women in Black.
pick her up on that one. Sounds like a cue for a joke: an Efrat settler dies and goes to heaven and meets 200,000 Arabs... Suggestions for a happy conclusion on a postcard please. [=]

60686. Holub, Alexander S. Letter: “Humanity’s Dark Side and Monotheism”, in Chronicle of Higher Education, August 15, 1997, pp. B10, B11. Dr. Regina Schwartz is touching on an aspect of humanity’s dark side. There appears to be a pseudo-religious cult, in which authority, the “chosen” are then free to take advantage of anyone who refuses to belong or who is offensive. Phrases like “Manifest Destiny” and “I was only following orders” are often heard from the “chosen”. Throughout history, Judeo-Christian monotheism has promoted an ethnocentric deity who demands an absolute allegiance— or else. This you do not find in other monotheistic religious philosophies (e.g., Zoroastrianism). But we must remember that it is man who creates the gods and invents the rules by which those gods control the believers. [=]

60687. Holy Land Christian Mission. “Notice of The Holy Land Christian Mission”, in Bilad-Jerusalem Times, January 27, 1995. p. 9. Due to the seizure of our properties and the appointment of a committee by the Palestinian National Authority to run the daily affairs of our Children’s Home and Mount of David Hospital in Bethlehem, the Holy Land Christian Mission is no longer responsible for the children, patients, employees, payroll and bills associated with the operation of the Mount of David Hospital or the Holy Land Christian Mission complex in Bethlehem. Dr. Thiab Ayyoush, Mr. Badral-Qawasmi and Ms. Diana Mubarak have assumed full responsibility for the operation of our Hospital and Children’s Home, and all requests for service, payment of bills, and any other amounts claimed must be addressed to them. The Holy Land Christian Mission will not be responsible for any obligations, debts, contracts or liabilities incurred, assumed or created by the Palestinian National Authority or the above-identified individuals or any agents of any of them, regardless of whether they claim to be acting in the name of, or on behalf of the Holy Land Christian Mission or Mount of David Hospital. The Holy Land Christian Mission has not authorized, and does not approve of their seizure of its property, and taking over of its operations, and is not responsible for their actions. [=]

60688. Holy Land Christian Mission. “Press Release of The Holy Land Christian Mission, Kansas City, MO, USA, 1/18/1995”, in Bilad-Jerusalem Times, January 27, 1995. p. 9. The Holy Land Christian Mission is an American charitable organization, dedicated to improving the lives of needy children and poor people around the world. At the end of 1994, we were supporting 20 different projects in 10 countries overseas, benefiting literally hundreds of thousands of children and their families. One of our projects is located in Bethlehem in the West Bank. Holy Land Christian Mission programs in Bethlehem include a wide range of activities: a children’s home and school, aid and assistance to widows, to children and their families in their homes and medical treatment at our Hospital. The Holy Land Christian Mission has previously announced that, because of the high cost of operating its hospital and because of dwindling donor support for its Bethlehem activities, it was going to have to close its hospital. However, the Palestinian National Authority has seized our hospital and all our other assets - in addition to taking over the daily to day running of our operations in Bethlehem. We are therefore unable to directly provide any further medical care for the patients who were being treated, but we are going to make arrangement for their treatment at other hospitals, despite these difficulties. Arrangements will be made for payment to the parents, for essential follow-up medical treatment, required to finish any procedures currently underway. It is obviously a very serious matter that the Palestinian National Authority can seize the properties of an American charitable society, merely by signing an administrative order. There has been no due process of law, and no legal process has been followed. There is no basis in law for this kind of action. The parents of the children will be encouraged to choose the hospitals and doctors that they wish to utilize for such treatment. The Holy Land Christian Mission will be providing funds to pay for essential orthopedic treatments for these patients, assuming that there are no further improper efforts to prevent us from aiding the children. While for years we have subsidized the Bethlehem operations from other funds and other programs, we cannot continue to do so. We decided to close our hospital, so that we could maintain our other charitable activities at a sustainable level, and continue to benefit thousands of Palestinians, but we do not know what effect this unauthorized and illegal seizure will have on our other programs in the West Bank. [=]

Mr. Chairman, I am here as an immigration attorney from New York from that is now a three-attorney firm; and I became involved in the Golden Venture representation from the beginning; and I handled quite a few cases during the pre-appellate aspect of the cases with the immigration judges.

Up until that time, one could say I specialized in this area. I probably handled about 1 to 200 other Chinese cases for persons who fled China based on the Chinese coercive population control policy.

As I tried to assist my clients in obtaining their statements, they asked me for predictions on what might happen to them. Based on my experiences, I made certain predictions on whether they would be eligible for parole, whether their claims amounted to asylum under our laws and policies.

And unfortunately all of the predictions were contradicted by what became a very rapid and furious change in policy right at the time of the Golden Venture.

The clients were in various locations, and the attorneys who handled these aspects of the cases administratively spent weeks locating the clients who were hired by relatives in New York City and other places to represent them. We could not find them.

The hearings were expedited. [here were characterizations in the press of the reasons why they came here. The reasons we heard were that they were coming for economic reasons. I had heard from employees of INS that the women were being brought here for prostitution.

I do not know who invented these stories, but there wasnothing really to support that in anything that developed later.

The harsh treatment continued up until today. As you can see, the proposed witnesses are not with us. And this is a continuing aSPeCi of the harsh treatment that they have been receiving.

In a letter which was addressed to the Honorable Chairman, INS explains why they are not being brought here today. There are two reasons outlined which I have had just a moment to review. Enforcement concerns. Basically, INS is concerned that if they bring the people here to testify it would delay their departure from the US.

Well, they have been here for 2 years and are likely to be here for a while longer. I cannot even guess at what percentage we are at resolution of this matter.

Second, and what I am a little confused about is they are saying that if they are brought here that we would be creating an asylum claim where none otherwise exists, because if they were to testify here, they would receive further harsh treatment in China from the government by means of reprisals.

This seems completely irrational. I think this is the most publicized immigration case probably in the history of the country.

When I tell people who do not know me very well that I am an immigration lawyer, they ask me if I have worked on the Golden Venture. If they know nothing else about immigration, they know about the Golden Venture.

Second, if by bringing these four individuals here we really are creating an asylum claim, what is the harm in that? I think the government has failed to express why that would not be in the interest of the US to have them here, even if it means creating another asylum claim.

And that has been the policy that I cannot fully understand the meaning of:

I thank you very much.

Mr. SMITH. I thank you for your testimony.

And the subcommittee will stand in recess until these couple of votes have been concluded.

Mr. HYDE. Before the gentleman --

Mr. SMITH. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HYDE [continuing.] Does that, I would like to ask the last gentleman who -- I do not see your name there.

Mr. BURGESS. John Burgess.

Mr. HYDE. Oh, Mr. Burgess. Do you do immigration work generally?

Mr. BURGESS. Actually, I have been kind of a country lawyer the last few years.

Mr. HYDE. Well, the gentleman who just testified -- I do not see your name either.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Wilson.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Wilson, do you do immigration work in New York?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HYDE. Is it your information that a Jewish person from Russia who gets an exit visa to Israel but prefers to come to the US does get to come to the US by way of Vienna and Rome and then to the US and is admitted as a refugee by virtue of the fact that they are of the Jewish faith and it is presumed, ergo, they are persecuted in Russia?

That is my understanding of the scenario. Is that your understanding?

Mr. WILSON. Well, I have handled only two such cases and neither of them had arrived via Israel. However, if they are admitted as refugees, I would imagine that --

Mr. HYDE. No, they do not go to Israel. In Vienna they are asked where they want to go, and a third of them, I guess, go to Israel and two-thirds come here.

I asked one of these refugees in Rome why they -- since they asked to go to Israel -- why they did not go to Israel, and they said, "Well, there's a war on there." They wanted to come here.

I am just trying to make a point that if you are Jewish and you are from Russia, where you would be persecuted because of your religion, there is no problem getting classified as a refugee and coming into the country.

But if you are Chinese and they are coercing abortions out of you, nobody wants to talk to you or see you or hear you. Or, God forbid, publicly put your story on the record. That might give you a claim for asylum.
of the loot. Many of these children skip school, do drugs, and are seeking a way to make a fast buck. According to a young man named Hamad, one day last week a group of pickpockets cornered a tourist in Via Dolorosa at around 7 p.m., threatened him with a knife, and stole his money. According to Hamad, the same group attacked a nun the next day. They forcefully dragged her into an alley, breaking her hand. When merchants complain to the police, they are told an arrest can be made only if the thief is caught with his hands in the tourist's pocket. All agreed that this phenomenon is giving the city a bad reputation and frightens tourists away. Many believe that the failure of the police to collar the pickpockets is no accident, since it paralyzes the tourist trade and affects the Holy City negatively. [=]

60694. Iskafi, Ibtsam. "Palestine and People: African Muslims in Jerusalem", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, May 5, 1995. p. 14. There are over 300 Muslims living in the Old City who are descendants of African immigrants. Most of them, according to the community's muhtkar Muhammed Jeddah, belong to one Arab Islamic tribe, the Salamaat. The tribe is originally from Jeddah, Saudi Arabia on the Red Sea. Later, the Salamaat migrated to Chad and the Sudan. Its members, however, never lost touch with Mecca and paid frequent visits to the holy city. In more recent times, following their pilgrimages to Mecca, the tribe would visit Jerusalem to pray at Al-Aqsa Mosque. They began to settle in the Old City, arriving in three main waves: the first at the end of the nineteenth century; the second in 1935; and later in 1948. Having settled in Jerusalem, they soon acquired the local customs, while they kept older traditions that continue to distinguish them from other Palestinians. One tradition is the communal meals they hold twice a month during which a sheep is slaughtered. They also meet once a month to discuss community problems. The tribe presently lives near Al-Aqsa Mosque compound in a neighborhood still known among local residents as the Slaves Quarter. African Muslims, descendants of tribes from Chad, Nigeria and Senegal, also make their home in Jerusalem. They speak Arabic at home and among friends and relatives, although the elderly speak with a noticeable African accent. Many members of the community have participated in the national struggle. Notable African-descended Palestinians include the head of Palestinian policemen, Fatima Birnawi, and journalist Ali Jiddeh. [=]

60695. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 43: Chapter Seven: Economic Development and the Provision of Public Services: (a) Israeli Practice in the Region. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. While thus having the power to control the local economy rigorously and to prohibit or restrict commercial ties with Jordan, Israel has nevertheless preferred to pursue a liberal policy in this respect, and has both removed the tax and customs barriers between itself and the Region, and facilitated continuing commercial relations with Jordan, and via Jordan with other Arab countries, by means of the "open bridges" policy [For the "open bridges" policy, see p.86]. As a result of this policy there is general freedom of movement for people and merchandise [For freedom of movement, see pp.84 et seq.], commercial and other economic business with Israel, and unrestricted passage of goods from the Region to Israel. The policy of facilitating contacts between Israel and the Region has of necessity involved problems in matters in which there is a difference in the two economies, for example in agriculture and the water system. Israel has been anxious to reduce unemployment by enabling residents of the Region to find work in Israel and by setting up training centres for instruction in such fields as building, carpentry, metalwork, handicrafts, and bookkeeping. There is also a variety of courses for women, including needlework, embroidery and beauty culture. Every year some 3500 persons are awarded certificates by these training centres, thus improving their opportunities for regular employment. Accordingly, the unemployment rate has declined from 13% in 1968 to 3% today, which is in fact less than the prevailing rate in Israel. This policy has also led to a significant increase in per capita income, a rise in real terms by 11%. Private demand has

---
riven by 9% and the Gross National Product has risen since 1967 by an annual average of 13% [The data and statistics appearing in this and other chapters are based on "Coordination of Government Operations in Judea, Samaria, Gaza District, Sinai, Golan Heights: A Thirteen-Year Survey (1967-1980)" published on 1/1/1981]. Appreciable improvements have also been made in education. In 1979-1980, the military government provided funds for the upkeep of 942 out of a total of 1320 educational institutions, the others being privately maintained. Since 1967, 26 vocational training centres, previously non-existent in the Region, have been set up in 19 towns. Similarly, the four higher education institutions have been established. The number of educational institutions has increased by a third, and whereas the population has increased only by about 20%, the number of pupils has gone up by 80%. Agriculture in Israel is subject to strict control and supervision through, inter alia, production quotas, marketing and export boards and regulated national haulage, all of which is intended to ensure stable markets, maintain prices and avoid gluts. Producers in the Region wishing to export their produce to Israel, and from Israel to other countries, are therefore required to conform to the Israeli system of controls, including the conditions and quotas affecting Israeli farmers [See further p.62.].

The military government took steps to set up an infrastructure of such services as water and electricity supplies which, before 1967, did not exist in many parts of the Region. Thus, prior to the commencement of the intifadah, there was no national or regional electricity grid, except in the concession area served by the Jerusalem District Electricity Co. Water supplies were dependent on local pumping stations, which generally did not meet the requirements. The economic advancement and consequent rise in the standard of living from 1967 onwards led to an increasing demand for water and electricity in places which had not had them hitherto. For example, a number of towns and villages in the Region were connected to the Israeli electric grid. They included Kalkilya, Tulkarem, Hebron, Faroun, Bala-Zita, Dir el Jessin, Anbata, Nir Shams, Bet-Omar and the Baraka Hospital. In addition, work has almost been completed on the "Electrify Samaria" project, which is designed to make electricity available throughout the Region. Similarly, waterworks, reservoirs, pipe-lines and roads have been constructed throughout the Region. [=]

60696. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-Isreal National Section; International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 55: Chapter Eight: Security Measures: (c) Demolition and Sealing-Up of Houses. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. Article 53 of the Fourth Geneva Convention explicitly envisages the possibility of houses being demolished for security reasons, stating: "Any destruction by the Occupying Power of real or personal property belonging individually or collectively to private persons, or to the State, or to other authorities, or to public, social or co-operative organisations is prohibited, except where such destruction is rendered absolutely necessary by military operations."

Picquet sheds light on the last clause of this article [Picquet, p.302.]: "The prohibition of destruction of property situated in occupied territory is subject to an important reservation: it does not apply in cases where such destruction is rendered absolutely necessary by military operations." The occupying forces may therefore undertake the total or partial destruction of certain private or public property in the occupied territory when imperative military requirements so demand." Furthermore, it will be for the Occupying Power to judge the importance of such military requirements. "Imperative military requirements" have been further defined as follows [M. Shamgar, op. cit., p.274.]: "Military requirements can be of two kinds: on the one hand, there is the necessity to destroy the physical base for military action when persons are discovered committing hostile military acts, and, in this respect, a house from which a grenade is thrown is a military base, not different from a bunker in other parts of the world. On the other hand, there is the necessity to create effective military reaction. The measure under discussion is of utmost deterrent importance, especially in a country where capital punishment is not used against terrorists who kill women and children." [See also Alan Dershowitz' contribution at a Symposium on Human Rights, 1 YHR, (1971), pp. 361, 376-378.]

Under the Regulations, houses may be demolished, in certain circumstances, for reasons of security. Regulation 118(1) of the Regulations provides that: "A Military Commander may by order direct the forfeiture to the Government ... of any house, structure or land from which he has reason to believe that any firearm has been illegally discharged, or any bomb, grenade or explosive or incendiary article illegally thrown, detonated, exploded or otherwise discharged, or of any house, structure or land situated in any area, town, village, quarter or street the inhabitants or some of the inhabitants of which he is satisfied have committed or attempted to commit or abetted the commission or have been accessories after the fact to the commission of any offence against these Regulations involving violence or intimidation or any Military Court offence; and when any house, structure or land is forfeited as aforesaid, the Military Commander may destroy the house or the structure or anything in or on the house, the structure or the land." [=]

60697. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-Isreal National Section; International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 62: Chapter Nine: Basic Freedoms: Freedom of Assembly; Israeli Practice in the Region. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. The Regional Commander, in Order No. 101 concerning the Prohibition of Incitement and Hostile Propaganda of 1967 (C.P. & O., Vol. 6, p.337.), did not prohibit assemblies or demonstrations but made them conditional on obtaining an appropriate permit from the military government. This is the accepted practice in many states which fully respect civil and political rights. If from the application it is clear that the assembly or demonstration will cause incitement or hostile propaganda, the permit is withheld. Following are some examples of political demonstrations that were permitted during 1979-1980 [The total number of political assemblies or demonstrations permitted in the period from 11/11/1979 to 7/31/1980 was 24.]:

11/14/1979: demonstration at the Freres Bethlehem University calling for the release of Bassam Shak’a, -Mayor of Nablus. 12/19/1979: political assembly of mayors at Bir Zeit University. 12/21/1979: mass demonstration of 3000 people against the requisition of land at Belt Amar. 12/24/1979: demonstration of solidarity with Bir Zeit University at Al Najah National University, in which Bassam Shak’a and 1000 people participated.

2/17/1980: conference at Nablus in which mayors, heads of local councils, and representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, trade unions, professional associations, women’s organizations, charitable organisations, educational institutions and centres, participated. 3/25/1980: demonstration at Bir Zeit University in protest against the decision of the Israeli Cabinet regarding settlements in Hebron and the closing of Abu Dis College. [=]

60698. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-Isreal National Section; International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 75: Chapter Nine: Basic Freedoms: Freedom of Assembly. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. With respect to the duty to carry identity cards, the permit is withheld. Following are some examples of political assemblies or demonstrations that were permitted during 1979-1980 [The total number of political assemblies or demonstrations permitted in the period from 11/11/1979 to 7/31/1980 was 24.]:

11/14/1979: demonstration at the Freres Bethlehem University calling for the release of Bassam Shak’a, -Mayor of Nablus. 12/19/1979: political assembly of mayors at Bir Zeit University. 12/21/1979: mass demonstration of 3000 people against the requisition of land at Belt Amar. 12/24/1979: demonstration of solidarity with Bir Zeit University at Al Najah National University, in which Bassam Shak’a and 1000 people participated.

2/17/1980: conference at Nablus in which mayors, heads of local councils, and representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, trade unions, professional associations, women’s organizations, charitable organisations, educational institutions and centres, participated. 3/25/1980: demonstration at Bir Zeit University in protest against the decision of the Israeli Cabinet regarding settlements in Hebron and the closing of Abu Dis College. [=]

60699. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

Israel National Section: International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 78: Chapter Ten: Election to Local Authorities: The Local Jordanian Law. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. Under the local Jordanian law [Town Municipalities Law, No. 29 of 1955. The Jordanian Official Gazette, No. 1225, 1st May, 1955.], the term of office of a municipal council is 4-5 years [Article 8(1).], and it is left to the discretion of the Minister of Interior to fix the number of council members, as long as there are no less than seven and no more than twelve. [Article 7.] The right to vote is granted by Jordanian law only to males over the age of twenty-one who have resided within the municipal area for at least one year and have paid local taxes of more than a specified amount [Article 12.]. Women are denied the franchise and the right to be elected. Under Jordanian law the Council of Ministers appoints the mayor, on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior [Article 34.]. As the Minister has the power [Article 27.] to appoint two additional members to a municipal council (with the same rights as elected members), and the Council of Ministers may dismiss the mayor if the “welfare of the municipality so requires” [Article 34., such decision being final and non-appealable], the Jordanian Government was able to appoint anyone as mayor even though he had neither been elected nor otherwise won local support. [±]

60700. Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section; International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law In The Areas Administered By Israel: Part 79: Chapter Ten: Election to Local Authorities: The Position Since 6/1967. Tel Aviv: International Commission of Jurists-Israel National Section, 1981. Under Jordanian law, municipal elections were due to be held within four months of 6/1967. However, in the interest of maintaining public order, the Regional Commander extended the terms of office of the municipal authorities pending further notice. [Order concerning the Extension of Term of Office of the Administrations of Local Authorities, No. 80 of 1967, C.P. & O., No. 6, p.200.] Elections to the municipal councils in the Region were first held in 1972 [In accordance with the Order concerning Municipal Elections, No. 454 of 1971, C.P. & O., No. 19, p.l099.] and again, with a wider electorate, in 1976.

Until the elections in 1972, the local Jordanian law was left in force, save only for the following two changes: (a) the powers previously held by the Jordanian administrative authorities were transferred to the Regional Commander [Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law, No. 194 of 1967, C.P. & O., No. 10 of 25th February, 1968, p.384; Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law (Amendment No. 1), No. 236 of 1968, C.P. & O., No. 12 of 16th June, 1968p,482, and Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law (Amendment No. 2), No. 312 of 1969, C.P. & O., No. 18 of 18th May, 1969, p.636.]; (b) the powers of the local municipal authorities were extended. [Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law (Amendment No. 3), No. 331 of 1969, C.P. & O., No. 19 of 20th October, 1969, p.667, and Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law (Amendment No. 4), No. 394 of 1970, C.P. & O., No. 23 of 30th August, 1970, p.816.]

No appointments were made by the Regional Commander to the local councils. On the contrary, provision was made for the councils to continue in office even with less than the legal number of members prescribed. [Section 3 of the Order concerning the Extension of Term of Office of the Administrations of Local Authorities, op. cit. See footnote 11 above.] Following the elections of 1972-1976, the military government continued its policy of non-intervention, allowing the elected councils to appoint mayors from among their number and confirming such appointments. The military government also refrained from nominating additional council members. However, certain amendments were made in the local Jordanian law in the interests of the welfare of the local population. Thus, in 1975, the Regional Commander extended the franchise to women [Order concerning the Town Municipalities Law (Amendment No. 9), No. 627 of 1975, C.P. & O., No. 36 of 1st September, 1976, p.54.], who voted for the first time in the elections of 1976. Further amendments were introduced with a view to assisting the development of the local municipalities in the Region and improving their services. Amongst other things, the municipalities were empowered to issue bye-laws, so as to enable them to run their own affairs more effectively. Following the Camp David Accords, negotiations have been taking place in order to reach an agreement granting full autonomy to the residents of the Region and the Gaza District. As these negotiations are still in progress, it was decided to postpone the municipal elections due to be held in 1980, and to hold them after an autonomy agreement has been signed. While recent occurrences may ignite a response. In the Israeli case it is this century’s persecutions and annihilation of half our number added to centuries of recurrent persecutions which struck at our two and a half thousand years of praying to be back in this land from which we were expelled, prayers which gave us a Diaspora identity which in itself has helped us to build here what we have. Together these historical facts have brought modern Israel into conflict with you Palestinians, and have dispersed you as we have recollected here from our dispersion. It is tragic that our tragedy should have caused displacement and suffering to you. We are both caught up in a situation which fits the classical Hegelian definition of tragedy—that of two rights which are in conflict.

We Israelis have to take responsibility for the no small part which is ours in respect to the degree and extent of the trauma which we have inflicted on you. But speaking as a Western trained professional expert who has been astonished and appalled by the extent and degree of what I perceive as women and child abuse in your society, which I have been told is traditional practice and widespread, in your case clearly the substrate to your reactions to our presence and what we have done to you or been provoked into inflicting, is the background culturally accepted traditional treatment of women and of all children in your own society. This is something which you take so for granted that you probably will find it hard to accept as a factor in your reactions at all. There are many of your own well trained professionals tend to overlook this situation publicly, but I doubt they would deny it in their informed professional private capacities. Violence against your own children is there in your educational and disciplinary habits, as it is throughout the Middle East and many other places. Israel’s parliament recently legislated against the beating of women and children in line with recommendations made by EPOCH-End Physical Punishment of Children worldwide. While still plenty of this kind of violence is rampant in our society, including that directed against many of you, we are trying to increase awareness that hitting people is wrong--and children are people too. We have reviewed our law on the rights of parents and other cares, including educationalists, to punish children and have prohibited physical punishment (including smacking, slapping, spanking, caning, etc.) and other humiliating treatment both in schools and in the home. This kind of legislation is something your future government will have to consider, for there is no hope for a future in which personal private violence and lack of respect for children and women are common practice within a society. Violence begets violence. Somehow you and we have to put an end to violence, however outraged we may feel and be as a result of all manner of violations and traumas inflicted by both sides.

For we do and have to go on living side by side and together, whether or not we like the situation and each other, or even ourselves. There can be no recovery, no future which contains ongoing violence. And despite the political situations which cannot be ignored, it is our child-rearing practices, the way in which we behave with each other in our homes who will less will determine our future and our survival or not in this region. The people, Palestinian and Israeli, will survive, or not, together. We will face the same environmental disasters if we do not join in trying to prevent or deal with them, be they in the field of ecology or the next earthquake which can strike our region at any time. Palestinians have to realize that in any war against Israel, any future war in which chemical or atomic weapons may be used, the fallout will be no less on either side, and the disaster will be for both. Future war is unthinkable given the extent of potential regional demise which could so easily be brought about. We know that for suicidal Hamas and Islamic Jihad fanatics it is not this life which counts but their belief in what they expect in the next life. If other Palestinians care about survival, life, and in building a future for their children, then, like Israelis, they must realize that our people's futures and present lives are inextricably intertwined and are dependent on regional peace. Our real enemies are shared ones--ourselves, those who threaten to wreak damage on this region or threaten Israel's ongoing existence and so also that of the Palestinians' overpopulation in what is already one of the most densely populated regions in the world, one with limited resources, environmental catastrophe, and commonly accepted practice which does not respect the human rights of other human beings who include women and children. We each have to overcome our sense of outrage and, whether or not we like the situation ourselves, or each other, we have to get on with the task of getting Israel accepted as an integral and permanent part of the Middle East. Palestinians should be the natural mediators and brokers of this situation even under the present circumstances where they are still struggling to define themselves and are beset with a myriad of other pressing personal problems. We are totally interdependent whether or not we want to be, and we cannot alter this state. No war is already an improved situation, but until there is a real interdependence amongst peoples at all levels, until Israelis are freely accepted as regional inhabitants and partners, until there is full peace, co-operation and collaboration, both peoples will remain threatened at a far more dangerous level than any level of danger which Israel presence, actions and reactions has posed to Palestinians to date. Doctor Judith Issroff is a social, child and family psychiatrist and a psychoanalyst. She is founder of the Israeli Association for Social Change & Solution of Conflicts. [6]

60702. Issroff, Judith. "Peacemaking and Conflict Resolution", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 16, 1994, p. 13. [Judith Issroff, a psychoanalyst, social and family psychiatrist.] The Guernica Institute in San Sebastian, Spain hosted the Second European Conference on Peacemaking and Conflict Resolution in October. With the exception of three Lebanese, two Turks and two Israelis, the Middle East was not represented. A valuable two-day pre-conference series of workshops were devoted to exposing conflict resolution trainers to each others' methods and techniques of dealing with such topics as classroom mediation and nonviolent conflict resolution in a number of settings. The concentration of experience and the collective international and multi-disciplinary grappling with the most difficult issues concerning conflict in many spheres and areas was intense. Among the topics dealt with were the role and responsibility of the media in exacerbating, quieting or as a means of helping resolve conflicts; prejudice reduction training; psychological aspects of conflicts; leadership strategies such as emotional control or expression of anger; and the place of public forums, theater, religious leadership, networks and schools. Most conflicts can be changed once dialogue rather than debate occur. For this reason, different models were presented as ways to analyze conflict situations. By determining which of the factors of the pillars of belief might be tackled, effective and often novel ways are found to weaken and to undermine the existing institutionalized structure of the conflict. Vivid examples from a number of troubled spots of this world illustrated the presentations. The effect was empowering and positive, rather than reinforcing feelings of helplessness and hopelessness about entrenched conflicts, such that exist in the local situation.

One media contribution which aroused much interest and is potentially of great value in the local and regional context, and ought to be made use of by educators, were Pablo Ariel's short cartoons. These simple finger paintings depict differences, intolerance, violence, peace and conflict. These thought provoking and nonverbal videotapes are readily available here for use in a number of situations, such as classrooms, and women's or awareness groups of all ages. What they evoke by the way of reaction depends on the viewers, and the way in which the subsequent discussion is led. Networking and resource facilities were also set up during the conference which included access to tried and tested educational materials. Various organizations have agreed to sponsor training techniques for trainers in mediation and conflict resolution techniques who work in pairs--Palestinian and Israeli--through the Israeli Association for Social Health & the Solution of Conflicts. [6]

60703. Izenberg, Dan. "IDF Exempts 17% of Eligible Men", in Jerusalem Post International Weekly, December 3, 1994. p. 5. 17% of men have been exempted from the IDF for medical reasons, living abroad, and being Yeshiva students, a 5% rise from 1974. The number of women released has dropped.

60704. Jaafry, Kamal. "'Taking What Is Rightfully Ours': Interview with Mohammad Zeidan: Part 3", in Challenge, March-April 1993. p. 5. Q: When Rabin was elected, he promised the heads of the Arab Local Councils that he would improve the conditions of their towns to equal those of Jewish towns. What happened to these promises? A: The government seems to be looking favorably on the issue of equality for Palestinian citizens in Israel. There is hope of some improvement in development budgets for Arab local councils. There are also hopes that more Arab citizens will be hired for work in government offices. To be honest, this positive atmosphere is not necessarily due to Rabin. The commitment to grant us equality started under Shamir. It was the result of the struggles we waged, after having reached an unbearable situation of total disregard and neglect. We are now more aware of our rights and will not be deceived by empty promises and lies. In August 1991, NCHALC set up a tent and held a sit-in opposite the Prime Minister's house and decided that we would not return to our villages without concrete governmental measures being instituted to equalize our situation, especially in the sphere of budgets. Finally, the government held a discussion and decided to grant us equal budgets. Thus, today Rabin is really continuing what Shamir began. Don't forget that Rabin also needs the support of the five Arab Knesset members in his coalition, and the Arab parties want to see Rabin come through on his promises. Although the budgets that have been granted for us thus far have been very meager, we regard them as a step forward. By granting us what is rightfully ours, neither Likud nor Labor are doing us a favor. They finally realized that we are aware of our rights and will struggle for them and that the price of not recognizing our needs would be too great. After 44 years, it is time for Israel to put an end to its discriminatory and neglect in the Arab sector.

Q: In the last elections, you headed an independent list that supported the Darawesh's Democratic Arab Party (DAP). How do you assess this experience? Do you think the Arab parties should cast votes of no-confidence in the government after the expulsions? A: In the wake of the expulsions, the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality (DFPE) and DAP should have translated the public's fury into a vote of no-confidence. Rabin's policies have worsened the situation in the Occupied Territories, as demonstrated by the mass expulsions, the use of antitank missiles to demolish houses in Gaza, and the escalation in numbers of deaths, especially of youth in ages ranging from 5 to 16 years old. Even if a no-confidence vote had failed to topple the government, at least it would have registered our opposition to government policy. Rabin should realize that we are angry about his policy.

The DFPE and DAP declined to vote no-confidence because they believe that a different government would be worse. I don't accept this. As far as the peace is concerned, Rabin has been no better than Shamir. Rabin knows that Arab support of Labor was motivated by hatred of the Likud rather than by love of Labor. He told us so himself when he was building his coalition. That is why he believes he can do things which are much worse than the Likud has ever done, with impunity. We must have a clear view of this government and demand a stoppage of the iron-fist policy in the Occupied Territories. Even if it is now too late to vote no-confidence, I hope that in the future the DFPE and DAP will work together to represent the real interests of the Palestinian
A: Kufr Manda is a typical example of the problems prevailing in Arab villages. The high unemployment rate is caused by two factors. First, we are situated more than 50 km away from the employment centers in Haifa Bay. Second, most of our residents are farmers who could not make a living off the land because of the difficult winter which destroyed their crops. Nor could they find other jobs. Government promises to compensate farmers were not kept. Thus we are witnessing a social deterioration. Some of our youths are turning to drugs and crime. The local councils are unable to solve this problem. We need an industrialization program which will offer our citizens economic stability and workplaces close to their homes.

60706. Jad, Islah. "Tribalism and the Municipal Elections: A Feminist Perspective", in News from Within, November 1995. p. 32. [Dr. Islah Jad is a lecturer in Cultural Studies and Women's Studies at Birzeit University. The above article first appeared in Al-Quds newspaper on 3/13/1995.] [Translated by Sireen Halala.] Preparations are currently under way for the "choosing" of a municipal council for El-Bireh, a West Bank city adjacent to Ramallah. The selection of a new municipal council to replace the one that was appointed by the Israeli authorities is in itself a positive step. Nevertheless, although the process by which this council will be selected will be different than the coming one - whereby the council will be appointed by the Palestinian Authority - the end result will most probably be the same. The process of appointing or "choosing" a council negates, by its very nature, the right of the people to freely choose their representatives, even if for a short transitional period. The process of "choosing" to be applied in El-Bireh has been fashioned on a tribal basis: the main families or tribes of the city will nominate some of their "elders," and the PA will then choose, say, five out of a total of nine council members from the list of those nominated by the tribes. The remaining four council members will be chosen from among the "minorities" living in the city, from lists put forward by the tribal and clan councils (dawawin), such as the Lod or Lifting Councils of 48 refugees. This process might, at first glance, seem geographically based, but a closer look reveals that this "geographical" distribution is based on family or the main families from the same geographical areas. Some representatives of the refugee camps will then be added to the council, although it is not yet clear on what basis they will be chosen. This complicated form of choosing a local council is indeed different from the appointment process which was severely criticized for deforming Palestinian political life. Unfortunately, however, it does not remedy the problem, and close inspection shows that its likely results and implications will be even more damaging to the prospects of developing Palestinian democratic processes than the appointment process.

60707. Jad, Islah. "Tribalism and the Municipal Elections: A Feminist Perspective: The Reasons Why", in News from Within, November 1995. p. 32-33. There are several, albeit interrelated, reasons why the form of "choosing" a municipal council in El-Bireh will be damaging to the democratic process: (1) This form of "choosing," although supposed to apply only until general elections take place, will reestablish organizational forms that have become almost obsolete in El-Bireh. We have not heard about the diwan [council] of so-and-so's family or the sheikh of such and such a tribe for a very long time. A number of factors have contributed to the disappearance of tribal structures: the large-scale emigration of a large number of the main tribes to the city; the increased attendance at private and government schools and colleges (Birzeit University in particular); the large number of cadre of ideological and political parties in the city; the large number of public institutions which led to a more varied population, in addition to the existence of three refugee camps situated between El-Bireh and Ramallah. Thus, what we are currently witnessing in El-Bireh is a revival of organizational structures based on pure tribalism to serve the need to "choose" a council - and as a mechanism that will bring forward a sector that was not prominent in the leadership of the national struggle against the occupation. (2) The rebuilding of tribal structures will reinstate the family and tribe as the individual's first loyalty; this after the national movement for a long struggle to weaken this loyalty and strengthen the concept of nationalism and loyalty to the homeland. Tribal leaders and ordinary people, Christians and Moslems, West Bankers and Gazans, city dwellers, villagers, and residents of the refugee camps were all represented in the national movement. The concept of nationalism and the banner of Palestinian national identity transcended all the factors that divide and fragment the people.

(3) The revival of the link of individuals to their family or tribe ignores the lessons of modern Palestinian history: one of the principal reasons for the defeat of the great revolution of 1936 was that Palestinian society was rife with family/tribal divisions, whereas it had faced an ideological movement (Zionism) which was based on national loyalty to the "Jewish homeland." Having learned this important lesson, the modern Palestinian movement in the 1960s based itself on concepts of loyalty to the homeland and the Palestinian national identity. This new orientation contributed to the weakening of the old forms on which the Palestinian national movement of the 1930s had been based. During the Intifada we witnessed the failure of the efforts of the Israeli occupation authorities to fan the flames of tribal and family feuds. We even saw that families were willing to denounce those in its ranks who were collaborators; some even gave up their right to tribal compensation for the blood of their collaborator sons even before they were killed. (4) This new form of "choosing" will bring back phenomena, such as family alliances, that have long been obsolete. If the party supporting the nominated person is his family or tribe, then his loyalty will be to them - otherwise they will not support him again. Instead of the concept of loyalty to the people as the source of authority, primary loyalty will revert to the family, and its interests will come first even at the expense of the people and its citizens. This contradicts any true democratic practice, because democracy is based on the realization of every individual's participation in public life regardless of origin, religion, color, or race. It cannot be circumscribed by organizational forms based solely on blood relations.

(5) El-Bireh is immediately adjacent to Ramallah, the city that is slated to be the actual capital - in addition to Jerusalem, of course - of the Palestinian state. In other words, it is not a small, remote village. It is, in fact, an urban area, thousands of whose residents are not related to any of the main families of El-Bireh. What role will these individuals play in the process of "choosing" the council? Moreover, the refugee camps have been the strongholds of the Palestinian national struggle; there are thousands of residents in the three refugee camps in Ramallah/El-Bireh. What will their role be in the "choosing" process? How can we establish a capital based on a fragmented socio-political fabric that will be unable to develop progressive projects which will attract the contributions of Palestinians in the surrounding areas? (6) This process of "choosing" a council will not only virtually exclude from the list of voters people who are not original residents of the city, especially the refugees, but what is more important, it will also put a seal of approval on the permanent exclusion of women - who constitute half of the population - from the electorate. It is well known that according to tribal law women may not participate in tribal councils. Therefore, if the current El-Bireh system is made the basis for voting procedures in the future, it will work against women being able to contribute to the selection of the candidates. Women know very well through their long and bitter experience that the tribal structure is inherently inimical to their interests. In the name of the reputation of the family, many constraints were placed on women, and they were even deprived of the rights granted them by Shari'a [Islamic religious law]. The tribal structure forbids any woman from performing public functions. If a woman should, nevertheless, through some quirk of fate reach a public position, she will be considered as "really a man." This attitude was manifest in the statement of the PA's advisor on tribal affairs in the Gaza Strip, as quoted in Al-Quds of 9/6/1995: "In our tribal festival, where we celebrated the birthday of President Abu Ammar, we made sure to involve two Palestinian women, and we presented two women knights, one of whom is the incarnation of manhood and pride in women...."

Thus, the institutionalization of political action on a tribal basis will constitute a sharp setback for women and what women have achieved. In the municipal elections of 1976 in the occupied West Bank, the Israeli authorities granted women the right to vote for the first time in West Bank history. Their hope was that women would vote on a tribal and family basis for a list of "liberals" who opposed what was popularly known as the "PLO list." As we all know, the results proved disappointing to the Israeli authorities since 78% of the women actually voted and the majority supported the PLO-identified candidates. The occupation authorities never allowed another election. Women's participation in the 1976 elections clearly proved that the first loyalty of women is to their country and not to their tribes or families. Finally, the claim that this "choosing" mechanism is only a temporary measure, to be superseded by general municipal elections, does not adequately answer the objections to it. For, as I pointed out earlier, this "temporary" arrangement will revive a socio-political mode of organization that was in the process of fading away. A lot of effort is being put into the implementation of the "temporary choosing mechanism," and it undoubtedly be argued that if it works once, it will work again. Furthermore, the elite that will emerge through this process will certainly attempt to consolidate their position and will argue for making the "temporary" mechanism a permanent one. Moreover, general elections are linked to such issues as withdrawal of the army from the cities, the election of a legislative council, presenting a draft constitution, etc. Because of the difficulty of resolving all these issues, there is a danger that "choosing" arrangements founded on reactionary political bases might turn into long-term structures. Why not instead choose elections format grounded in a genuine commitment to democracy on a wide popular base that consecrates the role of the people not only as sacrificers and strugglers, but as bearers of the right to choose their own representatives? If our purpose is to remove the councils appointed by the occupation authorities and replace them with temporary councils until the general elections, why not reinstate the councils that were elected by the people and were removed by the occupation authorities because of their commitment to the aims and policies of the PLO? Instead, the El-Bireh "choosing" mechanism will return us to a tribalism which is inimical both to women's rights as such, and to all forms of a civil democratic society that could plant the seeds of change for all its citizens, whether male or female. [=]

60708. Javits, Jacob K.; Steinberg, Rafael. Javits: The Autobiography of a Public Man. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1981. [Abstract includes Israeli/Zionist topics only]. For the Jewish-American Javits, Israel was always the "anchor and bastion" of democracy in the Middle East and was vital to US security: without a secure Israel he constantly thundered, the US could not hope to defend itself. Javits identified himself with Israeli interests that he reports Israeli leaders were astonished when he told them he considered himself an American first and an Israeli-Jew second. Fortunately, the US could rely on Israel in the cold war and there was no need for the US to establish close ties with any Arab State: the Arabs could be abandoned to the USSR without any damage to the US, contrary to some critics who thought that the US should have closer ties to oil producing Arab countries to Israel. [p. 271] In fact, in 1978, a group of 177 retired US general and admirals released a letter that stated only Israel could defend the Middle East from Soviet aggression: the retiring retired officers made clear that the US was helpless to resist Soviet aggression without the self-less assistance of the Jewish superpower! [p. 272]

Javits notes: "A wide range of Jewish organizations in the United States concern themselves with government policy. The most important in the early days were the Zionist Organization of America, which sent funds and immigrants to help Israel get started, and the American Jewish Congress and the American Jewish Committee, which were also effective in the civil rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s. [sic] Educational, charitable, and service organizations such as Hadassah and B'nai Brith and the National Council of Jewish Women also make their views known publicly and since their memberships are large and politically aware, they are listened to. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) is a registered lobbying organization. For many years it was under the direction of Isaiah 'Si' Kenan, who won the confidence of members of Congress because he operated dependably and reasonably, always on the basis of facts. he never approached a member of either house before carefully evaluating the significance of his suggestions to the individual congressman and his district, or senator and his state, and he knew the states and districts well enough to make intelligent judgements consistently. In 1951, when I was in the House, kenan and I worked closely together in obtaining for Israel a significant grant of economic aid from the United States. It was the first US economic aid for Israel." [pp. 280-281] Javits notes proudly that the US provided the “Jewish state” (energized by the injustice of a proposal to give money to Palestinian refugees from the Jewish Race-State [p. 280]) by presenting the spectre of Jewish voters in each district, voters with "absolute and unqualified support" for Israel, holding that Congressman personally responsible for the fall of Israel. [p. 281]. With Rep. Manny Cellar, a declaration was circulated in Congress to stress that aid to Israel would transform the Jewish state into a ‘military, economic and ideological bastion for the free world in the Middle East.’ [p. 280]

Javits’ constant work for Israel in Congress was reinforced by the work of four important American Jewish Zionists: (1) rabbi-stateman Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg of Englewood, New Jersey, of the American Jewish Congress; (2) of former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, who gave Israel key support in 1967 as the US Ambassador to the United Nations; (3) of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger who has a deep devotion to the Jewish People; and (4) Max Fisher, Detroit businessman and perhaps the most successful fundraiser for Israel in the United States. [pp. 281-282]

60709. Jawad, Saleh Abdul. "The Balance of Power Among the Political Forces in the West Bank: The PLO Factsions: Part 1", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993. p. 8-10. Among all the forces which are under the banner of the PLO, the National Liberation Movement (Fatah) forms the mainstream and the primary political power in the West Bank. This is because it bases itself on the principal of broad popular support, especially in the refugee camps and most villages, following in line but far behind, is the Popular Front for the liberation of Palestine, under the leadership of Dr. George Habash. Third, with only slightly less supporters, comes the Palestine Communist Party, which changed its name to the Palestine People's Party. In fourth place comes the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which is being weakened because of the split it is suffering.

When the intifada started, and despite the conflicts with the Islamic trend represented by the Moslem Brotherhood, these forces were not able to find a unified apparatus to lead the national struggle. This disunity is a result of the split which occurred in Fatah in 1983, the disunity is a result of the split which occurred in Fatah in 1983, the occupation authorities granted women the right to vote for the first time in depending and reasonably, always on the basis of facts, they never approached a member of either house before carefully evaluating the significance of his suggestions to the individual congressman and his district, or senator and his state, and he knew the states and districts well enough to make intelligent judgements consistently. In 1951, when I was in the House, Kenan and I worked closely together in obtaining for Israel a significant grant of economic aid from the United States. It was the first US economic aid for Israel. ['pp. 280-281] Javits notes proudly that the US provided the “Jewish state” (energized by the injustice of a proposal to give money to Palestinian refugees from the Jewish Race-State [p. 280]) by presenting the spectre of Jewish voters in each district, voters with “absolute and unqualified support” for Israel, holding that Congressman personally responsible for the fall of Israel. [p. 281]. With Rep. Manny Cellar, a declaration was circulated in Congress to stress that aid to Israel would transform the Jewish state into a “military, economic and ideological bastion for the free world in the Middle East.” [p. 280]

Javits’ constant work for Israel in Congress was reinforced by the work of four important American Jewish Zionists: (1) rabbi-stateman Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg of Englewood, New Jersey, of the American Jewish Congress; (2) of former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, who gave Israel key support in 1967 as the US Ambassador to the United Nations; (3) of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger who has a deep devotion to the Jewish People; and (4) Max Fisher, Detroit businessman and perhaps the most successful fundraiser for Israel in the United States. [pp. 281-282] generously contributed to Fatah made the achievement of this goal attainable.

Fatah was soon able to control the institutions that, until then, had enjoyed only the attention of the Communist Party, and a lesser part, the attention of the Democratic Front. The DFLP entered the institution field in the second half of the 1970s, and it established the first women's organization in the occupied territories (the Women's Action Committees). [=]

60710. Jawad, Saleh Abdul. "The Balance of Power Among the Political Forces in the West Bank: The PLO Facts: Part 2", in Al-Fajr Jerusalem Palestinian Weekly (New York), April 19, 1993, p. 8-10. Within a few years, Fatah's Abu Jihad—who was responsible for the "western sector," the apparatus that dealt with the affairs of the occupied territories—was able to establish a large network of new institutions. He was also able to penetrate and control organizations and unions that were traditionally controlled by leftist and independent forces. Among these organizations were the Shabiba (Youth) student movements, which were established at the beginning of the 80s by Abdul Aziz Shahnin (Abu Ali Shahin). Consequently, the control of Fatah supporters was spread to most professional, educational and health sectors and unions.

The Intifada was spontaneous, the culmination of years of political, psychological and economic pressures exerted by Israeli occupation. Still, the continuity of the Intifada and its momentum cannot be understood at all without taking into consideration the bulk of the enormous efforts played by Fatah and the rest of the national factions in building the popular frameworks and organizations, all of which formed the bases of the Intifada and its main artery.

There are two main reasons that Fatha is losing part of its traditional base in the refugee camps and villages to Hamas and Islamic Jihad: (1) The upsurge of the Islamic movement, and (2) the increased criticism that the PLO is suffering (about its dead-end political program, rumors of misappropriation of funds, chaos in the appointment of people to positions, etc.).

The dilemma of the leftist organizations seems to be more complicated, in light of the collapse of the socialist campo. This added another dimension to the traditional dilemma manifested in the ideologies of these organizations, which didn't appeal to the conservative Palestinian society. Plus, there were splits that struck at some of these organizations, particularly the Democratic Front.

While the national camp is united on the goal of establishing an independent Palestinian state, and unified in its attitude toward the upsurge of the fundamentalist movement, it is still suffering from a deep schism, particularly int he aftermath of the latest political approaches of the Palestinian National Council, held in the Algiers 11/15/88. The schism was widened by participation in the current peace negotiations taking place between the Arab parties and Israel.

The fragmentation of the national camp has led to some kind of fragile rapprochement between the Popular Front, the Democratic Front-Nayef Hawatmeh branch, and Hamas. This rapprochement, however, is not viable in the long run due to the sharp socio-ideological contradiction among them. [=]

60711. Jerrett, Martin. "Route Sixty Ploughs Through Hebron Vineyards", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, November 24, 1995, p. 1. Israeli bulldozers completed preliminary ground leveling work in the Hebron area 11/22/1995, for Route Sixty. In the process, they destroyed over five thousand dunums of farmland, mainly vineyards around Hebron and Halhoul. The Israelis had ignored specific instructions from the Israeli High Court to divert the route in order to reduce the harm done to the surrounding agricultural land, as well as to the homes and property of the Palestinians. Route Sixy is part of the settlement plan promulgated by the Israeli Government. Running north to south, it effectively splits the West Bank into two. On Sunr. 11/18/1995, Israeli bulldozers began leveling vineyards in the Buqa' and Wadi Mazeen area outside the city of Hebron four days before the expiry of a two week moratorium imposed by the Israeli High Court. Locals, the Salvation Committee and landowners met with Israeli surveyors and the military governor in Hebron. They discussed changes that would divert the route away from the Palestinian property. On 11/20/1995, standing amidst the ruins of her vineyard, the widow of Ismail Jaber and her four children faced Israeli soldiers and civil administration officers. She screamed, "They are taking the bread away from the widow and the orphan. Our only source of income." The women, age fifty, called upon legal and international institutions to come to her rescue. She then picked up a branch of the destroyed vine and strode forward. An officer of the Civil Administration then instructed the commanding officer, Major Fuad, to see that all orders were followed. The soldiers cocked their guns and lined up to prevent the woman from advancing. The woman fainted. Members of the municipal council, who were also on hand, argued that the Israeli High Court had issued orders to suspend work for fourteen days until a solution was found to the direction of the route. The two week period expired yesterday, 11/22/1995, but work had restarted four days previous.

According to the Deputy Mayor, Doctor Awni Sughayer, Hebron municipality contacted the Palestinian National Authority and asked them to intervene. The Palestinian National Authority managed to halt the road building for twenty-four hours only before work recommenced. The municipality is currently preparing a letter of protest to the Israeli Minister of Defense, Shimon Peres. The Deputy Mayor has several times tried to contact the Military Governor of the West Bank, but he has refused to see him. Although the Municipality met with Israeli surveyors and the engineer responsible for the circular roads, talks to avert major damage to Palestinian farmland were unsuccessful. Doctor Sughayer, speaking to the "The Jerusalem Times", said, "We believe these acts [the construction of circular roads] do not accord with the spirit of peace." He added that, with such a policy being implemented by the Israeli Authorities on Palestinian land, they were creating an unsuitable climate for the elections. The Municipality demanded Major Fuad redirect the works in the direction of the hilly areas so no damage would be done to agricultural lands and to give the local landowners a chance to exercise their legal rights. Major Fuad replied that no instructions from the Israeli High Court had been handed down to them ordering them to cease work in agricultural areas. They had, he said, been informed by the Commander of the Central Area to go ahead with the roadworks. One landowner, the wife of Nihad Jaber, questioned the meaning of co-existence when the family's only source of livelihood was being destroyed. "How can there be peace when there is no stability and twenty-five hundred dunums of our land are being destroyed?" she asked. Another Hebron landowner, Ya'aqoub Tawil, age sixty, lost thirty dunums in the Bireen area, south of Hebron, after the Israelis had confiscated it for a circular road linking the settlements of Bet Haggal and Inan-Al-Bateh to the Kiryat Arba road. In addition, settlers polluted a well on his land and the water can no longer be used. The Israeli Courts awarded him 50000 NIS in compensation which he has yet to receive. A total of 1500 olive trees were uprooted to make way for the thirty-two meter wide road that passes through his land. When he protested to the Civil Administration, they offered him only sixty NIS for each tree he lost. He does not believe they will even pay him this amount. At one point, the road carves its way through the side of a hill. Mister Tawil has a house there which is now inaccessible as the road to it was destroyed by the new road. Tawil said that he would hire an Israeli lawyer to fight his case, but he remains pessimistic about the outcome. Locals said that there could be no peace as long as the settlers were passing in their midst. They fear that the circular roads will become launching pads for settlers wanting to terrorize them. [=] that too many unprofessional bodies, including the Orient House, meddle in attempting to relieve the acute housing shortage that is aggravated by Israeli policies of land confiscation and refusal to grant building licenses to Palestinians. "Orient House, which has the unchallenged political and moral support as the seat of our negotiating teams doesn't have the expertise to deal with economic, tourism and housing problems," Siniora argued. He then said that there was already a specific, professional body - The Housing Council - that was technically capable of dealing with the housing problem. Siniora continued: "All it (The Housing Council) needs is proper financial backing and the appointment of a full-time head rather than the current post of a part-time volunteer." Lastly, Siniora discussed the role of women in building the state of Palestine and ending the occupation. Women are as important as men in this respect he affirmed. He noted that 49% of the electorate were women, yet out of a total of around 700 candidates running, only 22 were women. He recommended that in addition to forming special legislation to protect women's civil liberties, the Council should also reserve no less than 20% of the seats for women. Hanna Siniora is running for one of the two Christian seats that have been allocated for East Jerusalem.

60713. Jerrett, Martin. "Textile Sector Employs 50000, 80% Female Workers", in Biladi-Jerusalem Times, December 1, 1995. p. 11. The Palestinian clothing industry has the most export potential of all sectors of Palestinian manufacture. The textile and garments sector employs around 50000 people, 80% of whom are female workers. Hebron is the center of shoe manufacture in the West Bank and Gaza. There are 20 automated factories and around 400 workshops employing between 2-10 workers in the town. Together they produce 20000 pairs of shoes daily. The industry imports 60% of its raw materials from Italy, Germany and Taiwan; the remaining 40% come from domestic sources. According to Haj Jibril Al-Natsheh, who owns the Reem Sport Shoes factory in Hebron, the industry is only operating at 40% of its potential capacity. The main problem faced by the shoe manufacturing industry is the difficulty in obtaining raw materials such as the right polymers and PVC materials for making the soles of the shoes. There is also a lack of people that can design new products that would be able to sell in overseas markets. In addition, there is a lack of knowledge about foreign markets, says Haj Al-Natsheh, and the only way to gain this knowledge and penetrate markets in Europe or the US is to initiate joint ventures with foreign companies. Haj Al-Natsheh also says that the industry needs an industrial zone to provide more facilities if the industry as a whole is to expand. The textiles, leather and clothes sector of Palestinian industry retains the most potential for industrial development in the Palestinian economy. Some 37% of Palestinians employed in the industrial sector as a whole work in establishments producing clothes and textiles. Only 30 places employ 50 or more workers. Twenty of these establishments belong to the garment sector. Reem Sport, for example, employs 50 people making it one of the largest shoe factories in the West Bank and Gaza. They sell 80% of their products on the local Palestinian market (60% in the West Bank and 20% in the Gaza Strip) and export the remaining 20% to Israel. Haj Al-Natsheh says only 1% of total production of his factory has been subcontracted by Israeli firms. [=]
These meetings established a shared understanding and commitment based on the recognition of the rights of all peoples in the region to live in dignity and security, the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and sovereignty alongside Israel, and the right of all people to choose their legitimate representatives. This joint venture embraced fundamental principles of independence, parity and coexistence. It also articulated the agreed means for the resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict on the basis of these principles.

Palestinian-Israeli Action Committees: Parallel to the creation of the JCW, the Israeli women established their own center, Bat Shalom. The centers operate completely independently, each maintaining its own organizational and executive integrity. However, the two centers carry out joint programs through their coordinating body, the Jerusalem Link. For that purpose, the following subcommittees were established: The Jerusalem Committee, the Peace Watch Committee, the Training Committee and the Media and Publication Committee.

Spheres of Action: Since its establishment in 3/1994, the Center has been implementing the following major and diverse projects it is currently planning to expand its activities through concrete programs capable of addressing the new challenges facing women in the context of changing Palestinian realities.

1. Training and Empowerment Activities: The Center held a series of training courses, seminars and symposia designed to develop Palestinian women's leadership skills and potential. The aim of these courses and similar future programs is to enable the expression of an effective and focal women's perspective on crucial political and social issues. Such activities aim at promoting the genuine empowerment of women and training them to assume central roles at all levels in the political, social and cultural spheres.

2. Young Women Activities: The Center is holding a series of training courses, lectures and workshops specifically geared to high school and university students as well as new graduates. The targeted age group is 14-25. The young women will work within two main projects: (a) Community Work Groups that seek to address the Palestinian community's major persistent concerns. (b) Palestinian-Israeli Dialogue Group in which topics of mutual interest and concern are addressed with the objective of exerting a constructive influence on the pattern of future interaction between the two peoples.

3. Activities to Defend Occupied Palestinian Jerusalem: Two types of activities are planned to protect the Palestinian right to sovereignty over East Jerusalem and bring it to the attention of international scrutiny: (1) Lectures and dialogue meetings that present the issue of Jerusalem to reveal the Israeli government's policies and measures toward the city. The Israeli government's unilateral action to consolidate its illegal annexation of Jerusalem and prejudice its fate will form the focus of these meetings. (2) The formation of lobby groups and information campaigns to mobilize popular and official countermeasures to stem the Israeli government's violations of Palestinian rights in Jerusalem.

4. Violations of Women's Human Rights: In coordination with various non-governmental organizations, the Center seeks to monitor violations against women and to provide an effective support system, in addition to reinforcing women's rights.

60715. Kamal, Sami. "War of Words Fails to Reopen Mount David", in Bilad-Jerusalem Times, January 27, 1995, p. 9. The Minister of Social Affairs Intisar Al-Wazir (Um Jihad) announced on 1/19/1995 the PNA is taking over the Mount of David Hospital for Crippled Children. Al-Wazir said the Christian Holy Land Mission is no longer in charge of the Bethlehem hospital. In its place a committee of trustees has been formed to supervise day-to-day operations. A week has now passed since the PNA takeover, but the hospital remains closed. Employees are unsure when they will be able to go back to work, deputy staff nurse Hanneh Mafi told journalists. Malia said she has heard the PNA will reopen the hospital as soon as legal matters concerning the administrative changes are settled. She also said no one is quite sure why the hospital was shut down in the first place. Deputy Minister for Social Affairs Diab Ayyoush told The Jerusalem Times this week the hospital will be reopened when the Mission formally and legally hands over the keys, hospital register and all documents concerning the patients. He added that the Mission remains responsible for the payroll until the keys are turned over. Asked where the budget - estimated at $2 million a year - is to come from once the takeover is completed, Ayyoush said, "We shall appeal to charitable societies, though the Christian Holy Land Mission is also welcome to contribute if it wishes." The PNA action has resulted in the hospital being shut down five months ahead of the closure date set by the mission. The plan was to have the operation phased out by 5/1995. To date, 123 out of 160 employees have received compensation from the Christian Holy Land Mission. The 37 others have been notified they will be receiving their compensation at a later date. The deputy director of the hospital, Dr. Fuad Alfi, hinted at the reason when he said the mission's bank account has a zero balance. In an announcement last week, Al-Wazir implied that the decision to close the hospital earlier than expected was due to an infraction of the 1966 Law for Charity Societies. A clearer statement comes from the PNA-appointed board of trustees. It accused the mission of selling off some of the property in Bethlehem contrary to the Law of Charity Societies which prevails in the West Bank.

In a letter sent through the mission's attorney, Fuad Shehadeh, Al-Wazir also informed the executive director of the mission, Joseph Grigke, that "the sale or rent of the property is prohibited. Nor can it be given in donation, the letter said. The matter does not rest there, however. Over the weekend (1/22/1995), the Christian Holy Land Mission and representatives of the PNA-appointed board, traded accusations in a series of statements published in the local press. The Christian Holy Land Mission accused the PNA of seizing the property and taking over the day-to-day operation running of the hospital, including the adjoining orphanage, and the care program for the needy and the elderly. The mission also stated the PNA move is illegal, in light of which it no longer considers itself responsible for running either the hospital or adjoining orphanage. It said full responsibility for the financial aspects for the hospital devolves now on the Board of Trustees appointed by the PNA which included the Deputy Minister for Social Affairs Diab Ayyoush, Badr Qawasmi, and Diana Mubarak. In a statement on 1/21/1995 addressed to its patients, the mission explained it could no longer meet the costs of running the hospital due to a drop in contributions from donors and offered to have pending cases transferred to other hospitals to be treated at its expense. However, it made the offer conditional, saying this service would be provided if no further steps are taken to prevent the mission from helping the children. There are 1300 children on the waiting list for operations and another 300 children who have undergone a first operation but need further treatment, according to hospital deputy director Dr. Alfi. A statement published by the PNA Board of Trustees on 1/22/1995 contested the mission's explanation over insolvent - the board said the mission's claim that they are experiencing financial difficulties is simply not true. They accused the mission of twisting the facts and of shirking its responsibilities. The trustees explained the mission had opted to have the hospital shut down at its own initiative, and added the PNA Ministry of Social Affairs got involved because of the illegal actions of the mission. They stressed the PNA's action was not directed against anyone, but was taken to save the hospital.

Another statement from the mission stressed the PNA had committed a grave error when it seized the property of an American charity society, basing itself on an administrative order, without taking any legal steps to prepare the move. The mission stressed that there was no legal basis for the seizure, and said it is not sure what the effect of the seizure will be on its other activities in the West Bank. In the meantime, The Jerusalem Times has learned from Ayyoush that the Ministry of Health Riyad Za'noun sent a proposal this week to the headquarters of the Christian Holy Land Mission headquarters in Kansas City, the US, for a plan that could lead to the reopening of the hospital. No details have been disclosed. Asked about the contents of the proposal, Ayyoush said the PNA is not against the idea of the mission taking charge again. "We are not averse to the idea if the mission is willing to reconsider. Of course, we will not be running the hospital then," he said.
Jerusalem had been long, uncomfortable and terribly disappointing. This advocating the formation of a Jewish Army to fight on the side of the Liberation: Part 02: A Dream Comes True. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni to have a look at the war. But in actual fact we came because Shmuel enquirers that we had come to London from the security of South Africa dependents are remembered—and revered. [=] The war years we had spent in London, arriving there from the immigration into the one land of the earth that could yet save the goats and chickens, and an Egyptian doctor, who joined in the Palestine immigration. But the unforgettable cannot be her claims on Egypt. “If only they would leave the Egyptians in peace,” he mourned. “We don’t want to interfere with anyone and we don’t want to be overcome. The manacles of a foreign power were clamped Zionism, brought up on the Utopian propaganda of the silver-tongued troubadours sent out by the Jewish Agency for Palestine, the first sight of his beloved homeland in those days must have come as a terrific shock— that is if he arrived via the Suez Canal and entered the holy territory by way of Kantara, the frontier control post between Egypt and Palestine. It is true that after Port Said with its screaming beggars and peddlars, its fly-infested children, its leprous outcasts and its thieving porters and officials, this was a veritable haven of peace. But where were the bluer-than-blue skies, the cows whose udders trailed on the earth, swollen and blessed with rich, creamy milk; and the golden oranges tenderly plucked by blonde, sun-tanned gods and goddesses? All were sadly lacking in the hot, dusty countryside at the Palestine border.

If the Zionist propagandists forgot to mention the questionable comforts of the Palestine trains, they may well be forgiven; for the railways were run by the Mandatory Government and were in no way the responsibility of the Jewish Agency. But they should have warned the unwary traveller to prepare for the six inches of dust in the carriages and for the complete lack of water or sanitary conveniences on a journey which lasted twelve hours. I cheerfully accepted the dirt and discomfort because Shmuel, my husband, assured me that my first sight of Jerusalem would compensate for this ephemeral sordidness. I waited patienty and good-humorously at Lydda Junction for the branch train to Jerusalem, because I knew the real thrill was still to come.

Our fellow-passengers were a curious assortment of Arabs, goats and chickens, and an Egyptian doctor, who joined in the conversation when he heard Shmuel and me talking in English to each other. He immediately started off on a long harangue against Britain and her claims on Egypt. “If only they would leave the Egyptians in peace,” he mourned. “We don’t want to interfere with anyone and we don’t want to be interfered with.” Shmuel asked pertinently why Egypt stunk her nose into Palestine then. The answer came with the painless of an oft-repeated argument: “Palestine is our business. The Jews are giving the fellaheen notions well-above themselves; and if the Palestinian fellaheen get such notions, so will the Egyptian fellaheen. And then what will happen to the efferdis?”

I left Shmuel to discuss the age-old cry of the possessed against the unreasonable rebelliousness of the disposessed, while I leaned out of the window just in time to watch the first of the Judean hills swim into my line of vision. Shmuel had not exaggerated. The hills were as beautiful as the words in which he had painted them, and the nagging sense of disappointment lifted as by magic, leaving me exhilarated and excited by the fulfillment of a centuries’ old dream—the return to Zion. Shmuel and I were not new converts to Zionism. We had always dreamed of the time when we would be able to come to Palestine not as refugees from oppression, but of our own free will, to contribute any few talents which we might have to the upbuilding of our own country. We could not realize this ambition until June, 1946, a year after the end of World War II.

The war years we had spent in London, arriving there from South Africa in February, 1940. I used to delight in telling puzzled enquirers that we had come to London from the security of South Africa to have a look at the war. But in actual fact we came because Shmuel had been invited by Vladimir Jabotinsky to start a weekly newspaper advocating the formation of a Jewish Army to fight on the side of the
From London we saw European Jewry being destroyed under the sanctimoniously lowered eyes of the British Government. We knew of the situation in Palestine, despite having to rely almost exclusively on news presented with a British bias. But bias it as you will, the Strurna still went down with-everyone on board, after having been refused permission to land its cargo of human misery in Palestine; the British Parliament generously funded the war efforts before the war, had known David Raziel (the first commander of the IZL) and his friends intimately and was already then suspected by the authorities of entertaining too much sympathy for the “terrorists.” I thought that the CID considered Shmuel a reformed character after his years in England, but he suspected, with more justification, that his dosgier had been destroyed when the IZL blew up the CID headquarters in Jerusalem in 1944. At any rate, we started our careers in Palestine with a clean record from the CID.

With the house, we inherited a young army captain who had lodged with our landlords and continued to lodge with us as part of the agreement. From Captain B we got an interesting insight into the lives of the young British officers in Palestine. They were terribly bored in a country where there was very little entertainment; and what there was, was very often debarmed by their own commanders or by the cold reception they got from the Jewish patrons. Their social life was limited to invitations from the British officials and their wives, from the few wealthy Arabs who entertained and from a handful of Jews who risked the opprobrium of most of the Jewish community to fraternise with the Army (as opposed to officials of the Administration—who had many friends amongst the Jews). For their female company they had the chance of a handful of young, European Gentle women who worked in the Administration or in the various consulates, or Arab girls. Jewish girls, for the most part, did not care to risk their reputations by associating with the British Army.

In their boredom the young officers drank copiously, and delirium tremens was, in their estimation, a much more formidable enemity than the “terrorists,” for whom many of them had a sneaking admiration.

Captain B did not stay with us long. He, together with every other British officer in Palestine, was ordered into barracks—as protection against kidnapping—following the spectacular detention by the IZL of five British officers.

In an IZL attack on the Sarafand Army Camp, two of the young attackers, Simchon and Ashbel, had been wounded and subsequently captured. They were eventually brought to trial and sentenced to death. The IZL, who had demanded that their men be given the status of prisoners-of-war, as the struggle they were waging against the British was in fact guerrilla, underground war against an invader, determined to prevent the execution of the sentence. They kidnapped five British officers, threatening to hang them if Simchon and Ashbel were hanged.

Under this pressure, the Administration commuted the death sentence to life imprisonment. True to their word, the IZL released their prisoners without acting. The police in Mandatory Palestine did not symbolise law and order as they do in any civilised community. Here they were hated and feared by the people, amongst whom, indistinguishable from the rest, were members of the IZL and LHI who had sworn to rid the country of their presence—and were very effectively reducing their numbers. That the lot of the British policeman in Palestine was not “a happy one” was evidenced by a recruiting poster calling on young Britons to “join the Palestine Police and see the world.” and a realistic wit had added the word “next” to the word “world.” One of the most revolting sights to one unused to the manifestations of government by force was that of the spike-helmeted Arab Legionnaires from Trans-Jordan, brought in by the British on the somewhat feeble pretext that they themselves were not sufficiently strong to keep law and order in the country, and needed Abdullah’s soldiers to help them. [s]
Although not very efficient, had numerous tentacles which it sent out in all directions. There was hardly a British official, businessman or newspaperman who was not consciously or unconsciously an agent or general source of information for the police. They used to visit Jewish homes and glean scraps of information here and there which they would, deliberately in most cases, or inadvertently in some few instances, pass on to the police friends.

The Jews, for their part did the same. The intelligence services of the Hagannah, the IZL and LHI were excellent, as the British often discovered to their cost.

Although we were well aware of the underlying significance of these chats we had with our British acquaintances, we were nevertheless outspoken in our criticism of British policy, and vigorously justified the attacks of the IZL. We hoped we would be regarded as naively innocent, and therefore not dangerous; but, in any case, neither of us could have stomached kow-towing to our British acquaintances even for the sake of security.

One acquaintance in particular, a certain Major Y, who was also a neighbour, used to drop in at all odd hours of the night, whenever he saw a light burning. We suspected him of trying to check up on our latenight visitors, but I think we did him an injustice and that he was merely lonely. At any rate, he had a weakness, and I always had a bottle of brandy in the house, so that we got more out of him than he even got out of us. He expressed great sympathy for the Jewish cause and often criticised his superiors most energetically. Whether this was genuine or merely the Martell talking, we never discovered, but we did not trust him in any case.

This cat-and-mouse attitude of suspicion and distrust was prevalent in Jerusalem. The Jews distrusted the British and vice versa. And those who sympathised with, and belonged to the "dissidents" distrusted their fellow-Jews, as the treacherous betrayal of their people to the British by the Hagannah in 1944 still rankled deeply. Every Jew in Palestine, whether a member of the underground or not, lived in daily danger of arrest on suspicion of subversive activities. It was, therefore, a great temptation to dispose of a rival in business, love or politics, by tipping the police off that he was a member of the IZL or LHI. As there was no such thing as the very simplest right of man, this false denunciation was sufficient to cause a man's arrest, internment and even eventual deportation to Eritrea. It must be said to their credit that there were very few cases of betrayal for personal needs. The vast majority of those who were sent into captivity by the treachery of their brother-Jews were victims of political viciousness and hatred.

As soon as we had settled in our new home, Shmuel contacted the IZL and offered them his services. As he had met Menachen Begin on a short visit to Poland in 1938, it did not take him long to establish his bona fides, and he was duly enrolled as a part-time terrorist, being still mainly occupied with his political work for the Revisionist Party. Besides being only part-time, he was also a passive terrorist, his work consisting mainly of writing proclamations and issuing news-bulletins in English. I was, at first, not accepted into the organization as my ignorance of Hebrew disqualified me from doing any administrative or propaganda work, and I am not really the bomb-throwing type. If I had been, I could have been a valuable asset to the IZL in Jerusalem because of my deceptive personal appearance.

There is a general fallacy that all Jewesses have black hair, flashing black eyes, and hooked noses. I happen to have light brown hair, grey eyes and a retroussé nose. In addition, I speak English in what is known as a southern English accent. In consequence of my appearance and accent I was mistaken by the uninitiated in Jerusalem for an Englishwoman. If this purely coincidental resemblance to an Anglo-Saxon was not exploited to the full by the IZL, it did at least serve to save me from some of the unpleasant incidents to which the Jews of Jerusalem were being continuously subjected by the Administration.

On one occasion I was at a cafe with some friends, when the British threw a cordon around it and started checking identity cards. As very often happened to me, I was without identity card or passport, and not relishing the idea of being taken to CID headquarters for investigation, I brazenly walked through the cordon. A Cockney voice yelled loudly at me: "Hi, where d'ya think you're going?" I turned around, looked at him coldly as only an Englishwoman can look and said in my haughtiest Oxford accent: "To whom do you think you're talking?" He mumbled an apology, touched his cap and I walked off with a dignified air of injured innocence, to the great delight and secret envy of my friends.

On another occasion I had to visit someone in the King David Hotel just after it had been partially wrecked by the IZL. It was the most difficult place in the world to get into, especially for a Jew. I went along without my passport and told the officer in charge of the guard at the barbed-wire cordon, that I wanted to see Captain X. very urgently. Without any hesitation, he sent me through to the main building where I repeated by request. Here the guard tentatively asked to see my identity card or passport. As the British did not have to have identity cards, I said very coldly that I did not carry my passport around with me. That worked miracles. I was politely conducted through the whole building and could eventually give a good account of the extent of the damage which had been done.

To complicate matters still further, I had a blue British Passport. My own passport, a South African one, I had lost in a typical Palestinian accident. We travelled from Katamon to town in an Arab bus which was always crowded with people, children, baskets and chickens. There was one driver who always drove with his eyes closed, but never sufficiently closed to avoid seeing a pretty girl go by. Then he would open them wide, lean out of the window and, for the next few seconds, continue to gaze at the disappearing back of the fair damsel. On one such occasion he did what he had till then miraculously avoided doing—he collided with an oncoming vehicle. The jar of the collision caused my handbag to fly out of my hand and when, a few seconds later, the bus caught fire and the fearstricken passengers started to stampede, I decided to forego the pleasure of being trampled to death by a horde of screaming Arabs and chickens while grovelling for my handbag, and took a neat, ladylike header out of the nearest window. We were all extremely lucky that the bus was new and that the iron cross-bars usually on Palestinian buses had not yet been affixed to the windows. My passport had been in the ill-fated bag and I had perforce to apply for a new one. As there was no South African consul in Jerusalem, the British Mandatory Government, out of the goodness of its heart, gave me a blue British passport instead of my brown South African one.

I lay special stress on the colour of the passport because of its significance to the Arab guards at all Government and public buildings. At this period in the history of Jerusalem, it was impossible to enter a post-office, police-station or any government or public office without first producing an identity card and submitting oneself to a search by Arab guards. At least 90% of these guards could not read, but they could distinguish colors. A brown passport meant you were Palestinian and therefore a potential terrorist, but a blue passport dubbed you immediately as British and therefore completely above suspicion. All I had to do was to produce my blue passport and I was never subjected to the indignity of having my bag and pockets searched by an Arab guard. None of our friends, even the closest ones, knew of Shmuel's connection with the IZL, a fact which I regarded as a direct tribute to my own acquired clannishness. At this stage, Shmuel still did not let me into all the secrets, or rather all those that he himself knew, as I had still to prove my ability to keep my mouth shut. But I did, of course, know of his own activities and also knew some of the younger members who acted as liaison officers and messengers. The latter were constantly visiting the house with messages for Shmuel which they drove out from the most unlikely places on their persons. My particular favourite was a 17-year girl, fictitiously known as Adina. She was shy, pretty and terribly innocent. If she were due at any specific hour she would arrive as the clock was striking. Never once did she arrive after the appointed time, curfews or police searches notwithstanding. I was fascinated by this punctuality and secretly despaired of ever being accepted into the organization if this were one of the criteria. [+]
Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. LESS than a month after we arrived in Jerusalem, the mounting tension between the Mandatory Government and the Jewish Agency culminated in the arrest of the latter and their internment in the detention camp at Latrun. Some of our more cynical friends were convinced that this was an understandable error on the part of the British. What had really happened, they maintained, was that each member of the Agency had submitted a list of suspected terrorists to the CID, signing his name at the end of each list, and so inadvertently including himself. It was a good story anyhow.

A little while after these arrests, the IZL carried out a long-standing plan to blow up that part of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem which housed the British Administration offices and military GHQ. I naturally knew nothing about this plan and drove by in a bus about five minutes before the explosion. There seemed to be a large number of people standing around in the street outside the hotel, and I wondered who had arrived or was about to arrive. A few minutes later I knew. A journalist friend, who was amongst the crowd outside the hotel, told us that hundreds of people appeared to have heard of the IZL’s warning about the impending explosion and had turned out to watch it.

One Arab who escaped by jumping out of a window before the explosion occurred, told him the following story: “You see, in my village I am known as the village idiot. When I heard that the Irgun had said they were going to blow up the building, I wanted to run away. My boss ordered me not to leave as everything was being taken care of. But I am the village idiot, and I couldn’t understand how they were going to take care of the Irgun; so I jumped out of the window.” I later heard that the young woman who had given the warning was Adina. Unfortunately, the warning was not heeded, and many innocent victims lost their lives—amongst them some staunch supporters of the IZL. That was a black day for Jerusalem’s Jewry, and a still blacker one for the Mandatory Government, which never recovered from the complete chaos and disorganization which resulted from the loss of their records and the deaths of numerous high officials.

Captain B, still our lodger at this time, also worked in the King David Hotel. I never was more pleased to see anyone than I was to see him walk in alive and whole after the explosion. Similarly, there were many Jews in Jerusalem, many of them supporters of the IZL, who mourned the deaths of British officials whom they had known intimately and who had fallen victims to an ill-timed manifestation of British pig-headedness and pride—the “we won’t be intimidated by those damned Jews” attitude.

After the King David Hotel episode, the British authorities were very quick to respond to every warning. It soon became a national sport to phone a warning through to some government building and then watch the officials scurrying out at full speed, sometimes with the aid of specially prepared firemen’s ladders. The officials’ lives became quite impossibly harassed and the administration remained permanently semi-paralysed. The Post Office used to be evacuated three or four times a day, until people simply stopped using it. And the worst of it all was that they never knew when the warning was a hoax and when it might not be in dead earnest—and no one was taking any more chances.

Some stories of British brutality had been so much hearsay until I saw signs of it at first-hand. After the blowing up of the King David Hotel, the Army carried out searches in various Kibbutzim, ostensibly for arms, but actually as a subtle warning to the Yishuv of what they could and would do to settlements if the Agency and Haganah did not cease their cooperation with the “terrorists” and renew their previous idyll with time the dogs felt tired and sat down, the soldiers dug up the floor at that spot. I later heard that the young woman who had given the warning the blazing heat of the sun. We were met by the secretary of the settlement, and taken for a tour of the “battle area.” On the way, various members of the Kibbutz joined us and told us what had happened. The soldiers had been sent into the settlement without officers and instructed to behave as they would in conquered enemy territory. They imposed a 24-hour curfew while they conducted their search, and allowed no one out to get food or visit the lavatories which, as is customary in Kibbutzim, were in a separate building set some distance away from the living quarters. The soldiers did, however, milk the cows and brought some food to the children’s house. A pregnant woman was dragged to her room by her hair when she did not hurry to carry out the curfew orders quickly enough; soldiers at tempted to break into the girls’ rooms at night but were frightened off by their screams; some of the young men were punished for breaking the curfew by being made to stand bare-headed in the hot sun, holding heavy stones above their heads. Anyone whose arms dropped had his elbows severely punched with the butt of a rifle. Others, for some minor offence, were made to run round in a circle for hours and when their pace lagged they were reminded none too gently with the point of a bayonet to pick it up.

One of our guides told us that the British had brought mine-detecting dogs with them and that every time the dogs sensed metal—usually peper—digging had been instituted. Another maintained that each time the dogs felt tired and sat down, the soldiers dug up the floor at that spot. But I suspect the latter of having a sense of humor.

The two or three British journalists in the party insisted that these were all legitimate measures in the search for arms. Perhaps they were; but the situation began to look ugly when we visited the workshops and found the walls bare of tools, and everything that was not removable, destroyed; when we visited the food-stores and found that paraffin had been poured over edible goods, that food had been mixed with manure—and other such refinements; when we found hay-ricks spiffily set on fire, shower-baths completely ruined, the generator, water-pumps and bread-ovens deliberately damaged, and visible evidence that living quarters and store-rooms had been used as latrines.
Any further doubts which any of us might have had about the intentions of the British were completely banished when we visited the secretary's office and the clothes store. In the secretary's office the pictures on the wall had been slashed, papers had been taken out of files and torn to shreds. Typewriter and duplicating-machine were wrecked, gramophone records lay on the floor smashed to smithereens. In the clothes-store there was a veritable shambles. There were practically no men's clothes, or fragments thereof, visible, as these were probably considered fair loot; but women's and children's clothes were very much in evidence—swept off the shelves, ripped open, torn, ragged and trampled into the ground by heavy boots. The crowning evidence of British "kultur" was the writing on the walls. Wherever there was a nice, white expanse, there were swastikas and slogans such as "Hitler started the job, we'll finish it!" or "We'll turn this whole bloody country into a concentration camp" and so on.

There was, however, one saving grace. Some more kindly-disposed soldier had drawn a replica of the wistful-looking man on the roof of what once had been the dining-hall. [\=] a seat from Cairo within two or three days. A close friend of ours had secured a seat on a plane to South Africa. Priority 3 was sufficient to get there. England. An obliging young man at Cook's worked out a fascinating tour which I will explain later; and, in addition, both the country and the overland trip for me. It entailed travelling down the Nile by sampan, not a very savory place at that time for a solitary Jewess, for reasons England. An obliging young man at Cook's worked out a fascinating tour which I will explain later; and, in addition, both the country and the overland trip for me. It entailed travelling down the Nile by sampan, not a very savory place at that time for a solitary Jewess, for reasons England. An obliging young man at Cook's worked out a fascinating tour which I will explain later; and, in addition, both the country and the overland trip for me. It entailed travelling down the Nile by sampan, not a very savory place at that time for a solitary Jewess, for reasons in my hands I was exchanging pleasantries with him and promising to give his regards to acquaintances in Johannesburg.

...

I spent a whole month after Shmuel's departure on all these manoeuvrings and contrivings to get away. And all the while I stayed, alone, in the little house we had rented from the British official. Our Jerusalem friends were appalled at my living alone and at my habit of walking around, unaccompanied, at night. Their misgivings were not without foundation. Our little house had only one story and stood isolated from its neighbors. It was consequently an easy target for prospective burglars and intruders, especially Arabs, who would not have been adverse to attacking a lone, unprotected Jewess.

The danger of my walking unaccompanied at night came both from Arabs and from the British soldiery. The latter had, during this period, committed a number of atrocities against young Jewish girls and women. Several girls had been waylaid, assaulted and raped. Among them was a young member of the IZL who had been caught by a military patrol whilst pasting up the underground newspaper on the walls.

I had become too accustomed to independence and freedom from fear to be influenced by the well-meant adjurations of my friends; and I laughed off their anxieties, with the pious hope that the proximity of our dwelling to that of the head of the CID, Mr. Giles, and to various other police officers would ensure its immunity against burglars. As for my being accosted at night, I relied on my English accent and light hair to frighten off both Arabs and British. The former knew very well that the administration would not tolerate any interference with English women, while the latter would not take the risk of assaulting the colonel's wife by mistake.

Whilst the proximity of my house to that of Mr. Giles might have earned me immunity from burglars, its strategic disposition had some decided disadvantages. Mr. Giles and his friends were guarded day and night by Arab guards. In the daytime, when there was traffic and company in the streets, these guards were comparatively tame. But at night, when the streets were practically deserted and when every shadow could be concealing a ‘terrorist,’ these guards were extremely jittery and trigger-happy. On many an occasion as I walked passed Mr. Giles’ walled garden on my way home, I would look up to see the ugly barrel of a Sten-gun pointed at me over the wall, and would see this ominous-looking object swivel round to keep me covered all the time I was within bomb-throwing range of the domain over which it presided. Any false move on my part would possibly have earned me a back-full of bullets. These precautions were rather laughable in the light of the fact that I occasionally visited Mr. Giles’ British neighbors and could have leaned out of their bathroom window and planted a grenade safely and soundly in Mr. Giles’ bathroom. Neither Mr. Giles nor his Arab guards knew this, so the latter persisted in keeping a nervous watch over me, or rather over my shadowy outline as soon as my footsteps resounded in the dark streets. [↩]

60721. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 06: Return of the Prodigal. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. As soon as I had my plane passage booked, I got in touch with Adina to arrange an appointment for me with Avraham, Menachem Begin’s Chief-of-Staff, whom I had met a few months earlier with Shmuel. When Avraham had heard that I was planning to visit South Africa he asked Shmuel whether I would be prepared to try and raise some money for the IZL while I was there. I had had some compunctions about leaving Palestine, at a time of trouble and the company of a Cairo acquaintance, who undertook to show me some of those quaint feshcrops of Egypt. We returned to my hotel rather late to find a man from the travel agency impatiently awaiting me with the good news that I was, after all, leaving early the next morning. My guardian angel had certainly worked over-time. One of the passengers on the plane from England had been an outsize man with outsize luggage. The authorities in Cairo had given him a choice: either he travelled or his luggage travelled—but not both. He chose to remain with his luggage and I was sent in his place. This experience convinced me finally that anyone in skirts, who is under fifty and not positively handsome, can manage very nicely in the Middle East. Avraham enrolled me as a member. My initiation was decidedly disappointing. I had expected the solemn swearing-in process which all other members went through, but in my case this was dispensed with. I suspect the reason for it was that I was then, and until the IZL disbanded, regarded as a queer, lady-like species of terrorist; to be treated gently and sheltered from the crude, stern side of life. But, however hum drum the initiations, I was at last a full-fledged member of the Irgun Zvai Leumi!

Avraham gave me detailed instructions of how to send any money which I might collect and taught me how to use the IZL code in order to enable me to send him regular reports. Before we parted he had addressed me a speech, in English, which he had had prepared for me. I humbly accepted the implication that he did not consider me capable of preparing one of my own. That speech was an absolute masterpiece. It consisted of fine-sounding, flowery, Biblical phrases, in no wise improved by having been literally translated from the Hebrew. Unfortunately, I thought it wiser to destroy it before returning to Palestine, otherwise I could have quoted it in full for the delectation and education of those unacquainted with the quaintness of Hebrew style rendered in an imitation of modern English. If I had ever used that speech I am certain I would have been a sensation. Never since the days of Deborah would such thundering phrases, such god-fearing panegyrics, such fire and brimstone have been hurled at the heads of a defenseless audience.

To my regret I had to confine myself to language a little more suited to a South African audience in the year 1946; but I felt a sentimental attachment to that speech and took it with me wherever I went. A glance at it would restore my spirits when they wavered and imbue me with the fire and courage of my prophetic namesake. If that was all that Avraham intended, he succeeded admirably.

Cairo was an improvement on Port Said, as long as one did not penetrate too deeply into the noisome little side streets. The hotel was luxurious and orientally lavish, and the service was excellent. But none of this compensated me for the shock I received at the offices of the air Administration would not tolerate any interference with English women. Unfortunately, I thought it wiser to destroy it before returning to Palestine, otherwise I could have quoted it in full for the delectation and education of those unacquainted with the quaintness of Hebrew style rendered in an imitation of modern English. If I had ever used that speech I am certain I would have been a sensation. Never since the days of Deborah would such thundering phrases, such god-fearing panegyrics, such fire and brimstone have been hurled at the heads of a defenseless audience.

To my regret I had to confine myself to language a little more suited to a South African audience in the year 1946; but I felt a sentimental attachment to that speech and took it with me wherever I went. A glance at it would restore my spirits when they wavered and imbue me with the fire and courage of my prophetic namesake. If that was all that Avraham intended, he succeeded admirably.

Cairo was an improvement on Port Said, as long as one did not penetrate too deeply into the noisome little side streets. The hotel was luxurious and orientally lavish, and the service was excellent. But none of this compensated me for the shock I received at the offices of the air

I immediately started a wearisome trek from Cairo to Jerusalem with £10 in my pocket this prospect was, to say the least, somewhat disheartening. I immediately started a wearisome trek from Cairo to Jerusalem with £10 in my pocket this prospect was, to say the least, somewhat disheartening. I immediately started a wearisome trek from Cairo to Jerusalem with £10 in my pocket this prospect was, to say the least, having, characteristically, neglected to let them know I was coming. My welcome was both enthusiastic and tumultuous, the tumult sometimes reaching deafening proportions when too many of my approximately five hundred relatives foregathered in one place at one time. My reception was both overwhelming and somewhat frightening. After seven years of being completely family-less, this sudden transplantation into the bosom of a prolific clan was dizzying. When the nine days of wonder were over and I had visited while from the superstitious and familial affection, I turned my attentions to campaigning for the Irgun Zvi Leumi. I found that the activities of our organization had made an immense impression in South Africa, and not only on the Jews. The South African white population is divided roughly into three categories: the English, the Afrikaans and the Jews. There are two large political parties: the United Party, which consists of the English and a minority of Afrikaans; and the Nationalist Party, consisting almost exclusively of Afrikaans. The vast majority of the Jews had always thrown in their lot with the United Party, spoke English and sent their children to English schools. Because of their pro-British, pro-United Party orientation, they were generally disliked by the Afrikaans of the Nationalist Party, this dislike varying from the bitter hatred of the extremists to the indifference of the moderates, like Malan. At the same time, it would be very far from the truth to describe the attitude of the English to the Jews as that of brotherly love. It is among the English in South Africa that you find the real anti-semites—they dislike the Jews without reason, whereas the nationalistic Afrikaans at least think they have natural, legitimate reasons for disliking them. The struggle of the IZL against the British in Palestine was a revelation to the Afrikaans. Firstly, it showed them that not all Jews were Anglophiles causa Anglophiliae, and, secondly, it revealed the astonishing fact that the "Jew-boys" knew how to fight and give better than they received. A great respect for this new generation of Maccabbeans was born in the hearts of the Bible-loving Afrikaans. Their admiration for the exploits of the IZL was unbounded. If we had collected money amongst them we might have had even more of a success than we had amongst the Jews. The feelings of the English in South Africa towards the revolt in Palestine were mixed. The handful who understood its motives and aims sympathized with it. But the English are notoriously insular—not less so in South Africa than in their Home Country—and the majority of them neither knew what the conflict was about nor cared to take the trouble to find out. They knew only that the British were losing—lamplighth of the poverty of their interests were being attacked in Palestine and that the Jews were to blame for all the bother. This served to make them just so much more anti-semitic.

The Zionists in South Africa, brought up in an atmosphere of comparative freedom, completely devoid of any of the ghetto-complexes which had crushed the spirit of independence of many European Jewish communities, unanimously approved of the struggle against the British in Palestine. There were differences of opinion amongst them on the question of what form this revolt should take—that of the Jewish Agency or that of the dissidents. The majority of those who belonged to the so-called Old Zionist Organization stood solidly behind the Jewish Agency and gave their financial support to the Haganah. A large minority, consisting of members of the New Zionist Organization, gave their whole-hearted support and sympathy to the IZL and LIH—the "dissidents" or "terrorists." Among the Jewish non-Zionists, or army-Zionists (of whom there are not over many in South Africa) there were many who supported the IZL because they believed in freedom from oppression and because they were filled with admiration for the courage and idealism of men who could undertake so unequal a battle against the mighty British Empire. Others disapproved because it spoilt their relationship with their English friends, and a third category wavered while waiting on a lead from Moscow.

Everyone whom I met was eager and hungry for news of Palestine. I could not tell everyone, indiscriminately, about the IZL and its activities, but I did give them a general picture of the complete reversals of history in Jerusalem—where the proud British had been forced into ghettos and lived in daily fear of their lives at the hands of the once-cowed and trembling Jews. They loved to hear this and I loved telling it. I took particular pleasure in describing how the notorious General Barker—one of the most anti-Jewish of all the British GOC's who succeeded one another in Palestine in a dismal parade went to work in the mornings with an armed guard on either side of him, two soldiers with tommy-guns preceding him and two walking behind. He needed only a steel umbrella to complete the picture. My listeners, whatever their sympathies may have been, were delighted at the blow which the underground in Palestine were dealing to British prestige. Whenever anyone asked me whether it wasn't rather frightening to live in Palestine, I answered with a great show of bravado that only two things there really frightened me: crossing the streets, especially Allenby road in Tel Aviv, and the thought of having to share a kitchen with another woman. The latter fear was by no means academic, in a country where the acute shortage of accommodation had driven thousands of unfortunate women to suffer just that very purgatory. [=]

60722. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 07: Return of the Prodigal. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. My friends and I discussed ways and means of raising money. We did not want any large-scale, country-wide campaigns with the concomitant propaganda and expenses. From all points of view, the less the general public knew about our activities the better; and from the specific point of view of expenses, we were determined to keep these down" to the barest minimum, so that every penny we collected could be used to buy guns and bullets in Palestine. We were all voluntary workers and any of the small expenses which we did incur were paid out of our own pockets or by one of the richer members of our small working committee. We at first concentrated on approaching people personally and asking them for donations, but towards the end of my trip I dropped my caution to some extent and addressed meetings of about seventy-five people at a time. Although not all the people who attended these meetings were sympathizers, nevertheless no one ever betrayed our trust by talking about my identity or spreading the news about my activities. For this I was very grateful, as I still had to return to Palestine. In lieu of any ability as a public speaker, I had to call on the latent historic talent which I had discovered in myself. As I am not anything like the popular conception of a "terrorist": someone who stalks around in riding-boots carrying a step-gun—a kind of cross between a Hollywood cowgirl and a Russian Communist heroine—I emphasised the contrast by appearing before my audiences as a well-groomed, well-dressed young woman straight from a finishing-school in England. I immediately produced the right dramatic effect. From the audience came the inevitable stage-whisper: "Is that what the terrorists look like??" and "If all the terrorists are like that, then they can't be such terrible people!!"

I started my speeches by introducing myself as a very, very humble member of the Irgun Zvi Leumi. This was literally true, but nobody believed me. Many were quite convinced that I had personally blown up the King David Hotel and daily wrecked trains and bridges. I really did try my best to deny it, but it did not help. I told my audiences as simply and clearly as possible about the position in Palestine, about the struggle and aims of the IZL and why they, the South African Jews, should help in this struggle. I usually anticipated the objections of many people to the killing of "innocent Tommies" by proclaiming beforehand that in any war the ordinary soldiers were innocent victims of their Government's quarrels and no less so in the war in Palestine. In an appeal to my audiences to choose between innocent Tommy Atkins and innocent Isaac Cohen, I told them this story of one of many unfortunate so-called illegal immigrants—a true story and one typical of many of the tragic tales of the pitiful remnants of European Jewry.

A young Jewish girl had been in a German brothel where she contracted syphilis. According to Nazi practice the punishment for this crime was the gas-chamber. As she was already in the queue, patiently awaiting her turn for death, the Russians bombed the camp. In the ensuing panic and disorder she and many of her companions escaped to the surrounding forests. There they made contact with the partisans, one of whom was a young Jew, Isaac Cohen. "Isaac befriended the young girl and took her, to the nearest hospital, where she received treatment and was cured. She returned to fight with the partisans and married Isaac, when the war ended, the two of them decided to go to Palestine and start life anew, forgetting the horrors and atrocities of the past. They walked across the whole of Europe, from Poland to Italy. For many weary weeks they suffered hunger and cold and hardships, until they reached Italy, the last stage in their journey. From there they sailed in one of the small, overcrowded “illegal” ships to Palestine, the land of promise. Off the shores of Haifa their tiny ship was intercepted by a British destroyer and the passengers were forcibly transferred there—a process which would have renewed our sending lists, obviously an impossibility in the circumstances. We never solved this problem which was entirely one of our own making as none of our donors ever raised the question. Those who knew me and my family accepted my verbal receipt unquestioningly. I never approached anyone whom I did not know, without being accompanied by a common acquaintance, in the halo of whose reflected honesty I basked. This complete and implicit trust in the emissary of the IZL on the part of the South African Jews was both touching and encouraging. One man, however, did get a receipt. I had received an urgent cable from Avraham asking me to send £2000 immediately. This I did within a few days with the help of one very large donation and a few smaller ones. Two weeks later, the IZL blew up the British Army Officers’ Club in Goldschmidt House, Jerusalem, in a brilliantly-executed operation. As soon as the news reached the Johannesburg newspapers, the man who had given the very generous donation phoned me and thanked me for his “receipt.”

A weekly ordeal was my letter in code to Palestine reporting on my activities and on the various sums of money transmitted to them. The code was a very simple one to understand but very difficult to use; and somehow or other it seemed to lend itself most easily to love-letters. My weekly outpourings of ardor left me as completely drained of energy and feelings as if I had really been consumed by the flames of passion. I subsequently heard that my correspondent had to do a lot of explaining to his wife, who accidentally came upon one of my letters.

He played up, and replied in terms of endearment considerably restricted by his limited knowledge of English. His knowledge of the proprieties, too, was somewhat deficient as, on one occasion, after a particularly successful venture into the fields of amorous elegiacs, he ended his letter with a request that I convey his respects to my husband. The Palestine censor must have shaken his head dolefully over that one. In spite of the fact that we took a certain amount of care, it soon became public knowledge that the IZL were receiving money from South Africa. Questions were asked about this in Parliament and on the day that Mrs. Bertha Solomon, a Jewish member, hotly denied the libellous allegations that the British-loving Jewish community had contributed to the terrorists in Palestine, I had the supreme satisfaction of receiving a £1000 donation. Two officers of the Palestine Intelligence Service came out specially to try and trace the source and the method of transfer of South African Jew’s financial contributions to the underground forces.

We heard that they had discovered how the money was sent—first to London and from there to Tel Aviv. At this we breathed normally again and continued sending money directly to Tel Aviv without any qualms for the feelings of the sadlly misinformed “intelligence” officers.

While I was in Johannesburg, some IZL and LHI detainees escaped from the British detention camp in Kenya and were reported to have entered the Union of South Africa illegally and to have been given refuge there by sympathizers. We knew that this was not true, but the Union police did not; and this report, coupled with their certain knowledge of the existence of a strong core of supporters of the IZL in the Union served to put them on the alert. The South African Government would probably not have been much concerned over whether her Jews supported the “terrorists” or not, were it not for the fact that the British Royal Family were just about due to arrive on an official visit. The Government probably felt they had quite enough on their hands without having a royal assassination thrust upon them. The police consequently approached the Jewish Board of Deputies and asked them to use their influence to secure the Royal family against terrorist attacks. Instead of ridiculing the idea, the Board of Deputies flew into a panic, approached the local committees of the New Zionist Organization (which was considered to be hand in glove with the IZL) and set up a great wail about the dire consequences to South African Jewry should any harm come to... the King. One local New Zionist chairman, with a sense of humor, sent his personal guarantee to the head of the police for the safety of the Royal Family. In spite of this, the police precautions were numerous and elaborate. And while posses of police patrolled the streets and plain-clothes detectives mingled with the crowds, the "dangerous, terrorists" watched the Royal procession—from very much less than a bomb's throw.

I actually got my look at the Royal Family in my birth-place in the Orange Free State. I found myself standing next to someone almost as dangerous as myself—Mr. R., a teacher at my High School, a rabid follower of Malan, anti-British, anti-Jewish, anti-native—in fact, just plain "anti." We fell on each other's necks, exchanged some nasty remarks about the British and taunted each other with lacking the courage of our convictions by coming out to stand in the sun for an hour in order to watch a British king and queen ride by.

Our conversation drifted naturally to Palestine and he started explaining to me how the Jewish claim to the country on Biblical grounds was based on a false premise. Then followed some very involved interpretation, liberally scattered with quotations, and a somewhat original theory based on the division of ancient Palestine into Israel and Judah—all of which boiled down to the argument that Palestine really belonged to the Arabs. And, at any rate, said Mr. R., it is only fair to let the majority in a country decide to whom that country should belong. I asked him, very innocently, whether he thought that an afternoon spent on that particular sun-sort of a thing should apply to South Africa also, where the blacks outnumber the whites by four to one. At this he looked rather startled and withdrew his suggestion.

We parted on the most amiable of terms.

By March, 1947, Shmuel wrote that he was on his way back to Palestine, and I began to think of getting back to the yoke of domesticity. Once more I started a hunt for transportation. I eventually managed to get a first-class berth on the Windsor Castle which was sailing to England via Port Said. The ship was under charter to the British Ministry of Transport, whose representatives made all the arrangements.

When I arrived in Durban to take up my "first-class berth," I discovered I was sharing a cabin on C deck with twenty-seven other women. It was just at this time that the British Government was carrying out a pious, sanctimonious campaign against overcrowding on the "illegal" refugee ships to Palestine. Oceans of crocodile tears were shed over the cruel plight of those miserable, human animals forced by the Jewish authorities to sail to Palestine in hell-ships. These "miserable, human-animals" were falling over themselves to get away from the memory and the perpetuation of the concentration camps of Europe. They welcomed a short boat trip in very much better conditions than they had experienced for years, albeit those conditions did not conform with so-called civilized conceptions of modern comfort. But I and a thousand other people on the hell-ship chat was the Windsor Castle were not fleeing from terror and persecution and on top of it were paying first-class fares for the privilege of travelling in slightly less discomfort than the "illegal" immigrants. The British might have been a little less raucous about other peoples' hell-ships while they themselves were making a nice little profit out of their own line of Stygian sea-craft.

My cabin consisted mostly of Lebanese, Egyptian and Syrian women—all disembarking at Port Said. They jabbered incessantly, each trying to over-shout the other. When they started quarrelling amongst themselves after the second day at sea, I had enough and made a timid appeal to the Purser. When I told him what cabin I was in, he threw his hands up in horror, exclaiming: "How in heaven's name did you get there?" and immediately arranged to transfer me to another cabin—on A Deck. A dark suspicion began forming in my mind. This ship was evidently more hellish for some people than for others, and the distinction was not one of price, as we had all paid first-class fares. My suspicions were fully confirmed when I saw my new cabin-mates. All of them were going to England and each one had at least four Aryan grandparents. The distinction was evidently one of race. For Semites as any description, crowded conditions of C-deck were sufficient, but the true-blue Anglo-Saxons had to have something better. I should, of course, have refused the change, in solidarity with my fellow-Semites; but I suffer from occasional lapses of character and this-lapse was considerably helped on by the sight of a Syrian woman breast-feeding a four-year-old child in my original cabin. I partially calmed my conscience when the conversation in my new cabin turned to Palestine, by getting in some very effective blows at British-policy—blows which were at the same time more convincing as coming from one of us. Before arriving in Port Said I received a cable from Shmuel saying chat he had arranged an air-passage for me from Port Said to Lydda. I silently blessed him for saving me the awful train journey from Egypt to Tel Aviv. Anyone landing in Egypt at that time had to declare his religion. An irate official revealed the purpose of this declaration when, on one occasion, a fellow-traveller, whom the Americans would picturesquely call a "wise guy," started explaining that his father was a Methodist, his mother a Catholic and chat he had not made up his mind yet. The Egyptian official interrupted him impatiently: "I don't care what your religion is!—Are you a Jew or aren't you?" When I came through Egypt the first time with Shmuel, he declared that his religion was "Atheist." The puzzled official wrote down "religion unknown." This third and last time I was given no choice. The official was a burly, suave Egyptian with a horrible leer. He looked at me, wrote down "Christian" in spite of my feeble protestations, and got me off the ship in five minutes in order to make my plane to Cairo.

In the evening my great stand-by in Cairo took me to a dinner-party to inaugurate a new air company. There were a number of British businessmen and diplomats there, as well as a sprinkling of high Egyptian officials, one of whom had a white-slave-traffic look in his eye which made me shudder. At our table were four Britshers who, on hearing I was returning to Palestine, immediately began bombarding me with questions. They first wanted to know how I was able to return to Palestine when all British women and children were being evacuated. (It was just at -is time that the Mandatory Government, as a first indication of the complete disintegration of their administration, had evacuated the families of officials and all British subjects who were not on essential work. This, of course, did not apply to Jews with British passports.) I assured them gravely that my husband was on essential work and that I had an afternoon and evening to kill in Cairo. During the evening I took a stroll down the main street and was almost immediately stopped by a young Egyptian boy. He told me it was not safe for an English woman to be walking alone in the streets as there was an anti-British demonstration going on, and offered to accompany me back to my hotel. I thought it would be just like Fate to play a silly trick on me and get me murdered in Egypt for being an English woman, so I decided to beat a hasty retreat.

In the evening my great stand-by in Cairo took me to a dinner-party to inaugurate a new air company. There were a number of British businessmen and diplomats there, as well as a sprinkling of high Egyptian officials, one of whom had a white-slave-traffic look in his eye which made me shudder. At our table were four Britshers who, on hearing I was returning to Palestine, immediately began bombarding me with questions. They first wanted to know how I was able to return to Palestine when all British women and children were being evacuated. (It was just at -is time that the Mandatory Government, as a first indication of the complete disintegration of their administration, had evacuated the families of officials and all British subjects who were not on essential work. This, of course, did not apply to Jews with British passports.) I assured them gravely that my husband was on essential work and that I had an afternoon and evening to kill in Cairo. During the evening I took a stroll down the main street and was almost immediately stopped by a young Egyptian boy. He told me it was not safe for an English woman to be walking alone in the streets as there was an anti-British demonstration going on, and offered to accompany me back to my hotel. I thought it would be just like Fate to play a silly trick on me and get me murdered in Egypt for being an English woman, so I decided to beat a hasty retreat.

In the evening my great stand-by in Cairo took me to a dinner-party to inaugurate a new air company. There were a number of British businessmen and diplomats there, as well as a sprinkling of high Egyptian officials, one of whom had a white-slave-traffic look in his eye which made me shudder. At our table were four Britshers who, on hearing I was returning to Palestine, immediately began bombarding me with questions. They first wanted to know how I was able to return to Palestine when all British women and children were being evacuated. (It was just at -is time that the Mandatory Government, as a first indication of the complete disintegration of their administration, had evacuated the families of officials and all British subjects who were not on essential work. This, of course, did not apply to Jews with British passports.) I assured them gravely that my husband was on essential work and that I had an afternoon and evening to kill in Cairo. During the evening I took a stroll down the main street and was almost immediately stopped by a young Egyptian boy. He told me it was not safe for an English woman to be walking alone in the streets as there was an anti-British demonstration going on, and offered to accompany me back to my hotel. I thought it would be just like Fate to play a silly trick on me and get me murdered in Egypt for being an English woman, so I decided to beat a hasty retreat.
the incessant grind of training and the nerve-wracking precautions, the iron control over tongue and action, the strict attitude of caution towards everyone’s closest friends. As for being romantic in the sentimental meaning of the word—nothing killed romance quite as effectively as membership of the IZL. The young men, who regarded themselves either as potential corpses to be buried for all time, or as potential prisoners to be buried in detention camps for years without end, would, for the most part, not even consider the question of marriage. And to have passing love affairs and flirtations with their fellow-members was not considered to be quite the thing. So they sought out other fields for their amorous excursions.

The girls, on the other hand, had neither the time nor the opportunity to meet young men outside the IZL and many of them suffered deeply from the pangs of unrequited love, and, still more, from the natural horror that young women have of becoming old maids. So romance was sadly lacking in the ranks of the IZL.

My first real introduction to the underground came with my meeting Menachem Begin soon after my return to Tel Aviv. Shmuel and Avraham took me to see him. We entered a ground-floor flat in a new, modern building, in a fashionable area of Tel Aviv. In one of the rooms furnished as an office, sat Begin. There were no bodyguards, no precautions, no dramatics. I expected him to have a beard and be dressed in the long black coat favoured by the fanatically religious. This had been his form of disguise when we first arrived in Palestine. By the time I got to hear about it he was already safely accoutered in another role.

Begin had not been out of doors in the daytime since he had shaved off his beard, and the part of his face which had once been hirsute was consequently deathly pale. He is slight, baldish, and ugly, with an ascetic and refined ugliness. In his sports-coat and grey flannel trousers he looked like the Diaspora version of a Hebrew teacher. His mild and gentle manners were hardly in keeping with even my educated odd hours which he kept and also for his frequent trips abroad. When I was pressed to say exactly what newspaper he worked, I would declare with a grand gesture: “Oh, all kinds of papers, American, South African and...” and I hoped my questioner was satisfied. As we lived in a rather compact little community, our neighbors took a great deal of interest in us. However, no one ever suspected our nefarious connections, mainly because I spoke such an Anglicised Hebrew and Shmuel always wore a suit. Who had ever heard of a terrorist who wore a suit! It was notorious that they wore khaki shorts and shirts—as most of them did, anyhow, in company with at least 80% of the male population of Palestine.

I was in charge of disposing of or hiding all incriminating documents. Shmuel had given me strict instructions to burn any unnecessary papers and to put documents that he needed in a secret niche in his writing-desk. I soon discovered that burning papers in a country where there are no incinerators and no open fires was a major operation and one likely to attract a good deal too much attention. So I simply tore them up and put them in the dust-bin—a fact which I did not suspect it), and no member of the IZL, except those at the very top, knew where Shmuel lived. To the neighbors and to our acquaintances, Shmuel was a newspaperman. This accounted for the odd hours which he kept and also for his frequent trips abroad. When I was in charge of disposing of or hiding all incriminating documents. Shmuel had given me strict instructions to burn any unnecessary papers and to put documents that he needed in a secret niche in his writing-desk. I soon discovered that burning papers in a country where there are no incinerators and no open fires was a major operation and one likely to attract a good deal too much attention. So I simply tore them up and put them in the dust-bin—a fact which I did not think it necessary to worry Shmuel with. As for putting documents into the desk—I had a much better hiding-place which the male mind could not possibly be expected to appreciate. Instead of going through the laborious process of opening up the desk to find the secret spring and then closing it again, as Shmuel fondly imagined I did, I used to slip all incriminating documents. Shmuel did his work, which consisted mostly of writing, in an office in Tel Aviv; but he very often worked at home, too. This necessitated his travelling to and from Tel Aviv with papers in his briefcase which could have incriminated him beyond any shadow of a doubt if he had ever been searched by the British. While the taxis and buses in which he travelled were searched on innumerable occasions, he, himself, was never touched. The very respectability of his appearance ensured him a safe conduct.

The third and most extreme method of underground conspiracy was, as far as I know, practiced only by Menachem Begin. He lived with his family under a false name and never left his home during the day.
For a year he did not see the sun. When he had to meet anyone he was fetched in a car by night and brought back the same night, or else he spent the following day at the flat where the meeting had taken place and returned only when darkness had fallen.

The Begins lived in a secluded and select part of Tel Aviv under the name of Konigshoffer. The selection of their residence was entrusted to Meir, one of the oldest members of the IZL and the universal "untouchable" hand. In the hands of the general management of the Begin household was placed. He based his choice of a flat on its two-fold advantage: it was on the ground floor and had a separate entrance so that none of the family had to use the communal staircase; and it had five exits, in case of emergency.

Ala, Begin’s wife, hardly left the house at all in those days. She could not visit or be visited by her friends. Her sole companions were the members of the IZL High Command who came to confer with her husband, and the wives of those who were married—rather a hit-or-miss arrangement as far as she was concerned. Household supplies were provided by Meir, at whose flat Begin very often met people or simply sat and worked in greater convenience than in his own home. Ala’s own personal purchases were made by the wives of the other IZL members. (Begin’s and Avraham’s secretary and one of the few other people allowed to visit at the Begin flat.) Her only relaxation was sitting on the secluded porch and knitting.

At this time the Begins had two children—Benny and Chasya. Ala could have no domestic help whatsoever because of the peculiar, inexplicable habits of her husband; so Begin helped her. I got a middle class shock of surprise the first time I saw Menachem Begin, notorious rebel leader and Public Enemy No. 1 of the British, washing the baby’s napkins. But he said he liked house-work as it gave him some means of exercise and relaxation, and I very soon got used to seeing him wash the floors without wanting to rush up and take the mop away from him and do the job myself. He would wash, dress and feed the children while at the same time discussing matters of high policy with one or more members of the High Command. Shmuel was somewhat taken aback at first, but he, too, soon learnt to disregard these domestic activities in the midst of taking life and death decisions. Chasya at this time was a baby of six months, but Benny, who was four, was a problem. He was a very intelligent child and conversation had to be considerably camouflaged. He felt there was something peculiar about his household, but he never said a word to his playmates at the kindergarten. Nevertheless, it was thought safer not to rely entirely on Benny’s discretion, and everything discussed in the house had a code-name, while every one who visited there had a pseudonym with uncle or aunt attached to it. Shmuel was "Dod-Yaacov" and I was "Dod Rivka." In the comparative safety of the domestic atmosphere we sometimes grew a little lax so that Benny, in whose honor the whole performance was staged, used to call me "Dod Rivka whom father calls Doris" and Shmuel was "Dod Yaacov whom Dodah Rivka calls Mooky" (which is Shmuel’s nickname.) Begin himself was called "Ben David" after David Raziel. His lieutenants shortened this to "Bad"—the name generally applied to him except in his own home where everyone called him “Abe” (father). Neither the name "Menachem" or "Begin" was ever mentioned, even in the strictest privacy. I disengaged myself considerably at my first meeting with him when I addressed him as "Mr. Begin." Shmuel and Avraham looked horrified and the former whispered fiercely to me: “Don’t you know you mustn’t use that name!” I did not know, but I accepted the rebuke meekly. Shmuel had a veritable forest of pseudonyms. He was first known in Palestine as Emanuel, but when a note in his handwriting and signed with that name fell into the hands of the Rome police, he changed his name to Karni. In Europe he was known first as Perkin and later, after the British CID had got possession of a list of code-names which they found amongst the papers of an IZL representative, as Parker.

Amongst the journalists, whom Shmuel met frequently, he was known as David or Haerlinger, according to whom he saw. To visitors from abroad he was Feldman. The wonder is that he never got entangled in his own conspiratorial nets: but I suppose he could, if necessary, always have laughed off any mistake with the good old Cockney music hall chestnut: "I’ll forget me own name next!” I felt rather like a polyandrist with none of the advantages. This very necessary practice of pseudonyms sometimes resulted in rather amusing comedies of errors. Shmuel and I, for example, used to call Begin by the English version of his pseudonym—Davidson—when we discussed him between ourselves at home. This habit caused me a great deal of confusion at a time when Shmuel was meeting Carter Davidson of the Associated Press rather frequently. When he came home and told me that Davidson was talking about this or that, I found it difficult to reconcile the information with my knowledge and conception of Begin. Then I would realise that he meant the other Davidson. Very often in sheer desperation I would cry out wildly: “For God’s sake, which Davidson are you talking about.” As if life was not sufficiently complicated.

We had a rich overseas supporter of the IZL whom we called Wallace. On one occasion, on returning from Paris, I was greeted by one of our American friends with the important announcement that Wallace was in Palestine. She was referring to Henry Wallace, but I have a one-track mind and naturally took it to mean that our Wallace, our rich Wallace, was here. I immediately passed the information to Shmuel and he ran the wheels in motion in order to find him. A few days later at the breakfast table Shmuel took a few seconds off from his absorption in the newspaper to tell me that Dr. Altman had had an interview with Wallace. I snorted disdainfully and said: “What’s so important about that, that they’ve got to print it in the newspaper.” Shmuel looked at me with new respect. After all, this disdain of celebrities was rather admirable. A few minutes later I realised that this was Henry Wallace he was talking about and that it had been Henry Wallace, and not our rich Wallace, whom my American friend had been talking about. I kept a discreet silence until the time came when Shmuel remarked warily that he and Avraham had been unable to trace our Wallace. Then I broke down and confessed to my parochialism. [–]

60724. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 09: Life in the Underground. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. The IZL High Command at that time consisted of eight young men, amongst whom the 34-year old Begin, the Commander-in-Chief, was the oldest. Avraham was Chief of Staff, Amitzur was in charge of training. He is Russian-born, short, thick-set, with flashing eyes and a brilliant smile. He was the toughest-looking member of the High Command and certainly the nearest approach to a “terrorist” in appearance. Joel was the head of the intelligence service. Tall and fair, he could pass anywhere as an Englishman as long as he did not open his mouth. He cloaks some pretty sharp claws beneath a bland and courteous exterior. He had been a policeman, and must have been a very good one as there was no information he could not, and did not, get hold of. Gideon was Chief of Operations. Immensely tall and immensely clever, this quiet, shy young man was, at 24, the military genius of the IZL. He planned all the operations against the British and often led them personally when he could wheedle the consent of Begin.

Reuven, in charge of stores and arms-production, was the Beau Brummel of the High Command. He always looked natty, whether he spent the following day at the flat where the meeting had taken place and Shmuel and I, for example, used to call Begin by the English version of his pseudonym—Davidson—when we discussed him between ourselves at home. This habit caused me a great deal of confusion at a time when Shmuel was meeting Carter Davidson of the Associated Press rather frequently. When he came home and told me that Davidson was talking about this or that, I found it difficult to reconcile the information with my knowledge and conception of Begin. Then I would realise that he meant the other Davidson. Very often in sheer desperation I would cry out wildly: “For God’s sake, which Davidson are you talking about.” As if life was not sufficiently complicated.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
differences of opinion and clashes of temperament. Begin's patience and tact played a large and necessary role too. All major decisions had to receive the approval of the majority of the High Command. Discussion was free and untrammelled and no one was overborne or overwhelmed by the presence and personality of Begin. The meetings of the High Command usually took place in the Begin's flat, and it was just sheer luck that all these very fragile eggs in one basket were not turned into one large savory omelette for the delection of the British. By some miracle, no member of the last IZL High Command was ever arrested or detained by the British, in contrast to the previous one where everyone, except Begin was captured and sent to the Eritrean Detention Camp. Or perhaps it was not so much a miracle as the combination of improved security technique among the IZL and the passing of the phase of betrayal on the part of the Haganah.

While I liked and respected the young men of the IZL, it was the women who won my greatest admiration: and foremost amongst these were the "forgotten men" of the underground—the wives. These were the women who ran their homes and brought up children on the not very magnificent salary which full-time members of the IZL, irrespective of their rank, received. These were the women who trembled at every knock on the door lest the dreaded hour had come, who spent days and nights of loneliness, waiting—and worrying when a husband was hours overdue. Women who never knew, as they bade goodbye to their husbands each morning, whether that was the last time they would do so—for years or maybe for ever. Women who, forcibly parted for years from their husbands, struggled to educate and bring up children on the pitiful allowances which the IZL could afford to give them: who sacrificed and slaved uncomplainingly to send food and gifts to the fathers of their children whom, in turn, they fiercely protected from the coldness of want and privation which those fathers' courage and idealism had innocently brought on their heads, and who, because of the need for perpetual vigilance and secrecy, could not even seek the slight comfort and solace of pouring out their troubles into sympathetic ears. Arye, only occasionally, and had infrequent, secret meetings with her

Two women, amongst the hundreds whom I did not know, typified for me the courage and steadfastness of the wives. The first was Ala Begin and the second Zipporah Meridor. Ala is small, thin and stopped from long, endless days and nights of knitting and reading to tide over the interminable solitude of life in the underground. She wears glasses, having been eventually persuaded to that by her husband who, when the toll of cups and plates which she just missed putting on the table, rose too high. Ala's courage is of the quiet, steady kind, without flamboyance and without heroics It manifested itself in her amazing cheerfulness in all circumstances. For most women the act of childbirth is both a frightening and a solemn occasion, which merits the sympathy and appreciation of an attentive husband, and the petting and pampering of relatives and friends. Ala gave birth to two children in the days of the underground. No loving husband brought her flowers and gifts, no friends helped to while away the days. She lay alone, unvisited, unknown—and she returned home each time to tackle the additional burden smilingly and cheerfully. Ala's delightful sense of humor stood her in good stead in coping with the small difficulties of life which annoy and irritate in inverse proportion to their size. Her worry for Begin's safety and for the success of the revolt was a great and difficult burden—but a noble one. On the other hand, her inability to go out and buy what she needed when was also killed in the fight in Jaffa. Ruhama steeled herself once more to face the tumult of hope and fear when she heard that he had escaped—hope that they would once more be together, and fear lest he should be shot or wounded in the efforts to recapture him. Each time! he was recaptured, would come anti-climax, and relief at his safety, to be shattered once more by a fresh attempt on his part to break the chains of bondage.

There were other women in the IZL besides those who merely sat and waited. There were those who took an active part in the struggle: young girls who went out on actual operations; others who pasted up the wall newspaper and the frequent declarations and warnings; and yet others who worked on the radio, who typed, who acted as messengers. Some were unsung heroines, others were sung heroines. I had the privilege of knowing intimately one of the unsung heroines of the IZL—Ruhama, secretary both to Avrahm and to Begin, and general factotum of the High Command. We first met Ruhama soon after we arrived in Palestine. She was with Israel Epstein, a young school-teacher who acted as general secretary for the IZL High Command. They seemed to mean a great deal to each other. Two months later Israel was sent on an IZL mission to Rome. There he was arrested by the Italian police on suspicion of being connected with the blowing up of the British Embassy in Rome. In an attempt to escape from confinement, Israel was shot and killed. Ruhama took this on the chin and went on quietly with her work. She lived in a room in Tel Aviv away from her family, as the British had got onto her tracks and constantly watched her home. She is a person who is very much attached to her family, but she saw her young brother, Arye, only occasionally, and had infrequent, secret meetings with her mother. Her elder brother was in the detention camp in Kenya. I met Ruhama frequently at the Begin's flat, but got to know her really well only when she came to stay with us to recuperate after breaking her thigh. She was on a mission for the IZL when the car in which she was travelling overturned. For three long months she lay in a hospital gasping for breath as she writhed in the tortures of hell. When the pains had abated and she was beginning to recover, the attack on the Acre Fortress took place. At the head of the attackers fought, and fell, Dov Cohen—a dearly-beloved friend of Ruhama's. A week later she came to stay with us. She was deathly pale, as thin as a wraith and could not walk a step. With supreme courage and willpower she set herself the task of recovering her strength and courage from her husband when suffering the tortures of hell. When the pains had abated and she was free and untrammeled and no one was overborne or overwhelmed Zipporah struggled against financial hardship and continual ill health as she she brought up her two children. Yaacov's adventures kept her in a continual state of anxiety and nervousness. When she had reconciled herself to a long separation, tempered by the thought that he was at least safe, she was only agitated when she heard that he had escaped—hope that they would once more be together, and fear lest he should be shot or wounded in the efforts to recapture him. Each time! he was recaptured, would come anti-climax, and relief at his safety, to be shattered once more by a fresh attempt on his part to break the chains of bondage.

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads
radio-transmitter in her home, both she and her husband were arrested. He was exiled to the detention camps in Africa, where he remained for years, while she was sent to Bethlehem Goal—leaving behind two young sons in the care of her aged parents. She was released from Bethlehem a few months later, in time to give birth to her third child—a daughter. A few months of freedom, then again to Bethlehem, this time leaving her old mother with an extra baby on her hands. After a short time in Bethlehem, Dov Gruner was released again. She now had the burden of supporting her three children alone and unaided. She went back to teach school in the mornings, to care for the children in the afternoons—and to continue writing and reading broadcasts for IZL in the evenings. Her poverty, her frequent imprisonments, her hard life, did not dim her ardor for the cause of freedom. Without fear of the consequences, fully aware of the risks which she took, she continued her work for the IZL till the day the British left and the "Voice of Fighting Zion" spoke its last message and was silent. [=]

60725. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 10: Life in the Underground. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. My first taste of tragedy at close quarters came with the Dov Gruner case. Dov Gruner had been captured by the British after an attack on a police station. He was badly wounded and lingered on the threshold of death for months. After nine months in hospital he was considered fit enough to be tried. He was sentenced to death by hanging. In an effort to prevent this, the IZL kidnapped a British Magistrate, Mr. Wyndham. The British then postponed the execution and Wyndham was released. They tried to persuade Gruner to appeal but he refused, saying that as he did not accept the legality of the court, he did not recognise the sentence imposed on him and so could not appeal against it. Dov Gruner's sister, who was in America, appealed to the Privy Council on his behalf. The case aroused considerable interest throughout the world and the quiet, unassuming Gruner became a national hero overnight. His calm courage under the strain of so great an ordeal filled everyone in Palestine with admiration—even the bitterest enemies of the IZL. After Gruner's case had been submitted to the Privy Council, another three young men were sentenced to death. They were Kashani, Alkoshi and Rosenbaum, two of whom had been found guilty of having in their possession thong whips. They had been caught after the flagging of a British Major by the IZL in retaliation for a flagging sentence against two young Jews. This flogging had set the whole world laughing and the Britishsmarted more over this blow to their prestige than they did over the numerous deaths amongst their ranks. So what more fitting punishment could be dealt to the defilers of the British escutcheon in the Middle East than hanging by the neck until death! The third boy sentenced to death had committed the heinous crime of being found in possession of fire-arms. The IZL made plans to release Dov Gruner and his comrades from the Jerusalem prison where they were confined. Each night as Shmuel came home, I would greet him with the laconic, but meaningful query: "Well! And each time he would shake his head sadly and say: "Not ready yet." At last Shmuel could say: "The plans are all cut and dried. The break will take place the day after tomorrow." But fate dealt a cruel blow. On the morrow, the four were suddenly transferred to the Acre Fortress.

No one, not even the IZL who had sufficient reason to distrust the British, ever dreamt that they would carry out the death sentence while the Gruner case was still under consideration by the Privy Council. Plans were made for releasing the four from Acre Fortress. Dov Gruner's sister came from America to see her brother and try to save his life. She saw him once and was promised a second interview. In the early morning of the day of his promised interview, and while his case was still under consideration by the Privy Council, Dov Gruner and his three companions were secretly hanged. They were not given the privilege accorded to the basest criminal of having a minister of religion give them his last blessing. They were not given the privilege afforded to the foulest murderer of taking leave of their loved ones.

They were hanged in a cowardly, furtive way by an administration which vended its spite on four defenseless young men, because it was incapable of putting out the flame of rebellion against its repressive and cruel government. But Dov Gruner and his fellows—victims went to the gallows singing "Hatikvah" and the echo of their voices resounded throughout Palestine. There was not a man, woman or child in Palestine, friend or enemy, who was not shocked and horrified at this cowardly act. British prestige sank to an ever lower level and hate began smouldering in the hearts of even those who decried the acts of the IZL.

We first heard about the hanging on the early morning radio broadcast. Shmuel and I were completely stunned. I had still had a last lingering spark of faith in British sense of justice. This was violently and final, doused that dreadful morning. The British gallows had forestalled the intrepid young men of the IZL; but, nevertheless, the High Command decided to carry on with the planned attack against Acre. A fortnight after the hanging of Dov Gruner and his comrades, British prestige received another terrific blow in Palestine. Acre Fortress, which had resisted the onslaught on Napoleon, was penetrated by the Irgun Zvi Leumi. They sent the guards fleeing, panic stricken, to seek safety, with the result that over 200 of the Arab prisoners walked out of the gaol too. Although all the Jewish prisoners could have escaped, only twenty-seven did so, and only a specially selected 27. The rest knew that no preparations had been made to receive them and did not wish to embarrass the operation by overloading the lorries and over-burdening the rescuers with the additional responsibility of disposing safely of extra unplanned-for, escapees. They remained behind in a supreme exercise of discipline.

The operation went off smoothly and would have been even more than the brilliant success that it was, if not for a stroke of the most ill-fated bad luck. The retreating attackers and escapees ran into a party of soldiers returning from a bath, accompanied by a tank for their greater protection. But for this entirely unexpected and unplanned-for event, the fortress of Acre would have been stormed without any loss of life. As it was, eight young men lost their lives that day—seven of the attackers including the officer-in-charge, and one of the escapees, Ashbel—that same Ashbel who, a year previously, had been sentenced to death, and whose sentence had been commuted to life imprisonment after the IZL arrest of the British officers. A drag-net was immediately sent out after the Acre break but, except for a few Arab prisoners, no one was recaptured. This exploit aroused the admiration of all freedom-loving people. Even the British, to give credit where it is due, expressed grudging respect. Only our political opponents saw in it a deliberate and malicious manoeuvre to liberate Arabs imprisoned for anti-Jewish activities. This propaganda did at least raise a laugh if it did not succeed in anything else. The Acre gaol-break added immensely to the prestige of the IZL and did a little towards allaying the grief and despair caused by the Gruner tragedy. Triumph was, however, tempered by sorrow. Eight young men had fallen—eight of the best, who could be ill-spared by their own families or by the large family—which was the Irgun Zvai Leumi.

On the 1st May, 1947, the United Nations Commission arrived in Palestine. This was to be the Commission to end all Commissions. The Jews were already somewhat blaze about commissions. They did not expect this one to achieve any more than the Anglo-American Commission from whose burnt-out embers this new Phoenix had arisen; but, still, it was quite exciting to see the fleets of UNO cars, and to meet all the celebrities—not considerable consideration in a country where "lions" are feverishly hunted. Judge Sandstrom, the Swedish Chairman of the Commission, expressed a wish to see the leaders of the IZL, and Carter Davidson of the Associated Press arranged a meeting. Begin, Shmuel and Avraham were present at the meeting.

Two weeks later Begin, Shmuel and Meir met Dr. Granados of Guatemala and Professor Febregat of Uruguay, another two members of the Commission. Following on this latter meeting, the IZL High Command thought it advisable to have someone on hand in Geneva, where the Committee had decided to write its report, in order to act as a channel of information between them and the sympathetic members of the Commission. For want of anyone who could be easily spared they decided to send me there. I did not think their choice a very wise one, but nevertheless agreed to go. In order to make the acquaintance of Dr. Granados, I travelled up to Jerusalem after Joel had forewarned him that some one would be coming to see him. Dr. Granados asked that the visitor be provided with passwords so that there should be no change of mistaken identities. He suggested Bolivar, Juarez and Lincoln. I came up to Dr. Granados’ hotel room and gave my password rather shamefacedly. He measured his, even more shamefacedly, at which I made a feeble attempt at giving my counterpassword. We both burst out laughing instead and I said: “Silly, isn’t it?” He agreed wholeheartedly.

After thus establishing good relations, I arranged to meet him in Geneva.

60726. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 11: Life in the Underground. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. The arrival of the UN Commission and their appeal for restraint on the part of all contending parties in Palestine was heralded, by the British, with the passing of the death-sentence on three young men who had taken part in the attack on the Acre Fortress and had subsequently been captured. In response to a demand for a heart-rending appeal from the parents and relatives of the three condemned men, Haviv, Nakar and Weiss, the UN Commission made a half-hearted attempt to dissuade the British authorities from carrying out this sentence. This attempt was met by a cold and contemptuous slap-in-the-face from Sir Henry Gurney, the Chief Secretary, who practically told the Commission to mind their own business. Whether this matter came within the scope of the Commission or not is a debatable point, but what was quite indisputable was that it certainly was the business of the IZL.

After the treacherous behaviour of the British in the case of Dov Gruner, the IZL did not take any chances with the three victims. There were only two practical alternatives: either to rescue the three boys or to take hostages. The first alternative proved impossible as the army and police were on a day and night alert at all prisons after the Acre break. There remained only the second alternative. Now, no one of the IZL Command approved of taking hostages as a principle. But if there were any possibility of saving the lives of these young men who, by no stretching of any moral code, could possibly be considered to have warranted the odium of death by hanging, then that way, however odious in itself, was justifiable. Obviously, it would have been far more just to have captured and held as hostage the man directly responsible for the death sentences, General McMillan. But General McMillan evidently had an uneasy conscience and considered it necessary to have his person well protected. All his senior officers were equally well protected when they dared venture out of their self-created ghettoes. So fell to the lot of two sergeants, apprehended after many a vain effort and false start, to be martyred in the cause of Bevin and his henchmen.

The two sergeants were captured in Nathanya and held prisoner there. The British declared a curfew in the Nathanya area and searched it house by house, foot by foot and practically stone by stone. The Nathanya summer season was ruined; Nathanya’s chubby little mayor grew hysterical; the calm, undemonstrative British grew even more bloodthirsty, but the sergeants were not found.

The British then committed one of those acts of brutal stupidity for which Mr. Bevin was becoming notorious. They hanged the three boys. Perhaps the British thought this hanging justified on the grounds of saving British prestige in the eyes of the “natives.” This mythical prestige, which had received a severe kick in the pants when a British major was flogged by a couple of “Jew-boys” had actually been laughed out of existence after the Acre gaol-break. But if Bevin could not have it, he was determined to resurrect it. So he hanged three boys—and with their dying gasps flickered out the last dying embers of British prestige. The whole country was thrown into a turmoil. Would the sergeants be hanged or wouldn’t they? I was sick at heart. It seemed to me that many of my fellow-Jews had become intoxicated with that same brutish bloodlust as must grip the audience at a bull-fight, and those who cried for blood today would be the first to turn upon the executor tomorrow and revile him for “bringing disaster upon the Jewish people.”

For me the important thing was that three young men had been brutally and senselessly deprived of their lives and that three families had been steeped in tragedy. I hated the thought of further horror and bloodshed and with my whole being wished that some- means could be found of freeing the two sergeants. I know now that many of my friends in the IZL felt the same as I. It was a very difficult time for the IZL High Command. None of them was in the least blood-thirsty, and I felt sure they too would have welcomed a chance to take some other decision. But they decided to hang the two British sergeants—and they were hanged.

They were right because they considered the lives of young Jews as more important than the lives of British soldiers and because they knew they owed it to Nakar, Haviv and Weiss, and to Dov Gruner and his comrades, not so much to avenge their deaths as to ensure that their comrades should be protected from a similar fate. They owed it, too, to the young soldiers of the IZL whom they ordered to carry out operations which would have meant sure death by hanging for anyone who was captured, unless the British could be forced even though brutally, to revoke a law which was both illegal and barbarous. I see this now, and I saw it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.

60727. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 12: A Terrorist Abroad. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. SOON after the hanging of the sergeants, I was due to leave for Geneva. At the last minute, to my intense relief, it was decided that Shmuel should go to Geneva and that I should accompany him and carry out several commissions for the organization in Europe. My chief qualification for this task was my British passport with which I could travel through practically half of the world without the nuisance and delay of getting visas. The IZL Intelligence Service had got a copy of the CID lists for use at ports of embarkation. These lists were divided into three categories: the A list consisted of those people whose arrivals and departures were to be reported to the CID, on the B list were those who were to be searched for suspicious documents; and on the C list those who were to be arrested on attempting to leave or enter the country. They discovered from these lists that Shmuel, who had previously been given a clean bill by the CID, had now been promoted to list B. So, on the morning of August 6th, 1947, I carried all the essential and incriminating documents in my handbag.

At Lydda, Shmuel was searched but I went unscathed. Everything passed off quietly and we breathed a hearty sigh of relief as we entered the plane. We all waited expectantly for our passports to be handed back and for the plane to take off—but nothing happened. After twenty minutes an apologetic official boarded the plane and explained that there was some delay about checking the passports and would we see it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.

Everything passed off quietly and we breathed a hearty sigh of relief as we entered the plane. We all waited expectantly for our passports to be handed back and for the plane to take off—but nothing happened. After twenty minutes an apologetic official boarded the plane and explained that there was some delay about checking the passports and would we see it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.

At Lydda, Shmuel was searched but I went unscathed. Everything passed off quietly and we breathed a hearty sigh of relief as we entered the plane. We all waited expectantly for our passports to be handed back and for the plane to take off—but nothing happened. After twenty minutes an apologetic official boarded the plane and explained that there was some delay about checking the passports and would we see it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.

At Lydda, Shmuel was searched but I went unscathed. Everything passed off quietly and we breathed a hearty sigh of relief as we entered the plane. We all waited expectantly for our passports to be handed back and for the plane to take off—but nothing happened. After twenty minutes an apologetic official boarded the plane and explained that there was some delay about checking the passports and would we see it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.

At Lydda, Shmuel was searched but I went unscathed. Everything passed off quietly and we breathed a hearty sigh of relief as we entered the plane. We all waited expectantly for our passports to be handed back and for the plane to take off—but nothing happened. After twenty minutes an apologetic official boarded the plane and explained that there was some delay about checking the passports and would we see it then, but my woman’s heart prevailed over my head and I kept on hoping that some miracle would happen and the sergeants would not be hanged. For nights I dreaded to close my eyes and plunge into a nightmare world of gibbets and hanging figures—usually those of Shmuel and my brothers. And this passed too. The sergeants were hanged; not, as Shmuel assured me in reply to my agonised query, by the same men who had guarded them and had surely come to have some kind of feeling for them. And in my heart was born a new, deadlier, hatred for these British who had made hangmen out of my friends.
60728. Katz. Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 13: A Terrorist Abroad. New York, N.Y.: Shilioni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. Geneva was a miracle of peace and beauty after the heat and heartache which was Palestine, and we revelled in the calm and normality of the country as we got down to work. I contacted Dr. Granados and arranged to meet him over an after dinner liqueur. Shmuel waited for us in a near-by park. Precautions seemed unnecessary in this beautiful town, so remote from the atmosphere of hate and suspicion which we had left behind, but Shmuel knew and was known by many newspapermen and we could not take any chances. I told Dr. Granados that I was merely an intermediary and would take him to meet one of the men he had met in Palestine. So we talked of South America as we sipped our liqueurs and behaved as any two people without any missions. It was very pleasant while it lasted. We took Dr. Granados up to our hotel room and disclosed that we were man-and-wife, just in case he should be distracted from the subject on hand by idle speculation on whether or not we were "living in sin." The whole purpose of Shmuel's conversation with Dr. Granados was to continue the effort made by the IZL leaders in Tel Aviv to persuade him and Professor Fabregat to bring in a minority report in favour of a Jewish State in the whole of Palestine, in order to; counter-balance a possible minority report in favour of the Arabs. But his task was hopeless from the start. Dr. Granados was intent on bringing out a report which was "acceptable" and he kept on confounding every argument with the irresistible: "But what do you expect of me if your own leaders don't ask for more than partition?"

The next day I went up to the very impressive League of Nations building to see Dr. Bunche. The moment I sent up my name, which on this occasion was Mrs. Freeman, I was ushered into his office and given a very cordial reception. Dr. Bunche has become an internationally famous figure since his appointment by the United Nations as Acting Mediator between Israel and Arab States, but even in those days he was one of the outstanding figures on the United Nations Staff, with an international reputation as a courageous fighter for the elementary rights of colored people in the USA and throughout the world. Consequently, I regarded it as no small compliment to the IZL that he treated me not only with cordiality, which is natural to a man of good breeding, but with respect, which is an indication of his attitude towards the people whom I represented. He readily agreed to meet me the next day, at any place appointed by me, and be taken to see Shmuel. The meeting place was the main Geneva railway station and the time 5 P.M. I waited until nearly 5:30 and had almost given up when he hurried up in a taxi, and apologized profusely for keeping me waiting. He had been at a conference and could not get away sooner without exciting undue comment.

From there he was driven away to the flat of Rammy—the Irgun representative in Geneva—where he had a long talk with Shmuel, from whom I gathered later that Bunche maintained complete discretion as to the work of the committee but provided us with a valuable insight into the background of international interest in the Palestine problem. Bunche then told Shmuel of his belief that the United States would support the partition scheme.

Shmuel remained in Geneva for three weeks more, pursuing his conversations and keeping IZL Headquarters informed of the progress of the UN Committee's work. I flew to London. I was met at the air-terminal by Shiloni, who was at that time in charge of the IZL money-raising campaign in England. Shiloni is a young S. African doctor who gave up a promising career to work on behalf of the underground. His energy devotion and single-mindedness earned him the respect and regard of everyone with whom he came into contact, from the illustrious heights in which sat Menachem Begin and the High Command to the lowest plane of money collectors and payers of lip service. He is dark, spare and bespectacled, with a passion for neatness. It would take a great adept to search his rooms and belongings without his spotting it immediately, so precise and pedantic is he about the correct disposition of every article of furniture, clothes, books and papers. His note-books and address-books are always a miracle of neatness and detail—which is very useful in the ordinary pursuits of an ordinary life but which requires yet a second miracle to preserve them from the hands of the police in the ups and downs of underground life. His fellow workers had a wholesome distaste for those note-books and when, on suitable occasions, they tactfully suggested the advisability of destroying them, Shiloni did so with a heavy heart at so much wasted effort. Shiloni is a great believer in book-learning. When I arrived in London I found him studying with great intensity a book which was going to solve all our problems, with a flick of the wrist. The book was Dean Carnegie's "How to Win Friends and Influence People." I still cannot decide whether the fact that a year later he was studying Dean Carnegie's "How to Keep Friends" is an indication of the success or failure of the application of Mr. Carnegie's recommendations.

It was just one year since we had left London for Palestine and England was still suffering from the war and post-war austerity. The small talk consisted mainly of food troubles and the scarcity of electricity and gas. The people grumbled and complained as only the English know how, but whereas there had always been an element of stoicism, even of cheerfulness, in their grumbling during the war, now there was the faintest suspicion of a whine.

The newspapers were still smarrting over the hanging of the two sergeants, and amongst the local Jewish inhabitants the pros and cons were fiercely and bitterly contested. Jewish public bodies had published violent denunciation but, in private, opinions were very mixed. A brave little group of young men had put up large posters in the main thoroughfares of London and the suburbs explaining the IZL point of view and blaming Bevin and the British administration for the tragic loss of Jewish and British lives in Palestine. In Hyde Park, that most remarkable of British institutions, the Jewish Legion—an ex-Serviceman's Organization—had a platform propounding the IZL doctrine. The leading lights of this group, as well as their chief orators, were Major Samuel Weiser and Lieutenant David de Lange. These two men did a great deal towards educating the man-in-the-street who was curiously ignorant of the situation in Palestine, despite, or because of, the immense amount of publicity, for the most part hysterically un-British, which it received in the national press.

I went to Hyde Park on my first Sunday in London and heard David de Lange explaining why the two sergeants were hanged. This required a great deal of courage at a time when British public opinion, quite naturally, was not very sympathetic to the IZL. De Lange's harangue, as is usual in Hyde Park, was continually interrupted by hecklers. At one stage he asked his audience: "Why were three young Jewish boys hanged by our Administration?" A voice, which sounded genuinely surprised at the question replied: "Because they were murderers." Up piped a Cockney standing next to me: "Murderers, they wasn't murderers, they was bloomin' 'eroes." Which does show that not all the British were completely unenlightened.

In this atmosphere, I was expected to collect money for the IZL. It did not seem very propitious and I must confess that my heart failed me. Money-collecting, at the best of times, is a nauseating business. But in this atmosphere, I was expected to collect money for the IZL.
mongering lack of taste, had printed a full-page picture of the hanging sergeants, with lurid captions. This naturally upset many people and they expressed their great horror at the barbarity of the act to me. I answered them curtly that a picture of the three hanged Jewish boys would not look any less grisly. In spite of the difficulties, we, that is Shlioni and I, did succeed in raising some money, due mostly to the former’s perseverance. We were particularly successful in Manchester where a few stones-throwing incidents had persuaded the local Jewish residents that there was, after all, anti-Semitism in England and that the IZL was not completely wrong in wanting to wrestle Palestine from the British for the Jews.

I was often in conflict with Shlioni and the local committee about the method of approach. They preferred wrapping their request for money in the thin-foil of charity—money for the dependents of the internes. It is true that the IZL had to divert money badly needed for arms and equipment to the dependents of their members who were held for years in detention camps by the British, and any money collected directly for these dependents naturally lessened the burden on the IZL. But my soul revolted at the thought of seeking for charity; and, from a practical point of view, I was sure that a direct request for money to buy guns and bullets would be more effective than another whine, following upon the positive cataract of charity wailings to which the Jews the world over were perpetually subjected. In some cases the straightforward approach brought a startled and frightened look into the eyes of our ‘victims.’ One man threw up his hands in horror and said: “For God’s sake, don’t tell me what you want the money for. Here’s £100 and I don’t want to know what it’s going to.” But for the most part people liked to be told outright what we were collecting for and felt that, in a small way, they too were taking part in the fight for their country.

In spite of the general grimmness of my work in England there were some lighter moments. On one occasion I went into one of the City branches of Barclay’s Bank to transfer money for the Irgun to Palestine. I filled in the necessary forms, using my London pseudonym, which was Mrs. Merriman. I also supplied some fictitious address. I had to wait for a few minutes for some formalities to be completed and sat down to read a newspaper. The clerk called out to me when he had finished but— I went on blithely reading. He called again and then I suddenly jumped up, remembering that I was the “Mrs. Merriman” who was being addressed. This happened to me frequently. I simply could not remember my own name. I secretly thought the whole business of pseudonyms a bit silly, but Shlioni insisted on it, if only for Shmuel’s protection. I met many of our London friends and acquaintances and passed off my presence there in 1947, Hillel Kook had completely submerged his identity in that of the Revisionist Party. In America his own particular genius for propaganda and publicity found a fertile group and eventually sprouted prolifically in the framework of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation. In Paris, the latter organisation had done an excellent job of work in putting Zionism on the American map, and in making propaganda in the United States for the IZL—for which they deserved much credit, in spite of the fact that there were not a few who felt that the actual actions of the IZL were their own advertisement and that money might have been better spent in putting guns into the hands of the underground forces than in putting full-page advertisements in the New York Herald Tribune. The originator and head of this group was Hillel Kook, known in America as Peter Bergson, whose acquaintance I renewed in Paris. I had met him previously in London in 1940. In those days he was a frustrated, impatient young man, capable but erratic, with unbounded energy and ideas for which he could find no outlet in the rather stodgy confines of the Revisionist Party. In America his own particular genius for propaganda and publicity found a fertile group and eventually sprouted prolifically in the framework of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation. In Paris, in 1947, Hillel Kook had completely submerged his identity in that of Peter Bergson, well-groomed, suave and charming, a consummate politician with the brains, opportunism and self-seeking which go to produce one.

Eliezer was in charge of organisation and operations in Europe. He came from Poland to Palestine as a youth and worked his way through the Hebrew University, receiving a degree of Philosophy. Working his way for Eliezer consisted of being at various times a tutor, a nightporter in a hotel, where he sometimes got his Plato mixed up with his entries in the register, and, most exalted and amusing of all, an inspector of “kashrut” in the local butcheries. Epikaurus in all matters and epicurean in matters pertaining to food could sum up Eliezer succinctly. I loved eating with him. Just to watch him so obviously enjoying his food gave an edge to my own appetite. Being married to a woman in glowing terms—she is attractive, intelligent, has a nice figure and then he will shatter the vision with a malicious little twist— and the tax on greyhound-racing as does the ordinary British man-in-the-street. While the French behaved as any ordinary, decent people would behave in similar circumstances during the Exodus incident, yet one felt, nevertheless, that the opportunity of vivacious retaliation for Britain’s fine. Italian hand in the liquidation of French interests in Syria was not altogether absent from the thoughts of the French Authorities.

In Paris I met Benjamin and Eliezer for the first time. Benjamin was in charge of the European headquarters of the IZL. He had been detained in Eritrea from where he staged a dramatic escape to Abyssinia. After several very long months in Abyssinia, he was spirited over to France by the tortuous path of the underground. Benjamin is a Russian born “Chinese” from Harbin. The appellation ‘Sin’ (the Hebrew for Chinese) is hardly in keeping with his auburn hair and very marked Russian accent. He is the sweetest and gentlest of men—a characteristic which did not help him much in dealing with some of the real tough guys of the underground movement or with the suave politicians of the “Aid Organizations” such as the Hebrew Committee for National Liberation.

The latter organisation had done an excellent job of work in putting Zionism on the American map, and in making propaganda in the United States for the IZL—for which they deserved much credit, in spite of the fact that there were not a few who felt that the actual actions of the IZL were their own advertisement and that money might have been better spent in putting guns into the hands of the underground forces than in putting full-page advertisements in the New York Herald Tribune. The originator and head of this group was Hillel Kook, known in America as Peter Bergson, whose acquaintance I renewed in Paris. I had met him previously in London in 1940. In those days he was a frustrated, impatient young man, capable but erratic, with unbounded energy and ideas for which he could find no outlet in the rather stodgy confines of the Revisionist Party. In America his own particular genius for propaganda and publicity found a fertile group and eventually sprouted prolifically in the framework of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation. In Paris, in 1947, Hillel Kook had completely submerged his identity in that of Peter Bergson, well-groomed, suave and charming, a consummate politician with the brains, opportunism and self-seeking which go to produce one.

Eliezer was in charge of organisation and operations in Europe. He came from Poland to Palestine as a youth and worked his way through the Hebrew University, receiving a degree of Philosophy. Working his way for Eliezer consisted of being at various times a tutor, a nightporter in a hotel, where he sometimes got his Plato mixed up with his entries in the register, and, most exalted and amusing of all, an inspector of “kashrut” in the local butcheries. Epikaurus in all matters and epicurean in matters pertaining to food could sum up Eliezer succinctly. I loved eating with him. Just to watch him so obviously enjoying his food gave an edge to my own appetite. Being married to a woman in glowing terms—she is attractive, intelligent, has a nice figure and then he will shatter the vision with a malicious little twist—and the tax on greyhound-racing as does the ordinary British man-in-the-street. While the French behaved as any ordinary, decent people would behave in similar circumstances during the Exodus incident, yet one felt, nevertheless, that the opportunity of vivacious retaliation for Britain’s fine. Italian hand in the liquidation of French interests in Syria was not altogether absent from the thoughts of the French Authorities.
ordinary human, elementary rights of hygiene were denied him and he lay in his own excretion for six weeks until his body began to rot. This was only one of many devilish refinements which man’s ingenuity can conjure to debase the very name of man. It is no wonder that after six months Eli emerged from captivity with a bitter hatred of his torturers and all they stood for, and a subconscious terror of his fellow-men. He was immediately smuggled out of Palestine and sent to Europe to work for the IZL there and recover his physical and mental health. No one could have staged a quicker recovery than Eli, with his intelligence, strength of character and perseverance. But the recovery could not humanly have been a total one. He has remained with this fear complex which he attempts to hide by laughing at himself in particular and the world in general, but which makes itself felt in his verging on cruelty towards anyone who attempts to get too close to him and make him vulnerable to heartache and disappointment. Besides this fear of personal relationships, Eli has a fear of the authorities. He spent three years in Europe, working in a clandestine, illegal organization, which necessitated his crossing borders illegally, bringing over money illegally, and being concerned with bare-military “illegal” operations, such as the blowing up of the British Embassy in Rome and the derailing of the British troop-train in Italy— and he did all this while being mortally afraid. Eli is one of the bravest men I know—he does things in spite of his fear. This fear of Eli’s led him to meet people only on street-corners. There is practically no streetcorners in the main thoroughfares of the capitals of Europe where Eli has not met some-one. This habit annoyed people who objected to kicking their heels at street-corners, sometimes on a bitter winter’s day; but Eli insisted. This desire for secrecy, however, did not always help him. He still managed to get himself arrested twice in Italy. On one occasion he was picked up by the police for being without papers and was detained for weeks.

On another occasion, a few weeks after the blowing up of the British Embassy in Rome, the police came to arrest him. He started running and was naturally followed and caught; He claims to have told the police that he has a nervous disorder which makes him run whenever he sees a pretty girl (after her, naturally, not from her). When this explanation made no apparent impression on the police, Eli changed his tune and became a pathetic victim of the concentration camps, who instinctively ran whenever the menials of authority appeared on the horizon. Whether this story touched the soft hearts of the Italian police or not, I do not know; but they nevertheless released Eli after a few days’ detention.

Any arrest of his fellow-workers, which occurred quite frequently, would send Eli into a frenzy of hotel-changing—one night in one hotel and then off again. When he decided he had put the police off his track (they weren’t on it in any case, nor had they the faintest suspicion that they were, in all innocence, causing someone such trouble) he would settle down in some quiet back-street place until the next volcanic eruption. Eli had offices scattered all over Paris. Here he received telephone calls from all over Europe. In each office he had a different name. It was quite impossible for an ordinary, normal human-being to keep track of this conglomeration of names, offices, countries, telephone calls. But Eli could and did. He very, very rarely got himself mixed up with himself in some other guise. [=

60729. Katz. Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 14: A Terrorist Abroad. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. I was rather exhausted after my mission in England, so Shmuel sent me off to Normandy for a few days with a friend. We stayed with the only real French people I have ever met. (All others had been either French Jews or emigres). As my French vocabulary consists of exactly five words, of which two are “Out” and “Non” I concentrated on the food and left the polite conversation to Dinah, who knew about 50 words. We discovered to our great horror that had been given, I found it to be a hospital. Nothing daunted, and in spite of the temporary discomfort one feels when the first ice cold spurt hits one, I recommend this method of performing ablutions, if only for the exhilarating blood-coursing after-sensation and the rather punitive delights of splashing around in a moon-drenched sylvan glade in a real nymph and auraugh, alas, there was no nymph and auraugh. When I returned to Paris, having quite recovered from the aftereffects of London, Shmuel informed me that I was going on a trip to Stockholm. The purpose of this trip was to spy out the prospects of raising money for the IZL and also to probe, very gently, the possibilities of buying arms. I was quite thrilled at the chance of seeing Scandinavia, but my ardor was considerably dampened when Shmuel informed me that because of currency restrictions, I could get only a single ticket to Stockholm and could take £5 with me. For my subsistence in Stockholm and my return fare, he informed me that I would have to rely on our Stockholm contact. In Paris this didn’t sound nearly as bad as it really was, but, nevertheless, I can hardly claim to have set out in high spirits. We left Paris in the blazing heat-wave and arrived, after a few hours of non-stop flying, in an icy-cold, dark Stockholm-feeling of foreboding developed from an uncomfortable feeling in the abdominal region to a positive certainty of forthcoming catastrophe when I found no message from our Stockholm man awaiting me at the air terminal. Shmuel had cabled him a few days previously and had asked him to meet me. Stockholm, like any other capital in Europe, was very full and it was only through the influence of the air company that I was fixed up in the Hotel Gillet for a couple of days only.

The next morning I started a hunt for our contact man whose telephone number I had. After a great deal of exasperation and, trouble through the fault of the South African education system which did not consider it necessary to insist on the teaching of Scandinavian languages, I managed to gather that he was out of Stockholm, had been away for a week and would continue to be away for another week. I knew nobody in Stockholm, I had five pounds and no return ticket. Obviously, the first thing to do was to have a hot bath and a good breakfast which did not have to be paid for in cash, but went on the hotel bill. So I did that. The hotel was scrupulously clean and the room accommodation included an approachable W.C. and wash-basin, but no bath. Baths were extra and they provided the biggest, cosiest, wooliest, bath-towels I have ever seen. One of these would have made rather a bulky souvenir to take away, but I was sorely tempted. Having reinforced myself, I set out to try my fortunes in Stockholm, amply provided with instructions and directions from the hall porter, all ending in “gatan” with a few “storts” and “bergs” thrown in. First of all I tried to change my precious five pounds into English pounds and intimated that they had “enough of that rubbish.” The thought of what effect this attitude would have on a pukka Britisher, was the only bit of pleasure I got out of my trip to Stockholm. Eventually, at my third attempt, I managed to change my English pounds and the two thousand French francs I had tucked away in my purse. I then had approximately 60 kronen with which to get through the week. So I went and had a good lunch at the Gillet Hotel (and the Swedes certainly can eat), which cost me 7.5 kronen, and was the first and last good lunch to which I treated myself in Stockholm.

In the afternoon I set about finding my secondary contacts whose addresses and telephone numbers Shmuel had given me, just in case. The first was a fairly prominent business-man—Mr. K.—who had a reputation for being wealthy. He was out. The second was a young man by the name of Esther Lerenman, who stayed somewhere in the outskirts of the city and all they stood for, and a subconscious terror of the local inhabitants. I arrived at the address I had been given, I found it to be a hospital. Nothing daunted, and in spite of the ice-cold spurt which had started, I decided to reap some benefit from the pounds I have spent on detective stories and adopted one of the better known methods of tracking. By the simple process of walking into one apartment house after another in the same street as the hospital and looking at the lists of the occupants, I eventually found Miss Lerenman’s name and mixed up with himself in some other guise. [="author"

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads
==============================================================================
home. She too, however, was out.... I left a note for her and started the weary trek back to the hotel. Having arrived there, wet and bedraggled and full of self-pity, I was somewhat restored to find a telephone message from Mr. K. awaiting me. Would I come and see him the next morning, which was Friday, at his home? I most certainly would, and did. I travelled there by tram (I was still in the money then). Mr. K. lived in an apartment house in the fashionable residential district of Stockholm. His flat is large and beautifully furnished. Mrs. K., who opened the door, was large and beautifully dressed. Mr. K. did not spoil the sympathy. He had started life (in Germany evidently) with the initial advantage of a large frame, which, when filled in by Swedish food, produced a veritable mountain. His suit was so beautifully cut, however—and I strongly suspect a little judicious corseting too—that the impression he conveyed was merely that of a man who over-indulges himself somewhat.

Mr. K. was very courteous. He wanted to know who had sent me, how I had got his telephone number, who I was, what I was and, most of all, what I wanted. I explained as best as I could because, by now, I was beginning to feel a little vague myself about what I wanted in Stockholm. I very gently and timidly touched on the subject of money needed in general by the IZL and in particular by me. "Oh," said Mr. K., "we have just had a campaign for the IZL and we all contributed very generously." I subsequently discovered that Mr. K. had generously donated 300 kronen, which translated into English money means £30, and into American money means $45—less than the price of one of his suits. I explained that the IZL had never seen any of the money collected in their name, which was one of the reasons why I was in Stockholm. The conversation was carried on in German on his part and a very poor imitation of Yiddish on mine. By the time I left Stockholm my Yiddish was fluent, if somewhat original.

Mr. K. went off to phone his fellow Committee-members to arrange for me to meet them, while I carried on a desultory conversation with Mrs. K. I met the Committee for lunch. There were six or seven of them—all well-dressed and well-fed and looking extremely bulky and bear-like in their heavy overcoats and mufflers. I felt positively lost amongst them— a veritable orphan Annie. We went to a Jewish restaurant—the same gefulfe fish, Kneidlach and roast chicken that one gets in any Jewish restaurant in any town in the world. Only here, the liberality of the portions and the cleanliness of everything supplied the lovely city graced by magnificent goddesses. But I hated the place intensely. At night I went to bed early and rested my weary limbs. But, unfortunately, those weary limbs were also very cold and, without any artificial means of heating, they continued to remain very cold, sending constant biting messages to my brain to do something about it. The net result was that my brain became overheated and feverish and my feet remained cold and I spent most of the night tossing restless in my bed. The arrival of morning and, most important of all, of breakfast, was a sheer release. On Wednesday afternoon, by which time I was pretty hungry, Leo arrived post haste, having received an urgent message from his wife to return immediately to Stockholm, and my period of purgatory was over.

Immediately upon Leo's return we set about planning a campaign of action. We agreed between ourselves that we would not draw on Leo's very slender funds, established for the purpose of organizing members of the IZL in Sweden. So we simply had to raise money by a snap collection. Leo drew up a list of probable donors whom he would contact and I, as I had to get to Helsinki somehow or other, took along to the Finnish Consulate where I, as I had to get to Helsinki somehow or other, took along to the Finnish Consulate where I discovered we were travelling to Finland on the same boat. I eventually went by plane and, except for a fleeting glimpse in Helsinki, did not come across him again, which, perhaps, was all to the good. Conspiracy and flirtations are not very good stable companions. Leo’s task was not so easy. Most of the people on his list were not in Stockholm and those that were felt that they had already contributed their share to the gallant struggle of the IZL by donating their £15 or £20 to my predecessor. Nevertheless, after super-human efforts, Leo managed to raise enough money for a ticket to Helsinki and to cover the expenses of my room until the end of the week.

As I stepped into the plane on Friday morning, my spirits soared so much that I decided to risk writing to Shmuel. A few days previously I would not have dared write for fear of giving such vitriolic and splenetic vent to my feelings as would have turned the writing paper to ashes. As my pen was useless, I borrowed one from my neighbour. It happened to be one of those advertised as being capable of writing under water. Unfortunately, that is the only place where they do write, and unless one puts on diving gear and ensconces oneself at the bottom of a swimming pool, one is likely to dislocate one’s wrist trying to achieve a whole letter. Nevertheless, my spirits were not to be dampened. Leo had telephoned his father to meet me at the air terminal and when I arrived, there was a veritable deputation awaiting me. I was given so warm a welcome that I hardly felt the cold weather—and the temperature was 4 degrees below zero. We all went to Leo’s father’s flat where I explained the purpose of my visit. I found their enthusiasm and admiration for the IZL very heartwarming after the rather cold appreciation of the Swedish Jews. They asked for a little time to discuss the matter amongst themselves and meanwhile undertook to make my few days’ stay in Helsinki as pleasant as possible. This they did with a right good will. I was wined and dined until I felt positively bloated, and all this in a Helsinki which was still suffering from the after-effects of a crippling war. The rationing were very scanty, but the restaurants were amply stocked with every variety of food—at a price.

A very good example of the austerity conditions in Helsinki at that time was the hotel in which I stayed. It had just been evacuated by the Russians, and had still not been properly equipped for visitors. There were only two or three rooms which were habitable. My hosts apologized profusely for the lack of comfort, but Helsinki was full of foreign correspondents and trade deputation who had monopolized the very scanty accommodation. I had a huge room and bathroom. There was, however, no heating whatsoever and not the faintest sign of hot water. And any attempt at extracting any out of the maid or porter was simply hopeless. They just did not understand anything except Finnish and no-one who has not heard Finnish can possibly imagine how outstanding it sounds to anyone not born and bred in the country. During my four days in Helsinki I did not manage to separate even one word from the jumble of sound.

So, having given up any hope of getting hot water, I had to make do with cold. By breakfast time the morning after my arrival I had even solved the problem of hot water. I was given the austerity, standard breakfast which consisted of “silver tea,” a lovely name for something as prosaic as hot water, a little milk and sugar and some dry bread. I “bathed” in the silver tea, drank the little milk together with the dry bread and licked up the sugar. Fortunately my Finnish friends believed in “second breakfasts.”

There were at the time about 1200 Jews in Finland, mostly of Russian origin, and as warmhearted and hospitable as the Swedish Jews are cold and stingy. I remarked very mildly to my friends that I mean this is the only place where they do write, and climate, or, maybe, the magnificence of the scenery adds zest to the appetite. I didn’t do too badly myself, but then I had a few days of semistarvation behind me. On one of my evenings in Helsinki I went with Leo’s parents to see “Odd Man Out.” The Jewish population of Helsinki was greatly excited over this film as they had heard it was about the underground; and for them there was only one underground—the IZL. I did not have the heart to disillusion them and tell them it was about Ireland and not Palestine. The day I was due to leave, my friends explained to me that they very much wanted to help the IZL, but however much money they collected in Finland—and in a population of 1200 it wasn’t possible to collect over-much—when taken out of the country and converted into terms of dollars or pounds would amount to very little. So they suggested we should send out a young man to collect money, but that it should be converted into goods—either timber or arms and, in this guise, taken out of the country. I promised to convey this to our headquarters in Paris. Eventually, nothing came of the scheme as it was thought too much of an undertaking to ship arms all the way from Finland when there were some available a good deal nearer home. But, nevertheless, the good intentions and the warmth of feeling towards the IZL on the part of our friends in Helsinki was greatly encouraging.

I returned to Stockholm by ship which I boarded at a port called Abo. At least it’s written “Abo,” but I dread to think how it is pronounced. The return journey to Abo through the Finnish countryside was a delight. What particularly fascinated me were the dainty, picturesque, little wooden houses with which the country is liberally dotted. I made a mental note to try and transplant one of these houses to Palestine if we should ever become respectable enough to live above ground, literally and figuratively.

When I boarded the boat I found I had a two-berth cabin to myself. As always in these Northern countries it was scrupulously clean, it was warm and there was plenty of hot water. I went out on deck for some air before dinner and was “picked up” by the ship’s engineer—not very surprisingly a Finn. We got on famously in German, of which I know very little and not more than about five words. But I understood him well enough to know he was making a date with me for 9 that evening. The simplest thing was to say “yes” instead of breaking my teeth and trying his patience, so I said “yes” and, of course, did not turn up. No doubt he found someone to console him. Then I went down to look for dinner. I offer the following solemn invocation to the Finnish Merchant Navy: “For heaven’s sake write instructions to passengers in any European language, mind any, in addition to Finnish, which is quite meaningless to ignorant travellers like myself.” I wandered around helplessly for half-an-hour looking for the dining salon. The trouble was that in every nook and cranny there were people eating and I was completely at a loss to find which nook would suit my requirements. Eventually, a young Norwegian, seeing my plight, asked in tolerably good English whether he could help. I practically embraced him with relief and explained my difficulties. He looked a little askance at such abysmal ignorance but, nevertheless, took me under his wing and undertook to escort me to dinner as soon as the first session was over. My new friend, whose name was Nils, had escaped to England from Norway after the Narvik disaster and had served in the British Army—hence his very welcome knowledge of English. When we eventually got in to dinner, Nils piled up my plate with a gorgeous selection of mixed foods. I finished this with difficulty to find, to my honor, that it had merely been an hors d’oeuvre and the meal proper was yet to follow. I retired gracefully and spent the rest of the meal in wide-eyed astonishment watching Nils eat. And he was so slight too. After spending a pleasant hour in the cocktail bar, I retired to my cabin and slept properly for the first time. Later on, my feet were actually warm.

We arrived in Stockholm very early in the morning. It was drizzling and Leo was not there to meet me. He apparently had not received my cable. I just had no luck in Stockholm. Fortunately, Nils was still attentive. He took me to breakfast and then we tried to phone Leo. Just in case one hasn’t enough troubles in Stockholm, the public telephone booths are so built that one’s legs are completely exposed to the curious gaze of the passers-by and, what is a good deal more serious, to the elements. I was told, in all good faith, that the reason for this was so that the Stockholm authorities, who are great sticklers for the conventionalities, could observe whether any unseemly conduct was being practiced in the telephone booths. I must say that any couple who could manage to make love in a Stockholm telephone booth ought to have earned respect and admiration for their perseverance and ingenuity, rather than the opprobrium of the authorities. Nils and I spent an hour trying to phone Leo, taking it in turns to enter the telephone booth so as not to shock the local populace unduly. Nils, of course, was at a distinct advantage as he was, most sensibly, wearing trousers. Skirts may be quite the thing for the well-dressed woman-about-town, but they are hardly suitable protection against the bullying nor’-westers (or sou’-westers, or what you will) which came blustering in under the partitions of the Stockholm telephone booths. When I had emulated Lot’s wife to the extent of having been turned into a pillar of ice from the thighs downwards, we eventually located Leo. To my eternal disgrace, as soon as Leo said he would pick me up in ten minutes, I despatched Nils quite unceremoniously, in spite of his long-standing kindness.

Leo and I went off to look for an hotel room and once more I landed up in one of the lesserknown rooming-houses. This time my room was a huge, cold, old-fashioned drawing-room, literally bedecked with 19th century knick-knacks, with a bed tucked away as unobtrusively as possible in a corner. My feet turned cold at the very thought of sleeping there. Adjoining my room was a bathroom which was actually the door leading out into the passage. I was always scrupulous about locking troth doors when I used the bathroom, which is more than could be said of the other occupants of this most gloomy of houses, to my continual embarrassment. Leo and I had a council of war and I impressed on him the dire necessity of my getting back to Paris and out of Stockholm as soon as possible. There was only one slight hitch—the price of a plane ticket. Leo had a short, a very short, list of people who had promised to give him donations. They were mostly Jews born in Sweden who sympathised with the IZL. We visited them and, after much sweating of blood, came away with a total sum of 500 kronen, leaving us still short of 100 kronen (short £10) for a ticket and expenses. This we borrowed from Mr. H., who behaved quite handsomely, even taking me to dinner at the posh Stockholm Restaurant on a couple of occasions. I have often wondered why Mr. H., who has a family, did not ever take me home to meet his wife. I presume that, like all stolid and respectable citizens, he does not believe in worrying his wife about business matters; or maybe there is, after all, something of the adventuress about me, which only the exceptionally acute eye of Mr. H. could spot. Nevertheless, I bear him no grudge. On the contrary, he and Leo were the only two beings in Stockholm who appeared human to my somewhat bilious and prejudiced wisdom.

At last, after another couple of days of tramping and chocolate lunches, I took the plane to Paris on Friday morning, exactly two weeks after I had set out on my ill-fated journey. And even my leaving was not without incident. At the airport the Authorities demanded 10 kronen overweight for my luggage. I very firmly offered to pay in English pounds and they just as firmly turned my offer down—very fortunately, as I had no English pounds to pay with. Eventually, with the judicious use of my sweetest smile, we reached a compromise. I gave them Leo’s address and they said they would collect the money from him. I have never found out whether they did or not. In Paris I proceeded to the hotel where Shmuel was staying, tearfully reprimanded him for not coming to meet me (which was not surprising since I had written that I was returning on Saturday) and then soaked away all the bad memories of Stockholm in the hottest of hot baths. [ ]

60730. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 15: Prelude to War. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Future Press, 1953. SHMUEL had to stay on in Paris for another two weeks, but he decided to send me back to Palestine immediately as there were no other commissions to be done in Europe. I went by train to Amsterdam and had my first experience of travelling by wagons-fits. We passed through Rotterdam where the sight of cows grazing peacefully in the middle of what must once have been the shopping-centre of the town was all that remained to remind one of the brutal havoc and disaster which Hitler’s planes had hurled down on a peace-loving kindly community. I had a day and night to myself in Amsterdam and went on a sight-seeing trip. The luxurious feeling of being a tourist with a couple of pounds in my pocket quite outweighed what must otherwise have been a sense of utter loneliness in this strange town. And, also, I was delighted at being able to understand, more or less, what the people were talking about, since Afrikaans, one of the national languages of South Africa, originates from Dutch. It is, however, a very much simpler and less guttural tongue, and I was abashed to find, when I tried out my Afrikaans on the hotel staff, that they thought I was indulging in baby-talk. The next morning I took the plane to Lydda and found myself seated next to a prominent member of the Tel Aviv community who had been on a mission to Holland for the Jewish Agency. We soon struck up an acquaintance and he, perhaps naturally, concluded that I was a regular member of the highly respectable South African community in Palestine. The talk in the plane was about the Partition plan and its pros and cons. I opposed partition, whereas my neighbor, as was to be expected, was in favor of it. He turned to me and asked: “Why is it that all the South Africans oppose partition?” While not betraying my pleasant surprise at this revelation of anti-partition solidarity on the part of my fellow countrymen, I replied: “Maybe, it is because they are afraid that by the time they want to, or have to, come to Palestine, there won’t be any room left for them.” In spite of our disagreements, my neighbor and I remained on extremely friendly terms; so much so that when a violent atmospheric storm broke out and the lights failed, he very tenderly held my hand—presumably to prevent me from being frightened, or maybe to fortify himself. When we parted at Lydda he gave me his card and told me to be sure to call on him whenever I needed help. The only other time I ever met him he was with his wife, so I tactfully did not recognise him. But I still have his card! In Lydda I went through the formalities of security and customs, receiving the unfailing courtesy which my British passport always earned me. In the main hall there was a terrific din going on. The police had arrested two suspected “terrorists” who were very loudy and volubly ,protesting their innocence. They were two young men from a religious colony who had come to meet their mother, arriving from abroad. Unfortunately for them, they had not had the foresight to change from their workaday khaki clothes and hats to the irrefutable respectability of lounge suits. So they were detained as suspected terrorists and only after a lot of gesticulating and explaining on their part, and weeping and beatings of the breast on the part of the poor bewildered mother, were they eventually escorted out of the airport and released.

I returned to our flat in Ramat Gan, which had been faithfully cared for by Yael, a Jerusalem-born American-educated girl, who was the mainstay of the IZL public relations department. The next day I took Shmuel’s report to Menachem Begin and that night he and I went out for a walk in the streets of Tel Aviv—the first time he had walked in Tel Aviv since he had gone underground. We avoided all streetlights and spoke English for greater security. Nevertheless we were both a little nervous and did not stay out too long. But this walk whetted Begin’s appetite for the outside world and we made plans for the whole family to spend a Saturday at our flat in Ramat Gan. Any arrangements that Begin and I might have made for a family outing were purely academic and theoretical. They had first to have the official sanction of Avraham, who was the final arbiter on the question of security, before it came within the bounds of feasibility. And Avraham was not in the least enamored of the idea. His reluctance was eminently understandable. The expedition necessitated Begin's going out in broad daylight, and in the company of his family. Even if he, himself, were not recognized, there was always the danger that Ala might be recognized and the fact that they had two children and that Ala was about to have a third, would be divulged. The British never knew that Begin had more than one child and consequently in all their searches they looked for a man with a wife and small boy. Chasya was thus a vitally part of the conspiracy and the revelation of her existence would naturally increase the danger of discovery. Nevertheless, after a little pressure from everyone concerned, we finally succeeded in wringing a very hesitant "yes" from Avraham—on condition that everyone was as careful as possible.

Meanwhile Shmuel returned from Paris, having once more got past the security officials at Lydda with nothing worse than a search of his baggage. The fact that Shmuel was never detained during the years of his active participation in the underground remains one of those miracles in which the history of the revolt abounded. He was continually leaving the country and so exposing himself to the scrutiny of the security officials; he was known to have been one of the leaders of the Revisionist Party, and he was always meeting foreign correspondents who had an unfortunate habit of mixing with the local correspondents, many of whom knew Shmuel by name, if not by occupation. I think it is as much to the credit of the discretion of the correspondents as to the apparent inability of the authorities to reconcile his studious, "civilised" appearance and South African passport, with their own conception of a "terrorist" that Shmuel owed his immunity. The fact that he featured on the CID B list did indicate that he was not entirely above suspicion, but, fortunately, the seeds of distrust had no chance to germinate into fully grown conviction of guilt, before the British withdrew their administration.

On the momentous Saturday morning, Shmuel went into Tel Aviv early to pick up the Begin family. Avraham waited in a taxi a few corners away from the Begin flat and Shmuel then escorted them to the taxi, walking behind with Menachem, while Ala and the children went ahead. For Bennie and Chasya this was a most wonderful adventure. Not only were they going out with their father for the first time in their short lives, but, most wonderful of all wonders, they were going in a motor-car! The excitement was terrific. There were no British barriers out that day and inter-urban cars were not stopped and searched as very frequently happened. So the Begin family arrived without any mishap to spend the first of many Saturdays with us in Ramat Gan. Menachem was in "disguise"—he was wearing a hat and had taken off his glasses. Contrary to reports from the most authentic sources that Begin had had numerous plastic operations and that his face was altered beyond recognition, he had never done anything more drastic than grow a beard of going to Palestine as she had planned because, at the last minute, my mother insisted on the C deserted the plan because of the risk of exposure to the authorities.

On the momentous Saturday morning, Shmuel went into Tel Aviv early to pick up the Begin family. Avraham waited in a taxi a few corners away from the Begin flat and Shmuel then escorted them to the taxi, walking behind with Menachem, while Ala and the children went ahead. For Bennie and Chasya this was a most wonderful adventure. Not only were they going out with their father for the first time in their short lives, but, most wonderful of all wonders, they were going in a motor-car! The excitement was terrific. There were no British barriers out that day and inter-urban cars were not stopped and searched as very frequently happened. So the Begin family arrived without any mishap to spend the first of many Saturdays with us in Ramat Gan. Menachem was in "disguise"—he was wearing a hat and had taken off his glasses. Contrary to reports from the most authentic sources that Begin had had numerous plastic operations and that his face was altered beyond recognition, he had never done anything more drastic than grow a beard of going to Palestine as she had planned because, at the last minute, my mother insisted on the C deserted the plan because of the risk of exposure to the authorities.
on our breakfast-room wall. It was one of the less successful efforts of some quite unknown artist and depicted a young Jewish girl being burnt at the stake during the days of the Spanish Inquisition. With childish curiosity I asked my mother about the picture and heard, for the first time, of racial and religious persecution. That picture haunted me for years and probably did much to keep me on the beaten track than did all the Zionist history and propaganda which was pumped into us. In 1930, Vladimir Jabotinsky came to South Africa and my mother and eldest brother, Michael, became his ardent supporters. Michael was at the University in Johannesburg at the time and came home one vacation and told us younger children that we too, should be supporters of Jabotinsky. As, in those days, Michael was our great hero and wielded an immense amount of power and influence over us, we unquestionably became Revisionists (as members of Jabotinsky’s party were called) too. My father was chairman of the local Zionist Society and had been so for the previous twenty years. He stuck to his guns and remained a General Zionist. Then, in 1935, Jabotinsky broke away from the World Zionist Organization and formed the New Zionist Organization. This breakaway clef the Zionist movement in two and set the opposing parties into snarling and howling at each other for years. My mother, with the same enthusiasm and fanaticism that she had put into working for Zionism in general, now turned her attention to the New Zionist Organization. Our small town was split in two as surely as if some venomous giant had carved a yawning chasm through its middle. My mother quarreled with her opponents with great gusto. Her best friend, shocked by what she considered sheer betrayal on my mother’s part spread invidious rumors that my mother had lost her reason. This moved my mother to flights of fancy which could hardly be called lady like and are certainly unprintable. My father, who I have always been convinced was really still a General Zionist and wanted to remain in the Old Zion Organization, finally gave in (probably in sheer self-defence) and joined the Revisionists, resigning his 25-year old chairmanship of the local branch—to the great delight of his rivals who had grown old and decrepit waiting for a chance to oust him.

When I came home at vacation time from the University, I had to be supplied with a list of the people with whom we were on friendly terms. Old Zionists did not visit the homes of New Zionists and vice versa. At all communal functions the opposing factions lined themselves up on opposite sides of the hall. To an objective onlooker the whole affair was quite impossibly comical, but to the parish politicians, with my mother vehemently in the forefront, it was deadly serious.

By the time the IZL came on the scene my mother had moved to Johannesburg and there she took up the cudgels for the terrorists with the same zeal and an improved power of invective. Amongst the Jewish community she gained herself the reputation of being practically the chief bomb-thrower of the IZL and certainly one of its most vehement protagonists. Sheenew got herself into trouble with the local general press in an escapade which was quite typical of her. She had heard that a newly-rich member of the Jewish community had given £100000 to the Red Cross Fund. So my mother went off to get a donation for the IZL from him. She could not get to the great man, but saw his secretary instead. The secretary happened to be a gentile, and an Englishman: but my mother, who is incurably hopeless at catching names, decided that he was Jewish and so a fit receptacle for some suitable propaganda, which he could duly pass on to his boss, about whom she could hardly have been said to have minced words. The net result of her efforts was a big headline in the following day’s “Star,” one of the biggest dailies in South Africa, to the effect that the Palestinian terrorists had launched a big money campaign in South Africa and had sent thousands of pounds out of the county. My mother defended herself against the attacks of my brothers and her fellow-workers with the plea that the secretary had encouraged her and had not divulged his real sympathies—in short that he was a provocateur and a dirty dog. All of which may be quite true, but it did not enhance my mother’s reputation as a conspirator and keeper of secrets.

That is why I bought the khaki shorts and shirts when my mother arrived in Palestine. But to give her her due, except for informing the whole neighborhood of what she thought of the British and of the Jewish Agency, she was remarkably discreet. Perhaps the lurid picture of all the sufferings Shmuel would have to endure at the hands of the British which I painted and embellished for her had some effect.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations’ decision to partition Palestine was announced amid wild hilarious celebrations. Throughout the night young people and old danced in the streets. Venerable chassidic rabbis danced their ritual dances amid a motley, drunk with ecstasy. And on the 30th November, when the first Jews were killed by Arabs and the Yishuv was brutally jerked back into sobriety. From that day, the IZL was transformed from an underground anti-British organisation into a semi-secret army. A complete British withdrawal from the Tel Aviv to Petach Tikvah area enabled the IZL to set up proper training camps for full-time courses. This change-over and complete reorientation in training methods brought to a head the chronic shortage of arms and ammunition. In a series of daring and spectacular escapades, the British were relieved of quite a substantial amount of equipment, but this could not satisfy the growing needs of a miniature army. It was then that the plan for robbing Barclay’s Bank in Tel Aviv was conceived. Shmuel told me of the daring scheme to take away the £250000 which was purported to be in the vaults of the Bank. We waited on tenterhooks for news. Twice, unbeknown to the authorities, the plan failed through some technical hitch. We who knew about the plans beforehand were bitterly disappointed at each failure and felt the tension and expectancy reach practically to bursting-point. At last Gideon, who was the perpetrator of all the schemes, announced that his plan was fool-proof. The date was fixed for a Monday, late in February, 1948. The plan was as beautiful as it was simple. A squadron of British soldiers used to come regularly to Barclay’s Bank in an armoured bren-gun carrier to collect the army pay. They would throw a cordon round the bank and prevent anyone from entering it until they; had finished their job. This usually happened at about 8.30 on a Monday morning, a few minutes after the bank had opened. On this particular Monday, it was planned that the bren-gun carrier, complete with “British” soldiers, would draw up at the bank, which would then be duly cordoned off. Meanwhile Gideon and a confederate, who had been introduced into the vaults on Sunday night, would wait until the usual bank official had opened the vaults, would then calmly take the money, probably gagging the official so as to prevent him from giving premature alarm, and would hand it out in the manuscript. “soldiers.” The bren-gun carrier, complete with loot and accompanying lorry-load of “Tommys” would then disappear into limbo. All this would take about 15 minutes and be completed before anyone outside the bank was aware of anything untoward.

On Sunday evening I got a message that Ala had gone into the nursing home to have her baby and would I come early the next morning to look after the other two children. I decided to drop by Barclay’s Bank on my way to the Begins in order to be able to pass on the good news at first hand. I arrived at the bank a little after 8:30 and found an excited crowd milling around. This was not qmte according to plan, and my heart sank. I asked one of the bystanders what was going on and was told that the bank had been robbed. My spirits soared again. While I was watching, the boys came out of the bank and started climbing the bren-gun carrier. They had sacks on their backs, but they looked rather light and empty to me. At a whistle, the soldiers forming the cordon scrambled onto the lorry and the procession moved off to the accompaniment of bullets directed at them by an over-zealous and stupidly officious Haganah squad, which had got wind of what was afoot and had hurried to the scene to protect the interests of the British. At the sound of firing, the crowd scattered precipitately, not without many a mutter and a growl about people in the Haganah who could not mind their own business. I thought it wise to retreat too, as bullets have a nasty habit of straying from their intended direction, and a dead messenger could hardly be a harbinger of tidings, whether good or bad. I hastened to the Begins and told Menachem what I had seen, being able to assure him only that the boys had all got safely away.

We waited that morning for news from Gideon and news from Ala. The hours went and Gideon did not turn up. I made a feeble attempt to explain this away by the fact that he was probably busy counting the money. But we both knew that in the event of success, Gideon would
The journey was quite uneventful until we arrived at Bab El Wad, a spot well-beloved of Arab snipers and just about the most treacherous part of the road. At this psychological moment one of the foremost buses broke down. The whole convoy was halted while hasty repairs were effected—an operation calling for considerable courage and generous in nature as she was tough in appearance. She and her companion waited inside ten minutes longer than the appointed time and then decided to withdraw. Prolonging their stay would not have helped at all, as their very presence in the bank meant the maintenance of the cordon and the concomitant holdup of the relevant clerk. A few months later, the LHI pulled off the same trick—but successfully. They took the precaution of picking up the clerk at his home and accompanying him to the bank. [1]

In March, early in the morning, we arrived as soon as possible, bursting with excitement. At one o'clock I heard the secret ring and let Gideon in. His first words dispelled any last vestiges of hope which we may still have entertained. "Did you hear of the terrible catastrophe in Jerusalem?" he asked Begin. That day a British "special squad" had blown up half of Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem, killing over fifty people and causing millions of pounds of damage. Disaster was added to disappointment, and just to put the finishing touch for Menachem, Ali gave birth to another daughter.

What had happened to the plan which was as simple as it was beautiful? It was one of those incalculable imponderables which inspired Hamlet to quote Shakespeare on "the divinity which shapes our ends" or, on a lower plane, wrung from the Burns the heart-rending admission that "the best laid schemes, of mice and men gang aft'agly." The official in charge of opening the vaults had unfortunately just that morning had to visit the synagogue to offer up a prayer for the soul of his dead father. In consequence, he had arrived a little late at the bank, only to find himself kept out by the cordon of Tommies, in spite of all his promising. Gideon and companion waited inside ten minutes longer than the appointed time and then decided to withdraw. Prolonging their stay would not have helped at all, as their very presence in the bank meant the maintenance of the cordon and the concomitant holdup of the relevant clerk. A few months later, the LHI pulled off the same trick—but successfully. They took the precaution of picking up the clerk at his home and accompanying him to the bank. [1]
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp/net/downloads

punctually at nine. I spent a few minutes with him and then started off for the Consulate which was five minutes from the Jewish Agency building. I had gone a few hundred yards when there was a terrific explosion behind me. I did not wait to see what was happening, but hurried to get to the Consulate with most unheroic precipitancy. I found Shmuel in the waiting room, deathly pale and quite touchingly pleased to see me whole. The blast of the explosion had brought down bits of the Consulate ceiling. Almost the first few minutes of shocked silence, the waiting room started babbling at once, with that animation which comes from relief at having been spared the fate of others less fortunate. Phones started ringing and murmurs started flying. Out of the conglomeration of fantastic stories, one pattern appeared constantly—the explosion had occurred in the Jewish Agency building and the explosives had been introduced in an American Consulate car.

When the handful of people in the waiting room, with whom we had suddenly become bosom pals, heard that Shmuel and I intended going from the American Consulate to the French Consulate, there were cries of horror and protest. And not without reason. The French Consulate was in the Arab part of the New City and to get there from where we were meant traversing quite a few unhealthy streets from the Jewish point of view. An intrepid Jewish newspaperman had been stabbed and severely hurt in that neighborhood a few days previously. Our original plan had been to refrain from mock heroics and go there by tax but pleased to see me whole. The blast of the explosion had this was thwarted as the whole area was closed to vehicles immediately after the explosion. So we had to go on our perilous path with complete nonchalance outwardly and with a good deal of inward trepidation. We were the only two lunatics in the streets, except for some of the most villainous-looking Arabs I have ever seen, sitting on the pavement outside their shops. As we passed them I felt the hair rising at the back of my head and a cold shiver went down my spine. Our overcoats seemed very flimsy protection for our vulnerable backs and I swear I felt the knife between my shoulder blades as surely as if it had been plunged there by murderous figures.

Whether my light hair proved a talisman or whether the Arabs had had enough blood-letting for one day we’ll never know, but we did arrive safely at the French Consulate to the great surprise of Benjamin Cohen, the Secretary of the Consulate and a good friend of ours. We both presented a very bold front and laughed the matter off with sang froid. Benjamin very kindly undertook to deliver Shmuel’s passport, duly visa’ed, that afternoon at the Vienna Cafe. He was the only Jew in the French Consulate and, in fact, one of the very few Jews who still came to work in that part of town. He risked his life every day getting to and from work and sometimes, when the tension was high, was virtually marooned in the Consulate for days on end. But he carried on steadfastly, typifying the Jews of Jerusalem who went about their daily tasks calmly and courageously in the face of terrific day-to-day strain and tension.

We decided that we had drawn sufficiently on our good luck account for one day and, on the way back from the French Consulate, took a circuitous route which, for part of the way at least, led past a British encampment. It is true that the British troops in Jerusalem had been more effective in blowing up the “Palestine Post” building and Ben Yehuda Street rather than in protecting unarmed Jews against the attacks of cutthroat Arabs, as was their ostensible task. Nevertheless, we thought that if confronted by an actual attempt at slaughter on their doorstep, they might lift a hand to prevent it, if only out of sheer sportsmanship. Their presence could not, of course, be any guarantee against the ill-effects of sniper’s bullets, but death by a bullet seemed rather a clean, civilised way of departing from this world in comparison with some of the exquisite refinements which the Arabs had invented.

We once again got safely through the danger zone, passed through the gates out of the British ghetto and came to a barricade hastily erected by the Haganah at the Jewish Agency building after the damage had already been done. At the barricade was a squad of black-bereted Haganah boys in charge of a cockeyed, bumptious little officer modelled to a T in the style of a British army “type”—from the little, fair, moustache to the jaunty cane. He stuck his nose in everywhere, interfering with the efficient execution of his men’s duties and generally pushing everyone around, especially old women and men with long grey beards. I am generally quite mild-tempered, but any attempts at bullying me or pushing me around make me wild. So, not unnaturally, I took an instant dislike to this officer. This dislike was considerably enhanced when our turn came to be identified as passed through the barrier. I produced my British passport and was immediately fawned upon and slobbered over in English, until he saw the obviously Jewish name, when his attentions cooled off considerably. Then came Shmuel’s turn—and Shmuel had no passport and was very obviously Jewish. He explained very politely and apologetically that he had to leave his passport at the French Consulate and had come out without an identity card, not anticipating such a contretemps. The officer replied as rudely as possible that Shmuel could then spend the rest of the day at the barrier until someone turned up to identify him. I offered at once to identify him as my husband and asked rather caustically whether all these elaborate precautions weren’t somewhat belated. The officer bridled and said aggressively that I was at liberty to pass on through the barrier. I replied equally aggressively that I was remaining with my husband, and challenged him to have me removed. At that stage Shmuel lost his temper too and demanded to know, in his very fluent Hebrew, why the officer was speaking English instead of his own tongue. The quarrel then continued in Hebrew with biting interjections in English from me, as my Hebrew fails me completely in times of stress. At this stage a British officer walked up from the ghetto to the barrier. Our by-friend almost fell over himself in his rush to jump to attention and salute. When I heard the British officer addressed as “Sir,” I said very loudly and clearly to the general assembly: “Now what connection could a Haganah officer possibly have with that man to make him lick his boots like that?” The British officer had the good grace to blush for his less sensitive counterpart who, nevertheless, felt he had had enough of us and of me in particular. He dismissed us haughtily, with the sneering advice to Shmuel to stay in Tel Aviv in future.

I felt that we had had enough of Jerusalem at one go and suggested that we leave as soon as possible. There were all kinds of rumors afloat to the effect that Fawzi Kaukji, who was in charge of the Arab irregulars in the Jerusalem area, had cut off the road to Tel Aviv or had threatened to cut it off. Consequently, there was a wild rush on the Tel Aviv buses. Through the system of knowing someone who knows someone or, to use that delightful Israel expression, “protektsia” (a system which is universally abhorred and decried by those who haven’t got it, until they acquire it), we managed to get into an armored bus and started our return journey.

The discussion in the bus naturally centered on the destruction of the Agency building. Each one had a story to tell of how he, or his uncle, or his grandfather’s third cousin, had been refused entrance to the Agency building by the guard while free access was given to non-Jews. Feelings ran high against the bullying and boorish behaviour of the Haganah guards at the Agency barricade towards their fellow-Jews, especially the old and timid, as opposed to their servile groveling before the Gentile; Human grief, bitterness and determinism in a bullet-proof container, could perhaps fittingly describe that bus-load of intrepid travellers. The dangers of the road were completely forgotten in the grief at the death of our fellow Jews, blown up by the enemy, bitterness at the Gentile complex which allowed our enemy to stalk abroad untrammelled, and determination to resist that enemy to the last. Fawzi Kaukji had not cut off the road (it was cut off a month later) and we arrived safely in Tel Aviv, to be greeted by my mother with grateful surprise. She had succeeded in convincing herself that we were both buried beneath the ruins of the Agency building, unbeknown to God or man. In spite of the general concensus of opinion in our bus that the destruction of the wing of the Agency building could be mainly ascribed to the Haganah's Gentile complex, the facts were otherwise. The story as we heard it is that the Agency had been in the habit of buying arms from the Arab driver of the American Embassy car and actually bought and paid for the load of explosives which was delivered to them at their heavily-protected headquarters, duly equipped with an appropriate time-gadget. We shall have to leave it to history to decide whether it is better to be a fool or a knave. [-]

60733. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 18: A Am Becoming a Soldier. New York, N.Y.: Shilioni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. In March, 1948, Shmuel went to America, alone, as it was decided not to send me, after all. I was very pleased at this decision as the situation in Palestine looked as if it were becoming decidedly interesting, and the one and only characteristic which I have inherited from my mother is my intense dislike of missing anything exciting. The purpose of Shmuel's trip was to speed up the collecting of money with which to buy arms, and to finalize the arrangements for the dispatching of a ship containing arms, ammunition and potential soldiers for the IZL. This ship was the Altalena. Shmuel left on one of the last—if not the last—plane to take off from Lydda airport which was immediately afterwards encircled by the Arabs. His car was fired on several times during the journey without suffering any direct hit. A month before this I had decided that it was time I stopped being a tame terrorist and learned how to be a soldier. As a result of my "proteskia" in high quarters, my request to be put into a training group bore immediate results. A day later a young woman, fully a head taller than I and correspondingly broader, arrived at our flat. She introduced herself as Rachel, a pseudonym, and said she was my instructress-to-be. I had been assigned to a group of young women who were starting a course in the handling and use of fire-arms. One of my jobs was to be the "contactman" of the group. That meant that Rachel would let me know when and where we were to meet and I had to pass on the information to every member of the group. Rachel suggested that I start my career immediately and very kindly volunteered to take me on a tour of the houses of my fellow adventurers so as to acquaint me with their addresses. I looked obviously at my semi-high-heeled shoes and suggested changing them, but she assured me heartily that we didn't have far to go.

We set off, Rachel with great gusto and greater strides, and I trotting obediently behind her. The first house we had to visit was on a hill-top in Bne Brak—about two miles from our flat as the crow flies. To my horror, I discovered that Rachel intended taking the same route as the mythical crow, except that ours would be on a lower and much more uncomfortable plane. We started off across country, climbed through barbed-wire fences, ploughed through cow-infested fields, traversed murky-looking lanes and, in a final spurt, climbed a steep hill to our destination. The crowning indignity was by being left outside to kick my heels and stub my toes while Rachel went in to transact some secret business. By this time I had worn down my high heels, torn my nylon stockings, ripped my narrow skirt and was now thoroughly equipped for Yemenite girls. I suggested to Geulah that the two of us would manage alone but sheokemonely took me aside to whisper that we really seriously thinking of using me. The first thing I did was to have that barrel of fish removed as far away as possible. Then we set to work to scrub the floors and the shelves and some old cupboards which I found thrown out in the yard. When everything was scrubbed I sent one of the girls into Petach Tikva to buy oil cloth with money which I wheedled out of Yehudah. We shall have to leave it to history to decide whether it is better to be a fool or a knave. [-]

After Shmuel left for America I suggested to Amtzur, who was in charge of training, that I would like to go to a camp for a week or two really to learn how to shoot instead of fooling around. He promised to arrange this for me and, sure enough, a couple of days later, Geulah, an officer in the IZL, arrived up at our flat and told me she was delighted at the idea of my going to a camp for a week or two—to cook. Geulah's enthusiasm was understandable. She was in charge of the commissariat for the district and had also to provide the cooks. This was an extremely difficult undertaking as every young girl wanted to be in the front line and no one wanted to do anything as dull and prosaic as cooking. I did not think this a very appropriate means of improving my knowledge of firearms, although of course I might in the process have found some substitutes for dynamite and hand-grenades; nevertheless, I agreed to go and cook, consoling myself philosophically with the though that "they also serve who only cook and wait."

I sent my mother off to my brother, Michael, in Haifa and Geulah took me to the camp. It was housed in an abandoned Arab farmhouse set in the midst of an orange grove. There was no water on the premises and the nearest tap was a mile away. The "kitchen" consisted of a few shelves, three primus stoves and a sink—a very precious item of furniture as I discovered later.

The camp was known as Base 6 and was used as an officers' training school. One course had just been completed and a new one was due to start the next day. Yehuda, the officer-in-charge of the school was in despair. He had forty men coming the next day and the two young Yemenite girls who had been cooking were completely hopeless. He did not have to tell us that. The smell from the kitchen hit us hard as we came up the avenue of orange trees. Geulah introduced me to Yehuda as the new cook. He looked at me blankly and then drew her aside and washing in a fierce whispered conversation. The purport of this, as she subsequently told me, was, that she had completely lost her senses; that this was no place for ladies; that she had better send me home and bring somebody a little less genteel. Geulah listened unperturbedly, told him not to worry and took me to the kitchen. My heart sank somewhat when I saw that kitchen. It was a veritable pig-sty. There were puddles of water on the floor, bits of food and dirty tins and bottles lay scattered all over the place, and in a corner was a barrel of stale fish from which arose a sickening stench. I had a hurried colloquy with Geulah. The next day one of the other young women from our course, Chana, was due to join us. We were to spend a week in the camp and then be relieved by two other women from the same course. I suggested to Geulah that the two Yemenite girls stay on that day to help me clean up, but that she should send them back to their base the next day when Chana arrived. She was a bit dubious about whether the two of us would manage alone but agreed, nevertheless, to do as I asked.

The first thing I did was to have that barrel of fish removed as far away as possible. Then we set to work to scrub the floors and the shelves and some old cupboards which I found thrown out in the yard. When everything was scrubbed I sent one of the girls into Petach Tikva to buy oil cloth with money which I wheedled out of Yehudah. We covered everything possible with clean oil-cloth and the kitchen began to look almost presentable. Then I had a look at the cooking utensils. There were two large saucepans and a frying pan. With these we had to cook three-course meals for over forty people, and boil water for tea and washing. I set to and found some clean petrol tins. (By the time we left at the end of our week the food had already stopped tasting of paraffin). In addition, we had forty tin plates, forty mugs, forty forks and spoons and three knives.

Yehuda set the guards to work to clean up the dining room and the yard and by the next morning when Chana and the forty young men arrived the camp was almost habitable. Yehuda gave Chana and me a lecture on the necessity of punctuality in meal time. We listened very seriously but all the time an imp in my brain kept asking: I wonder how he managed with the young Yemenite girls? He must have suffered the pangs of hell. He is very precise and orderly, an excellent instructor, according to reports from his pupils, and a keen disciplinarian. But I am sure our Yehuda's girls were not made of the same stuff. Chana and I agreed to try our best to have the meals ready in time: breakfast at 7.30 a.m., lunch at 1 p.m., supper at 6.30 p.m. We were supposed to serve fish for lunch as a substitute for meat on two or three days of the week, but all the time I was at the camp I refused to look a fish in the face after my inadvertent contact with some decaying remnants of the species in that notorious barrel. So Guelah very kindly sent us meat when she sent anything at all. Although the Jewish population of Palestine was already beginning to feel the first pinch of the impending meat famine, there was no shortage of meat whatsoever in the IZL base camps. The commissariat had been provided with a few hundred head of cattle by an enterprising posse which had rustled them from a decidedly unfriendly Arab village.

But the worst problem was that of washing-up. The first day we took the dirty crockery down to the water; but after that we had the water brought to the dirty crockery. Even then the process was a nightmare. We had to boil water and then use all kinds of ingenious devices to overcome the deficiency of bowls in which to wash up and racks for drying the dishes. But human ingenuity rises to great heights when put to severe tests and we overcame these difficulties. Our greatest boon was the sink with a run-away pipe which gave us an outlet for our dirty water and slops. As we discovered on another occasion life would have been impossible without that. Yehuda allocated orderlies to keep the two large drums in the kitchen filled with water and other orderlies to cut the bread at meal times. Anyone who has ever tried cutting bread with a blunt knife for fifty hungry men has tasted a bit of Dante's Inferno. Chana and I tried it once and then demanded five orderlies to take over from us.

To the camp guards we handed over the job of peeling potatoes while they guarded in the mornings, and scouring the saucepans in the afternoons. In spite of this distribution of labor we worked from 5.30 in the morning till 10 at night with a few minutes snatch off for meals and a precious half-an-hour in the afternoon for getting ourselves cleaned up.

We rose at 5.30, cleaned our room, dressed, washed, laid the tables, made the breakfast and served it at 7.30. After breakfast we washed up and prepared the lunch, which we served at one o'clock makes.

On our last day in the camp Chana and I were rewarded by Yehuda for our efforts, and compensated for our thwarted ambition to become fighters by being allowed to shoot a couple of rounds each on a rifle and Sten-gun. I proved to be a tolerably good shot, especially with a Sten-gun, which had been bestowed on us. When, in addition, the boys formally presented us with a token of their appreciation, we couldn't have been more pleased than if we had been given Victoria Crosses. We left the camp that day with the feeling that we really had done something to help, if only to avert the wholesale poisoning of some of the IZL's most promising young officers.

On our last day in the camp Chana and I were rewarded by Yehuda for our efforts, and compensated for our thwarted ambition to become fighters by being allowed to shoot a couple of rounds each on a rifle and Sten-gun. I proved to be a tolerably good shot, especially with a Sten-gun, which had been bestowed on us. When, in addition, the boys formally presented us with a token of their appreciation, we couldn't have been more pleased than if we had been given Victoria Crosses. We left the camp that day with the feeling that we really had done something to help, if only to avert the wholesale poisoning of some of the IZL's most promising young officers.
which they hid from the prying eyes of the British police, who had received instructions to disarm and arrest any Jews who carried some means of self-protection. The Haganah boy who had been sitting near me decided that the safest place for his Sten-gun was right under me. I had had more comfortable seats in my time. A sudden shout shook us all, a Sten bullet whistled past us. Fortunately the British policeman who put his head into the bus to see if everything was all right did not notice the look of extreme discomfort on my face, or perhaps I underrate my powers of dissimulation. On arrival in Haifa I did a very stupid thing—I took a bus going to the town instead of to the Carmel. As soon as I realised my error I got off the bus, to find myself a lone and solitary figure in Kingsway—the Main thoroughfare in the town. There was not another living soul to be seen. All the shops were closed, as they had been for weeks. In spite of the state of utter desertion and desolation in the street, I could feel the presence of people and, mainly, of eyes staring at me. Perhaps this was merely my fevered imagination, but it felt real enough. I did not like the idea of standing and waiting for a bus with all those eyes staring at me and started walking frantically back towards the Carmel, dragging my suitcase and glancing nervously up at the roofs of the flanking buildings in the hope I presume, of dodging if I spotted a sniper aiming at me.

Suddenly a taxi came tearing out of a side-street. I hailed the driver frantically and as he pulled up I hurled out to him scarcely noticing the weight of my suitcase, and jumped into his car, without stopping to look whether he was an Arab or a Jew. He was Jewish, fortunately, and lifelessly with a bullet through its head; the hardworking mother hanging the week’s washing on the roof. Every empty space in a building was commandeered by previous roof-hungry refugees. There was not a solitary figure in Kingsway—the Main thoroughfare in the town. There was not another living soul to be seen. All the shops were closed, as they had been for weeks. There were few belongings piled on hand-carts, dragged wearily from street to street looking for garages, washhouses, foyers, which had not already been commandeered by previous roof-hungry refugees. There was not a block of flats in Tel Aviv which did not have two or three refugee families established in its entrance hall and another two or three families in its wash-house on the roof. Every empty space in a building was immediately turned into a dwelling. The problem of sanitation became a serious one for the Tel Aviv Municipality, as well as for the more fortunate, and more discriminating, flat-dwellers. Trim, well-kept gardens were turned into forests of washing on lines. Fashionable, modern blocks of flats looked like tenement houses, with hordes of grimy children clinging to the bannisters, milling up and down the stairs, using the gardens both as football pitches and as public conveniences. Tel Avivian tempers, which are sorely tried at the best of times by the heat and over-crowding, were now tried almost to breaking point by the invasion of the refugees, the nightly nerve-racking cacophony of noise and the daily fear of sudden and violent death or maiming.

We who lived in Ramat Gan were spared some of the anxieties and irritations suffered by the Tel Avivians. We met with sniping only when we went to Tel Aviv—which most adults did in any case every day. My only direct contact with bullets came during a visit to the dentist's office. When we went to Tel Aviv—which most adults did in any case every day—my only direct contact with bullets came during a visit to the dentist's office. It was not another living soul to be seen. All the shops were closed, as they had been for weeks. The dentist, a middle-aged Christian Arab came up to him and started complaining tearfully that some one had taken his refrigerator out of his flat. The dentist had been badly wrecked in one heavy explosion and the outside wall was pitted with sniper’s bullets. There wasn’t very much doing in his office in those days but he felt honored-bound not to be frightened off by the Arabs and carried on a single-handed war of nerves with the snipers. He was, in fact, much more afraid of being thought afraid than of the practical consequences of his bravado on his own life. He, the dentist, regarding himself as having some small share in the victory (a claim which no one could possibly deny) and took all the more pride in showing visitors round what had been the dangerspots of Haifa. When we arrived at the Wadi Nisnas I got a tremendous thrill out of seeing soldiers with IZL armbands patrolling the streets. As we were standing and chatting to a sentry, a middle-aged Christian Arab came up to him and started complaining tearfully that some one had taken his refrigerator out of his flat. The dentist had been badly wrecked in one heavy explosion and the outside wall was pitted with sniper’s bullets. There wasn’t very much doing in his office in those days but he felt honored-bound not to be frightened off by the Arabs and carried on a single-handed war of nerves with the snipers. He was, in fact, much more afraid of being thought afraid than of the practical consequences of his bravado on his own life. He, the dentist, regarding himself as having some small share in the victory (a claim which no one could possibly deny) and took all the more pride in showing visitors round what had been the dangerspots of Haifa. When we arrived at the had been for me just one more proof that the end does not always justify the means.

We Ramat Gannians were also given a small taste of the refugee problem when we were asked by the Local Council to give temporary homes to children who had fled the reign of terror on the border together with their families, and were living in conditions of indescribable filth and over-crowding. I readily agreed to take a child and applied for one. I was given a five-year old boy named Mordecai.

He was Mordecai Sharabi. He was small, but perfectly formed, with big, beautiful black eyes, a mischievous, intelligent little face and the most cuddlesome of chocolate-brown bodies. The very first thing I did with Mordecai was to give him a hot bath. His yells were blood-curdling, but it was not the water he objected to so much as being undressed to the skin. To such an indignity he had never before been exposed in his short life. After a week of violent protestation, however, he suddenly submitted to his nightly bath without so much as a squeak—until I tried to give him a shower bath. Then his native stubbornness asserted itself and he refused point-blank to go under "the rain." He developed a very fine taste in clothes, too, and would forcibly prevent my dressing him in anything of which he did not approve. His method was that of passive resistance—he simply refused to put his arms into sleeves or his legs into the appropriate holes, and unless I used actual physical force I could not budge him from his decision. The clash of wills usually ended in my cursing volubly in English, which Mordecai could not understand, and submitting to his judgment.

Every morning when he opened his eyes and saw his newly-polished, brightly-shining boots, his delight was unbounded. As these impeccable, glistening diurnal beauties could not possibly be the same kicked-about, dusty, shabby monstrosities of the night before, little Mordecai was quite convinced that I bought him a new pair of shoes every night. And if nothing else endeared me to him, it was this astonishing generosity (or whatever corresponded to that in his baby-reasoning) which did. Feeding him was a racial problem. I consulted all the authorities in the neighborhood on the feeding habits of the Yemenite; beautiful Yemenite Hebrew—and we had been introduced by our guide to Mordecai's sister and nurse, Sarah. I asked where Mordecai was and Sarah pointed to the bed. In a far corner we saw a frightened little face—one of the children of the neighborhood, and the father, too, came out to see. It was Sarah's face and native pride and dignity. When the time came to part with Mordecai, my mother and I shed quite a few tearful tears. I dressed him up in perfectly-pressed trousers, a spotless white shirt and a genuinely new pair of gleaming white boots. The neighbors gathered round to admire and say farewell.

At the school where all the foster-mothers were congregated with their charges we exchanged views on our experiences. Some of the women were genuinely relieved to be rid of their foster children, but the majority of us were sad at heart. As I said goodbye to Mordecai he must have felt from the unaccustomed violence of my embrace that something unusual was afoot. He clung to me and refused to let go. One of the teachers tore him away forcibly and I left with the sound of his sobs in my ears. The children were returned to their parents, who had been given temporary homes in a safer area. I managed to find out the address of Mordecai's "home" and, after giving him two weeks to acclimate himself to his own mother and family once more, my mother and I went to visit him.

The address was somewhere in the Hatikvah Quarter of Tel Aviv. This is a slum quarter on the border of Jaffa. After wandering around for an hour and being continually yelled at by the local inhabitants not to go here because of the snipers or there because of collapsing houses or somewhere else for some other equally good reason, we stumbled on a young girl who said she knew Mordecai and would take us to him. We arrived at a one-story, barn-like building and went in. It consisted of one large room with no flooring and very little roof. In this room there were no less than ten families—sleeping, eating, cooking, washing and what, for lack of a better term, I have to call living.

Our guide pointed out a baby-cot in one corner of the room and indicated that this was the "home" of the Sharabis. We timidly edged towards the cot and a pile of ragged blankets and clothes suddenly came to life in the shape of a young girl. There was a quick exchange of beautiful Yemenite Hebrew—and we had been introduced by our guide to Mordecai's sister and nurse, Sarah. I asked where Mordecai was and Sarah pointed to the bed. In a far corner we saw a frightened little face peeping out beneath a pile of dirty rags and dirtier clothing. The face was the face of Mordecai, but there all resemblance ended. He was dressed in exactly the same clothes as he had worn on the day he left me, with the addition of two weeks' accumulation of mud, food particles and God knows what else. He was thin and pale again—and frightened to death that we had come to take him away. My mother spent some of the hardest twenty minutes of her life in Mordecai's home. I had seen poverty and dirt at close quarters before and was merely saddened by it. But she was seeing it for the first time in its naked reality, and she felt physically ill. We left after twenty minutes in a triumphal procession, followed by all the children of the neighborhood, after having succeeded in extracting a shy smile from Mordecai in response to the gift of a ball and chocolate. I begged his sister to bring him to see us sometimes. She never came and somehow or other I did not manage to visit him again until Jaffa was conquered. In the upheaval and general transplantation of people, Mordecai went out of our lives, probably forever. [—]

60735. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 20: Tafta and Yehudieh. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. But, to return to the attack on Jaffa. We were quite a mixed company that day in my brother's flat as the news of the attack came through. Those of us who were in the IZL were jubilant; the somewhat wishy-washy "sympathizers" were wishy-washy about this also—perhaps the attack was premature, perhaps it would have been better to have waited for the Haganah, perhaps this and perhaps that; while the outright opponents of the IZL saw in this action a Machiavellian political move to divert attention from the Haganah's magnificent conquest of Haifa. The latter, true to type, came out with a scathing radio attack on the IZL for "endangering the Yishuv" and "stabbing the authorities in the back"—in fact denunciation No. 3 (I am positive they had their Phillips catalogued and merely told their readers to produce No. 1, 2 or 3 as the case may be, so uniform and repetitive
Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine

www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

were they.) However, the attack on Jaffa proved to be so popular in Tel Aviv that the Haganah distribures began to look a little foolish and with a magnificant, face-saving, gesture they suddenly found it necessary to come to the rescue of the IZL, who, they declared, were unable to cope with the magnitude of the task. So, suddenly, it was the Haganah who was conquering Jaffa, according to some of the local newspapers, and the IZL were merely lending a little assistance. To them, if zealous, belief that nothing could be done without me, I hastened back to Tel Aviv to be in on the battle. I went straight to the Begin's house. Alia told me that she hadn't seen Begin for days, except for a fleeting glimpse now and again when he rushed in to change his clothes. I asked how I could get to the war, and she advised me to try the Freund Hospital, where the IZL had established its battle headquarters. I found the Freund Hospital fairly easily but did not find the guard too kindly disposed to stray, inquisitive females. Fortunately, Yael arrived a little later and took me in under his wing.

The Hospital was being used both for its original purpose, with an efficient staff of IZL doctors and nurses, and as the army headquarters. The whole IZL High Command were there. Menachem Begin, still unbeknownst to most of his soldiers, had come out of the underground and was moving around quite freely. The place was buzzing with activity. Everyone had a job and every job had been snatched up by eager firstcomers. They were managing quite well without me and I was about to go home, sadly disillusioned, when Yael came to the rescue again and asked me to drive her to a few places. I was delighted to be of some use and gladly consented.

Yael was acting as Begin's secretary and general right-hand woman. She translated statements from Hebrew to English for the foreign press, arranged press conferences, acted as public relations officer, typed, telephoned, rushed about the town and remained always smiling, cheerful and obliging—which endeared her considerably to the harassed, nervous and over-worked members of the High Command. I never got anywhere near to the fighting in Jaffa and with justice—there really wasn't very much I could do there. Instead, I was appointed Menachem Begin's occasional driver. I took him for long drives in the country away from the heat and noise of Tel Aviv, where it was impossible to think anything out to a clear conclusion. The IZL were in "occupation" of the whole area from Petach Tikvah to Tel Aviv. They patrolled the roads, controlled the traffic, guarded the settlements against possible Arab attacks. The blue armband with the IZL emblem was a familiar sight in these districts.

On one of our drives Begin and I were slapped by an armed IZL man. He apologized politely for troubling us, got into the back of the car and ordered us to take him to a spot well out of our way. I turned the car round obediently and the IZL commander was taken for a forced ride at the police, but firm, insistence of one of his sergeants, who would undoubtedly have been acutely embarrassed had he recognized his travelling companion.

Although Begin had come out of the underground in Tel Aviv, to the extent that he left his house in broad daylight and was known to be constantly at the Freund Hospital, yet he had still not made any public appearances and was unknown to the vast majority of IZL members. This was still a very necessary precaution as the British were still in the country even if they had moved out of the Tel Aviv district.

About a week after the conquest of Jaffa, Geulah suddenly descended on me again at about 8 o'clock one evening. She needed helpers urgently to provide a meal for a battalion which was setting out at dawn to attack Yehudieh, a large Arab village in the neighborhood of Petach Tikvah. We immediately set out for the base camp at Kfar Ona. Arrived there at about nine, we plunged into the thick of the hustle and bustle of an army preparing for action. The base consisted of a deserted Arab house with a large courtyard and surrounding out-houses. The house was used as army headquarters and kitchen. In the courtyard were clustered groups of men numbering about 200 in all, getting last-minute instructions from their sergeants, cleaning their weapons, laughing and joking—and all by the light of the stars. So have men throughout the ages prepared for battle and only the absence of the champing of horses and rattling of spurs served to distinguish this moonlit army encampment from that of Caesar or Judas Maccabees. There was also one other distinguishing feature—the women, from the First Aider, who went into the front-line with their male comrades, to the humble cooks who stayed ignominiously behind. Our instructions from the commissariat were to provide a midnight meal of sandwiches, hardboiled eggs and cocoa for 200 people, and a packet of sandwiches for each soldier to take along with him to tide him over the initial period of disorganization, until the field kitches were up and running. Our equipment consisted of two primus stoves, two large saucepans, a few knifes, fifty cups, and a tank of water. The furniture consisted of one large table. Light was provided by a hurricane lamp which was being continually borrowed by the first-aiders and forcibly recovered by the cooks to the detriment of tempers already frayed. We eventually had to take the matter to arbitration. We rounded up one of the officers in charge and each side presented its case vociferously: was it more important that the men should be fed or that the First Aid equipment should be in order? Even Solomon would have been hard put to it to decide. But our modern Solomon settled the problem simply: he ordered a hurricane lamp to be taken away from somewhere else and given to the first-aiders. The centre of the stove was thus transferred to another quarter.

Having successfully outmanoeuvered the harpies we next fell into the clutches of the furies—our two antiquated primus stoves. They either belched out smoke and flames with terrific verves and gusto, roaring boisterously all the time, or else they obstinately shut up clamps, refusing to be cajoled or threatened by the local Prometheans.

We struggled manfully with them, which was a supreme act of courage on my part, for if there is anything I am afraid of it is a primus stove. But eventually we realised that we couldn't possibly get the eggs boiled and the cocoa ready by midnight with our recalcitrant equipment.

It was a point of honor to have everything ready in time, so I found a solution for which I now beg our soldiers' pardon: we boiled the eggs in the cocoa! There is a saying in Afrikaans: "What doesn't kill, fattens." the soldiers of the IZL must certainly have put on a lot of weight during the period of their active service. Our "kitchen" had no sink and no drainage system whatsoever, with the result that the water we spilled in the dark and the water which leaked from the tank, combined with the dregs of the cocoa and the water from the cups which we were continuously rinsing to make up for the deficiency in quantity, soon formed into a pool on the stone kitchen floor. By the end of the night we were standing up to our ankles in water and wading through it with that horrible squeaking sound which wet shoes make. At two in the morning a bugle call brought the men in the courtyard to attention. The sergeants yelled out commands and in a few magical minutes there stood in perfect array, row after row of well disciplined soldiers, light artillery, infantry, pioneers and first-aiders. There was last hurried colloquy of officers and then Yishai, who was in charge of the operation, addressed the men by the light of the moon. This last Caesareasque touch perfected the illusion I had had all night. Here truly was an ancient Roman Army about to hurl itself against the cruel, ruthless Huns and Vandals.

Yishai's speech was caesarean in content too. He started with a brief survey of the plan of campaign, then exhorted his men to be courageous and steadfast in face of the enemy, and ended in fine oratorical style on the duties of a man towards his country and his people.

I had always been extremely sceptical of the practicallity of Caesar's stopping all proceedings to harangue vast hordes of soldiers no more than a few minutes before they plunged into the heart of a battle. But Yishai that night dispelled all my doubts and cynicism. Not only is it possible to deliver an eye-of-battle speech, it is even possible to make the occasion a very solemn and impressive one. When Yishai had arrived a little later and took me in under his wing. men should be fed or that the First Aid equipment should be in order?
were on part-time duty as guards and orderlies. We remained listening to the dying echoes of the fresh, young voices and then turned sadly back to our unheroic and unacclaimed chores.

By the afternoon of the next day Yehudieh was completely occupied by the IZL and it was safe for the “volunteers” to move in and start cooking. My turn came on Thursday, two days after the conquest. Geulah picked me up and we travelled by car to Kfar Ona, from there transferring to an “ambulance” for the short journey. The road to Yehudieh was surrounded and they were cut off, together with a small group of soldiers who had been driven out of the village and quite possibly it was! When we weren't chasing the flies off the food we were waging a fixed battle against a battalion of stray cats. And when we rested from these exertions we took care to keep a safe distance from the walls so as not to have too many unwelcome bed-companions. On account of other manifestations of primitive hygienic conditions in Yehudieh, there was a bonfire going perpetually in the courtyard, and a steady stream of men and boys, from young “generals” to even younger privates, filed past this bonfire and dropped into it their lice-infested clothes.

The problem of feeding the men was two-fold. We had to provide a proper three-course meal for those who could come and get their food, and we had to send food to about 100 men at the frontline who could not leave their posts. Again we came up against that perpetual nightmare in the IZL catering department—the chronic lack of utensils. We managed to provide a meal for the base soldiers with what amounted to commissary meat in comparison with our second problem. We simply did not have any available means of sending soup and hot drinks to the front line for 100 people. So we sent out scouts to scour the Arab shops. They came back with an amazing assortment of kitchen and bedroom ware. We first used the various species of jugs, then the wash-basins and bowls and, in the last resort, we had recourse to chamber-pots. In the latter instance we confined ourselves strictly to new ware only. Nevertheless I suspect that our thoughtfulness did not receive due recognition from the recipients of its fruits. As the cooks were on 24-hour duty, I had to spend the night in Yehudieh. The other women lay down to sleep on camp-beds in the first-aid room. I waited to see what the consequences would be, and the moment I saw first one, then another, surreptitiously scratching, I beat a hasty retreat. I found myself in a comparatively clean deck-chair, placed in it the middle of the officers’ duty room and settled down to get some sleep. Each time I managed to doze off, there was another interruption. Once it was the sentry to say the cats had got in through an open kitchen window and were devouring the next day’s meat. This necessitated a quick but boisterous sortie into the kitchen to disperse the marauders. Then it was a burst of ribald laughter from the duty officers in the corner or a hearty greeting to someone just in from the front-line.

At one in the morning I was cordially invited to join in a meal of chicken prepared by the sentries. I prudently refrained from enquiring how the chicken had been cleaned and in what kind of vessel it had been cooked. I chose a drumstick. Never have I lingered so long over a morsel of chicken. It must have belonged to the oldest rooster in the village and one whose muscles had been toughened and developed by years of cock-fighting. The young men attacked their chicken with gusto and looked at me in great surprise when I suggested timidly that perhaps another hour or two in the “pot” would have improved it considerably. Evidently the Palestinian youth grew teeth in keeping with their characters. After the chicken everybody else was in such high spirits that I gave up any further attempt at sleep and, after resting my jaw-muscles for a while, joined in the general merriment.

My period of duty was over after breakfast and while waiting for transport back to Tel Aviv I betook myself on a tour of inspection through Yehudieh. The village was one of the largest and richest in the country, by Arab standards. By European standards it was nothing more than a cluster of mud-baked hovels, set unevenly in roughewn, steep, winding streets, with here and there a stone house belonging to some local notable. Some of these notables must have had tidy-sized stockings stuck away somewhere. Their houses were furnished with magnificent carpets and drapes and excellent furniture. They obviously made up for their lack of toilet and washing facilities by the liberal use of expensive perfumes which they bought by the litre, or even by the gallon, if the size of their perfume bottles was any gauge. In nearly every house hung a picture of Haj Amin El Hussein—the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem and organiser of all the anti-Jewish riots in the previous two decades. In quite a number he shared honors with Hitler whom he had assisted in exterminating the Jews of Europe.

The local inhabitants had left in-a great hurry and had clearly taken very little with them in their precipitate flight. Not that the houses bore that peaceful look of being lived in and merely temporarily deserted by their owners. On the contrary, some of them had received a severe drubbing in the house-to-house fighting and others showed signs of having been invaded by a conquering army. And it was just these signs which indicated the precipancity of the flight of the owners of the house: a few pitiful articles of clothing thrown out into a courtyard, a child’s shoe lying on a dust-heap, a baby’s doll kicked into a corner. These little things would have taken away any “conquering hero” feeling if I had ever been disposed to have any. In spite of our victory and the very small loss of life amongst our forces, I felt rather sad about Yehudieh and the babies and children and women who were innocent victims in this war as in all other wars. But whenever I begin to feel sad and sentimental about the “innocent” Arabs, the thought of the 70 doctors, nurses and university lectures brutally murdered and incinerated on their way to the Hadassah Hospital, or the raped, mutilated remains of Jewish women fighters discovered by their sorrowing comrades, jerks me back to reality. And in Yehudieh, too, the eventual toll of Jewish blood effectively counteracted any false sentimentality for the “poor Arabs.”

Every village in Palestine has a water-tower which is its highest building and consequently its best lookout point. Yehudieh is no exception. One day, shortly after the proclamation of the State of Israel on May 14th, two young IZL women were on look-out duty on the water-tower in Yehudieh. For days the small detachment in Yehudieh were anxiously expecting a strong Arab counter-attack from Wilhelm. They had sent frantic messages to the Haganah for reinforcements. They received promises, re-assurances and finally abuse. But no reinforcements. On this lovely day in late spring the expected counter-attack took place. Before the two girls could join their comrades, the water-tower was surrounded and they were cut off, together with a small unit defending the tower. This small group of tired and dispirited soldiers fought like tigers against overwhelming odds. In bitter, hand-to-hand battles they fell, one by one, until they were all wiped out. Only the two girls remained on top of the watertower. They were first-aiders, not soldiers—they had no revolvers, no knives. They knew only too well what horror awaited them if they were to fall into the hands of the Arabs alive. The air and gravity were their only allies, and entrusting their souls to their God they plunged off the tower to shatter their bodies to pieces at the feet of the enemy. [—]

60736. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 21: A Momentous Sabbath. New York, N.Y.: Shilioni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. On Friday, 5/18/1948, twenty-four hours before the time they had previously announced, the British declared the end of their military operations in Palestine and decided to withdraw that day. The Army, which had already been withdrawn from all the towns and was concentrated in a coastal strip near Haifa was to be evacuate gradually, the last troops leaving in August 1948. On the afternoon of May 14th, Ben Gurion proclaimed the formation of the new State of Israel, with a Provisional Government composed of all the large parties, except the Revisionists. Early on Saturday morning the residents of Tel Aviv and Ramat Gan were awakened by the noise of explosions—the Egyptians had launched their first air-attack on the new State. Intrinsically the Egyptian air-raids were on a small insignificant scale, and in comparison with air raids in London, or Berlin, where tens of thousands of tons of death were hurled on the heads of a defenseless population during the course of one night, they could almost now be described as puerile. They used three Spitfires at a time and the bombs they dropped were 25 pounds, or at most, 50 pounds. But the fact that they had an absolutely clear run with no anti-aircraft or fighter opposition, was rather discouraging, and even frightening, to the civilian population; and even a 25-pounder can cause rather drastic results if it falls on one's head. The Egyptian air-raids on Tel Aviv continued for some weeks and caused many casualties, the majority of whom were killed when a bomb fell on queues of waiting passengers at the Central Bus Station. After the first two days the Israeli "Air Force" took up the cudgels. The mainstay of the Air Force was a handful of training-planes affectionately called "primus stoves" by their pilots. These planes and their crews had done sterling service in bringing supplies to isolated and cut-off settlements and in patrol-work, but they were hardly a match for the Egypt-—fighter-bombers, despite the willingness and stout-heartedness of their intrepid crews. However, in a few short weeks, the Air Force was sending their own Spitfires into the air manned by Jewish airmen from all over the world who flocked to the tiny State to help her out of her difficulties, and the Egyptians were chased out of the skies. The air-raids had one salutary effect: they compelled the Jewish refugees from Jaffa to go back to their homes. Even after that town had been liberatec and most of the refugees from the border had returned from their temporary, foley-and-roof homes in Tel Aviv to comparatively comfortable dwellings in Jaffa, some had, nevertheless, refused to budge, preferring their laundry rooms in a fashionable northern suburb to tenements in the unfashionable Hatikvah quarter. The first air-raid soon sent them scurrying helter-skelter back to the safety of Jaffa and dwellings a little less exposed to the heavens and the little missiles which fell from them.

On that Saturday the birth of the State of Israel the Begin were at our flat as usual. In the afternoon I drove them over to visit Zipporah Meridor. We sat down to tea with Zipporah and her two children—Rachel aged 11 and “Doodle” aged 6. Suddenly Rachel, who had walked over to the window, announced in the calmest of voices: “Mother, there’s father.” We all laughed at the joke. It was true that Jaacov Meridor had succeeded at last in escaping from the British detention camp in Kenya after four unsuccessful attempts, but we all knew that he was in Paris and couldn’t possibly take the risk of travelling at this juncture even in his anxiety to be reunited with his family whom he had not seen for four years. So we laughed at the joke, but Rachel was insistent. Zipporah rose to look out of the window and burst out: “It is Yaacov!” Then we all rushed to the window. Down the path, all wreathed in smiles, walked Yaacov and Shmuel. They could not have timed their arrival more dramatically. When the shouting laughing and crying were over we heard the story of their trip from Paris from Shmuel. They had chartered a special plane to take them to Palestine, and arrive there on May 15th. The plane was British with a British crew who had been given instructions by their firm to land in Cyprus. When they heard that their clients insisted on being landed in Palestine they protested volubly. The British Government had forbidden British planes to fly to Palestine and, in any case, the date was very unpromising as no one knew just exactly what would happen in Palestine after the 14th of May. After a great deal of arguing and telephoning to London the British business instinct evidently won the day and the captain agreed to fly to Tel Aviv. (Lydda was in the hands of the Arabs.)

The passengers in the plane were decidedly nervous all the way. There was every chance that it might prove impossible to land in Tel Aviv and that they might have to go to Cyprus or that if Cyrus would instruct the crew to land there in any event. The prospect of landing in Cyprus, in the very den of the lions, was not a cheerful one either for Meridor, even though he was travelling on a false passport, or for his travelling companions, among whom were two more who had escaped with him from Kenya. Indeed the whole plane load would have been an interesting catch for the British.

While the tension in the plane grew steadily greater and greater, Tel Aviv was suddenly sighted below, and the plane began making preparations to land. The Tel Aviv aerodrome was never intended for large aircraft and the plane pitched up right at the end of the run-way just short of taking a header into the sea. The passengers disembarked into a ghost airport. The place seemed completely deserted except for a plane which had suffered recent damage. As they glanced around curiously, human forms began cautiously retreating themselves from the nearby buildings until all at once they were surrounded by excited members of the Haganah who had come out from where they had been sheltering against possible bombs from the approaching plane. A short while previously they had been bombed by Egyptian planes and quite naturally suspected that this plane too might very possibly have been up to no good.

So Yaacov Meridor, Hillel Kook, Shmuel and company were the first air-passengers to land in the State of Israel. The British crew were at one and the same time relieved at their safe arrival and on tenterhooks as to their own fate and that of their plane, at which the Haganah men were casting overt looks of desire. A Haganah officer actually took one of the passengers aside and asked him if it would not be possible to persuade the crew to sell the plane. Eventually, to the considerable relief of both passengers and crew, the plane was ordered to take off for Cyprus, and pick up its passengers for the return trip on the following Tuesday, at the Haifa airport. [—] listened aptly, with tears in their eyes. After 2000 years of exile and political slavery the Jewish people had regained their national independence as a nation among other nations, as a free, dignified people among other free peoples. And Menachem Begin, leader of the small band of revolutionaries who had chased out the British Goliath, who had freed their people from the yoke of the oppressor, spoke to the people, told them that one struggle had ended to be superseded by an even greater, more dangerous battle—the battle to maintain their fragile State against the attacks of their vicious enemies whose combined armies were hammering at its gates. He spoke to the sons of Israel and to the mothers of Israel, adjuring them to be of good heart and to finish their monumental task with the same magnificent spirit as they had started it. And he spoke to the future Government of Israel, hoping to be wise in its dealings with other states, energetic in bringing the exiles back to Zion, just and righteous in its rule over the people, and steadfast in safeguarding the independence bought with the blood of heroes and martyrs. If this had been his first, well, as his first, message to the people of Israel, Menachem Begin would have become a great legendary figure in Jewish history. He will still feature prominently in any objective Study of the liberation of Israel as the great commander of the great army of revolution, but the aura of glam and mystery will have been rudely plucked away by the cruel fingers of Mad henchmen—Spit, Prejudice and Intrigue. [—]

60738. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 23: Birth-Pangs of the Altalena. New York, N.Y.: Shilioni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. YAACOV MERIDOR and Shmuel had come to Israel to explain why the Altalena with its load of soldiers and arms had not arrived in Tel Aviv port at midnight of 5/14/1948, as had been planned. Already in December 1947, after the publication of the partition decision with its concomitant declaration that the British must leave the country by 5/15/1948, the IZL High Command had forecasted that this latter date would mark the beginning of a concerted attack by all the Arab States on the infant Jewish State. They knew of the disastrous shortage of arms even in the Hagana despite the millions of pounds that had been collected ostensibly for the very purpose; they knew, too, that while the British were still in the country no appreciable number of arms would be allowed into the ports and any ship suspected of arms-running would be confiscated. So they planned to bring in a shipload of arms one minute past midnight on May the 15th. If this plan had succeeded, the whole course of the war against the Arabs would have been drastically altered, but fate and the wealthy Jews of the world decreed otherwise. The ship, the Altalena, had been purchased by Avraham Stavsky in America on behalf of the Hebrew Committee for National Liberation and was available in France at the end of 1947. But the money for buying the arms trickled in with deadly slowness. Shmuel’s trip to America and a lightning visit he paid to South Africa in January had been for the purpose of urging on everyone the dire need for more, and yet more, speed. In spite of the super-human efforts of the IZL representatives, the wealthy Jews did not realise the tremendous urgency of the situation and they parted slowly and languidly with their money, with the result that by the 15th May the arms had not yet been bought and the Altalena did not arrive.

On that evening, the IZL offered to sell the ship to the Hagana. When their offer was refused, the High Command resolved to carry on with their original plan and bring the arms at the very earliest opportunity. Contrary to the original plan whereby Yaacov was to take getting a passage to England from there—a process which might have taken at least a week. The next day we were in Paris and at the headquarters of the IZL. The place was an absolute tower of Babel.

Yaacov and Emeline were offered a "lift" in our plane. He was delighted at the opportunity as his intention had been to fly to Cyprus in the hope of getting a passage to England from there—a process which might have taken at least a week. The next day we were in Paris and at the headquarters of the IZL. The place was an absolute tower of Babel. Hundreds of people passed through the offices every day, talking every language under the sun. There were five telephone rings continuously—calls from Switzerland, from Belgium, from Germany, from America, from North Africa; and meetings in every available corner. We had plunged into one of the queerest staidest and yet the wildest of all those nebulous, siriously powerful cliques which control the undercurrents of Europe, the international arms black-market.

Their agents and spies must be ubiquitous and omniscient. No sooner had a whisper gone out that the IZL were in the market for arms than all manner of peculiar and ordinary-looking strangers started dropping in at the IZL headquarters. Some were suave and well-dressed, their brown and white shoes betraying their Mediterranean origin, others were unkempt and exaggeratedly sinister-looking. Even an Olga Pullofsky in the form of a beautiful cabaret-singer occasionally flitted across the scene. But all had one story; they had arms to sell. According to the story, the arms in question were .303 rifles, which were somewhere near Barcelona and which would have to be paid for in Switzerland. The main question was how to get the arms from Spain to France, as the Altalena was at Port de Bouc, near Marseilles. I went to bed at about 2 a.m. by which time the arms had been shipped disguised as cattle, transported by lorries camouflaged as cows, flown by 'planes masked as eagles, or perhaps that was just the result of my wearied, over-fevered brain.

This problem of delivery cropped up hundreds of times. There were arms to be had all over Europe, but the IZL insisted on delivery in France, and the purveyors of the arms offered delivery in Spain, in England, in Germany, in Switzerland—in fact anywhere except France. In most cases the problem of getting the arms across numerous borders was insuperable and projects which had been followed up for days and had necessitated numerous journeys had to be dropped. It did not take our people in Paris too long to realise that there was a limited number of arms to be bought in Europe but that a vast army of agents was engaged in an attempt to dispose of them. At first, at the stage of initiation, Alex and I, the two principal "buyers," had shot across the length and breadth of Europe in one wild goose chase after another. Alex would hurry to Brussels to negotiate about some rifles only to be told on arrival that the rifles were not actually in Brussels, but in Geneva. Alas, those rifles had been sold, but they could offer him some machine-guns in Paris. Irmia would get an urgent call to go and see some armoured cars in the South of France. After a breathless rush across France he would arrive there only to discover that the armoured cars were jeeps and that, in any case, they had to come from across the Italian border. Time and again the same false hopes were raised and the same dulling disappointment followed. The fact was that most of the agents were selling the same arms. The differences in prices and the differences in location were mere blinds—sometimes deliberate, sometimes due to the intricacies of a system of sub-agents and sub-sub-agents who received their instructions from their own headquarters in some particular capital of Europe and were not authorized to do any more than pass the customer on to their own principals. There was certainly no question of principle in this trade. The goods went to the customer who paid the highest price first. Undoubtedly the same wares were offered to representatives of the Arab States, whose needs, fortunately for them, were not as great as ours and, consequently, I presume they were cheated on a few occasions. After they had inspected the arms and paid the small deposits, the goods mysteriously vanished in transit. In each of these cases the monetary loss was small, but the annoyance, frustration and indignation were in inverse proportion to the spoliation.

The European munitions black-market was one source for the purchase of arms. There was another much more constructive and satisfying source—the remnants of the underground movements. The Resistance Organizations of Europe had ceased to exist with the conquest of Germany by the Allies, but some of their buried and cleverly-hidden arms dumps remained extant. As people who had suffered bitterly from the cruel regime of an occupying force, who had fought against it like tigers, they sympathized with and applauded the activities of the IZL in Palestine. Their sympathy and plaudits were expressed in concrete, material form;—they opened up their arms dumps to their fellow underground fighters. Not everything was usable or purchasable, but the IZL nevertheless got equipment there which it would have taken them months to buy elsewhere and would have cost thousands of pounds more. And only the IZL could have gotten this equipment, whose sale was based on esprit de corps and not on mundane, sordid, commercial considerations. [="=]

60739. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 24: Birth-Pangs of the Altalena. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. Soon after we arrived in Paris, it was decided that I should go to London and look into the aeroplane proposition which Mr. M. had passed on to Shmuel in Haifa. Once again my only qualification for the job was the fact that I was the only person with a British passport, except for Shmuel, who, however, was too busy to go himself. As we had people in London who knew something about aeroplanes, the risk of my making too much of a hash was not great. Nevertheless I was given minute and detailed instructions about everything, most of which I forgot in any case as I could not make notes and my memory had not received the kind of training necessary for secret service work. My task was three-fold. I had to negotiate about Mr. M.’s three Hallifaxes, look into the question of a gift of two seaplanes which someone wanted to make us, and round up two or three air crews for the planes which were supposed to be coming from Canada any day. On the face of it this appeared a very simple operation and I was told to report back in Paris in a week’s time.

I made the journey by train and cross-Channel steamer, landing in London early in the morning. We were the usual crowd of sleepy-eyed, bilious-looking early-morning Channel-crossers and the Customs officials did not pay any undue attention to us. After a cursory glance through my suitcase the examiner ticked it off with his white chalk and was just about to send me away when a man lounging in the doorway nodded at him almost imperceptibly, and strolled over at leisurely pace with his hands in his pockets. He wore a navy-blue raincoat and a short, grey, trilby and had plain-clothes detective practically branded on him. He whispered in the Customs’ official’s ear and the latter somewhat apologetically re-opened my suitcase and started going through it most methodically. Every scrap of paper which he found he passed on to his colleague who studied it carefully. The suitcase evidently did not divulge any great secrets so they turned their attention to my handbag.

This was the stage to which one must apply one of the three accepted techniques usually employed by passengers subjected to the indignity of a detailed search: either you became convivial and suggested in the heartiest hail-fellow-well-met manner that perhaps if the security officer, or the customs official, would hint what he was looking for you would be only too pleased to help him out; or else you stood on your constitutional rights and demanded the reasons for this travesty of personal liberty and dignity, or thirdly, you maintained a stony, dignified silence, suitably embellished with a cold, contemptuous look in your eye. I chose the third course, at least to the extent of the silence. I am never quite sure whether what I think is supposed to be a contemptuous look may not appear as a simple leer or even a facial defect to the intended recipient. The CID officer went through my handbag very thoroughly. I had some notes written in hieroglyphics intelligible only to me, which he studied closely and at length. As he asked me no questions I maintained my attitude of indifferent silence. Then he examined my address book and made copious notes. I had intentionally made no note of any London addresses and the only ones that were in the book were of perfectly innocent and harmless relatives and friends in France and Switzerland of our neighbors and acquaintances in Palestine to whom, there being no postal communication, I had promised to give regards and messages of reassurance. But down they went on the British blacklist and probably have trouble to this day every time they want to visit the United Kingdom. If they are patriotic Jews they will surely forgive me the inconvenience they are suffering in their role as red herrings dragged up by the tongue of the Customs shed at Dover. I have one thing, however: inefficient the British Intelligence Service in Palestine might be, in their home country they were on their toes. Scotland Yard was not the Jerusalem CID and was not to be underestimated or dismissed with the contempt reserved for the latter.

This lesson was confirmed when I arrived in London to stay with Walter—the man in nominal charge of IZL affairs in Palestine. Although in my case there was a possibility that I was searched merely because my passport indicated that I was resident in Palestine and was thus a natural object of suspicion, in the case of Walter there was no ambiguity whatsoever. He was constantly being followed and his telephone was tapped. On one occasion when he had to make a trip out of town he approached his uninvited bodyguard and suggested amicably to him that he ride with him (Walter) in order to save the taxpayer's money on petrol. The offer was politely but firmly turned down and as Walter swung into the main highway, there was the unbosomable police car sticking as tenaciously to him as Mary's little lamb. Peter, too, an ex-RAF pilot whom I met for the first time on this trip to London, was well-known to the CID. He was on particularly good terms with his "tail," treating him to occasional tankards of beer in the local pub and on other occasions taking him on a combination wild goose chase and red herring trail right across London and then losing him deliberately in the Underground. The "tail" took this with a good grace. There was a tacit understanding between them that he was doing his duty following Peter but that it was well within the rules of the game for the latter to employ evasive and confusing tactics. Up the cricket players and long live British sportsmanship.

Walter was convinced that the CID knew about the activities of practically every active member of the IZL in London and he was probably right. But therein lay another difference between Palestine and the islands of the United Kingdom. In the former, British rule had been exerected by a special type of official reserved exclusively for service in the colonies where the local inhabitants were mostly colored, semi-civilized people who, according to current superstition, had to be kept down with the jack-boot and the whip. The existence of these colonies provided the British Colonial and Foreign Offices with an excellent opportunity of getting rid of their political "remittance-men"—men whose autocratic domineering and cruel natures made them completely unfit for home consumption, but suited them perfectly for dealing with the "natives" of the Gold Coast, or Nigeria or . . . Palestine, where public opinion, if it existed at all, could be disdainfully disregarded. Hence the complete absence of habeas corpus, of unbiased courts and of constitutional rights in Palestine, in direct contrast to the almost passionate worship of the rights of the individual and of personal liberty in their own country. And hence the reason why, while in Palestine any one even faintly suspected of coming into third-party contact with the "terrorists" was deported to a detention camp outside of the country without any trial at all, in London, plainclothes detectives were deputed merely to watch over the activities of suspected "terrorists," and nothing more serious was meted out to them than an occasional session at Scotland Yard where they were questioned and then released in the course of half an hour. This naturally applied to the cases where there was no concrete evidence other than that of association with suspected and suspicious characters. In the one and only case where a young man was found in possession of explosives, he was tried in the public press and given a vicious sentence out of all keeping with the magnitude of his transgression.

The only member of the IZL with whom the CID were evidently not familiar was the Palestinian representative. He had come to London as a student and combined his studies with less peaceful pursuits. In appearance he looked so much like the Hollywood version of a foreign anarchist that the CID probably felt he was too obvious a caricature to be genuine. He always wore a dark hat pulled well over his eyes and slunk through the streets with one eye peering round the corner and the other squinting over his shoulder—a feat of ocular acrobatics which was made all the more spectacular by his habit of wearing thick- lensed glasses. When boll his eyes were focussed in the same direction, considerably magnified and somewhat distorted by the powerful lenses, he looked exactly like; venemous owl. Yona, as he was called all the time he was in England was very impatient of his lily-livered fellow-Jews. He was constantly threatening to "bump off" some one or other for obstructing the IZL or for being too luke-warm in his sympathies, and had to be patiently reminded by Walter that the enemy was the British Government and not the Jewish Board of Deputies or the Zionist Federation or the Revisionist Party. But Yona's bark was a good deal worse than his bite and to my certain knowledge all the time he was in England he did not assassinate even one tiny, little member of the Jewish or gentle community.

As soon as I arrived in London I set the wheels going in all three of my commissions. Peter and Yona were in charge of recruiting air-crews and I passed on the instruction that they were immediately to send over to Paris everyone on their lists. This was not quite as simple as it sounds. We had about six young men on our lists, one of whom had to write his fins 1 professional examinations in a fortnight's time, some had to close down the r-buses and others had family responsibilities which they had to settle. But all agreed to abide unquestioningly by our decision as to whether they should leave London or not. I could merely pass on the instruction from Paris and had no authority to temporise. So they all crossed the Channel two or three days later and kicked their heels in Paris for weeks due to an unforeseen and regrettable hitch in the despatch of the long-awaited planes from Canada. Eventually some of them returned to England, but others found their way to Israel and joined the Israel Air Force which had by then come into existence. I contacted the Mr. C. to whom M. had referred us about the Halifax and Walter and I went to see him in his sumptuous suite of offices. We waited an hour and a half for him to finish a board meeting after which he gave us a very cordial reception. We were then entertained to a graphic description of the meteoric rise of his company and to beer and sandwiches, as our visit had extended itself into the lunch-hour. Eventually we got down to what interested us. Mr. C. (to whom I shall in future refer as Mr. Cohen for the sake of clarity) agreed that shore were Halifax planes available and that he would be delighted to let the IZL have them for a song. There was just one snag, however—how to get them out of England. He suggested that the best plan would be for the IZL to buy a converted Halifax transport plane and two bombers for the ostensible reason of dismantling them and using them as spare parts for the transport plane. I got a sneaking impression during the conversation that the transport plane, which would also be provided by Mr. Cohen's company, was not going to be quite so cheap as the bombers and that the latter were being dangled as bait for the former. But I kept my own counsel for the moment. We started bombarding Mr. Cohen with questions—in what condition were the planes, how much would they carry, when and where could our expert see them. Mr. Cohen was acutely embarrassed by all these questions and eventually confessed that he himself knew very little about the planes but that his colleague, Monsieur Jacques, was due at any minute and he would have all the answers at his fingertips. We waited another hour for Monsieur Jacques who breezed in just as we were about to leave, apologising profusely that he couldn’t stay for more than two minutes. As we weren’t inclined to stay much longer ourselves we arranged that he should meet Peter, Yona and me the next day at twelve. I suggested the foyer of one of the large hotels as a suitable meeting-place, but Monsieur Jacques threw up his hands in horror at this. He couldn’t possibly take the risk of meeting in a public place and suggested Hyde Park. This was my turn to be baffled. Hyde Park was a large place for a rendezvous and the chances were that it would be raining. Monsieur Jacques reassured me. He would drive past a certain specified part of the Row at exactly twelve and pick us up in his car. I was still very dubious and pressed him to give me an assurance that he wouldn’t keep us loitering around Hyde Park waiting vainly for him. Monsieur Jacques drew himself up to his full five-feet-four and bristled hautly. I had cast aspersions on his punctiliousness and besmirched the Jacques family escutcheon. No sooner were we out of earshot than Walter burst out: “His name is Jacques as much as mine is de Gaulle. I know that little crook—he once cheated me out of £400.” This was not a very good augury. But I maintained that a crook could possibly succeed in getting those planes out of England where an honest man would fail dismally, so we ought to take a chance on him. Only we had to make quite certain that his victims were the British authorities and not ourselves. I thought, too, that Cohen seemed quite genuinely to want to help us in spite of being handicapped by an abyssmal ignorance of aircraft and their uses. So we decided to get hold of Peter and Yona and keep the appointment for the next day.

When I told Peter that the man behind the scheme was Jacques he groaned loudly and long. He had heard of this Monsieur Jacques. He had also heard about the planes which had been standing in one of our numerous headaches to the Agency. It was not included anyone else in the invitation I arrived alone. We had an us. There was the question of getting the planes out of England, then of getting them into France; there was the problem of taking crews from the Britsh Government. Then it was my turn to be horrified. Hyde Park is rather a large place for a rendezvous and the chances were that it would be entirely negligible factors: firstly, I was very much sceptical of the truth of Mr. Cohen’s information. After all, the British Government did not really need to engage a private company to carry out its arms deliveries to Iraq. Secondly, we would have to provide three complete air-crews with civilian “A” certificates—something which was completely beyond our capacity in England. Nevertheless, I undertook to discuss the matter with our experts and let Cohen know the results the next day. My colleagues were at first fired with enthusiasm at the thought of acquiring such a treasure galloon through a little legitimate piracy. But when we considered all the technical difficulties, they agreed with me that the whole adventure, even if it came within the bounds of actuality, was well beyond our limited resources of man-power. Yona was all for blowing the ‘planes up if we couldn’t divert them. But I suggested that the Haganah representatives in London were much more likely to be able to cope with the original scheme than we as they had been registering aircrews for months; and that we hand the information and the contact over to the Jewish Agency and see what they could do about it. To this day I don’t know whether the stratagem was ever pulled off, but I suspect, due to the very fact that we never heard anything about it, that my scepticism was well-founded and that we had merely bequeathed one of our numerous headaches to the Agency.

Another headache which we, this time in mischievous mood, passed on to the Agency was a “death ray” expert who attached himself to us. He was one of the numerous cranks and crack-pots who spring up like—mushrooms wherever the drums and cymbals of war send out their reverberations. All he claimed to be able to do was to hypnotize the moon and cause it to stray from its appointed route, to the inevitable death and destruction on the wrong people. This was obviously a case for the Haganah experts.

While on the subject of crack-pots I am reminded of another longhaired member of the species who came to see Yechiel, our chief air-force officer in Paris. He offered in all seriousness to sell him atomic energy sufficiently compact to be enclosed in a match-box; and he offered these match-boxes in wholesale quantities, not just one miserable box at a time. When he backed up his sales-talk with the attraction of a guarantee Yechiel asked politely just exactly how this guarantee would be tested. The answer was as simple as it was startling. The amiable maniac suggested that Yechiel invite together a few people he was anxious to be rid of and he would then be given a death and destruction on the wrong people. This was obviously a case for the Haganah experts.

But to return to the Halifaxes. I saw Cohen another ten times at least. Each time he raised a fresh problem, but was unable to confound us. There was the question of getting the planes out of England, then of getting them into France; there was the problem of taking crews from England, then changing them in France; there was the difficulty of getting the various licenses; there was the question of payment—where and in what currency. All these problems we solved, but we still had not seen the planes in spite of Peter’s insistence that we couldn’t decide on anything until we saw them. Finally, weeks after I had left England, Peter was enabled to inspect the planes. He pronounced them unairworthy as they stood and, after making numerous enquiries, found that in order to bring them into fit state to receive an airworthiness certificate, they would cost as much money as brand-new bombers. So ended in ignoming our Halifax purchases. I was extremely interested to read months later in the “Palestine Post” that there was a great uproar in...
England about some British planes which had been illegally transferred to Israel. The man behind-the-scenes, according to the newspaper report, was none other than our old friend Monsieur Jacques... My feelings were mixed: a combination of incredulity at the validity of the whole sensational story and reverence for Monsieur Jacques’ reputation.

I vividly remembered how the events had taken place. Monsieur Jacques, who had always been so self-sufficient and distant, had finally been forced to come out of hiding and tell his story. I was shocked by his sudden change of heart, but I admired his courage. Monsieur Jacques had always been known for his quiet wisdom and his ability to keep his counsel.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had come to learn about the illegal transfer of the planes. It was through his connections with the British government that he had discovered the truth. Monsieur Jacques was a man of great influence, and he had used his position to try and stop the transfer of the planes.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had decided to come forward and tell his story. He had been inspired by the courage of the young pilots who had risked their lives to prevent the transfer of the planes. Monsieur Jacques was moved by their sacrifice, and he knew that he must do something to help.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had decided to help the IZL with their project. He had offered to help them in any way he could, and he had suggested that they might be able to use some of the planes that had been transferred.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had decided to help the IZL with their project. He had offered to help them in any way he could, and he had suggested that they might be able to use some of the planes that had been transferred.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had decided to help the IZL with their project. He had offered to help them in any way he could, and he had suggested that they might be able to use some of the planes that had been transferred.

Monsieur Jacques then went on to explain how he had decided to help the IZL with their project. He had offered to help them in any way he could, and he had suggested that they might be able to use some of the planes that had been transferred.
bell and a newcomer was ushered into the room. His presence created a buzz of interest amongst my hearers and produced a look of profound annoyance on R.’s face. The late-comer was a leading London Zionist especially commissioned by the Federation to attend the party and see that too much damage was not inflicted on their funds.

He immediately asked permission to put some questions to the speaker. The audience rose as a man and objected to his questioning me when he had not heard my talk. For a few minutes the dogs of chaos and detective speeded me on my way with a curt nod of his head and I came out of the investigation with no greater loss to my dignity than was occasioned by the curious glances of my fellow-passengers.

Peter and I had spotted him following us one morning and immediately jumped into a taxi, more for the thrill of shaking off areal, live “tail” than for any strictly utilitarian purpose, as we were merely on our way to have a perfectly innocent lunch in a restaurant. In Newhaven I accepted the same procedure as in Dover and my suitcase and hand-bag were searched in stony silence. Having satisfied himself that I had no tanks concealed in my luggage and no machine-guns on my person, the guard returned with a curt “All right.”

I found “him” standing next to me. His face differed from that of the man who had not heard my talk. For a few minutes I wondered whether he was the same man with a curt “All right.” He told us that it was not at all as I had imagined; he was worried about the security of the man who was to be our guide. He wanted to go back there as soon as possible. That was where he wanted to live—not Palestine. But he felt it was time the Jews had a country of their own and he was willing to give up a year or two of his life to help get that country. He wanted to go back there as soon as possible. That was where he wanted to live—not Palestine. But he felt it was time the Jews had a country of their own and he was willing to give up a year or two of his life to help get that country. So that those Jews who wanted to could come and settle there. Nothing annoyed Joe so intensely as to hear anyone associating work in the IZL with glamor and thrills. "It's like the glamor of war," he would say. "Dirt, lice, disease, blood and fear—do you call them glamorous? My dear child," Joe would continue, "if you want glamor, go to a luxury hotel on the Californian coast. Bathe, sail in the sparkling sea, bedeck yourself in gorgeous clothes, dance and make love in the moonlight. That's glamor, that's excitement—not the questionable thrill of seeing your friends die or the romance of living like a hunted animal." When Joe was not driving people round the countryside inspect arms and ammunition, he attached himself to Benyamin, for whom he had an immense admiration. He acted as his chauffeur, his memory-jagger, his aide-de-camp. There was nothing too menial or too exalted for Joe. He would work uncomplainingly into the small hours of the morning and be up bright and early to give to a new day all the energy and devotion which he had stored up in his spare, wiry frame.

I drove out with Joe one afternoon to a deserted chateau whose owner, a wealthy American Jew had given the IZL the use of it as a radio receiving station. Joe was taking out some equipment to the two IZL radio experts who lived on the premises in a day and night effort to establish communications with Israel. On the way he talked to me about his shop in Los Angeles, about his family and his nostalgia for the youthfulness and vigor of America in contrast to the senile decadence of Europe. But in spite of his scorn, he still found the French countryside delightful and bursting into rapturous paeans as every fresh turn of the road revealed a vista more breathtakingly enchanting than the previous one. When we arrived at the chateau, Joe surprised me still further by his completely un-American attitude towards it. He took an intense delight in pointing out to me the noble proportions of the rooms, the antique furniture and old paintings, and was not distracted by the obvious signs of decay and disrepair in the house itself and in the magnificent wilderness which still showed signs of having once been a stately garden. Joe positively enthused over the chateau in contrast to his contemptuous dismissal of Parisian architecture as resembling a Christmas cake with its iced scrolls and rosettes and filigree work, and his even more contemptuous dismissal of elegant Parisian apartments as resembling museums. I could not quite fathom the reason for his excepting the chateau from these criticisms, unless it was that the house had griped him unawares, when his artificial defenses were down, when his parochial pride did not force him to debase everything Swiss not American in order the more to acclaim what was. I teased him about this and warned him that one day a non-American woman would capture his heart in the same way and despite his declared intention of marrying only a Californian girl. I even suggested finding him a beautiful girl in Israel who would keep him tied to the country and prevent him from leaving as soon as he felt his job was done. But Joe simply laughed good-humoredly at my good intentions.

I was not allowed to remain idle in Paris for any length of time. My first commission was to go to Basle to transfer some money to Israel. A good part of the IZL money was concentrated in Switzerland from where it was transferred, either to Paris or to Tel Aviv as the need arose. I immediately took the night train to Basle and arrived there just as the talks were opening. In spite of the long and complicated instructions which Benyamin had given me, the operation was a very simple one and took only a few minutes. The final stage of the process, however, had to be done through Zurich. The manager of the bank suggested that if we were in a hurry it would speed matters up thinking to the last that it was but a nightmare or else some horrible mistake on someone's part. Soon after Matie arrived, he insisted on going to Palestine to join the IZL. To this end he learned flying and caused his mother endless anxiety every time she knew he was in the air. To his parents' acute distress he wearied of his studies at the University. His oneobsessionoccupied him completely to the exclusion of all other interests. He had to get to Palestine; One might have thought that a simple operation for a boy whose parents could afford to pay for his passage. But, firstly, Matie's parents were very reluctant to part with their only child, and, secondly, for a Jew to go to Palestine in those days needed the permission of the Mandatory Government in the form of an immigration certificate. These certificates were doled out very sparsely and the "safe" countries, such as America, the Dominions and the British Isles, were even less favored. Their immigration needs were not pressing and each certificate they received meant one less for the tortured people of Europe, who had exchanged Hitler's concentration camps for British and American Displaced Persons' camps. His only hope lay in persuading his father to send him to Palestine on a business trip or as a student at the Hebrew University. Eventually he succeeded in doing the latter and turned up at our flat in Ramat Gan towards the end of 1947, just after the outbreak of the unofficial war with the Arabs.

I remember Matie's telling me with great glee how, while he was walking through a street in Tel Aviv, two bullets suddenly whizzed past his ear. He simply did not associate himself with death. He drove a motorcar with dangerous speed and carelessness and he flew a plane recklessly and daringly. His belief in his own immortality was both childish and childlike. Very few of us go through life continually expecting and fearing death; but always, at the back of our minds, is the thought that one day our turn must inevitably come. Not so Matie. He simply did not believe that it could happen to him and he must have died incredulously, thinking to the last that it was but a nightmare or else some horrible mistake on someone's part. Soon after Matie arrived, he insisted on going to Jerusalem—at least to register at the University. If not to study, Shmuel and I tried to dissuade him. We knew that Jerusalem was due for a difficult time and the lonely parents were always at the back of our minds. I suggested that if he stayed in Tel Aviv he might get the chance of using his flying ability when the IZL eventually got planes. But he was not to be moved. Jerusalem was the place for him—and to Jerusalem he went. We met him there on our last visit in March 1948. He was in uniform and looking better and happier than he had ever been. So as not to be a financial burden on either his parents or the IZL, he had got himself a part-time job at Reuter's and was at the same time taking an intensive course in the IZL. At the completion of his course he went into full-time service with the IZL as a junior officer. He was killed a month later in the gallant IZL defence of Ramat Rachel. Matie’s mother carried her grief with pride and dignity. Her first reaction to the news of his death was to say quietly that if her son had to die in war, she was glad he had not given up his precious young life for others, but had died fighting for his own people. But she never recovered from the shock of her bereavement. A year later her broken heart gave up its struggle with sorrow and quietly ceased beating. [↩]

60742. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 27: Journey’s End. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. I was welcomed back in Paris by Eliezer with new instructions—to go post-haste to Brussels. Besides taking arms to Israel, the Alatalena was to carry about 900 young men and women to swell the fighting forces. As in the case of the deadlier portion of the ship’s cargo, the human cargo, too, had to be gathered in from all over Europe, had to be taken across borders and into France. This was a monumental undertaking successfully entrusted to the capable administration of Eliezer, who had the control of his European organization at his finger-tips. Timing was the essential factor in dealing with the human element. The people had to- be gathered together in their country of origin, the necessary passports and transit visas had to be available, not too soon to make the latter invalid before the date of departure and not too late to upset the time-table. At the same time, once the travellers were concentrated in a transit camp, they became a financial burden on the IZL who had to feed and provide for them, so that the shorter the time they spent in the camps, the less would they strain the IZL resources. In some cases, as in Germany, where most of the people were in Displaced Persons’ Camps in any case, or in Italy, where the IZL had been maintaining a training and transit camp for months, this latter consideration did not apply; but in places like Belgium and Holland, or North Africa and the South American States, it was essential that the concentration of people should take place at the latest possible date.

In Marseilles, too, where the final regrouping before embarkation would have to take place, there were also many complicated problems to be overcome. A camp had to be provided for 900 people, with sleeping accommodations, eating facilities, proper hygienic arrangements and medical care. Then again, care had to be taken that the youngsters be exercised so that young men and women should not have to spend too much time in Marseilles. The objections to this were three-fold: Firstly, there was the same financial consideration. Secondly, a large gathering of foreign, young people for some length of time would naturally arouse a good deal of comment. While this could not be kept a secret from the local population or from the prying eyes of the British Intelligence, it was nevertheless not thought advisable to give the latter sufficient time in which to pass the information on to their Government and so cause the French Government considerable embarrassment. Thirdly, the strain of keeping nearly a thousand people who were tiring at the leach to get to Israel and have a go at the Arabs, confined to a camp for any undue length of time would have been an extremely unenviable one, and could only result in a flaunting of discipline with its inevitable aftermath of demoralization. So Eliezer’s task was gigantic and as it depended so much on the element of timing he had to be continuously despatching envoys to all corners of Europe to coordinate, to organize, to give last minute instructions. For this purpose I was sent to Brussels.

I had to obtain a full list of the people intending to come on the Altalena, see that they had passports and arrange for them to get transit visas for France and exit visas from Belgium. Most of the young people were Belgian-born and not a few of them intended leaving without the knowledge of their parents, as they were convinced that the latter would not give their consent. I did not approve of this and tried to persuade them to talk to their parents and overcome their opposition. But they were adamant in their anxiety not to be prevented from going with the others. Strangely enough, those who were keenest to go and understandably most concerned lest they should be stopped, were the girls. Or perhaps this was not so strange for the girls lived more sheltered and secluded lives than the boys, and here they were being given a glorious opportunity to take part in an epic such as they had only read about or seen in the cinemas. And for once they were not “mere girls,” but human beings who could contribute and suffer as much as the boys. I read this enthusiasm and this eagerness for a life of thrills and adventures in their beaming, excited faces and sparkling eyes, and I felt sad and depressed. How could I explain to them that he was right, that they would find no glamour in this adventure, but only heartache and hardship. How could I explain that there would be times when they would bitterly regret having run away from their comfortable homes and the protection and solace of their parents. Such explanations would have sounded trite and flat in face of their youthful ardor and idealism. But, nevertheless, I felt I owed it to them, or to their parents, or to my own conscience to describe to them what war against the Arabs meant and also to warn them that a small ship on the high seas would be extremely vulnerable to attacks from the air and from enemy ships of war. I told them this, not so much to frighten them off as to prepare them, to provide them with some kind of shock-absorber against all eventualities. They absorbed all the details with rapt attention as children will listen to fairy stories of cruel witches and malevolent ogres, but they did not, and possibly could not, grasp the implication. However, my job was not to scare the wits out of our future soldiers; it was to see that they arrived safely and on time in Marseilles. So, after I had done what I considered to be my duty in attempting to dissuade those who were running away from home from joining the rest, I set about the more concrete aspects of the undertaking. Firstly, however, I did put my foot down and insisted that no-one under eighteen should be allowed to go and that two girls in particular—one with tuberculosis and the other with heart-trouble should on no account be taken. Yosef, the boy in charge of the group, agreed with me whole-heartedly and was greatly relieved at the chance of using my veto, which could be identified with Eliezer’s, to reinforce his own arguments and so overcome all tears and pleading. My concrete tasks proved somewhat complicated. Firstly, not all the boys and girls had passports and some could not hope to get them without their parents’ consent. Secondly, the question of exit permits from Belgium border was rather a ticklish one especially for those with’ Belgian passports, who were all of military age and so liable for temporary conscription into the Belgian army; and for those without any passports at all, whose departure from any country would in normal circumstances be regarded as impossible, it was completely out of the question to try to evade. This was obviously not an undertaking for amateurs to dabble in, so Yosef and I decided to call in the local expert on these matters. He was a certain Mr. Z., who had organized the traffic of “illegal” immigrants for the Haganah. Mr. Z. worked in an obscure little office in one of the suburbs of Brussels and it took Yosef a day or two to trace him through the tortuous channels of the Haganah underground. Having eventually located his lair, we had to call on him four or five times and leave cryptic, carefully veiled messages until we eventually ran him to earth. He received us very kindly and undertook to help us. According to the plan which he outlined, he would arrange a collective French visa for the 35 or so boys and girls and would then take them clandestinely out of Belgium. They were to be dressed as hikers and to carry only rucksacks and food and water with them. After they had “jumped” the border, the party would take the train to Paris, where they would become our responsibility. We fixed on a date during the first week of June.

I left Yosef to work out all the details with Z. and returned to Paris to report to Eliezer. The Belgian party did not arrive upon the appointed day. I was beginning to worry badly about them when, 36 hours later, Eliezer walked into the office and asked in his matter-of-fact, nonchalant manner whether I would like to go with him to the hotel to see the Belgian boys and girls who had just arrived. At the hotel all was swill the fighting forces. As in the case of the deadlier portion of the air and from enemy ships of war. I told them this, not so much to frighten them off as to prepare them, to provide them with some kind of shock-absorber against all eventualities. They absorbed all the details with rapt attention as children will listen to fairy stories of cruel witches and malevolent ogres, but they did not, and possibly could not, grasp the implication. However, my job was not to scare the wits out of our future soldiers; it was to see that they arrived safely and on time in Marseilles. So, after I had done what I considered to be my duty in attempting to dissuade those who were running away from home from joining the rest, I set about the more concrete aspects of the undertaking. Firstly, however, I did put my foot down and insisted that no-one under eighteen should be allowed to go and that two girls in particular—one with tuberculosis and the other with heart-trouble should on no account be taken. Yosef, the boy in charge of the group, agreed with me whole-heartedly and was greatly relieved at the chance of using my veto, which could be identified with Eliezer’s, to reinforce his own arguments and so overcome all tears and pleading. My concrete tasks proved somewhat complicated. Firstly, not all the boys and girls had passports and some could not hope to get them without their parents’ consent. Secondly, the question of exit permits from Belgium border was rather a ticklish one especially for those with’ Belgian passports, who were all of military age and so liable for temporary conscription into the Belgian army; and for those without any passports at all, whose departure from any country would in normal circumstances be regarded as impossible, it was completely out of the question to try to evade. This was obviously not an undertaking for amateurs to dabble in, so Yosef and I decided to call in the local expert on these matters. He was a certain Mr. Z., who had organized the traffic of “illegal” immigrants for the Haganah. Mr. Z. worked in an obscure little office in one of the suburbs of Brussels and it took Yosef a day or two to trace him through the tortuous channels of the Haganah underground. Having eventually located his lair, we had to call on him four or five times and leave cryptic, carefully veiled messages until we eventually ran him to earth. He received us very kindly and undertook to help us. According to the plan which he outlined, he would arrange a collective French visa for the 35 or so boys and girls and would then take them clandestinely out of Belgium. They were to be dressed as hikers and to carry only rucksacks and food and water with them. After they had “jumped” the border, the party would take the train to Paris, where they would become our responsibility. We fixed on a date during the first week of June.

I left Yosef to work out all the details with Z. and returned to Paris to report to Eliezer. The Belgian party did not arrive upon the appointed day. I was beginning to worry badly about them when, 36 hours later, Eliezer walked into the office and asked in his matter-of-fact, nonchalant manner whether I would like to go with him to the hotel to see the Belgian boys and girls who had just arrived. At the hotel all was chaos and confusion and spirits which, in Brussels, had reached the top of the barometer were now pushing a way out through the bottom. Ardor was practically dripping with dampness and enthusiasm had petered out completely. They had had their first taste of the “glamor and romance” of the underground and had found it bitter and rather frightening. The story I heard was somewhat garbled by the introduction of excited interjections, in even more excited French, into a narrative told in already imperfect Yiddish. I managed to pick out from the jumble of jargon and jabber that they had had to wait around the border for nearly twelve hours until they saw a chance of crossing. Meanwhile they had eaten up all their food and drunk all their water and had not dared replenish their stores. They grabbed at their first chance of jumping the border, jumped, and were caught on the other side by a French patrol. After hours of argument and discussion they eventually persuaded the French to let them go, as their French visas were in order. By this time they were especially hungry, cold, and afraid of all manner of things from fright. When they arrived in Paris, a new catastrophe awaited them in the form of a posse of French police. In Brussels, the stricken parents of those who had run away had set up a hue and cry and called in the aid of the police, who had, in turn, passed on the appeal for assistance to the French Prefecture. Once more there was vehement argument, tears and protestations and, at last, emotionally and physically exhausted, and with most of their luggage mislaid in the general melee, they were allowed to go except for two girls who were minors. The latter were taken into custody and eventually resumed to their parents. After two days in Paris the rest regained their youthful ardor and enthusiasm and, deliberately forgetting the dark depression and resolutely shutting out their brief glimpse into the realms of fear, set out for Marseilles in great spirits to add their mite to the history of their times. [8]

60743. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 28: Jersey’s End. New York, N.Y.: Shilon Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. While I was in Paris I acted as Eliezer’s driver. I would have sworn, before I tried it, that driving in Paris was a physical impossibility for any comparatively sane and normal person. To the naked eye of the pedestrian in Paris, any driver of a moving vehicle appears either as some kind of miracle-working demi-god or as a sheer lunatic completely careless of his own life and utterly oblivious of the existence of his fellow-creatures. In point of fact, when one is actually sitting behind the wheel and driving, everything seems to fall into its natural place—pedestrians do appear to have minds and even occasionally to know them. rival motorists actually do not appear to regard it as their life’s work to knock out as many vehicles as possible, and even the taxi-drivers appear to be almost human instead of the diabolical hell-cats one always pictures them to be. In short, except for one or two cunning devices designed to confuse and confute the unwary visitor, Paris is a much easier and pleasanter city to drive than Tel Aviv. I got some of my worst headaches from a habit the French have of hiding away their traffic lights in some unobtrusive corner, or of suspending them somewhere in the stratosphere well out of the range of vision of anyone without a portable telescope or periscope. Fortunately, the French police are generally very polite and long-suffering, and even more so with foreigners who, besides not being able to talk a word of French, seem also to be generally half-witted and below par. Eliezer had only one fault to find with my driving—a fault of omission rather than of commission—my complete lack of a bump of locality. I must, in self-defense, deny that I am completely devoid of a sense of direction, but I have to confess that I could never remember where all Eliezer’s offices were. For this I would have required not only a knowledge of topography and compass reading, in which I am considerably shaky, but also a neat jargon and jabber that they had had to wait around the border for nearly twelve hours until they saw a chance of crossing. Meanwhile they had eaten up all their food and drunk all their water and had not dared replenish their stores. They grabbed at their first chance of jumping the border, jumped, and were caught on the other side by a French patrol. After hours of argument and discussion they eventually persuaded the French to let them go, as their French visas were in order. By this time they were especially hungry, cold, and afraid of all manner of things from fright. When they arrived in Paris, a new catastrophe awaited them in the form of a posse of French police. In Brussels, the stricken parents of those who had run away had set up a hue and cry and called in the aid of the police, who had, in turn, passed on the appeal for assistance to the French Prefecture. Once more there was vehement argument, tears and protestations and, at last, emotionally and physically exhausted, and with most of their luggage mislaid in the general melee, they were allowed to go except for two girls who were minors. The latter were taken into custody and eventually resumed to their parents. After two days in Paris the rest regained their youthful ardor and enthusiasm and, deliberately forgetting the dark depression and resolutely shutting out their brief glimpse into the realms of fear, set out for Marseilles in great spirits to add their mite to the history of their times. [8]

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorpus.net/downloads to load arms intended for use against the Arabs in Palestine. The panic was shortlived. Willing hands and eager backs took over. Our boys tackled the unfamiliar job with the fury of galley-slaves under the whip, making up for lack of experience and skill with inspired zeal and energy. The work of loading went on under the scorching Mediterranean sun and the amateur dockers sang as they worked, in a tongue strange not only to the dockside loungers and the curious sightseers, but even to many of those who sang. But the spirit of the song transcended the incomprehensibility of its words. It rang out into the hot summer air, speaking of a new freedom, of a new race, resurrected from the ignoble, maltreated skeleton of what had been a proud and dignified people, and of an old tongue re-born to unify the scattered shreds of a nation and turn Babel into Concord.

On the morning of 6/11/1948, a truce came into force between Israel and the invading Arab States, and on that same evening the Altalena sailed for Israel and destruction. The next morning Shmuel received a cable from Israel to hold up the ship! In great dismay he cabled back that it was too late and suggested that the ship be contacted from Israel as he had no means of communication with her. Shmuel spent another three anxious and unhappy days before the arrival of Israel of Arieh Ben Eliezer who brought the welcome news that, after a meeting between the IZL and representatives of the Israeli Government, the latter had asked that the ship be brought with all speed and had promised to help in every arrangement. We knew that the用手 of the world on his shoulders with greater relief than we cast off the stones from our hearts. We were all jubilant. We were now able to set about our preparations for returning to Israel, which we hoped to reach in time to welcome the ship on its arrival there.

There was to be a virtual exodus from Paris. Except for a skeleton staff, headed by Arieh Ben Eliezer, who would liquidate all IZL activities in Europe and close down the ramifications of offices and organizations, everyone was leaving for Israel, for home. A special plane was chartered to take the 30-odd passengers. We remained in Paris another week tying up the loose ends and waiting for the planes from Canada to arrive. When Shmuel declared that we would wait no longer and set a final date for our departure, two planes arrived with a dramatic last-minute flourish, on the eve of our impending flight. Their ultimate fate was affected by the disaster of the Altalena. Instead of being flown to Israel as soon after our departure as possible, they were kept in France and the crew, whom Yechiel had with pains taking perseverance kept off the tiles and on the straight and narrow, were sent home. Eventually, the planes were handed over to the representatives of the Israeli Government in France. [6]

60744. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 29: Journey's End. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. As we boarded the bus which was taking us to the airport the next day we got news that the Altalena had arrived safely off the coast of Israel. The news was supplemented by a vague report of shooting at the ship. This puzzled and worried us considerably. We tried to analyse the situation without any of the facts at our disposal and came dared not ask any questions nor show any undue interest or agitation; for, even to many of those who sang. But the spirit of the song transcended the incomprehensibility of its words. It rang out into the hot summer air, slippery as sharks, for the very childish, but nevertheless comforting,

Women in the Middle East and North Africa
Israel-Palestine
www.ReferenceCorp.net/downloads

==============================================================================

The work of loading went on under the blazing Mediterranean sun and set a final date for our departure, two planes arrived with a dramatic last-minute flourish, on the eve of our impending flight. Their ultimate fate was affected by the disaster of the Altalena. Instead of being flown to Israel as soon after our departure as possible, they were kept in France and the crew, whom Yechiel had with pains taking perseverance kept off the tiles and on the straight and narrow, were sent home. Eventually, the planes were handed over to the representatives of the Israeli Government in France. [6]

60744. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 29: Journey's End. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. As we boarded the bus which was taking us to the airport the next day we got news that the Altalena had arrived safely off the coast of Israel. The news was supplemented by a vague report of shooting at the ship. This puzzled and worried us considerably. We tried to analyse the situation without any of the facts at our disposal and came dared not ask any questions nor show any undue interest or agitation; for, even to many of those who sang. But the spirit of the song transcended the incomprehensibility of its words. It rang out into the hot summer air, slippery as sharks, for the very childish, but nevertheless comforting, the new state which they had helped create and to pay their respects to its Government which was not one of their own choice but was nevertheless the Government of Israel, and therefore pervaded by an aura of sanctity. They came to respect and revere and stayed to shudder and despise. But most of all, I was sorry for Eliezer. He had left Palestine after an epoch of fratricidal brutality in which he had been one of the main victims. He returned to Israel hoping he would forget the horrors of the past and pick up the threads of his old life and he found himself caught once more in the web of hate. During his first few days in Israel he lived in terror of being recognized by some of his former tormentors and of falling once more into their clutches. His fear was unreasonable—no one would have hurt him; but it was none-the-less understandable and pitiable. The scars which had gradually healed during his years in Europe were brutally scorched and re-opened by the burning Altalena. Besides those killed and wounded, five so-called ring-leaders were arrested. They were Benyamin, Yaacov Meridor and Amitsur who had supervised the off-loading, and Hillel Kook and Moshe Hasson, who had merely come to welcome the ship and its passengers.

In Tel Aviv we learned that, besides Stavsky, another seventeen young men had been killed by the bullets of the Palmach, some of them in the sea as they tried to escape from the burning hulk. Amongst those killed were two of the boys from Cuba, the boys who had begged and pleaded to be given a last-minute chance to keep their appointment with death. We learned, too, that Avraham Stavsky had died—not from the wound in his leg or the subsequent loss of blood, but from a broken heart. That stout heart refused to go on beating in a world where brother murdered brother in cold blood, where wounded men were shot at in the water, not by a cruel, insensate enemy, but by their fellow-citizens. It is futile now to go into all the arguments, the insinuations and the libels which have raged about the tragedy of the Altalena and will continue to do so for many years to come. But two facts stand out starkly and nakedly: even if the Israel Government were correct in their highly imaginative argument that the IZL had acted illegally or even that they were preparing a revolution, there was absolutely nothing to prevent them from helping to unload the Altalena, confiscating all the arms and, if necessary, arresting all the leaders of the IZL who were in any case known to them personally. Instead of doing this, they set brother to murder brother. And then, as a crowning infamy, they fired on a ship loaded with ammunition which, but for the gunship on the bridge of the main victims. He returned to Israel hoping he would forget the alternative as opposed to joining the IZL in Jerusalem. Then the State of Israel was declared on the eve of May 15th, Jerusalem was not included in its boundaries. Under the Partition scheme, it was to be an international city. So cut-off and besieged Jerusalem, while it remained attached by sentimental and practical ties to the main body of the State, was nevertheless legally an autonomous city not bound by the laws of the new state nor subject to its Government. When Begin, therefore, declared the dissolution of the IZL in Israel and its absorption into the Israeli Army, the IZL in Jerusalem was perfec exclud ed and continued to exist as an independent organization, operating in conjunction with the Haganah against the Arabs. Its ranks were considerably swelled by the cream of the ex-IZL forces in Israel whose gorge rose up at the thought of serving under Ben Gurion's administration after the Altalena incident. Many of them walked the fifty miles between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem over the bare crags of the Judean hills in order to continue the fight against the Arabs amongst friends and comrades. Joe, for this reason and even more so because the thought of liberating Jerusalem had captured his imagination, chose to fight with the IZL in Jerusalem rather than join the Israeli Forces in Tel Aviv. Perhaps he would have been wiser to choose the latter or return to America. Those who believe in the inexorable inevitability of Fate will say it would have made no difference to his ultimate destiny. We are, unfortunately, never given the chance of testing the fallibility or otherwise of these theories. [=]

60746. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 31: The Army of the IZL. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. Menachem Begin was a completely broken man after the Altalena incident. He came to stay with us in Ramat Gan for a few days to recuperate in the quiet, unfevered atmosphere. In all the time I had known him in the days of the underground, I had seen him worried and distracted, but never particularly depressed and hopeless. During this crucial period in his life he touched the very depths of depression and only his natural resilience and buoyancy bore him back to the surface of the swirling, dark pool of horror and despair. During this visit, Arthur Koestler came to see Begin. He obviously thought he was at the Begin home, not at ours, and I had some little difficulty in persuading him that I was not Ala Begin. I suspect that he went away with the definite impression that we were still suffering from a hang-over from the conspiracy days and had deliberately mixed ourselves up in order to confuse him. That we really were suffering from a carry-over, rather than a hang-over, from the underground days was borne home rather forcibly to us by an incident during Koestler's visit. We were having tea out in the garden and he was holding forth rather loudly and aggressively on his theories about the Latinitizing of the Hebrew script and the introduction of classics into the school curriculum. In order to emphasize a point he was making he banged on the table and said in loud emphatic tones: "I tell you, Begin . . ." A shocked silence fell over the assembled company and each one swivelled his eyes surreptitiously round to see if any of the neighbors had heard the forbidden name. So strong were the taboos and restrictions of our conspiratorial days that even after the British had left the country we were still horrified at the broadcasting of the name and identity of their erst-while arch-enemy. A visible, communal sigh of relief quivered through all of us as we realized that our fears were completely anachronistic.

As Shmuel was away most of the day, I kept Begin company. We talked together a great deal but never about the tragedy which was foremost in our minds. I threw out a half-baked idea that he should go to Jerusalem where the IZL still existed and where the young men in charge were crying out for guidance and leadership in a task which was as much political as military and for which they did not feel qualified, particular’ in view of the highly delicate and tense internal situation which had arisen out of the Altalena tragedy. I am sure that Begin had considered this possibility too but in the exigencies of the moment had shelved it. When I brought it up again, it began germinating and maturing in his brain and eventually emerged as a full-hedged plan. When he propounded it before his erstwhile colleagues in the IZL High Command, they opposed it vehemently on the ground that he was needed in Tel Aviv to take over the post-Altalena confusion and to lay the foundation for the formation of a political party from the ex-adeherents of the IZL. Begin saw the justice of these arguments and proposed, instead, that Shmuel take over the leadership in Jerusalem and become the last of the commanders of the IZL. This alternative was readily accepted as being suitable from all points of view, not the least of which was the fact that Shmuel was by heart and inclination a Jerusalemite and that he was still virtually a Jerusalem resident on temporary loan to Tel Aviv. Shmuel eagerly agreed to the suggestion and started packing again—for both of us. I had to overcome some initial resistance on his part to my accompanying him—resistance which was more formal than actual as there really was no doubt in either of our minds that I would go with him to Jerusalem—in spite of the shortages of food and water and in spite of the fact that the truce was due to end in a few days’ time. We took it for granted that where he went, I went. Some of our friends thought it a bit scatterbrained of him to take me, but my mother, who arrived from Haifa just in time to greet us on our return from Paris and bid us farewell before our trip to Jerusalem, agreed that I must accompany Shmuel on what she considered another of our mad, death-seeking schemes. “If you must be crazy,” she said, “then at least be crazy together.” With that maternal blessing we completed our preparations.

Before describing our journey to Jerusalem it is necessary to depict, in brief, the background of the situation in the city before the truce. Abdullah’s Arab Legion had occupied Latrun on the main highway, thus preventing any passage of traffic between the capital and the coast. At the same time, they cut off the city’s water-supply by capturing the pumping station at Ras-el-Ein. On the south, the city was cut off by the armies of the Arab States—the Iraqis, the Egyptians and the Arab Legion. Besieged Jerusalem tightened her belt. All the food-stores available in the city were collected and rationed out daily. The city’s water wells were sealed to the public and tapped only by the local authorities, who distributed the water at the rate of a few cupsful per head per day. The population of the city became desperate. The food stocks were petering out, the wells were drying up, and the population was subjected to day and night shelling from the heavy mortars of the surrounding Arab armies. The Old City fell, but the New City held on tenaciously. Then, just as the desperate population were reaching the end of their tether, manna fell as smooth as a billiard table. Beyond Rehovoth, the road degenerated to straighten out the post-Altalena confusion and to lay the foundations for residents who had rested for a while and were hurrying back to arrive in the city before all civilian transport was stopped. [a] 60747. Katz. Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 32: The Army of the IZL. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. Any non-resident of Jerusalem had to get a permit from the authorities to travel to the city. Soldiers travelled on army permits, civilians on permits from the Jewish Agency. Shmuel was very dubious about the possibility of my getting such a permit and warned me that he might have to leave me behind after all. But I was not easily put off by stories of permits. I went to the office of the Jewish Agency and asked for a permit as a returning resident, which was, after all, almost true: we had been living away from Jerusalem only some twenty months. The clerk informed me that I did not need a permit any longer—all I required was a voucher from the bus company to say that I had beenengranted a seat on a bus and I could then travel under the collective permit carried by the busdriver. There were not many people going off to Jerusalem to be in the war, and I got my voucher easily. In fact, I got one for Smnuel too and had a little legitimate gloat over people who exaggerate the difficulties of a situation. We arrived at the bus station looking like modern counterparts of the Lithuanian Jews who emigrated to South Africa in my parents’ time. In deference to our age of progress we had, instead of the barrels of herrings, zip-bags full of tinned foods, and, instead of the feather mattresses, we had rugs and cushions. Molye, the grocer, fumed out all his precious foodstores so that we should not go hungry in Jerusalem. He refused to take payment, saying we could pay him when (I could almost hear him adding inwardly “and if?”) we returned.

My mother came to the bus-station to see us off. She ought to have been used to our continual comings and goings and to what she considered our crazy escapades. But she was not. Her heart still failed her as she waved us on our way, quite convinced that this time we would not pay him when (I could almost hear him adding inwardly “and if?”) we returned.

With the truce, thousands of Jerusalem residents, who were not required for fighting or defence, packed their belongings, took their children and fled from this city of death to the coastal area to Tel Aviv, to Haifa, to the settlements, to wherever they had friends and relatives, who could give them a roof, a bath and fatten up their children again. The “Burma Road” hummed with activity. But these were the minority. The bulk of the civilian population remained in the city, among them those who had been born there, who had their roots there and were so physically and emotionally bound to the city that they could not dream of existence anywhere else. They did not blame those who left. The months of horror had impaired the physical health and nerves of many; the economy of the city was completely ruined, and there was very little from which to make a living. These two factors were sufficient to justify the exodus of those who did leave, but even they did not frighten the stalwarts of Old Jerusalem into seeking out the comfort of the “New Jerusalem” of Tel Aviv. As the truce period drew to a close the stream of traffic on the Burma Road was reversed. Food supplies and reinforcements poured into the city from the coast together with returning residents who had rested for a while and were hurrying back to arrive in the city before all civilian transport was stopped.
We arrived in Jerusalem as the sun was setting, eight hours after leaving Tel Aviv which is thirty miles away as the crow flies. The city looked dead and desolate but surprisingly undamaged, except for Ben Yehuda Street which had been practically destroyed by a load of explosives planted by the British, and for the various manifestations of the anti-British activities of the IZL which still gaped widely to the skies. The Arab shelling appeared to have caused very little external damage to the solidly-built stone buildings. This first, superficial impression was quickly dissipated when we arrived at the old IZL Headquarters (where we had drunk the toast to the newly-arrived Sten-guns four months previously) to meet Raanan. Here the gaping holes in the roof and the havoc in the courtyard gave the lie to the untouched and unruflled exterior of the building.

Shmuel immediately plunged into the maze of troubles and difficulties the IZL were experiencing in Jerusalem. So that I should not, meanwhile, have to sit on our suitcases in the street, we took a room at the Eden Hotel until such time as Shmuel could take off a few minutes from his more pressing worries to think about where we were going to live. The proprietor of the hotel welcomed us effusively. His welcome was probably all the more cordial for the fact that in his large and comfortable hotelery built to house nearly a hundred guests there were, besides us, exactly three others: Konrad Bercovici and Major Weiser who had arrived by jeep a few days before us, and Shoshana Raziel who had returned to her home in Jerusalem only to find it evacuated because the people who deserve the unstinted praise of the people of Jerusalem are after leaving Tel Aviv which is thirty miles away as the crow flies. The city looked dead and desolate but surprisingly undamaged, except for Ben Yehuda Street which had been practically destroyed by a load of explosives planted by the British, and for the various manifestations of the anti-British activities of the IZL which still gaped widely to the skies. The Arab shelling appeared to have caused very little external damage to the solidly-built stone buildings. This first, superficial impression was quickly dissipated when we arrived at the old IZL Headquarters (where we had drunk the toast to the newly-arrived Sten-guns four months previously) to meet Raanan. Here the gaping holes in the roof and the havoc in the courtyard gave the lie to the untouched and unruflled exterior of the building.

Shmuel immediately plunged into the maze of troubles and difficulties the IZL were experiencing in Jerusalem. So that I should not, meanwhile, have to sit on our suitcases in the street, we took a room at the Eden Hotel until such time as Shmuel could take off a few minutes from his more pressing worries to think about where we were going to live. The proprietor of the hotel welcomed us effusively. His welcome was probably all the more cordial for the fact that in his large and comfortable hotelery built to house nearly a hundred guests there were, besides us, exactly three others: Konrad Bercovici and Major Weiser who had arrived by jeep a few days before us, and Shoshana Raziel who had returned to her home in Jerusalem only to find it evacuated because the people who deserve the unstinted praise of the people of Jerusalem are after leaving Tel Aviv which is thirty miles away as the crow flies. The city looked dead and desolate but surprisingly undamaged, except for Ben Yehuda Street which had been practically destroyed by a load of explosives planted by the British, and for the various manifestations of the anti-British activities of the IZL which still gaped widely to the skies. The Arab shelling appeared to have caused very little external damage to the solidly-built stone buildings. This first, superficial impression was quickly dissipated when we arrived at the old IZL Headquarters (where we had drunk the toast to the newly-arrived Sten-guns four months previously) to meet Raanan. Here the gaping holes in the roof and the havoc in the courtyard gave the lie to the untouched and unruflled exterior of the building.
As for Shmuel, he always maintained so calm and dispassionate a front that it is difficult to know his reactions. He had two very narrow escapes. On one occasion he was in a car with Major Weiser when a shell fell directly behind them, killing a young man standing next to the car. Weiser, who was a seasoned campaigner, was considerably shaken, so I presume that Shmuel was not as unrefined inside as he appeared to be on the surface. On another occasion he was just stepping into his car outside the GHQ in Katamon when a shell fell on the pavement a few yards away from him. The war-experienced Jerusalemites conceived of all manner of ingenious devices for confounding the snipers. I had the opportunity of seeing one of the most brilliant of these when we drove Shoshanah to her home to collect a few of her personal belongings. Her flat was in a district which faced the notorious Sheikh Jarrah suburb, from where the Arabs had ambushed the convoy to Mount Scopus. As pedestrians crossed the street, they afforded the snipers across the narrow valley a wonderful target. In order to obviate this, the dwellers in that neighborhood had hung up mammoth curtains made of sack-cloth across the exposed streets. This enabled them to run across in safety unless by some very unfortunate chance they were hit by a sniper trying out his luck in a blind, targetless shot. After two days of "sight-seeing" and visiting all our old friends, I decided it was time I did some useful and constructive work. I could not seriously offer my services as a soldier, so, instead, I volunteered for work in the hospital.

The IZL women volunteers had rigged up a first-rate little hospital with about forty beds in a villa which had previously been occupied by General Barker, one of the best-hated GOC's of many who were sent out by the British to wipe out the "terrorists." This was a piquant piece of poetic justice which I was always at great pains to point out to visitors to the hospital. In this hospital we received all our wounded who had been through Hadassah or one of the other hospitals, been X-rayed, operated on when necessary and pronounced out of danger. In this way we made more beds available for urgent cases and helped, to some small extent, to narrow the dangerous gap between the hospital facilities and the thousands who needed them. It must be remembered that the "large" modern Hadassah hospital on Mount Scopus had to be evacuated and temporary make-shift premises had been hastily equipped in town. Even in normal circumstances this disorganization would have caused a shortage of beds. How much more, therefore, was this so when, in addition to ordinary cases of sickness, there were hundreds of wounded soldiers and civilians.

Soon after the recommencement of the war, Shmuel had visited the IZL wounded in the Hadassah Hospital and I had accompanied him. I had seen films of emergency war hospitals from the days of the Crimean War to modern times and had been warned by my friends of what to expect; yet, nevertheless, I was shocked and sickened when confronted by grim reality. As so often happens in moments of great stress it was something quite trivial which produced the greatest effect. I stood the sight of doctors and nurses stumbling over beds which filled the passageways in the wards, which filled the corridors and the verandas; I stood the sight of bloody, oozing bandages; I bore with difficulty the groans and cries from the check-filled wards, but what eventually broke my nerve and sent me scurrying out for air was the shock of seeing men and women in the "me ward." This departure from all accepted practice suddenly brought home to me the cruel and crucial difficulties under which the sick and wounded and their medical attendants existed.

My work in the IZL hospital was of a very elementary nature. My only qualifications were a First Aid Certificate and a Home Nursing Certificate, both of which I had received in South Africa ten years previously, plus enthusiasm and willingness. I was allowed to draw only on the two latter qualifications. In the course of time I became an excellent meal-server, an even more excellent bedmaker and I could even remove a bed-pan without immediately wanting to vomit. I took temperatures with the skill of an expert and gave sleeping-pills as if I had had the operation of seeing one of the most brilliant of these when we drove Shoshanah to her home to collect a few of her personal belongings. Her flat was in a district which faced the notorious Sheikh Jarrah suburb, from where the Arabs had ambushed the convoy to Mount Scopus. As pedestrians crossed the street, they afforded the snipers across the narrow valley a wonderful target. In order to obviate this, the dwellers in that neighborhood had hung up mammoth curtains made of sack-cloth across the exposed streets. This enabled them to run across in safety unless by some very unfortunate chance they were hit by a sniper trying out his luck in a blind, targetless shot. After two days of "sight-seeing" and visiting all our old friends, I decided it was time I did some useful and constructive work. I could not seriously offer my services as a soldier, so, instead, I volunteered for work in the hospital.

The IZL women volunteers had rigged up a first-rate little hospital with about forty beds in a villa which had previously been occupied by General Barker, one of the best-hated GOC's of many who were sent out by the British to wipe out the "terrorists." This was a piquant piece of poetic justice which I was always at great pains to point out to visitors to the hospital. In this hospital we received all our wounded who had been through Hadassah or one of the other hospitals, been X-rayed, operated on when necessary and pronounced out of danger. In this way we made more beds available for urgent cases and helped, to some small extent, to narrow the dangerous gap between the hospital facilities and the thousands who needed them. It must be remembered that the "large" modern Hadassah hospital on Mount Scopus had to be evacuated and temporary make-shift premises had been hastily equipped in town. Even in normal circumstances this disorganization would have caused a shortage of beds. How much more, therefore, was this so when, in addition to ordinary cases of sickness, there were hundreds of wounded soldiers and civilians.

Soon after the recommencement of the war, Shmuel had visited the IZL wounded in the Hadassah Hospital and I had accompanied him. I had seen films of emergency war hospitals from the days of the Crimean War to modern times and had been warned by my friends of what to expect; yet, nevertheless, I was shocked and sickened when confronted by grim reality. As so often happens in moments of great stress it was something quite trivial which produced the greatest effect. I stood the sight of doctors and nurses stumbling over beds which filled the passageways in the wards, which filled the corridors and the verandas; I stood the sight of bloody, oozing bandages; I bore with difficulty the groans and cries from the check-filled wards, but what eventually broke my nerve and sent me scurrying out for air was the shock of seeing men and women in the "me ward." This departure from all accepted practice suddenly brought home to me the cruel and crucial difficulties under which the sick and wounded and their medical attendants existed.

My work in the IZL hospital was of a very elementary nature. My only qualifications were a First Aid Certificate and a Home Nursing Certificate, both of which I had received in South Africa ten years previously, plus enthusiasm and willingness. I was allowed to draw only on the two latter qualifications. In the course of time I became an excellent meal-server, an even more excellent bedmaker and I could even remove a bed-pan without immediately wanting to vomit. I took temperatures with the skill of an expert and gave sleeping-pills as if I had had the operation of seeing one of the most brillian closed my eyes and plunged the needle in. To my horror, the patient let out a blood-curdling yell. This completely unnerved me and I fled from the room, leaving Yael to finish off the gruesome task of injecting the liquid from the syringe. In spite of the fact that she assured me I had done an excellent job and that that particular patient always yelled, I would never again touch an hypodermic syringe. I always tried to be cheerful, patient and kind according to the tenets of the text-books, but I soon discovered why hospital nurses have the reputation of being hard-hearted, cruel monsters. This is sheer self-protection against the willfulness, irritating egotism, bad temper and, in fact, hardheartedness and cruelty of their patients. Very sick people are no trouble at all. The constant attention which they need, but never demand, is given gladly and willingly, with unselfish devotion, by the nurses. But convalescent patients are the bane and detestation of every nurse’s life, and our patients were mostly convalescent or near-convalescent. The number of times a day I ran up and down the stairs bringing glasses of water, administering phoney headache pills, washing fruit, tightening loose bandages and giving assurances that the doctor would most certainly come that day, were legion. By the end of the day my legs ached, my back ached and my spirits were dangerously near to breaking-point. I made a solemn vow there and then that if I should ever have the misfortune to be hospitalized, I would lie quietly reading a book. I would wait my turn to be fed and washed patiently and not clamor for preference and, above all, I would never criticize the nurses or accuse them of neglect. [–]

60749. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel’s War of Liberation: Part 34: The Army of the IZL. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. Two days after the recommencement of the war, Shmuel and I went to stay with Raanan, the Jerusalem Regional Commander of the IZL prior to Shmuel’s arrival, and now, in effect, Chief of Staff. This was more convenient for Shmuel who spent a good deal of time at Raanan’s flat in any case, and a good deal more in keeping with austerity conditions in Jerusalem in general and in the IZL in particular. Shmuel was in the throes of solving the problem of the five British officials of the Jerusalem Electric Corp. who had been arrested by the IZL on suspicion of spying for the Arabs. Due to the inexperience of the intelligence officer, there was not sufficient evidence in the hands of the IZL to convict them in any court of law. The IZL Intelligence officers maintained, however, that the Haganah had enough additional evidence to convict the five in a fair trial. Shmuel studied all the evidence very carefully, including a confession of guilt from one of the five. He came to the conclusion that the IZL as such could not put the five on trial with the evidence in their possession.

The British government was demanding the release of the five men and Ben Gurion and his government went into their usual hysterical panic when confronted by an “international situation” and demanded through the Military Governor of Jerusalem, Dr. Bernard Joseph, that the five be handed over to them. In their hysteria, they instructed Dr. Joseph to take the men by force, if necessary. There were two courses open to Shmuel: to keep the five and try to collect additional evidence, or to hand them over to the Haganah. He inclined to the second course because, with the vision of the Altcvana still vividly before him, he did not want to risk another blood-bath which would probably on this occasion have been reciprocal. But he hesitated about taking it because he did not trust the Haganah and feared they would not bring the five to trial. So he directed negotiations with Dr. Joseph until the latter declared publicly that if the five British were handed over to him he would proceed to a fair trial and, presumably, that the Haganah would introduce the evidence in their possession to complete the link. This public statement must have earned Dr. Joseph a literal preference and, above all, I would never criticize the nurses or accuse them of neglect. [–] crueal shaft pierced and parted it in screaming ecstasy. The night was called all the more hideous by the terrible cries of one of our neighbors whose husband, missing after the attack on Malcha, had been found that afternoon in a gulley, killed by a shell.

Raanan’s wife and I had the unenviable woman’s task of merely sitting and waiting for news, which we got from Shmuel who was in constant contact by phone and messengers with the IZL staff. As zero-hour approached we heard a terrific explosion which we took to be the blowing we very soon learned that this was the first of a long list of misfortunes up of the Old City gates as per plan and the initiation of the attack. But which forsook the success of the attack from the start. A shell had fallen on a LH truck loaded with ammunition and had blown it skyhigh, taking its toll of human lives too. Ten o’clock came and went, eleven o’clock came and went and the attack did not start. Shmuel grew more and more worried. Messengers came with news that the LH still were not ready, that the Haganah were not ready. Meanwhile the precious hours slipped by and with their passing the chances of capturing the Old City before dawn grew more and more slender. At last, at three in the morning, both the Haganah and LHI informed the waiting IZL officers that they were ready to attack.

The plan called for the simultaneous blowing-up of three of the Old City’s gates, one by each of the three attacking groups, and a three-pronged advance. The IZL blew up their gate without any difficulty and within a short time were fighting within the precincts of the Old City Itself. but the Haganah and the LHI through some miscalculation of the amount of explosives necessary to do the job, failed to blow up their gates. The small IZL forces, which had already made a considerable bridgehead, were thus left without any protection on their flanks due to the miscarriage of the plan of the campaign. When, consequently, the truce came into force at 5:30 a.m. and the Haganah Command, which had the overriding voice in all joint operations, gave them the order to retire, they had no alternative but to do so, and the Old City remained in the hands of Abdullah’s Arab Legion.

All this I subsequently heard from Shmuel, as I went to bed shortly before three. Shmuel had the unpleasant task of breaking some other news to me: Joe had been killed! I behaved very badly when he told me of it as gently as he could. At first, I refused to believe that it could be true. How was it possible that a man who had survived the horrible war against the Japanese, could have been killed in what was a dolls’ war in comparison When Shmuel dolefully insisted that it was not only possible, but that I had really happened, I turned upon him and berated him for having sent Joe to his death. This was a cruel and unjust accusation made in the bitterness and despair of the moment. In spite of his deep hurt, Shmuel realised that I spoke in the wildness of sorrow and nevertheless he still insist that I of all people, should so have added to his burden of grief and responsibility: He was not the first officer to be arraigned by the bereaved friends and loved ones of those soldiers whom he had sent into battle; nor will he be the last, unless, by some miraculous mystical power, mankind should be persuaded that there are other ways of settling differences than by pulverizing one’s opponents.

On Saturday, the 17th July, the official war came to an end in Jerusalem. People emerged from their homes into the bright sunshine laughter of the children rang out again in the streets, and through the whole city ran a tremor of relief.

But the pall of smoke and dust still hovered in the air—symbols of the destruction which had rained down in the night. And to the Jerusalem-smell of latrines and disinfectants was added another, sickly-sweet—the smell of death seeping out from the as-yet-unburied bodies of the city’s heroes and victims. The lack of water and the shortage of ice combined to bring home forcibly the horror and sordidity of man’s continual strife against man. That smell of death pervaded the whole city. When it was not an actual sensory sensation, it remained with one as an olfactory memory, recurring at odd times and in peculiar places as if to insinuate the tranitoriness and ephemerality of all things mortal and cast a shadow over the brief, forgetful moments of merriment and laughter.

On Sunday, I went to Joe’s funeral. It was the first time I had ever been to a funeral. All our other bereavements had occurred in South Africa, while we were in England. Joe was buried, together with eleven other men of the IZL, among them one other from the Altalena who was killed by the same shell as claimed Joe’s life. These two had no families in Jerusalem and only a few friends to see them off on the long road to eternity. But most of the others had been local boys and their mourners were many, amongst them Ashkenazi, Sephardi and Oriental Jews. The scenes at the Bikur Holim Hospital, where the plain dead coffins were piled up in the courtyard while their contests received the last tributes to the dead in the little adjoining synagogue, were ghastly. According to their customs and traditions, the Oriental Jews set up an endless heart-and-spirit-rending wail, while they tore their clothes and banged their heads with frightening effect against the walls of the synagogue. The immediate relatives of the dead men insisted that their coffins be opened and they fell upon their dear departed ones, kissing their hands and faces in a shrieking ecstasy of grief. To add to the horror of these macabre scenes, the professional mourners who attend all oriental Jewish funerals, sat crosslegged on the ground, alternately beating the earth with their palms and flinging their arms wildly to the skies, all the time singing in high-pitched, quavering voices a blood-curdling funeral dirge.

The noise of this unfettered, primitive and elemental grief, combined with the sickly smell of death, became a nightmare. I found myself thinking about Joe and his love for the beautiful and the spacious, for cleanliness and modernity, or the lovely Californian shores—and I heard myself moaning aloud: “God, how he would have hated all this!”

The funeral procession started off. The military trucks, on which lay the draped coffins attended by guards of honor, were preceded by slow marching, tense-faced soldiers of the IZL. Behind the cortage walked the relatives and friends of the dead. All along the two-mile route, the citizens of Jerusalem lined the streets to pay their last respects to the faithful defenders of their city. A silly, sentimental refrain rang with madam like persistence in my thoughts: “Joe, I promised to dance at your wedding, and instead I’m weeping at your funeral.” This refrain accompanied me the whole length of that grievous journey in the blazing, phlegmatic sun. I felt it to be unworthy of the occasion, but it had occupied my brain, drained and exhausted as it was with emotion, as a disease will take possession of a weary, unresting body. At last we passed the outskirts of the town and reached the temporary war-time cemetery of Sheikh Bader. The communal grave. blasted out of the rock, was overgrown with the grass, gaped widely and hungrily. As the volley of the military escort echoed through the valley of death, the coffins were lowered one after the other, to rest in close proximity until such time as peace should return to the tortured city of Jerusalem and enable her to bury her dead in graves marked with the dignity of headstones in a setting in keeping with the tranquility and sanctity of death. [•] collected for the daily laundering of clothes, was used again for washing the floors and then went into the waste-water pail. This waste water was the housewife's most valuable asset, for it went finally into flushing the toilets. I hated those symbols of twentieth century civilization in Jerusalem—the modern conveniences. They were a devilish anachronism which contrived to inflect on the fastidious the most subtle of all torments—the torture of the aesthetic sense. Getting at the water was not a simple matter. When the pump was being operated, a sodgy mess of mud and soap suds was thrown out of the stove in a muffle. I worked in a Jerusalem kitchen or, still worse, in a Jerusalem bathroom with its conglomerations of Heath Robinson water contraptions, sufficiently obscured by the dim lights as to cause many a bruised ankle or shinbone to the unwary.

Although the battles were officially over, minor clashes continued to occur. We were constantly getting fresh casualties in our hospital, mainly from Mount Zion, a high point overlooking the Old City, the responsibility for guarding which was in the hands of the IZL. The changing of the guards took place at night so as not to expose them to the mercy of Arab snipers on the Old City walls. And yet there were incidents. On one night in particular we suffered heavy casualties in wounded when the Arabs tunneled underneath a strong-point and then blew it up, burying its Jewish guards in stone and ruble. Some of the boys were interred for hours until their comrades could dig them out. There were no fatal casualties that night, but Yaacov Mizrahi, of whom more later, was permanently blinded, a second boy developed tetanus and hovered on the brink of death for days, and eight were so badly cut about and bruised that they spent weeks in the hospital before they were able to walk around in comfort. The snipers, too, continued to take their toll of lives. Our flat, to which we moved a few weeks after the truce started, faced the Old City walls. Anyone who stood on our kitchen balcony for any length of time was either a hero or an idiot, depending on one's point of view. The number of bulletmarks on the outside of the wall testified to that fact. As I have never pretended to be a hero, I used to crouch low and practically crawl whenever I wanted anything on the balcony, taking care not to expose even the minutes' part of my anatomy above the low wall.

In between my chores, I continued working in the hospital. But with the advent of "peace," the girls in the First Aid units found the time heavy on their hands and many of them asked to be transferred to work in the hospital. This sudden abundance of helpers made me dispensable and I became, instead, a Welfare Officer. My duties consisted in visiting the wounded IZL boys in hospitals other than our own, bringing them chocolates, cigarettes and books, listening to their complaints and tending to their needs. As soon as they could be moved, I had to arrange for their transfer to our own hospital. There were very seldom any complaints, and as for their needs—they always assured me that they, themselves, had none; but most of them worried about their families. I was continually asked to find out if parent were getting their allowances, or whether families who had had to evacuate their old homes had found new ones, as the boys realised that their parents or other relatives would not want to worry them with these things and so would not divulge the true state of affairs. And always they would ask how soon they could be transferred to our own hospital—not because they did not get good treatment or were unhappy where they were, but because they wished to be with friends, at "home."

In accordance with an unwritten, tacit law which we women had ourselves evolved, we made a point of looking our best whenever we came into contact with outside authorities such as the Municipality, the welfare organizations, public medical authorities and the Haganah. This was a reaction to the real truth—that due to the chronic shortage of funds our forces looked rather a rag-tag and bobtail crew, in an amazing assortment of "uniforms," ranging from Cossack-booted partisan attire to Australian awash-buckling hats and bushjackets. But we women were extremely jealous of the reputation of the IZL, so Noar, my visiting companion, and I always kept our uniforms as immaculate as possible.
enabled us to spend more time with the sick and wounded and less in tramping in the hot sun from one hospital to the next. And yet as much time as we spent with the boys and girls was never enough. They liked to see us in our trim uniform and caps with the IZL badges prominently displayed. It made them feel less cut-off from their friends and still a part of the great, underground family, in spite of their temporary disablement. I am always happy to think that we did do something to lighten the long, painful days of our boys and girls spent in hospitals. And yet we wanted to do more.

But we did not only give. We received too-spiritual gifts much more precious than the mere chocolates and cigarettes which we brought. There was Yaacov Mizrahi. He taught me how one can suffer pain and affliction with courage and forebearance. At eighteen he had lost one eye completely and these doctors were fighting a losing battle to save the sight of the other. Yaacov underwent one operation after another, each one successively diminishing his and the doctors' hopes of restoring sight to his eye. And always it was he who was cheerful, he who encouraged us when he sensed our dismay at the failure of another operation. I used to sit at his side, holding his hand to maintain contact with him, and tell him, in my faltering Hebrew, about what the Gedud (the Brigade) was doing and how his friends, who had been wounded with him at Mount Zion, were faring. Noar would read to him. Then he would speak of the "old days" and how different things would be in the future. Poor Yaacov, for him they certainly are different. But when last I saw him his spirit was as strong and youthful as ever as he studied in the School for the Blind to become a useful citizen of the State for which he gave so much.

Then there was Yitschak, whose surname I have forgotten. He was sixteen years old altogether and was in hospital for the second time, this time with a shattered leg. He had been in the IZL since the age of fourteen and had not managed to finish his schooling. Now he was making up for lost time by reading voraciously and indiscriminately whatever he could lay his hands on. In addition, he had found that he had a remarkable aptitude for clay-modelling and was making rapid strides under the tuition of the hospital therapy instructor. Yitschak was simply simmering with enthusiasm at the wonderful new vista of learning and education which was opening before him. I always felt thoroughly ashamed at the thought of the careless matter-of-factness with which I and my South African friends had accepted our schooling and the serious attitude which we had towards our lessons, our dancing lessons, our elocution lessons—most of which we rifle against a background of white and blue silk, and ruffled tempers, disordered hair and clothes, and manifold bruises gathered from all the buffeting we had received. I decided then and there to eschew the life of fame and pursue the simple pleasures of a simple woman.

The next day Begin performed the ceremonial function of handing the IZL flag over to Raanan, as Chief of Staff of the Jerusalem IZL and thus of the IZL in toto. The duty of receiving the flag should nominally have been Shmuel's, as Commander, but he had no pretensions to being a military man and did not even have a uniform; so he gladly retired in favor of Raanan. This ceremony was one of the most touchingly impressive I have ever witnessed. On the large sports field in Katamon, which the IZL used as a parade-ground, row upon row of rifle-bearing men and women soldiers stood at attention. There were mortars and bren-guns, armored cars and jeeps, radio equipment and first-aid detachments. Every thing gleamed in the sun, from the highly-polished boots to the freshly laundered and almost uniform uniforms. To the casual observer this was no more than a very mediocre, small-scale military parade. But to those of us who knew how much blood and sweat and tears and hard work and sacrifice and renunciation and self-denial went into producing every rifle, every pair of boots, every uniform, every one of the brand-new berets with their different colored pom-poms—to us, this was a miracle. And as the flag of the IZL unfurled, revealing the gleaming golden emblem of the hand grasping the rifle against a background of white and blue silk, the miracle became an emotional cataclysm whose intensity was broken only by the sudden whirring of cameras as the newspaper photographers sprang back into life and resumed the feverish activity which they had suspended for a few minutes when even they had fallen under the spell of the solemnity of the moment.

For the foreign correspondents and photographers, Begin's visit to Jerusalem was a field-day. After days of uneventful post-war inertia, punctuated only by the clashes and sniping which had lost their news value by their frequency, here was an event which hit front-page headlines. The newspaper men made the most of their opportunities; and the press and movie-photographers were by no means outdone by them. Facts were sometimes sacrificed to sensation—as in the case of one movie-tone newssheet, which featured Begin's visit to Jerusalem and the ceremony of handing over the flag, and showed pictures of Begin and Shmuel, together with the commentary that Shmuel was Begin's double and went everywhere with him in order to foil assassination.

This resemblance between Begin and Shmuel created quite a sensation in Jerusalem. I myself see no resemblance whatsoever other than that they both have moustaches, not of the same length or shape, that they both wear glasses, not with similar frames, and that they both wear trousers. It was the trousers that must have clinched the argument for the news-photographers. By an unfortunate coincidence Begin and Shmuel were wearing identical suits brought for them from South Africa by my mother. This, coupled with the superficial facial resemblance, caused a good deal of confusion. Shmuel found himself cheered and they needed the extraordinary rigor of a strong-fisted regime to keep the Irgun Zevai Leumi ceased to exist as an independent military against the Arabs, the common danger and the habit of self-discipline cause havoc in the ranks of the Haganah. Without doubt, too, this would disciplinary measures were not only redundant, but ridiculous. In the war position in Jerusalem was sufficiently strong to have enabled them to plans and their leadership the common aim would the sooner be already made clear its readiness to dissolve of its own accord, and this imposed. The IZL was then a comparatively small organization bound organization unconditionally, or else. "Undoubtedly the Government, and Raanan and Avinoam representing the IZL.

For Shmuel, the return to normal meant the increasingly difficult struggle of maintain" the IZL camp in Jerusalem. Besides the immense difficulty of feeding and clothing hundreds of people, with very limited resources, there was the growing battle against demoralization which afflicts every idle army. The men were bored and restless and exaggerated the usual soldiers' grumbles into minor tragedies. The hardships they had borne cheerfully in the days of fighting now became irksome and irritating. Those who had spent the last six years fighting—history.

congratulated and accosted unwarrantedly—a somewhat painful experience for one as modest and retiring as he is. Newspapersmen asked him if he was Begin’s younger brother and the photographers snapped him furiously, to his acute embarrassment. For weeks afterwards small boys would stop and stare at him in the street and then argue furiously about whether he was Begin or Artsi (Shmuel’s pseudonym in Jerusalem). Shmuel’s reaction to the Begin’s double story was typical: he took it very calmly, remarking merely that they certainly must think him a damn fool if they thought he would serve as a bullet-proof vest for Begin. Begin returned to Tel Aviv the day after the ceremonial parade. He was accompanied on part of his journey by an IZL guard of honor complete with white-helmeted motor-cyclists, and left the city in a triumphal procession, cheered on his way by the waving citizens. Life returned to normal or to the equivalent of normal. For me it meant more work in the hospitals and the daily drudge of housekeeping. Not that this was dull and monotonous. On the contrary, every day brought something new and exciting. First we started getting used to a great event in the heat of an Israeli summer; then we got more and more electricity until the nights of the candle were completely forgotten; and, finally, the shops filled up with all kinds of luxuries, such as tinned foods, fruit and vegetables and we even got rations of chicken to supplement our meat allocations. Only the water-pipes remained silent and obdurate and continued to remain so until a week after we left Jerusalem.

The only remaining problem was that of getting the best possible terms for the soldiers. Negotiations were started on how the incorporation should take place. The negotiations were carried on between Mr. Gruenbaum, the Minister of Interior in the Provisional Government, and Raanan and Avinoam representing the IZL. Interminable discussions took place as to whether the IZL should go in as a battalion or whether the members should join as individuals; whether they would have their own officers or whether they would be officered by Army Command appointees. The IZL planned to hold a monster military parade through the streets, bringing with them all their arms and armor which they would then hand over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.

Discipline in the days of the underground had been self-imposed. The IZL was then a comparatively small organization bound together by common ideals and a common purpose. This unity and harmony obviated the need of any imposed discipline. The soldiers of the line obeyed their officers because they recognized that through their plans and their leadership the common aim would the sooner be achieved. The junior officers obeyed their senior officers for the same peremptory, clumsy "we'll show you who's boss!" demand on the part of Army Command appointees. The IZL planned to hold a ceremonial parade. He was accompanied on part of his journey by an IZL guard of honor complete with white-helmeted motor-cyclists, and left inspired the magnificent vow: "If I forget thee, may my right hand forget its cunning," was still not incorporated into the State of Israel, was still mutilated by the amputation of its oldest limb from the body corporate. To many this justified the continued existence of the IZL in the hope that they would create a political situation which would convince the Israel Government, too, was demanding that the IZL arms be handed over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.

For Shmuel, the return to normal meant the increasingly difficult struggle of maintain" the IZL camp in Jerusalem. Besides the immense difficulty of feeding and clothing hundreds of people, with very limited resources, there was the growing battle against demoralization which afflicts every idle army. The men were bored and restless and exaggerated the usual soldiers' grumbles into minor tragedies. The hardships they had borne cheerfully in the days of fighting now became irksome and irritating. Those who had spent the last six years fighting—history.

To brighten our lives still further, the cinemas re-opened, not change the inevitable decision which Shmuel and his colleagues had to make. The fact that the Israel Government, too, was demanding that the IZL arms be handed over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.

Discipline in the days of the underground had been self-imposed. The IZL was then a comparatively small organization bound together by common ideals and a common purpose. This unity and harmony obviated the need of any imposed discipline. The soldiers of the line obeyed their officers because they recognized that through their plans and their leadership the common aim would the sooner be achieved. The junior officers obeyed their senior officers for the same reason. In everyone burned unquestioning devotion to the idea that the IZL was not only a body of friends and comrades, fired by a common ideal. It had become a large, unwieldy, heterogeneous body with the small hard core of underground fighters surrounded by the fleshy pulp of prodigals returned to the fold after many years of absence and of newcomers who joined the IZL instead of the Haganah for sentimental reasons, or for reasons known only to themselves. This mixed bag of idle men not only needed the ordinary elements of military discipline, but they needed the extraordinary rigor of a strong-listed regime to keep them under control, just as any other conscripted civilian army required in time of peace. And the IZL officers had not the means of applying this much needed discipline. They had no prisons, no fatigue duties, no punishments, in fact no army regulation sufficiently comprehensive to meet this situation. To an objective observer the obvious solution to the immense two-fold problem of upkeep and discipline was the dissolution of the last rearguard of the IZL and its incorporation into the Army of Israel. But the objective observer does not always see the imponderables, one of which was the serious political purpose behind the maintenance of the IZL in Jerusalem.

This city, beloved of all the Jews of the world, which has inspired the magnificent vow: "If I forget thee, may my right hand forget its cunning," was still not incorporated into the State of Israel, was still mutilated by the amputation of its oldest limb from the body corporate. To many this justified the continued existence of the IZL in the hope that they would create a political situation which would convince the Israel Government, too, was demanding that the IZL arms be handed over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.

Discipline in the days of the underground had been self-imposed. The IZL was then a comparatively small organization bound together by common ideals and a common purpose. This unity and harmony obviated the need of any imposed discipline. The soldiers of the line obeyed their officers because they recognized that through their plans and their leadership the common aim would the sooner be achieved. The junior officers obeyed their senior officers for the same reason. In everyone burned unquestioning devotion to the idea that the IZL was not only a body of friends and comrades, fired by a common ideal. It had become a large, unwieldy, heterogeneous body with the small hard core of underground fighters surrounded by the fleshy pulp of prodigals returned to the fold after many years of absence and of newcomers who joined the IZL instead of the Haganah for sentimental reasons, or for reasons known only to themselves. This mixed bag of idle men not only needed the ordinary elements of military discipline, but they needed the extraordinary rigor of a strong-listed regime to keep them under control, just as any other conscripted civilian army required in time of peace. And the IZL officers had not the means of applying this much needed discipline. They had no prisons, no fatigue duties, no punishments, in fact no army regulation sufficiently comprehensive to meet this situation. To an objective observer the obvious solution to the immense two-fold problem of upkeep and discipline was the dissolution of the last rearguard of the IZL and its incorporation into the Army of Israel. But the objective observer does not always see the imponderables, one of which was the serious political purpose behind the maintenance of the IZL in Jerusalem.

This city, beloved of all the Jews of the world, which has inspired the magnificent vow: "If I forget thee, may my right hand forget its cunning," was still not incorporated into the State of Israel, was still mutilated by the amputation of its oldest limb from the body corporate. To many this justified the continued existence of the IZL in the hope that they would create a political situation which would convince the Israel Government, too, was demanding that the IZL arms be handed over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.

Discipline in the days of the underground had been self-imposed. The IZL was then a comparatively small organization bound together by common ideals and a common purpose. This unity and harmony obviated the need of any imposed discipline. The soldiers of the line obeyed their officers because they recognized that through their plans and their leadership the common aim would the sooner be achieved. The junior officers obeyed their senior officers for the same reason. In everyone burned unquestioning devotion to the idea that the IZL was not only a body of friends and comrades, fired by a common ideal. It had become a large, unwieldy, heterogeneous body with the small hard core of underground fighters surrounded by the fleshy pulp of prodigals returned to the fold after many years of absence and of newcomers who joined the IZL instead of the Haganah for sentimental reasons, or for reasons known only to themselves. This mixed bag of idle men not only needed the ordinary elements of military discipline, but they needed the extraordinary rigor of a strong-listed regime to keep them under control, just as any other conscripted civilian army required in time of peace. And the IZL officers had not the means of applying this much needed discipline. They had no prisons, no fatigue duties, no punishments, in fact no army regulation sufficiently comprehensive to meet this situation. To an objective observer the obvious solution to the immense two-fold problem of upkeep and discipline was the dissolution of the last rearguard of the IZL and its incorporation into the Army of Israel. But the objective observer does not always see the imponderables, one of which was the serious political purpose behind the maintenance of the IZL in Jerusalem.

This city, beloved of all the Jews of the world, which has inspired the magnificent vow: "If I forget thee, may my right hand forget its cunning," was still not incorporated into the State of Israel, was still mutilated by the amputation of its oldest limb from the body corporate. To many this justified the continued existence of the IZL in the hope that they would create a political situation which would convince the Israel Government, too, was demanding that the IZL arms be handed over to the Israeli Army and its soldiers incorporated therein, forced the issue.
organisation. The handingover of the arms was carried out without incident in spite of the fact that the military authorities, with characteristic gaucherie and tactlessness, sent a unit of Palmach (who had carried out the brutal attack on the Altalena from the Tel Aviv shore) to receive the arms. Perhaps one day, when our Government reaches maturity, they will learn how to be gallant and gracious, and how to recognise and acknowledge worth even in their political opponents. The Haganah in Jerusalem, though Jerusalem had been instructed not to allow the arms to leave the establishment, was a part of the Israel Army, carried out "Operation Liquidation" with amazing speed and efficiency. They dismantled the barracks in Katamon, they removed our wounded to their own hospitals, in one day, and then began swearing-in the individual members. This latter process took quite a considerable time, owing to the numbers involved.

The liquidation of our little hospital was a very sad event for the women volunteers, especially for Rachel and Nata who had built it up from an empty, neglected villa to a well-equipped, well-run modern establishment. They felt it should have been possible to keep it going for the Army, but by the very nature of the place this was impossible. The IZL was dead, and anything associated with it had to be destroyed, so that its name should not be perpetuated. This was good party politics on the part of the Government, even if it was not good ethics. I had the dismal task of conducting the Haganah swearing-in officers round all the hospitals and explaining to our sick and wounded that they had to take the oath to the Israel Army and become part of it. (The Army had agreed to accept responsibility for all our wounded, including those who were permanently disabled.) I knew that the dissolution of the IZL was inevitable and that death had been quiet and painless; but, nevertheless, I had natural compunctions about assisting at the death-rites. Somebody had to do this, however, and who was more suitable than I who knew all the boys and had been accepted by them as a friend. The task was not a simple one. Some of these boys had been in hospital for months and had lost touch with events. They could not understand why we had dissolved and, still less, why they should join the army. I explained as simply and clearly as I could and pointed out that, as the IZL was no longer in existence, there was no one to take care of them, to see they had the necessary medical attention, if they did not join the Army.

The Haganah officers behaved with exemplary patience and tact. They gave me all the time I needed to explain away all doubts and fears, adding their assurances that there would be no discrimination in care and attention against anyone. But what explanations or assurances could I find for 18-year-old Zion who cried and said that he had been in Betar and the Irgun half of his life, and what could he possibly do without an underground? This cry of Zion's struck fear in my heart. I confess that for one moment of blind panic I was afraid of what would happen to these young men, whose dives had been wrapped in an ostensibly illegal organisation, when they should have to revert to normal lives in normal circumstances. Would their revolt against the authority of tyranny become a revolt against authority in general, or would they revert back to peace-loving, order-abiding citizens of their new, young State. I could have spared myself such misgivings. These young men integrated themselves into their new society without any of the trials and difficulties which confronted others in every other revolutionary movement throughout the annals of history. They did not become breakers of law and defiers of authority as many of our opponents prophesied in their Jeremiads. This is one of the many phenomena in which the IZL abounded and which, in itself, deserves the learned attention of future historio-philosophers.

When we came to Yaacov Mizrahi, both the Haganah officers and I were deeply moved. I explained the situation gently to him. He accepted it philosophically, expressing amazement that the Army should want him: "I don't think I shall make much of a soldier again, but if you want me to swear, I'll swear." As the swearing-in officer guided the pen in Yaacov's hand to seal, with a sprawling, unnatural signature, his induction into the Army, the tears rolled unabashedly down my cheeks. At the end of the day I walked home with the Haganah officers. One of them, a nice young man, seeing my dispiritedness, tried to console me: "Never mind," he said, meaning to be kind, "we might still need you people again if Jerusalem is internationalized." He was thoroughly snubbed for his pains. "Next time," I said tartly, "you and your friends can go underground. We shall not be Ben Gurion's dirty work for him again."

I met Shmuel at the Eden Hotel where he had been holding a Press Conference to explain the background to the liquidation of the IZL. We were both in cheerful moods and decided to dine at the hotel in an effort to restore our spirits. I was in uniform for the last time and the badge on my cap attracted the attention of a man sitting by himself at the next table to ours. He leaned over and asked me, in impeccable Southern English whether I would let him have my badge as a souvenir. I detached it and handed it to him, remarking dryly that I would not advise him to wear it publicly in England as that was the badge of the notorious Irgun Zevai Leumi. Instead of showing signs of agitation he perked up interestedly and introduced himself as a British Labor Member of Parliament on an unofficial tour of Israel. He told us that his sympathies had always been with the IZL and that he was going back to England to tell Attlee that he was making a great mistake about Israel. Shmuel invited him to come and visit us and continue the conversation. He readily accepted the invitation, but two days later the porter at the hotel informed Shmuel to say that the British Member of Parliament regretted he was unable to dine that day as he had been urgently recalled to England. We were sorry. There was so much more we would have liked him to tell Mr. Attlee. [=]

60751. Katz, Doris. The Lady Was a Terrorist During Israel's War of Liberation: Part 36: Dissolution. New York, N.Y.: Shiloni Publishers, Futuro Press, 1953. The assassination of Count Bernadotte provided my mother with just about the only experience she had not yet had in Israel. At the time of the murder, Nathan Friedman-Yellin, the leader of the LHI, was on his way to Haifa to take a plane to Europe. When the Government ordered all members of the LHI to be arrested he, naturally, headed the lists. In view of his claim that he knew nothing about the assassination, it might have been more politic for him to hand himself over to the authorities and dissociate himself from the crime. Instead, he chose to go into hiding—a rather impractical undertaking under a Jewish regime, where everybody knows everybody else's political affiliations, and where there is no longer any solidarity amongst the local inhabitants against the rule of a foreign oppressor. As the members of the LHI were taken down to the authorities in Haifa, Friedman-Yellin could not take refuge with any of them. He turned to my sister-in-law, Katie, with whom he had a slight acquaintance. My brother, Michael, and sister-in-law had been members of the IZL and were now members of the Herut Party.

When he arrived at their flat and asked for refuge, Michael and Katie did what any other decent people would do in similar circumstances—they took him in. How anyone as large as Friedman-Yellin (he is about 6 ft. and must weigh close to 200 lbs) could possibly have hoped to hide in a three-room flat in which there were, besides Michael and Katie, also three children and my mother, I cannot imagine. But he stayed there, undetected, for ten days, during which my mother had the time of her life. She was able to tell him just exactly what she thought of him and his organization. She pumped him dry on his ideologies, past and future, and she bombarded him with questions about the Bernadotte murder. The poor man could not escape and probably cursed the day he had chosen to go into hiding instead of sitting in a quiet, peaceful prison.

Friedman-Yellin continued to keep in touch with those of his colleagues who were still at large and was thus, quite inevitably, traced to Michael's flat, where he was dramatically arrested in the early hours of the morning, on the eleventh day of his sojourn there. The Israeli police were polite but firm. They searched the flat thoroughly—but quietly, as my mother threatened them, in her curious Anglo-Yiddish, that they would have to pacify the baby if they woke her. They left the flat an hour later taking with them Friedman-Yellin, all the papers, letters and photographs they could find, and Michael. They would probably have taken Katie as well if it had not been for the three little children. So now my mother's cup of experience was full—she had actually witnessed, with her own eyes, the arrest of a member of the family. She took a very poor view of this experience.

As communication with Jerusalem was still very irregular, we
